

THE ADMINISTRATION'S "NEW LOOK" AT THE SCHOOL PROBLEM

Word now is that Southern schools, under federal-court orders to integrate immediately, may face yet another legal hassle, in the suburbs, this time. Civil-rights lawyers outside the Government are considering suits that would abolish county lines for school purposes, force white suburban schools to take more blacks. The reasoning: De facto suburban segregation in the South is the outgrowth of the old system of segregation under law. Thus, it is argued, today's setup is illegal, too. Northerners will watch the outcome closely.

—U.S. News & World Report, Feb. 9, 1970.

SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN — —

The Associated Press underplayed the story and hinted that all would work out for the best, reporting that:

"Federal court-ordered deadlines for total desegregation in many Southern school districts were met yesterday by confusion, protests and school closings in some areas. In others, there was a smooth transition. Over all, the Supreme Court's directive setting Feb. 1 as the deadline for desegregation, along with lower court orders following that guideline, appeared to have brought more faculty and pupil integration than there had been. In some districts, however, schools were not opened and in others whites did not show up at schools where integration was to have taken place. . . ."

In a remarkable example of Southland-smearing and news-slanting, James T. Wooten of the "all the news that fits" New York Times inadvertently explained why there was less trouble than expected: the white children—as well as the black children whose parents could afford to—simply boycotted the Federally controlled public schools, and transferred to newly established and segregated private schools. This NYT front-page story of Sunday, Feb. 1, is an excellent example of what Vice President Spiro Agnew has been talking about. We quote parts thereof:

"Canton, Miss. Jan 30—The pretty young wife with the champaign hair waved good-by to the children from her 1970 hardtop sedan, pushed a chrome button on the dashboard and watched the tinted glass windows slide quietly shut.

"'You know,' she drawled pleasantly, adjusting the volume on a Nat King Cole stereo tape, 'I thought about this a lot and I just couldn't stand to have my kids in with all those Negroes.' So, . . . she had driven her children to the Canton Academy, an abandoned tent factory hastily converted into a private school that promises a high-quality education for her children at a reasonable price. For her, it was an almost irresistible appeal: a good segregated classroom within her budget but beyond the Federal Government's reach. . . ."

"The private school business is booming in the Old Confederacy. William F. Simmons, of the White Citizens Councils of America, a white supremacy group, estimates the growth of his organization's private schools in the Jackson, Miss. area to be nearly 3,000 in the last six weeks. There are similar reports from Florida, Georgia, and Alabama. . . ."

"According to the Southern Regional Council, 'most of the academies are not accredited by regional or state accrediting bodies, and although these schools often boast of superior teachers, many of their faculties are not certified by the state to teach. Many of the schools are operating without libraries or lunchrooms and are in makeshift buildings.' . . ."

"Despite the fears of public officials, educators and other Southern citizens, the boom in private school business does not appear to be subsiding. All across the South white parents are signing tuition checks with John Hancock flourishes, declaring their independence from the federal judiciary. 'I know these people can't afford it,' Governor Williams said recently, 'but they've got a right to do it.' Kenneth Dean of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations heard the Governor's statement and quoted William Faulkner in response. 'These people,' the Mississippi novelist once said, 'would start another Civil War knowing damn well they would lose'." (End of quotes from NYT).

In an attempt to force children to remain in Federally dominated schools, one set of jurists decreed that private schools are not tax-exempt institutions. The reaction to that opinion was quick and positive. Congressman George W. Andrews, Alabama, had the following inserted in the Jan. 28, 1970 Congressional Record.

ASSAULT ON PRIVATE SCHOOL SYSTEMS BY FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. Speaker, the assault on private school systems in this country by the Federal judiciary must be repelled, and it must be repelled now. This outrageous decision by three Federal judges in Washington, denying tax exemptions to some private schools in Mississippi, is certainly characteristic of the discriminatory nature of the court where the South is concerned.

Yet there is another profound danger in this latest rape of the law. I have warned my colleagues more than once that letting the judicial branch write laws, simply because for the moment they have application only to the South, a favorite whipping boy since time in memorium, is simply allowing the constitutional powers of the legislative branch to be eaten away.

Surely all in this body are aware that section 501(c)(3) of the Tax Code says that a nonprofit organization is exempt from Federal taxes if it is organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational purposes. We ought to know this. We wrote the law.

If my colleagues are not concerned with the loss of their power to make laws, even the ones under which the Internal Revenue Service operates, they will be most concerned when the Federal decrees now clubbing helpless southern school boards, school children, and their parents, begins to strike their own constituencies.

As the saying goes, a hit dog hollers--and where the dog happens to be at the time makes little difference. It still hurts.

I am today introducing legislation to amend sections 501 and 170 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that tax-exempt status under section 501 shall not be denied to a private school on account of the admission policies, requirements for admission, or composition of the student body or faculty of such school.

If a court of the United States enters a final judgment that the Constitution or laws of the United States prohibit the granting of exempt status to a private school on account of the admission policies, the requirements of admission, or the composition of the student body or faculty of such school, for the period during which such judgment is in effect, then no institution organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, testing for public safety, literacy, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals shall be exempt from taxation. (End of quotation).

THE "NEW LOOK"

The Administration doesn't seem overly concerned about the seeming death of the public school system. It is reported that the Administration has a plan which would make the argument of public vs. private schools of little importance. The new plan: give the money to the student instead of the school!

The National Observer, Feb. 2, 1970, has the story. We quote pertinent parts from it.

PARENTS WOULD BUY SCHOOLING WITH A VOUCHER

The Nixon Administration, having pledged "new and stronger emphasis on experimentation and evaluation" in education, is studying a plan that would permit parents to buy education for their children at any school they choose.

The working name of this device is "educational voucher." A parent would be given a voucher, representing his child's share of the public-school budget. The voucher could then be "spent" at the public or private elementary or secondary school of the parent's choice, or even, in some views, at profit-making schools that might be established in response to the voucher market.

The educational-voucher plan is being developed here (Cambridge, Mass.) at the Center for the Study of Public Policy under a $196,000 grant made in December by the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). Little publicized until now, it is one of the experiments that President Nixon alluded to in his message last week explaining his veto of the Health, Education, and Welfare bill: . . . "In my education message, which I will shortly be submitting to the Congress, I will propose a new and searching look at our American school system. . . . We are placing new and strong emphasis on experimentation and evaluation to learn about more effective approaches to education."

The voucher proposal has drawn support from both conservatives and liberals, although not always for the same reasons. It is especially attractive to those concerned with improving education of the poor, which is why OEO, the poverty agency, has funded the study. In a half-dozen states, legislation already has been introduced proposing various voucher plans, though none as ambitious as might grow out of the OEO project.

A voucher scheme would pose a bagful of Constitutional and other legal problems involving segregated schools, church run schools, and the profit motive. And it is sure to draw the ire of professional education organizations devoted to a system of public schools. . . . an NEA spokesman said just last week that widespread use of the voucher program would be a threat to the public school system, in the NEA's view. "This business of making it competitive will just widen the gap between the poorer and the richer school districts," he said, since students would tend to flow to the better schools in rich districts to the detriment of poor districts. . . .

Southern states have been attracted to voucher programs. . . . mainly as a way to circumvent integration by founding private schools supported by state tuition grants. But these schemes generally have been opposed by courts on the grounds that private schools principally supported by public funds, even if indirectly through tuition grants, is a public school for purposes of the Supreme Court's desegregation rulings.

Mr. Friedman, the University of Chicago economist whose views have been especially attractive to the Nixon Administration, proposed a voucher program for American primary and secondary schools as early as 1953. . . . In Mr. Friedman's view, parents should have absolute freedom to choose the kind of school their children attend; whether they should attend integrated schools, which he believes would be desired, should in his opinion be left to persuasion. But a virtue of the voucher system, he said last week, is that it can be devised to conform to whatever standard the issuing agency desires. "If a community at large felt strongly that you must have compulsory integration, then it could be specified that the voucher be spent only on schools that are integrated," he says.

As for attending parochial schools, he says: "I don't think a voucher system in any way violates the separation of church and state, provided that the voucher does not specify that it must be spent at a particular religious kind of school." He does not expect, however, that a voucher system would bring any great resurgence in the financially troubled parochial-school system, because other private schools would spring up to compete with them. . . .

Discerning readers will already have learned that this "voucher system" is but a snare and a delusion. It is a civilian adaptation of the education section of the GI Bill of Rights, whereby veterans are given vouchers to be spent for education; and the schools accepting them must meet rigid Federal requirements in order to qualify. There is no relaxing of Federal control under a voucher system; rather, the control is extended to cover the individual student and the parents as well as the school! One basic fact of life in a Bureaucratic State always seems to be overlooked: What the Federal Government subsidizes, the Federal Government controls —and indeed must control if any efficiency is to be made possible.

In the light of existing civil rights legislation and existing court decisions, any Federally-issued education voucher could not be honored at a segregated school, or at a Christian school, Friedman's hints to the contrary notwithstanding. Furthermore, any plan emanating from OEO will be advantageous to parasites, not to responsible parents.

Is there, then, an answer to the education problem which confronts America? We know of but one satisfactory answer, and it is summarized in a leaflet which we received recently from the Association for Christian Schools, Post Office Box 35096, Houston, Texas 77035. We reprint this Christian answer to one of America's most serious problems.

You ask me why I send my children to a Christian school?

Well, now, that's a good question. I know what you're thinking. The public schools have just as good facilities and teachers as the Christian schools, and sometimes even better. So why all this fuss and bother of setting up a separate school system? Why not teach the children religion at home or in the church or Sunday school?

But, you see, you've asked me something that gets right to the core of the meaning of life. If Christian schools meant simply tacking on a prayer each day, or an extra course in Bible study, they wouldn't be worth all the time and expense.

I send my children to the Christian school because I believe that all of life is religious. God is at the center of everything. He made all things. He guides and controls them, and He demands that we, His creatures, honor Him as Lord and Savior in everything we do.

Of course that includes our studying, as well as our everyday work. It includes every part of life, without exception. It means that I can't be satisfied with submitting my children to Christian training at home and church only. As a parent, I'm responsible for those thirty important hours that they spend each week in school. Some of the most significant training of my children takes place in the school atmosphere. How can I leave God out of the picture here?

But you say, what's the difference if my child studies arithmetic, history, or literature in a public school or in a Christian school? Much. I want my child to learn from his earliest years, that all of life belongs to God and was made for Him-

-In science, I want him to know that he is studying God's laws for the universe.

-In history, I want him to see the unfolding of God's plan for the ages and the redemption of His people.

-In literature, I want him to test other writers by Christian standards so that he will appreciate what is good and true and beautiful, and discern what is false or dishonoring to God.

-In civics, I want him to know that true government is ordained of God and requires our loyalty and support. I want him to learn the principles of honesty, decency, co-operation, and fair play because these are rules that God has set up for the ordering of our life together.

All this is a big order. It can't be accomplished in fifteen or thirty minutes a day. It takes everything we've got to instill in the hearts of our children that true fear of the Lord which is "the beginning of all wisdom."

Moses said it thousands of years ago. He told the people of Israel then how to bring up their children - God's covenant children. This is how he said it:

"Therefore shall ye lay up these words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them your children, speaking of them when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates." (Deuteronomy 11:18-20).

This means Christian education - in all of life.

Expensive? Yes, of course. We pay our full share of taxes for the public schools, and we support our Christian schools in addition to this. But we count it a privilege to have this wonderful opportunity, in a land of freedom, to dedicate ourselves and our children entirely to God.

Would you like to know more about our Christian schools, how they are operated, supported, what policies and curricula prevail? You are invited to write or call your local Christian school.

AND NOW TO ABOLISH THE FAMILY

"I am curious," wrote Abigail Adams to her friend Mercy Warren in November, 1775, "to know how you spend your time. 'Tis very saucy to make this demand upon you, but I know it must be usefully employd and I am fearful if I do not question you I shall loose some improvement which I might otherways make. . . . A patriot without religion in my estimation is as great a paradox as an honest Man without the fear of God. Is it possible that he whom no moral obligations bind can have any real Good Will towards Man, can he be a patriot who by an openly vicious conduct is undermining the very bonds of Society, corrupting the Morals of Youth and by his bad example injuring the very Country he professes to patronize more than he can possibly compensate by his intrepidity, Generosity and honour? The Scriptures tell us righteousness exalteth a Nation."

1775 was a turbulent year in American history. On the night of April 18, Paul Revere and William Dawes made their midnight ride, alerting the countryside, that men might prepare for the morrow's Battles of Lexington and Concord, and the real beginning of the great Revolution. On May 31, in 1775, the Mecklenberg Resolves, which preceded the Declaration of Independence by more than a full year, were adopted at Charlotte, N.C. The Mecklenberg Resolves declared that all laws and commissions from the King and from Parliament were null and void. On June 14, 1775, the Continental Congress voted to raise an Army, and on the following day George Washington was appointed commander-in-chief of this army-to-be. Two days later, on June 17, 1775, there was fought the Battle of Bunker Hill; and at that battle, one of the casualties was General Joseph Warren.

So, five months later, when Abigail Adams wrote a letter to Mercy Warren, asking how the latter spent her time, the question was not "very saucy," but rather, compassionate.

There was a spirit of liberation in the air. Women were seeking to determine just what their part should be in this great movement toward liberation which swept the land and wrote its history in blood. For the most part, women found their place: they molded the bullets for their husbands' muskets, and sent their men off to war, perhaps never to return. Then they took over the job of keeping the family unit intact and protected. Many of the family heads did not return, but the families did not perish, for the women saw it as their part in the great Liberation movement, to keep the family alive, and this without benefit of social security or GI Insurance; for the strength of the Nation lay, not in the wealth of the country, but in the well-ordered homes of the people. . . .

What has been romantically recalled as "four score and seven years" later, the spirit of liberation again bestirred the Nation. It led to a War Between the States and, once again, the family unit was endangered, for brother often fought against brother, and "womens' lib" movements were rife. Let us turn the spotlight of history briefly on the year 1851:

Amelia Jenks Bloomer, editor of The Lily (a womens' liberation magazine) had just launched her campaign for reform of women's dress (bloomers, not bras, were involved). Horace Greeley was publishing serially in his New York Tribune, Karl Marx's Revolution and Counter Revolution. President Fillmore had just signed a new Fugitive Slave Law and had called upon the northern States to execute the law.

And, in 1851, being read by women throughout the land, were the works of Lydia Hunt Sigourney (1795-1865), an American author who became famous for her series of Letters to Young Ladies. To recreate the spirit of "womens' lib" which permeated society at that time, we republish excerpts from that series of letters.

TO YOUNG WOMEN

The mind of the present age, acting on the mind of the next, is an object of concern to every being endowed with intellect, or interested, through love or hope, in the welfare of the human race. Our age fully admits this sentiment: and we see not only the theorist and the practical man, but the divine, the philosopher, and the poet, devising modes of nurture for the unfolding mind, and striving to make useful knowledge the guest of the common people. . . . Is it not important that the sex to whom nature has entrusted the moulding of the whole mass of mind in its first formation should be acquainted with the structure and developments of mind? that they who are to nurture the future rulers of a prosperous people should be able to demonstrate, from the broad annal of history, the value of just laws and the duty of subordination? the blessings which they inherit, and the danger of their abuse? Is it not requisite that they, on whose bosom the infant heart must be cherished, should be vigilant to watch its earliest pulsations for good or evil? that they who are commissioned to light the lamp of the soul should know how to feed it with pure oil? that they in whose hand is the welfare of beings never to die, should be fitted to perform the work and earn the plaudit of heaven?

The natural vocation of females is to teach. In seminaries, academies, and schools they possess peculiar facilities for coming in contact with the unfolding and unformed mind. It is true, that only a small proportion are engaged in the departments of public and systematic instruction. Yet the hearing of recitations, and the routine of scholastic discipline, are but parts of education. It is in the domestic sphere, in her own native province, that woman is inevitably a teacher. There she modifies by her example, her dependants, her companions, every dweller under her roof. Is not the infant in its cradle her pupil? Does not her smile give the earliest lessons to its soul? Is not her prayer the first messenger for it in the court of Heaven? Does she not enshrine her own image in the sanctuary of the young child's mind so firmly that no revulsion can displace, no idolatry supplant it? Does she not guide the daughter, until, placing her hand in that of her husband, she reaches that pedestal, from whence, in her turn, she imparts to others the stamp and colouring which she has herself received? Might not she, even upon her sons, engrave what they shall take unchanged, through all the temptations of time, to the bar of the last judgment? Does not the influence of woman rest upon every member of her household, like the dew upon the tender herb, or the sunbeam silently educating the young flower? or as the shower and the sleepless stream, cheer and invigorate the proudest tree of the forest?

Admitting, then, that whether she wills it or not, whether she even knows it or not, she is still a teacher, and perceiving that the mind in its most plastic state is yielded to her tutelage, it becomes a most momentous inquiry what she shall be qualified to teach. Will she not of necessity impart what she most prizes and best understands? Has she not the power to impress her own lineaments on the next generation? If wisdom and utility have been the objects of her choice, society will surely reap the benefit. If folly and self-indulgence are her prevailing characteristics, posterity are in danger of inheriting the likeness.

This influence is most visible and operative in a republic. The intelligence and virtue of its every citizen have a heightened relative value. Its safety may be interwoven with the destiny of those whose birthplace is in obscurity. The springs of its vitality are liable to be touched, or the chords of its harmony to be troubled, by the rudest hands.

Teachers under such a form of government should be held in the highest honour. They are the allies of legislators. They have agency in the prevention of crime. They aid in regulating the atmosphere, whose incessant action and pressure causes the life blood to circulate, and return pure and healthful to the heart of the nation.

Of what unspeakable importance, then, is her education, who gives lessons before any other instructor; who preoccupies the unwritten page of being; who produces impressions which only death can obliterate; and mingles with the cradle-dream what shall be read in eternity. Well may statesmen and philosophers debate how she may be best educated who is to educate all mankind.

The ancient republics overlooked the value of that sex whose strength is in the heart. Greece, so susceptible to the principle of beauty, so skilled in wielding all the elements of grace, failed in appreciating their excellence, whom these had most exquisitely adorned. If, in the brief season of youthful charm, she was constrained to admire woman as the acanthus-leaf of her own Corinthian capital, she did not discover how, like that very column, she was capable of adding stability to the proud temple of freedom. She would not be convinced that so feeble a hand might have aided to consolidate the fabric which philosophy embellished, and luxury overthrew.

Rome, notwithstanding her primeval rudeness, seems more correctly than polished Greece to have estimated the "weaker vessel." Here and there, upon the storm-driven billows of her history, some solitary form towers upward in majesty, and the mother of the Gracchi still stands forth in strong relief amid imagery over which time has no power. But still, wherever the brute force of the warrior is counted godlike, woman is appreciated only as she approximates to sterner natures: as in that mysterious image which troubled the sleep of Assyria's king—the foot of clay derived consistence from the iron which held it in combination.

In our own republic, man, invested by his Maker with the right to reign, has conceded to her, who was for ages in vassalage, equality in intercourse, participation in knowledge, dominion over his dearest and fondest hopes. He is content to “bear the burden and heat of the day,” that she may dwell in ease and affluence. Yet, from the very felicity of her lot, dangers are generated. She is tempted to be satisfied with superficial attainments, or to indulge in that indolence which corrodes intellect, and merges the high sense of responsibility in its alluring and fatal slumbers.

These tendencies should be neutralized by a thorough and laborious education. Sloth and luxury must have no place in her vocabulary. Her youth should be surrounded by every motive to application, and her maturity dignified by the hallowed office of rearing the immortal mind. While her partner toils for his stormy portion of that power or glory from which it is her privilege to be sheltered, let her feel that in the recesses of domestic privacy she still renders a noble service to the government that protects her, by sowing seeds of purity and peace in the hearts of those who shall hereafter claim its honours or control its destinies.

Her place is amid the quiet shades, to watch the little fountain ere it has breathed a murmur. But the fountain will break forth into a rill, and the swollen rivulet rush towards the sea; and who can be so well able to guide them in right channels as she who heard their first ripple, and saw them emerge like timid strangers from their source, and had kingly power over those infant-waters, in the name of Him who caused them to flow? And now, Guardians of Education, whether parents, preceptors, or legislators — you who have so generously lavished on woman the means of knowledge — complete your bounty by urging her to gather its treasures with a tireless hand. Demand of her as a debt the highest excellence which she is capable of attaining. Summon her to abandon selfish motives and inglorious ease. Incite her to those virtues which promote the permanence and health of nations. Make her accountable for the character of the next generation. Give her solemn charge in the presence of men and of angels. Gird her with the whole armour of education and piety, and see if she be not faithful to her children, to her country, and to her God.

For the strength of a nation, especially of a republican nation, is in the intelligent and well-ordered homes of the people. And in proportion as the discipline of families is relaxed, will the happy organization of communities be affected, and national character become vagrant, turbulent, or ripe for revolution. . . .

1775 — 1851 — 1971 — three years in the history of the United States of America in which the spirit of liberation and the inevitable revolution which must follow, have threatened to destroy the American family as the elemental unit from which community, society, nations, are built.

But, oh, how different are the voices heard in the land in the year of our Lord 1971. There is, for example, Earl Warren, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He calls for a “new civilization.” He envisions a new law order in which men “become truly partners in a new creation—creation of a new heaven and a new earth—better than any which preceded it” (Los Angeles Herald Examiner, Dec. 14, 1970). Warren is not content with working toward a world under God's Law; he would replace God's Law with the laws of men—which, incidentally, would do away with God's holy sacraments as well, one of which is holy matrimony; which involves one woman —one only and woman only—becoming bone of the bones and flesh of the flesh of one man—again one only and man only; the two united to form one family unit, after the fashion which God Himself began, and blessed.

We quoted Abigail Adams as of 1775, and we quoted Lydia Sigourney as of 1851. Now, in contrast, we quote Patricia Coffin, “modern living editor” of Look Magazine, the Jan. 26, 1971 issue of which is a “special issue” commemorating the death of the “American Family” as it has existed in the past. Editor Coffin writes some of the truth, but not all of the truth. Excerpts:

“The family—the unit upon which our entire society is based—is being totally restructured. This shake-up is the most significant aspect of the underground revolution. . . .

we were founded, we will be reborn—in rebellion... Today's young are more idealistic than their parents. They are truly color-blind. They are committed to a warless world. I salute them. Theirs is the future. They are breaking down false family inhibitions... This revolution can't be a bummer—because the family is the basic pad from which our spaceship earth is being launched into the future... ”

Alvin Toffler is the science reporter for the new age of non-marriage. Author of the book Future Shock, he is being quoted, asked to contribute, appear, address, predict, etc. In his contribution to Look, he tells us that biological breakthroughs will shatter the family structure. He says that “America's only beginning to feel the first impact of the pill, but the pill is like a popgun compared to the howitzers and nuclear weaponry that lie ahead in the field of biology; the notion that babies can be raised outside the womb, the possibility of creating what somebody has called ‘identi-groups’—tens of thousands of people with identical genetic characteristics—the possibilities of, in effect, pre-programming your own children and determining their characteristics. The striking thing about all of these developments is that they don't lie 50 years or a hundred years in the future; if you talk to scientists working on this, you get estimates of ten years... ”

“We forget that we've radically increased the rate of change in society, change in jobs, change in neighborhoods, changing sexual patterns, changing leisure-time pursuits, the change in the ratio between alcohol and drugs, and all these feed into society and make it more difficult for two people in love to grow together... My own hunch is that most people will try to go blindly through the motions of a traditional marriage, and try to keep the traditional family going, and they'll fail... ”

All in all, Look and Toffler and other current observers to the contrary notwithstanding, Huxley probably painted the clearest picture in his Brave New World: babies being pre-programmed in massive state hatcheries, the woman being totally liberated from the duties of womanhood, wifeness and motherhood. In the ant society, families are not required — but neither are souls.

Against all of these scientists and devotees of planned evolution, we utter these words of caution: If a New Society is established in which the traditional family unit no longer functions, then the New Society will be a society without a civilization, without a culture, and without a future; a society less law abiding than a society of wolves, or of elephants.

At the risk of being called as old fashioned as the nineteenth century Lydia Sigourney, let us point out that the family has certain functions which the scientists and sociologists seem to forget. The family, for example, is a country's best police force: it protects children by training and supervision from criminals and perverts. Despite the failure of millions of families, families still police and discipline the great majority of the nation's children. Moreover, the family is still the best educator ever discovered.

There is one example of failure in attempts to destroy the family unit. In Soviet Russia the “women's lib” movement was a complete success. Women were freed from the burdens of family life, were permitted to engage in the joys of ditch-digging, street-cleaning, and all the other previously man-dominated chores. Science had not yet freed woman from the burden of child-bearing, but in Russia she was certainly freed from the task of child-rearing; for she could place her infant in a well-tended nurse and go about her duties in field or factory. But this whole program has been one of the biggest of Communism's many big failures. Despite easy divorce, nurseries, communal living, the people in Russia still live as families — a scientific program of family-annihilation did not work.

There is this fact that scientific socialists forget: The family system is God-ordained, not man-ordained. It survived the passing of Greece, the fall of Rome, the death of empires, world wars and civil wars, depressions and inflations; and it may just survive the march of “planned evolution;” because the family and marriage came before even church and state. God ordained marriage in Eden, it is the only institution whose origin is in paradise, and, when entered into and kept in terms of God's law, it is still man's happiest state. Because it came first, the family is the basic reality of man's life. When man loses touch with reality, he loses touch with life, and that means death. St. Paul declared that the commandment to honor one's parents, the family commandment, “is the first commandment with promise,” the promise being a good life, a long life, a happy life.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part One

INTRODUCTORY -

The Constitution of the United States is—at the time of this writing—still the supreme law of the land, and this regardless of the attempts of saboteurs and underminers who would have it otherwise. And, under that Constitution, you have certain rights which can not be interfered with, save by due process of law. For instance, if you are a citizen, you have a right to maintain a home of your own. You may not have exercised it, but the right is yours, just the same. You have the right to travel wherever you wish. You may not ever have gone ten miles from your place of residence, but you have the right to roam if you choose. You have the right to engage in business, or accept employment of any character offered you and, although during this last generation there have been enacted certain so-called civil rights laws which actually have deprived citizens of their Constitutional rights, such laws are, per se, unconstitutional; though nothing will ever be done about this situation unless the people, themselves, rise up and demand a return to the Constitution and to Constitutional government. Through apathy, ignorance, fear and the use of deception, the citizens of the United States have surrendered their rights as individuals.

Now, these individual rights of which we speak, are rights which derive from that first and foremost individual right: the right to own private property. This is a right laid down by the Lord God Himself when He delegated to Moses the task of setting up a civil government for the service and protection of the citizens of the kingdom of Israel.

After Joshua had captured the promised land, the very last thing he did was confirm a covenant with the people in Shechem, then "Joshua let the people depart, every man unto his inheritance." So firm and inflexible was this right to property that when King Ahab asked Naboth for some of his land, Naboth said, "The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee." When Jezebel plotted the death of Naboth because he refused to give up his property, then the Prophet Elijah told Ahab that his children should suffer, and that Jezebel would be eaten by dogs (I Kings, Chapter 21).

Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, in testifying before the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1957, explained the importance of the property right with the following illustrations:

A man is free on the inside because he has a soul that he can call his own. Wherever you have the spirit you have freedom. A pencil has no freedom, ice has no freedom to be warm, fire has no freedom to be cool. You begin to have freedom only when you have something immaterial or spiritual.

Now, freedom must have some external guaranty of itself. The external guaranty of human freedom is property. A man is free on the inside because he can call his soul his own; he is free on the outside because he can call something he has his own. Therefore private property is the economic guaranty of human freedom. . . .

Now, there is another school of thought: it holds that private property is the enemy of human freedom, that man is not really free unless he is free of all things that he can call his own, if man is to be free, he must be free of property, free of responsibility, free from competition, and free from all thoughts that would make a person think of himself as an individual created in the image of God.

Here, then, are the two opposites:

- 1) Private property is the proof of human freedom, versus
- 2) Private property is the proof of human slavery.

Between these two extremes there are the dreams of the utopians who seek perfection in human society, and the schemes of the seekers of power and pelf for themselves or for some "chosen people" who are supposedly destined to rule the world.

Of the idealists, Fred R. Marvin wrote:

Locating the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, hunting for the fountain of perpetual youth, seeking a system of society wherein all will be equal in every respect and wherein, with little or no effort, one can enjoy unlimited luxuries, are things that have engaged the attention of mankind from the beginning of written history. There is no fountain of perpetual youth. There is not, and can not be, a society such as idealists have pictured, so long as man exhibits traits of envy, jealousy, greed, avarice, lust, shiftlessness, laziness, etc. Man has learned that the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow and the fountain of perpetual youth are myths, but unfortunately, man has not yet learned that a social and political Utopia is also a myth.

A large number of books have been written—are still being written—on the subject of Utopia. Among them is one by J. H. Beadle, an early day western newspaperman who wrote a book called Western Wilds, and the Men Who Redeemed Them. Copyright 1878, printed by a publishing house long since out of existence and probably read by few even when published, the book tells of one Rodney Geffroy, then an old prospector, whom the author met near Georgetown, Colorado. Geffroy was the son of a Swiss mother and a French father. His father had been fired by the writings of Rousseau. When yet a young man, Rodney was sure that the wonderful Socialist society of which his father had taught him, could never be found in the old world, so he migrated to the United States. He visited New Harmony, a socialist colony in Indiana.

"At New Harmony I found the short-lived experiment a failure. Communism was even less satisfactory. The religious communes I found intolerable from their plentiful lack of common sense. I turned my steps toward Nauvoo, then rising into prominence as the last and greatest attempt to establish a religious brotherhood. But there I found all the evils of the old system with few of their corresponding benefits; priestcraft without paternal care, greed without a thought of future reckoning, insuring the defeat of their own aims, and a fanaticism which scorned the commonest suggestions of prudence."

And so he traveled on, seeking Utopia. But he began to conclude that "Practical life has taught me to dream no more of the Brotherhood of Man; than liberty and progress are to be secured by no cunningly devised schemes, but earned by slow and toilsome steps of the individual."

So the seeker after Utopia joined a troop engaged to fight with Mexico. In a battle, while seeking to escape, his horse jumped a cliff and he was injured. When he regained consciousness he found himself in a little hut attended by a Spanish girl. She nursed him back to health but knowing that if captured he would be executed, she hired an Indian guide to take him to a Moqui Indian camp in the Sierra Madre range in what is now New Mexico. He found this camp of primitive Indians to be a kind of socialistic institution. He said:

"The government, if government it might be called, was a pure paternalism; but repression was unnecessary because crime could scarcely be said to exist. At last, said I, I have found the Brotherhood of Man. There is no scheming of man to supplant his fellow; here all are equal and obedience to natural law with mutual toleration takes the place of courts and statutes."

Here he lived a year and, continuing his account of this utopian experiment, he said:

"But I soon found that in parting with most of the faults of a progressive race, they had parted with many of the virtues and all of the advantages. There was no envy, for there was no emulation; the weak were not trodden down by the strong in a struggle for place, for there was no struggle. There was no caste, for there was neither rank nor wealth; a dead level of mediocrity took the place of our many distinctions of birth and condition. They had not the petty vices of the trading people, as they had little intercourse with the rest of mankind; nor the faults of the manufacturing towns, for every family was its own manufacturer. Political strife never disturbed them, for there was no choice as to the form of government, and no energy to change the ruler. The chief did not rob the people, for they had nothing worth his taking; the people did not envy their king, for he was poor as themselves. Luxury and its attendant vices they knew not; the land sufficed but for a bare existence; and unchastity was so rare as to be looked upon as a monstrous phenomenon. But this chastity resulted from the lack of aggressive energy. No military ambition disturbed the placid current of their lives; they scarcely knew how to defend themselves against their savage neighbors, and retiring into these rock-defended fastnesses, they had left the open country to their foes.

“Then I say that energy is evolved only in conflict; that a vigorous combat with evil develops the individual, and that a state from which ambition should be banished to leave the citizen free from conflict, would be a state in which moral vigor would in turn decay, and social stagnation as a living tomb (would) swallow up the proudest product of the march of minds. With these people one day passed as another. Whether they had a belief in immortality, I could not learn; but they might well ignore it since even in this world they were already dead. Beyond the narrow horizon of their hills, they saw nothing; to them this basin was the world. Ambition had no place in their dull emotions. One year I abode with these people. It was a rest; but for a lifetime—ah, that would be consignment to a living tomb.”

And the author concludes: “Truly a state of society where all men are equal, have equal, do equal—a dead level—would be a living tomb; and yet... in the face of sound reason and common sense, men and women continue to join the army in search of the impossible. It would be far better to revive the fables of old that, at the end of the rainbow there was a pot of gold for whomsoever might reach it, or that somewhere on this globe there was a spring of water a drink from which would give a person eternal youth, and set bodies of men and women in pursuit of the gold or perpetual youth. Less harm to humanity, at least, would result.”

So much for the idealists who seek for an earthly Utopia. There also are the seekers of power and pelf who promise Utopias to the people to promote their own selfish ends. On page 422 of Eliphas Levi's book, The History of Magic, there is this description of James Jacques Rousseau:

Once there was a man in the world who was so soured on discovering that his disposition was cowardly and vicious, and he visited the consequent disgust on society at large. He was an ill-starred lover of Nature and Nature in her wrath armed him with eloquence as a scourge. He dared to plead the cause of ignorance in the face of science, of savagery in the face of civilization, of low-lived depths in the face of all social heights. Instinctively the populace pelted his mania, yet he was welcomed by the great and lionized by the women. His success was so signal, by revulsion his hatred of humanity increased and he ended in suicide as the final issue of rage and disgust... After his death the world was shaken by its attempt to realize his dream.

The above, written of Rousseau, might be used, save for the suicide, as an apt description of Weishaupt, Marx, Baboef, Lenin, Trotsky, Stalin, and others who promoted for selfish purposes, the impossible dream of the Brotherhood of Man in a man-created heaven on earth.

But, in all this conflict of ideas and of ideals, in this mad desire to “return everything to chaos” or to establish a man-made Utopia on earth, the key to understanding it all is this:

There is a fixed belief that all present day social, economic and political ills are due to ownership of private property, to all forms of government which recognize the private property right, to all religions that uphold the private property right, and to all institutions which derive from property rights, such as the family.

This “fixed belief” was spelled out in six “abolitions” by Adam Weishaupt, of whom we shall have more to say later. He called for:

1. Abolition of all ordered governments.
2. Abolition of private property.
3. Abolition of the right of inheritance.
4. Abolition of patriotism.
5. Abolition of the family.
6. Abolition of religion.

About 75 years after the publication of the above, Karl Marx came out with a revised and expanded set of commandments:

1. Abolition of property in land and application of all rents of lands to public purposes.
2. A heavy progressive or graduated income tax.
3. Abolition of all right of inheritance.
4. Confiscation of the property of all emigrants and rebels.
5. Centralization of credit in the hands of the State, by means of a national bank with State capital and an exclusive monopoly.
6. Centralization of the means of communication and transport in the hands of the State.
7. Extension of factories and instruments of production owned by the State; the bringing into cultivation of waste lands, and the improvement of the soil generally in accordance with a common plan.

8. Equal liability of all labor. Establishment of industrial armies, especially for agriculture.
9. Combination of agriculture with manufacturing industries; gradual abolition of the distinction between town and country by a more equable distribution of population over the country.
10. Free education of all children in public schools. Abolition of children's factory labor in its present form. Combination of education with industrial production, etc., etc. (Reprinted from the "Lusk Report").

There is a certain quotation which we have printed from time to time, and we should like to call your attention to it once more:

"It often happens, too, both in courts and in cabinets, that there are two things going on together—a main plot and an underplot—and he that understands only one of them will, in all probability, be the dupe of both."

The above is a very good thought to keep in mind as we study the present international conspiracy. There are so many "underplots" that we are apt to be the dupe of the main plot unless we understand something of all of them.

First, it should be understood that the basic tenets of the overall conspiracy were perfected long before Adam Weisshaupt or Karl Marx were born.

Secondly, it should be understood that whatever the name used to designate any particular branch of the conspiracy, one basic aim is common to them all: The abolition of the private property right.

Thirdly, it should be understood that this conspiracy presents a different face to different people in different countries. Professor Arthur Shadwell, of London, made an extensive study of the disease that was destroying the British Empire, and England, and his conclusions are worthy of study, and application:

"Socialism is described by different writers as a religion, a faith, a philosophy of life, a theory of evolution, a step in evolution, an historical necessity, an economic necessity, a new conception of society, an attitude toward life, practical Christianity, the Kingdom of God on earth, an opportunity for self-expression, an economic system, an ethical code, a class struggle, a spirit, a theory of political action, a theory of society, the opposite of Individualism, a tendency, democracy applied to industry, the science of minding our own business, a body of economic, political and social doctrine and philosophy, a scientific theory, a man's mind developed, a criticism, a feeling, an ethical-religious mass movement, a system of political organization, science wedded to art, common sense, a theory of national and municipal house-keeping, mankind functioning in the spiritual plane, a collective consciousness in humanity, the antithesis of Capitalism, the political and social faith of all sensible men—besides many other things."

Being a Britisher, the writer of the above overlooked a few American definitions, such as New Deal, New Frontier, Great Society, etc. Before making his summary of definitions, Prof. Shadwell commented: "Socialism springs from and expresses the most contrary primitive motives—love and hate, greed and sacrifice, envy and pity, pugnacity and peacability. It wears the badge of the gentle emotions, but makes most appeal to the destructive ones."

It is because of the contrary and antagonistic features of this cause of world unrest, distrust, class-hatred and the revolutionary spirit it breeds, that it is so little understood by those whose very lives depend upon a better understanding. It preaches love while practicing hate, it urges sacrifices while intensifying greed, it expresses pity for some but envy for most, while displaying the banner of peace it has declared war on every government that honors the Prince of Peace and is urging bloody revolution to attain its ends.

The late George Bernard Shaw observed that "Communism is the same as Socialism, but better English." Shaw should know, for he was a Fabian Socialist from its beginnings. Because we need to know this "better English," we are writing this series of letters.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Two

THE SEED IS PLANTED

Socialism, as it has developed, may be defined as government ownership or control of the means of production and distribution of goods. It is always disguised as public ownership or ownership by the people, but these are semantics, or word tricks. Public property must be administered for the public, and whatever agency assumes the duties of management automatically assumes the duties of government, for the terms are synonyms. The people are said to own everything in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, but some agency must manage things for the people, and the management is the government.

In the United States socialism has aimed more at control, rather than ownership, of the means of production and distribution of goods. But this is a subject for discussion for later letters in this series.

Socialism may be ushered into a country all at once by violence or revolutionary action, usually by a small group who seize control. But, more often, socialism is approached gradually by popular vote using such terms as central planning, social security, public housing, wage and price controls, civil rights legislation, federal aid to education, etc.... all of which indicate varying degrees of government intervention and partial control over economic activities.

But we are dealing with beginnings, and socialism began when the first man saw a wall or fence erected by another man, and cried: "This man has no right to fence off this land and call it his own; because private ownership of property is the root of all evil." And if we were to choose a date for the beginnings of organized socialism (though the name itself had not yet been coined), we might start with the year 1185.

In 1185 there was formed in what is now called France, a society known as "Confrerie de la Paix." It was essentially a pacifist organization which started out to promote "world peace through world law." But the pleas for peace soon were shunted aside and the idea of "Community of Land" began to be preached. As soon as this communistic scheme came to the attention of the authorities, it was outlawed and the "Confrerie de la Paix" went underground.

Half a millenium later, in 1712, there was born Jean Jacques Rousseau, a man who called himself a Jew of French citizenship. He proclaimed himself the new prophet of the new golden age which he was going to usher into the world. He dug up, polished and modernized the old slogans and cliches of the earlier socialists, and become quite influential in the intellectual circles of his day. We like the description of him written by Professor Lothrop Stoddard:

He was born of unsound stock. He was neurotic, mentally unstable, morally weak, sexually perverted, and during the latter part of his life was undoubtedly insane. Together with all this however he possessed great literary talents, his style, persuasiveness and charm captivating and convincing multitudes. He accordingly exerted upon the world a profound—and in the main a baneful—influence, which is working indirectly but powerfully even today."

Rousseau's main theme might be summed up in one sentence: "Destroy civilization; whatever is, is wrong." Or, as the British authority on socialism, Nesta Webster, wrote:

Destroy civilization in its entirety and the human race sinks to the level of the jungle in which the only law is that of the strong over the weak; the only incentive, the struggle for material need. For although Rousseau's injunction, "Go back into the woods and become men!" may be excellent advice if interpreted as a temporary measure, "go back into the woods and remain there" is a counsel for anthropoid apes!

Then came Adam Weishaupt; and here we meet the direct ancestor of the Marxian system of socialism. Weishaupt was a German who received his education at the hands of the Catholic Society of Jesus. But he broke with the Jesuits and—either by preference or invitation—left the religious order and came to hate it. About 1770 he became professor of canon law at the University of Ingolstadt, Bavaria. Weishaupt claims to have devoted the next five years to a careful survey of all the ills which beset mankind. At the end of that time, he presented to the world his theory, which is the foundation for the teachings of the present day Socialist School of Thought, although the leaders of that School will insist they know nothing about Adam Weishaupt and his Order of the Illuminati, and will insist they are expounding the theories of Karl Marx.

All that Karl Marx did was to reinterpret the program and philosophy of the Illuminati in order to bring it up to date and make it acceptable in practice for the so-called Machine Age, or Industrial Age, which was then visibly emerging. The same thread that runs through Marx's writings is discernible in the writings of Weishaupt. Marxism is Illuminism applied to the Machine Age (even as Fabianism is Marxism applied to the Anglo-Saxon heritage, and as Communism is Marxism applied to the Oriental heritage).

As a matter of historical interest, 1776 is an important year, because two things happened which were destined to shake the world:

On May 1st, 1776, Adam Weishaupt promulgated his Order of the Illuminati; and on July 4th, 1776, the American Declaration of Independence was published.

A very interesting book was written just a few years after the beginning of the French Revolution, by Professor John Robison, then Secretary to the Royal Society of Edinburgh, Scotland, and a traveler in Europe at the time of the Illuminati's greatest power. Titled, "Proofs of a Conspiracy," Professor Robison displayed considerable understanding of the reason why so many world revolutionaries are always against property rights, patriotism, religion, and family loyalty. According to Professor Robison:

... The more closely we examine the principles and practices of the Illuminati, the more clearly do we perceive that this is the case. Their first and immediate aim is to get the possession of riches, power, and influence, without industry; and to accomplish this, they want to abolish Christianity; and then dissolute manners and universal profligacy will procure them the adherence of all the wicked, and enable them to overturn all the civil governments of Europe; after which they will think of further conquests, and extend their operations to the other quarters of the globe, till they have reduced mankind to the state of one undistinguishable chaotic mass.

In describing the techniques of these 18th century collectivists, Professor Robison gives us some information that, although written in 1798, seems very modern indeed:

Patriotism and loyalty were called narrow-minded prejudices, and incompatible with universal benevolence; continual declamations were made on liberty and equality as the unalienable rights of man. The baneful influence of accumulated property was declared an insurmountable obstacle to the happiness of any nation whose chief laws were framed for its protection and increase....

... After the mind of the pupil has been warmed by the pictures of universal happiness, and convinced that it is a possible thing to unite all the inhabitants of the earth in one great society, and after it has been made out, in some measure to the satisfaction of the pupil, that a great addition of happiness is gained by the abolition of national distinctions and animosities, it may frequently be no hard task to make him think that patriotism is a narrow-minded monopolizing sentiment, and even incompatible with the more enlarged views of the Order, namely, the uniting of the whole human race into one great and happy society....

The promoters of Illuminism were not fuzzy-minded idealists, they were very practical people with a very bold plan for ruling the world. They did not stop with the enunciation of theories. They also developed ways and means for putting their theories into practice. In the instructions which were given to the initiates of the Illuminati, we read:

We must acquire the direction of education, of church management, of the professorial chair, and of the pulpit. We must bring our opinions into fashion by every art, spread them among the people by the help of young writers. We must preach the warmest concern for humanity, and make people indifferent to all other relations. We must take care that our writers be well puffed, and that the Reviewers do not depreciate them; therefore we must endeavor by every means to gain over the Reviewers and Journalists; and we must also try to gain the booksellers, who in time will see that it is their interest to side with us.

Add to Weishaupt's eighteenth century writers, reviewers, journalists and booksellers our twentieth century columnists, commentators, motion picture actors, producers and directors, radio and television owners, managers, and producers; and all you have is the plan of the Illuminati brought up to date!

It should also be pointed out that, for his day, Weishaupt's objectives were very bold. Had his whole scheme been known, it would have been met with revulsion, and Weishaupt and his followers would probably have been lynched. Therefore, even as today, it was necessary for him to set up a system of deception, fraud, intrigue, falsehood; in short, a total conspiracy. So, to conceal facts from the members themselves, the membership was divided into Degrees, with those in one Degree knowing nothing of the activities and personnel of any other Degree above them. The system of securing followers will sound familiar to students of today's conspiracies against God and Country:

Organizers or propagandists would go to some person known to be religious, and tell him the whole object of the Order of the Illuminati was to advance the interests of the church. If taken in by this, and many sincere people were, this person would ask if he could become a member. After being granted this "great privilege," he would be inducted into a Degree where all were like-minded and where the general discussions were so directed as to create no suspicion. Meanwhile, another organizer or propagandist would go to some individual known to be atheistically inclined; and he would be told that the whole purpose of the Order was to wreck the church and destroy its influence. This being in harmony with his wishes and desires, he would apply for membership in the Order; and he then would be inducted into a Degree where all were like-minded with only one group leader really knowing "what it was all about."

And so on down the line. Those who wanted to overthrow the government were all in the same Degree; those who wanted to destroy the moral code were in a Degree where all were like-minded; and so on, in a manner similar to the Communist "fronts" that were so numerous during World War II and thereafter.

Those in each of Weishaupt's Degrees were gradually led into the common movement, their objections to certain aims of the Order being slowly broken down. Professor Robison cited authentic documents and explained how deception was used by Weishaupt and his Adepts. Dr. Robison wrote:

He employs the Christian religion, which he thinks a falsehood, and which he is afterwards to explode, as the means for inviting Christians of every denomination, and gradually cajoling them, by clearing up their Christian doubts in succession, till he lands them in Deism; or if he finds them unfit, or too religious, he gives them a sta bene, and then laughs at their fears, or perhaps madness, in which he leaves them. Having got them the length of Deism, they are declared to be fit, and he receives them into the higher mysteries. . . .

When he could not persuade them by his own firmness, and indeed by his superior talents and disinterestedness in other respects, and his unwearied activity, he employed jesuitical tricks, causing them to fall out with each other, setting them as spies on each other, and separating any two that he saw attached to each other, by making one the Master of the other; and, in short, he left nothing undone that could secure his uncontrolled command.

The members took code names; Weishaupt being known as Spartacus, for example. And code names were given cities and towns, to hide their meetings and activities from outsiders.

Weishaupt recognized the value of women in promoting his revolutionary aims, and sought to organize them, as well. One of the Illuminist leaders wrote:

There is no way of influencing men so powerfully as by means of women. These should therefore be our chief study; we should insinuate ourselves into their good opinion, give them hints of emancipation from the tyranny of public opinion, and of standing up for themselves; it will be an immense relief to their enslaved minds to be freed from any one bond of restraint, and it will fire them the more, and cause them to work for us with zeal without knowing that they do so, for they will only be indulging their own desire of personal admiration.

Another leader, Zwack, code name Cato, proposed the formation of a woman's auxiliary. Dr. Robison quotes from a document in the handwriting of Zwack:

It will be of great service, and procure us both much information and money, and will suit charmingly the taste of many of our truest members, who are lovers of the sex. It should consist of two classes, the virtuous and the free hearted

(i.e., those who fly out of the common track of prudish manners); they must not know of each other, and must be under the direction of men, but without knowing it. Proper books must be put into their hands, and such (but secretly) as are flattering to their passions.

Need we call your attention to the parallel: the womens' auxiliaries of Weishaupt's day, and the Womens' Lib organizations of our day? And though it is not generally realized that there is a Central Control Headquarters which directs all of the seemingly separate and independent movements of our day, they all are subsidiaries of what we might call the Socialist Conspiracy.

To illustrate: Those who are religiously inclined are attracted by some organization with the word "church" or "Christian" in its title, one which sets itself up to promote "the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God." So very successful has this strategy been, that an organization calling itself the National Council of Churches has become the largest socialist lobby in the nation's capitol!

The Communist wing of the Socialist movement still employs the device of using code names for its members; in the past few years we have seen the utilization of women's organizations; and one of Weishaupt's vilest tricks—the use of drugs to further his purposes—has now become an open program.

If you look in a modern dictionary or encyclopedia, you probably will find the Order of the Illuminati referred to as an 18th century "humanitarian movement." You will not be told that Weishaupt was able to hide his Illuminati Degrees within the Degrees of Masonry. Nor will you be told that Illuminism invaded the young United States, and that such notable Americans as George Washington and John Adams warned against the evils of this secret order.

A part of Dr. Robison's warning has been almost totally overlooked by most students of the occult. We refer to the later creation of the German Union and the establishment of "reading clubs" where the Illuminist thoughts and theories were taught and handed on to new adepts after the secret order had supposedly been suppressed.

Bavarian police, it is true, learned of the Order of the Illuminati and its treasonous activities, raided its headquarters and, supposedly, put an end to the organization. But Weishaupt and his principal Adepts were never captured. They simply went to other parts of Europe—especially France where they inspired the French Revolution—and their work continued in new ways. For example, shortly after the alleged demise of the Order of Illuminati there emerged the "German Union," an organization which, in Dr. Robeson's own words:

But, although I cannot consider the German Union as a formal revival of the Order under another name... I consider the Union as a part of Spartacus's work... The leaven was not only distributed, but the management of the fermentation was now understood, and it went on apace.

Dr. Robison also described the reading clubs which were formed in Germany, as supplements to the German Union itself. Selected intellectuals would be invited to these private club meetings, where propaganda would be read and discussed and plans made for the propagation of socialist and internationalist schemes.

But the movement had already spread beyond the borders of what was to become Germany. The Jacobin Club was the "legal" organization of the members of the Illuminati. Similar clubs existed in almost every city in Europe. Thomas Frost, author of "The Secret Societies of the European Revolution," wrote, in 1876: "The political history of Europe during the last hundred years has been made, to so considerable an extent, by the various secret associations by which revolutions and insurrections have been prepared, that our knowledge of it is incomplete and unsatisfactory without some acquaintance with the agencies which, during that period, have been incessantly at work beneath the surface. The great European convulsion of the last century was foreshadowed by the Illuminati."

Weishaupt wanted to establish what he called The Kingdom of the Just. 70 years later Marx and Engels were commissioned to write the Communist Manifesto by an organization calling itself the League of the Just. The resemblance in names was not coincidental.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Three

THE COMING OF THE PROPHET

In 1848 a man who had been evicted from Prussia, from France, from Belgium, and who had found a home in exile in London, grasped hold of a spectre that was haunting the world, molded it into a fixed and enduring form, called it Scientific Socialism, and sent it forth to conquer the world it had been haunting.

The world came to know this man as Karl Marx. He made a religion of revolution; and in the name of this doctrine which he patched together and taught, everything we hold dear in this life may be destroyed. In order that we may know something of the influence of this doctrine of "Creative Destruction" which Marx did not invent, but which he did codify, and which has now become part of that greater movement that has come to be called the Religion of Humanism; it is necessary that we review the background and environment, the life and the times of Karl Heinrich Mordechai Marx:—

Heinrich Mordechai, father of Karl Heinrich Mordechai Marx, was the son of a line of Rabbis unbroken, father to son, for three hundred years. Heinrich seems to have resisted family pressures, and became a lawyer. The Counselor of Trier, a town in what is now Rhineland, Germany, also broke with the family by joining the state's official Christian church, and by seeing to it that all his children, including his second son Karl, then six years old, were baptized into his new faith. There is evidence that Karl's mother took the faith seriously, but the bourgeois father merely joined the church because it was "good for his business" as a lawyer. As for son Karl, he was born a humanist, took his humanism step by step toward its development into a full-blown religion: revolutionary humanism, which Marx himself chose to call Scientific Socialism.

The Marx myths, which grow more numerous, would have us believe that there was much persecution, mistreatment, and poverty; all of which helped shape the Marxian doctrines. The facts of the case disprove the myths. He was never persecuted, nobody mistreated him other than verbally, he was never fined or incarcerated. He was merely ordered out of Prussia, France and Belgium, but nobody laid a finger on him at any time. Which is something of an indication that "the devil takes care of his own;" because the unmitigated insolence, written and spoken, the violent outbursts against all authority and against anybody else's ideas, would make the presence of a Karl Marx almost unendurable in any society of any country. As for his mythical poverty; father Heinrich gave son Karl a very expensive education, his mother and his wife's mother both left him substantial sums when they died, and except for a period of five or six years, his capitalist pal and collaborator Frederick Engels furnished him with money regularly, gave him a handsome endowment which should have kept him "living like a millionaire" for the last years of his life. The "poverty myth" developed because Marx was not able to manage his household and his finances. Money ran through his fingers like water and he knew not how to economize — which in itself might be no great sin save that this man who couldn't handle the finances of his own family, is now hailed by millions of people as "the greatest economist the world has ever known."

There exists some of the correspondence between father Heinrich and son Karl—at least we are so told by certain of the biographers of Marx. And from these letters we piece together a story of Karl the schoolboy:

The boy showed "ability, although not quite genius" in school. As the only one of the Mordechai children to show any marked intelligence, the parents were "wrapped up in him," and he was shown every advantage. But his first year at the university at near-by Bonn was a failure. "Foolish escapades" and "debt" are mentioned. Whether there were the usual troubles over wine and women, is not mentioned in the correspondence. At that time German students were supposed to show their manhood by competitive drinking, philandering and sword-play. A hint is given in a letter in which the father writes: "We have sacrificed to provide our son with seven hundred thalers a year, while the sons of the rich have no more than five hundred." A letter to son Karl complains: "You have no sense about money; everybody has his hand in your pocket." (This was true throughout the lifetime of this "world's greatest economist.")

At his own earnest solicitation, the boy was transferred to the University of Berlin, which made the father happy since the academic life here was known to be more rigorous and more disciplined. The German scholar, Ludwig Feuerbach is quoted as saying that "Other universities are positively Bacchanalian compared to this workhouse."

In the 1830's, Berlin was the center of a group of students and young professors known as the "Young Hegelians," radical followers of the philosopher G.W.F. Hegel (1700-1831); and young Marx became an eager participant in this "Professors' Club" where he spent most of his time discussing philosophy, politics, and revolution. He was supposedly studying for a law degree, but he never made it at the University of Berlin. In 1841, he submitted his doctoral dissertation to the University of Jena, where he was awarded a degree in philosophy (but not in law).

In 1837, father Heinrich became very ill, and died the following year. There is some hint that his death was hastened by the anxiety caused by his son. He wrote in one of his last letters: "I am still in the dark as to your views... I mean that cursed gold, whose worth to a family man you do not seem to grasp at all..." In another letter, his anger bursts forth: "...complete disorder, wandering through all branches of science, silly brooding at the burning oil lamp; turned wild in your coat of learning and unkempt hair! In your wildness you see with four eyes; a horrible set-back and disregard for everything decent!" Of one of Karl's letters to him, the father says: "A made composition, which denoted how you waste your ability and spend your nights to create these monsters!... Your mother and sister Sophie suffer much for you."

In 1842, Karl Marx got a job as a journalist, the only type of paying job he would ever hold. (Later he would receive a regular salary of $5 a week from Charles A. Dana for writing a column for the New York Tribune; a job which he held for nine years, until the War Between the States made it unwise to keep on publishing Marx's column. However, for its historical importance, it is well to understand that the files of the old New York Tribune contain far the largest share of the published writings of Karl Marx — published in English, not in German).

It was not until about 1843 that Marx become seriously interested in socialism as an economic or philosophical system. And that came about because he and his young friend, Frederick Engels, came into contact with one Moses Hess, known as "the communist rabbi." Hess had an important influence over both Marx and Engels; and from that time onward Marx became a dedicated revolutionary, and revolution to him became a religion. The one distinguishing feature of Marx's personality, however, was his inability to cooperate with any of his fellow revolutionaries. To him, all others were rivals and inferiors. Only with Engels was Marx able to maintain an enduring friendship; and in all probability this was because Engels was always careful to give to Marx the two things he required: subservience and money.

An accurate and unbiased description of Marx, the man, is probably impossible; because to study Marx is to admire him, to detest him, to be utterly confused by his contradictions, but never to attain an objective understanding of him.

L. Ray Carroll observed that "A Marxian biographer worked eight years on his book, considered the most exhaustive and accurate of all the lot. This was ... while one of the Marx daughters was still alive. There were many others also who knew the men who were exiles with Marx, and who had papers and records from the days of the Manifesto. This biographer was not at all satisfied with his finished work. 'A man nobody knows,' he exclaimed. ... After showing the utmost consideration for the prophet he revered, he at times almost gave way to despair. Was he a philosopher or a fool? he exclaimed, not saying that he was thoroughly convinced one way or the other. His (Marx's) personal habits, his utter lack of understanding of life, were hard to explain away. Whether his philosophy meant anything, or was a rigmarole of ill-chosen words, the biographer could not be sure."

We suspect that the above reference is to biographer Otto Ruhle, who finally came up with the following more or less accurate description:

Marx was one of those persons who are overpowered by a perpetual urge towards the highest, the purest, the most ideal. It was not merely his ambition to be the most famous among those who have studied social literature, and the most learned of all the critics of economic science; he also wanted to be the most efficient revolutionist, and pre-eminent among the advocates of revolution. He wanted to expound the purest theory, to establish the most complete system of communism. As a preliminary to the demonstration of this superiority, he must prove that the socialist theories of all his predecessors were worthless, false, contemptible, or ludicrous. He had to show that the socialism of the utopists was a crazy-quilt of outworn and questionable ideas. That Proudhon was a suspect intruder into the realm of socialist thought. That Lasalle, Bakunin, and (Johann) Schweitzer were tainted with bourgeois ideology, and had probably sold themselves to the enemy. He, Marx alone, was in possession of the true doctrine. His was the crystal-clear knowledge; his was the philosopher's stone; his the immaculate conception of socialism; his the divine truth. With contemptuous wrath, with bitter mockery and profound hostility, he rejected all other opinions, fought against all other convictions than his own, persecuted all ideas that had not originated in his own brain. For him, there was no wisdom except his own, no socialism other than the socialism he proclaimed, no true gospel outside the limits of his own doctrine. His work was the essence of intellectual purity and scientific integrity. His system was Allah, and he was its prophet.

Otto Ruhle, writer of the above, was a sympathetic biographer, which makes his description suspect in this sense: it is doubtful that Marx ever had an original idea on the subject of socialism. He was a genius at plagiarism and adaptation; he took the ideas of Hegel, Weishaupt, Hess, Fourier, Owen, Proudhon, and the other socialists and revolutionists whose works could be found in the London library; and taking some from each, he concocted a poisonous brew that has upset the world.

Marx, however, did not seek to destroy civilization, society, governments, for the sake of destruction only, he looked upon his system as one of creative destruction. He thought it necessary to destroy in order to create; and his new creation was to be a paradise—a workers' paradise were the words he usually used to portray his Marx-made kingdom of heaven. In his early writings, Marx gave the following hint of the religiosity of his aims:

Communism is the positive abolition of private property, of human self-alienation, and thus the real appropriation of human nature through and for man. It is, therefore, the return of man himself as a social, i.e., really human, being, a complete and conscious return which assimilates all the wealth of previous development. Communism as a fully developed humanism is naturalism. It is the definitive resolution of the antagonism between man and nature, and between man and man. It is the true solution of the conflict between existence and essence, between objectivity and self-affirmation, between freedom and necessity, between individual and species. It is the solution of the riddle of history and knows itself to be the solution.

The above is a Religious Manifesto, written by one of the authors of the Communist Manifesto! It is a statement of faith; faith in a system which the author calls "a fully developed humanism." And any form of humanism, fully developed or otherwise, is a religion of revolution; revolution against God and a pledge of faith in the power of Man. Furthermore, since humanism calls for the establishment of a new social order, to be built upon the ashes of the existing Christian social order, this religion of revolution is pledged to the program of Creative Destruction!

In an attempt to explain and clarify, one student of Socialism, Fred R. Marvin, wrote, in 1931:

Responsible for this mad desire to "return everything to chaos," or to establish a Utopia on earth, is a fixed belief that all present day social, economic and political ills are due to the private property right, and to all forms of government which recognize that right and protect and defend the individual in the exercise thereof.

This belief is founded wholly on a false premise followed by illogical reasoning. The germ, then, of all we term radicalism, no matter under what name it appears, is this false belief in the theory of Socialism. Destroy the belief and the diseases that result from it disappear. . . .

If the above were only true, wholly true; if it were possible to kill this "germ" by calling upon rationalism, common sense, logic; if facts and evidence could wipe out Socialism, then it would have been destroyed centuries ago!

What is forgotten is that Socialism is not simply a theory, a program, a system; it is based on a faith in Magic, a faith that belies logic and common sense. It is the kind of faith that produced a Mazdak in 5th century Persia, the kind of faith that built the cult of the Assassins in 11th century Arabia, the kind of faith that came to the West through the Bogomils and Cathars in the medieval centuries, the kind of faith that inspired the secret societies of Central Europe: the Carbonari, Grand Orient Freemasonry, Rosicrucians, Illuminati, the League of the Just which changed its name to the Communist League at the instigation of Karl Marx.

R. J. Rushdoony, in an introduction to the invaluable Marx's Religion of Revolution by Gary North (Craig Press, Box 13, Nutley, New Jersey 07110, $3.75), notes that:

Basic to the modern mentality is the belief in magic. Magic is the attempt by man to gain autonomous power, to gain control over the world of man, nature, and the supernatural. In magic, man sees himself as his own god and creator, and total power and control becomes his goal. By means of this total and autonomous power, man expects to govern reality by his own prediction and planning.

The popularity of the Greek mentality to the men of the Renaissance and Enlightenment has been due to the fact that the Greeks combined, it was believed, a scientific technique with a magical faith. . . . Archimedes . . . said . . . "Give me a place to stand, and I will move the world." . . . The remark is in essence magic, refined and technologically aware magic, but magic nonetheless. "Give me a place to stand!" The assumptions in this presupposition are enormous. Make me a god, and I can move the world. Give me the power to create gold, and I can buy the world. . . .

The Renaissance and Enlightenment restored magic to the world. . . . Karl Marx applied the Enlightenment conception of philosophy with especial consistency. . . . The two governing passions of Marx's life were, first, a hatred of Christian society, of Biblical law and order, and, second, a magical belief in the efficacy and power of destruction. The contradictions in his system of economic order are impossible to reconcile. As an economics, it has no future. As a philosophy of magic, Karl Marx's system is impervious to attack, once its presuppositions are granted. The implications of humanism and of anti-Christianity are carried to their logical conclusion, to pure magic. The Marxist belief in the creative power of revolution now extends far beyond the frontiers of Marxism: it is a part of the humanist legacy.

After the Terror of the French Revolution a French scientist wrote:

"The Revolution has razed everything to the ground. Government, morals, habits, everything has to be rebuilt. What a magnificent site for the architects! What a grand opportunity of making use of all the fine and excellent ideas that had remained speculative, of employing so many materials that could not be used before, or rejecting so many others that had been obstructions for centuries and which one had been forced to use."

It was Karl Marx who inherited this secular humanism, this revolutionary fervor, and fused it into a religion: a faith in magic and in the power of creative destruction.

What Marx began, what he left the world a century ago, now has been refined, perfected, tested in scores of ways in as many countries. It challenges the United States not so much as a military juggernaut, a political menace, or even as an economic threat; but it comes to us as a religion, proclaiming that society—rather than the individual—must be reborn, that "I Am" must become "We Are."

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Three

BLOOD RED AND PARLOR PINK

Remember the old childhood brain-teaser, "an alligator is a crocodile, but a crocodile may not be an alligator"? The same is true of Socialism: Communism is Socialism, but Socialism is not always Communism.

We might liken these "isms" to a tree:

The roots are grounded in Satanism, which stretches all the way back to Adam and the cursing of the earth because of the original sin, the first recorded manifestation of this bringing about the murder of Abel by his brother Cain. The trunk of the tree is Illuminism, a principal manifestation of this being the French Revolution. Stemming from this trunk are many branches, the greatest of which is Marxism, and Communism is but one of many sub-branches stemming from Marxism—or Scientific Socialism, to give this branch the name Marx liked to use to identify his particular scheme for achieving World Government.

It must be remembered that Communism was not designed to appeal to all types of people or to all stratas of society. To name a few of the other sub-branches: While Communism was designed to appeal to the working class of people, the cooperative movement was designed to appeal to the small farmer, the anarchist movement was patterned to appeal to the "rugged individualist" who hated law and government restrictions of any kind, the so-called Christian Socialist movement was designed to make socialism seem synonymous with Christianity (in the United States this took the form of the "social gospel".) Actually, several of the offspring of Marxism—or Scientific Socialism or social science—found their respective pathways leading into parlor, pulpit, pedagogy, professional brotherhood, industrial league, scholastic society, businessmen association, bankers club, womens organization, neighborhood discussion group, etc., etc.

The fact that all of these offspring were branches extending from the same tree trunk, being fed from the same tap roots, and therefore all producing the same manner of fruit; is almost never mentioned!

There was one important exception to this unusual blackout; and it had to do with the old Saturday Evening Post, back in the 1930's — we cannot give you the exact dates because we were in China at the time and since we wound up in a Japanese prisoner of war camp before ever getting back home, all of our records were lost. But, we do recall, and the Library of Congress should be able to back us up, that in the 30's The Saturday Evening Post ran a series of articles entitled "Towards the Millenium." One of the articles (by F. Britten Austin, we believe) was captioned, "Meet Lenin."

From Charles W. Phillips we have the following comment and direct quotation from that article:

Most all of the historical writings about Lenin refer to him as the leader of the world-wide communist movement. But, according to Austin, Lenin the leader was himself responsible to an inner occult group whose membership and form of organization was unknown. According to Austin, "Lenin... was himself a high initiate in a secret society, occultly connected with all the revolutionary groups, whereof, like the other members, he knew only the one man immediately above him and the three units below; unpleasant things happened to the traitor who failed in obedience or revealed the barest hint of its existence."

Later in the same article, Mr. Austin pointed out that: "... Behind all the revolutionary parties, permeating them all, was the mysterious society controlled by unknown superiors for a vast and shadowy purpose in a mystical future. Its definite backing would lift any one of the revolutionary groups into supremacy over the rest."

As a matter of fact, the above quotation reveals nothing new. In 1835 an European revolutionary named Malegari wrote to another revolutionary, Dr. Breidenstein, these significant words:

We form an association of brothers in all points of the globe, we have desires and interests in common, we aim at the emancipation of humanity, we wish to break every kind of yoke, yet there is one that is unseen, that can hardly be felt, yet that weighs on us. Whence comes it? Where is it? No one knows, or at least no one tells. The association is secret, even for us, the veterans of secret societies. (Quotation from Nesta Webster's book, "World Revolution," page 123.)

Every secret society, every occult organization, every mystery religion, points to a hidden leadership which is unknown, unidentifiable, kept secret even from those whom the world has looked upon as leaders and wielders of absolute power. This hidden hierarchy can cause movements to rise and fall, can dethrone dictators as in the case of Khrushchev, can topple whole governments; yet no one can positively identify these rulers of the darkness of the world. Commenting on this strange situation, Mr. Phillips wrote, in 1951:

Therein lies the answer to the riddle of what makes the Communist Movement click. There is the key to the otherwise unexplainable phenomena of why, almost overnight, a Hitler, a Mussolini, or some other socialist leader suddenly makes his appearance on the political scene and is given the finances and assistance that is necessary to raise him to a national figure of so much importance as to make him what is seemingly a world leader or a world threat. Then, when the cycle is completed and his mission is finished, he comes to a speedy and inglorious end. That is what is meant by Mr. Austin's conclusion that there exists some mysterious organization which lies behind all revolutionary groups whose backing can lift any one of them into supremacy over the rest.

There also may lie the answer as to why one of the most important advisors in the Department of State can have his espionage activities perfectly coordinated with a program of the Russian Communists who represent the opposite extreme of the hodge-podge of races, groups, nations, languages and ideas which all together, make up the political world. It might be that it could also explain the reason why it has been possible to perfectly coordinate a program in which among the chief actors are to be found New York bankers, high American statesmen, Supreme Court Judges, and just plain Russian spies. This may all sound fantastic but when you look at it coldly and analytically, that is exactly what happened when Alger Hiss was indicted and an attempt was made to prevent his conviction and set him free. This centralized control over all Socialist activities has to do with a seldom mentioned alliance between Socialism and Finance Capitalism, which we shall discuss later. Sufficient for the theme of this particular letter is the fact that many historians refer to an allegation that Adam Weishaupt was financed in his activities by the first Rothschild. We say allegation, because we have seen no actual proof, but since Rothschild aimed to control the finances of the world, and since the plan of the Illuminati would have aided and abetted Rothschild's plan, the allegation is probably true. Certainly, from 1850 onward the Socialist organizations did receive financial assistance from the International Bankers.

But, let's get back to the chronological part of our study in Socialism.

Though Marx and Engels wrote the Communist Manifesto in 1848, Marx remained rather unimportant and had little influence until he was able to obtain control of a concrete organization in 1864. During those years between 1848 and 1864, Marx had far more influence in New York City than he did in all of Europe combined. From about 1840 onward, the first great "Exodus of the Jews" from Germany to the American "Promised Land" occurred. They were for the most part political malcontents who found it unhealthy to remain in Germany, and they congregated in ghetto-like communion in Brooklyn and the East Side of New York City. They read Karl Marx's column regularly in Charles Dana's New York Tribune. Marx had no comparable following in Europe at that time.

On September 28, 1864 the followers of the syndicalist Proudhon held a convention at St. Martin's Hall in London, at which time the International Workingmen's Association was formed. Later this was to become known as the 1st International. Marx was living in London at the time, determined to crash the convention and take charge. He did, and from that time onward, Marx began to be important.

An indication of Marx's importance: In 1872 the headquarters of the 1st International were moved to New York City. However, suffering somewhat from absentee leadership and also due to the fact that this type of Socialism would not prosper on American soil, the 1st International quietly folded its tenets and drifted away into obscurity four years later at an international convention in Philadelphia, a convention that was featured by non-attendance of international delegates.

For the next 13 years there was no "international" and the various branches of Socialism went their different and independent ways until, in 1889, conventions were held in Paris and Brussels and, the following year a 2nd International was founded "and constituted as a Central International Socialist Bureau in 1900." This 2nd International prospered and at the outbreak of World War I: "it included twenty-seven countries, with a membership of twelve millions."

This 2nd International dissolved as a result of the "Great War" and with the conquest of Russia by the Bolsheviks, a 3rd International was formed and dominated by Moscow.

Meanwhile back here at home, the most authentic record of the inroads of Socialism in America in the years prior to the 20th Century, is found in the admirable Report of the Joint Legislative Committee in the Senate of the State of New York on Revolutionary Radicalism; otherwise known as the Lusk Report, which was published April 24, 1920. Why a New York Senate report? Because, as we stated previously, New York City had become the world communist headquarters, and remained such until Leon Trotsky took his followers from New York to Leningrad—passage arranged and the trip financed by International Bankers, as was the other army of invaders from Switzerland through Germany in sealed railway cars to Leningrad, where Lenin and Trotsky joined forces to "Bolshevize" Russia.

We quote from that Lusk Report:

The present Socialist movement (in 1920-Ed.) in the United States must be distinguished from the early experiments in Utopian ideals, represented by the sectarian communities such as the Shakers, or the experiment in Communism made by the Owenites, or the Fourierists and the Icarian communities.

The modern movement of organized Socialism may be dated from the formation of the Social Party of New York and vicinity which was organized in January, 1868, in the Germania Assembly rooms on the Bowery. The membership of this organization, recruited solely from the German labor circles, and its policies and platform, were in accord with the principles then set down by the International Workingmen's Association.

... The movement was generally stimulated by the action taken in transferring the General Council of the International from London to New York. The general secretary of the council at this time was S. A. Sorge, who was an intimate friend of both Karl Marx and Friederich Engels. He became the most active of the organizers in the new movement.

When the 1st International dissolved in 1876, the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party of North America was formed by dissident members of the International. The following year the name was changed to the Socialist Labor Party, which was led by Daniel de Leon, who called himself a Jewish Marxian.

Now back to the Lusk Report:

For about twenty years the Socialist Labor Party was the dominant factor in the Socialist movement in this country. It was recruited largely of alien elements, and particularly under the influence of German (Jewish) leaders. It was wholly out of touch with American life and American principles. The despotic character and extremely narrow viewpoint of the party leadership finally resulted in alienating newly converted Socialists from the party, and a new party, known as the Social Democratic Party of America came into being in 1899.

An attempt to harmonize the difference was made in the following year and a convention was held in Indianapolis on July 29, 1901, representing the various Socialist organizations with the exception of the New York faction of the Socialist Labor Party. The result of this convention was the formation of the Socialist Party of America, which has led the Socialist movement in this country since that time (up to 1920, that is—Ed.)

At that Socialist convention in 1901, Morris Hillquist (real name, Misca Hilkowicz) was named leader of the Socialist Party of America. But militant socialism, as such, did not appeal to the native born Americans, and in the following twenty years, a wide variety of socialistic types were tried out on the American people. We submit the following listing of the more important attempts, with the approximate time of their organizing:

- 1905: Intercollegiate Socialist Society
Industrial Workers of the World (IWW)
- 1906: Rand School of Social Science opened
- 1907: Christianity and the Social Order, by Walter Rauschenbusch, published.
- 1908: Federal Council of Churches organized.
- 1912: Christianizing the Social Order, by Walter Rauschenbusch, published.
- 1913: Sixteenth (Income Tax) Amendment ratified.
First tax-exempt (Rockefeller) Foundation approved by Congress.
Seventeenth (direct election of Senators) ratified.
Federal Reserve Act adopted.
- 1914: Emergency Peace Federation (the first "communist front") organized by two women: Louisa Lochner and Rosika Schwimmer.
- 1915: Women's International Committee for Permanent Peace organized by Louisa Lochner, Rosika Schwimmer and Jane Addams.
- 1917: Fellowship of Reconciliation formed by Norman Thomas and A. J. Muste.
A Theology for the Social Gospel, by Walter Rauschenbusch, published.

- 1917: American Conference for Democracy and Terms of Peace established under Rabbi Judah Magnes.
- 1919: Anarchists organized under Alexander Herkmann and Emma Goldmann.
Women's International League for Peace and Freedom founded by Jane Addams, Emily Balch, Sophonisba Breckenridge and Agnes Brown Leach.
Communist Labor Party formed under John Reed, Benjamin Gitlow, et al.
- 1920: American Civil Liberties Union formed with Roger Baldwin, Jane Addams, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Morris Hillquist, Soph. Breckenridge, and others.
Trade Union Educational League founded by William Z. Foster.
United Communist Party, Sept., 1920, is beginning of first permanent Communist organization in the United States to pose as a political party.
- 1921: Council on Foreign Relations incorporated.
League for Industrial Democracy is formed to replace the Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

We began the above admittedly incomplete listing with the formation of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, and we ended with its change of names. So, going back to the beginning: It is little known that the first president of this Intercollegiate Socialist Society was the famed novelist and story teller, Jack London. One of London's books published by the Communist "Vanguard Press, Inc. (was a paperback, on the cover of which was this paragraph:

"The present volume is composed of the best of his Socialist writings and in view of the fact that like George Bernard Shaw he valued his Socialism even more than his literary eminence, it is indispensable to the understanding of his genius."

This book contains an "Essay on Revolution" by Jack London. We quote therefrom: (There are) when the roll is called, an army of 7,000,000 men, who in accordance with the conditions of today, are fighting with all their might for the conquest of the wealth of the world and for the complete overthrow of existing society. There has never been anything like this revolution in the history of the world....

This revolution is unlike all other revolutions in many respects. It is not sporadic. It is not a flame of popular discontent, arising in a day and dying down in a day. It is older than the present generation....

In January, 1905, throughout the United States the Socialists held mass-meetings to express their sympathy for their struggling Comrades, the revolutionists of Russia, and, more to the point, to furnish the sinews of war by collecting money and cabling it to the Russian leaders. The fact of this call for money, and the ready response, and the very wording of the call, make a striking and practical demonstration of the international solidarity of this world revolution: Whatever may be the immediate results of the present revolt in Russia, the socialist propaganda in that country has received from it an impetus unparalleled in the history of modern class wars....

... To the bourgeois mind their unbelief in the dominant conventions of the established order is startling. They laugh to scorn the sweet ideals and dear moralities of bourgeois society. They intend to destroy bourgeois society with most of its sweet ideals and dear moralities, and chiefest among these are those that group themselves under such heads as private ownership of capital, survival of the fittest, and patriotism — even patriotism.

Such an army of revolution, 7,000,000 strong, is a thing to make rulers and ruling classes pause and consider. The cry of this army is "No quarter! We want all that you possess. We will be content with nothing less than all that you possess. We want in our hands the reins of power and the destiny of mankind. Here are our hands. They are strong hands. We are going to take your government, your palaces, and all your purpled ease away from you, and in that day you shall work for your bread even as the peasant in the field or the starved and runty clerk in your metropolises. Here are our hands. They are strong hands....

... Vastly more significant is the fact that of all the countries the revolution has fastened upon, on not one has it relaxed its grip. On the contrary, on every country its grip closes tighter year by year. As an active movement it began obscurely over a generation ago. In 1867, its voting strength in the world was 30,000. By 1871, its vote had increased to 100,000... and in the year of our Lord 1905 it passed the seven-million mark.... The so-called great middle class is a growing anomaly in the social struggle. It is a perishing class....

The Revolution is here, now. Stop it who can.
(End of quotation from Jack London's essay)

But London was wrong in this respect: Fabianism, not Communism, would destroy the "great middle class" in America.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Five

THE RETURN OF THE SPIRIT OF QUINTUS FABIVS MAXIMVS

"The Utopias of the 1820-28 phase of Socialism, as dreamed of by Robert Owen and Fourier and Saint-Simon, were still the carrots held out to the donkeys who died on the barricades in Europe in 1848, although each new prophet had a different method and suggested a different instrument for reaching these Utopias. Proudhon offered the minimum wage (later to become a federal law in the United States); Georges Sorel the general strike (to become the favorite tool of CIO); Marx, according to (George Bernard) Shaw, declared that force is the midwife of progress without reminding us that force is equally the midwife of chaos; Bentham proposed universal male suffrage and annual parliaments (in the USA universal suffrage begins at 18 but includes the female as well as the male.) John Stuart Mill, in spite of his courageous optimism, considered that the social problem of the future was that of uniting the greatest individual liberty of action with a common ownership in the raw materials of the globe and an equal participation of all in the benefits of combined labor, equally distributed."

So wrote Anne Freemantle of the progress of Socialism up to the time of the founding of the Fabian Society (the parenthetical observations in the above paragraph are those of your editor.)

In the year that Karl Marx died—1883—the Fabian Society was born. Its parents were two publications: Progress and Poverty by the American single-taxer Henry George, and England for All, an English Imperialistic adaptation of Karl Marx's Das Kapital by H.M. Hyndman. Marx didn't seem too happy about his English disciple's attempt to Anglicize his Socialism and make of it a vehicle for the building of a World Government to be run by Anglo-Saxons for Anglo-Saxons. In a letter to his friend Friedrich Engels dated December 15, 1879, Marx wrote:

In the beginning of June there was published a little book called "England for All." It pretends to be written as an expose of the propositions of the Democratic Federation, a recently formed association of different English and Scotch Radical Socialists... the chapters on Labor and Capital are... literally extracted from, or circumlocutions of, "Das Kapital," but the author does not quote the book or its author... he wrote letters of excuse for instance that "the English don't like to be taught by foreigners" and that my name "was so much detested." With all that, his little book, in so far as it pilfers "Das Kapital," makes good proposals, although the man is a weak vessel.

Marx was right about Hyndman being a weak vessel; he also was a false prophet. He predicted most positively that a world-wide Socialist revolution would begin on July 14, 1889, the hundredth anniversary of the fall of the French Bastille. But, even here, Hyndman was a help to the young Fabian Society, because the English radicals who had looked to violent revolution as a way to bring about The New Order, now turned to the gradualism of the Fabians.

As for Henry George and his part in the birth of Fabian Socialism:

George had written his book Progress and Poverty, which was published in 1879, sold over 100,000 copies in the United States in the following two years (a phenomenal occurrence for that time) and was re-published in 1881 in England. On the occasion of the English publication, Henry George visited England and gave a series of lectures to popularize his ideas and promote the sale of his book.

Though little is mentioned of Henry George these days, his work had a terrific impact in the last two decades of the nineteenth century; both in the United States and in Britain. Anne Freemantle, in her book, This Little Band of Prophets, noted that:

where in the civilized world had labor received its just due... The fundamental cause of the whole evil was to be sought in the fact "that people were shut off from the land which, combined with human labor, formed the source of all wealth... in a newly opened country it was best to regard the land as belonging to all and to permit everyone to take possession of and cultivate as much as he required... in old countries, however, the taxation of rent was the best remedy."

Shaw has said that five-sixths of those who like himself were swept into the great Socialist revival of 1888 had been converted by Henry George... "To George," E. R. Pease has noted, "belongs the extraordinary merit of recognizing the right way to social salvation. The earlier Socialists had proposed segregated communities; the Co-operators had tried voluntary associations; the Positivists advocated moral suasion; the Chartists favored force, physical or political; the Marxists talked revolution... George wrote in a land where people ruled themselves, not only in fact but also in name."

In a brilliant refutation of Henry George's single tax theory (which helped shape the Fabian catechism), Mr. Zach Montgomery, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, in 1886 published the following defense of the private property right, which Socialism seeks to destroy:

In order to have a clear idea of the nature and limits of man's title to property we must constantly have in mind the fact... that man did not make himself, but that he was made by Another, and, consequently, that he does not belong to himself, but that he belongs to Another. That his entire physical, mental, and moral self; his body, with its flesh and blood, and bone and marrow; its every muscle, fibre, and atom of matter, from the very tip of his hair to the end of his little toenail; his soul, with its will, memory, and understanding; and, in fact, every faculty which it is possible for him to use, either in the acquisition of knowledge or the accumulation of worldly wealth, are all the absolute property of his Creator. That the earth, the air, and the ocean, with all their teeming wealth of animate and inanimate things, are also the property of Him who created them. Therefore, whatever title man has acquired, or can acquire, to any species of property, whether it be land or personal chattels, must of necessity be from God, the only true owner, and subject at all times to His supreme will and control. That man has a genuine but subordinate title to the earth and the ocean, with all their varied productions, is manifest not only from the testimony of natural reason, but also from the words of holy writ, for in the first chapter of Genesis it is written that God said: "Let us make man to our image and likeness; and let him have dominion over the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and the beasts, and the whole earth, and every creeping creature that moveth upon the earth." Here, then, is the source of man's title, not only to his personal goods and chattels, but to his landed estates as well. For it will be observed from the language just quoted that man's "dominion" was not to be limited to the "fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the air, and the beasts," but was to be extended to "the whole earth" as well as to "every creeping thing that moveth upon the earth." Here, then, is man's title-deed, through which he traces back to his Lord and Maker his right to property, both real and personal...

We have said that man's title to property, both real and personal, is but a subordinate and qualified one, subject at all times to the superior and ultimate title of the Creator, and of this fact we must not lose sight. In order that we may the more certainly keep this fact steadily in view, let us inquire a little more closely into the reason for this limitation upon man's title to property. No intelligent being has ever yet knowingly and designedly put into shape anything without a purpose. And the Almighty, being infinitely wise, has neither made nor done anything without an infinitely wise purpose. And being infinitely good, He has neither made nor done anything without an infinitely good purpose. Hence we are led to conclude that when He made the earth, the air, and the ocean, with all their elements of material wealth, He must have made them for an infinitely good purpose. Consequently, when He gave to man dominion over these things it must have been His will that he use them in a manner to correspond with the objects for which they were made. But what was the Almighty's object in creating these elements of worldly wealth of which we are speaking? Was it not to promote His own honor and glory, and at the same time to supply man's proper physical, mental, and moral wants, and thereby to contribute to his happiness?

The gift of the Almighty to man of dominion over the earthly creation was of course a gift in common, whereby every human being was allowed to draw from this common and abundant heritage, and appropriate to his own use such articles—not previously appropriated—as were suited to his necessities, tastes, and lawful desires. And when men began this process of individual appropriation, then and there began the origin and history of private property....

It must be borne in mind, however, that man's title to property, whether in land or in movables, ... is a qualified and limited title in the nature of a trust, coupled with an obligation to use such property as to subserve the end for which it was created, namely: the honor of God and the welfare of man....

The very first lesson we should teach our children is that man does not belong to himself but to his Creator; that he is as much the absolute property of his Maker as is the planet upon which he lives; that in the vast economy of God's eternity each individual man is of far more value than the mightiest orb that rolls in space; that his superior value over that of the material universe is not found in the superior quality of the clay of which his body is formed, but in his noble attributes of soul, which distinguish him as an immortal child of God and an heir to everlasting happiness. He should be taught that worldly wealth, like worldly wisdom, is only truly valuable in proportion as it aids us in our journey from this land of misery, sin, sorrow, and death to our true country, and that it can only so aid us when used in the manner which its Great Author had in view in creating it; and that unless properly used it becomes not a help but a positive hindrance to man's happiness both here and hereafter....

We sincerely believe, in the very depths of our soul, that the only lasting and effective cure for the crying wrongs which greedy monopolists, heartless tyrants, and unprincipled politicians are scourging our country, and the only preventive against the still more direful disaster with which we are threatened at the hands of communistic demagogues, is to be found in a more widely spread and deeper moral and religious sentiment among the people. And it is our earnest conviction that, in order to implant this sentiment in the minds and hearts of our people, we require more of our Saviour's gospel and less of Mr. Henry George's.

The above words were first published in 1886; but they are so very pertinent to our present time with its problems; that we are reminded of King Solomon's comment, that "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us." (Ecclesiastes 1: 9,10).

In other words, the past is prologue; and in these letters we remind you of things past that you may better understand and be able better to deal with the problems of today. So, back to Quintus Fabius Maximus:—

A Roman general who lived in the third century B.C., Fabius was nicknamed "Cunctator," or "the Delayer," because of the delaying habits he used against Hannibal in the second Punic War. By avoiding pitched battles and engaging in what we now know as guerilla tactics, he was able to buy time so that Hannibal was pinched for supplies and the Roman battle strength was built up. Fabius did not defeat Hannibal, he merely prepared the way for the coming of Scipio Africanus, who actually defeated Hannibal at the pitched Battle of Tarantum, and thus setting the stage for the emergence of World Government, administered by the Romans and for the Romans.

It was not from Scipio the conqueror, but Fabius the delayer, that the new Socialist Society took its name. Fabian Tract No. 1 explained: "For the right moment you must wait, as Fabius did most patiently when warring against Hannibal, though Many censured his delays; but when the time comes, you must strike hard, as Fabius did, or your waiting will be in vain and fruitless."

From this statement a motto was framed: "I wait long, but when I strike, I strike hard." The motto usually was accompanied by a sketch of an angry tortoise by the Fabian artist, Walter Crane. So "the tortoise became the heraldic device of the Society—emblem of persistence, longevity, slow and guarded progress towards a (revolutionary) goal."* (See footnote below)

Both the name and the motto were adopted on January 4, 1884, which may be taken as the date of the official founding of the Fabian Society. "The Fabian Society consists of Socialists," reads the first line of the Fabian Basis, adopted in 1886, revised in 1919, and again in 1949. The Basis begins:

The Fabian Society consists of Socialists.

It therefore aims at the reorganisation of Society by the emancipation of Land and Industrial Capital from individual ownership, and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit. In this way only can the natural and acquired advantages of the country be equitably shared by the whole people.

The Society accordingly works for the extinction of private property in land, with equitable consideration of established expectations, and due provision as to the tenure of the home and the homestead; for the transfer to the community, by constitutional methods, of all such industries as can be conducted socially; and for the estab-

Quotation is from Fabian Freeway, by Rose L. Martin. We highly recommend the study of this book because, in this series of letters we do not intend an in-depth study of Fabianism. We are identifying the various strands which are woven into the whole cloth that is the total conspiracy; Fabian Socialism is one of those strands. But for a real study of the subject, the best available is Fabian Freeway, High Road to Socialism in the U. S. A., by Rose L. Martin. ishment, as the governing consideration in the regulation of production, distribution and service, of the common good instead of private profit. . . .

The "Rules of the Fabian Society, as Amended by the Postal Ballot held in April, 1949" are also revealing, and important in our study of Socialism. We quote the more important parts of these Rules:

1. The name of the Society shall be the Fabian Society.

2. The Society consists of Socialists. It therefore aims at the establishment of a society in which equality of opportunity will be assured and the economic power and privileges of individuals and classes abolished through the collective ownership and democratic control of the economic resources of the community. It seeks to secure these ends by the methods of political democracy. The Society, believing in equal citizenship in the fullest sense, is open to persons irrespective of sex, race or creed, who commit themselves to its aims and purposes and undertake to promote its work. . . . Its activities shall be the furtherance of socialism and the education of the public on socialist lines, by the holding of meetings, lectures, discussion groups, conferences and summer schools, the promotion of research into political, economic and social problems, national and international, the publication of books, pamphlets and periodicals, and by any other appropriate method.

3 The Society as a whole shall have no collective policy beyond what is implied in Rule 2; its research shall be free and objective in its methods. No resolution of a political character expressing an opinion or calling for action, other than in relation to the running of the Society itself, shall be put forward in the name of the Society. . . .

The "without regard to sex, race or creed" provision permitted a strange and awesome melange of members. There were out-and-out Bolsheviks, Lords and Ladies, bankers and businessmen, preachers and professors, and just anyone who called himself or herself a Socialist and promised not to use the name of the Society to promote his or her particular pet peeve.

Leading lights of the Fabian Society included, or include (a partial list) :

Atlee, Lord Clement Richard. British Prime Minister 1945 to 1951, during which time his Government nationalized British industries and gave independence to Palestine and India.

Aveling, Dr. Edward Bibbins. Lived with Karl Marx's daughter Eleanor, collaborated with her on many books, translated works of Engels.

Author of system of economics now employed by our Federal Government.

Laski, Harold Joseph. London School of Economics; Harvard University from 1915 to 1919; was adviser to FDR in 1933 during the fateful first "hundred days;" John F. Kennedy was his student at the London School of Economics; etc., etc.

Wallis, Graham. Lecturer at London School of Economics; one of the "Big Four" of the Fabian Executive; taught at Harvard, New School of Social Research: called the "first great Fabian missionary to the United States;" author of "The Great Society," a phrase picked up by pragmatist John Dewey, and later used to identify the socialist program of President Lyndon Baines Johnson.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Six

AND THE CAULDRON BUBBLED IN BLOOMSBURY SQUARE

"The permeation of the United States by British Fabian socialism," notes the Veritas Foundation study, Keynes at Harvard, "proceeded primarily through the universities." And Harvard University was selected as the "fount from which leftist ideology filtered through to other educational institutions."

But, who "selected" Harvard? Who directed the permeation? Who chose Fabianism as the weapon for the conquest of the United States in preference to Bolshevism, Syndicalism, Guild Socialism, National Socialism, International Communism, or some one or more of the other varieties of collective brotherhood?

For our answers, we need first to look in on a specialized clique of British Fabians who came to be called "the Bloomsbury Group" because they—like the Haight Asbury hippies of our generation—chose to reside and conduct their "happenings" in that particular area of London called Bloomsbury Square. And, coincidentally, just as the original Fabian Society gang revolved around Sydney and Beatrice Webb, this Bloomsbury mob revolved around another couple: Leonard and Virginia Woolf. The fact that both Webb and Woolf—like Marx before them—called themselves Jews but at the same time insisted they were atheists, may also be coincidental. Though highly educated, upper middle class, more or less successful as writers or artists and therefore well-to-do financially, these Bloomsbury Fabians were extremely bohemian, amoral, perverted —

In connection with the above, we received a letter from a correspondent who had recently been on the scene, and he wrote us about the Bloomsbury Group. His letter reads, in part:

November 23, 1970

Dear Don Bell:

I wish I had more time today to write a long letter respecting the Bloomsbury Square group, so named after the area in London in which they resided. If there is one thing you may say about them they were not, it was square! In short, it was a nest of perverted, no, super-perverted, Fabians and communists from Keynes to Marx's daughter. They even returned to the ancient shores of Carthage and bought little boys who had been sold and then castrated, for the pleasure of such men. The publishing in 1967 of Strachey's letters caused Dobbs to revise Keynes at Harvard in 1968, and this further light shed on the degradation of the Bloomsbury mob is terribly important to your present series, particularly in light of the official report filed with the state legislature to which you refer on the bottom of page 2, #47. (Reference is to our series of letters dealing with proposed new Constitutions—a series now available in booklet form at $1 each. If reference to the dissolute, licentious and indecent behavior of the Bloomsbury Square group was considered important to our previous Constitutional series, it is even more important, indeed it is essential to our present Study in Socialiam.

Rose L. Martin, author of Fabian Freeway, makes an important reference to the Bloomsbury group in her chapter dealing with the rise of John Maynard Keynes to the role of chief economic statistician for the Fabians. We quote from her book, beginning on page 326:

Keynes' international bent owed much to a friendship renewed in London with his old Fabian Socialist college chum, Leonard Woolf. Throughout his long bachelorhood (he married at 42) the lanky and personable Keynes was identified with the so-called Bloomsbury group... They were addicted to group-opinions and to a superficially critical, but none the less protective, attitude towards Soviet Russia. An apparent point of difference with Russian Marxism was their belief that collectivist-minded intellectuals—rather than what Keynes called 'the boorish proletariat'—were destined to become the professional rulers of an ideal future world. Bertrand Russell once described the Bloomsbury Fabians as a passionate mutual admiration clique of the elite....

It may be recalled that from 1915 Leonard Woolf was also the London Fabian Society's leading amateur of international affairs; the author of International Government, which supplied the first blueprint for the League of Nations;... Woolf's views on World Government and German reparations were faithfully reflected by John Maynard Keynes, when the latter attended the Versailles Peace Conference as a member of the British Treasury delegation.

There, as one of the younger dissidents, British and American, grouped around Colonel E. M. House, Keynes established long-lasting ties with Walter Lippmann and with Felix Frankfurter who represented the Zionist cause at the Peace Conference. Returning from Paris, Keynes expressed their mutual dissatisfactions in his first book-length work, The Economic Consequences of the Peace. Lippmann and Frankfurter helped arrange for its publication in America, where it was touted and officially distributed by the League for Industrial Democracy as it was by the Fabian Society in Great Britain and the Colonies. Here Keynes announced frankly that capitalism in Europe was doomed....

Here is the connecting link, the point of contact, the key to understanding that has been neglected or overlooked by most historians or students of radicalism: The Paris Peace Conference was the meeting place of the young dissidents of the world! There, the International Socialists met the International Bankers and made enduring compacts; there the Zionists met the Imperialists and the future Israeli State was born; there International Agent Edward Mandel House brought together the dissidents of Great Britain and the United States to plot the creation of a secret government structure that was destined eventually to create an Anglo-Saxon Federation that would rule the world—or, at least, so thought House and his opposite number in England: Reginald Baliol Brett, Lord Esher.

In short, conspirators of every hue and creed, advocates of the many forms of World Government, Internationalist plotters and planners from all over the world, met at Versailles under the guise of making peace, to compare plans, coordinate blueprints, and divide the world, prior to conquering it!

Out of that Paris get-together was born the Council on Foreign Relations, which embraces (as did the Peace Conference at Paris) similar "conspirators of every hue and creed, advocates of World Government, Internationalist plotters and planners" of the United States. Similar national organizations exist in other countries; and international organizations (such as the Bilderbergers) exist, that these national group leaders may meet and compare notes one with another under circumstances more private than those provided by the United Nations.

We mention all of the above somewhat out of context with this series as such, in order to lay a foundation so that what we are about to quote will be better understood.

Earlier in this letter we quoted from a communication we had received regarding this Bloomsbury Group. We quoted but one paragraph from that communication. Now we would like you to share with us the rest of that letter:

(John Maynard) Keynes was born the same year the Fabians were conceived, rather, delivered; gestation having taken many years. He died Easter Sunday, 1946, not to arise again, however.... To think the world "leaders" paid homage to this satanic beast, and vicariously to the whole den (the Fabian Society) is almost occultly frenetic.

"Not one Rome, but two Carthages." Methinks their Q. Fabius Maximus leanings are showing!

I also wonder if lurking in the wings is Scipio awaiting his turn. Because, while the defensive policy of Fabius was "to worry, weaken, and starve an enemy whose necessity was victory, opposing a passive resistance to the provocations of Hannibal and the mummers of the camp," don't forget there already existed the aggressive, or the offensive plan of Rome which was: "It was her policy to cripple, not crush; to balance rival and ally. An elastic clause restored the possessions of Massinissa, to be a thorn in the flesh of Carthage and a convenient weapon of aggression, at the will of the suzerain power...." (Quoted from an honest history, A History of Rome to the Death of Caesar, W. W. How & H. D. Leigh, Longmans & Co. London 1898).

Yes, Hannibal finally forced to retreat from his foreign expedition releases the role of Fabius who was then honored in the Senate "with the wreath of grass as the savior of the state. Shortly after, Fabius died (203 B.C.) at the age of nearly ninety years...."

Scipio now defeats Hannibal on his own home ground in the famous battle of Zama, and the Roman foreign policy now comes into full play. That Rome had the power to crush Carthage but didn't, is the key. Instead, they created "two Carthages." What an unusual simile may be drawn from this.

London (Rome, in this simile) has for years had the policy of balance of forces. As the Victorian age began to wane, however, a new look was needed at the world powers. Germany had been consolidated from Prussia to the extremities of the Holy Roman Empire. What is more, Austro-Hungary was a natural potential ally. France was through as a world power, as was Spain, the two of them having been the ancient threat to England. Russia, long a sleeping giant, had been contained by sea power, by bottling-up, as it were, in portless ports. The Teutonic to her west was more than a match on the ground, and she was frustrated in the eastern sector by the two mushrooming Pacific powers, Japan and America. London-Rome's "ally," America, was growing in muscle and stature daily, the concocted and induced civil war having failed to check her. Therefore, a change of world tactics within the same strategy was necessary. Germany would be destroyed, rather crippled; in one, and if needs be, two jolting wars. The "rival & ally" would both be embroiled. Judicious balancing of the "rival & ally" after disposing of Germany would become the modern day recreation of "the two Carthages." Furthermore, this time the division of the world would be so allocated as to give the appearance that Carthage-Washington was in in parity with Carthage-Moscow while, in fact, both sides were being directed from central Rome-London. Preparatory to this, the various revolutionaries were brought to London and trained. The eastern group, Marx, Lenin, Trotsky, were trained in the sword, i.e., revolution from below. The western group, the Fabian Society, was trained in the use of the pen, revolution from above. Both were sent their way to destroy the Christian Tzar and the Christian Constitution preparatory "for a New World Government." Both have succeeded.

To make the simile more interesting, consider the name changes the "Illuminated Ones" assumed. There was Adam Weishaupt, Spartacus; von Zwack, Cato; Mirabeau, Leonidas; Baron von Schroeckenstein, Mahomet; Urbanus... etc.

If you study the foregoing carefully, you may conclude with this editor, that as a thumb-nail political history of the world since the Boer War (or since the first Punic War?) it is something of a masterpiece; that is, if you subscribe to the Conspiratorial View of History, rather than to the Dialectical and Historical Materialism of the Marxian school.

For the purposes of our present study, note particularly the two weapons used to re-establish a balance of power: the pen and the sword; the pen to promote revolution from above; the sword to foment revolution from below.

When the "penmen" were well trained, they and their writings began creeping into the United States. Fabian leaders Sydney Webb and Edward R. Pease came to the United States in 1888 for a long visit to train Fabian groups in the art of socialism, and an American Fabian League was formed before the turn of the century, and a magazine, The American Fabian, began publication in February, 1895. The Fabian plan for the United States called for a long-range program "to effect a series of basic changes in the (United States) Constitution itself that would make possible the introduction of State Socialism step by step in the United States." The editors, as early as 1895, boldly announced:

We call our paper "The American Fabian" for two reasons; we call it Fabian because we desire to make it stand for the kind of educational Socialist work which is so ably done by the English Fabian Society... We call our paper "The American Fabian" because our politics must in a measure differ from those of the English Fabians. England and America are alike in some things; in some things they are utterly unlike. England's (unwritten) Constitution readily admits of constant though gradual modification. Our American Constitution does not readily admit of such change. England can thus move into Socialism almost imperceptibly. Our Constitution being largely individualistic must be changed to admit of Socialism, and each change necessitates a political crisis. This means the raising of great new issues. (Italics added).

"Change the Constitution" was the cry — and this was not a result of American thinking. The plan to change our Constitution came from England!

To substantiate that statement: In 1897 Ramsay McDonald, a Fabian Socialist later to become a British Prime Minister, made a trip to the United States. He returned to England and, on January 14, 1898, he gave a report of the visit to the London Fabian Society, which met at Clement's Inn. McDonald told his fellow Fabian Socialists:

"The great bar to (Socialist) progress (in the United States) is the written constitutions, Federal and State, which give ultimate power to a law court."

We'll have occasion to refer to this subject in later letters. But, to return to the chronological pattern in our study:

On September 12, 1905, a meeting was held in a loft above Peck's Restaurant, at 140 Fulton Street, in Lower Manhattan. At that meeting were Jack London, Upton Sinclair, Thomas Wentworth Higgins, J.G. Phelps-Stokes, Clarence Darrow, Morris Hillquist, Harry W. Laidler, Owen R. Lovejoy, perhaps others. At this meeting there was born the Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

We wrote, in a previous letter, that Jack London was made first president of ISS. The purpose of ISS was "to promote an intelligent interest' in Socialism among college men and women." And the charter members went to work immediately forming chapters in colleges and universities across the land.

By 1917 chapters had been organized in 61 colleges and universities and, by 1921 the ISS was ready for its next step: it became the League for Industrial Democracy.

It is not our intention to conduct a study in depth of the League for Industrial Democracy. However, in order to show its positive connections with the British parent movement, some documentation seems advisable:

The 49th annual report, 1931, of the British Fabian Society said "...we continue active association... with the League for Industrial Democracy of New York which carries on active propoganda in the United States on very similar lines to our own work here..."

The League for Industrial Democracy, in its official organ, News Bulletin, Volume 1, Number 2, January, 1923, openly boasted:

"What the Fabian Society and Guild Socialist League have done in England, what Clarte is doing on the Continent - this, making due allowance for American conditions and American needs, the L.I.D. seeks to accomplish in the United States."

We stress the importance of the above, and of documentation of similar nature which could be offered; because in the United States left-wing liberals will insist that they are not, cannot be labeled, Fabian Socialists because there is no Fabian Socialist organization in the United States!

It could be said with equal evasiveness that there are no members of the Illuminati in the United States because there is no organization of that name in the country! But, it has been the policy of Illuminists, since the first exposure of that organization almost 200 years ago, never to use the word Illuminati or the term Order of the Illuminati, in identifying any person or activity. Exactly the same is true of the Fabian movement in the United States. After a few abortive attempts to found "Fabian" Societies in the United States, the name "Fabian" was dropped from the American vocabulary of Socialism, and other names were used; such as (we name only the principal organizations at this time) :

Intercollegiate Socialist Society
American Civil Liberties Union
Americans for Democratic Action
American Socialist Party
Atlantic Union

Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions
Council on Foreign Relations
C.I.O. (especially while under the control of the Reuther brothers, and prior to its amalgamation with A.F.L.)
Federal Council of Churches
Harvard Socialist Club
Institute of Pacific Relations
International Ladies Garment Workers under the leadership of David Dubinsky League for Industrial Democracy
New School for Social Research
Progressive Education Association
Rhodes Scholars
Students for Democratic Action
Students' League for Industrial Democracy
Terrible 1313 complex
and many other organizations.

Aside from all of these organizations and their activities, however, there existed in the United States in the first decade of this twentieth century, a group of "academic Socialists," liberal professors who were destined to do more towards socializing the United States than all of the organizations combined. And, to this day, few Americans realize what happened:-

There was a professor of Jurisprudence and Political Science at Princeton University. He associated with a group of Socialist-minded fellow professors from various Ivy League Universities, men such as Harry L. Overstreet, Henry C. Adams, Richard T. Ely, Albert Shaw, William Graham Sumner, Rev. William Bayard Hale, William T. Harrison, E.R.A. Seligman, Lincoln Steffens, W.D.P. Bliss, etc. The name of this professor was Thomas Woodrow Wilson, son of a Presbyterian minister, destined to become the 28th President of the United States, and so serve at a time when the Fabians began to achieve their first great goal: "to change the Constitution of the United States" in order that it might, step by step, become the "United Socialist Republics of America."

While Woodrow Wilson could not actually be named a Socialist, he did present Fabian Socialist programs as his own. And, under Wilson, this nation became the Carthage-Washington ally to Rome-London's Carthage-Moscow rival.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Seven

THE PROFESSOR GOES TO WASHINGTON AND THE COLONEL GOES TO TOWN

"Colonel House was watching the opportunity. In 1910 he came East from Texas and, like Diogenes, sought a man. 'I began now to look about (he wrote) for a proper candidate for the Democratic nomination for President. ... I turned to Woodrow Wilson, then Governor of New Jersey, as being the only man in the East who in every way measured up to the office for which he was a candidate'."

So recorded Charles Seymour, compiler and arranger of The Intimate Papers of Colonel House. Seymour noted that Wilson and House met for the first time on November 24, 1911, only a year before the election, and they became "instant soul-mates." The next day, House wrote to his brother-in-law, S.A. Mezes, then President of the University of Texas:

New York, November 25, 1911

Dear Sidney:

I had a delightful visit from Woodrow Wilson yesterday afternoon.... We had a perfectly bully time.... Never before have I found both the man and the opportunity.

Fraternally yours

E. M. H.

That Wilson was, indeed, "the man" was made manifest by one of his first campaign speeches (later to become a part of his book The New Freedom). Wilson said, in part:

We stand in the presence of a revolution—not a bloody revolution, America is not given to spilling blood—but a silent revolution, whereby America will insist upon recovering in practice those ideals which she has always professed, upon securing a government devoted to the general and not to special interests....

We are just upon the threshold of a time when the systematic life of this country will be sustained, or at least supplemented at every point, by government activity. And we have now to determine what kind of governmental activity it shall be; whether, in the first place, it shall be direct from the government itself, or whether it shall be indirect, through instrumentalities which have already constituted themselves and which stand ready to supersede the government.

Wilson might as well have been saying: "We are going to have totalitarianism, whether we like it or not. The question is; shall the dictatorship be run directly by the government, or indirectly by an Invisible Government?"

The author of The New Freedom would most naturally be a soul-mate to the author of Philip Dru—Administrator; because the two books had revolution and a new kind of government as their theme.

Edward Mandell House was, and remains, a most mysterious character. There are Seymour's four-volume collection of the Intimate Papers of Colonel House, but they tell us little of House, the Man. Then there is the book Mr. House of Texas, written with the aid and consent of House by Howden Smith. Here we learn that the original family name was Huis, that the family emigrated from Holland to England, and then to Texas before the War Between the States. Smith insists that House "was not of Jewish extraction" and that father Thomas House simply named his son Edward Mandell after "an intimate friend, a Jewish merchant." In any case, father Thomas accumulated a tremendous fortune running the blockade and shipping cotton to Europe during the Civil War, and House "was one of the few Southerners who came through the war years without any appreciable diminution of wealth." While the people of the South were undergoing the sufferings and terrors of the reconstruction years following the War, House took his family back to England and here young Edward Mandell was placed in a fashionable English school where, according to biographer Howden Smith "here were planted the seeds of that partiality for Britain, his father's homeland, which undoubtedly exerted a profound influence upon his mental attitude in after years."

Once the Southland began to rid itself of the carpet-baggers, House and family returned to Texas, but young Edward Mandell seems to have left his heart in London.

In 1911 House left Texas to establish residence in New York City, pulled strings to get his intimate friend and brother-in-law, Sidney Mizes, transferred from the University of Texas to the presidency of the College of the City of New York. Aside from brother-in-law Sidney, and soul-mate Woodrow Wilson, Edward Mandell's next best friend seems to have been Walter Lippmann, who "assisted House in an atmosphere of secrecy to prepare for the European peace." (Quotation is from Smith's biography of House).

According to Howden Smith, House "was a fearless thinker, utterly untrammelled by accepted conventions. For example, he was under no illusions as to the basic character of the American Constitution and the system of government it created. He believed that the Constitution, product of eighteenth-century minds and the quasi-classical, medieval conception of republics, was thoroughly outdated, that the country would be better off if the Constitution could be scrapped and rewritten. But as a realist he knew that this was impossible in the existing state of political education."

But House had plans for greater than merely changing the United States into a Dictatorship ruled by an Administrator. He was an international operative whose real connections have never been fully revealed to the public. We do have a clue, found in a booklet by one Foster Bailey, an occultist, theosophist, illuminist, Englishman, director of the Lucis Trust, and leader of The New Group of World Servers.

In a lecture delivered to an esoteric group in London in October, 1954, Bailey said:

Esotericists in the world have to learn how the New Group of World Servers works and then work in that way. We have to bring to humanity knowledge of the Hierarchy in new-age terms, and to do that we have to enlarge our own understanding of the Hierarchy. If we do not do that and do not understand more about them, how they work and the practical relationship possible between the disciple and the Master, then we cannot give a true picture.

Humanity today is ready and waiting to be told about The Plan. That there is one is widely assumed. We are now able to recognize certain facts and features about that Plan which are so practical and so common-sense and so real and useful, that they cannot be denied. In every land, in every nation, in every race, in almost every city of any size all over the world today there are people eager to know what they can do in line with God's Plan that will be useful. We shall never lift the futility of the men and women of the world so that the potency of their loving hearts and the intelligence of their keenly focused minds can be used until we do away with this futility in ourselves. We must let them know about the Hierarchy, about the Plan and about the New Group of World Servers. Knowledge of these three things are in our hands. They are of deep, and fundamental significance and about them we can know much more should we focus upon it.

Let us consider how the New Group of World Servers came into existence because the method of its creation gives us the key as to how we as esotericists can learn to wield world-wide influence as a group and escape the folly of an attempt to create an esoteric super-organisation, with old-age pressurizing propaganda.

Some of you will perhaps remember information given us about the way the old League of Nations came into existence. One of the Masters at a conference in the Hierarchy made a suggestion toward the improving of the relationships between nations in line with the new-age needed co-operation. It was considered useful. The different Masters thought about it and therefore the disciples in the Ashrams who were close to them and had achieved some telephatic relationships, also thought about it. Eventually one disciple picked it up and said, "I will do something about it." He then formulated a plan of physical plane action and this was considered. The whole field was studied as to what would be practical and could possibly be achieved and the disciple was given the green light, so to speak, and went to work. In the case of the League of Nations that disciple happened to be COLONEL HOUSE. He worked with all those he could influence, and the sixth ray disciple WOODROW WILSON took the lead and the League of Nations was born. Thus an Hierarchical effort was anchored on the physical plane by a disciple and responded to, by those who could catch the vision and wanted to serve their fellowmen. This example illustrates an Hierarchical technique. (Italics added).

Foster Bailey, author of the above, was identified as English. However, he spent much of his life in the United States and is perhaps better identified as a world citizen. He was the husband of Alice Evans Bailey, third woman in the "holy trinity of Theosophy," the other two being Madame Helena Blavatsky and Annie Besant, both of whom were "card carrying" members of the British Fabian Society until they resigned to devote full time to the development of the religious department of the world government movement. In the book, The Theosophical Movement, 1875-1950, there is this reference:

Two members of the Besant Society in the United States, Alice A. Evans and Foster Bailey, joined forces in marriage, formed the "Arcane School," and for many years held classes and correspondence courses under the ostensible guidance of a "Tibetan" teacher. . . . Mrs. Bailey died in 1949 at the age of seventy. . . .

Foster Bailey, obviously, was much younger than his wife and, insofar as we have been able to determine, after her death, Bailey transferred his headquarters to England and amalgamated his activities with that of the Lucis Trust, a British-based organization of occultists headquartered at 38 Broadwater Down, Tunbridge Wells, Kent; which, in turn, has an important interest in the Temple of Understanding project on the outskirts of Washington, D.C.

Colonel House is identified as one of the disciples of the Ashrams operating as a World Server toward the end of the Piscean Age—it is publicly announced that the world now has entered the Aquarian Age. Woodrow Wilson was a "sixth ray disciple." Just how important are these allegations of telepathic communication between disciples on the physical plane—such as House—and Masters on the "astral" or supernatural, plane? Let us not dismiss the claims too lightly. It should be understood that we are dealing with conspiracy; and the ultimate Conspiracy began in the Garden of Eden, and that Conspiracy was on the spiritual plane. To deny the power of Satan to work in the world and influence men toward the carrying out of his plans, is to do exactly what Satan desires of you. Satan, as the god of this world and the prince of the power of the air, has his Hierarchy which works with his disciples on the physical plane. To deny this is to deny the Word of Scripture itself. And because of this, we are commanded to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves.

However, back to Ashram disciple House and Sixth Ray disciple Wilson, and their activities on the physical plane:

By some strange coincidence, Colonel House found it necessary to travel to Europe every summer, supposedly for reasons of health. In 1912, it was essential that Wilson win the presidential nomination if House's plans were to succeed. Seymour wrote that "Champ Clark had by far the largest convention vote of all the candidates, and it was evident that he must first be disposed of before any of the other candidates would have a chance." As a matter of record, Wilson did not win the nomination until the 46th ballot, and it was House's explicit instructions to the Texas delegation, given before it left Texas for the Baltimore convention, which won the day for Wilson. But, that House would miss this vital event to sail to Europe, would seem to show that something even more vital demanded House's presence in England in the summer of 1912. House wrote to Wilson:

Dear Governor Wilson:

I am sorry beyond measure that it is my fate not to be able to be at the Baltimore Convention. . . . However, I have done everything that I could do up to now to advise and to anticipate every contingency. . . . We are sailing for England on the Cunard S.S. Laconia on the 25th. . . . If you will permit me to act as your friend in an advisory capacity it will give me pleasure to use my every effort in your behalf. . . .

Faithfully yours

E. M. House

The nomination was difficult, but the actual election was more or less a foregone conclusion because of a manufactured split between Taft and Roosevelt. "As election returns came in on November 5," wrote Seymour, "it soon became clear that the Democratic confidence in overwhelming victory was fully justified. Mr. Taft carried only two states, Roosevelt only 88 electoral votes. It is true that Wilson's popular vote was less than a majority, but his plurality in the electoral college was the greatest ever received by a presidential candidate, and he carried with him handsome Democratic majorities in the Senate and House of Representatives."

In 1913, the following things happened:

The New Freedom, by Woodrow Wilson, containing major portions of his campaign addresses, published: "An attempt to express the new spirit of our politics." The book was compiled by Christian Socialist W.B. Hale, and was a nearly perfect mirror of the social program of the British Fabians.

An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution, by Charles Beard, published. At the time, Beard was a professor at Columbia University and listed as a faculty sponsor of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society.

Feb. 25, Sixteenth, income tax, amendment, declared in force.

May 31, Seventeenth amendment (popular election of U.S. Senators) proclaimed in effect.)

Dec. 23. President Wilson signs into law the bill creating the Federal Reserve System.

On May 15, 1914, Colonel House sailed for Europe on his "Great Adventure," a plan to build up the underdeveloped areas of the world by converting into an international labor corps, the armies of Germany, England, Japan and the United States. Instead, however, war was declared while House was in Europe talking to various heads of government.

Despite these regular mysterious visits to Europe, House still maintained absolute control over the White House. Wilson—up to the time of his dramatic break with House at Paris in 1918—did not make a single important decision without first consulting his alter ego. Bernard Baruch, who was in a position to know, declared: "The Colonel's hand was in everything." And it was House, working in close cooperation with the World Zionist Organization and the British Foreign Office, who maneuvered the United States into active participation in World War One on the side of England!

The situation needs to be understood:

Perfidious Albion had become the tail that wagged the dog that was Europe; by means of a foreign policy strategy that came to be known as the "balance of power." That is, England would balance the power of one nation or group of nations, against the power of another nation or group of nations. But, as Germany began to grow too great and too powerful, and as France and Spain began to shrink into second class powers, a new set of powers had to be raised up if Albion were to continue acting as the political fulcrum around which the world would turn. Circumstances decreed that those two new world powers were to be the powerful youth that was the United States and the sleeping bear that was Russia (see Part Six of this series, and note the "Two Carthages" simile).

So: Germany was to be crippled, the United States was to be forced out of her Western isolation and into world affairs, and Russia was to be awakened and Socialized, and made the enemy power against which the friendly power (U.S.A.) could be balanced. Now read the following items and note how they fit into the political jigsaw puzzle:

1. There appeared in the Jewish Chronicle of London on Feb. 7, 1936, the "Landman Letter," the author having been the Honorary Secretary of the Second Joint Zionist Council of the United Kingdom. We quote, in part:

During the critical days of the War, in 1916... (Sir Douglas) Malcolm... took the initiative in convincing these representatives of the British and French Governments that the best and perhaps the only way to induce the American President to come into the War was to secure the cooperation of Zionist Jewry by promising them Palestine. By so doing the Allies would enlist and mobilize the hitherto unsuspectedly powerful force of Zionist Jewry in America and elsewhere in favour of the Allied on a quid pro quo basis. At that time, President Wilson attached the greatest possible importance to the advice of Mr. Justice Brandeis... The Zionists carried out their part and helped to bring America in, and the Balfour Declaration of November 2nd, 1917, was but the public confirmation of the verbal agreement of 1916.

2. Sir William Wiseman was wartime chief of the British Secret Service in America, and was introduced to President Wilson by Col. House. After the war ended, Wiseman remained in the United States and joined the banking firm of Kuhn, Loeb and Company. Wiseman was much interested in a group of revolutionaries headquartering at 63 West 107th Street in New York City, under the leadership of an electrician employed at the Fox Film Studios who went by the name of Leon Trotsky.

Immediately after the United States broke diplomatic relations with Germany as a preliminary to declaring war, Trotsky and his group were given passage on March 27, 1918, on a Norwegian American liner. The night before his departure, Trotsky made a speech at Harlem River Park Casino, spoke in both German and Russian and said: "I am going back to Russia to overthrow the provisional government and stop the war with Germany and allow no interference from any outside government." And, as Trotsky boarded the ship for Russia he carried a substantial amount of money supplied by Kuhn, Loeb and other International Banking Houses. When the ship stopped over at Halifax, Nova Scotia, Trotsky was arrested and detained, but then released and allowed to proceed at the request of President Wilson, via Col. House to Sir William Wiseman.

At approximately the same time, Lenin and his immediate group was allowed to proceed in sealed railway cars, from Switzerland through Germany to Leningrad. There, Lenin and Trotsky joined forces to overthrow the provisional government set up by Kerensky. The whole invasion and conquest was financed by International Bankers out of their London, Washington, and Berlin offices.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Eight

THE MARRIAGE OF FABIAN SOCIALISM WITH FINANCE CAPITALISM

"By the start of this century, the architects of the left-wing underworld had learned how to draw the funds of the very wealthy into socialistic hands," remarks Zygmund Dobbs in The Great Deceit. "In this they copied the British Fabian Socialist Society. Beatrice Webb, who along with her husband and G. B. Shaw dominated the Fabian movement, was herself a wealthy heiress. She taught other Fabians how to ease their way into the confidence of the influential and the rich and their children. In fact, it is a standard Fabian socialist policy to secure wealthy heirs and heiresses as marriage partners for their members so as to syphon big fortunes into the coffers of the socialist movement."

Arnold Bennett, a prominent Fabian, commented in his diary for July 8, 1898: "Nolan (another prominent Fabian—Ed.) told me that every few years some promising member of the Fabian Society contrived to marry an heiress, whose wealth and energies were subsequently devoted to the cause. Thus Sidney Webb married Beatrice Potter, B. G. Costelloe married Miss Pearsall Smith, and J. Ramsay MacDonald married Miss M. E. Gladstone. Nolan assured me as a fact that G. B. S. some months ago discussed with certain other Fabian Society members as to whose 'duity it was to marry an heiress'."

"Shaw, himself," continues Dobbs, "deliberately plotted out a marriage with a wealthy heiress of masculine habits. Thus the socialist movement became a recipient of millions of dollars along with the influence of one of the wealthiest families of the world. This was strictly a marriage of convenience, and in Shaw's own words in which 'sex had no part'."

"In the United States numerous Fabian socialists did the same. Norman Thomas, for example, married an heiress and as a result has been able to live affluently on the basis of his wife's income. Numerous other American socialist leaders have done the same.

Thus, the daughters of some of America's wealthiest families have been politically seduced in order to furnish the radical movement with a plentiful supply of capitalistic dollars. . . . Academic leftists were experts in the technique of separating millionaires from their money while simultaneously vociferating that the wealthy were an evil element that had to be eliminated. In the ensuing years, the socialists accomplished the amazing feat of getting control of the giant foundations, all founded by men who had devoted their lives to the free enterprise system and owed to it their enormous fortunes." (Preceding written in 1964—Ed.)

There was also the "Wall Street Alliance" with Fabian Socialism by way of publications (Fabianism uses the pen, while Communism uses the sword). Carroll Quigley, author of Tragedy and Hope, a History of the World in Our Time, is careful never to refer to Fabianism in any one of the 1348 pages of his book. He dodges the word "Fabian" by oversimplifying: he speaks of only two kinds of Socialism; Utopian and Scientific. Yet he does make reference to the "marriage of convenience between Capitalism and Socialism. but he does it in such a way that J. P. Morgan and his direct associates are blamed for the "Morganatic marriage," and such banking houses as Kuhn, Loeb, Rothschild, Lazard, Warburg, Lehman, etc. seem to be exonerated of guilt, by omission. Quigley plays with the Anglophile names: Harkness, Payne Whitney, Dillon, Lamont, Carnegie, Vanderbilt, Brown-Harriman, Rockefeller; but he writes not a word in this context of any name of outright Semitic origin.

What Quigley wrote is true, but it is not the whole truth. Here is what he wrote:

More than fifty years ago the Morgan firm decided to infiltrate the Left-wing political movements in the United States. This was relatively easy to do, since these groups were starved for funds and eager for a voice to reach the people. Wall Street supplied both. . . .

The best example of this alliance of Wall Street and Left-wing publication was The New Republic, a magazine founded by Willard Straight, using Payne Whitney money, in 1914. Straight, who had ... remained in the Far East from 1901 to 1912, became a Morgan partner and the firm's chief expert on the Far East. He married Dorothy Payne Whitney ... daughter of William C. Whitney, New York utility millionaire and the sister and co-heiress of Oliver Payne, of the Standard Oil "trust." One of her brothers married Gertrude Vanderbilt, while the other, Payne Whitney, married the daughter of Secretary of State John Hay, who enunciated the American policy of the "open door" in China. In the next generation, three first cousins, John Hay (Jock) Whitney, Cornelius Vanderbilt (Sonny) Whitney, and Michael Whitney (Mike) Straight, were allied in numerous public policy enterprises of a propagandistic nature, and all three served in various roles in the late New Deal and Truman administrations. In these they were closely allied with other "Wall Street liberals," such as Nelson Rockefeller.

The original purpose for establishing the paper (The New Republic) was to provide an active outlet for the progressive Left and to guide it in an Anglophile direction (in other words, promote Fabian ideals and policies—Ed.) This latter task was entrusted to a young man, only four years out of Harvard, but already a member of the mysterious Round Table group, which has played a major role in directing England's foreign policy since its formal establishment in 1909. This new recruit, WALTER LIPPMANN, has been from 1914 to the present, the authentic spokesman in American journalism for the Establishment on both sides of the Atlantic in international affairs....

It was these connections, as a link between Wall Street and the Round Table Group, which gave Lippmann the opportunity in 1918, while still in his twenties, to be the official interpreter of the meaning of Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points to the British government....

There is a most important omission in the above quotation: Carroll Quigley fails to point out that, in addition to his membership in the Round Table Group, and his tie-up with the "money barons of Wall Street," Walter Lippmann was also a charter member of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, and a member of the British Fabian Society. Later, he helped organize the Institute of International Affairs which, in 1921, became incorporated as The Council on Foreign Relations!

Through Walter Lippmann, then, the interlock is made manifest: Finance Capitalism, Fabian Socialism, Anglophile Internationalism, all recognizing Walter Lippmann as their spokesman and journalistic mouthpiece!

But this is too important an allegation to make from the pen of only one witness. We add to the shaded testimony of Carroll Quigley the more forthright and open testimony of Rose L. Martin, in Fabian Freeway:

Financed by Dorothy Whitney Straight, whose brother was a J.P. Morgan partner, the New Republic was staffed in the beginning by a number of talented, ambitious and socially acceptable young Socialists from Harvard, who dropped the Socialist label but not its program soon after graduating. Among them was the pundit and columnist, Walter Lippmann, who had joined the Fabian Society of London in 1909....

By what Lippmann prudently calls "a certain parallelism of reasoning," the New Republic often suggested policies that President Wilson followed. In those years the paper enjoyed a kind of mysterious importance which it never equaled again, not even under the New Frontier.

During the winter of 1916 young Lippmann had several interviews, "such as any journalist has," with the President.... Thereafter, Herbert Croly, senior editor of the New Republic, and Walter Lippmann met about once every fortnight with Colonel House to discuss problems "relating to the management of neutrality" prior to the reelection of President Wilson in 1916. With S.K. Ratcliffe commuting from London to attend editorial luncheons at the New Republic, the Fabian circuit was complete....

It was no accident that the Fabian Socialist Walter Lippmann, while on the staff of the New Republic, was named by Colonel House in 1917 as executive secretary of a confidential group to formulate war aims and postwar policy for President Wilson. There the famous—or infamous—slogan, "Peace Without Victory" was born, to be revived in a more literal sense many years later during the Korean War (and to become the official policy of the Nixon Administration in regard to the current Indochina War—Ed.)

That postwar planning group named by Col. House, was a well-kept secret. In fact, little has ever been written about it by "court historians." It was headed by Dr. Sidney Mezes, brother-in-law of Col. House, who was brought eastward by House, from the University of Texas to the City College of New York, that House might have a "crony" with whom he might discuss his real aims and aspirations. So, House named his own brother-in-law to head this first Presidential "brain trust," and he named Walter Lippmann executive secretary of the group. Lippmann later let it be known that there were about 150 "college professors and other specialists" in this secret group that came to be dubbed "The Inquiry." We have never seen a complete list of these 150, but it is known that some of them later were to become important members of the Federal Bureaucracy and most of them were to form the charter nucleus of that "secret government" that came to be known as the Council on Foreign Relations.

Identified as members of "The Inquiry" were: Sidney Mezes, Walter Lippmann, Dr. Isaiah Bowman, Norman Thomas (head of the American Socialist Party), Allen Dulles (to become head of C.I.A.), John Foster Dulles (to become Secretary of State), Christian A. Herter (also to become Secretary of State), Tasker H. Bliss (a general who had a running feud with General Pershing), James T. Shotwell (a Canadian who was a British propagandist prior to America's entry into World War I), and young Franklin Delano Roosevelt was an American adviser at the Paris Peace Conference, but there is some question as to whether he was a member of House's special Inquiry group.

One group which has not been sufficiently covered in previous comments concerning the Paris Peace Conference, is the International Banking Cabal. In his The Invisible Government, Dan Smoot observes that:

"House had powerful connections with international bankers in New York. He was influential, for example, with great financial institutions represented by such people as Paul and Felix Warburg, Otto H. Kahn, Louis Marburg, Henry Morgenthau, Jacob and Mortimer Schiff, and Herbert Lehman. House had equally powerful connections with bankers and politicians of Europe.

Especially important was House's influence and his intimate connections with the English banking houses, such as key representatives of Lazards, Hambros, Morgan Grenfell, de Stein's, Gibbs, Schroders, Rothschilds, Samuels, Sterns, Samuels, Sassoons, etc.

And important in this connection is the comment of Dr. Dillon, the British observer whose book on the Paris Peace Conference is considered the most objective of the lot of books written on the subject (including that of Fabian John Maynard Keynes). Dr. Dillon wrote:

Of all the collectivists whose interests were furthered at the Conference, the Jews had perhaps the most resourceful and certainly the most influential exponents. There were Jews from Palestine, from Poland, Russia, the Ukraine, Roumania, Greece, Britain, Holland, and Belgium; but the largest and most brilliant contingent were sent by the United States.... It is none the less a fact that a considerable number of Delegates believed that the real influences behind the Anglo-Saxon peoples were Semitic.

The formula into which this policy was thrown by the members of the Conference, whose countries it affected, and who regarded it as fatal to the peace of Eastern Europe, was this: "Henceforth the world will be governed by the Anglo-Saxon Peoples, who in turn, are swayed by their Jewish elements." (Here is the British-Israel Movement as seen in 1918 by the people of Continental Europe who feared the movement of "the tail which wagged the dog that was Europe." More on this phase of the Conspiracy in later letters—Ed.)

In Revelation 16:12, John records a vision in which he saw "three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils...."

Out of this "war to make the world safe for democracy" and its ensuing "Peace Without Victory," emerged three spirits:

1. The spirit of "Jewish Nationalism," that was brought about by the Balfour Declaration and the later establishment of the State of Israel.
2. The spirit of American Internationalism, brought about through the violation of the Monroe Doctrine and the emergence of the United States as a "world leader."
3. The spirit of Russian Imperialism, brought about by the installation of Russia as a Communist world power.

This last phase of the plot has been reported excellently by the British journalist, H. Wickham Steed, in his book Through Thirty Years. Before quoting from the book, let us identify the characters to whom he refers:

William C. Bullitt was one of House's "experts" at Paris. While a student he had become an admirer of John Reed, "Harvard's most distinguished Communist" who died and was buried in the Kremlin. Bullitt married Reed's widow and for his services in helping to bring the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. together diplomatically, Bullitt was honored by being named the first American Ambassador to Soviet Russia—by F.D.R. in 1933.

Lincoln Steffens was a Socialist who embraced almost every type of same at some time in his life. He joined L.I.D. as a Fabian but later became an Anarchist, still later espoused Bolshevism, finally settled down as a kind of parlor pink supporting Norman Thomas. At the time of Steed's report, he was promoting Bolshevism.

... a flutter was caused by the return from Moscow of Messrs. William C. Bullitt and Lincoln Steffens who had been sent to Russia towards the middle of February (1919) by Colonel House and Mr. Lansing. . . . Potent international financial interests were at work in favour of the immediate recognition of the Bolsheviks. Those influences had been largely responsible for the Anglo-American proposal in January to call Bolshevik representatives to Paris at the beginning of the Peace Conference. . . . The well-known American-Jewish banker, Mr. Jacob Schiff, was well known to be anxious to secure recognition for the Bolsheviks, among whom Jewish influence was predominant; and Tchitcherin, the Bolshevik Commissar for Foreign Affairs, had revealed the meaning of the January proposal by offering extensive commercial and economic concessions in return for recognition. At a moment when the Bolsheviks were doing their utmost to spread revolution throughout Europe, and when the Allies were supposed to be making peace in the name of high moral principles, a policy of recognizing them, at the price of commercial concessions, would have sufficed to wreck the whole Peace Conference and Europe with it. At the end of March, Hungary was already Bolshevik; Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and even Germany were in danger and European feeling against the blood-stained fanatics of Russia ran extremely high. Therefore, when it transpired that an American official, connected with the Peace Conference, had returned, after a week's visit to Moscow, with an optimistic report upon the state of Russia and with an authorized Russian proposal for the virtual recognition of the Bolshevik regime by April 10th, dismay was felt everywhere except by those who had been privy to the sending of Mr. Bullitt. . . .

... Shortly after leaving Colonel House, information reached me that Mr. Lloyd George and President Wilson would probably agree next morning to recognize the Bolsheviks in accordance with Mr. Bullitt's suggestions. . . . I had hardly sent this article to the printers (The London Daily Mail—Ed.) when an American friend, Mr. Charles R. Crane, who had been dining with President Wilson, called to see me. He showed great alarm at the turn things were taking. "Bullitt is back," he said, "and the President is already talking Bullitt's language. I fear he may ruin everything. Our people at home will certainly not stand for the recognition of the Bolsheviks at the bidding of Wall Street. . . ."

Before I was up next day, Colonel House telephoned to say that he wished to see me urgently. Apparently, to use an Americanism, my article "had got under the President's hide." When I reached the (hotel) Crillon, House and Auchincloss looked grave. I told them that, had I waited to discuss policy with them before writing my article, the chances were that there would have been no policy to discuss because the President, and, possibly (Prime Minister) Lloyd George would have committed themselves to recognition of the Bolsheviks that very morning.

Two events that changed history: Because of too early exposure, the plot to recognize Communist Russia in 1919 was defeated, and diplomatic recognition was delayed for 15 years, a fact that may have made a second world war seem necessary to the Planners. And because of a break between Wilson and House and the ensuing disenchantment with Wilson's Fabian plan for World Government, the League of Nations was never recognized by the United States, and the creation of the United Nations, following a world crisis, became inevitable to the Planners.

When it became evident that a New World Order was not to be produced at Paris, then a plan calling for a delaying action (Fabian strategy) was developed:

Colonel House and Lionel Curtis (of the British Foreign Office) arranged a dinner meeting at the Hotel Majestic in Paris on May 19, 1919, to which a select group of Fabian-minded Americans and Englishmen were invited for the purpose of setting up an organization with branches in every English-speaking nation of the world "to facilitate the scientific study of international questions." At that meeting were the Dulles brothers, Christian Herter, Tasker Bliss, James Shotwell, and others; and on the British side were Arnold Toynbee, R. H. Tawney, John Maynard Keynes, and other members of the Fabian Society, the Round Table Group, or both.

Formed at that meeting was the Royal Institute of International Affairs (Chatham House, London), the American Institute of International Affairs, which was reorganized in 1921 and renamed the Council on Foreign Affairs.

From that time onward, collectivists of every type promoting internationalist schemes of every type, would look upon the Council as aegis, forum, and sometimes financier.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Nine

THE DRIVE TO RECOVER THE LOST COLONIES

"There does exist, and has existed for a generation, an international Anglophile network which operates, to some extent, in the way the radical Right believes the communists act," writes Anglophile Carroll Quigley in his slanted but revealing history of the world in our time, Tragedy and Hope. "In fact," he continues, "that network, which we may identify as the Round Table Groups, has no aversion to cooperating with the Communists, or any other groups, and frequently does so..."

Five years ago, in a series we were writing at the time (later published as Volume II of The Barbarians, but no longer available because reprinting of limited editions is economically infeasible to a small publisher), we first made mention of the Round Table Groups. Since that time we have received numerous requests for further information on the subject.

Since England has now become Socialized, and since any effort to re-unite the United States with the British Empire is, therefore, an effort toward Socialization of the United States; this seems an appropriate occasion for discussing this "international Anglophile network which operates...in the way the Communists act."

First, let us set the scene. In 1870: The United States was still healing the wounds suffered from the banker-inspired and slavery-instigated War Between the States. Alaska had been purchased from Russia, there was some concern over the continuing difficulties between States in South America, over the ten-years of civil war Cuba had waged against Spain, conditions were unsettled in Mexico, but Canada had been granted Confederacy status by England. All in all, the United States was concerned with its own affairs in its own hemisphere, the Spirit of Manifest Destiny was yet to be enunciated, and the United States had no concern for Old World intrigues.

On the other hand, Europe, in 1870, was in a ferment. Emperor Franz Josef had just established the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which was to endure until destruction in World War One. The Franco-Prussian War saw the Germans invading and defeating France in 1870-71. This would lead to the deposition of Napoleon III and the setting up of the Third Republic of France, which was to last until the Germans would again invade and defeat France in 1940. As a result of the German victory of 1871, the new German Empire would be proclaimed with Wilhelm I at its head; this to last until Germany's defeat in World War One. Italy had just annexed the Papal States and in 1870 the new unified Italy emerged as a Nation. Spain was fighting desperately to hang onto an Empire, and was to find it impossible.

And England in 1870 was in the midst of a great political upheaval. William Gladstone, anti-Imperialist, Liberal (in the original meaning of the word), was at political war against Benjamin Disraeli, Imperialist, Tory, self-proclaimed "Jew but apostate Judaist," and final victor in the Gladstone vs Disraeli contest.

Gladstone and his followers regarded the idea of "Empire" with great suspicion. They felt that trying to establish an Empire was too expensive, that it would involve England in unnecessary wars, and that the idea was impractical because there was no economic advantage in building an Empire. At that time there was free trade, and Gladstone felt that England would be able to control that trade no matter who held the colonial territories because of England's control of the shipping lanes and England's superiority in manufacturing and merchandising ability. Besides, those colonial areas would finally separate from the mother country, voluntarily if they were given the rights of Englishmen, or by rebellion if they were deprived of such rights—as the American Colonies had already demonstrated. Looking at the situation a full century later, One might say that Gladstone & Co. thought in terms of a Commonwealth of Nations; while Disraeli and his cohorts thought in terms of Empire, with England ruling absolutely.

Though history has shown the victory of the Commonwealth idea over that of Empire, Disraeli won the day if not the century, and among his very first acts upon becoming Prime Minister (1874-1880) were the naming of Queen Victoria Empress of India and the gaining of control of the Suez Canal.

Carroll Quigley is of the opinion that the great propagandist who "sold" the idea of Empire to the English, as opposed to Gladstone's idea of "little England," was John Ruskin, whom most Americans would look upon as author and art critic rather than revolutionary. (How often these go together!) here, we quote Quigley:

Until 1870 there was no professorship of fine arts at Oxford, but in that year... John Ruskin was named to such a chair. He hit Oxford like an earthquake, not so much because he talked about fine arts, but because he talked about the empire and England's downtrodden masses, and above all because he talked about all three of these things as moral issues.... Ruskin spoke to the Oxford undergraduates as members of the privileged, ruling class. He told them that they were the possessors of a magnificent tradition of education, beauty, rule of law, freedom, decency, and self-discipline but that this tradition could not be saved, and did not deserve to be saved, unless it could be extended to the lower classes in England itself and to the non-English masses throughout the world....

Ruskin's message had a sensational impact. His inaugural lecture was copied out in longhand by one undergraduate, Cecil Rhodes, who kept it with him for thirty years.... With financial support from Lord Rothschild and Alfred Beit, he (Rhodes) was able to monopolize the diamond mines of South Africa as De Beers Consolidated Mines and to build up a great gold mining enterprise as Consolidated Gold Fields. In the middle 1890's Rhodes had a personal income of at least a million pounds sterling a year (then about five million dollars) which was spent so freely for his mysterious purposes that he was usually overdrawn on his account. These purposes centered on his desire to federate the English-speaking peoples and to bring all the habitable portions of the world under their control. For this purpose Rhodes left part of his great fortune to found the Rhodes Scholarships at Oxford in order to spread the English ruling class tradition throughout the English-speaking world as Ruskin had wanted.

Among Ruskin's most devoted disciples at Oxford were a group of intimate friends including Arnold Toynbee, Alfred (later Lord) Milner, Arthur Glazebrook, George (later Sir George) Parkin, Philip Lyttelton Gell, and Henry (later Sir Henry) Birchenough. These were so moved by Ruskin that they devoted the rest of their lives to carrying out his ideas. A similar group of Cambridge men including Reginald Baliol Brett (Lord Esher), Sir John B. Seely, Albert (Lord) Grey, and Edmund Garrett were also aroused by Ruskin's message and devoted their lives to extension of the British Empire and uplift of England's urban masses as two parts of one project which they called "extension of the English-speaking idea."

They were remarkably successful in these aims because England's most sensational journalist William T. Stead (1849-1912), an ardent social reformer and imperialist, brought them into association with Rhodes. This association was formally established on February 5, 1891, when Rhodes and Stead organized a secret society of which Rhodes had been dreaming for sixteen years. In this secret society Rhodes was to be leader; Stead, Brett (Lord Esher), and Milner were to form an executive committee; Arthur (Lord) Balfour, (Sir) Harry Johnston, Lord Rothschild, Albert (Lord) Grey, and others were listed as potential members of a "Circle of Initiates"; while there was to be an outer circle known as the "Association of Helpers" (later organized by Milner as the Round Table organization.)...

This group was able to get access to Rhodes's money after his death in 1902 and also the funds of loyal Rhodes supporters like Alfred Beit and Sir Abe Bailey.... They worked valiantly to extend the British Empire and to organize it into a federal system. They were constantly harping on the lessons to be learned from the failure of the American Revolution and the success of the Canadian federation of 1876, and hoped to federate the various parts of the empire as seemed feasible, then confederate the whole of it, with the United Kingdom, into a single organization. They also hoped to bring the United States into this organization....

So, there were the fortunes of Rhodes, Beit, Bailey, later of Carnegie, and an unknown amount of financial aid from Lord Rothschild, Lord Esher, the Astor family and others; all this vast amount of money being set aside for the purpose of creating a "World Confederation" ruled by the Anglo-Saxons (but with the inner "Circle of Initiates" proclaiming a "new doctrine": that the Anglo-Saxons were really the "Lost Tribes of Israel" and that the Tribe of Judah (allegedly the Jews of the world) would join the re-discovered Tribes in governing the world. This should explain the source of the money which is used to maintain certain "British Israel" promotional activities—vast trust funds and foundations were established at the end of the nineteenth century to finance such “religious” work).

Out of Rhodes’s vast fortune there was established the Rhodes Scholarship program. There also were created such groups as the English Speaking Union, the Atlantic Union (which was created in 1897), and similar “bundles for Britain” programs. But our concern in this series of letters is for the secret societies about which little has ever been published; especially, the Pilgrim Society and the Round Table Groups.

THE PILGRIMS were founded in London on July 24, 1902, four months after the death of Cecil Rhodes. The first officers were Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, President; General Lord Grenfell, Chauncey Depew, and Captain Hedworth Lambton, Vice-Presidents; and Sir Harry Brittain, Secretary. Americans involved with the British organization included General Joseph Wheeler of Alabama, Don M. Dickinson of Detroit, Colonel Herrick of Cleveland, and Charles T. Yerkes. Six months after the founding of the English Pilgrim Society, an American branch was set up.

Sir Harry Brittain as secretary of the Pilgrims, wrote a book that was published in a very limited edition in 1942—copies for members only and each copy personally autographed. E.C. Knuth, author of The Empire of the City says that he read a copy of the book which was titled Pilgrim Partners, and subtitled Forty Years of British-American Fellowship. Among other things, it is here revealed that the Pilgrim Society is “the most distinguished international organization in the world.” Its importance may be estimated by the fact that “each incoming American or British Ambassador receives his initial welcome from The Pilgrims, and gives his first address to the peoples of Britain or America respectively from a Pilgrim’s gathering.” It was the Pilgrim Society which caused Woodrow Wilson to break his promise to the American people, and plunge the nation into World War One. Referring to the book Pilgrim Partners, Mr. Knuth wrote:

On page 113, Sir Harry records (and the capitals are his): “AT LENGTH, IN APRIL, 1917, DAWNED A WONDROUS DAY in Anglo-American history—the U.S.A. had joined the Allies. The Pilgrim’s dream of fifteen years at length had come to pass... A few days later a solemn service was held at St. Paul’s Cathedral to mark the entry of the United States into the war, and the members of The Pilgrim’s Club were allotted a place of honor under the dome, behind the King and Queen... (page 115)”...

Sir Harry records that he was requested to come to New York in 1915 by the Chairman of the American Pilgrims “in order to give him a hand” in welcoming Lord Reading (Rufus Isaacs). The dinner in honor of Lord Reading took place at Sherry’s on October 1st, and was attended by 400 representative men prominent in the banking, commercial and political life in the United States. In Sir Harry’s words “dear old Joseph Choate” (former ambassador to Great Britain) presided.

The magic number of 400, once the symbol of reigning wealth and privilege, appears here in a new role. Men of millions here sway the destiny, the life or death of their fellow citizens, with an organization which is subversive to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States, an organization of which not one in one thousand of their fellow citizens has ever heard. The purpose of these men is completely interwoven with the dependence of their own invariably great fortunes on the operations of “The City,” citadel of International Finance. Not only do these men collectively exert a planned influence of immense weight in utter secrecy, but they operate with the support of the immense funds provided by Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie.

Perhaps once a year the New York Times or the London Times will contain an article mentioning a meeting of the Pilgrim Society, on which occasion some important State official will say something regarding Anglo-American relations, if such statement is more or less innocuous. But no public report is ever made of the really important decisions taken by this group of no more than 500 who literally control and dictate all important Anglo-American relations, political, commercial, educational and economic. This is made possible in great measure through the practice of naming United States Presidents honorary members of the Pilgrim Society, and adhering to a firm rule that Ambassadors of both nations must report to The Pilgrim Society before reporting to the Secretary of State or the British Foreign Minister.

A full and complete exposure of the activities of The Pilgrim Society since its birth in 1902 would literally shake thrones. But such exposure must be left to some organization with greater manpower than your present editor.

THE ROUND TABLE GROUPS were not organized until 1910, but they grew out of the Rhodes—Milner coterie which planned and carried out the terms of settlement of the Boer War. Rhodes dreamed of a railroad running all the way from Cairo in northeast Africa to Cape Town in southwest Africa. This meant that Britain must seize control of Egypt in Northeast Africa, the land occupied by the Boers in Southwest Africa, and all lands in between through which such a railway would run. Rhodes did not live to see the fulfillment of any such dream, but he did interest millionaires Abe Bailey, Alfred Beit and Lord Rothschild in helping to finance a war against the Boers. Briefly:

Brother Frank Rhodes was to start an uprising in Johannesburg while, at the same time, Starr Jameson was to lead an invasion force into the Transvaal from Bechuanaland and Rhodesia. Meanwhile back in London, The Times was used to prepare public opinion for a declaration of war (Winston Churchill was to gain his first popularity as a war correspondent in the Boer War). Albert Grey and other Rhodes disciples negotiated with Colonial Secretary Joseph Chamberlain for the official support necessary.

Anglophile historians would like to forget the details of the above; because Frank Rhodes made a mess of his Johannesburg uprising and it fizzled out, Jameson raided and was captured by the Boers, and Cecil Rhodes and his friends stayed quiet for almost two years. Then they began to act again. Propaganda flooded England and South Africa from Flora Shaw, Wickham Stead, Edmund Garrett and other Times correspondents. One of Rhodes's best friends, Alfred (Lord) Milner, was made high commissioner of South Africa (1897). Lord Esher worked his way into the confidence of the monarchy to become its chief political adviser for more than 25 years (he wrote almost daily letters of advice to King Edward during his reign, 1901-1910.) Lord Esher was to King Edward what Colonel House was to President Wilson. And Esher was a friend of Cecil Rhodes and his fellow millionaires, and also a friend of Alfred Lord Milner and his Foreign Office policy makers. And so, the second attempt was successful; the Boers were defeated and Transvaal and other Boer areas were taken over and administered as occupied territory until 1905, by High Commissioner Alfred Milner.

With the death of Rhodes (1902) Milner succeeded to the political leadership of the Rhodes followers, especially to the leadership of the secret societies established by Rhodes. Milner gathered around him, while in South Africa, a group of young civil service men specially selected because they admired Rhodes. This group (which might be compared with House's "The Inquiry") was dubbed "Milner's Kindergarten." When Milner left government service to devote himself to high finance and to the carrying out of the Rhodes enterprises, Milner then began the task of reorganizing his "Kindergarten" and converting its members into the Round

Carroll Quigley, our best source for information on this subject, writes:

"As soon as South Africa was united in 1910, the Kindergarten returned to London to try to federate the whole empire by the same methods (they had used in South Africa). They were in a hurry to achieve this before the war with Germany which they believed to be approaching. With Abe Bailey money they founded The Round Table under Kerr's (Lord Lothian's) editorship, met in formal conclaves presided over by Milner to decide the fate of the empire, and recruited new members to their group.... Curtis and others were sent around the world to organize Round Table groups in the chief British dependencies (and in the United States-Ed.)"

The Round Table magazine which was first edited by Kerr and financed by Abe Bailey money, still is being published by The Round Table, Limited, 166 Piccadilly, London, and is very similar in content and appearance to the magazine Foreign Affairs which is published by the Council on Foreign Affairs.

The Round Table "is published in London four times a year. Since its foundation in 1910, it has been a completely independent journal supported by the Round Table groups in many parts of the Commonwealth" (quoted from the magazine itself). We have not been able to obtain a recent copy of this publication, but it may be informative to note that the issue of July, 1968, has as its leading article one titled America's Need for Allies, by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. who might be regarded as the second most potent voice of Fabian Socialism in the United States (Walter Lippmann being the first voice; though, with his semi-retirement, John Kenneth Galbraith may be taking his place). Also interesting: for years, the principal American correspondent to The Round Table has been (though anonymously) Erwin D. Canham, editor of The Christian Science Monitor.

The Round Table, for the sixty-plus years of its editorial existence, has held steadily and unwaveringly to one of the original aims of its founders: The return of the lost American Colonies to the British Commonwealth of Nations; because World Union is not possible of achievement unless Atlantic Union first become reality.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Ten

GENESIS OF THE ROUND TABLE

"In fact, this network, which we may identify as the Round Table Groups, has no aversion to cooperating with the Communists, or any other groups, and frequently does so." In those words Carroll Quigley introduces the subject of the Round Table. Then he goes on to justify his act of exposing them to the world, when for years they had acted in at least semi-secrecy:

"I know of the operations of this network because I have studied it for twenty years and for two years, in the early 1960's, to examine its papers and secret records. I have no aversion to it or to most of its aims and have, for much of my life, been close to it and to many of its instruments. I have objected, both in the past and recently, to a few of its policies . . . but in general my chief difference of opinion is that it wishes to remain unknown, and I believe its role in is significant enough to be known."

With that last statement, your editor is in complete agreement, but with this difference: Mr. Quigley thinks the Round Table groups should be exposed that they may be praised; while we believe they should be exposed that they may be condemned by all who detest the idea of a Socialist World Government. So, let us proceed:

Alfred, Lord Milner was a student at Oxford, where he became a disciple of John Ruskin; then a government official in South Africa, where he became a follower of Cecil Rhodes; and finally he was an international financier, where he became a co-conspirator with Lord Rothschild. Upon the death of Cecil Rhodes, he became chief trustee of the Rhodes Trust. Occupied as governor-general and high-commissioner of South Africa, he organized the Milner Kindergarten, composed of young men from Ruskin's classes at Oxford, from like-minded young career men from Cambridge, later from the London School of Economics. This group (which we have compared to Col. House's The Inquiry, and to Felix Frankfurter's little hot dogs) became the dominant influence in British imperial and foreign affairs from 1910 onward.

It was in 1910 that the Round Table name was adopted. To quote Quigley again:

"The Round Table Groups were semi-secret discussion and lobbying groups organized by Lionel Curtis, Philip H. Kerr (Lord Lothian), and (Sir) William S. Maris. . . . This was done on behalf of Lord Milner. . . . The original purpose of these groups was to seek to federate the English-speaking world along lines laid down by Cecil Rhodes and William T. Stead and the money for the organizational work came originally from the Rhodes Trust (said to amount to the equivalent of one hundred and fifty million dollars at the time of its inception, but growing continually as a result of Rhodes business interests in South Africa—Ed.)

"By 1915 Round Table Groups existed in seven countries, including England, South Africa, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, and a rather loosely organized group in the United States (George Louis Beer, Walter Lippmann, Frank Aydelotte, Whitney Shepardson, Thomas W. Lamont, Jerome D. Greene, Erwin D. Canham of the Christian Science Monitor, and others). The attitudes of the various groups were coordinated by frequent visits and discussions and by a well-informed and totally anonymous quarterly magazine, The Round Table, whose first issue, largely written by Philip Kerr, appeared in November, 1910."

Lord Milner led the groups, and acted as chief trustee of the Rhodes Trust until his death in 1925, followed by Lionel Curtis until his death in 1955, by Robert H. (Lord) Brand (brother-in-law of Lady Astor) until his death in 1963, and now Adam D. Marris, son of Sir William and Brand's successor as managing director of Lazard Brothers bank.

Currently, control of the Round Table Groups is vested largely in the Editorial Committee of The Round Table magazine, under Adam Marris. Other members of this editorial board include Dennis Austin, Sir Olaf Caroe, H.V. Hodson, Richard Hornby, M.P., Douglas Hurd, S.C. Leslie, Sir Ivion Macadam, Nicholas Mansbergh, Lord Redcliffe-Maud, Dermot Morras, Jeremy Mores, Timothy Raison, David Thomson and Sir Robert Williams — and, so far as is known by this editor, Erwin Canham is still listed as chief United States correspondent to the Round Table magazine.

But, back to Carroll Quigley's running account, and lest our disregard of copyright become too flagrant, we paraphrase:

Through Rothschild, Bailey, Esher, and other banking interests, the Morgan Bank in New York was a part of the financial apparatus behind the Round Table Groups from the very beginning — this principally through the influence of Thomas W. Lamont, a Morgan partner, a Round Table member, and a Communist sympathizer (his son Corliss Lamont has been identified with dozens of front organizations, his wife was a firm supporter of Clarence Streit's Federal Union, a member of the American Russian Institute, the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, etc. And father Thomas seems to have become a Fabian Socialist in his youth at Harvard, never having departed from the ways of his youth after having taken his place in the elite group known as International Financiers. The Lamonts are, to be sure, the best living example of the inter-relationship existing between International Banking, Communism, Fabianism, and World Government).

Another note on Lord Milner: In 1901 he is said to have refused a fabulous offer, worth up to $100,000 a year—a lot of money in 1901—to become one of the three partners of the Morgan Bank in London (eventually the post went to E. C. Grenfell, and the Morgan affiliate in London became known as Morgan, Grenfell, and Company) Instead of joining Morgan, Milner became director of a series of previously independent public banks, chiefly of the London Stock Bank, now known as the Midland Bank. He “became one of the greatest political and financial powers in England, with his disciples strategically placed throughout England in significant places, such as the editorship of The Times, the editorship of The Observer, the managing directorship of Lazard Brothers, various administrative posts, and even Cabinet positions. Ramifications were established in politics, high finance, Oxford and London universities, periodicals, the civil service, and tax-exempt foundations.”

Here, then, was a true “Invisible Government” which controlled English politics and economics through its strategically placed agents who were Knights of the Round Table; though that control did not extend to the rest of the English-speaking world prior to World War Two.

And here is the key paragraph, quoted directly from Quigley's Tragedy and Hope, p. 951:

“At the end of the war of 1914, it became clear that the organization of this system had to be greatly extended. Once again the task was entrusted to Lionel Curtis who established, in England and each dominion, a front organization to the existing Round Table Group. This front organization, called the Royal Institute of International Affairs, had as its nucleus in each area the existing submerged Round Table Group. In New York it was known as the Council on Foreign Relations....”

The author has condensed a great deal of history into that paragraph. But he has been careful to omit the part played by Colonel House and his The Inquiry, though he does admit in a later paragraph that plans for both the RIIA and the CFR “were drawn up at Paris.” But Quigley fails to mention the part played by the Fabian Society and its American counterpart, the Intercollegiate Socialist Society; and he tries to place the entire onus on the Morgan Bank: which is not the whole truth. In fact, for reasons best known to himself, Quigley chooses to ignore completely the Fabian Society; in the entire book consisting of 1309 pages plus index, we could not find the word “Fabian” used even once in the so-called “history of the world in our time.”

Nevertheless, it seems true that the Round Table exercised authority over all the other groups, because the Round Table controlled the money that was being spent to change the world! The Fabians could not defy the Round Table because to do so would have been to commit financial suicide, as well as to have been denied access to the communications media, which were owned or controlled by members of the Round Table Groups. The same can be said of the Communist organizations, the Royal Institute of International Affairs — and in the United States, the Council on Foreign Relations also is subservient to the “submerged” Round Table Group which takes its orders from the International Bankers and their political agents!

To indicate the extent of the power exercised by this Internationalist Power Elite, let us cite a few historical examples.

In about 1910 the Round Tablers decided to alter Cecil Rhode's original plan and create, instead of an all-powerful British Empire, a British Commonwealth of Nations. The decision was made by Milner, Lothian, Curtis and Marris, and no matter how loudly Winston Churchill might have cried that he would not supervise the dismemberment of the British Empire, he did exactly that.

In 1909, Philip Kerr (Lord Lothian), Lionel Curtis and (Sir) William Marris were in Canada laying the foundations for the Round Table organization there when Marris got the idea that the manner of England's dealing with Canada should be applied to all other British colonies and territories. "Marris persuaded Curtis that self-government... however far distant was the only intelligent goal of British policy in India." It was decided that the Indians should be taught to govern themselves—which is why all Indian leaders, Gandhi, Nehru, etc., were taught at Oxford or Cambridge (Gandhi learned his technique of "passive resistance" from Fabian teachers on English campuses).

As a result of this decision, a declaration was drawn up by Lord Milner and issued on August 20, 1917 by Secretary of State for India Edwin S. Montagu, which said that "the policy of His Majesty's Government... is that of the increasing association of Indians, in every branch of the administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire."

So, because the Round Table Elite so decided back in 1909, the British Empire has become a collection of "self-governing" States bound together by the British Crown.

The Round Table Group also seems responsible for the "divide the State" technique which has become a standard part of the repertoire of the world conquerors.

The Round Table Group also seems responsible for the "divide the State" technique that has become a standard part of the repertoire of the world conquerors. It was first tried, in our times, with Ireland. Here, we again quote Quigley:

"Lionel Curtis, who helped edit The Round Table in 1919–21, advocated in the March 1920 issue that Northern Ireland and Southern Ireland be separated and each given Home Rule as autonomous parts of Great Britain. This was enacted into law eight months later as the Government of Ireland Act of 1920, but was rejected by the Irish Republicans led by Eamon de Valera.... The Round Table group worked valiantly to stop the extremists on both sides but with only moderate success.... When De Valera's party, the Fianna Fail, did win an election in 1932 and he became President of Ireland, he abolished the oath of loyalty to the king and the office of governor-general, ended annual payments on seized English lands and appeals to the Privy Council... one of the last links with Britain was ended in 1938, when the British naval bases in Eire were turned over to the Irish, to the great benefit of German submarines in 1939-1945."

The practice of cutting States in two pieces, for the purpose of causing political friction and creating "hot spots" where brush fire wars may be started—and at least theoretically controlled—began, in this century, with the dividing of the island of Ireland. Now there are two German States, two Korean States, two Vietnams, two Pakistans, and in Africa several mis-divided areas where wars can be—and have been—precipitated to enrich the International Bankers who utilize their Round Robin Groups to find ways and means of transferring natural resources into their hands (the current Indochina bloodletting came about simply because the riches of the Mekong Delta had to be developed and controlled by the "proper" set of International wealth-seekers).

Also, the concept of "Three Worlds" came from the drawing board on the Round Table. The plan as envisioned by Lionel Curtis and Lord Lothian was used as the background setting for a supposed novel by the Socialist George Orwell, a book written in 1948 about 1984. In 1971 there is much talk of "Three Worlds:" one existing behind iron, bamboo and rice curtains, one consisting of the alleged Free World, and the third being made up of the remaining countries which have no power to speak of, but are made wealthy by playing the free world against the slave world in a kind of grotesque, musical comedy type of power play.

Further attesting to the power of the Round Table Groups is the fact that members of that Cabal brought the United States into World War One, World War Two, Korea, Vietnam; and intend to amalgamate us into a One World Government whenever they feel that the time is right for such a move!

Here in the United States, little is known of the Round Table. Original members have been identified as Walter Lippmann, George Louis Beer, Frank Aydelotte (who also heads the American Rhodes Scholar organization), Erwin Canham, Thomas W. Lamont, Jerome Greene, and Whitney Shepardson. The Round Table Group in the United States probably included Owen D. Young, Russell Leffingwell, Norman Davis, Allen Dulles, Frank L.

Polk, Isaiah Bowman, Stephan Duggan, and Otto Kahn, all of whom were partners, associates or employees of the Morgan interests!

Control of the Group seemingly shifted from the Morgan partners to the Rockefeller Brothers in about 1928, though all of the international banking houses have been, and are, involved, plus most of the industrial tycoons who have developed internationally; such as Carnegie, Whitney, Vanderbilt, Brown-Harriman, Dillon Reed, Mellon, Duke, Ford, etc.

And who are the present members of the Round Table, American Group? All that are known to be members are mentioned in this letter. The others form a secret set within the Council on Foreign Relations and its economic branch, the Business Council. One might oversimplify and say that the Council on Foreign Relations is the most obvious arm of the "Invisible Government," that the Round Table controls the Council, and the International Bankers and Cartelists control the Round Table members.

The Credo of the Round Table was stated by Lord Lothian, who died in Washington in 1940:

"He held that men should strive to build the Kingdom of Heaven here upon this earth, and that the leadership in that task must fall first and foremost upon the English-speaking people."

Lionel Curtis, as an influential knight of the Round Table, was also one of the prophets of the British-Israel Movement, a religious movement which teaches precisely the credo laid down by Lord Lothian. Curtis was a prolific writer and his biggest work was a three-volume history of the world which he titled Civitas Dei (published in 1938). His views on world government and the "rule of law" (a favorite phrase of the United Nations promoters), are most interesting, especially because the later works of such men as Clarence Streit, James Avery Joyce, and current promoters of the "Atlantic Union" scheme for world government, are mostly re-writes of Curtis's original material. Here is a sample, culled from several books written by Lionel Curtis:

The rule of law as contrasted with the rule of an individual is the distinguishing mark of the Commonwealth. In despotisms government rests on the authority of the ruler or of the invisible and uncontrollable power behind him. In a commonwealth rulers derive their authority from the law, and the law from a public opinion which is competent to change it... The idea that the principle of the Commonwealth implies universal suffrage betrays an ignorance of its real nature.

That principle simply means that government rests on the duty of the citizens to each other, and is to be vested in those who are capable of setting public interests before their own... The task of preparing for freedom the races which cannot as yet govern themselves is the supreme duty of those who can. It is the spiritual end for which the Commonwealth exists, and material order is nothing except as a means to it... The peoples of India and Egypt, no less than those of the British Isles and Dominions, must be gradually schooled in the management of their national affairs... The whole effect of the war (World War One) has been to bring movements long gathering to a sudden head... Companionship in arms has fanned... long smouldering resentments against the presumption that Europeans are destined to dominate the rest of the world. In every part of Asia and Africa it is bursting into flames... Personally I regard this challenge to the long unquestioned claims of the white man to dominate the world as inevitable and wholesome, especially to ourselves... The world is in the throes which precede creation or death. Our whole race has outgrown the merely national state and, as surely as day follows night or night to day, will pass either to a Commonwealth of Nations or else to an empire of slaves. And the issue of these agonies rests with us.

Curtis is very blunt: he does not believe in "democracy" except as a means to the end which is a rulership by the Elite. He wants to develop the undeveloped areas of the world, but for the especial benefit of those who are "destined to rule the world."

This is a common theme in all humanitarian schemes. Whatever is done is to be done in the name of The People, and for the good of The People; but always there is an Elite which is self-chosen to determine what is good for the people.

There is one form of Socialism which has not yet been examined in this series of letters. Some call it "Christian Socialism," but it is more generally known in the United States by the term "Social Gospel." It has been so very successful in these United States, that the religion of the Nation has become Humanism (which is a form of Socialism).

In our next Letter, we shall explore the historical results of the Socialist attack upon religion.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Eleven

SOCIALISM CAPTURES THE CHURCHES

A report issued by a Senate Committee in 1929 states: "It is their purpose to abolish religion from the world. Although the Communists are carrying on religious propaganda under the misleading name of 'Christian Socialism' in common with the Socialists, they do not believe in religion and term it a 'superstition' and an 'opium for the people.' The Communists have led some church leaders to look upon Communism as an humanitarian movement and to regard Socialism as a religious movement...."

Forty-two years after the above was written, Socialism is the religious movement that is sweeping America; though it is called the Social Gospel rather than the Socialist Gospel.

But, let's look back to our beginnings, that we may have a basis for comparison. In his excellent The Protestant Revolt, Dr. James Deforest Murch commented on what has come to be known (and condemned by social gospelers) as The Protestant Ethic. We quote:

"America is not utopia, but reflect on the American achievement. Our American culture for the past 200 years has been proudly called "Christian" and even "Protestant." It was based on a universal belief in the sovereignty of God, the divinely revealed law of God, the God-given freedom of the individual and the overruling direction of Divine Providence. Coupled with this was the conviction that by God's help any worthy ambition was within range of achievement. For over three hundred years America was a land of open opportunity. Wide stretches of territory and great natural resources were unclaimed. Beyond new horizons and new frontiers lay hopes of riches and a new life. Nothing could 'keep a good man down.' In this climate God-centered persons prospered and material progress was greater with each succeeding year.

"In the 'game of life' there were certain accepted rules. They began by taking God into account. His moral code must be obeyed.

Respectability included going to church on Sunday and engaging in no worldly pleasures or business on God's day. Most leaders of community life had high regard for the clergy, paid their church dues, read their Bibles at least occasionally, prayed and did a little church work. Prayer before a business deal was not an uncommon practice. All the blessings of life were considered the gift of God. A rich man was considered a special mark of God's favor. There was even a Thanksgiving Day each year when the whole community assembled in some church or churches to thank God for its material growth and prosperity.

"Then, there was hard work. Slothfulness was considered a sin. It was believed that genius was at least half due to a full day's work. Self-denying workers seldom looked at the clock and were willing to labor sixteen hours a day if that were necessary to achieve a worthy goal.

"Honor and integrity were prized possessions. It was believed that shrewdness and ambition were good but not at the sacrifice of virtue. 'A man's word was as good as his bond.' The friend dependable and true, the adviser honest and fearless, the competitor just and chivalrous were characteristics of American business at its best.

"Freedom of the individual and his God-given constitutional rights were either respected or demanded. Individuals were free to earn a living and climb their ladders of success in their own way. They could choose their own professions or change them at will. They could exercise their genius for making or managing money in any lawful way. If by dint of superior skill or intelligence a man chose to live better than his neighbor he could do so and his neighbor was free to excel him if he could.

"Merit was the best qualification for advancement and success. Whether the man was poor, underprivileged or unknown, or wealthy, cultured and socially fortunate, his merit was recognized for what it was and usually rewarded.

“Thrift was the hallmark of all worthy men. As soon as a young man began to earn money he began to save a portion of it. It was considered a good rule to put away a dollar out of every ten earned. Even the schools taught the habit and each child had his own savings account. It was believed that at some point in life these accumulated savings might either be the nucleus for starting a business or making a rewarding investment, or providing an ‘umbrella for a rainy day.’

“This so-called ‘Protestant ethic’ reached out beyond the business and industrial life of the nation. . . . The state papers of President Abraham Lincoln . . . often read like pages out of the Bible. . . .” (Quotation from The Protestant Revolt, published in 1967 in a limited edition by Crestwood Books, Box 2096, Arlington, Va., 22202. $5.95.)

Weishaupt’s Order of the Illuminati began in Germany; Marx’s codification of Communism began in Germany; and it might also be said that so-called “Christian Socialism” also began in Germany.

Before Karl Marx there was Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831), a German philosopher who must be held responsible for the development of the “thesis-antithesis-synthesis” line of reasoning which became the “dialectical materialism” of the Socialists. But Hegel also propounded an heretical type of Christian materialism wherein God was the thesis, Christ the antithesis, and humanism the synthesis (we are over-simplifying, but the profoundest of explanations of Hegelianism would still amount to over-simplification; Hegel’s writings—at least in English translation—are so complicated that one wonders if Hegel himself knew what he was writing at times).

Anyway, Marx picked up Hegel’s dialectics, and Hegel’s so-called Christian syntheses formed the philosophical background of the German school of “Higher Criticism” of the Scriptures, one important theologian of this school being one Albrecht Ritschl (1822-1889), who becomes important to our story because of his influence on a young American of German ancestry, one Walter Rauschenbusch (1861-1918).

We do not mean to imply that Rauschenbusch socialized religion in America all by himself. There were many others, notably Washington Gladden, Richard T. Ely, W.D.P. Bliss, George D. Herron and others of the old Federal Council of Churches; and these preachers were ably assisted by such as Henry George, Edward Bellamy, Henry Demarest Lloyd, Norman Thomas, A.J. Muste, and many, many more. But Walter Rauschenbusch gave dignity to the movement, made socialism seem not only respectable but Christ-like and Christ-approved.

A brief biography is in order and, lest we be accused of biased reporting, we’ll quote from the standard reference work Who Was Who in Church History, by Elgin S. Moyer, Moody Press, Chicago, 1962:

RAUSCHENBUSCH (roushenboosh), WALTER (1861-1918). American Baptist minister, born at Rochester, New York. Received first three years of schooling in Barmen, Germany, where mother spent the years 1866 to 1869. After graduating from Rochester Free Academy in New York, spent four years traveling abroad, studying at the Evangelical Gymnasium of Gutersloh in Westphalia. Attended lectures for a few months at the University of Berlin. Following a short visit to England, returned to Rochester to enter simultaneously the senior year of the university and the junior year of the seminary. Rauschenbusch held a successful pastorate for two summers in a small German Baptist Church in Louisville, Kentucky. From 1886 to 1897 pastor of the Second German Baptist Church in New York City. Did much religious work among the German immigrants. From 1897 to 1902 professor of New Testament in the German Department of Rochester Theological Seminary, following 1902 professor of Church history in the English department. Rauschenbusch became much interested in a program of social betterment. Worked with Jacob Riis to secure playgrounds for children. Developed a strong interest in Christian Socialism, and emphasized the necessity of economic as well as political democracy as a method of realizing the kingdom of God upon this earth. . . . his teachings spread widely, and caused some strong criticism. (Italics added).

Rauschenbusch wrote three books:

Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), Christianizing the Social Order (1912) and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). The three books provided the inspiration and the goals for the whole movement which is sometimes called “Christian Socialism.”

One brief quotation from his Christianizing the Social Order, will serve to illustrate the character of Rauschenbusch’s philosophy:

When men of vigorous character and intellectual ability obey the laws of Capitalism, and strive for the prizes it holds out to them, they win power and great wealth, but they are placed in an essentially false relation to their fellow-men, the Christian virtues of their family stock are undermined, their natural powers of leadership are crippled, and the greater their success in amassing wealth under capitalistic methods, the greater is the tragedy of their lives from a Christian point of view.

Here is, not Christianity, but Socialism wearing stolen robes of righteousness. These preachers of the social gospel attributed the cause of all suffering and hardship, not to sin, but to the existing social order. They preached—much as Marx preached—that the old social order would end in crisis that would, like the phoenix bird, bring forth a new social order from the ashes of the old order (so, “Burn, Baby, Burn!” a new generation of social actionists would cry, in carrying out the wishes of such men as Rauschenbusch.)

To these social gospellers, the villain of the piece was “private property,” the villain that is always pointed out by the Socialist, whether he pretends Christianity, Fabianism, Communism, Humanism, Humanitarianism, or any other “ism.”

As Clarence B. Carson comments in his The Flight from Reality: “The condemnation and rejection of the existing order was, of course, prelude to the calling for a new order. Advocates of the social gospel were all bent upon social reconstruction, in one degree or another. Some were avowed socialists, some unavowed, and others were to appearances less radical in their aims. But they appealed to Christianity as the justification for making over or modifying the social order. The theory was not particularly complicated. Most of the early proponents of the social gospel held that society is an organism. Individual men are products, more or less, of the environment. In order to save men, then, it is necessary to redeem the society by reconstructing it along Christian lines. When this work of reconstruction had been accomplished, the Kingdom would have come. Those who were engaged in the task of rebuilding society were working for the coming of the Kingdom. . .

“Anyone conversant with socialist doctrines will be able to discover them in more or less pure form in Rauschenbusch’s work. . . to the extent, and it has been considerable, that the churches, their ministers and spokesmen, have adopted these doctrines and advocated the programs based on them, to that extent have they been drawn into the effort to bring about socialism in America. For these doctrines depend for their justification upon the rhetoric of socialism; they are meaningful within the intellectual framework of socialist doctrines; the particular programs have long been devices for gradually moving toward socialism.

drawn into the orbit of reformism by doctrines ideologically derived from socialism but phrased in the language of religious concern. This was another step in the domestication of socialism in America.” (From The Flight from Reality, by Clarence B. Carson, The Foundation for Economic Education, Inc., Irvington-on-Hudson, New York. 1969.)

It was in 1907 that Walter Rauschenbusch inverted the Gospel by proclaiming that “Church and State are alike but partial organizations of humanity for special ends. Together they serve what is greater than either; humanity. Their common aim is to transform humanity into the kingdom of God.”

And having thus declared that it is the duty of Church and State to build the kingdom of God upon this earth, Rauschenbusch then gave action to his words by helping to organize the Federal Council of Churches.

Perhaps this part of our story can be told most effectively if we permit the late Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam to do the telling. Oxnam was a pupil of the notorious Dr. Harry F. Ward, who posed as a Methodist leader but spent most of his time and energy trying to make the Methodist Church a transmission belt for the Communist Conspiracy.

Bishop Oxnam wrote a book entitled Personalities in Social Reform, in which he names the social actionists he most admired. In Chapter One, “The Scholar as Social Reformer,” he identifies “the scholar” as the husband-and-wife team of Sidney and Beatrice Webb, the Fabian Socialists of whom we have already written in this series of letters. Chapter Two is entitled “The Minister as Social Reformer,” and the minister turns out to be our present subject: Walter Rauschenbusch.

So you’ll understand the kind of company our social gospel theologian keeps, at least in Oxnam’s eyes, we’ll add that Chapter Three of Oxnam’s book is entitled “The Administrator as Social Reformer,” and the Administrator is identified as David E. Lilienthal, onetime head of T.V.A., later head of A.E.C. and longtime member of the Council on Foreign Relations and its tycoon-controlled sister club the Business Council.

Chapter Four of Oxnam’s book is dedicated to “The Saint as Social Reformer,” and—hold your hat if you haven’t heard—the “saint” is Mohandas Gandhi of India, a man trained in the Fabian Socialist school, a heathen who denied the deity of Christ and remained a heathen until his assassination.

And Chapter Five of Oxnam’s book deals with “The Missionary as Social Reformer,” and here the selection falls to the late Albert Schweitzer, an ultramodernist theologian of Germany (of the same school of Higher Criticism that produced Walter Rauschenbusch), a man who denied practically all of the major doctrines of Christianity while making a name for himself as an authority on Bach, a philosopher, and a medical doctor.

But we are concerned with what Oxnam says about his favorite minister, Walter Rauschenbusch. He tells us that Dr. Rauschenbusch prayed for a share in the work of 'redemption' and that he then wrote a book that "changed the thinking of American Christianity, and that his teaching, preaching and writings summoned the religious forces of the nation for the regeneration not of the individual but of society."

(Something we forgot to mention previously: The biography of Rauschenbusch which we reprinted contains the information that he "made a short visit to England." The purpose of that visit, according to Oxnam, was in order that "Dr. R." might meet, and study personally, under Sidney Webb who then headed the Fabian Society in London).

One paragraph from Oxnam's chapter about "Dr. R." we shall quote directly:

Dr. A. W. Beaven, a former President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, wrote Mrs. Walter Rauschenbusch in 1937, after there had been time enough to survey the contribution of this professor (Rauschenbusch) to religion and reform: "It is clear, it seems to me, that the greatest single personal influence on the life and thought of the American Church in the last fifty years was exerted by Walter Rauschenbusch. Probably the three most influential men in American church history upon the thought of the church have been Jonathan Edwards, Horace Bushnell, and Walter Rauschenbusch. "The Social Creed of the Churches," adopted first by the Methodist Episcopal Church, is dated 1908. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America was founded in 1908, and Walter Rauschenbusch participated in its establishment. . . . He not only taught history, he made history. The stream of American Christianity has broken from the "old bottom" of individualism and has channeled a new course through the social bad lands of poverty, slums, excessive wealth, industrial inequity and economic injustice. Rauschenbusch changed both the emphases and the direction of American Protestantism.

Walter Rauschenbusch was a socialist, but he did not like to use the word or have it associated with his activities. He said that "Socialism is the most solid and militant organization since Calvinism, and it is just as dogmatic." Then he added that "The only power that can make socialism succeed, if it is established, is religion."

This would seem to confirm that the chief concern of the Pink Doctor, was socialism, and that religion was only a means toward attaining the socialist end. To him, the establishment of a socialistic society meant the completion of the "kingdom of God" on the earth; and howevermuch he disclaimed the title of "socialist," his "kingdom" was not that spiritual society spoken of in the Bible, into which one must be reborn as an individual through a personal relationship with Jesus Christ as Saviour; rather, his kingdom was a collectivist society which would be brought about by slum clearance, redistribution of wealth, correction of industrial inequities, and the bringing about of "economic justice." In other words, the "kingdom" which Dr. Rauschenbusch would build was precisely that kingdom which Socialism has always promised, but has never been able to deliver.

Nevertheless, the doctrines laid down by Dr. Rauschenbusch are the doctrines which led to the inauguration of the Welfare State and the transformation of America's church building from houses of worship to humanistic lecture halls. The secret of the Pink Doctor's success lay in deception, as explained by Edgar C. Bundy in his Collectivism and the Churches:

"Dr. Rauschenbusch saw Jesus Christ . . . not as one who would come to save sinners from their sins but as one who had a 'social passion' for society. Dr. Rauschenbusch, however, brought something new into the picture. He knew that, if he identified socialism as such in his preaching and teaching, many people in the church would not accept it and would revolt. So he gave it some window dressing. He entitled his socialism 'The Kingdom of God' on earth. (In this same manner, Socialist and Communist propagandists in the church, instead of identifying socialism by name, always have dressed it up in religious terminology so that the people who sit in the pews or read their works and who, by and large, do not evaluate what they hear or read, will accept it as being authoritative because a theologian or a minister has said it)."

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Twelve

AMERICAN CHURCHES BECOME SYNAGOGUES OF SOCIALISM

ITEM I: "Walter Rauschenbusch was from 1886 to 1897 pastor at the Second Baptist Church, New York City. There he read and was influenced by the works of Henry George, Tolstoi, Mazzini, Marx, Ruskin and Bellamy. In 1891-92 he spent some time abroad, studying economics and theology at the University of Berlin, and industrial conditions in England. There, through Sidney and Beatrice Webb, he became interested in the Fabian Socialist movement." (*)

ITEM II: "In 1910, when the Baptist, Rev. Walter Rauschenbusch spoke to the Berlin Congress of Free Christianity, he had cause to rejoice in the progress of the social gospel in the United States. The Federal Council of Churches had been established in 1908, socialism was coalescing with Christianity; prohibition and women's suffrage were progressing. He could thus hope that 'the movement towards Socialism, which must be recognized as historically inevitable, might not be a class movement, but a movement of the people'." ()

ITEM III: Dr. Kirby Page was an ordained minister of the Church of Christ, chairman of the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of Churches, a member of the Socialist Party, and a self-styled "social evangelist." Dr. Sherwood Eddy was a member of the national committee of the American Civil Liberties Union, a worker with the Y.M.C.A. in Asia, and he traveled with Dr. Page in so-called "evangelistic campaigns" in the United States, China, Japan, and Korea. Together they wrote the book Creative Pioneers, published by the Association Press of the Y.M.C.A. in 1937. In the chapter "Pioneers in Socializing Religion" under subhead IV, "Socialized Religion," appears the following:

The real work of most of us should be in the field of building the new social order. One of the most adventurous groups of pioneers in this field is the Fellowship of Socialist Christians. A tentative statement of their principles is as follows: The Fellowship of Socialist Christians is a group of Christian people who accept the Christian faith as the only adequate interpretation of and guide in the perplexities of life. Within the terms of this faith they have arrived at socialist political and economic convictions. They see in the processes of decay and destruction in contemporary capitalist society the judgment of God upon a society which violates the law of God and of Life by its injustices. They believe that modern society is involved in progressive forces of self-destruction.

ITEM IV: "The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, organized in 1908, adopted a reformist code from the beginning. Among the things for which it stood were:

For equal rights and complete justice for all men in all stations of life... For a living wage as a minimum in every industry, and for the highest wage that each industry can afford... For the most equitable division of the products of industry that can ultimately be devised... For the abatement of poverty....

"Many changes were being wrought under the religious impetus.... The missionary effort was being changed by the new ideas. The emphasis was beginning to shift toward social service, medical missionaries, and so forth. In due time, more and more ministers came under the sway of the social gospel, and church organizations began to wield their influence both for general and for particular social reforms.... To the extent, and it has been considerable, that the churches, their ministers and spokesmen, have adopted these doctrines and advocated the programs based on them, to that extent have they been drawn into the effort to bring about socialism in America. For these doctrines depend for their justification upon the rhetoric of socialism; they are meaningful within the intellectual framework of socialist doctrines; the particular programs have long been devices for gradually moving toward socialism." (*)

ITEM V: "One of the first commissions brought into being by The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, when the Council was organized in Philadelphia in 1908, was the Commission on the Church and Social Service. Some thirty denominations and communions, as constituent bodies of the Council, carried out their social-service program through this commission... With (this) Commission for 1915 are listed a number of names that became well known for their support of the Communist-front movement in the United States. One member, Dr. Harry F. Ward, has been identified under oath by many witnesses before United States Congressional committees as a member of the Communist Party.

"In his Yearbook of the Church and Social Service in the United States, Dr. Ward... having discussed the work of the individual denominations in the field of social service, confirms the fact that 'local forms of The Federal Council of Churches came into being.' Local councils of churches were organized, as in Dallas, Louisville, Atlanta... The Council promulgated the new social gospel through these lower echelons.

"The Federal Council of Churches was not content with reaching the big cities. At its annual meeting in December 1914 the Executive Committee of the Council created a new commission to direct its rural work... Dr. Ward tells us that the social-service program expanded also into the international field. He says: 'The Federal Council has a separate organized Commission on Peace and Arbitration of great influence, which has been instrumental in bringing about the organization of the Church Peace Union and the World Alliance of the Churches.' The Federal Council leadership played a primary role in the establishment of the Church Peace Union, which was actually the organic beginning of what was later to be known as The World Council of Churches. 'The spirit of the Social Gospel in connection with foreign mission work,' writes Dr. Ward, 'had become in many respects more influential than the work of the churches at home.'

"Dr. Ward urged at the time that the various denominational secretaries be ready, whenever possible, to cooperate in campaigns of 'Social Service Evangelism,' under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches. The churches were urged to work for the following: pure water supply, food inspection in public markets, legislation for mortuary and vital statistics, legislation for tenement buildings and sanitary codes, municipal or mission lodgings, workhouse and state farms, playgrounds and comfort stations, social centers and public schools, working men's compensation laws, laws limiting working hours for women, and enforcement of labor laws. The churches also were counseled to investigate the social cost of saloons and the cost of living; to help determine minimum wage standards; to discourage Sunday work and demand one day's rest in seven, and to improve industrial education in the public schools.

"In short, the church was to turn itself into a social-service enterprise that would have little resemblance to the church which Christ founded to spread the gospel of the redemption of men's souls." (*)

ITEM VI: "When Rauschenbusch's dream of a redeemed society failed of realization through the moral and spiritual impact of his Social Gospel, he turned in his latter days to an almost exclusive demand for state intervention in economic and social life. Something of his disillusionment about God and the moral order has been carried over into the new Social Gospel in American Protestantism. Few modern liberals assume that a moral order is written into the nature of things. A crass pragmatism has invaded their ethics. Their 'gospel' exhibits a definite trend from God to man and a collectivist trend from the individual to the group, accompanied by an eagerness to use political methods to achieve 'the will of God.' In this situation there is increasing liaison between church and state and a growing conviction that if there is ever to be a Great Society it must come largely through government... The Social Gospel is little more or less than Socialism." (*)

ITEM VII: "The social gospel... sees... the state as the true order of God and man. The state is given the overall jurisdiction and sovereignty over church, school, family, business, farming, and all things else which belongs only to God. The essential function of the social gospel is to render all things unto Caesar and nothing to God... When... churches pass resolutions supporting civil violence, equalitarianism, community organization for picketing and demonstrations, they are clearly violating the Biblical law and are moving in terms of human traditions. A false canon or rule has then been applied to life; a canon other than the infallible word of God." (*)

ITEM VIII: The true Christian appraisal of Socialism was excellently stated in a measure taken in 1966 by a Christian Reformed Church in Racine, Wisconsin; a measure unfortunately neglected. We quote parts therefrom:

1. Socialism is in conflict with man being the image bearer of God, who as such is a responsible creature who is individually accountable to God. The Christian may not shun any facet of his personal and covenantal God-ordained responsibilities by shifting them to the state.

2. Socialism is in conflict with the First Commandment of the Moral Law in that it gives priority to the State above God as the supreme authority over man. God is the great benefactor and not the State. Socialism is the direct opposite of this, making the State the distributor of wealth and regulator of life. Men are then forced by circumstance to look to the State rather than to Divine Providence for the source of their daily material sustenance.

3. Socialism is in conflict with the Eighth Commandment of the Moral Law which insists upon the legitimacy of private property, forbids any form of stealing said property and demands of the individual faithful stewardship of such property.

4. Socialism is in conflict with the Tenth Commandment of the Moral Law which forbids all coveting of the neighbor's possessions and all notions of statist redistribution of wealth which is the trumpeting position of Socialism.

5. Socialism advances the idea of centralization of power which is the very purpose of Satan.... Further, it advocates "one world" which will certainly be under the anti-christ which we may not advocate or support in any degree or form.

The gradual drift toward Socialism and state welfarism... has rendered us unconsciously vulnerable to the departure from these Biblical principles.

The current accelerated adoption of socialist and welfarist measures... makes it a matter of paramount importance that our people be aware of our denominational position and see Socialism for what it is, a diabolical evil.

ITEM IX: "Noteworthy is the fact that many Christians who turn to socialism seem to discover in the Bible only one subject: The social problem and the demand for social justice. This theme does indeed play a great role in the Old and New Testament, and yet it is but one of many (Ex. 21; Gal. 5; Col. 3). Besides, it is a derivative motif. The Bible does not view social injustice by itself but as the consequence of a greater evil, the source of all evil, namely, that men do not fear God, do not keep His commandments, and bow down to idols (e.g. II Kings 17) (at present the idols are: man and society). Of course, some may argue, 'We have not forgotten the root cause of our difficulty (which is sin).' But the fervor of their argument and their systematic neglect of certain aspects of the problem make me fear that this knowledge is cerebral and that their heart lives in the social issue only. Such (persons) are aroused by transgressions of the eighth commandment, 'Thou shalt not steal,' and of the tenth, 'Thou shalt not covet,' viewed as a commandment meant for others. The level of the socialists is thus indeed reached, but the gospel is forgotten, a message inseparable from the exordium: 'I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee up out of the house of bondage.'

"Allow me to put it most boldly. The whole social problem is of absolutely no importance when compared to the command to fear the Lord. Any Christian who places human relations on a par with the relation between man and God, or regards the human sphere as separate and independent of the latter relation, thereby discloses that his Christianity has been infected by humanism.

"The command, 'Love thy neighbor,' is a Christian precept, but when detached and removed from the framework of the great commandment: 'Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart...' it ceases to be such, in a very real sense. It is likewise erroneous to think that compliance with the command to love one's neighbor is at the same time a fulfillment of the chief commandment to love God.

"The humanizing phenomenon is so frequently encountered. In it the call to God and the obligation to serve Him as an individual and in a group is replaced by the call of the other man and finally by the call of man himself." (*)

In the preceding itemized quotations and references we have attempted to show that, out of the mouths and minds of other witnesses, "Social Gospel" is just another name for "Socialism," as is Fabianism, Communism, Welfarism, or any other form of

(*) The Society of the Future, by H. van Reissen. Pages 102-3.

Collectivism; and that any church where the social gospel is preached is nothing more nor less than a center for the teaching of socialism. We also have shown that the Federal Council of Churches was the chief dispenser of this doctrine which has been called, falsely, a Christian doctrine.

The Federal Council was succeeded in 1950 by the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America, a body which amalgamated the Federal Council with seven other interdenominational groups. Under the new title, the preaching of socialism and humanism was intensified.

The National Council also began popularizing the word "ecumenical," calling for a collectivized world church preaching a one world religion: Humanism. (Perhaps we should clarify those terms: Socialism is an economic system which can—and does—adapt itself to almost any political system; whereas Humanism is the religious system which develops with the growth of Socialism. Socialism cannot exist in a Christian society because Socialism depends for its existence upon the theory of evolution as opposed to the Biblical doctrine of Creation, Socialism condemns private property, while Christianity commands that private property be respected and protected, etc. Therefore, if Socialism is to be maintained as an economic system, then it must associate itself with a religious system which puts Man in the place of God—and in actual historical development, this "Man" who replaces God always becomes synonymous with "State.")

Thus, because of the impact of Socialism, the religion of humanism has become the religion of most of the churches in the United States, it is the religion of our courts of law, of the schools, colleges and universities. It is the religion of the United Nations (as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights will attest).

"By its omnipresence in most news and communications media," commented R. J. Rushdoony on the subject of humanism, "and by its presence in church and state, it is working to weaken the moral fiber of the people. Pasteur's words were apt: 'the microbe is nothing, the terrain is everything.' Every attempt is being made, in and through the schools and other media, to create that favorable terrain. The terrain, here, however, is man, created in the image of God, and man, though fallen, is ethically, not metaphysically, separated from God. His nature remains the same, a creature of God, made in His image and responsible to Him, made under God's law and made to obey Him. Man can alienate himself morally to his own destruction, but he cannot alienate himself metaphysically. He remains always a creature of God; he cannot become a creature of the state or of man. The religion of humanity is therefore a delusion which can only destroy those who put their trust in it."

In the past several years the religious establishment in the United States has begun to shorten its name; rather than refer to itself as The National Council of Churches of Christ, it has begun to call itself simply the National Council of Churches. This aids in the ecumenical effort, permits open fraternization with apostates, heretics, infidels, heathen, agnostics and atheists. And, increasingly, this religious hierarchy has abandoned traditionally religious pursuits and occupied itself with economic and political issues. At home the religious hierarchy keeps itself busy promoting federal control of education, the extension of cradle-to-grace governmental paternalism, the compulsory integration of the races, and the destruction of traditional Christian culture. In the foreign field, our national religious leaders support the United Nations, call for the surrender of all sovereignty to a World Body, promote the amalgamation of all religions in the name of Humanity..

That our state religion has become Humanism is important for this reason: The purpose of a state varies in terms of its religion. A state can be either messianic or ministerial, either a savior or a minister of justice. For Biblical religion, the state is the ministry of justice; for non-Christian religions, the state poses as man's savior. These two concepts are mutually exclusive, there can be no compromise between them. The Christian places his hope in the saving power of Jesus Christ; the Humanist places his hope in a New Order brought about on this earth by man and by means of revolution. The choice is either the savage, socialistic, man-made, man-invoked New Order, or "the glorious liberty of the children of God" (Romans 8:21). Because two absolute sovereignties and sovereigns cannot co-exist at the same point in time and space, claiming the same jurisdictions. The warfare between Christ and Caesar is inescapable war, and is a war unto the death. Therefore, let us gird up our loins and quit ourselves as sons of God!

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Thirteen

THE GOSPEL OF REVOLUTION

"Remember Pearl Harbor" was the rallying cry for the Nation in the spring of 1942. On the first day of the year the first "United Nations Declaration" had been signed in Washington, pledging cooperation for victory on the part of the 26 allied Nations. Manila had fallen to the Japanese (your reporter being the first U.S. war correspondent to be captured by the then enemy). United States troops were landing in North Ireland, Gen. Douglas MacArthur was preparing to leave Corregidor Island for Australia, declaring as he departed, "I shall return."

This was the scene when the "Protestant Establishment" of the United States held a national conference at Ohio Wesleyan University to plan the destruction of the Christian social order and to promote in its place, a World Socialist Order. The event was duly—and objectively—reported by Time Magazine on March 16, 1942. Because of its historic importance, we reprint that entire article:

AMERICAN MALVERN

These are the high spots of organized U.S. Protestantism's super-protestant new program for a just and durable peace after World War II:

- * Ultimately "a world government of delegated powers."
- * Complete abandonment of U.S. isolationism.
- * Strong immediate limitations on national sovereignty.
- * International control of all armies & navies.
- * A "universal system of money...so planned as to prevent inflation and deflation.
- * Worldwide freedom of immigration.
- * Progressive elimination of all tariff and quota restrictions on world trade.
- * "Autonomy for all subject and colonial peoples" (with much better treatment for Negroes in the U.S.)
- * "No punitive reparations, no humiliating decrees of war guilt, no arbitrary dismemberment of nations."

* A "democratically controlled international bank to make development capital available in all parts of the world without predatory and imperialistic aftermath so characteristic of large-scale private and governmental loans."

This program was adopted last week by 375 appointed representatives of 30-odd denominations called together at Ohio Wesleyan University by the Federal Council of Churches. Every local Protestant church in the country will now be urged to get behind the program. "As Christian citizens," its sponsors affirmed, "we must seek to translate our beliefs into practical realities and to create a public opinion which will insure that the United States shall play its full and essential part in the creation of a moral way of international living."

Among the 375 delegates who drafted the program were 15 bishops of five denominations, seven seminary heads (including Yale, Chicago, Princeton, Colgate-Rochester), eight college and university presidents (including Princeton's Harold W. Dodds), practically all the ranking officials of the Federal Council and a group of well-known laymen, including John R. Mott, Irving Fisher, and Harvey S. Firestone, Jr. "Intellectually," said Methodist Bishop Ivan Lee Holt of Texas, "this is the most distinguished American church gathering I have seen in 30 years of conference-going."

The meeting showed its temper early by passing a set of 13 "requisite principles for peace" submitted by Chairman John Foster Dulles and his inter-church Commission to Study the Bases for a Just and Durable Peace (italics added—Ed.). These principles, far from putting all the onus on Germany or Japan, bade the U.S. give thought to the short-sighted selfishness of its own policies after World War I, declared that the U.S. would have to turn over a new leaf if the world is to enjoy lasting peace. Excerpts:

* "For at least a generation we have held preponderant economic power in the world, and with it the capacity to influence, decisively, the shaping of world events. It should be a matter of shame and humiliation to us that actually the influences shaping the world have largely been irresponsible forces. Our own positive influence has been impaired because of concentration on self and on our short-range material gains. . . . If the future is to be other than a repetition of the past, the U.S. must accept responsibility for constructive action commensurate with its power and opportunity."

* "The natural wealth of the world is not evenly distributed. Accordingly the possession of such natural resources . . . is a trust to be discharged in the general interest. This calls for more than an offer to sell to all on equal terms. Such an offer may be a futile gesture unless those in need can, through the selling of their own goods and services, acquire the means of buying."

With these principles accepted, the conference split up into four groups to study, respectively, the social, economic and political problems of the post-war world and the problem of the church's own position in that world. (Despite their zeal for world political, social and economic unity, the churchmen were less drastic when it came to themselves. They were frank enough to admit that their own lack of unity was no shining example to the secular world, but did no more than call for "a new era of interdenominational cooperation in which the claims of cooperative effort should be placed, so far as possible, before denominational prestige"). Discussion waxed hot and heavy, with one notable silence: in a week when the Japs were taking Java, discussion of the war itself was practically taboo. Reason: The Federal Council felt that, since five of its other commissions are directly connected with the war effort, the conference's concern should be with plans for peace. One war statement—"the Christian Church as such is not at war"—was proposed by Editor Charles Clayton Morrison, of the influential and isolationist-before-Pearl-Harbor Christian Century. This statement was actually inserted in a subcommittee report by a 64-58 vote after a sharp debate. In the plenary session, however, it was ruled out of order. Some of the conference's economic opinions were almost as sensational as the extreme internationalism of its political program. It held that "a new order of economic life is both imminent and imperative"—a new order that is sure to come either "through voluntary cooperation within the framework of democracy or through explosive political revolution." Without condemning the profit motive as such, it denounced various defects in the profit system for breeding war, demagogues and dictators, "mass unemployment, widespread dispossession from homes and farms, destitution, lack of opportunity for youth and of security for old age." Instead, "the church must demand economic arrangements measured by human welfare . . . must appeal to the Christian motive of human service as paramount to personal gain or governmental coercion."

"Collectivism is coming whether we like it or not," the delegates were told by no less a churchman than England's Dr. William Paton, secretary of the World Council of Churches, but the conference did not veer as far to the left as its definitely pinko British counterpart, the new famous Malvern Conference (Time, Jan. 20, 1941). It did, however, back up Labor's demands for an increasing share in industrial management. It echoed Labor's shibboleth that the denial of collective bargaining "reduces labor to a commodity." It urged taxation designed "to the end that our wealth may be more equitably distributed." It urged experimentation with government and cooperative ownership.

"Every individual," the conference declared, "has the right to full-time educational opportunities . . . to economic security in retirement . . . to adequate health service (and an) obligation to work in some socially necessary service."

The conference statement on the political bases of a just and durable peace proclaimed that the first post-war duty of the church "will be the achievement of a just peace settlement with due regard to the welfare of all the nations, the vanquished, the overrun and the victors alike." In contrast to the blockade of Germany after World War I, it called for immediate provision of food and other essentials after the war for every country needing them. "We must get back," explained Methodist Bishop Francis J. McConnell, "to a stable material prosperity not only to strengthen men's bodies but to strengthen their souls."

Politically, the conference's most important assertion was that many duties now performed by local and national governments "can now be effectively carried out only by international authority." Individual nations, it declared, must give up their armed forces "except for preservation of domestic order" and allow the world to be policed by an international army & navy. The League-of-Nations-with-teeth would also have "the power of final judgment in controversies between nations...the regulation of international trade and population movements among nations."

The ultimate goal: "a duly constituted world government of delegated powers; an international legislative body; an international court with adequate jurisdiction, international administrative bodies with necessary powers, and adequate international police forces and provision for enforcing its worldwide economic authority."

March 16, 1942)

Thus were the plans laid and the decisions made by the self-proclaimed Protestant Hierarchy in the spring of 1942. All that has followed in this Religious Establishment's march toward world socialism has been, in the greater sense, anti-climactic, merely the carrying out of a program adopted in the early months of World War II. And it is noteworthy that this program was written by a man who, as a young intellectual, had been a selected member of Colonel House's The Inquiry, a group which tried to have the League of Nations Covenant approved by the United States Senate as a part of a peace treaty; a man who, as a Wall Street lawyer, became a mainstay of the Council on Foreign Relations and an intimate of Bernard Baruch and the International Bankers; a man who was a friend of long standing to Alger Hiss, recommended Hiss to head the multimillion-dollar Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, who worked side by side with Hiss in the State Department and in the various conferences that planned the United Nations, who also worked side by side with Hiss in the Federal Council of Churches, and who defended Hiss when Hiss was accused of Communist activities. This man's name was John Foster Dulles.

Hiss landed in a Federal penitentiary as a convicted perjurer; but Dulles became Secretary of State under President Eisenhower!

The Federal Council of Churches became so infiltrated with Fabian Socialists and Communist Fronters that it was felt advisable to find a new name: The National Council of Churches. However, in 1960, a national controversy developed over an official U.S. Air Force Reserve Training Manual which warned Air Force personnel that communists, dupes and sympathizers had infiltrated the churches. Richard Arens, then staff director of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, testified:

"Thus far of the leadership of the National Council of Churches of Christ in America, we have found over 100 persons in leadership capacity with either Communist-front records or records of service to Communist causes. The aggregate affiliations of the leadership, instead of being in the hundreds as first indicated, is now, according to the latest count, into the thousands, and we have yet to complete our check..."

An independent group, Circuit Riders, Inc., compiled and published a list of names of over 7,000 ministers and theological school professors who have supported communist causes and fronts. Unfortunately, we have no record of the number of NCC supporters who also promote Fabian Socialism and/or the British Israel Movement.

But the NCC is clearly on record in regard to the United Nations and the World Religion which must accompany it. In its 1963 Philadelphia Assembly message, after calling for "racial brotherhood and justice," the NCC's message went on to say:

"As churches, we must actively support the United Nations and adequate aid for developing nations; must press for significant steps toward disarmament and for diversion of enormous resources now devoted to the arms race to a frontal attack on the unmet needs of mankind; and must recognize that revolutionary movements of our time may be new thrusts for human dignity and freedom."

Dr. Luther H. Evans, ex-director general of UNESCO, said plainly that "The peace of the world demands not only the existence of the United Nations, but also a United Religions!"

In the last several years, NCC has turned its efforts toward the promoting of revolution. In 1967 over 800 delegates attended a Conference on Church and Society which was held in Detroit. There it was decided that there was need for a "theology for revolution." It seems that "when violence aimed at systemic violence occurs it ought to be defended, supported, and interpreted in such a manner as will aid, hasten its end, and serve to establish a greater measure of justice."

"Systemic violence" refers to "the violence of the system," better known as "police brutality," "inhuman justice," "inequality of treatment in the courts," etc. Any kind of coercion on the part of the established society would be called "systemic violence." And the NCC advises that "the Christian thing to do" is to meet violence with violence by resisting arrest, refusing to be drafted, aiding in civil disturbances, etc.

The NCC report continues: "There are situations where Christians may become involved in violence....It must be recognized that there is no guarantee that the actual results of the use of violence will be those intended nor that violence, once released, can be controlled by its initiators. The question emerges today whether the violence which sheds blood in planned revolutions may not be a lesser evil than the violence which (though bloodless) condemns whole populations to perennial despair.... Whenever violence committed by the oppressed against systemic violence is deemed the more moral and more effective means to overcome the systemic violence, the Church should, in sorrow, support the violence of the suppressed by means of financing, marshalling of manpower, and the encouragement of the disciplined, effective use of that violence."

In other words: any revolt against the present system should be financed, manpowered and encouraged by the Church!

In 1968 the NCC and its international organization, the World Council of Churches, began to unite the Protestants and the Catholics in worldwide revolutionary action. A conference on World Cooperation for Development, sponsored jointly by the WCC and the Roman Catholic Pontifical Commission of Justice and Peace, was held in Lebanon; and one of the major issues discussed had to do with the use of violent revolution as a means of removing obstacles (such as ordered governments) which might stand in the way of plans for development in underdeveloped countries. A conference-approved report read, in part: "There can be nonviolent revolutions. All our efforts must be directed to change without violence if it will be possible. But if injustice is embedded in the status quo and its supporters refuse to permit change, then, as a last resort, men's consciences may lead them in full and clear-sighted responsibility to engage in violent revolution. A heavy burden then rests on those who have resisted change (italics added)."

Following through, in Latin America, Roman Catholic priests have become members of guerrilla bands that are seeking to establish Socialist regimes on the pretext of promoting economic development in those countries. And the NCC, according to the publication Combat of October 15, 1970, has been distributing propaganda praising the Castro-type revolutionary action in Latin America. According to the article, "The NCC...utilizes official handouts from Prensa Latina, Castro's own propaganda agency, touts returned members of the cane-cutting Venceremos Brigade as resource persons to be utilized by church groups seeking information about Cuba, and provides information on how to obtain films on Cuba from two radical film companies."

The NCC propaganda suggests that church members get involved with teach-ins on Cuba, recommends that churchgoers join one of the Venceremos Brigade trips to help with the Cuban harvest (does not mention the fact that the trip includes a post-graduate course in guerrilla warfare.) NCC also provides a 24-page booklet by Che Guevara that is called "Man and Socialism."

That we may keep our understanding unimpaired, let us look back to the beginnings of the Church He built; back to the time when He opened the Book and read:

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, To preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

The heart of His earthly ministry was concern for individuals in need, but He made it clear that His Kingdom was not to be of this world; a shocking disclosure to all those who conceived His Messianic purpose to be the political restoration of the Davidic Kingdom and the destruction of Roman rule. When confronted with the religious and political forces of the day, He submitted, while declaring the whole counsel of God. Many felt His ministry had failed, yet the impact of His moral and spiritual teachings upon the political and social community was so great that nothing in the world has been the same since. His followers preached the Word, healed the sick, cast out devils. But they did not appeal to politicians to make pacts to bring about world peace, they did no lobbying for social legislation, they made no marches demanding amelioration from injustices and inequalities, they supported no political messiahs who promised utopias for the underprivileged. Yet the world was "turned upside down" by their witness—a witness which also proclaims that a Christian cannot be a Socialist, and a Socialist cannot be a Christian.

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Fourteen

THE PLANNED ECONOMY

Much has been written in this current series of letters concerning the Fabian movement, its background and its accomplishments. In order properly to understand the subject of "economic planning," it is necessary to refer, once again, to Fabianism, and to repeat some of the information already covered because the central theme of Fabianism is Economic Planning.

Professor F. J. C. Hearnshaw of London College observed the Growth and development of Fabianism at the London School of Economics, and he became recognized as the best English authority on the evils of Fabianism. He wrote, in 1928:

"The policy of the Fabians was in accord with their apparently mild and persuasive creed. They studiously avoided the giving of shocks to society; they went about, not in sheep-skins and goat-skins, but in silk hats and frock coats, like the most innocent of shopwalkers; they enrolled in their ranks pitiful parsons of all denominations, and got them to assure the religious world—gravely perturbed by the materialistic atheism of Karl Marx—that socialism was really nothing more than applied Christianity; they lived in suburban villas; waxed eloquent in drawing-rooms, made money, invested it, and flourished on the dividends like any ordinary capitalist; drew rents and royalties, and sought differential increases of salaries, just as though they had been normal parasites of the toiling proletariat. . . .

"Their method of attack upon capitalism . . . has been thoroughly characteristic; it has been the method of sapping rather than assault; of craft rather than force; of subtlety rather than violence. 'Permeation' has been their watchword. Power rather than property has been their immediate quest; but power which will enable them in the end—by peaceful and constitutional means, infinitely more effective and less destructive than communist violence—to possess themselves of property. They have wormed their way, often in disguise, into political clubs, trade union executives, cooperators' directorates, educational committees, religious conferences, boards of guardians, municipal councils, and other public bodies, and have made it their business to guide and drive them in a socialistic direction. . . .

"(Under Fabian planning) step by step, land, mines, railways, ships, banks, shops—everything will be nationalised, municipalised, socialised. Private enterprise will be slowly but completely squeezed out of existence; competition will be imperceptibly but entirely eliminated. And the funds to achieve these ends will not be seized by lawless force; they will be quietly but remorselessly extracted from private enterprise and competitive industry themselves by a graduated system of predatory taxation. Nothing will be confiscated; everything will be purchased and paid for. The members of the possessing classes will, by some ingenious device or other, compensate one another, until (again gradually) their funds run out, when they will, to their great advantage, be compelled to resort to work, even if it be only to 'earn a precarious livelihood by taking in one another's washing.' Meantime the proletariat will rejoice. They will all be servants of the beneficent state; their wages will go up, for they will fix them themselves through their elected representatives; their hours of labour will go down, for they will no longer have to maintain capitalists and landlords in luxury; they will begin to draw large old-age pensions whilst they still have youth and energy to enjoy them; education, medical attendance, amusements, recreations, transport—all will be free and unrestricted. In the end, everyone will be a blessed pauper, paying away all his earnings in rates and taxes, and in return being luxuriously maintained

(so long as he does not display any recrudescence of individualism) on outdoor relief. (Fabian Tract No. 127 contains this significant statement: "To the socialist, taxation is the chief means by which he may recover from the propertied classes some portion of the plunder which their economic strength and social position have enabled them to extract from the workers.... To the socialist, the best of governments is that which spends the most.")"

Professor Hearnshaw wrote the foregoing in 1928, before this Nation had experienced any New Deal or Brain Trust, before the "Great Depression" had been forced upon the citizens of the United States. But, if you will re-read his citations, changing the words "Fabian" or "Fabianism" where they appear to "New Deal" and "New Dealism," or to "New Frontier" and "New Frontierism," or to "New Republic" and "New Republicanism," or to any of the other words that have been coined to hide the uglier word "Socialism;" then you will have a picture of what has been happening, gradually, to these United States ever since Fabianism was introduced into this country.

As we said previously, the central theme of the Fabian movement is Economic Planning. The first important step taken by the Fabian Socialists in England was the establishment of the London School of Economics, where future Fabian leaders could be properly trained in the practice of economic planning. Similarly, when Fabianism was introduced into the United States in 1905, the first step taken had to do with colleges and universities, and the first Fabian organization was named the Intercollegiate Socialist Society. The plan paid off: our first "socialist" President, Woodrow Wilson, had been a college president. Later, in increasing numbers, Presidential advisers were "borrowed" from the faculties of leading colleges and universities.

Along with the theme of economic planning went the planning of an Elite Corps which would be designed to take over the functions of government and run the country from behind the scenes.

James Burnham noted this latter development as far back as 1940, when he pointed out that a new ruling class was developing: the managers. The workers would place the managers in power. Then in 1949, Miss Edna Lonigan wrote a most important article, The New Ruling Class, which appeared in the March 30, 1949 issue of Human Events. Miss Lonigan noted that the various opponents of New Dealism, Fascism, Communism and such other political phenomena constructed by the Socialists, have failed to recognize a common factor which appears in all forms of statism. It is the emergence "beneath all the Left Wing governments, of rule by the Palace Guard. This small elite within the bureaucracy knows all the Machiavellian arts of power, and skillfully uses the pretext of mass welfare to establish itself in absolute control."

Miss Lonigan wrote in the context of political events of 1948, but what she wrote is so timely today that we quote quite extensively from her article:

"We were right, in November, in regarding President Truman as a cracker barrel politician, out of the Old West. We were also right, in January, in thinking that the Administration had abandoned our Constitution. What we missed was the connecting link; the fact that the Palace Guard controls Truman, as it controlled Roosevelt, and that its only policy is maintenance of its own power. Harry Hopkins and other shining lights of the Roosevelt era are gone, but they were not important as individuals. The elite is a new class, trained in handling the high voltage wires of absolute power. When one topples, another is ready to take his place. The forces that support this group must be defeated, if we wish to return to Constitutional government....

"The goal of the new elite is the same in every country. They devise one program of 'welfare' after another, but, however their 'planned economies' may seem to differ, they all centralize power.

"The role of the Leader, while important in the beginning, is easily exaggerated. The Leader is the symbol to which the people's emotions are attached, the charismatic 'savior', whom Max Weber foresaw a generation ago. The elite strip the people of their possessions while the Leader holds them enthralled. So completely is the Leader's function that of a symbol that he can continue to head the government long after he is physically broken, as Roosevelt proved.

"The governing elite must be conspiratorial, because it is doing the exact opposite of what the Leader says. Every governmental utterance must be designed to delude. The elite must be secretive, because it must constantly change its tactics to keep the people deceived, and to confuse its adversaries. The elite must be dynamic, to seize quickly all the new means of power, before people realize what is happening.

“When it assumes power, the leadership party’s program is pacific and takes the form of the domestic Welfare State. But first in Germany, then in Russia and Japan, now here in America, we see the effort to build the World Welfare State, scattering its largesse and spreading its tentacles over the world. Of course this brings opposition, and then the Welfare State becomes the Garrison State, in which the people are induced to surrender what remains of their wealth to the elite, for protection against ‘The Enemy.’

“But whatever the stage of the development, government by the elite is a return to Absolutism. When the elite manages a dominant share of the nation’s resources, the voters’ representatives cannot exercise the power of the purse, and, therefore they cannot keep the executive subordinate to law. The Constitution functions only when the people keep their own money, and dole it out through their representatives to an executive which takes orders. It is necessary for a new elite to keep up the forms of government by law, so that citizens will not be aroused. . . .

“The issue is control of the national income. If we surrender our earnings to government, we can get nothing but rule by an elite. Only government by the ruthless is tough enough to hold this enormous power. So the aim of those who believe in liberty must be to reduce the share of the national income which the elite is permitted to manage. The strategy for defense of Constitutional or limited government is to block all efforts to give out money to the elite. They always have ‘good’ reasons for asking us to give up our earnings. But the Welfare State can never provide welfare. And when the people begin to doubt the welfare slogans, patriotism becomes the last refuge of the power-mad.” (End of quotations from article by Edna Lonigan).

In line with the above, the Fabian Elite in the United States began to establish organizations which would influence each and every facet of human thought, emotion and action. It would take a book to list all of the organizations dedicated to the various phases of economic planning—with accent on government control of the planning—but the first and largest of the organizations was the American Civil Liberties Bureau (later changed to Union and now known as ACLU.)

In about 1927, the leaders of these various organizations were invited to associate themselves with the Council on Foreign Relations which became a kind of central headquarters for every kind of planning. Later there were formed new organizations for particular types of planning, such as that conglomeration of organizations clustering around the Public Administration Service at 1313 East Sixtieth Street in Chicago on the campus of the University of Chicago, and nicknamed Terrible 1313. This group of organizations has to do with State and local governments, and proposes, gradually, to do away with them and replace them with federally controlled Regional Governments, Megalopolises, Metros, etc. (*)

Other important affiliates of CFR include the Committee for Economic Development, an organization that grew out of the New Deal’s National Planning Association, which, in turn, was a lineal descendant of the Fabian PEP (Political and Economic Planning) that heralded the Fabian Society’s capture of the British Government in 1931. This American counterpart of PEP, the Committee for Economic Development, was formed in 1942 and exists chiefly to secure the cooperation of industrialists, corporation executives, commercial and manufacturing interests during the peaceful transition to total socialism.

Then there is the Business Council, which has the primary responsibility of selecting the men who are to occupy key positions in the Executive Department of Government—men who can be depended upon to carry out the policies dictated by CFR.

(*) In connection with the current drive to destroy the States, the following footnote to history is important: The daily newspapers of December 27 and 28, 1935, carried a story from Washington to the effect that a committee headed by Herald L. Ickes, then Secretary of the Interior, had recommended the division of the country into ten or twelve districts for “regional social and economic planning.” Ickes later was asked to resign his post (by President Truman); his ideas—along with those of Henry Agard Wallace—were much too “pregressive” for the times, and not sufficiently “gradual” to be in accord with the Fabian plans of the era. For example, it was noted by observers in 1935, that if the Ickes plan were put into effect, it would “wipe out State lines and make bureaucratic government supreme.” It was 35 years later—in 1970—that the Ickes plan was adopted, by Executive decree, by the allegedly conservative President, Richard M. Nixon.

The Advertising Council has escaped public notice as a part of the so-called Invisible Government; but its role is of the utmost importance to the Planners, because it is the propaganda bureau charged with the responsibility of "selling" controversial programs to the public. Among the successes that can be attributed to the Advertising Council are the mental health program, the Peace Corps, the Medicare and Medicaid programs, etc. An idea of the power of this organization may be gained by a statement by Theodore S. Replier, then head of the Advertising Council, which appeared in a June, 1961 issue of Saturday Review:

"There are Washington officials hired to collect figures on about every known occupation, to worry about the oil and miners under the ground, the rain in the sky, the wildlife in the woods, and the fish in the streams — but it is nobody's job to worry about America's state of mind, or whether Americans misread a situation in a way that could be tragic. This is a dangerous vacuum. But it is also a vacuum which explains to a considerable degree the important position the Advertising Council holds in American life today."

Another way of estimating the importance of this self-appointed brainwashing group is to note the names of a few of its past and present committee members:

Ralph J. Bunche, United Nations Under Secretary.

Benjamin J. Buttenweiser, partner in Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Paul G. Hoffman, United Nations.

Charles S. Jones, President, Richfield Oil Corporation.

John J. McCloy, Chairman, Chase Manhattan Bank.

Eugene Meyer, former Chairman, Washington Post & Times-Herald.

Elmo Roper, public opinion analyst and Atlantic Union director.

Boris Shishkin, AFL-CIO.

Thomas J. Watson, Jr., President, I.B.M.

Henry M. Wriston, American Assembly and executive staff of Council on Foreign Relations.

To demonstrate the manner in which Fabian "economic planning" became an actual function of government, we quote from a textbook, Public Policy and the General Welfare, written by Charles A. Beard and published in 1941:

"The state in the Great Society...rests upon administration. Once the administrative functions of the state were simple; they consisted mainly of tax collection and police and military control. The warrior and the record keeper were the prime agents of the state. But as the state is transformed from a police-state into a service-state, the entire governing process is profoundly changed.... Today the state is really a great producing agency. It constructs public works...it is also a distributing agency. It operates railways, carries mails and parcels, manages forests, coal mines, and oil fields, and disposes of their products.... The state (also) prescribed rules and standards for private enterprise...it subsidizes steamship lines. It organizes and manages banks. It lends money.... In short the state is an economic organization... The economic character of the modern state in the Great Society is hardly a matter of controversy. This fundamental generalization stands fixed in facts: The modern state is a service-state; its primary functions are economic in character; its successful operation rests upon the mobilization of intelligence and skill and the efficient use of material goods....

"The modern society is a Great Society. It consists of many different groups woven together in a complicated process of production. In this society the administrator must operate. He will therefore confront political and economic conflicts on every hand. He will find that politics consists largely of group actions for the purpose of using the power of the state for group benefit. This will be true whatever may be the future form of society or the formula for the ownership of property." (End of quotation).

Note: The term Great Society was first used by the Fabian Socialist Graham Wallas, then by the pragmatist and progressive educationist John Dewey, later by historian Charles Beard, and finally by President Lyndon Johnson; the Great Society is the Socialist Society in all of these contexts. The term Administrator as used by Charles Beard, was first used by Col. E. M. House, in his book Philip Dru: Administrator.

Originally, our government was limited to keeping the peace; but by 1941 it was called a "service-state." Is it any wonder that, in 1938, Garet Garrett wrote The Revolution Was? (Concluded next Letter).

WHEN "I AM" BECOMES "WE ARE"

A STUDY IN SOCIALISM

Part Fifteen

EPILOGUE

Twenty years ago Dwight D. Eisenhower was Supreme Commander of NATO, Douglas A. MacArthur had been relieved of his command in Korea, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were about to be executed as atomic spies, Red China had been condemned by the United Nations as an aggressor in Korea, the wartime Selective Service Act had been extended until 1955, the honeymoon with Red Russia had ended and the Cold War was in full favor.

Such was the situation when Upton Close spoke before the members of the Chamber of Commerce in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. The address was noteworthy because it was one of the first times that the word "Fabianism" had ever been spoken before an audience of this sort in mid-America. Everyone knew of Communism and its threat, but almost nobody save the scholars knew anything about Fabianism.

The speech was notable because what was said twenty years ago is as timely today as it was that night.

After pointing out that Karl Marx and his German confederate, Frederick Engels, were the forerunners of the Fabian Socialist movement in Britain and America, Upton Close went on to say:

"If the Marxist system were confined to Europe, as it once was, if it were confined to Russia, even if it were confined to Europe and Asia, the United States would be only remotely threatened. It is because the Marxist movement has wormed its way into the United States and is today actually in control of the present administration of the United States in many respects, that we in America are in supreme danger; the final showdown might end in the destruction of the American system.

"Of course, you are all aware of the fact that the Marxist system from its very inception has been noted for its schisms, for its internal quarrels, for the violence of those internal quarrels, for the fact that the winning groups in an internal quarrel never have any tolerance for the losing groups. The only thing a losing group can hope for is a gentle death, maybe by starvation, rather than a violent death after torture.

"... The importance of this is that today we Americans are in danger of being mised completely; misled as to the interpretation of current events because of one of these sectarian differences in the Marxist church! We have today, two branches of that Marxist faith that are eminently successful, each in its respective field, each from its own standpoint. Together they are destroying the free people of the world.

"One branch has its headquarters in London. It is the branch which grew out of the British Fabian Society which was originally the British Marxist Society, and which planned so cleverly because of the shrewd brains that were in it — the brains of George Bernard Shaw, H.G. Wells, The Webbs, Ramsay MacDonald, Herbert Morrison, Harold Laski, John Strachey and the rest of the younger ones; Attlee, Shinwell, etc. Then they dragged in labor leaders, such as Ernest Bevin; just as our socialists in America have dragged in top labor leaders. The Fabians (British Marxists planned shrewdly, beginning with just a little group of 20 or so who met back in 1883. They planned so shrewdly to seize and acquire power that today they are the government of the British Empire. Today they are able to sequester, requisition and take over all of the industry and property of the oldest industrialized empire in the world — the order has just been issued for the complete and immediate nationalization of the steel and iron industries of England, for which this British Marxist government proposes to pay about $800,000,000 in paper that really is worth nothing!

“The other branch of the Marxist church is the one that has had the big publicity among us—the branch in Moscow—the one that our government propagandists out of Washington spent so much time adulating, building up, praising ‘good old Joe,’ creating friendship as they said, preparing us to be brothers to the Russians — until about a year ago.

“After the contest broke out between the two branches of the Marxist faith, our government propagandists were shifted, just like a shifting lever, to damning the Moscow group. Now that’s the order of the day. And there’s a point in this: by concentrating invective on Moscow (although, mind you, the Communist group here in the United States is always protected), by continually concentrating the American mind and its fears and its dislikes on Communism overseas, those who put out this propaganda and those who inspire it, are able to hide from the American people the Marxist moves that are going on here, and that are contemplated to attain success here while our eyes are diverted to a Marxist peril on the other side of the water.”

Mr. Close then went on to give the story (too long to repeat in this letter) of how the so-called “China group” which was made up of pro-Communist young men, was able to build up so much influence in the State Department (via CFR’s Institute of Pacific Relations, for example.) Then, returning to the subject of Fabianism:

“... The great apostle of English Socialism to America was Harold Joseph Laski, a small, dark, taciturn Englishman of non-Anglo-Saxon appearance and said to have an almost hypnotic influence over those whom he chose as his disciples. At the age of 21 he arrived from Oxford to lecture at Canada’s McGill University. After two years there, he spent four years as lecturer at Harvard, also giving guest lecture courses at Amherst and Yale. Laski then returned to England to become the pundit of the London School of Economics. He lectured at the Magdalene College at Cambridge and held the chair of political science at the University of London from 1926 to his premature death in 1950.

“Laski’s influence on a man in America, eleven years his senior, made history — bad history for free enterprise! That man was Felix Frankfurter. From 1910 until made Supreme Court Justice by F.D.Roosevelt, Frankfurter was Laski’s host on a number of the Englishman’s visits to counsel with New Deal and Social Welfare Politicians. Harvard Law School became permeated with his thinking. Graduate after graduate from the Harvard Law School was sent down into government offices in Washington with Frankfurter’s endorsement to help him. Alger Hiss, Jessup, Acheson, the Service boys, Lattimore — any number of young fellows came down to Washington with the same credentials, and that is where the “China group” tied in with the British Socialist group. Not only into government, but also into dominating influence in journalism, publishing, education and religious fields, and in some States into politics, went this stream of Fabian Socialists to change American thinking and life.

“While Americans throughout the United States were totally oblivious of what was going on, were trusting the fate of the nation and the world to the Administration in Washington, this Administration was being taken over in its policies, foreign and domestic, by this British-Socialist-China-Frankfurter group. . . .” (End of excerpts from speech by Upton Close before the Capital Hill Chamber of Commerce, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, in the spring of 1951).

Following Fabian tactics, the converting of the United States from a free enterprise Republic to a socialist Republic has been a gradual, step-by-careful-step procedure. The first giant step forward was taken during the Wilson Administration. Then came the halt in the march toward Socialism, during which time the previous gains were made secure; people began to “get used” to the income tax, the Federal Reserve System, the direct election of Senators which robbed the States of any power in Washington, the growth of great tax-exempt Foundations that seemed to be taking over the Universities and inducing them to cease teaching the merits of a free enterprise system. This was a period of solidification of Fabian gains, which was mistakenly referred to as “a return to normalcy.”

Then came the next giant step forward: The International Bankers “pulled the plug” and plunged the nation into an economic collapse and the people accepted the New Deal Plan and the Fabians took over under FDR. Their program was a total failure but few ever knew this because “patriotism is the last resort of the power-mad;” the nation was plunged into World War II and in our determination to crush foreign enemies, our domestic enemies were forgotten.

From that time onward, the march toward solidification of Socialism has been made under the excuse of "war time economy." The Hot War faded into the Cold War, to be followed by the Korean War, then the Viet Nameese War, which expanded into the Indo-China War — and if it peters out because the people refuse to continue to support this kind of no-win-no-lose massacre in which the only victors are the oil-seekers and the developers of the Mekong Delta industrial, agricultural and mining complex; then there is a Middle East War that can be made into a Great War any time the Planners desire; a war that no one will dare oppose because it will be given religious overtones and called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.

"Perpetual War for the Perpetuation of Socialism," would be an appropriate title for this chapter of current history. Instead, however, we hear misleading cliches. One often heard in gatherings of liberals is: "Socialism is a good cushion against Communism," which is like saying that consenting to rape is less painful than resisting the violation of person. Another cliché that is heard in social circles: "The Welfare State is the best security against communism." Which is like saying that they can't put you in jail if you're already in jail.

We sincerely hope that this series of letters has convinced every reader that such terms as Communism, Socialism, Fabianism, the Welfare State, Nazism, Fascism, state interventionism, egalitarianism, the planned economy, the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the New Frontier, the New Republicanism are simply different labels for the same thing. To see any vital difference between these so-called ideologies is to miss the really important characteristic which all of these labels have in common.

An ideology is a doctrinal concept, a way of thinking, a set of beliefs. And if you will examine each of the above-mentioned labels you will discover that there is a belief that is common to them all: That Government should control the creative and productive actions of the people. Every one of these labels—without exception—stands for a philosophy that is opposed to Biblical economy, to private enterprise, the free market, private property, and the traditional American concept of limited government.

Using the terms welfare state and communism (though he could have used any two of the labels we have mentioned), Leonard E. Reed of the Foundation for Economic Education makes the following comparison:

"Under both the Welfare State and communism, the responsibility for the welfare, security, and prosperity of the people is presumed to rest with the central government. Coercion is as much the tool of the Welfare State as it is of communism. The programs and edicts of both are backed by the police force. All of us know this to be true under communism, but it is equally true under our brand of welfare statism. Just try to avoid paying your 'share' of a TVA deficit or of the farm subsidy program or of federal urban renewal or of social security or of the government's full employment program.

"To appreciate the family likeness of the Welfare State and communism, observe what happens to individual freedom of choice. Under either label (the ideology is the same) freedom of choice to individuals as to what they do with the fruits of their labor, how they employ themselves, what wages they receive, what and with whom they exchange their goods or services—such freedoms are forcibly stripped from individuals. The central government, it is claimed, will take over. Full responsibility for ourselves is denied in order to make us dependent on whatever political regime happens to be in control of our government apparatus. Do these labels mean fundamentally the same thing? As an exercise, try to find any meaningful distinction.

"Our planners are saying, 'The Welfare State is the best security against communism.' The Russians could say with just as much sense, 'Communism is the best security against the Welfare State.'

"We call the Russian brand of governmental coercion 'communism.' They, however, refer to their collective as the 'Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.' The Russians call our brand of governmental coercion 'capitalism.' In the interest of accuracy and clarity, we, also, should call ours 'socialist.'

"Socialism in Russia (communism, to our planners) and socialism in the U.S.A. (the Welfare State, to our planners) have identical aims: the state ownership and control of the means of production. Further, one as much as the other rests on the use of police force. In Russia the force is more impetuously applied than here. There, they pull the trigger and think later. Here, the government relies more on the threat of force and the acquiescence of the citizens.

"Alexis de Tocqueville predicted over a century ago the characteristics of the despotism

(the Welfare State) which might arise in America: 'The will of man is not shattered, but softened, bent, and guided; men are seldom forced by it to act, but they are constantly restrained from acting. Such a power does not destroy, but it prevents existence; it does not tyrannize, but it compresses, enervates, extinguishes, and stupefies a people, till each nation is reduced to nothing better than a flock of timid and industrious animals, of which the government is the shepherd.'

CAN YOU UNSCRAMBLE AN EGG?

It is better to face facts than to ignore them; for to ignore them is merely to deceive ourselves. And it is a fact that in these United States, Socialism has become endemic. We engage in a kind of deception by calling it other names and inventing new labels to camouflage the fact; but it's still socialism. Let's face it: every person who bears a social security number, every parent who sends a child to a public school, every man or woman who accepts a government check as aid or subsidy is aiding and abetting the growth of Socialism.

Socialism in the United States has developed a very tricky meaning: State ownership or control of the means and/or the results of production. Under this definition, a man may think that he is running his own farm or factory or business, but because of that word control, he's really just working for the State; let him act against the wishes of the State and punishment is sure and usually swift.

Give Socialism entry into any area and it insinuates itself into the warp and woof of the activity, becomes imbedded in the mores, the traditions, the way of life. Furthermore, once Socialism has penetrated into any activity, immediately there develops a stubborn vested interest to assure its continued growth; it infects the economic, the social, the political bloodstream—the medical term would be metastasis, the spreading of the infection from one area to another until the whole body is sick unto death.

How to be rid of the disease called Socialism? How are we to eliminate federal control of education, or quit paying farmers not to plant crops, or quit paying people not to work, or cut off federal programs for urban renewal, or quit any of the other scores of socializations which have infested our institutions? Let's face another fact: There is no formula or blueprint or plan that will stop endemic Socialism; we cannot defeat Socialism by fighting against it. This is exactly like trying to unscramble an egg. The damage has been done, repair is impossible.

Does this mean that we simply give up and submit to slavery? God forbid! But it does mean that, instead of being on the defensive against Socialism, we must be on the offensive for Christian reconstruction. Not warfare against, but reconstruction in the terms of Him who said, "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21:5).

Fight against federal control of education? It's a losing battle. Get on the winning side by working for the establishment of private and Christian schools, and by sending your children to such a school. Has your church been lost to the Socialist NCC? Quit fighting to save it; instead, help build or find and support a church where Christ and Him crucified and resurrected is preached and believed. And so on down the line with all of our socialized institutions.

More than three years ago we wrote: "As a nation we have become too filthy to recover; we must reconstruct." If our tax dollars subsidize Socialism, then with our free dollars we must subsidize Christian reconstruction. Those who try to save the old forms, the old churches, the public schools, the old and captured citadels, will go down with them.

"The desperate need," writes a Christian friend, "is for Christian, for Biblical, statecraft. This means establishing our concept of the state, among other things, on the Biblical anthropology, on the doctrine of the fall. Neither man nor the state is to be trusted. Sovereignty is essentially an attribute of God alone. The state and man can only have limited liberty. The supremacy of law, God's law, must govern every sphere of human activity, nor can any sphere be divorced from God. Church, state, school...society, and all things else must be under God, or else they are under judgment.

"This, then, is obviously a time of judgment. Equally obviously, we must make it a time for reconstruction."

TO COMPLETE THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE TROIKA

FRESH BURST OF SUMMITRY

It's designed to dazzle the world, and it's designed to bemuse especially the American voter who goes to the polls in something less than a twelvemonth. As for the rest of the year 1971, Richard M. Nixon seems to have entered into an open race with Santa Claus in an attempt to cover the world with gifts for good little Nations. Having already had visitations from or with Sato of Japan, Tito of Yugoslavia, Meir of man-made Israel, and others of lesser import, came the news that Nixon is just beginning his house calls to heads of state. At the time of the writing of this newsletter, the schedule looked like this:

- Dec. 6—Canadian Prime Minister Pierre E. Trudeau goes to Washington.
- Dec. 13-14—Nixon flies to the Azores, where French President Georges Pompidou will be awaiting a confrontation which will be emceed by Premier Marcello Caetano of Portugal.
- Dec. 20-21—British Prime Minister Edward Heath will fly from No. 10 Downing Street, President Richard Nixon will fly from one of three White Houses; they will meet and confer in Bermuda.
- Dec. 28-29—West German Chancellor Willy Brandt will visit Mr. Nixon at the Key Biscayne, Florida, White House.
- Jan. 6-7—Japanese Prime Minister Eisaku Sato will call on Mr. Nixon at the latter's San Clemente, California, White House.
- Feb. 21-28—Unofficial President for Foreign Affairs Henry Kissinger will escort Richard Nixon and William Rogers to Peking, China where they will be permitted to converse with Premier Chou En-lai, and may even be permitted to see, speak, and bow to Chairman Mao Tse-tung.
- Late in May (little David K. hasn't yet told newsmen the exact date)—Henry Kissinger will convey and convoy Nixon, Rogers and accompanists to the Kremlin in Moscow, where they will discuss the dividing of the world into three parts with Soviet Chairman Leonid Brezhnev and other leaders of the Moscow branch of the World Conspiracy.

In an attempt to analyze and justify all the goings and comings, one Washington Bureau Chief (Robert S. Boyd) wrote the following which is reprinted for its informational value, but with the understanding that this editor does not necessarily agree with any of the conclusions reached by the writer.

HEALING OF SORE SPOTS PURPOSE OF NIXON VISITS

...Nixon's new economic policies (have caused) European uneasiness that he is going to barter away their future in his private dealings with the Kremlin. Europeans are concerned about:

- * The 10 per cent surcharge on their exports to the United States.
- * U.S. demands that they revalue their currencies to make it easier for American goods to compete in world markets.
- * Possible U.S. moves to withdraw troops or sign strategic weapons agreements with the Russians without consulting them.

The Japanese have similar fears, plus irritation at U.S. demands for a limit on textile imports. . . .

On the summit talks, Kissinger said the allies have an "understanding of our general purposes, but I think there is also a degree of uncertainty as to what our moves mean... the purpose of these meetings is to remove as much of that uncertainty as possible."

Kissinger said Nixon will attempt to find out where the Allies feel their vital interests are affected. He also will give them a "fuller rundown" on subjects likely to be discussed in Peking and Moscow than he has given the U.S. public. "We're not going to promise them a veto," Kissinger said, "but we will give serious consideration to their views, and promise not to take actions that would affect the Allies' vital concerns (without consulting them)." Kissinger noted that many significant changes have taken place in the past year: new openings to Peking and Moscow, the signing of a Berlin agreement, Nixon's new economic policies, the entry of Britain into the European Common Market. In view of these changes, he said, it is time for the Allied leaders to get together "to make sure their basic directions are complimentary."

As for trade and financial matters, Nixon will be accompanied by Treasury Secretary John Connally, and the foreign chiefs of state will bring their finance ministers. In some cases, there is real substance to be negotiated at the meetings. For example, France's Pompidou has insisted on involving himself personally in key foreign policy questions. He would not agree on terms for the admission of Britain to the European Common Market until he met with Prime Minister Heath last spring.

Now the problem is fixing a new exchange rate between the dollar and the franc, as well as other currencies. Pompidou has his finance minister, Valery Giscard Destaing, on a short leash, and is apparently blocking an agreement until he meets with Nixon.

Resolution of the current international monetary crisis may be advanced by the round-robin series of conferences with other leaders as well.

Thus the Nixon diplomatic road-show is something more than a political spectacle to please voters at home and abroad. The President will be spreading salve on sore spots, but if he can ease the itching, perhaps the sores will have a better chance to heal. (End of quotation).

Notice Sir Henry's use of the first person singular; most appointed employes on the people's payroll would have the sense of fitness to say, "The President will," or "the Government will not," or "the Administration may," but not this foreign-born Rockefeller-stooge. He says, "We're not going to promise them a veto," "We will give serious consideration to..." "We promise not to take actions..."

The serious and awful side of this situation is not Kissinger's boastfulness or his lack of tact in the use of the pronoun "we," but it's the fearful fact that Kissinger is not boasting; he and his internationalist bosses really are making the important decisions, the office and the person of the President of the United States of America to the possible contrary notwithstanding. When Hank Kissinger says, "We'll do this," Dick Nixon had better say, "Okay, Hank," or else he'll probably find himself in the same hopeless fix in which President Woodrow Wilson found himself after disagreeing with Col. House in Paris at that first modern Summit Meeting attended by a U.S. President in 1919. When he spoke for himself against the advice of his alter ego, Wilson returned to the White House a broken man, to die soon thereafter. It is a fearful thing for a leader to stand for people or principal against the clique that bought his office for him — and no one knows this better than the grocer's delivery boy who grew up to become President. Time noted that the "whirling-dervish act" and the "jet-hopping from island to island and coast to coast" on the part of President Nixon, would be conducted "Under the watchful eye of Henry Kissinger." Which is a fairly accurate statement of what is to transpire.

Meanwhile, meeting-upon-meeting was the routine. The Warsaw Pact Nations held a conference, at which decisions were made that, according to Radio Moscow "would be made public sometime in the future." The Moscow satellites did dutifully approve the Moscow-promoted "mutual security conference" which is supposed to better the chances of peace in Europe, and which Secretary of State Rogers has approved (the conference as well as European peace).

Brezhnev is still on a capital-hopping trip, was in Copenhagen making things "rotten in the State of Denmark," planned visits to other Scandanavian countries before returning to the Kremlin. Various and sundry of the African mini-nation organizations also were holding conferences. Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans spent ten days and nights in various parts of the Soviet Union, promoting trade with Iron Curtain countries. His mission "fully accomplished," he went on to Warsaw to explore "the potential for import-export increases, joint ventures and tourism," and probably to popularize Polish ham.

Meanwhile, Latin America was not being overlooked. White House Counselor Robert Finch and Communications Director Herbert Kline were "roving quietly through Latin American Nations to find what, vis-a-vis Uncle Sam, 'bothers' the Latins.

And, perhaps most important of all, at the Big Ten Conference at Rome where the Central Bank Nations were trying to decide what type of trade coupons were to be used to replace the formerly gold-backed U.S. dollar as international money, the credibility gap outdid the Grand Canyon.

The United States Government positively would not permit the dollar to be devalued; this is the theme we have heard played over and over since the August 15th freeze began and Treasury Secretary Connally allegedly went to Central Banks all over the so-called free world making personal appearances to sing his theme song: "The United States will not devalue the dollar."

So, the Big Ten monetary conference broke up, the dollar sank to an all-time low; all because:

"The United States has offered in theory to devalue the dollar by more than 5 per cent in a move to realign major western currencies, West German Finance Minister Karl Schiller said yesterday (Dec. 1). Schiller said the other countries of the so-called Group of 10 were 'embarrassed' by the proposal and unable to give any prompt official answer. He said this was why the meeting of finance ministers... was adjourned until Dec. 17 and 18 in Washington... Earlier on Dec. 1) U.S. Treasury Secretary John B. Connally had said there was no settlement in the Rome talks, but he reported 'some progress'." (Wire services quote).

We have referred to many meetings and conferences in this letter. Our list is far from complete. But the unprecedented number of gatherings of heads of state, powwows of premiers, meetings of ministers of finance and foreign affairs, convocations of trade and commerce secretaries and commissars, assemblings of central bank presidents — these get-togethers didn't just happen. They were planned to follow each other in quick succession, sometimes coincide, compete, jump from country to country and city to city because regional world governments are being formed and these many meetings are necessary to complete the division of the world.

Time newsmagazine hinted: "This unprecedented round of summit talks is intended to deliver a clear message to Peking: the U.S. President will be speaking not just for his own nation when he arrives in China but for the Western World as well."

And Time might have added that this is the message which is to be delivered to Moscow as well. For, these are the three divisions of the world that is being shaped: One World is to be led by the United States; a Second World is to be governed by Russia; and a Third World is to come under the suzerainty of Red China. And when the leaders of these three meet in serious confab there must be none who can challenge authority to rule, but they must meet as equals, and yet as competitors.

Ever since the beginning of the Cold War, it has been apparent to any student of world affairs that there have been raised up two super powers: the United States and Russia. It also should be apparent that there was being raised up a "third world" which owed firm allegiance neither to the USSR nor to the USA, though demanding aid from both because they were underprivileged members of the family of nations. Paralleling the allegations of the Blacks in America, who are told they deserve special treatment by virtue of their ancestors having been slaves; these mini-nations of Asia and Africa feel it their right to expect rewards and reparations because their ancestors were said to be enchained in the slavery of colonialism.

Looking back, it now seems apparent that from the very beginning of the plan to create regional governments, the Grand Design envisioned three Great Leader Governments that were to be selected because of their geographical location, the quantity of their population, and the potential wealth of their natural resources. In short, geopolitics was to be the determining factor.

Early Planners, thinking in terms of nationhood and race, must have conceived of these three Leader Nations as being the United Kingdom, the United States of Africa, and the United States of America. Such a division of the world was the dream of such nationalists as Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie. But their successors—firm internationalists knowing no loyalty to race or nation, and often having neither—saw the geopolitical impracticability of any such division of the world, chose instead to raise up the United States, Russia and China.

These internationalists also would have chosen to alter the governmental forms in these leader nations; a form of socialism being more adaptable to oligarchic control.

Dr. Kuehnelt-Leddihn, European correspondent for the National Review, discussing the long range aspects of present U.S. Foreign Policy on the Dean Manion broadcast of Nov.

14, 1971, in reference to World War II, said:

"...in the old world wars there was one power to stem the Russian advance, and there was another power to stem the Chinese advance; and these two powers have been totally demilitarized. The German Army never had a real revival. The Japanese have almost totally disarmed."

His meaning was in a different context; but if it was intended that Russia and China should become world leaders, then it was essential that Germany and Japan both be defeated so that Russia and China might awake and grow great. That Chiang Kai-shek proposed to build a Republican China was both an aid and an embarrassment, for he would be put out of the way when it came time for Mao Tse-tung to take his place.

Now, to create this Great Troika: World War One established the United States as a world power without parallel at that time; World War Two and the ensuing Cold War established Russia as a competitive World Power; and the United Nations created Red China as the Third World Power!

Dr. Thomas Patrick Melady is the American Ambassador to the mini-nation of Burundi. He is said to be an expert on Africa and the author of several books which are supposed to prove it. He loves the United Nations and he wrote a special article for publication in the July 1971 issue of the Catholic World, entitled, "The United Nations Faces the Next 25 Years." We call your attention to what he says about the UN and the Third World in selected passages taken from that paean of praise to the UN:

"The presence of the Third World at the United Nations is a significant new political development of the past decade. Every September each new General Assembly of the United Nations unfolds another chapter in the postwar rise of the Third World and the significant changes this has brought in international affairs...."

"In 1955 ... the late Dag Hammarskjold cited in his annual report 'the great upheaval in the relationship of nations and peoples that is underway' and pointed out that 'the peoples of Asia today, and of Africa tomorrow, are moving toward a new relationship with what history calls the West.' By 1957, as the pace quickened, Mr. Hammarskjold reported: 'The United Nations reflects ... the renaissance of Asia, the awakening of Africa ...'

"The presence of the Third World in the United Nations has turned it into a truly global institution.... For the Third World nations, the United Nations is a unique opportunity and a special instrument.... More important, the United Nations is the only place in the world where the influence of these (mini) countries outweighs their economic and military strength. And it is through the Secretariat and the Secretary-General that their influence is particularly felt."

Ambassador Melady wrote his article prior to the extending of the invitation to Red China to join the UN, accept the veto power in the Security Council, and declare itself to be the unchallenged leader of the Third World. "One has the feeling," Mr. Melady opined prior to the event, "that as we enter the second twenty-five year period (of the UN) we are at the eve of an equitable solution to this (China) problem that has been a vexing one for all advocates of universality."

And so, in the "fulness of time" there has been revealed a leader of this man-made Third World, a man whom Chinese Communists look upon as very god and not mere man. Wrote Rev. Dick Hillis:

"The men of Red China's armed forces are required to make a morning offering in front of the picture of Mao Tse-tung. Hymns are sung before his portrait and quotations from his thoughts are recited. Loyalty is expressed in 'the infinite worship of Chairman Mao.' Civilians are equally involved in reverence to Mao. Many villages have established a 'room of loyalty' for the worship of the Chairman. Peasants have 'tablets of loyalty' hung in their homes before which they observe morning and evening devotions. As Christians return thanks at meals and pray to God before retiring, so Mao's devotees thank him for their meals and worship him before going to bed."

And so, Nixon may be permitted to see Mao in the forbidden palace; then he will pay his respects to the Kremlin Troika of Kosygin, Brezhnev and Podgorny; and after these visitations, all the world will have been divided into three parts; and Satan will exclaim: "All these kingdoms of the world are mine, to give unto whom I will."

IS BIG BROTHER A BUREAUCRAT ?

ACCORDING TO WEBSTER:

Bureau:—A specialized administrative unit.

Bureaucracy:—Government characterized by specialization of functions, adherence to fixed rules, and a hierarchy of authority; A system of administration marked by officialdom, red tape, and proliferation.

Bureaucrat:—A government official following a narrow rigid formula.

"The epoch of individuality is concluded, and it is the duty of reformers to initiate the epoch of association. Collective man is omnipotent upon the earth he treads." So wrote Italian revolutionist Giuseppe Mazzini at about the same time that Karl Marx was proclaiming a similar doctrine in defense of a different form of Collectivism.

Since that time reformers have been hard at work initiating that "epoch of association" which would produce the "collective man." Reformers who followed the blueprint made by Marx evolved that epoch of association which is called the Soviet; whereas here in the United States those who worked within a republican framework (as Mazzini had advocated) developed the Bureaucracy.

While both are forms of totalitarian tyranny, there is this structural difference between the two: The Soviet is composed of elected officials; the Bureaucracy is composed of appointed officials. In either case, Collective Man, as personified by the Commissar or the Bureau Chief, is dominant on the earth he treads and he often approaches omnipotence.

Bureaucracy is a special kind of collectivism. While seeking to be subject to the orders and authority of elected officials, a bureaucracy actually becomes a law unto itself, made up of a permanent caste of professionals standing apart from the general citizenry, operating a closed shop, running their own show, and deciding who shall get into the act, and when and how. Against their decisions there is little hope of appeal or little means of self-protection, for they make their own administrative law and run their own courts wherein they act as judge, jury and prosecutor.

"The bureaucracy of government embraces both the administrative and judicial processes in all strata of the state," wrote Chester C. Maxey in Bipartisanship in the United States (Caxton Printers, 1965).

"Typical of bureaucracy," Maxey continued, "these processes are carried on through pyramidal forms of organization composed of numerous public officials and employees united by a central principle well expressed by the old bit of doggerel verse which noted that

*All the big bugs have bigger bugs
To jump on 'em and bite 'em,
While the bigger bugs have higher bugs,
And so ad infinitum.*

"But all the bureaucratic bugs, big or little, have a common interest in sticking together against outsiders, and the outsiders include all of the general public not affiliated with their own particular bureaucracy. So the ordinary citizen who is on the outside looking in, if he has a tax problem, a claim to press, a wrong to be righted, a privilege to be realized, a service to be procured, or any other business to transact with the government, must deal with a body of public servants over whom he and the rest of the outside public have only remote control."

HOW THE BUGS TOOK OVER

The Constitution of the United States says that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union, a republican form of government." The law books say that a "republican form of government" is a government by elected representatives, wherein no basic power of government is delegated to appointees. Bureaucrats are, of course, appointees, one and all. It may be a shock to realize that the United Soviet Socialist Republic is more republican in this sense than is the United States of America:— In Russia there is but one political party, the Communist Party. Members-to-be of the Soviet are nominated by the Party, and then elected by the people. It may be a sham kind of election; but isn't a choice between Right Wing Socialist Nixon and Left Wing Socialist McGovern also a sham, differing only in degree from the Russian system? Anyway, the Russian bureaucracy (or soviet) is run by elected officials, while our bureaucracy is run by appointees.

This buildup of a Bureaucratic Dictatorship had its inception in a Reorganization Act which was passed by Congress and became law on March 27, 1969 – less than three months after Richard M. Nixon took the oath of office, swearing to uphold and defend the Constitution, which he proceeded both to disregard and defy when he began to “restructure the Government Service Systems,” placing them under the dictatorial control of appointed bureaucrats.

Using the “Reorganization Act” as his Congressional permit, Nixon issued an Executive Order (11647) which divided the Country into Ten Regions, each with a designated “capitol” to handle all matters within that Region, or Province, and an appointed Governor, or Chairman, for each Regional Council, which is composed of appointed Bureaucrats representing the Departments of Labor, HEW, HUD, OED, SBA, etc. This is a new form of government, creating a Bureaucratic Dictatorship which is designed eventually to replace all City, County, and State Governments.

In a remarkable article by Virginia McNeil, published in the August, 1972 issue of The National Educator, the author explains the formula that is being used to perfect this bureaucratic dictatorship. She refers to it as ‘A Formula for Changing Mankind: Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS).’

She writes, and we quote at length:

We are involved in a Revolution, a Conceptual Revolution, which will attempt to deny the existence of God as the creator of man. The inventors of this revolution are not new, they have been around since the earliest recorded times. They have never been as effective before because man has always risen up and battled on the side of God and country. As in any revolution, this one has two sides; one side believes God is a Supreme Being and the creator of man in his image; the other side believes man is God and thus is autonomous and able to create man according to man's image.

You will not be asked to choose a side, because you are not to know of the existence of this revolution. You will only slowly become aware that something is occurring, subtle changes are taking place. To some this will not be an unpleasant experience, it will denote progress. Others will not approve, because they will see time-proven traditions and values being taken away. At first this will be very gradual. But with the computers, as the ultimate weapon, it will occur very rapidly.

All will be shocked to see a subtle loss of control, of individual expression, freedom of thought and freedom of action (how we think, feel and act). The conservative thinkers and the liberal thinkers will have to join forces in order to repel this conceptual revolution that attempts to put man in an Adaptive Framework for Change.

To create this new man, made by man, it is necessary to first change the man made by God. There are various terms tossed about, such as change agents, facilitators, manipulators, etc., who will not be God's agents but man's agents to bring on change.

...How will the public be led to accept these changes? By devising game plans for the Revolution. RAND Corporation of Santa Monica (Calif.) has devised many game plans (as have other think tanks—Ed.) The most effective game devised to make points with the public is the game of Semantics. I quote from Coombs on Educational Planning: “They spoke through different jargons and often used the same terms to mean different things.”...

We hear the word Accountability daily, yet few understand its meaning. Most have been led to believe it means more accountability of government to the people; instead, in the PPBS formula, it means people will be accountable to government.

Decentralization is also a misunderstood word. To many it means more local control; but in the PPBS formula it means legislative powers and responsibilities must be delegated to unit or regional managers. The Federal regional managers have been guaranteed these powers by the Presidential Executive Order No. 11647, dated Feb. 10, 1972. It created the ten Federal Regional Councils and the four functional departments of government.

In this "Quiet Revolution" or "Conceptual Revolution" or "Bureaucratic Conquest" of the Country (or perhaps you have a pet name of your own), the groundwork has been laid, and most of the defensive positions have already been overrun and captured by the Revolutionary Elite. The strategy has been comparatively simple:

1. Gain Total and Absolute Federal Control of All Phases of Human Activity, of Community Development, of the Nation's Natural Resources, and of its Economic Affairs (the four departments which are to replace the seven current Cabinet Departments concerned with domestic affairs).
2. Transfer this Accumulated Power to Bureaucratic Control, with all Management and Direction in the hands of Appointed Bureaucrats.
3. "Decentralize" this Power by delegating the power downward to the Ten Regional Councils.
4. Establish rules and guidelines which are to be followed by all State, County and Local Governments in the areas prescribed (Human Activity, Community Development, Natural Resources and Economic Affairs).
5. Enforce obedience by cutting off Federal grants to State, County and Local Governments that do not comply with established rules and guidelines.
6. Make obedience mandatory by means of regulated Revenue Sharing.

Revenue Sharing is another of the semantic game plans referred to by Virginia McNeil. State, County and Local officials are told that all their financial problems will be solved, that the money will pour in to meet their needs through this revenue sharing plan. What they do not realize is that in order to get this money they must obey every rule and regulation of the Regional Council which rules their particular area. They (elected officials) have become the vassals of the Regional Councilmen (appointed officials.) And the elected officials must obey the appointed officials, because appointed officials are collecting the taxes, and then sharing the tax revenue as they see fit.

This revenue sharing bill sounds wonderful as it is described in press releases. To wit, here is the AP dispatch of August 10, 1972: "The Senate Finance Committee has finished its work on the $29.8 billion revenue sharing bill for cities and states. Committee Chairman Russell B. Long, D-La., said he hopes that congressional action, including settlement of differences with a House-passed revenue sharing bill, will be completed before the break for the Republican National Convention.

"Before sending the measure to the Senate floor, the Committee Wednesday voted to phase out a matching program providing 75 per cent federal funds for social-service programs and replace it with grants totaling $1 billion a year beginning Jan. 1, 1973.

"The Committee added a provision for child care and family-planning services for welfare mothers estimated to total $1 billion in the current fiscal year.

"The committee bill calls for distribution within states of two-thirds of each state's share of the $29.8 billion revenue sharing fund on the basis of population, per-capita income and tax effort. The same criteria would apply to distribution of the fund among the states. The measure would reduce grants to 17 states and increase allocations to 33 states compared with criteria adopted earlier by the House. Committee sources said that although allocations to the more populous states would be reduced, the largest cities generally would receive more than under the House bill.

"Long said the disputed social-services program was estimated to cost $40 million when it was first authorized in 1962, but has skyrocketed to between $2 billion and $4.6 billion in the fiscal year that began July 1.

"The panel voted to continue funding existing projects on a 3-to-1 matching basis, but to approve no new contracts after Aug. 9, 1972, allowing only flat grants totaling $500 million to next Jan. 1."

We reprinted this entire press release to show how much was said of allocations of money for various programs, but almost nothing was said about the key provision of this revenue sharing bill. The article does say that distribution of funds will be on the basis of "population, per-capita income and tax effort." The term "tax effort" is not explained in the article. Here is what it really means:

The States must make an effort to raise more money by levying personal income taxes at the State level. The State is to levy the taxes, but Federal appointees are to collect the taxes. Then, after the Feds have collected the State's taxes, they will "return two-thirds of each state's share"

if the State has made the approved "tax effort" and otherwise obeyed the rules and regulations laid down by the Ten Regional Councils!

"Force" need not be military, and seldom is under most types of Socialism. It may be legal, psychological, economic, etc. And the force used here is economic: Agents of the federal government collecting State taxes under the hoax of "revenue sharing."

It is this economic force which is provided by the so-called Revenue Sharing Act, that is required by the appointed managers of the country (many of them self-appointed), in order that they may convert the government of this Nation into a Bureaucratic Dictatorship. And to expedite this goal, note what Senator Long hopes for: That congressional action, including settlement of differences with a House-passed revenue sharing bill, "will be completed before the break for the Republican National Convention."

One thing Democrat Long failed to mention (if he knew it in the first place): If President Nixon signs the Revenue Sharing Act into law before he goes to the Convention Hall in Miami Beach to accept his nomination, it won't matter much who is elected President of the United States in November; because the real power to administer and execute the domestic affairs of government will have been signed over to the entrenched bureaucrats; a gift of the United States Congress, delivered by the President (the handling of foreign affairs of the Nation has been in the hands of a non-elected group for years; their present agent is Herr Henry Kissinger).

Under this Revenue Sharing Act, your real government leader will be the Chairman of the Regional Council of the Region in which you reside. He will give orders to your Governor, your Mayor, and your County officers. Those Regional Chairmen have been chosen and installed, but they must await conveyance of the necessary power (via the revenue sharing act) before speaking out too boldly. As an example of the activities of these Regional Chairmen, there was an article in the Pensacola (Fla.) News, of July 18, 1972. Accompanying the item was a picture of a smiling Black named William Walker, and the story read:

"William L. Walker, regional director of the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity, will speak today to the Pensacola Community Action Committee.

"Walker is director of Region IV, covering eight Southeastern states from South Carolina to Mississippi. He will speak on legislation concerning CAP agencies, revenue sharing, and the changing role of the CAP agencies...."

Director Walker is already planning for the changes that will be brought about when the Revenue Sharing Act becomes effective and he becomes Proconsul of the Fourth Region of the United States, an area made up of the former Sovereign States of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

Robert C. Weaver, former Chief, Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), was quite frank when he said: "Regional government means absolute Federal control over all property and its development regardless of location, anywhere in the United States, to be administered on the Federal officials' determination. It (regional government) would supersede state and local laws.

... Through this authority we seek to recapture control of the use of land, most of which the government has already given to the people."

But, "recapturing... the land" is only part of what is involved when one recalls that in addition to Executive Order 11647 of Feb. 10, 1972 and this Revenue Sharing Act that gives it its dictatorial power, there also is Executive Order 11490 of Oct. 30, 1969, "Assigning Emergency Preparedness Functions to Federal Departments." This Order empowers Regional Council members to, under the color of law, control all food supply, money and credit, transportation, public utilities, hospitals, and other essential facets of human existence.

There remains a possible solution to this dilemma: Demand that your Senators and Congressmen represent their electors, not the Executive Branch appointees. But, it's hard to convince these Representatives that they are voting themselves right out of their opulent positions.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL, MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

. Part One

INTRODUCTION

There appeared in the Wall Street Journal of September 1, 1972, a leading editorial which labeled as fantasy, hallucination and big lie, the charge that there is "a long-time conspiracy financed by the Rockefeller family and programmed through the Council on Foreign Relations, aimed at imposing a one-world Socialist government."

The spokesman for the Dow Jones interests also derided the idea of any conspiracy in such controversies as fluoridation, progressive education, mental health programs, sex education in the schools, etc. These were all ridiculed as "rightist" fantasies. But also scorned as untrue were such "leftist" charges of conspiracies in connection with the assassination of JFK, that "the military industrial complex sent Johnny marching off to war in Vietnam in pursuit of corporate profits," and that "the U.S. intervened in Vietnam in order to lay claim to that nation's off-shore oil reserves," etc.

Then, in closing his editorial, the writer perhaps unintentionally delineates the most important tool of the total conspiracy:—

"What is notable about these descents into surrealism is that radical rightist theorists are generally without political, economic or social influence. As a rule, they preach their gospel mainly to their own kind through fringe journals and vanity printing presses. But radical leftists are given nationwide TV forums from which to propound their theories, respected publishers vie to print their most fantastic charges, even the most wild of them remain respected members-in-good-standing in the academic community, and the national media, which properly execrate the rightists, generally treat them with respect and from time to time with deference. . . ."

If what the editor says is true—and it is—then is this not proof in itself that there is a conspiracy to silence the rightists and to publicize every word uttered by the leftists?

We cannot deny that what we write in this series of letters will be preached mainly to "our own kind" and we realize that few will be converted because of what we write. In far graver situations—because souls were involved in their cases—Noah faced the same handicap, as did Isaiah, and all the other prophets from Jeremiah to John the Baptist. Still, what they said had to be said, because it was their privilege and duty to bear witness to the truth, that succeeding generations might read what their own generations refused to hear. It is with this same regard for obligation that we write of a conspiracy which is denied and called fantasy by those who would conceal facts from the people.

DEFINITION:—

Merriam-Webster Dictionary, Second Edition, records the following meanings for the word "conspiracy": 1) a "combination of men for an evil purpose; an agreement between two or more persons to commit a crime in concert, as treason, a plot." 2) "Combination of men for a single end; a concurrence, or general tendency, as of circumstances, to one event; harmonious action; 3) "Law. An agreement, manifesting itself in words or deeds, by which two or more persons confederate to do an unlawful act, or to use unlawful means to do an act which is lawful; confederacy."

Using any one, or all three of the above definitions, it becomes immediately apparent that to deny that conspiracy exists is to, in the words of the editor of Wall Street Journal, engage in "fantasy, hallucination, myth and big lie."

The Council on Foreign Relations is, of course, a "combination of men for a single end," which makes of it a conspiracy. The real argument, then, has to do with the answer to the question: For what end are the members of the CFR conspiring?

It is our intention to prove, out of their own mouths, that there is a conspiracy to build a new social, political and economic world order, and that the purpose of that conspiracy is to concentrate the wealth, the natural resources, the production, distribution, and sale of the world's goods, in the hands of a favored oligarchy of international financiers and industrialists.

We further intend to prove that there is an overall plan for the accomplishment of this purpose, a plan which is already being carried out, and a plan which calls for the building of a new social order on a global scale.

First, let us ask, Why? And a person well qualified to answer is Roy Ash, president of Litton Industries and chairman of the President's Advisory Council on Executive Organization.

On February 7, 1972, there was held a White House Conference on the Industrial World Ahead, which was called:

"A Look at Business in 1990."

As one of the participants in that conference, Roy Ash later appeared before the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce to tell West Coast businessmen what was decided at the White House Conference. The billing for this latter event is impressive, reading:

"The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, in cooperation with the U.S. Department of Commerce and the White House Staff, is presenting The White House Conference, The World Ahead, A Look at Business in 1990. Thursday, May 18, 1972. Los Angeles Hilton. 3:00-6:30 p.m."

It's a privilege to be with you this afternoon and, together, to peer into the future toward 1990. Some of you may have wondered why the White House conferees were advised to direct their prognostications to the year 1990, rather than to some other specific date in the decades ahead. Unfortunately, there is little I can provide in the way of edification; I rather wondered about it myself. Alright, I reasoned, George Orwell long ago appropriated 1984. Herman Kahn more recently laid claim to 2000. So there were not many good numbers left. Possibly 1990 was selected for the benefit of the panelists. They will all be retired and safe from harm if their predictions are wrong.

At the White House conference held earlier this year my fellow panelists and I discussed the subject of world business and the economy of 1990. Our particular panel, I should add, was comprised of Jean Frere, Managing Partner of Banque Lambert, Brussels, Belgium; Robert V. Roosa, partner of Brown Brothers Harriman & Co., United States; Roberto Campos, president of the International Bank, Sao Paulo, Brazil; and Peter G. Peterson, then Assistant to President Nixon for International Economic Affairs and Executive Director of the Council on International Economic Policy, and now the Secretary of Commerce.

While we did not always achieve unanimity, our conclusions on the general subject of the future of world business tended, for the most part, to be strikingly similar. In the time allotted me today, I will attempt to summarize those conclusions. However, in all fairness to Messrs. Frere, Roosa, Campos and Peterson—none of whom are here to cry foul if their panel chairman goes astray—I will hedge by saying that what follows represents essentially my own views, reinforced where appropriate with their comments.

The threshold question is, why is world business so important to us anyway? Why don't we just concentrate on improving the U.S. business and economy? Isn't that enough challenge?

The answer is that increasing economic and business interdependence among nations is the keynote of the next two decades of world business—decades that will see major steps toward a single world economy evolve out of today's increasingly interacting, but still separate, national economies. As city, state and regional economies in this country have become melded into a single and highly interacting national economy, so individual national economies will meld into a single world economic system. And as the economic development of the United States made obsolete self-contained U.S. state, or even regional, economies, so the natural development of the world between now and 1990 will make obsolete a free standing French economy, a Japanese one, and even a U.S. economy in isolation from others.

Such an evolution is natural and inexorable—and beneficial. For an intelligent civilization always has and always will seek more and more efficient, and thus productive, means of converting its limited resources, energy and manpower into useful products and services. More highly integrated economic structures—based on specialization of its many elements and on interdependency among the specialized parts—is the inevitable answer. A single world economy is that higher order integration for the decades ahead.

The obstacles and hazards in the way of realizing a beneficially functioning single world economy are many. More effective multilateral governmental institutions must be developed and brought into operation. Some aspects of individual sovereignty will be given over to supranational authority. Even as critical, the relative roles of the world's governments, on the one hand, and of globe circling business enterprises on the other, need to be worked out. Some have likened the upcoming issues between sovereign nations and multinational business to the test of earlier times between church and state.

We need only look at the long road the European Common Market countries have taken, and are still on, as they step by step reconcile national interests with the mutual advantages of a more broadly based economy, and as they embrace the activities of multinational business, to visualize the even more complex issues as we move toward a single world economy. But the Common Market countries are all industrialized and all operate under the private enterprise system. In embracing all the countries of the world, special attention needs to be given to the less industrialized countries and how they relate to the already industrialized ones, and to the place of the socialist countries in a developing world economy.

Roberto Campos, of the panel, maintains that great strains will arise in embracing within a single world economy countries of widely disparate development levels. He sees a strong bipolarity of interests and objectives. One of the bilateral poles of the future, as he sees it, will be comprised of emerging post-industrial, mass consumption societies—the largely developed societies—by 1990 perhaps 30 per cent of the world's population when taken together. The industrial-transitional and pre-industrial societies, representing over 70 per cent of the world's population, would constitute the other pole. And, as he notes, these two groups will greatly differ in the nature of their priorities and in the range of options available, thus a continuing source of international tension. Campos foresees, in the post-industrial societies, a humanistic revolt against technology and the surfeit of materialism it has produced; and in the developing nations, a technological revolt against hedonistic humanism—because for them the most urgent concern is the eradication of poverty—through stepped up “materialism.”

As importantly, international agreements between the socialist and the private property economies add a different dimension to the problems for which solutions need be found over the years ahead. But as Jean Frere forecasts, the socialist countries will take major steps toward joining the world economy by 1990. He goes so far as to see them becoming members of the International Monetary Fund, the sine qua non for effective participation in multilateral commerce. Then also, by 1990 an imaginative variety of contractual arrangements will have been devised and put into operation by which the socialist countries and the private capital countries will be doing considerable business together, neither being required to abandon its base ideology. (The economic theories of Adam Smith and Karl Marx are not without their common points.)

These special dimensions of the next economy—the economy of the world, as it first permeates the industrial countries and then reaches out to embrace both the pre-industrial and socialistic ones—present challenging tasks for the next two or more decades. . . .

The industrial world ahead. . . will turn increasingly on the use of massive amounts of capital, the development and application of a cascading flow of new technologies, and highly professionalized management. Yet these relatively scarce resources are not equally available to all the world's countries. Thus the role for the multinational company.

For, the fundamental reasons the multinational corporations are here to stay and will conduct much of the world's business of the future are simple ones. These powerful factors of production—that is, capital, technology and management—will be fully mobile, neither contained nor containable within national borders. They can be employed wherever in the world they will be most productive. World-wide transportation systems—extensive, economic and rapid—will make the world smaller in 1990 than California was in 1920. New management techniques, aided by computer processed data and instant communications, will allow as effective direction and control of world-around business activities in 1990 as a fifty man factory was controlled by the on-the-floor visual supervision of 1920.

The multinational corporation will be the natural outgrowth of the driving force of industrial enterprise that continually seeks out ways of producing and distributing more goods at lower cost to the consumer. Having a world perspective and operating in conducive national environments, it will combine labor, materials, capital, technology and management in the most productive combinations and distribute the fruits of this combination to world markets.

Such maximum efficiency in the use of all the world's productive resources is essential for the demanding period ahead. The multinational corporation—domestic in all countries, foreign in none—will become the mechanism to realize the potentials of world business for all the world's citizens.

Yet the very scale and dimension of the multinational corporation will require new forms of relationships between business and national governments. To reflect this need for reconciling the roles of sovereign nations and multinational corporations, Robert Roosa is convinced we are going to have to develop and apply clear "rules of the road." It cannot now be predicted whether they will come about from case by case development in the courts of international law or by treaty among major nations. In any event, effective international rules of the road are as essential for the world economy ahead as they are for Los Angeles traffic.

As a framework for their development and application will be the establishment of more effective supranational institutions to deal with intergovernmental matters, and matters between governments and world industry. A key intergovernmental institution that needs to work well in a world economy is the International Monetary Fund. Roosa predicts that the IMF will reach new capabilities and dimensions. It will become, in Bob's words, the most advanced embodiment of the aspirations that so many have for a world society, a world economy. The IMF, he forecasts for 1990, is going to be the source of all of the primary reserves of all the banking systems of the world.

Jean Frere observes that monetary stability is going to be as critical for the 1990 world economy as the finer standards for distance, weight and time that are now required by modern technology. To bring this about is no small task; inflation must be licked and gold restored its rule; he concludes.

It would be my own forecast that within two decades the institutional framework for a World Economic Community will be in place and operating just as today's European Economic Community structure provides the strong supranational framework for the European economy.

So, as we look ahead to the world economy of 1990 we already see some parts falling into their places. World business already is rapidly increasing. Multinational corporations are increasingly a fact of world business. Governments are beginning to perceive the meaning, problems and opportunities of a world economy. High on official agendas, world-around between now and then, will be programs to reconcile national interests, the forces of world business, and international objectives.

For, in the final analysis, we are commanded by the fact that the economies of the major countries of the world will be interlocked. And since major economic matters in all countries are also important political matters in and between countries, the inevitable consequence of these propositions is that the broader and total destinies—economic, political and social—of all the world's nations are closely interlocked. We are clearly at that point where economic issues and their related effects can be considered only in terms of a total world destiny, not just separate national destinies, and certainly not just a separate go-it-alone destiny for the United States.

In the preceding, Roy Ash and his fellow White House panelists—multinational industrialists, international bankers, government appointees—tell American businessmen that a World Economic Community will be in operation by 1990, that "some aspects of national sovereignty will be given over to supranational authority," that the IMF will be "the source of all of the primary reserves of all of the banking systems of the world," and that the Socialist countries of the world will join in the creation of this New World Society, and finally, that this is "natural, inexorable, and beneficial."

In simpler words: We shall have World Government whether we like it or not. And the oligarchists who say this know whereof they speak; because they have their plan, it has been put into operation, and it is now working and being worked at every level of society: international, national, regional and at State, County, City and Community levels.

This revolutionary plan for the reshaping of the world is complex, difficult to understand because of its semantics. Even the name of the plan is disarming, seemingly innocent and innocuous. The plan is called the "Planning-Programming-Budgeting System" and few people other than its operators even know of the plan's existence.

We intend to do our utmost to relieve this dearth of knowledge in this series of letters.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

----- Part Two -----

THE PLANNERS

In order to build the Planned Society, it is first necessary for the builders to enter into a Conspiracy and formulate The Plan, outlining the goals and objectives that are to be attained. Next, it is necessary to blueprint The Program, to diagram the steps that are to be taken in order to achieve the planned goals and objectives. Finally, it is essential that The Budget be prepared, so that the necessary wherewithal will be immediately available for the carrying out of The Program and the attainment of the goals and objectives of The Plan.

And that is a skeletal description of the System which is being used to bring about The New World Order, and which is called so unobtrusively and so innocuously, the Planning - Programming - Budgeting System.

Planning is, of course, the first essential step. And Planning also is the essential ingredient of any totalitarian system of government. Economic Planning is the very heart and soul of any and every form of Socialism, from the Rightist Fascism to the Leftist Communism.

But this kind of planning is alien to, and inimical to, the American form of representative republican government and free enterprise economy.

No one knows this better than the Socialist Planners. "Planning has no place under pure capitalism," wrote Seymour Harris, professor of economics at the Harvard Littauer School of Business Administration, founding member of the Fabian Socialist Americans for Democratic Action, Senior Consultant to the United States Treasury Department and the Council of Economic Advisers and ten other Federal agencies in the Kennedy Administration, author, lecturer, etc., etc. This adviser to Presidents who has expressed great admiration for the Soviet System and who looks upon himself as chief American prophet of the great god of economics Maynard Keynes (a claim disputed with merit by John Kenneth Galbraith) is author of the prophecy that "a planned society may be just around the corner, and capitalism may be but a stage in the historical process from feudalism to socialism." His reasoning:

"Planning has no place under pure capitalism, for it does not allow much room for the capitalist trinity—sovereignty of the consumer, the tyranny of the price system, and the quest for profits. In a planned economy, the economic architects generally determine what use is to be made of limited resources and, therefore, to some extent impair the sovereignty of consumers. Their targets are set according to an objective determined by the state, e.g., producing for war or raising the mass standard of living, and thus do not allow price and income movements to regulate the productive process; and since these goals are selected by the general board of strategy, acting for the party, the government, or the people, the planned economy supplants the entrepreneur, who is the human magneto in the capitalist machine."

This is the typical argument for Fabian economic policies, which were adopted and adapted by the American Federal Government beginning in 1933. We have written much about Fabianism in previous letters, and it is not our purpose to debate the fallacies of the system at this time. However, a brief restatement of some of the highlights of this specialized brand of Socialism seems required:

The Fabian Society was organized in England in 1882 and has played the guiding role in the Socialization of England. In addition to its domestic activities, there was much overseas missionary work performed; the London School of Economics was established, according to one of its promoters, in order "to raise and train the bureaucracy of the future socialist state"—and many Americans have been trained there, one of them having been the late John Kennedy. With Richard Nixon's admission that he is "a Keynesian," the claim of former Prime Minister Clement Atlee seems to have been fully justified: "It's alumni do the economic planning for the English-speaking world."

In 1931 there emerged in England from the inner circle of the Fabians what was known as Political and Economic Planning (PEP). Shortly thereafter a number of the most prominent British Fabians came to the United States to assist their American colleagues in Planning, Programming, and Budgeting FDR's New Deal.

It is important to understand that Fabianism would never have been adaptable to Russia and Communism could never have been successfully imposed on the English. The two different forms of Socialism were carefully tailored to their specific roles and for their respective situations.

The Planners also understood that culturally and otherwise there is much in common between the people of England and the United States. They have substantially the same legal systems, speak the same language, observe Christian traditions, etc. If Fabianism was the proper approach for the successful socialization of England, it was reasonable to conclude that it might also be the most suitable brand to try out on the Americans.

So, as Syndicalism and the I.W.W. movement fizzled out like a wet fuse on a bomb; as the Bolshevik fad faded off the pages of current history, after World War II both the Trotskyist and Communist causes trickled down to form mere pools of subversion in metropolitan areas; but Fabian Socialism grew and it grew until, in 1972, its aims and objectives are to be found prominently displayed as planks in the platform of the National Democratic Party.

(A parenthetical comment: The Fabian approach in the United States followed much the same pattern as that which had proved successful in England. There the Fabians took over the Labour Party and made their revolutionary changes while that Party was in power. But the Labour Party could never make the programs work properly; so the Conservative Party would then be brought into power, to restore order and make the Labour Party programs work. In the same sense in the United States, the left-leaning National Democratic Party proposes and takes a step toward total Socialism, then the National Republican Party disposes and makes the Democratic proposals work! Both are Socialist, but in order to display a seeming difference, the National Democrats lean leftward and copy the Welfare Statism of Sweden; while the National Republicans lean toward the right and, in keeping with their alleged accent on "big business," imitate the monopolistic Corporate State Fascism developed in Italy.)

"In 1913, the planned economy existed only in the minds or scribblings of leftward theorists. As recently as 1930, the average economist reacted violently to the suggestion that a programmed economy might embody some logic. But much has happened since 1930. The world has observed three five-year plans in the USSR effect an unparalleled expansion and industrialization, as well as a strengthening of the military machine." So wrote Seymour Harris in his book Economic Planning (Alfred A. Knopf, 1949). The words planned and programmed in the preceding quote were italicized by your author to point out a planned coincidence:

It is interesting that Harris chose the year 1913 as the date of conception of the theory of economic planning; for it was that year that the Federal Reserve System was born, the Income Tax began, and the first tax-exempt foundation received a federal charter.

We mention these happenings of 1913 because the system we are discussing in this letter bears the name and title of the Planning - Programming - Budgeting System, and here we see how the budgeting was planned even before the programming began.

Interesting, too, was the author's selection of the year 1930 in connection with violent objections on the part of economists to the programmed economy; for it was in that year that President Herbert Hoover began laying the groundwork for the coming planned depression which would permit the ushering in of the New Deal Programming. (If any of our readers are shocked by our reference to Mr. Hoover as the man who "made straight the way" for the coming of FDR and the New Deal, permit us one reference to the pages of the Congressional Record of August 20, 1962, page 16008. There is an entry by Rep-Schwengle of Iowa dealing with the establishment of a Hoover Memorial and Library at West Branch, Iowa (Hoover's birthplace) on August 10, 1962. One paragraph from an article by Mildred Spaeth appearing in the local paper (reprinted in the Record) reads: "His (Hoover's) life in West Branch was ended at 11 years. But when at 22, a graduate of the new Stanford University's first class, an engineer on his way to England to discuss his new job as head of the Rothschild families' mining interests all over the world, he came to spend a day here..." Italics were added for emphasis.)

Seymour Harris also speaks glowingly of the first use of what is now called the planning-programming-budgeting system, in his reference to the Soviet five-year plans. What this Fabian fabler does not say is that the five-year plans were programmed and budgeted by American financiers, industrialists and technicians. Professor Antony Sutton of Stanford University's Hoover Institution, notes in his highly authoritative Western Technology and Soviet Economic Development:

"...there is a report in the State Department files that names Kuhn, Loeb & Co. (long established, important financial house in New York) as the financier of the first Five Year Plan."

Professor Sutton proves most conclusively in his three volume history of Soviet technological development that the Soviet Union was planned, programmed and budgeted by the United States (for further information on this subject refer to Don Bell Reports of August 25, 1972, which deals with Aid and Trade with the Enemy.)

However, the Soviet Five-Year Plans were not to be used in the United States; rather, Fabianism was the system chosen for us. Let us recall what was said previously of how different styles of Socialism are carefully tailored to fit particular situations and particular cultures. So, while the Soviet Five-Year Plans were a type of our present Planning - Programming - Budgeting System (hereafter referred to as PPBS), the Soviet PPBS was a crude and coercion-based system ideally suited to the inhabitants of the USSR (and to Orientals), and would be not at all suitable for people of Nordic and Anglo-Saxon cultures.

So, this American-style PPBS was adapted from the English PEP (Political and Economic Planning). In a remarkable article by the late Florence Fowler Lyons which appeared in the Dec. 17, 1967 issue of The Ledger (Montrose, Calif.), the following explanation is given:

"If PPBS confuses you, just associate it with the source of its inspiration - the traditional communist-socialist 'Five Year Plans.' Hitch admitted in 1966 that PPBS grew from 'small beginnings... which date back to Blackett'."

Hitch is Charles J. Hitch, 13-year veteran of the think-tank called Rand, where the PPBS was perfected for American usage. Hitch presently is president of the University of California (there for reasons we'll explain later.) And Blackett is Professor Patrick M.S. Blackett, chief science advisor to British Fabian Socialists Hugh Gaitskill and Harold Wilson.

In an excellent background paper sent us by Marilyn Angle, of Santa Monica, California, where patriots are fighting the introduction of PPBS in their school system (more of this in a future letter in this series), we are given the following thumbnail history of the development of PPBS in the Executive Branch of the Federal Government:

- 1929: President Hoover set up President's Research Committee on Social Trends, which was liberally financed by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.
- 1949: President Truman named a U.S. Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of Government. This was the first Hoover Commission, and it recommended the establishment of performance budgeting (this is the B in the developing PPBS).
- 1955: Second Hoover Commission.
- 1956: President Eisenhower appointed the Commission on National Goals. The American Assembly of Columbia U. was given responsibility for preparing this "national goals" report, and a number of foundations provided financial support. Staff director of the Commission was William F. Bundy.
- 1961: President Kennedy, implementing two RAND suggestions, launched PPBS in the Department of Defense under Robert Strange McNamara. * (See footnote at bottom of next page).
- 1965: President Johnson Initiated PPBS throughout the Executive Branch.
- 1966: Congress passed Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act, which set the stage for bringing PPBS into the Model Cities Program.
- 1968: HEW under President Johnson prepared a draft Social Report. What had been primarily economic planning now would become social planning and programming.

- 1969: President Nixon's Administration committed itself to the issuing of Annual Social Reports. In July, 1969, Nixon established the National Goals Research Staff and directed that it report to him annually, starting July 4, 1970, with specific concentrated concern for the year 1976 (200th anniversary of the Nation.)
- 1970: Bureau of the Budget is reorganized into Office of Management and Budget to have complete control over the performance budgeting for all areas of government activity.
- 1972: President Nixon signed Executive Order No. 11647, which created Ten Federal Regional Councils.
- 1973: (Pending) Restructuring of the Federal Cabinet into five departments for domestic functions. Also revenue sharing to finance PPBS at local levels of government.

The foregoing information merely highlights the development and application of PPBS at the domestic level, within the United States. But perhaps even more important in the final analysis is the international application of PPBS. The World Bank, under McNamara, uses PPBS as an inflexible guideline in the granting of loans; it is a requirement for all U.S. loans or give-aways to foreign countries or developing regions; the Peace Corps is a PPBS adjunct; all Ford Foundation grants are subject to PPBS

* Robert McNamara was the first executive to try out the RAND-developed PPBS at the corporate level. He used PPBS to build the Edsel automobile. The Edsel became a joke in the motor car industry, but the system used to produce it was approved by Kennedy for Defense Department management. McNamara as Secretary of Defense brought in Charles Hitch of RAND (now of UC) and Alain C. Enthoven of RAND (now of Litton Industries), to take charge of the PPDS operation of the Defense Department. Coincidentally, McNamara used PPDS at Ford and lost money. Litton Industries under Roy Ash, president and Alain Enthoven, vice president, also installed PPBS to operate their multinational conglomerate — and Litton Industries reported a loss of $14 million in the third quarter of its current fiscal year (reported May 25, 1972). It is this same Roy Ash whom we quoted so extensively in our first letter in this series. McNamara, who started it all, now has gone to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, where he is busily installing PPBS on an international scale.

PPBS also is a requirement of the United Nations since 1956 for all developing countries, via "regional workshops on budget classification and management" which were held in Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Far East.

UNESCO, between 1960 and 1963, "in co-operation with the developing nations," established a network of new training and research centers for Latin America (Santiago), Asia (New Delhi), the Arab States (Beirut), and for the new African Nations (Dakar). "To provide a nexus for these regional centres and for universities and other organizations that might be attracted to this field of training, UNESCO (with the co-operation of the World Bank, the Ford Foundation and the French Government) established in Paris in 1963 the International Institute for Educational Planning (IIEP.)"

PPBS is being used, therefore, at every level of government for the control and management of people of all classes: internationally, nationally, regionally, and at State, County, City and Community levels. PPBS was "perfected" by RAND Corp., a think-tank located at Santa Monica, Calif., to aid Government in pursuit of its "goals and objectives" through the process of budgeting. It is being applied to Defense, Law and Order; Health, Education and Welfare; Economic Development; the new public corporations such as the Post Office; Education; etc.

It works like this: Big Brother says, "I have made the Plans; you must set up your Program so it will help fulfill my goals and objectives; then I will set up a Budget for the operation of your Program; using the Revenue Sharing Plan to finance it. By means of the Revenue Sharing Plan I took all of your money, so you'd be forced to operate your Program under my Budget and in accordance with the goals and objectives of my Plan." That's PPBS in a nutshell.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

- - - - - Part Three - - - - -

THE SEVEN-YEAR PLAN

In Science magazine, February 5, 1971, there appeared an article by Karl Deutsch, John Platt and Dieter Senghass of Harvard University, which states that four of the most important political achievements in this century are:

1. Soviet type of one-party state, developed by V. I. Lenin, 1917-21.
2. Large-scale nonviolent political action, M. K. Gandhi, 1918-34.
3. Peasant and guerrilla organization and government, Mao Tse-tung, 1929-49.
4. Cost benefit analysis (PPBS), Charles Hitch (1956-63).

These political achievements are described as political administrative techniques.

It was Charles Hitch who developed the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System at RAND Corporation, then joined Robert S. McNamara to install the system in the U.S. Department of Defense. Hitch later was transferred to the presidency of the University of California, to assist in installing PPBS in the California school system.

In regard to the four political administrative techniques listed above, it should be noted that each is a new development for the control of people.

The Soviet "one party state" is not a political development as we know such in the United States; for the Communist Party is not a political party in the true sense of the word; rather it is a monopolistic minority group which forces its will upon the majority of the citizens of the USSR. Under this political administrative system, a small self-proclaimed elite monopolizes all the power of the state so that it can create the environment which will allegedly perfect human nature and result ultimately in a perfect society. Monopoly control by a small elite: this was Lenin's contribution toward the building of the New World Order. And it was simply a system of people control.

Gandhi's contribution had to do with the control of people through peace; Mao Tse-tung's contribution was for the control of people through violence; and Hitch's PPBS is for the control of people through planning and programming through the coercive use of the budget - the power of money being used for the purpose of creating a New Society (which includes the programming for the creation of a new man who will fit into the preplanned pattern peacefully and contentedly.)

The use of the acronym PPBS, with its accent on "Budgeting," would seem to indicate that this was merely a new system of accounting, and nothing more. In fact, this was the assurance usually given all the dubious and the skeptical who opposed the installation of PPBS. However, as a mere accounting system, PPBS was a failure from the very beginning:

PPBS was given its trial runs, not within a government agency, but in certain private-sector corporations (forecasting the desire of the Elite Planners to convert this Nation into a Corporate-Fascist-State.) PPBS first tried out at the expense of the Ford Motor Co., in its Edsel Manufacturing Department, under the managership of Robert Strange McNamara, with farcical results. The PPB System also was tried out with the Penn-Central Railway, and that corporation was taken over by the Government. It was installed at multinational Rolls Royce, and that corporation went into the hands of receivers. Men who helped perfect PPBS at RAND joined the executive staff of the multinational conglomerate, Litton Industries in an attempt to make the system work at the corporate level in a competitive economy—and Litton lost $14 million in its last reported fiscal quarter. Etc., etc.

In other words, PPBS was clumsy, costly, ineffective; yet it was considered to be so successful administratively that it was adopted by the Executive Branch of our Federal Government, installed first in the Defense Department and later in all Departments. (If you agree that our conduct of the Vietnamese War has been a most miserable failure, remember that it was conducted under Charlie Hatch's Planning-Programming-Budgeting System!)

Even though PPBS has been an abysmal failure wherever tried at the corporate level, Rand Corporation executives and spokesmen are still working overtime trying to "sell" the system to every large corporation in the country. As an example, we have the photostat of an article written by L. A. Dougharty, of the Cost Analysis Department of Rand Corporation, titled: "Developing Corporate Strategy Through Planning, Programming, and Budgeting."

Because we are dealing with "proofs of a conspiracy," it is necessary to reproduce some of their words and their presentations. And because Mr. Dougharty gives the Rand Corporation description of how the United States Government uses PPBS, we reprint pertinent parts of the Dougharty article, together with a table showing how PPBS has been adapted as a "Seven-Year Plan" by the Federal Executive:

DEVELOPING CORPORATE STRATEGY THROUGH PLANNING, PROGRAMMING, AND BUDGETING

...the corporation needs a planning framework that aids in clarifying objectives, identifying the alternatives open to the firm, and measuring the effectiveness of those alternatives toward the attainment of the objectives of the corporation. To cope with this problem of integrating objectives with resources, ...the Government of the United States—the biggest conglomerate of them all—is employing what is termed "Planning, Programming, and Budgeting (PPB)." ...

Table I presents a programme structure for the U.S. Government. It illustrates how the resources of the government (measured in dollars, are allocated to the various broad programme areas such as National Defense, Education, etc.

Under each broad programme area, the programmes of the government agencies that contribute toward the attainment of the broad area objective would be arrayed. Education programmes, for example, would be arrayed under the Education category, rather than under the sponsoring agency. Selecting from among the competing programmes in each broad programming area involves the second aspect of PPB—the analytical part. Analysis is shorthand for a variety of quantitative techniques for exploring the cost and effectiveness of programme proposals over an extended time period (seven years—Ed.) The most prominent example of the use of PPB is in the United States Department of Defense, where the new planning structure clarified objectives in defense and pinpointed weaknesses in the then current strategy for defense....

In the case of the Department of Defense, the programme categories that reflect the military objectives of the United States are set by the Department and not by the services.... The transition of the PPB concept used in government planning to corporate planning is not difficult to make. The parallel between business and war is remarkably close, so it is not surprising that planning techniques of the two can be quite similar....

In connection with the above, the Rand Corporation, which designed the PPB System used by the Defense Department, affirms that the entire responsibility for the PPBS operation must reside with one person at the top. "No one at a lower level has the authority or the right or the ability to acquire the knowledge required to perform the necessary tasks..." says Rand. This will explain why General Lavelle—and perhaps other Generals—are in trouble over the "unauthorized" bombings in Viet Nam. The general officers at the lower level had not "the authority or the right or the ability" to make an on-the-spot decision, even though such a decision might save thousands of lives!

Randman Dougharty, in the above article, writes only of the use of PPBS in the Defense Department. However, Table I, which he uses to illustrate his article, does show its application, not to departments and agencies of the Executive, but to programme areas. Hence, we see appropriations budgeted, not to the State Department as one unit and the Treasury Department as another unit of the Executive Branch. Rather, they are combined in one "programme area" and the appropriation is voted by Congress for the area of "international affairs and finance." Commerce and Transportation are two separate and distinct Cabinet Departments; yet they are linked together in the budget. Likewise Health, Labor and Welfare; while Education is separated from H.E.W. and made a programme area all by itself alone, though each Department will spend a part of its funds on one or more areas of education! Thus, Congress loses the ability to know how much money is being used for what, and loses all control over Administration expenditures! Only the "one person at the top" knows how the taxpayers' money is being spent. And, as presently set up, that "person at the top" is the director of the Office of Management and Budget, whose name is Caspar W. Weinberger, whose assistant director of OMB is S.M.Cohn, and who, with Arthur Burns of the Federal Reserve, and Henry Kissinger of the White House, make up a Governing Troika of appointed—not elected—rulers of these United States. In effect, they are not representing the people or the States, even though they do receive their appointment from the President of the United States. Rather, they are the chosen agents of that Elite Minority Group which has determined to build a total, managed, global society.

To attain that goal, PPBS has been perfected and installed in the Federal Government. It is a totally interrelated management system, wherein the planning, programming, and budgeting components are interdependent and inseparable within the system, and whereby each subsystem, or separate function of government (education, health, welfare, labor, defense, etc.) is linked together into a total national system. The entire framework is then managed from "the executive head."

And this "executive head" manages the System from and through the Office of Management and Budget!

As a part of the documentary proof which has been collected and forwarded to us, to sustain such charges, we have a copy of an official Bulletin, a part of which we shall reprint:

The foregoing list is taken from a 20-page set of originally typewritten, single-spaced instructions explaining to department heads why PPBS is important, and how they are to cooperate by submitting to the executive office at stated times certain tabulations, financial requirements, programme suggestions, special analytical studies, etc. The Bulletin is written in bureaucratese, but a few statements stand out:

"The budget is the financial expression of the underlying program plan. Review by the (Budget) Bureau is conducted primarily in program terms... To meet Bureau needs, agency PFP submissions are to present specified data on outputs, costs, and financing over a seven-year period... Responsibility for the development and use of PPB systems rests with the head of each agency. Agency heads are required to take such action as is necessary to insure that line managers participate in operation of the PPB system.... Agencies are encouraged both to make use of the various training and educational programs offered through the Civil Service Commission, and to establish internal orientation and training courses as appropriate."

After PPBS was installed in every executive "department and establishment," other necessary steps were taken. First, the Budget Bureau was "restructured," expanded, and made a Management Bureau as well; as the new name affirms: "Office of Management and Budget."

Next, plans were made, and finally completed, for the dividing of the Nation into Ten Regions, with Ten Regional Capitals where Regional Councils meld together all separate departments and agencies and then govern their regions, not according to department or agency category, but according to societal programme area.

An essential part of this programming is yet to be completed: the restructuring of the Presidential Cabinet Departments into four departments, to make "area functioning" less complicated.

Also in process of completion are three important steps in the area of budget and finance: 1) Installation of the Revenue Sharing Program; 2) Imposition of personal Income Tax Laws in every State in the Union, and arrangements for collection of same by Federal-not State-tax collectors; and 3) Transfer of all bonds, securities and "public money" held by counties, cities and incorporated communities, to central Federal Reserve Banks, where such funds and securities will be held in "special custody" by the Feds.

Meanwhile, the 1313 Organization launched a pilot project to introduce PPBS at the State, County, and City level.

And most important of all: The Planners began working more than three years ago on a PPBS operational model for the public schools, where it will be used to produce the "new man" trained to fit properly into the total, managed, global society.

These are some of the "programme areas" to be explored in upcoming letters.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

----- Part Four -----

THE MANAGEMENT SYNDROME

"Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) is such a deliberately deceptive and innocuous title for so encompassing an operation of internal subversion that it hardly causes a stir with taxpayer, parent and voter who ought to be the most concerned about domestic enemies of the functions and purposes of legitimate government," wrote Marilyn Angle in an article which appeared in the October, 1971, issue of The Educator.

"Purveyors of management have done their job so well for so many years," continued the author, "that 'manager' has developed a status in today's world, whether he performs a legitimate function or not. . . .

"A new ruling class whose ascent to power was inevitable was predicted by James Burnham 30 years ago in his book The Managerial Revolution. He identified 'managers' as a new type of professional with command of essential skills quite distinct and towering above the capabilities needed for the fairly routine jobs. Rule would be obtained through state ownership, with managers in control.

"When 'performance budgeting' was established in the Truman-appointed Hoover Commission, a whole new ball game, or 'game plan' for managers, who were to become the new ruling class, was set in motion."

This new breed of "managers" was conceived, nourished, developed, trained, and poured into public management positions by the use of funds supplied by foundations—Ford, Rockefeller, Carnegie, Alfred P. Sloan, etc. The funds were used to finance special courses at universities and colleges where these new "managers" were trained. Post-graduate training was often provided by such management-minded organizations as the Council on Foreign Relations (Henry Kissinger is an excellent example of CFR training and development). The 1313 Conglomerate, located on land owned by the University of Chicago (Rockefeller), has been able to train, unionize, and provide an excellent job-placement service for such public management categories as City Managers, Metro Managers, Regional Council Officials, etc. In addition to the training and placement of freshmen managers, CFR, 1313, and similar organizations provided business men for public management service, universities sent professors to Washington, Ford gave McNamara to the Defense Department, and the newly developed think-tanks began concocting goals and objectives which were to be achieved at the taxpayer's expense and used as guidelines by the new managers.

When McNamara left the Edsel production department to go to the U.S. Defense Department, he took with him two RANDmen (the think tank which developed PPBS). Charles J. Hitch worked with McNamara to "computerize" DoD, then transferred to the University of California, to install PPBS in the California Public School System. Henry R. Rowan also left RAND to help McNamara and Hitch ruin DoD, then he moved to the Bureau of the Budget to install the new "analytical techniques" for other agencies of the Federal Government. His work concluded at the Budget Bureau, Rowan then returned to RAND.

"Implementing PPBS into non-defense agencies," writes Marilyn Angle, "was accomplished by Executive Order of President Johnson in 1965. In 1967 the Bureau of the Budget became the Office of Management and Budget.

"President Johnson's 'Office of the Presidency' set the stage for President Nixon's State of the Union message in which he laid the cornerstone for the 'New American Revolution.' All rioters can line up on the diversionary side! This 'Revolution' is being quietly conducted by Management, Executive Order and Commissions. . . .

“Nixon’s ‘game plan’ should be called ‘Ready or Not,’ because his action locks the United States into world government and enforces what Congress delays. The issue is not who is the candidate in the election . . . any charismatic can be president who can take and deliver the orders!”

When the Bureau of the Budget was expanded and converted into the Office of Management and Budget in 1967, the swing to the PPB System at the Federal level was completely installed. OMB became the core of the web of internal subversion, and the Planners immediately began to push their programming to take over government at all remaining levels. Public Management, an organ of the 1313 Conglomerate, explained the importance of the creation of OMB in an article by Donald C. Stone, which appeared in the issue of March 1971. Because this is a vital part of the plan to create Regional Government as a management control center between an all-powerful Central Government and subservient State, County and City governments, we feel it is important that you, the reader, understand what they, the Elite Planners, have to say on the subject. We are, therefore, quoting at length from this article by Donald C. Stone:

OMB: WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO LOCAL GOVERNMENT?

The recent reorganization of the Bureau of the Budget into the Office of Management and Budget has significant implications for local governments. . . . According to Stone . . . “It demonstrates that budgeting, programming, management improvement, systems development, coordination, and evaluation all need to be interrelated. Moreover, it shows how budgeting is primarily a policy and program resolution function—the heart of the management function—rather than a fiscal and accounting function.”

Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1970, transforming the U.S. Bureau of the Budget into the Office of Management and Budget and creating the Domestic Council, has important implications for cities, counties, and states. . . . The Domestic Council is conceived as functioning as a complementary organ on the domestic front as the National Security Council functions in the international area. The Plan provides that the Council will have its own staff, but surely it must rely extensively on OMB.

The OMB and Domestic Council are appropriately major elements in the Executive Office of the President. Some members of Congress opposed the Plan, but not a sufficient number to vote it down (Editor’s note: the OMB was actually established by Executive Order in 1967, but was not voted on by Congress until 1970, when the change was made a part of Reorganization Plan No. 2. Insofar as OMB was concerned, the Congressional vote was merely approval of something already put into operation).

The Plan, with the appointment of George P. Shultz as director of OMB (now Treasury Secretary—Ed.), dramatized the functions to be performed. Dr. Shultz, formerly a member of the University of Chicago’s Graduate School of Business Administration (a 1313 training camp—Ed.), had demonstrated well his administrative credentials. . . . He in turn designated Arnold Webber (also 1313) as one of his two associate directors. . . .

The OMB is responsible . . . for developing, in consultation with state and local governments, the organizational and administrative arrangements that will make the federal-state-local system more workable. Under new mandates, and augmented by the Domestic Council, the Office of Management and Budget should accelerate attention to a variety of measures for this purpose. The following proposals are illustrative. Many of these call for close linkage with the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (a 1313 agency—Ed.)

- * More rigorous steps to consolidate and simplify . . . grant-in-aid programs . . .
- * Greater decentralization of federal activities and decision making to regional offices . . .
- * Stronger Presidential leadership with Executive Office staff in each region and major metropolitan area as well as in Washington to foster improved management and cooperation.
- * Deputizing of state and local officials under contractual arrangements to perform federal services and activities . . .
- * Stimulation through federal grants of the creation of state OMBs . . .
- * Development of income tax credits, revenue sharing and other transfers of funds.

. . . The National Association of Schools of Public Affairs and Administration is devoting its principal efforts to measures which would produce the trained personnel and knowledge essential to effective federal-state-municipal programs . . .

The new mandate of the OMB makes it the logical agency to incorporate such measures into the program of the President, and to work with state and local governments in their fulfillment. Such efforts require assistance and support by multipurpose groups such as the International City Management Association, National League of Cities, U.S. Conference of Mayors, National Association of Counties, Council of State Governments, American Society for Public Administration, and the National Association of Schools of Public Affairs and Administration (these are 1313 satellites—Ed.). Hopefully, the State-County-City Service Center will provide an effective mechanism through which these associations can unite their cooperative effort to improving the total federal system. (End of quotes; italics added for emphasis).

One of the earliest efforts to install PPB System techniques at the State and local level. Again, it seems important to use their words, since we are dealing with a conspiracy. The following, therefore, is quoted from an official PPB document which was intended to coordinate this pilot effort:

IMPLEMENTING PPB IN STATE, CITY, AND COUNTY

A Report on the 5-5-5 Project in cooperation with

- The Council of State Governments
- The International City Managers Association
- The National Association of Counties
- The National Governors' Conference
- The National League of Cities
- The United States Conference of Mayors

State-Local Finances Project of The George Washington University Washington, D.C., June 1969

Five States, Five Counties, and Five Cities examined the feasibility of applying the techniques of planning-programming-budgeting to their governments. As originally conceived, the 5-5-5 road was to be the initial phase of a continuing and widening effort either to set up PPB systems or to use some of the processes of program analysis in states and localities throughout the country. The project served as the nucleus for developing a body of experience on the start-up phase of PPB implementation in the various governments.

The five states participating in the demonstration were California, Michigan, New York, Vermont, and Wisconsin. The five counties were Dade, Florida; Nashville-Davidson, Tennessee; Los Angeles, California; Nassau, New York; and Wayne, Michigan. The five cities were Dayton, Ohio; Denver, Colorado; Detroit, Michigan; New Haven, Connecticut; and San Diego, California.

Initial discussions began in January 1966 with representatives of the states and later, in the spring of that year, with the city representatives. A more formal relationship was not effected until July 1967, when the George Washington University, on behalf of the State-Local Finances Project, and each of the 15 governments signed Letters of Agreement. The participating governments undertook to carry out the initial phases of installing a system. The State-Local Finances Project of the George Washington University served as the central staff for the project, providing, with the cooperation of the U.S. Bureau of the Budget, a means of communication among the governments, as well as training and technical assistance.

Each county and city in the project received an award of $20,000 from the George Washington University, out of a Ford Foundation grant for the project, and each state $10,000, with the requirement that the amounts be at least matched "in kind." The primary condition was that the funds be used for internal staff training, and project travel, in order to emphasize that a PPB System stands or falls on the ability of internal government personnel to operate it.

After this PPB System had been tried and tested and found to be generally unopposed by all citizens concerned; and after its installation had begun or been completed at all levels of American Government, so that the OMB would become the Management Control Center for the entire Nation; then came the next step: the creation of a totally new level of government, situated between the Federal Government and the State Governments, taking orders from the Executive Office of the President (OMB) and enforcing those orders upon the State Governments beneath them! Following the pattern already established by the Federal Reserve Districts and the Federal Power and Irrigation Authorities, the fifty States, would be divided between Ten Federal Regions, to be ruled over by Ten Regional Councils made up of the new type Managers that had been produced according to the plan described at the beginning of this letter.

Accordingly, after preliminary tests and pilot projects, on February 10, 1972, President Nixon affixed his signature to Executive Order No. 11647. We published the text of this Order in our Letter of April 14, 1972, but because of its importance in its PPBS context, it seems essential that we repeat its publication:

EXECUTIVE ORDER 11647
FEDERAL REGIONAL COUNCILS

The proper functioning of government requires the development of closer working relationships between the major Federal grant-making agencies and State and local government and improved coordination of the categorical grant system.

I have heretofore directed the Domestic Council to:

- 1) Receive and develop information necessary for assessing national domestic needs and defining national domestic goals, and to develop for the President alternate proposals for reaching those goals;
- 2) Collaborate with the Office of Management and Budget and others in the determination of national domestic priorities for the allocation of available resources.
- 3) Collaborate with the Office of Management and Budget and others to assure a continuing review of ongoing programs from the standpoint of their relative contributions to national goals as compared with their use of available resources, and;
- 4) Provide policy advice to the President on domestic issues.

Furthermore, I have assigned to the Office of Management and Budget the responsibility for assisting the President in developing efficient coordinating mechanisms to implement Government activities and to expand interagency cooperation. Three years ago I directed that the senior regional officials of certain of the grant-making agencies convene themselves in regional councils to better coordinate their services to Governors, Mayors, and the public.

I have now determined that the measures prescribed by this Order would assure improved service to the public.

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. FEDERAL REGIONAL COUNCILS

a) There is hereby established a Federal Regional Council for each of the ten standard Federal regions. Each Council shall be composed of the directors of the regional offices of the Departments of Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare, and Housing and Urban Development, the Secretarial Representative of the Department of Transportation, and the directors of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. The President shall designate one member of each such Council as Chairman of that Council and such Chairman shall serve at the pleasure of the President. Representatives of the Office of Management and Budget may participate in any deliberations of each Council.

b) Each member of each Council may designate an alternate who shall serve as a member of the Council involved whenever the regular member is unable to attend any meeting of the Council.

c) When the Chairman determines that matters which significantly affect the interests of Federal agencies which are not represented on any such Council are to be considered by that Council, he shall invite the regional director or other appropriate representative of the agency involved to participate in the deliberations of the Council.

SECTION 2. FUNCTIONS OF THE COUNCILS

Each Federal Regional Council shall be constituted as a body within which the participating agencies will, under the general policy formulation of the Under Secretaries Group, and to the maximum extent feasible, conduct their grant-making activities in concert through:

- (1) the development of short-term regional interagency strategies and mechanisms for program delivery;
- (2) the development of integrated program and funding plans with Governors and local chief executives;
- (3) the encouragement of joint and complementary grant applications for related programs;
- (4) the expeditious resolution of interagency conflicts and coordinating problems;
- (5) the evaluation of programs in which two or more member agencies participate;
- (6) the development of long-term regional interagency and intergovernmental strategies to the needs of States and local communities;
- (7) the supervision of regional interagency program coordinating mechanisms; and
- (8) the development of administrative procedures to facilitate day-to-day interagency and intergovernmental cooperation.

SECTION 3. UNDER SECRETARIES GROUP FOR REGIONAL OPERATIONS

There is hereby established an "Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations" which shall be composed of the Under Secretaries of Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, and Transportation, the Administrator of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, the Deputy Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Deputy Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget, who shall serve as the Chairman of the Group. When the Chairman determines that matters which significantly affect the interest of Federal agencies which are not represented on the Group are to be considered by the Group, he shall invite an appropriate representative of the agency involved to participate in the deliberations of the Group. The Undersecretaries Group for Regional Operations shall, consistent with the objectives and priorities established by the President and the Domestic Council, establish policy with respect to Federal Regional Council matters, provide guidance to the Councils, respond to their initiatives, and seek to resolve policy issues referred to it by the Councils. The Under Secretaries Group, under the Chairmanship of the Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget, shall be responsible for the proper functioning of the system established by this Order....

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

..... Part Five

TEN REGIONS ARE MORE EASILY SOCIALIZED THAN FIFTY STATES

The planning, programming and budgeting of a Nation's resources—human and natural—by a Central Government, is pure and unadulterated Socialism. When Richard Nixon, as Chief Executive of the United States of America, assumed nominal control of the Planning - Programming - Budgeting System that was being installed in all departments, bureaus and agencies of government at all levels—international, national, state, county and local—it was found that the socialistic system was not working well under our representative republican form of government. There were nearly three thousand separate governments in the Fifty States, and there were hundreds of federal aid and give-away programs being administered by almost as many different agencies. It all made things quite complicated when the Planners wanted to socialize the Nation.

And so it happened that, upon assuming the Presidency, one of the first things Richard Nixon was instructed to do, was to ask the Congress for permission to proceed with the "Restructuring of Government Service Systems." Which meant: the right to make the changes necessary in order to make the Planning - Programming - Budgeting System (PPBS) more easily directed from a Central Office of Management and Budget.

Allegedly in order to "streamline" the services of the Executive Departments which dealt with "human resources" (the Departments of Labor, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, the Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Small Business Administration), the Nation was divided into Ten Federal Regions. Few realized then, or understand even now, that "Regional Government" is a new level of government superimposed over State, County and City governments, and is designed to replace State and County governments in order to make the internationally adopted PPB System operate more effectively.

In our last letter, we reprinted Executive Order 11647 which, among other things, "established a Federal Regional Council for each of the ten standard Federal Regions." These ten new political subdivisions to which the fifty States have been divided and allocated, are:

REGION I: Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont.

Regional Capitol: Boston

REGION II: New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands.

Regional Capitol: New York City.

REGION III: Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, District of Columbia.

Regional Capitol: Philadelphia.

REGION IV: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee.

Regional Capitol: Atlanta.

REGION V: Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Wisconsin.

Regional Capitol: Chicago.

REGION VI: Arkansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas.

Regional Capitol: Dallas-Fort Worth.

REGION VII: Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska.

Regional Capitol: Kansas City.

REGION VIII: Colorado, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Wyoming.

Regional Capitol: Denver.

REGION IX: Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada.

Regional Capitol: San Francisco.

REGION X: Alaska, Oregon, Washington, Idaho.

Regional Capitol: Seattle.

Thus were the States divided among their Ten Federal Regions, that PPBS might work more effectively in the area of human resources: But one important step remained:

When President Nixon received permission to "Restructure the Government Service Systems," he dared to exceed Constitutional and Congressional limitations in creating ten Federal Regions with ten Regional Councils which would operate under the authority and direction of the Executive Office of Management and Budget, and exercise authority over the States, Counties and Cities within their respective jurisdiction; but Restructuring the Cabinet Departments was a bold step which seemed to require Congressional approval. Nixon explained that the proper management of human resources demanded Cabinet alterations, but up to the time of this writing, Congress has proved hesitant and unwilling to cooperate.

On March 29, 1972, President Nixon made a stirring appeal to Congress, asking that his Cabinet Restructuring plans be approved immediately. He did not mention PPBS in his appeal, but he did speak of resources and their planning, programming and budgeting as his central need. Here is Nixon's message to Congress:

To The Congress of the United States:

The sand is running in the glass, and the hour is running late, for enactment of a critically needed reform, one that merits the very best support which you as legislators for 208 million Americans, and I as their Chief Executive, are able to give.

That reform is reorganization of the executive branch of the Federal Government—the most comprehensive and carefully planned such reorganization since the executive was first constituted in George Washington's administration 183 years ago. Its purpose is to make American government a more effective servant to, and a more responsive instrument of, the American people. Its method is to organize departments around the ends which public policy seeks, rather than (as too often in the past) around the means employed in seeking them.

The broad outlines of the reorganization proposals which I presented to the Congress just over a year ago are now well known. The seven domestic departments which sprang into being under pressure of necessity one at a time since 1849 would be viewed as a single system for the first time, and their functions regrouped accordingly. The product would be four entirely new, goal-oriented departments concerned with our communities, our earth, our economy, and our potential as individuals — plus a revitalized fifth department concerned with keeping America in food and fiber.

A Department of Community Development, a Department of Natural Resources, a Department of Economic Affairs, and a Department of Human Resources would be created to replace the present Departments of Interior, Commerce, Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare and Housing and Urban Development, and Transportation. And the Department of Agriculture—under our plans as I ordered them revised last fall—would be streamlined to increase its ability to serve the farmer and so to serve us all. Several independent Federal agencies would be drawn into the consolidation process as appropriate. Further management reforms would be instituted within the new departments, to provide authority commensurate with responsibility at every level and to make form follow function intelligently.

I do not speak lightly or loosely in characterizing this measure as critically needed. To say that we must prepare government to perform satisfactorily in the years ahead is only another way of saying that we must prepare for its very survival. This Republic, soon to begin its third century, will surely grow old unless we take wise and decisive action to keep it young. "Adapt or die"—the Darwinian choice is ours to make. . . .

In less sweeping reorganizations than the one I am urging, of course, a President can institute changes through plans submitted under the Reorganization Act, whereby the burden of proof rests with defenders of the status quo. However, such authority no longer extends to the creation, consolidation or abolition of executive departments. In any event we would have felt it wise to submit so massive a reform as this one for statutory enactment, so as to permit consideration of amendments and to provide time for full hearings and review. My hope now is that the Congress will honor the best spirit of democratic change by electing now, in this election year, to modernize the executive structure and redeem the lagging public faith in our ability to order our national affairs effectively. . . .

I am pleased to note that the Congress, acting through its Committees on Government Operations, has held extensive hearings on my proposals; that testimony, most of it favorable, has been taken from a broad, bipartisan array of expert witnesses; and that committee work on the House side is nearly complete on the bill to establish a Department of Community Development.

For our part, we in the Administration have continued working to perfect the legislation and the management concepts set forth in my message of March 25, 1971. The Office of Management and Budget has taken the lead in working with Members of Congress . . . There is still much work to do . . .

Twenty-five years ago, when the United States was realizing that World War II had marked not the end, but only the beginning, of its leadership responsibilities in the world, a reorganization of the executive machinery in the defense area was undertaken. That reform, which created the Department of Defense, marks the only major streamlining of the Cabinet and the only consolidation in our history. The new structure thus established has served America and the free world well in the challenging period since.

Now the time has come to take a similar bold and visionary step on the domestic side of national affairs. The 1960s, troubled, eventful, and full of progress as they were, were only the prelude to a period of still faster change in American life. The peace which we find increasing reason to hope will prevail during the coming generation, is already permitting us to turn somewhat from the formerly absorbing necessity which motivated the last major executive branch reform.

Other great purposes now move to the foreground: "to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility . . . promote the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and to our Posterity." To serve these purposes, let us act decisively once again, and forge new institutions to serve a new America.

Richard Nixon

The White House, March 29, 1972.

In his appeal to the Congress, Nixon lays stress on the reorganization of the Defense Department, saying that "the new structure has served America and the free world well in the challenging period since (its reorganization.)" It was the Defense Department which was first converted to the PPB System; and Nixon's real reason for "restructuring" the Executive Cabinet is to make PPBS more effective in these other Departments.

A Socialist System doesn't work well under our traditional representative republican form. Therefore, the Planners insist that the form be altered to accommodate the new system.

This conflict of form with system is spelled out in oblique manner in an article by Stanley B. Botner of the University of Missouri, which appeared in the July-August 1970 issue of the Public Administration Review (a 1313 publication). In calling this article to our attention, American Party presidential nominee John G. Schmitz commented:

"This article spells out the imprecision and failures of PPBS in a dozen different ways. Yet despite its obvious limitations and inadequacies, the conclusion is given that PPBS is precisely what the President needs to 'serve effectively.' It is beyond my understanding how these 'experts' could arrive at such a conclusion, based on their own evidence."

FOUR YEARS OF PPBS: AN APPRAISAL

When President Johnson issued his 1965 order introducing the planning-programming-budgeting system (PPBS) in civil agencies, some hailed the action as a breakthrough in the decision-making process. According to the more optimistic, PPBS would provide a rational basis for allocating resources among competing programs. Techniques utilized in the Department of Defense could be applied to "soft" programs such as health and welfare, it was thought, and DoD specialists were imported to assist in effecting the fiscal renaissance. However, the Bureau of the Budget and the agencies are still struggling to comply with the order more than four years after its issuance. . . .

While some worthwhile results have been achieved with PPBS to date, the system has failed to fulfill the expectations of its more ardent proponents. Why is this so? What are some of the deficiencies and problems which have been encountered?

With the benefit of hindsight, it appears that PPBS was introduced in civilian agencies abruptly, on too large a scale, and without adequate advance preparation and study. Former Secretary of Commerce John T. Connor described the introduction of Cabinet members to PPBS:

The Cabinet members were called together early one morning without any prior preparation and, after a brief summary by Budget Director Schultz, ordered to be put into effect promptly. There was no meaningful discussion of whether or not it would be applicable throughout the Federal Government, even if successfully applied in Defense.

Mr. Connor commented further that "the timing turned out badly as the Vietnam War financial demands made a shambles out of any reasonable priority system."...

Another problem resulted when techniques utilized in the Department of Defense did not prove readily transferable to the civilian sector... It is one thing to quantify the benefits from the application of a stated volume of firepower to a specified target. It is quite another to quantify the benefits to the individual, his family, and society generally of a program to rehabilitate alcoholics particularly if one considers the impact of intervening causative factors....

As BOB Director Robert P. Mayo told the Proxmire Subcommittee: "We are limited... by our inability to develop output measures that permit inter-category comparisons of benefits. For better or worse, we have no generally agreed-upon way of deciding quantitatively whether the Nation benefits more by providing greater dignity for the aged (and less financial burden on their families) or by training disadvantaged persons in their early 20's or by making our airways safer or by reducing crime... I am fully committed to the use of economic analysis as an aid in making budget decisions. At the same time, I would insist—as would anyone who understands our form of government—that economic analysis can never be the sole determinant of budget decisions."...

Summarizing the above: PPBS will not work effectively under our form of government; but the elite planners are committed to the use of PPBS because this is the only way as yet discovered and put into practice, whereby the controlling elite can totally manage the global society. Therefore, since the System cannot be changed, the form of government must be changed to fit the System!

This is why, when Nixon succeeded Johnson in the White House, he recalled the former's order of 1965 which began the PPB System in all Executive Departments and, on April 12, 1968, issued a new and revised Bulletin which gave new instructions on how to use PPBS in all "executive departments and establishments. This is why Nixon asked for, and obtained, the Reorganization Act of 1969, under the authority of which he then issued executive orders setting up the Ten Federal Regions. This is why he then issued Executive Order 11647, establishing ten Federal Regional Councils and placing the Executive Office of Management and Budget in charge of the entire domestic operation of PPBS.

And this is why there is yet the need to "restructure" the Cabinet Departments:

Since the PPB System won't function effectively under our present form of government, the form must be altered to fit the System!

Please bear in mind that this is not merely a domestic operation—it is a worldwide movement to "build a total managed global society."

In this connection, as this letter is being written, the New York Times of Oct. 5, 1972 carries the front-page announcement that PPBS has just gone multi-national! Twelve Nations—including the United States and the Soviet Union—have established the International Institute of Applied Systems Analysis (another name for PPBS) in the Laxenburg Palace, near Vienna.

"The agreement to create the institute, which was signed today at the Royal Academy in London, is believed to be the first time that the Soviet Union has given official backing and funds to an East-West project not directly linked to either its own Government or to the United Nations."

Adds the Times: "Djermen M. Gvishiani, a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences and son-in-law of Premier Alexei N. Kosygin is to serve a three-year term as chairman of the institute's council. Other council members are French and East German."

Thus PPBS, of the computerized, all-seeing eye, is a camouflaged, innocuous alias for the greatly feared "Big Brother." That a system developed by RAND is to be turned over to Communist "experts" for them to operate at the multi-national level, is a sinister sign of the times!

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

..... Part Six

HOW THE MASTER PLANNERS PREPARE THEIR PLANS

The Planning-Programming-Budgeting System (PPBS) is the name given to a highly sophisticated method of governance which was developed in order that certain self-appointed leaders among men might control "the future evolution of mankind." This is to be done by denying the taxpayer any control over budgetary matters, by imposing dictatorial management of all resources, both human and natural, and by establishing a computerized system of thought-control after the manner of Big Brother as envisioned in George Orwell's 1984.

PPBS was "perfected" by Rand Corporation, a "think tank" located in Santa Monica, California, to aid Government in pursuit of certain "goals and objectives" which have been determined by the "planners."

Mrs. Ruth Spencer, Chairman of the Education Policy Committee of the United Republicans of California (UROC), gave this excellent description of the "System": "Going far beyond the traditional processes of budgeting, PPBS provides for:

- (1) 'planning' what governmental policies should be and then measuring behavioral compliance with those policies . . . ;
- (2) 'programming' to establish those state-formulated policies through experimental 'pilot' and propaganda techniques; and
- (3) 'budgeting' to set the programs in action and lock in the state-formulated policies.

PPBS budgeting procedure is very complicated and riddled with new terms and new meanings. It begins with 'planning,' which is the setting of so-called 'goals and objectives.' Goals are general, timeless and long-range policy pursuits. Then subordinate to the goals, 'objectives' are formulated. They are specific, short-range, measurable ways in which individuals are to think, feel and act as a result of certain programs which promote the goals." . . .

"It Begins With Planning..." So, let us learn, from their own words, the who, where, what, when and how of these plans . . .

Back in 1958, one R. D. Specht, of the Rand Corporation, wrote a book entitled Rand, A Personal View of its History. We quote briefly therefrom:

"The (fledgling Rand) Corporation had an additional financial problem: that of securing sufficient working capital. This problem was solved initially by a $100,000 interest-free loan from the Ford Foundation, which enabled Rand to establish a line of credit from the banks. The Ford Foundation upped its loan to $1,000,000 and in 1952 the Foundation converted this loan into a grant under the condition that the Rand Corporation conduct out of its own funds an equal amount of 'Rand-sponsored Research' on subjects in the national interest. That is, the loan was to be repaid not in cash but in research on problems of national security and public welfare that lay outside the scope of Project Rand's work for the Air Force. . . . The Air Defense Command asked Rand to . . . set up a Systems Training Program. A separate group, the Systems Development Division was set up within Rand to do the work of crew training. This Division soon acquired the additional jobs of writing computer programs . . . and of developing training methods . . . As the job grew, the Systems Development Division became twice as large as the rest of Rand."

It is this Systems Development Division which became the actual planning division of the PPBS scheme.

But, since we are using their own words to arrive at an understanding of PPBS, let us now take note of an article written in June, 1969, by R. E. Overbury of the Ministry of Technology, London, and which appeared in their publication Long Range Planning. Here we learn, in their own words, how they make their plans. Granted, this article is in their jargon, makes use of their semantics, but since it was written by a Londoner for perusal by Yankees, translation into lay Americanese is not required.

A mystical note is introduced at this point. There was the famous Oracle at Delphi, which answered all questions, both public and private. Here, at Apollo's preeminent shrine, the priestess Pythia spoke oracles which were interpreted by a priest, the answers thus determining the plans of the ancient Greeks. Delphi was credited with being the unifying influence in an otherwise fragmented life of Greece.

Significantly, the modern PPBS oracles are received and interpreted through what they named the Delphi Technique.

Here are excerpts from Technologist Overbury's article:

TECHNOLOGICAL FORECASTING

A CRITICISM OF THE DELPHI TECHNIQUE

(The author—R. E. Overbury—criticises the methods of forecasting technological developments by obtaining a consensus of opinion among the experts. He argues that the problem is not to forecast what might happen, but rather to decide what should happen and he suggests improvements in the Delphi technique which would change it from an ad hoc method of "crystal ball gazing" into a system for continuous consultation among "responsible organizations.")

There have been so many recent references to the Delphi technique that it seems fair to offer some comments which appear to the writer to go to the heart of technological forecasting and to suggest a different approach to an even more urgent problem, that of long-range planning.

The Delphi technique was developed by Olaf Helmer and Theodore Gordon in an experiment carried out during 1963 and 1964 under the auspices of the RAND Corporation, a complete account of which is given in Helmer's book "Social Technology." The experiment was to obtain predictions from individual experts, for periods up to 50 years ahead, about six areas deemed to be of dominating world importance, namely scientific breakthroughs, population growth, automation, space progress, the probability and prevention of war and future weapon systems. The method was to send questionnaires and elicit predictions from six groups of experts representing the areas chosen. Eighty-two replied out of about 159 approached; of these, thirty-five were members of RAND, seven others were RAND consultants, and the remaining forty were not connected with RAND. Six of these were European respondents. Each panel of experts answered four separate questionnaires spaced about two months apart, and a summary of respondents between the rounds (sic). The aim of the process with the data feedback and experts' criticisms of each others' views, was to reach a "consensus" of views in each of the six areas.

The presentation of all these results in a series of graphs indicated a median or "break-even date" (and the upper and lower quartile of responses) for the events guessed at; for instance, in the case of dates for reliable weather forecasts, controlled thermo-nuclear power, or, in the automation area, for the widespread use (of) teaching machines, household robots, or centralised wire-tapping!

The authors of the experiment seem (hardly surprisingly) to confess some disappointment at the results;...The general immaturity (frankly, it is the only word) of the results follows from the kind of questions asked...The points the writer wishes to suggest are as follows:

- (i) Developments since the 1930's have, in practice, brought about a decisive change in the position and status of technology. ...The difference now is broadly that we can, for practical purposes (not to put too fine a point on it) assume that nothing will happen in the future that is not now, at any rate, conceivable. This means that...we can now contemplate, within natural laws, being able to achieve almost any worthwhile objective however far out. The basic problem is therefore now the altered, and more difficult, one of choosing the right kinds of objectives instead of purely passive crystal-ball gazing.
- (ii) To choose the right objectives, we need to establish a picture...of a desirable end-of-century world, which will naturally also involve human value judgments.
- (iii) The main criticism of long-term forecasting could be that it is not really approaching the right problem. In an age in which we have an unusual power to determine events. It is not realistic to behave like outside observers with no power to influence them. What will happen depends on what we want to achieve. A solution of the world food problem, a more mature or balanced society, possibly through genetic engineering or perhaps the age of leisure through automation and international economic and industrial organization..

We gave you the preceding in their own words, that you may understand that, even as bumbling and erratic as has been their efforts up to the present, these are men who are playing God! They are drawing a picture of the world as they want it to be at the turn of the century, then they are going to make that picture come to life. They are saying: "Come, let us remake the world, let us remake man so he will fit contentedly into that remade world; let us change his culture, his religion, his actions and reactions, his physical form and his mental process. We know what is best for man and for the world, and we have the power to do as we wish. What will happen depends on what we want to achieve!"

It is important to understand that this long-range planning (the first "P" in "PPBS") is not confined to the United States and its governments and agencies. Though the experimenting and developing were the work of such think-tanks as RAND, notice that the criticism, which was taken to heart and acted upon, came from London. And the PPBS techniques are for the world, not just for the United States.

In our last letter, we referred to the fact that PPBS had gone "multinational," though the attempt to hide the System is illustrated by the use of the name "Systems Analysis." Because of the importance of this development, we are reprinting the entire article which appeared, beginning on the front page, in the New York Times of October 5, 1972:

U.S. AND SOVIET WILL LEAD

A 12-NATION 'THINK TANK'

By Richard D. Lyons

Special to the New York Times

Washington, Oct. 4—Led by the United States and the Soviet Union, scientific academies of a dozen nations today set up a joint "think tank" to seek solutions to problems created by the increasing industrialization of societies.

Pollution control, urban growth, public health and overpopulation are among the problems that will be examined by the International Institute of Applied Systems Analysis in the Laxenburg Palace, near Vienna.

Dr. Howard Raiffa, a professor of managerial economics at Harvard, who will direct the new institute, emphasized that its work would deal solely with 'peaceful purposes.'

The agreement to create the institute, which was signed today at the Royal Academy in London, is believed to be the first time that the Soviet Union has given official backing and funds to an East-West project not directly linked to either its own government or to the United Nations.

Moscow will provide one-third of the annual operating costs of about $3.5-million, while the United States through the National Science Foundation will match that amount. The remaining third will come from other nations.

Djhermen M. Gvishiani, a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences and brother-in-law of Premier Alexsei N. Kosygin, is to serve a three-year term as chairman of the institute's council. Other council members are French and East German.

Although officials here were reluctant to say so openly, privately they conceded that the institute was yet another step in a bridge-building effort that the United States hopes will eventually bring about the liberalization of the Soviet and East European Communist systems. They said that the United States was "giving more than it's getting" in connection with the institute, but that the investment was worthwhile because of its potential impact upon both the Soviet Managerial class and East-West ties.

During a news conference at the National Academy of Sciences here last week, Dr. Raiffa acknowledged that the United States was the recognized leader in management techniques and systems analysis. These fields of study evolved in the United States in the aerospace industry when the space program was started in the late nineteen-fifties (Rand's Systems Development Division—Ed.)

To cite an example, if the development of a system to provide health care to large numbers of people were under examination, experts on mass transportation would be asked for opinions on how patients should travel to hospitals and clinics. The point is that health care is a much broader problem than just doctors on the one side and sick persons on the other.

Dr. Raiffa said that the institute expected to have 100 scholars not only from the East and West but also from the so-called third world. An announcement about the institute made here by the National Academy of Sciences stated that "projects being considered for the institute fall into four categories—environmental systems, health care systems, municipal services systems, and large engineering design systems."

"A likely first task would be concerned with energy; an analytical study of short and long-range projection of the world supply of energy resources and demands for energy, dynamic substitutions among energy sources, future technologies, and hazards of each source. In preliminary evaluations, this project has been seen as one that is large enough to be significant yet could be completed fairly soon."

Dr. Raiffa said in a position paper that the institute would have "a selective approach which will concentrate on a few problems at a time with the understanding that these problems will vary through time."

The idea for such an institute evolved six years ago from a White House planning group led by Francis Bator, then a specialist on national security affairs and now a professor of political economy at Harvard.

The institute will be housed 10 miles from Vienna in an 18th century palace now being renovated by the Austrian Government at a cost of about $4-million.

Also participating in the institute will be the leading scientific organizations of Czechoslovakia, Canada, Bulgaria, Japan, West Germany, Italy, Poland and Britain.

It should be understood that the computer is the heart and soul of the PPB System, just as programmed budgeting is the blood stream which permits it to function. Soviet Russia has no financial worries as such, since that imperial conglomerate has been mining and hoarding gold for half a century. But the Russians do not have the technical know-how for building computers; and it would be impossible for Soviet Russia to convert to any new "Systems Analysis" method without first obtaining the necessary computers. Which explanation will aid in putting the following information into its proper perspective:

The Soviet Government has ordered 15,000 large, modern computers from the United States. They will be used to implement the Soviet's own version of PPBS and according to the distinguished expert on Russian affairs, Victor Zorza, the computers will be used to compile a massive data bank in which complete information on every individual will be stored. The information system will then be used as a weapon to maintain thought control. Zorza wrote:

"...the main purpose of such a system would be to prevent any disloyal ideas from even taking shape in the heads of Soviet citizens. . . . The full records of his psychological characteristics and actions could be used to devise an approach that would quickly persuade him...that his best interests require him to conform to the political guidance of his spiritual advisor at the KGB (Soviet Secret Police)."

It seems most evident, though solid proof is lacking, that among the unpublicized but important achievements at the various "Summit" meetings has been the exchange of something more than wheat and machine tools, truck plants and nuclear technology; it appears that the Soviet Government has given our "representatives" its highly developed technique of psychopolitical control of people, in exchange for the U.S.-developed Planning-Programming-Budgeting System. And when Soviet Psychopolitics is combined with American PPBS, the result is a world of contented slaves, even happy slaves.

In the United States at the present time, there is being introduced into the public schools, a system that will not only control political dissent, but will render the people incapable of disliking the system in the first place!

A Planning-Programming-Budgeting System for public schools seems so very practical, progressive, beneficial and effective, that uninformed parents are unwittingly approving a system which will make their children slaves to the system!

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

- - - - - Number Seven - - - - -

SSS - THE NUMBER OF A MAN

PPBS—the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System is applied Scientific Socialism in use to control people, what they produce, what they consume, how they spend their work-time and their leisure time, what they think, and how they react to various stimuli. The PPBS concept, simply stated, goes something like this: If you know what you have to start with, and you know what you want to end up with, it's possible to design a system that will tell you exactly what's needed to make the precise changes that are required. One scientific socialist referred to PPBS as an "accounting system to be used as an instrument of prediction and control," adding that there should be no doubts "about the possibility of a managed society...social technology can be developed so that it will be possible to gain control over societal processes."

The management of society as a whole demands the setting up of special machinery for the observation, control and ordering of each individual member of that society, if the whole is to function as the Planners desire.

That machine is the Computer, its product the Data Bank, and its basic ingredient your Social Security Number. If PPBS is to function as a "people control mechanism," then Big Brother wants your number, not your name; because numbers are the stuff with which Computers deal, and all security systems—social or penal—have found that it is more effective to assign numbers than to accept given names.

Sen. Sam Ervin objects to the misuse of a person's social security number, not because of its use for PPBS purposes as such, but because he feels it to be an unconstitutional invasion of privacy (which it is, of course—but the entire Social Security System was once considered to be unconstitutional—which it is, of course). Because of his stand on constitutional rights as opposed to social denigration of rights in a sea of equality, the Senator from North Carolina receives a lot of mail about the use of the Social Security Number as an identifier. The complainers seldom realize that there is being built a massive dossier bearing that number with a coded computer card to make it easier to add details and comments to that dossier at any given moment's notice by some unidentifiable bureaucratic clerk who has the power to wreck the lives of those who pay him to serve them. But the individuals who know nothing of PPB Systems still resent the use of their social security number as an identifier. Some examples from Sen. Ervin's mail:

"Why is it necessary to give my Social Security number to the Postal Department in order to rent the same box I have been renting for the past four years."

"I've had to give my Social Security number to donate blood, get a telephone and open a charge account."

"The university has changed all student identification numbers to their Social Security number."

"I had to file suit to get the state to issue my daughter a driver's license without giving a Social Security number."

"I had to give my Social Security number in order to make funeral arrangements for a friend."

"Our state tax form requires a Social Security number for a homeowner to submit a tax exemption claim."

"The company I work for is replacing their file numbers at time of employment with Social Security numbers."

"United Air Lines is asking applicants for membership in its 100,000 Mile Club for their Social Security numbers."

"A coin magazine sent me bore a pasted label with my Social Security number on it. I can only deduce that this came from a mailing list bought from a bank or broker."

Among other cases given were the following:

A California woman vacationing with her husband in Wyoming was denied a fishing license because she had no Social Security number. An Army man had a letter returned to him with a note reading, "APO regulations prohibit mailing of items which do not include the full name and Social Security number in the return address. Therefore this letter is returned to you."

One correspondent wrote: "Since I have lost my personal identity (name) I will sign off with only my number. Punch your computer if you want to know who I am."

Along with these and other anti-testimonials there appeared in the June 1972 issue of Government Executive, an article by Samuel Stafford, the publication's associate editor, which highlighted the following charges:

1—The issue of confidentiality of computerized data is getting increased attention from both the Government and industry.

2—Growing use of individual Social Security numbers as identifiers by a broad assortment of governmental agencies and private firms causes pressure for clear guidelines.

3—Big need, however, is for a national policy on privacy safeguards regarding data banks, computers, identifying numbers and other aspects of the complex issue.

The article follows:

IS THE SOCIAL SECURITY NUMBER BEING ABUSED?

*By Samuel Stafford
Associate Editor*

During much of the Twentieth Century, a small but single-minded band of social philosophers has repeatedly warned the rest of us that the demands of a technical society are relentlessly robbing us of both our individuality and our humanity.

We are being conditioned, the pessimists say, to passively accepting the yoke of absolute authority—both public and private. We no longer feel a sense of outrage over what appears to be a steady erosion of our most cherished traditional "rights" and prerogatives.

In short, what Big Brother wants from us,

Big Brother gets. We are becoming a society of nameless, helpless ciphers, and we haven't even got the gumption to fight back. So say the most solemn of our prophets.

The Computer, Data banks, Vast information networks from which can be plucked every last bit of information on John Q. that ever has been amassed about him—right down to his sex life, "normal" or otherwise, or how many times he calls his mother-in-law a month or whether he has a mole on his left thigh or whether he flunked out of officer training school or attended a rally for a certain politician or once badmouthed the boss or fell behind in his bills or got some high-point traffic tickets.

Certainly, much highly personal information about John Q. Public already is stored in such information systems, and as computer systems continue to be linked into ever larger networks, much of that data is becoming available to agencies and individuals whose aims are quite remote from those that prompted the original data collection and storage.

Leading the privacy defenders of course, is South Carolina (sic) Sen. Sam Ervin. Not all of those who support Ervin's privacy crusade have his blessing, however. Ervin has little patience with those impractical civil libertarians who would dismantle modern technology and have us return to more primitive ways of living.

It is the senator's unassailable (?) position that since humans created the machinery that permits wide-ranging data gathering and exchange, it is up to humans—especially Government and industry policy makers—to properly control such activities.

Main questions facing those who favor easier information access and those who want tougher controls:

* How far should Government and private industry computer linkage be allowed to progress in the direction of the ultimate in efficient data storage and retrieval—a national data bank?

* What legislation and regulations are needed to provide legal and technical safeguards against improper—and possibly damaging—disclosures of personal information?

* Should a "universal" identification number be assigned to every American? Should a person's Social Security number be used for that purpose? Assuming that everyone should have a universal identifier, at what age should it be assigned? . . .

Adding a sense of urgency (is) a pending proposal before the American National Standard Institute's Computers and Information Processing Committee to adopt a technical standard which would use the Social Security number to identify all citizens in computerized records. Voluntary standards developed by the Institute usually are adopted by industries.

Ervin noted that ANSI was not dealing with a strictly technical issue, and that any action that it took would represent "a major philosophical decision affecting the rights of individuals in the computer age and the future uses of economic, political and government power in our society." He urged a delay to allow more public debate and legislative and executive branch study of the issue.

Ervin also was critical of the Nixon Administration for writing ANSI that it was taking a "neutral position" on the Social Security number issue. . . .

If Government and industry allow the Social Security number to become a universal identifier, Ervin adds, "I fear Americans may find themselves designated by one digit and that would be zero."

In fact, use of the Social Security number for many purposes has been growing in recent years. Since 1961, the number has been used by the Internal Revenue Service to process tax returns. In addition to its normal Social Security use, it is used by other components of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Civil Service Commission, Federal Aviation Administration and other agencies, by the military services, law enforcement agencies, banks, stock brokerages, universities, public school systems, libraries, state and local governments for tax, driver's licenses and other purposes, businesses in credit card applications, insurance companies, mailing list firms, and private credit and collection agencies.

The urgent need to come up with clear-cut guidelines and possibly legislation regarding use of the number was pointed up by Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball's appointment of a task force to study the problem. The task force, headed by Assistant Commissioner Jack S. Futterman, urged a "conservative and cautious approach to any action that might increase non-Federal use of the Social Security number. . . . The task force also recommended that the Social Security Administration "embark on a positive program of enumerating school children in ninth grade." A Social Security Administration spokesman said recently: "We have already acted on this recommendation and are encouraging ninth grade registration."

(The Senate is considering a welfare reform provision which would require that every child be issued a Social Security card upon entering first grade.)

. . . No one involved in the policy and legislation drafting process expects the complex privacy-technology issue to be resolved soon or easily. But all concerned believe that those actions ultimately taken will have a tremendous impact on future life in America. (End of quotation).

To rob every person of his individuality, to make of every man and woman merely a number, a digit, a "zero;" this is the danger that Sen. Ervin and others of like mind see in the universal application of the Social Security number. The use of computerized data to "keep people in line and obedient" to the dictates of Big Brother, is the thing they fear; and certainly such tyrannical domination is a fearful thing.

However, such people seem to see only the first step. They envision the loss of man's identity, his reduction from man to robot. But the PPB System has no intention of peopling the world with robots. After reducing man to zero, it then intends to remake man in its own image, after its own plan, to conform to its own program, and to be performance budgeted into its own remade New World Order.

As regards the individual, PPBS works something like this—and we are using lay terms rather than their sciento-socialistic jargon:

1. BRAINWASHING PHASE. Traditional beliefs, standards, values, morals, concepts, are to be washed out of man's mind and memory, together with all former regard for individuality, initiative, freedom, and independence. Man thus becomes a "zero," his only identification consisting of his assigned number, his Social Security number.
2. RE-EDUCATION PHASE. Man is now trained (via modernized Pavlovian techniques) in three "taxonomic domains":

- a) how he should think,
- b) how he should feel,
- c) how he should act.

3. ADAPTIVE PHASE. Remade man is then fitted into his proper place (predestinated by the experts) in the Total Managed Global Society.

Virginia McNeil probably expressed it best in an article which was published in the August 1972 Educator. She was quoted in a previous Don Bell Reports, but not in the precise context of this series of letters. Therefore, we quote:

We are involved in a Revolution, a Conceptual Revolution which will attempt to deny the existence of God as the creator of man. The inventors of this revolution are not original, they have been around since the earliest of recorded times. They have never been as effective up to this time, because man has always risen up and battled on the side of God and country. As in any revolution, this one has two sides; one side believes God is a Supreme Being and Creator of man in His image; the other side believes man is God and thus is autonomous and able to create man according to man's image.

You will not be asked to choose a side, because you are not to know of the existence of this revolution. You will only slowly become aware that something is occurring, that subtle changes are taking place. To some this will not be an unpleasant experience; it will denote progress. Others will not approve because they will see time-proven traditions and values being taken away. At first this will be very gradual, but with the computer as the ultimate weapon, change will come very rapidly.

Some will be shocked to see a subtle loss of control of individual expression, freedom of thought and freedom of action (how we think, feel, and act.) The conservative thinkers and the liberal thinkers will have to join forces in order to repel this conceptual revolution that attempts to put man into an Adaptive Framework for Change.

To create this new man made by man, it is necessary to first change the man made by God. There are various terms used, such as change agents, facilitators, manipulators, etc., who will not be God's agents but man's agents to bring on change. These agents have been well trained in our universities and have been liberally financed by federal grants and foundation money (usually the Ford Foundation.) They are well prepared this time, because they have been given a formidable weapon — the Computer. The computer, once it is used to break down man into bits of matter and classify all of his energy cells, will not care if its victim was once a liberal, conservative, communist, socialist, marxist, democrat or republican; because the finished computerized product will be a new man with a new consciousness and a new set of values. The programs fed into it will guarantee that the finished products will all think, feel, and act the same. How does PPBS fit into this Revolution? Its existence was never meant to be discovered by the public. It is merely a formula — a process. This process has been tried many times without success. Now, because of the use of computers, the timing in achieving a revolution will be shortened to implement the formula in our country. Fascism, Nazism, Socialism, Maoism, Communism, etc., are all products of this formula. It can never be used for the good of man, because it is a formula that denies God as the Supreme Being and insists that there will be a single absolute decision-maker on earth. This decision-maker may be as mysterious and invisible to the public as God, and he may not be the one who officially holds the title ...but whatever the name, the semantics, the area covered, the ultimate goal is to have a totally controlled and managed global society. (End of quote).

In the preceding, the author properly names the Computer the ultimate weapon in this conceptual revolution. And the operator of that weapon has your number—your Social Security number.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

. Part Eight

CONTROL OF TAX MONEY THE ROOT OF THE EVIL

In a previous letter in this series, three Harvard professors were quoted as stating that four of the most important political achievements in this century are 1) Soviet type of the one-party state as developed by V. I. Lenin from 1917 to 1921, 2) large-scale nonviolent political action as developed by M. K. Gandhi from 1918 to 1934, 3) peasant and guerrilla organization and government by Mao Tse-tung from 1929 to 1949, and 4) cost benefit analysis (PPBS) as developed by Charles Hitch from 1956 to 1963.

These four systems were developed for the political control of people. The PPB System stresses preplanned programming and programmed budgeting; and programmed budgeting demands centralized control of the budgeted monies.

This means that under PPBS; all programs—Federal, Regional, State or Local—must conform to PPBS aims and objectives, must meet the Budgeting standards set by a Central Authority, and the performance of the Program must meet PPBS guidelines, or the money may be withheld or impounded!

First came the necessity of creating the Central Budgeting Authority. This was done through conversion of the Federal Budget Bureau to the new Office of Management and Budget (OMB).

Next came the need to consolidate and to centralize control over all giveaway and aid programs. This was accomplished through the creation of the Ten Regional Governments and their Ten Federal Regional Councils, overall direction of which is delegated to the "Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget."

So far, so good, in the eyes of PPBS experts. Creation of OMB and Regional Councils would serve to establish control over all Federally financed programs. But there were two escape hatches:

1) All Federal programs must be financed by the Congress, and all money appropriations must originate in the House of Representatives, then be approved by the Senate. This meant, in effect and substance, that if the Congress approved a certain amount of money to be spent on a particular program, then that money—no less and no more—must be spent according to the Congressional mandate. This hampered OMB's performance budgeting and cost analysis powers to a considerable extent. And,

2) All programs were not yet Federally financed. Many programs were financed by the States themselves; many more were financed by municipalities and local authorities through municipal bond issues, etc. Over such programs the Central Authority had little or no control, and the effective operation of PPBS demands total control over all public programs, even as in Soviet Russia or the Welfare State of Sweden.

Next priorities of the PPBS experts, therefore, had to do with obtaining the power of supervision and control of all monies spent for public programmes.

One of the first steps taken in this connection had to do with the financing of the public school system. It was true that Federal aid to schools had almost transferred all control over local schools to the Federal level. Almost, but not quite. Despite the billions being poured into the educational system by the Federal Government and the tax-exempt foundations, the chief support of public schools still came from the property taxes which were collected at the County level by County tax collectors. Over such money, the Central Authority had little control. And if the PPBS operatives were to take over the operation of the American system of education (an essential part of the program to remake man in man's image) then the Central Authority must have full control over the allocation of money for educational purposes at all levels of government!

Since California had already been selected as a pilot State for the introduction of PPBS into its public school system, California also was the ideal State in which to try out the scheme to eliminate all local financing of school programs by means of the property tax.

First, property taxes were raised and raised until the rates became almost prohibitive. Property owners in California began to sell their property and move to other States to avoid the outlandish tax (pun intended).

Then it began to be publicized that the principal reason for the increase in taxes was the increased costs of maintaining the educational establishments. There was, of course, more than a grain of truth in the allegation; the Planners had seen to that by lavishing money on unnecessary improvements, by building school buildings and then leaving them unused and unoccupied because they didn't fit into the forced busing program, etc.

Then came the charge that education was not equal, because schools were best in the areas where property taxes were highest. Etc., etc.

And the final outcome in California: the State Supreme Court decreed that property taxes could no longer be used to finance the public schools.

Thus, control of the money allocated for educational purposes at the local level would be transferred to the Central Authority which operates out of Washington, D.C.

Just as important, if PPBS were to be successful, was the need to eliminate all local control over all public programs at the State and local levels.

And this was the purpose of so-called Revenue Sharing.

Since PPBS has already increased the federal debt by tens of billions and there is no revenue to share, the end objective of the revenue sharing scheme is to induce all States to impose State income taxes, which Federal agents will collect, then the money thus collected will be redistributed through integrated aid programs supervised by the designated officials at the Ten Regional Capitals. That is, State and local programs will be funded if they meet the performance budgeting requirements of OMB and the Federal Regional Council. This arrangement will provide absolute control by the Central Authority over all "shared revenue."

Of course, this Federally collected State income tax scheme still will not provide sufficient funds; and since all other sources of tax revenue will have reached the point of no returns, a new kind of national tax will be added: the Value Added Tax. This is a complicated kind of sales tax that was developed in Europe and which can be collected at the point-of-sale to the ultimate consumer of the taxed product.

However, even with Revenue Sharing and Regional Government control over all public aid and welfare programs; there still will remain one area of money collecting which will not be under the direct control of the Central Authority:

Counties and Cities still will have the use of money collected through property taxes, occupational, professional and business licensing, parking areas and parking meters, fines and forfeitures, bond issues, public subscriptions, etc. These "public monies" and other securities held at the local level of government add up to a substantial amount of money over which the Central Authority has little or no control.

To seal up this "escape valve," OMB called upon the U.S. Treasury Department to order all holders of such "public monies" to take such bonds, securities, coupons, collateral and other deposits out of local banks and safety vaults, and transfer them to the nearest Regional Federal Reserve Bank (of which there are twelve in these United States).

Thus the Federal Reserve Bank will have local "public monies" in its care and keeping, and the withdrawal and use of such money will be in accordance with Federal PPBS guidelines, or else.

Unbelievable? We have before us a copy of Operating Circular No. 20, from the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, addressed to all Member Banks of the Sixth Federal Reserve District, entitled "Special Custody."

This is a seven-page circular written in the same difficult-to-decipher jargon usually employed by federal departments. But the meat of the message is that: "The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta... makes available its custody and safekeeping facilities... to hold in special custody securities deposited:

(a) by a member bank as collateral to a public or governmental body, board, unit or agency (as 'public body') or to a public or governmental official...

- (b) by a bank as collateral pledged to the United States to secure a Treasury Tax and Loan account or deposits of public money...
- (c) as security in lieu of penal bonds...

"The right is reserved to withdraw, add to, or amend at any time the provisions of this operating circular.

Monroe Kimbrel, President."

Unable to fathom the full intent of this Federal Reserve order, one city administration ordered its City Manager to write to their Congressman, asking him to find out what it was all about and why their city bonds, securities and "public monies" had to be turned over to the Feds for safekeeping. We shall withhold all names to protect the innocent; but the Congressman received the following reply to his inquiry:

"Dear....."

"This is in response to your letter concerning the proposed arbitrage regulations.

"On August 18, 1972, Secretary Shultz announced that the Treasury had decided to withdraw the 'Gross Repayment Section' of the proposed regulations. In addition, it was announced that a task force composed of Treasury representatives and experts on state and local finance would begin meeting 'almost immediately' to consider other problems involved in the arbitrage bond regulations. The meetings are proceeding in a mutually satisfactory manner.

"The comments received from interested persons will be carefully considered in the review of the regulations.

Very truly yours,

(signed) Otto G. Stolz

Special Counsel to the Under Secretary."

Arbitrage, incidentally, is defined as "purchasing in one market for immediate sale in another at a higher price." Which is wholly incidental and has almost nothing to do with the questions asked about the Federal Reserve's "Operating Circular No. 20" which calls for the transfer of local government funds to a Federal Reserve Bank. Note especially that nothing whatever was said about this Fed circular superseding all federal and state laws, and all court orders.

Here is yet another example of the complete run-around given to official queries as to executive department maneuverings.

All we can conclude is that the Central Authority wants to have supervision over the spending of all municipal and community funds!

AND THE CONGRESS, TOO -

Earlier in this letter we mentioned that there are two "escape hatches" which have prevented OMB from having full control of the funds which go into PPBS performance-budgeting; one of them being the jealously guarded power of Congress to appropriate specific amounts of tax money for specific purposes. The attempts of OMB to supplant this Constitutional duty of the Congress has caused something of a feud between the Legislative and Executive Branches of the Federal Government, coming to something of a head when the adjourning 92nd Congress refused to permit the Chief Executive to cut appropriations wherever he desired in holding expenses for the fiscal year down to an alleged $250 billion.

Congressman William S. Moorhead, of Pennsylvania, pinpointed OMB as the agency behind the feud and, without ever mentioning PPBS by name, he remarked that "the increasing wide-ranging activities of the Office of Management and Budget-OMB-of the Executive Office of the President are becoming a topic of major concern to Members of Congress and the public. Unlike other executive departments and agencies that bask in the sunlight of publicity, the work of the OMB has been shrouded in the obscurity of the bureaucratic maze—despite the all-powerful quarterback role that it plays in the executive branch.”

The Congressman then called attention to an article by Beverly Craig which appeared in the Detroit News of August 30, 1972; one of the few articles in which the author has dared to present critical statements about the activities of OMB. Here again, however, the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System is mentioned only by inference and never by name. Excerpts from that article follow:

NIXON'S BUDGET AGENCY FEARED, HATED
(by Beverly Craig)

It's called 'the OMB' but critics have shortened even that to 'Tomb.' OMB has so much clout that it sometimes buries, by deferment, programs approved by Cabinet members and enacted by Congress.... 'OMB is the most hated of all federal agencies,' said a congressional staff director. 'I'd rather deal with the Politbureau than the OMB'....

OMB, akin to the treasurer or controller of a corporation, is frequently described as the President's right arm. And it implements his policies in the most forceful way of all—cash flow. The agency also helps Cabinet departments formulate budget requests, apportions funds quarterly, assesses the potential cost and efficacy of legislation proposed on the Hill, helps push the President's legislative proposals, and audits existing federal programs.

Congress feels that its constitutional mandate to appropriate money—the power of the purse—gives it the last word on who gets what. That's the major rub between Congress and OMB....

The OMB is close physically as well as philosophically to Mr. Nixon, with quarters in the Executive Office Building next to the White House. Its new director is Casper W. Weinberger, the former deputy who took over after George P. Shultz became secretary of the treasury. OMB is a relatively small agency, with a staff level of 600, of whom about 420 are professional and the rest clerical. But its salaries are among the highest in government. The staff has grown by about one-fifth in the two years since it was reorganized with a management thrust.

The first set-back in OMB's drive for power to disburse all funds in accordance with its own PPBS guidelines, came on August 7, 1972, in a federal court in Kansas City. A District Judge held that the impoundment of funds by OMB was illegal.

Congressman Joe L. Evins of Tennessee is author of the following statement:

“We are all concerned about the withholding, freezing, and impoundment of funds by the Office of Management and Budget after Congress has made specific appropriations. The arbitrary action of OMB in this area has become notorious and widespread. It is interesting to note that Chief Judge William H. Becker for the Western District of Missouri has recently issued a decree, holding that the impoundment of funds by the OMB... is illegal. The case was brought by the Missouri Highway Commission against John A. Volpe, Secretary of Transportation, and Casper W. Weinberger, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, alleging that the withholding of funds in this case was illegal. A writ of mandamus was issued, as well as a declaratory judgment by the Federal court against impoundments.”

In the opinion rendered by Judge Becker, it was held that Congress still held the power of the federal purse over OMB, and the Judge cited a Congressional ruling (paragraph (c) of Section 101, Title 23, U.S.C.A.) which reads as follows:

(c) It is the sense of Congress that under existing law no part of any sums authorized to be appropriated for expenditure upon any Federal-aid system... shall be impounded or withheld from obligation, for purposes and projects as provided in this title, by any officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government... ”

And therefore, as the 92nd Congress adjourned sine die with many of its members never to return because of an intervening national election, Congress had won the first battle in the war for control of all public funds, thanks to a Federal Judge. But neither Congress nor Constitution can long stay the march of the Planning-Programming-Budgeting Systemizers, who really believe it is predestinated that a Central Authority shall rule the world and the people therein, and that control of budgets is the means of rulership.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

. Part Nine

GLOBAL ASPECTS OF PPBS

"The end of World War II probably marked the pinnacle of U.S. prestige; the height of the Viet Nam War may well have marked its nadir. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, retiring editor of Foreign Affairs, writes in the current issue: 'The methods we have used in fighting the war have scandalized and disgusted public opinion in almost all foreign countries. Not since we withdrew into comfortable isolation in 1920 has the prestige of the U.S. stood so low.'"

So reads the opening paragraph of a special article in the current issue of Time (Nov. 6, 1972.) But, neither the editor of Time nor the retiring editor of the Council on Foreign Relations's tactical journal would ever admit openly that the American conduct of the Viet Nam War was so scandalous and disgusting because Robert Strange McNamara, while Secretary of the Defense Department, introduced, and conducted the war, along the strict lines laid down by PPBS—the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System as developed by Rand Corporation.

In an earlier special article published by Time (July 5, 1972), titled "The Particular Tragedy of Robert McNamara," the story is told, without ever mentioning PPBS by name, of course. Here are excerpts from the July 5th article:

"It is only the latest paradox in the career of Robert McNamara that he turns out to be a chief victim of the Viet Nam study that he initiated (PPBS—Ed.)... His business acumen enabled him to gain control of the sprawling Defense establishment. Yet he was so infatuated with statistics that he was long blinded to the human factors in the Viet Nam conflict. It was a puzzling outcome for a man who had entered Government renowned for his humane instincts as well as his technological brilliance... He gave a powerful impression of the assured technician. Even reporters who did not cover the Pentagon liked to attend his press conferences. Briefed to the eyeballs behind his almost rimless glasses, his gleaming black hair immaculately slick, McNamara delivered an unstoppable stream of convincing detail. He had a swift answer for every question, a sharp rebuttal for every doubt.

"McNamara overawed the generals and admirals who worked for him, and he barely disguised his contempt for the military way of doing things... McNamara brought the same technological assurance to the war in Viet Nam... he willingly took command of what came to be called 'McNamara's War.' In 1964, he made his famous pronouncement that American troops would be home by Christmas of 1965. When that did not happen he pressed hard at the White House for a greater troop commitment. He was mesmerized by the fact of getting the forces to Viet Nam: 'We put 100,000 men across the beach in 120 days and did not impose wage or price controls or call up the reserves. The Russians could not do that.'

"As the war widened he consistently underestimated its cost—in life, in spirit, even in money. He miscalculated the cost of the buildup by $11 billion in 1965, by $7 billion in 1966. Because of his confidence in technology (PPBS, that is—Ed.), he did not appreciate the staying power of the North Vietnamese, who could get along without up-to-date military hardware. When the war bogged down and his well-laid plans went awry, he seemed to fit the classic case of the man who falls because of too much pride in his rationality." (End of quotation).

Robert Strange McNamara, the brilliant technologist who understood figures better than facts and things better than people, had initiated that performance-budgeting system called PPBS at the Ford Motor Company, where the end-product turned out to be the poorly-performing and ill-fated Edsel Motor Car. From Ford McNamara was moved to the U.S. Department of Defense, where the same PPB System was installed, the end-product being a stalemated war in which even CFR-bigwig Hamilton Fish Armstrong could say that "the methods we have used in fighting the war have scandalized and disgusted public opinion in almost all foreign countries."

And then before the utter failure of the PPB System was brought to the attention of the public-at-large, McNamara was moved from the National Defense Department to the International performance-budgeting agency called the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and more popularly known as the World Bank.

In this post, McNamara has been able to entrench PPBS as a world management system.

It would be unfair, however, to leave you readers with the impression that McNamara is the "executive head" of this system. McNamara, after all, might be called merely a "computer reader" and "data processor" for an Elite Supranational Organization in which he is an important executive employe, but hardly the "Executive Head." In fact, PPBS methods were being employed at the World level long before McNamara took his post at the World Bank.

Here, a historical "flashback" is necessary if we are to understand the present and anticipate the future:

THE ORGANIZATION FOR ECONOMIC COOPERATION AND DEVELOPMENT

In the Encyclopedia Britannica which was printed and released for publication in 1969, under the subject heading "Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development," Vol. 16, page 1089, there appears this unusual sentence:

"U.S. Government at the beginning of 1962 was advised to increase its regular government expenditures to stimulate its economy."

A little later in this same column we read:

"In January 1962 ten of the larger countries pledged $6 billion to stabilize their currencies through the existing International Monetary Fund."

First, note that here is an international organization "advising" our Government to spend more money; and second, pledge more billions to the IMF at the same time!

Our Federal Government obeyed both of the orders. And thus began our difficulties with unfavorable balance of payments and the critical drop in the value of the dollar on the international exchange.

Who is this International Group that tells the United States Government how much to spend and how much to pledge to back up its currency?

Let's start at the beginning:

As Time observed, "the end of World War II probably marked the pinnacle of U.S. prestige." And the prestigious Nation that had been called upon to make the world safe for Communism, now was called upon to repair, rebuild, and restore Europe; the first actual contract for such endeavor being called the Marshall Plan. As later events were to demonstrate to our sorrow, the United States was not yet adept at what was then an elementary form of Planning, Programming and Budgeting on a Continental scale. So, as if by design, European experts were called in to help the United States spend its taxpayers' money on European reconstruction and Afro-Asian development.

The most important of these official get-togethers of expert Planners and Budgeteers was to be known as the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC). OEEC was set up in 1947 to direct the European Recovery Program; that is, to supervise the spending of your money and mine to rebuild the world's economy (so some of us could ride to work in German made Beetles, and listen to programs on Japanese-made radios and television sets, while others of us, out of work as a result of this international PPBS, could join the expanding welfare program and live off the earnings of those of us not yet unemployed.

There is something which, to our knowledge, has never been explained in an understandable manner: the interlocking Planning, Programming, Budgeting System of certain of the Regional Governmental Agencies which we have been told to support by sacrificing our National Independence in order to create a condition of International Interdependence.

Succinctly: UN was set up as the Universal Holding Company which would keep the books, record and formalize the proceedings between nations until something better and more totalitarian in nature could be devised and forced upon the peoples of the world. NATO was established as a Regional Branch of the UN which would govern the military and defense matters between the signatory nations. The Atlantic Union was devised to foster political union between these same nations. And OEEC was set up to build economic and monetary cooperation between these same nations.

To put it another way: If you can think of all of the industrial and productive (the "have" nations) of the alleged free world, being joined together in one great Confederation, then NATO would be its Department of Defense, Atlantic Union its State Department, and OEEC its Commerce and Treasury Departments.

Thus, OEEC, in addition to supervising the European Recovery Program, also took steps to establish interstate commerce regulations (eliminate intra-European import quotas, for example), promoted the use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, supervised the European Monetary Agreement (a part of the IMF), and created a special fund to ease settlements, create currency convertibility, and regulate the credit between member states.

By 1961, the principle task (Marshall Plan programming and budgeting) was finished, and OEEC went out of business – but not before it had set up an even more powerful agency to supersede it: the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) was to become the most powerful of all these Regional Government Agencies, in that it concerned itself with far more than international commerce and finance, and became the headquarters for Regional PPBS, even as the Federal Office of Management and Budget had become the headquarters for National PPBS!

As we noted previously in this letter, it was OECD which "advised" the United States Government to spend more money and give more money to the IMF. Yet another indication of the power of OECD is contained in a report on the international monetary meetings of last October (1971) when the world monetary experts were trying to work out an acceptable method of counteracting the massive U.S. balance of payments deficit which was causing so much turmoil in international monetary circles.

The agents of the central bankers and the finance ministers of the nations involved met in Paris under a veil of secrecy with a group which called itself the Working Party Three (OECD representatives) on October 18 and 19. There the Working Party Three "changed hats to become deputy ministers of the Group of Ten industrial nations Oct. 19-20." Quotation is from the standard reference service on current events, Facts On File, which also notes:

"At the conclusion of the OECD meeting Oct. 19, Otmar Emminger, chairman of the Working Party Three and vice chairman of the West German Bundesbank (central bank) said no agreement had been reached on an appropriate adjustment of the U.S. balance of payments deficit... Rinaldo Ossola, chairman of the Group of Ten deputies and deputy director of the Bank of Italy, said Oct. 20 that the deputies tentatively agreed to permit a 3% swing either side of parity in any new or temporary package of exchange rates. He reported that the delegates had deliberated on an 'average weighted realignment' to implement an agreed-upon turn around of the U.S. deficits."

The above is quoted simply to show that the OECD and its Working Party Three are the same as the Group of Ten deputies and the Central Bank deputies (our central bank is the Federal Reserve Corporation); and that all are a part of the so-called World Bank – and the World Data Processing is performed through this same OECD.

A valued correspondent (who shall be nameless in this series of letters) has obtained an OECD catalogue of publications for 1972, direct from OECD's headquarters at 2 rue Andre-Pascal, 75 Paris 16, France. The catalogue reveals that OECD is interested not merely in monetary matters and in commercial affairs, but acts as a central international agency for information and instruction on the following subjects—all of which fall within the purview of PPBS:

Education, Science & Technology, Manpower, Social Affairs, Land-Use Planning, Environment, Tourism, Transport, Industry, Energy, Fisheries, Agriculture & Food, Development, Statistics, Economic & Financial Affairs, and Information.

Recalling that the Computer and its Data Bank are the very heart of PPBS, it is of extreme importance to know that the Organisation (sic) for Economic Co-Operation and Development has issued "a new series of information studies on Computerised Data Banks in Public Administration."

As researchers have come to expect, this announcement from Paris "talks about apple pie without ever mentioning the applies;" that is, it is all about PPBS but the acronym is never used, as will be seen from the following quotation:

"As governments seek to make the best use of information technology a new trend is becoming evident: the setting up of widespread networks of computerised data banks. Since automation is clearly linked to reforms in the public administration, a number of important policy issues will have to be recognised and resolved. Some of these issues as well as a number of technical problems are discussed in this report by a consultant of OECD's Science Directorate."

So there can be no mistake about this series having to do with the universal application of the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System, we quote the Table of Contents of this OECD announcement:

Bibliography

We are informed also that "OECD is the forum in which the governments of 19 European countries plus Canada, Japan and the United States pool their information relevant to current economic trends, exchange ideas, and, when necessary, advise on appropriate courses of action in the light of shared experience."

ENTER PETER PETERSON

In view of the international importance of OECD and the fact that the United States did not have an "economic Kissinger" to handle American commercial and economic affairs at the world government level, as Nixon began the second half of his first term as President of the United States, he created a Council on International Economic Policy, named Peter G. Peterson as its executive director, and himself as its chairman.

Peterson, 45-year-old former chairman of Bell & Howell, will lay down guidelines (supervise PPBS integration) for more than sixty federal departments and agencies. As Fortune magazine, March 1971, suggested:

"Peterson's staff should grasp the chance to shift the focus of attention from the plight of individual industries to a sort of systems analysis (PPBS-Ed.)... We hope he will be guided by a central high principle—that it is in the best interest of the U.S. that business be encouraged to continue its multinational development and that capital and technology be permitted to move ever more freely throughout the world. In some instances, adherence to this principle will mean overriding narrow domestic politics and local interests."

Multinational corporations seem to be establishing governments of their own in defiance of national governments and political institutions. But if Government itself becomes a corporation and a network of corporations, (corporate fascism), then there is no serious conflict. PPBS is applicable to corporate management, and it is applicable to governmental management; PPBS is the liaison and the catalyst which permits the mixing of political oil and economic water. And Peter Peterson is the "economic Kissinger" who must bring about in the commercial and economic world what Kissinger has brought about in the political and military world. Especially with regard to Soviet Russia and Communist China.

PPBS is the weapon, and it will deprive all people of their remaining freedoms. But they won't know enough to mind, if PPBS is successful in its supreme task: that of re-making man in man's image.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

..... Part Ten

THE DELPHI TECHNIQUE ENTERS THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM

Lawrence P. Grayson, acting director of the Division of Technology of the U.S. Office of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, was very frank, and may have said more than he intended to say. In an article appearing in Science, March 17, 1972, under the awesome title, "Costs, Benefits, Effectiveness: Challenge to Educational Technology," he gave this succinct view of the situation facing the Planners who are busily installing the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System (PPBS) in the public schools of the Nation:

"Educational decision makers often presume that people who resist a change in an approach to education do not understand the advantages to be gained by that change. This is not necessarily so. It is precisely because parents, students, and others fully perceive the implications of an innovation that they may resist it. This is the case particularly when the innovation may affect established values of the students or impart new ones in a way which conflicts with the values established in his home or community or with those of his background or culture."

He is speaking, of course, of the introduction of PPBS, which does, admittedly, conflict with the established values, traditions and culture of the family, the community, of American Government and of Christian culture.

There are two principal reasons why there has been so little resistance to the introduction of PPBS in the public school systems of the Nation. First, the parents themselves have been effectively brainwashed into acceptance of security as the greatest of blessings and, as in the case of forced busing for example, they are afraid to rock the boat, lest they be punished for non-conformity and independent action and initiative. People are afraid to resist any change which the so-called experts call a change for the good.

Secondly; and aside from the brainwash, the self-appointed creators of this New Society in a New World have been extremely careful in their presentations and in their public utterances regarding PPBS. Their camouflage has been most effective. Like the wolf in sheep's clothing, it is only when one is able to get beneath the surface of their word-coating that the dangers of PPBS become manifest.

Complicated and confusing titles (like the one used by educationist Grayson in the Science article from which we quoted) are a part of the technique of deception. Olaf Helmer came out with this one in December, 1966:

"The Use of the Delphi Technique in Problems of Educational Innovations."

A "flashback" is required: In Part Six of this series we described the "Delphi Technique" which is used by the Planners to determine their goals and objectives (after which they fashion their programmes, then apply the performance budgeting technique). This Delphi Technique was developed by Olaf Helmer and Theodore Gordon in 1963 and 1964 under the auspices of the Rand Corporation. Then, in 1966, in an alleged scientific treatise, Helmer explained how his Delphi system of technological forecasting was to be applied to the task of remaking the American educational system so that the educational system would, in turn, remake the American citizenry.

Just to furnish a glimpse at the jargon employed by these egghead re-makers of man, in seeming attempt to prevent any layman from understanding what they're really talking about, we quote from Helmer's paper:

"Since the educational innovations planned today will probably not be introduced for several years, and since the effects of such innovations—in terms of increased ability among new graduates to cope with the vicissitudes of life—may not be noticed for many years thereafter, decisions regarding such innovations cannot really be made rationally without a reasonably clear image of what the socioeconomic and technological environment of the next few decades will be. . . . In view of the projected character of our future environment and the effect we wish to exert on it through educational endeavor, it is necessary to establish appropriate educational goals. This is largely a matter of preference judgments, to be obtained through the Delphi method . . .

“After these preparatory steps, a wide survey of suggestions for potential educational innovations should be made; . . . Then an estimate of the dollar cost of each item in the resulting list of contemplated innovations should be made. . . . And finally, on the basis of these cost-benefit estimates a program of educational innovations can be constructed by allocating a given budget among the items on the list of innovative proposals.” (End of quotations.)

The “scientific paper” from which we have quoted in the two preceding paragraphs, was prepared, in 1966, for publication in The American Behavioral Scientist. Let us now skip forward five years, to April 1971, and to an article which appeared in The Futurist—a publication of the World Future Society; An Association for the Study of Alternate Futures.

A preliminary word about these Futurists: this is an association of social, behavioral and other professors of the inexact sciences who actually believe that it is their duty to predict the shape of the world of tomorrow, and then set down to the task of making their predictions come true. They believe that it is within the power of man to control his future “evolution,” and that they have been specially trained and delegated to the responsibilities of directing that control. In short, they are playing at being gods, and the new humanity will be their creation! Francois Hetman, a French Futurist, has expressed the goal in the following words:

“To the extent that man fulfills himself by ‘projecting’ himself into the future, the future becomes the realm where he has true freedom to act, the reservoir of his potentialities. By increasing his mastery of the environment, he sees it with new and more perceptive eyes; the increasing multiplicity of technical choices implies a permanent re-appraisal of his social and ecological heritage. It is therefore necessary for him to develop new ‘sciences of man’ which will permit him to make informed choices as to options for the future and to defend his estate against all forms of degradation. The future is therefore our most precious resource. Its methodological exploration becomes a new dimension of our society. Concern for its implications must therefore increase rapidly.” (From The Language of Forecasting, Paris, 1969).

These Futurists who are dedicated to the task of remaking the world and all that’s in it according to the instructions printed out by their computer (which has replaced the Oracle at Delphi even as they seem to have replaced the God of our fathers), these “men of great wisdom” are not crackpots in the usual sense of the term. They are, perhaps, endued with the fanaticism that often accompanies the worshiping of idols, but many are men of renown in their own fields of endeavor. These world reshapers include:

- Glenn T. Seaborg*, once chairman of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and member of the Board of Directors of the World Future Society.
- Carl H. Madden*, chief economist with the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S.
- Arnold Barach*, senior editor of Changing Times magazine.
- Orville L. Freeman*, presently president of Business International Corporation.
- Barbara Hubbard*, organizing director of the Committee for the Future.
- Michael Michaelis*, Washington manager of Arthur D. Little, Inc.
- Rowan A. Wakefield*, executive vice president of Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies.
- Ian H. Wilson*, consultant on Business Environment, General Electric Co.
- Herman Kahn*, director, Hudson Institute.
- Charles Levinson*, secretary general, International Chemical Federation.
- Earl C. Joseph*, staff scientist in the Univac Division of Sperry Rand Corporation.
- William W. Simmons*, director of exploratory planning for the International Business Machines Corporation.
- Louis H. Mayo*, George Washington University; served on the White House Task Force on Disarmament in 1956; was executive secretary to the network study staff of the FCC in 1956-57.

Isaac Asimov, writer of science fiction.

Anthony J. Wiener, associated with Herman Kahn at the Hudson Institute.

Alvin C. Eurich, president of the Academy for Educational Development in New York City, author of Reforming American Education, Campus 1980, High School 1980.

John Dixon, "a widely known consultant in planning, futures research, and the role of voluntary associations in reshaping public policy."

Peter House, president of Environmetrics, Inc.

Sylvan J. Kaplan, chief of the National Park Service's Division of Plans and Objectives.

The above is but a partial list of Futurists who participated as speakers and panelists in the First General Assembly of the World Future Society, May 12-15, 1971, in which "people from all over the world" joined in an "exploration of what mankind can and should do in the years ahead."

Sufficient introduction to these "shapers of tomorrow's world" who insist that "the world we live in is increasingly the world we ourselves make, and we cannot do the job wisely without foresight."

Their means of "gaining foresight" has now become an improvement on the Delphi technique which is called the Delphi Conference. Beginning on page 55 of the April 1971 issue of The Futurist, is an article about the Delphi Conference, written by Murray Turoff, of the U.S. Office of Emergency Preparedness. This is an adjunct to the Office of Management and Budget, also is situated in the President's Executive Office Building, and is the "executive head" that runs the entire Nation if and when those standby Emergency Executive Orders are ever declared to be in effect because of a "national emergency."

There is this picture of Emergency Chief Turoff seated at his Teletype keyboard, to which there is attached an active Computer. The caption under the picture reads:

"Will future committee meetings look like this? Murray Turoff is conferring with 20 other persons, some of whom are located thousands of miles away. Sitting in his office at the U.S. Office of Emergency Preparedness in Washington D.C., he types out his ideas and questions. A computer adds his thoughts to its running record of the conference proceedings. When any other participant has free time, he goes to a teletype similar to this and asks to be connected (by ordinary telephone lines) to the computer keeping track of the conference. The computer prints out the record of the conference; he then types in his comments, which immediately become part of the conference proceedings. When this picture was taken, the conference had been going on for several weeks without a break, but the participants were still living their normal lives."

Excerpts from Turoff's article follow:

The Delphi technique, often used in forecasting future developments, can be combined with computers to create a new procedure called the Delphi Conference. This new method enables a large group of individuals to communicate meaningfully and rapidly with each other both in generating group forecasts and in making policy decisions....

Computers have long promised to bring about a revolution comparable in scope with the industrial revolution. Just as the steam engine brought about a great extension of man's physical powers, the computer offers a large extension of his mental power, specifically, his memory and ability to process information logically. By remembering and manipulating data, computers have offered society the hope of being able to cope with an increasingly complex civilization....

The Delphi technique has been defined as a method for systematically soliciting and collating informed judgments on a particular topic. Under this procedure, participants respond to a series of questionnaires interspersed with summaries of the responses by group members to earlier questionnaires. With the introduction of computers the emphasis begins to change from communications between the group and an outside party to communication within the group.

...In the Delphi Conference, the computer operates as a real-time accounting system. Instead of the usual accounting functions (sales, stock, shipping records, etc.), the computer stores discussion items entered by members of the group and accumulates votes on these items.... With the computer constantly at his disposal, a participant in the conference can interact with the others in the conference at any time of day or night.... Participants can be thousands of miles apart. Their commands can be transmitted to the computer by ordinary telephone lines from the terminals (which can simply be a teletype keyboard)... At the U.S. Office of Emergency Preparedness (part of the Executive Offices of the President) in Washington, D.C., the Delphi Conference has been used to explore its own potentialities.

The 20 respondents in the initial experiment were located at government agencies, businesses, non-profit organizations, and universities at widely separated locations...

The incorporation of Delphi techniques into computer systems appears to be a first step in making the computer a true extension of man's intellectual capability.

Talk of the cold, remote, inhuman aspects of government when it is removed from the community level and centralized at a State, Regional, National, or even World level; here is a form of government that is the ultimate in the impersonal and the inhuman; it is a faceless, even voiceless, composite Dictator that prints out our future from a Computer, and then prints out the programme which will achieve that future, and budgets the operation with taxpayers' money, and with nary a taxpayer ever knowing who gave the orders that he must obey in order to become a part of the world of tomorrow!

Think of this manner of ruling a world and a people: A group of unidentified and unseen men who may never even have seen each other, seated in their figurative ivory towered think-tanks perhaps half a continent apart; each of them seated at a teletype keyboard which is attached to a Central Computer, feeding their isolated and impractical theories and conjectures onto a piece of tape; from which a Central Executive Head arrives at decisions and issues orders concerning any and every facet of life from conception to cremation.

This, for example, is the manner in which the American child is to be prepared for a life of usefulness in the world of tomorrow. From some of these conferences, we have a few of the conclusions that have been published in papers and journals not ordinarily made available to the public at large. We are going to quote directly from a few of these sources. The special cant employed by bureaucrats, plus the odd jargon of the educationists, make the following difficult to interpret; but the message will be clear once you become accustomed to the cant and jargon:

"Today's educational planning can claim an unbroken ancestry running back to ancient times... The Spartans, some 2,500 years ago, planned their education to fit their well defined military, social and economic objectives. Plato in his 'Republic' offered an educational plan to serve the leadership needs and political purposes of Athens... These early examples... linking a society's educational system to its goals... show how educational planning has been resorted to in periods of great social and intellectual ferment to help change a society to fit new goals." (Philip Coombs, "The World Educational Crisis - A Systems Analysis," Oxford University Press, N.Y., 1968).

"Behavioral objectives, written in the affective domain, will be applied to all persons in the educational institution, e.g., students, teachers, principals and administrators, educational specialists, families, community groups." (EPIC, "Educational Innovators Press, "Developing Observation Systems.")

"... an observation system must focus on small bits of activity or behavior that is to be categorized... teacher-student verbal interaction... what people do... Individual students are observed and coded... an IBM 1230 form is utilized for data processing purposes... The most commonly utilized method of observation is the use of audio tape recording... After observations are recorded, they are transformed to a matrix for interpretation." (EPIC, Ibid.)

"Currently in education, the focus is on accountability. One necessary component of accountability is the measurement of behavior... 'systematic observation' has emerged as a valid and useful technique for obtaining behavior feedback." (EPIC, Ibid.)

"By its very purpose, a program budgeting system is a gigantic consumer of data... The sources of data and the means of collection and analysis are, of course, obvious concerns. Not so obvious, but just as real, are the fears of the individuals supplying the data about the intended uses of the data." (Rand Corporation, "Developing a Program Budgeting System as an Aid in Planning Higher Education," S.A. Haggart).

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

..... Part Eleven

ON BUILDING THE NEW MAN TO SERVE THE NEW SOCIETY

The headline asked, "School Management: Is PPBS the Answer?" and there followed an article which did not answer the question but did serve to introduce a very controversial subject to its readers. Appearing in the Los Angeles Times, Sunday, July 26, 1970, and written by Robert B. Young, the Times Education Writer, this article was one of the first public notices of the fact that the State's Public School System was to be used as a kind of guinea pig in an experiment with a new psychopolitical method for "educating" school children.

Following are excerpts from that article:

It's not a new missile system and if added to gasoline it won't stop smog, but a tongue-tier called PPBS is provoking mixed dread and joy among California education watchers. And its concept is as hard to master as its name is to say.

"The initials stand for Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. And California's teachers, school administrators and district boards will be hearing more of PPBS as 1974 approaches—for that is the target date for overturning the schools' traditional 'line-item' accounting methods, and opening up a bulging bag of new management techniques.

"Can education be charted, or can't it? That is the question, for at the heart of PPBS are goal-setting and progress-measuring rituals that are taken for granted in large industrial firms—especially in aerospace.

"A teacher of journalism and English at Taft Union High School, near Bakersfield, bristles at the very sound of PPBS. 'Teaching is such a personal process,' said Mark Donnelly, ... 'you can't measure it in terms of "efficiency," the way engineers measure things....

"In government circles elsewhere, it has become something of a fad to have a PPBS. Now, 40 states and some cities—notably, New York City—are gaining leverage on complex problems of civil administration with PPBS-style analyses....

"The man closest to California's experiment with PPBS in education is James E. Waters, executive secretary of a Sacramento advisory commission on school district budgeting and accounting.... 'We're trying to move away from the idea of managing education as a process,' said Waters, 'and toward management of the end product...'

The "end product" is, of course, the child, who is being 'conditioned' to take his or her place in a future society which has been "evolved" by master planners, using PPBS procedures to bring about the evolution.

PPBS is a complex, elusive, difficult-to-explain and difficult-to-comprehend form of psychopolitical procedure when it is applied to education. Mrs. Ruth Spencer perhaps explained it best by showing the inter-relationship of PPBS methods as applied to government, industry, and education. Mrs. Spencer served as Chairman of the Education Policy Committee of the United Republicans of California (UROC), and in that capacity made an intensive study of PPBS. An article by Mrs. Spencer appeared in the February, 1971, issue of Round-Up, the organization's publication. We quote from that article:

PPBS - TOOLING FOR "1984" THROUGH BUDGETING

A new sophisticated budgeting system has developed on the government scene with the potential of destroying all taxpayer control over budgetary matters and governmental policies, as well as preparing for the thought-control of "1984." Commonly referred to as "program budgeting," the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System" (PPBS) has been activated on the national level and recently set in motion for adoption by the California Board of Education, unbeknown to most lay citizens and legislators.

PPBS was designed by Rand Corporation of Santa Monica to aid government in pursuit of its "goals and objectives" and policy reform through the process of budgeting. It is to be applied to the policies of Defense; Law and Order; Health, Education and Welfare; Economic Development; and the current business operations such as the Post Office....

PPBS budgeting procedure is very complicated and riddled with new terms and meanings. It begins with "planning," which is the setting of so-called "goals and objectives." Goals are general, timeless and long-range policy pursuits. Then, subordinate to the goals, "objectives" are formulated. They are specific, short-range, measurable ways in which individuals are to think, feel and act as a result of certain programs which promote the goals. An example of a PPBS goal for a school district might be "Environmental Understanding," and a behavioral objective under that goal might be "Support legislation to control coastline conservation." Objectives of the goal "health" could be "Use existing community mental health services;" or, quoting from the 3M "SHES" curriculum: "Explain conception, parental stages of development, and the birth process." Progressing from "policy" to action, goals and objectives of PPBS in education serve as guidelines in directing not only learning skills but also behavioral change and politically-oriented accomplishments. They are subject to measurement and "accountability" with regard to the teacher's ability to teach the objectives and the student's satisfactory accomplishment. Teachers and students will be "recycled" in case of failure to comply.

"Programming" stands between "planning" and "budgeting" and refers to the countless types of experimental research, operational and evaluation activities or "performance" that are to be funded by "budgeting" to bring about the policy requirements of "planning." How the structure of programs works is illustrated in HEW's Planning-Programming-Budgeting guidelines for PPBS. Therein the federal department's health, education and welfare programs are classified and given a 6 digit coded number for computer use. A "program" would be indicated by the code entry 1 5 4 5 7 1. This would mean funding under the major category of education (1), for general research (5), directed at improving International Education (4), through developing innovation (5) at regional laboratories (7 1). This example of HEW's existing program code structure shows how programming is an essential component working with the policies of "planning" and with "budgeting," and budgeting becoming the means of setting programs in action, whether those programs are aimed at improving International Education, basic skills, Headstart, sex education, educational parks, or whatever.

At whatever level PPBS program coding originates, whether local, state or federal, a procedure of review and evaluation of the program comes into play. This review involves an extensive data collection effort and written reports giving data evaluation. Although at first the goals and objectives may be set at local governmental level, there will be a point at which the "cost effectiveness" of implementing programs must be evaluated, reviewed and revised. From these processes develops a "program analysis" which then evolves into new, revised, state-federal standardized, centralized programs based upon new goals and objectives, related by program coding to a central budget structure. This revision for centralization is consistent with the nature of computer programming which anticipates the replacement of preliminary, detailed input with a final centralized program. Thus the PPBS process can be compared to a man-wood-fire temperature control situation that could be replaced by a programmed thermostat button. There will be a "button" in PPBS also, at a point where "man," (teachers, principals, administration and school board officials) is eliminated.

Rand Corporation Memorandum RM-4271-RC, p. 41, depicts the anticipated centralization of the PPBS structure: "The first point to emphasize must be the personal responsibility of the executive head of the organization. No one at a lower level has the authority or the right or the ability to acquire the knowledge required to perform the necessary tasks of coordination." Therefore, in the advanced stages of PPBS, after the goals, objectives and programs have been "reviewed" and subjected to elaborate computer mathematics and programming technique, they will become centralized, revised, standardized, and "irrefutable." Those new centralized policies and programs will then serve as the basis for "decision-making" in budget preparation in requesting funds for new and continuing programs.

PPBS is no simple accounting system. Rand Corporation designed PPBS as "a resource analysis system," involving far more than traditional budgeting as associated with accounting. Several vital changes in the budgeting process are introduced: PPBS "budgeting" eliminates the function concept and puts budgeting on a program basis. This means that PPBS sets up a coded program format, geared to local-state-federal funds, and under each program is included the costs of such functions as salaries, transportation, maintenance, etc. Presently these functions are separated and their costs reported separately. In other words, under PPBS the cost of "salaries" will be distributed throughout the countless programs.

The new PPBS budgeting will also change the fiscal year reporting now designed to limit the exercise of officials' discretion and check their honesty. PPBS "looks beyond" a single year and provides for funding for programs which project into the future over spans of time covering two, five, seven years, depending on the program. A six-digit program budget code number will serve as a "crosswalk" to fit the multi-year programs into annual budgets. This time span of long-range programs involves another change having to do with funding for "future benefits" and the personal judgments involved. PPBS offers no alternative to reliance on such personal judgment and "crude intuition" in requesting money to pay for "future benefits."

These departures from the present budgeting system will serve to seriously decrease the taxpayers' control of budgetary matters, being based on "decision-making" beyond their reach, understanding and refutation. In addition to losing control of spending, under the PPBS "planning" and "programming" system, taxpayers and local officials will lose control of educational curricula content, health and welfare program policy, as those programs become "centralized under state-federal standards. Another sophisticated characteristic of PPBS is its conceptual framework, which ties together the total of all governmental functions, so a "manpower" program could involve education, welfare and labor programs, further decreasing taxpayer power to control governmental policy (and spending).

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL BOARD SETS PPBS IN MOTION

At its December 1970 meeting the California State Board of Education directed the State Department of Education to proceed with revision of the State School Accounting Manual, a necessary procedure in preparing for "the adoption of the proposed program structure for budgeting, accounting and reporting purposes to become operative in California Public Schools beginning July 1, 1973."...

In the meantime, newly elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction Wilson Riles (he succeeded Dr. Max Rafferty, who opposed PPBS-Ed.) has revealed his plans to expand the roles of the State Board, its Curriculum Commission and the State Department of Education to promote "performance accountability" in the state's public school system, to establish experimental schools to test various programs; to collect information about the program results; to analyze, evaluate and revise the goals and then to broadcast their recommendations under state auspices....When the program coding is completed, and geared for "planning," "programming," and for state-federal funds, California taxpayers will have lost control of their local school budgets and curricula content, will have subjected their students, school administrators, officials and themselves to "behavioral" measurement, and opened the floodgates to federal aid and control of public schools.

PAST IS PROLOGUE

It will behoove taxpayers and legislators who wish to better understand the "Big Brother" potential of PPBS to review the history of the socialist "progressive education" movement in America, for what is past is prologue. The design inherent in PPBS to take control of education—health and welfare as well—from taxpayers and their representatives and put that control in the hands of distant social scientists, with federal funding has been the challenging vision of collectivist minds in this country for over sixty years. Great headway toward socializing America already has been made by liberal "progressive" educationists and politicians who have worked deceitfully to create "a new social order," who believe that capitalism is doomed and some form of socialism is desirable and inevitable, and that it is the business of the schools to help build a radically different collectivist form of society, whether fascist or communist. These advocates of socialism, followers of John Dewey and many other Keynesian-Fabian Socialists, would have the schools assume a propaganda function; indoctrination, not education, is their watchword. Children are to be prepared for participation in a collectivist order, and therefore the role of the school—from the nursery through the university—is to serve as “an agency” in revising procedures and curricula that will accomplish that end.

It was in 1933 that an important spokesman for the movement, Dr. George S. Counts, counselled the schools to “deliberately reach for power” and “to the extent that they are permitted to fashion the curriculum and procedures of the school they will definitely and positively influence the social attitudes, ideals, and behavior of the coming generation,” where “trust in Providence” must be replaced by “careful planning” and “private capitalism by some form of socialized economy.”

Now, after many years of such growth, PPBS offers its science and technology of business procedure to the human-social realms of health, education and welfare. Careful policy “planning,” “programming,” revision, and the irrefutable access to federal aid “budgeting,” come within closer reach than the socialist Frontier Thinkers ever envisioned.

And PPBS’s totalitarian potential offers this extension: the “democracy” of the teachers’ and the community’s efforts will be discarded when the PPBS “executive head” is ready to finalize the program of “1984” — only make it 1974!

All legislation and action to implement PPBS in the California school system should be repealed, and constant guard against passage of any changes in the law to establish PPBS should be maintained by concerned citizens and loyal legislators in Sacramento and Washington, lest the tooling for a “1984” machine gun is allowed to proceed under the guise of an innocent, baby-carriage budgeting system.

(End of article by Mrs. Ruth Spencer)

The preceding article concentrates on the situation in California, but exactly the same things—with variations depending upon the locale and temper of legislators—are going on in every State in the Union. There has been more exposure of PPBS, and more opposition to it, in the State of California because a group of very alert “school watchers” in that State were first in the Nation to discover a plot that was intended to remain a secret to all but those Planners who were active in socializing America, deceitfully and clandestinely.

California is spotlighted, too, because that State was chosen as a “project” area for the development and perfection of PPBS techniques. The system was developed at Rand Corporation, which is situated at Santa Monica, and under the alleged conservative leadership of Governor Reagan, it was easier and less questionable to transfer the locally-residing “experts” from Rand to State employment.

But the concerned citizens of all the States should feel grateful to that small band of California citizens and parents who spotted the PPBS plot and began doing their utmost to alert the rest of the Nation to the dangers inherent in PPBS.

Your editor wishes at this time to express his particular thanks to those who did the original research, and made available to us their findings, files and documentation. Our special gratitude is extended to Mrs. Marilyn Angle, Mrs. Virginia McNeil, Mrs. Ruth Spencer, the late Florence Fowler Lyons, Mrs. Mary Pohle, Joseph P. Bean, M.D., Gary North, and others whom we may have overlooked.

We mention these names because they have spoken out or written publicly against the evils of PPBS, and whom we can therefore thank publicly. Also — as we continue to shine the editorial spotlight on the use of PPBS as a political, economic and social weapon against school children, teachers, school administrators, parents and citizens of the Nation; we shall be more and more dependent upon the work that has been done by these Californians Against PPBS. The research and the data-gathering could never have been accomplished by one individual. We are proud to have become a kind of human “data bank” into which their combined efforts can be collated, and then channeled out to the concerned citizens of the entire Nation.

AN EDUCATIONAL REVOLUTION "WITHOUT THE BLOODBATH"?

There is today, in the literature concerning governmental reorganization, social and welfare reorganization, educational reorganization, and every other kind of reorganization, the constant recurrence of the word "revolution." Such use of the word has no reference to the Reds and other radicals who are attacking "the Establishment;" nor to those who are engaged in counter-revolution as ultra-conservatives. Rather, this use of the word "revolution" refers to those who are in high positions in Government (the Nixon Revolution, for example), and to those who are in positions of trust, who are responsible leaders, and who are quick to admit that they are "leading a revolution." An example of this in the educational field recently was brought to our attention: The UC News, issued weekly by the University of California, published the following in its issue of Feb. 8, 1972:

"EDUCATIONAL 'REVOLUTION' NEAR, SAYS UCR EXPERT"

"Riverside—Public education in the United States is headed for a revolution—a drastic change in who runs the schools, what is taught and who learns, a University of California, Riverside, educator believes.

"Dr. Laurence Iannaccone, a professor of education and administration at UC Riverside, and one of the nation's foremost experts on public education, said that change of a magnitude rivalling the transformations that took place in American education in the early 1900's, will occur before 1980.

"'There's no question that public education will undergo a revolution in the next ten years,' he said, 'The issue is how we are to avoid the bloodbath that may accompany it.'

"According to Iannaccone, the new concern about education has been magnified by changes in population, the electronic media, growing awareness of racial and ethnic issues, and by taxpayer dissatisfaction over mounting taxes. The solution, he says, is a complete restructuring of school organization, and a shift in funding responsibilities." (End of quotation; italics added).

His solution, in other words, is universal application of the method called Planning-Programming-Budgeting System (PPBS).

When PPBS is applied to education, it becomes especially difficult to dig through the layers of semantic confusion and planned word-camouflage, and get down to the basic dangers of the method. Therefore, it seems expedient, first, to define some of the more commonly used terms. This should make it easier to understand what will follow. The definitions are those used by Rand Corporation, by public administrators, and by the educationists who are promoting PPBS:

PLANNING, PROGRAMMING, BUDGETING SYSTEM (PPBS)—"A systematic approach to the allocation of limited resources for the accomplishment of priority objectives."

GOAL—"A statement of broad direction, general purpose, or intent. A goal is general and timeless."

OBJECTIVE—"A desired accomplishment which can be measured within a given time frame."

ALTERNATIVES—"Possible objectives and means of obtaining them."

SYSTEM—"A system involves many parts, or components, that operate independently and in combination to achieve stated goals or mission objectives."

PROGRAM—"A unique combination of personnel, facilities, equipment and supplies, which operate together to accomplish common objectives."

SYSTEM ANALYSIS (also called the Systems Approach, or Systems Management)—

"The process of evaluating the inputs, the costs, and the resources required of a program, as well as evaluating the outputs, the service, the benefits and the payoffs."

FUNCTIONAL ANALYSIS—"The technique of breaking down a mission into an organization of jobs or tasks performed."

TAXONOMY—Systematics, or Systems Analysis as applied to education; "The study of the general principles of scientific classification."

Concerning this last term "taxonomy"—About ten years ago a group of psychologists, behavioral scientists and educators under the leadership of Benjamin Bloom, came up with what they labeled "the taxonomy of educational objectives." By the probable process of merely enlarging on the original experimental findings of Ivan Petrovich Pavlov (who worked under the aegis of Joseph Stalin and the urging of Secret Police Chief Lavrentia Berea), Bloom and his associates classified the behavioral objectives of modern education into three categories, which they called cognitive, affective, and psychomotor.

Interpretation:

The cognitive domain in education is concerned with the gaining of knowledge, and with recall or memory.

The affective domain has to do with what the student believes, what his values and his attitudes are.

The psychomotor domain is concerned with what the student does or can do under certain stimuli; his motor performance.

More simply: Bloom's taxonomy classifies each student according to:

- 1) What he knows,
- 2) How he feels about it,
- 3) What he does about it.

The PPBS elite adopted and adapted Dr. Bloom's taxonomy and "the essence of the PPB System (as applied to education) is to be able to evaluate student performance in each of these three domains," declares Joseph P. Bean, M.D. "Therefore, behavioral objectives are written for each course to determine what the child learns (knows), what his attitudes are (feels) and what action he is able to take (does). The objectives pre-determine what knowledge is necessary or good, what attitudes the child should have, and what action is considered desirable. The right of parents to determine what values and attitudes they wish to develop is by-passed, and the objectives generate attitudes often inconsistent with those the parents prefer."

Dr. Bean was a member of the Glendale, California School Board, resigned because he found he could do nothing in that capacity to halt the flow of the "River of Pollution" which is the public education system in his State and in the United States. In a classic statement of resignation from the school board, Dr. Bean concluded with these words:

"... Only about ten percent of the decisions affecting school districts are made by the local board of education, the River of Education is too highly contaminated for this small fraction of influence to make an impression at the local level.

"When a new trustee is elected to a local board of education, he intends, of course, to represent the residents who elected him. But usually the new board member, within a matter of six weeks, finds himself representing the educational establishment instead of the residents. When parents come before the board to make requests, they are often treated rudely and as enemies of the board. Rarely will a board member continue to identify with the parents and to serve them and their children. With their districts 90% controlled by the federal and state governments, parents live under complete tyranny when their own local boards identify with the administrative staff instead of the people whom they were elected to represent.

"There is nothing new about attempts to control another person's behavior. Physical force has been used since just after man appeared on earth. However, the techniques of warfare more recently developed, have led to the invention of new weapons which relegate nuclear explosives to the category of the bow and arrow. It is generally agreed that of these new weapons (which include hypnosis, traditional psycho-therapy, behavior modifying drugs, brain surgery on the masses, enzyme inhibitors, and implanted electrodes in the brain) operant conditioning is the most specific and easiest of manipulation. Its implementation is being accomplished on hundreds of millions of persons on this planet at this moment.

"When you consider that the ultimate goal of warfare is the control of the behavior of the vanquished by the victor, we are therefore, in the greatest conflict in the history of mankind. Welcome to World War III."

All of these new weapons mentioned by Dr. Bean (plus others such as sensitivity training, sex education, the religion of humanism and data bank surveillance) have been integrated into and become a part of the vast arsenal of PPBS.

When the PPBS elite concentrates on the task of controlling human behavior, the emphasis is on the schools of the nation. The older generation—those on the other side of the alleged generation gap—are expendable and their number diminishes with the years. It is the more expedient course with these "wrongly educated grown-ups" not to convert but to coerce. The red tape of governmental restrictions and regulations, the oppression of income tax soul-scrutiny, fear of losing social security, health and welfare benefits, the pesterings of pettifogging bureaucrats; such weapons of coercion keep most of the "over thirty" group anxious to keep in line.

But with the youth there is the need for conversion to a new way of life. And forced education is the perfect vehicle when it is driven and directed by a PPB System which determines what each youth is to know, feel, and do.

The PPBS elite will, of course, insist that its design for the schools is merely to get the most out of every dollar spent; to make the teacher and the administrator accountable for the work he should do. Here is the way the designers of PPBS explain it:

"Let us suppose that a school spends a budgeted amount of money for a particular program. It is desirable to learn whether the dollars spent are producing the results expected. To determine the success of the program, behavioral or performance objectives for the class must be written down. The teacher then is to give the type of instruction which will enable the class to meet these written objectives, and within a given time block. Testing is then done to determine whether the students in the class actually did meet the written objectives. Thus, PPBS is merely a system of cost accounting, nothing more."

This is what the proponents of PPBS will tell you. Up to a point, they are correct; it is a system of cost accounting. But, it also is so very much more!

The programming, or taxonomy, has three parts: know, feel, and do. Under PPBS, the knowledge imparted is of a peculiar nature. Johnny can no longer read, write, spell, add or subtract satisfactorily; but he is given controlled amounts of certain scientific, technological, physiological, sociological, and political information. The academic is glossed over, the technical and professional are stressed; so that to know is to be prepared functionally for the new society.

In the "affective" (feel) domain, PPBS 'programs' the student with values and attitudes that are in conflict with his home training. And in the "action" (do) domain, he is programmed to political and social action, and to sexual action befitting an animal rather than a human being.

We appreciate Dr. Bean's description, because he was on the "inside" of the system long enough to observe it from the professional point of view. He writes:

"When the teacher (under PPBS) has completed an instructional unit and has tested the students, the test results are assigned symbols and computerized. The information flows to a regional data collection and processing center, one of several in each state. There a student profile is built for each student in the region. From this center the data flow to a large data bank serving one or more states (eventually, one of the ten federal regions into which the Nation has been divided—Ed.) In this master bank an enormous amount of information is permanently stored on each student.

"The Rand Corporation, which assisted with the theoretical construction of a PPB for schools, affirms that the entire responsibility for the PPBS operation must reside with one person at the top. 'No one at a lower level has the authority or the right or ability to acquire the knowledge required to perform the necessary tasks...' says Rand.

"After students have been evaluated for the first time to determine how well they have achieved the stated objectives, this programmer at the top will be in a position to modify, delete, or add to the objectives, to achieve a standardization of objectives for all classrooms in every school in any one subject. After three or four testings or evaluations, the programmer will no doubt have standardized the objectives for every classroom, and the usual decision-makers will be locked out of the process. The power of the programmer (the one man at the top) bypasses the board of education, the superintendent of the school, and the parents. Even the teacher, who is given a chance to write the first set of objectives, loses out because the teacher's power to influence the objectives will be removed by the programmer; the teacher will truly be a facilitator and a manager of the classroom, but not a teacher at all.

"After each child is programmed with the pre-determined knowledge, values, and potential skills, he will be standardized and averaged out, leveled off at a base-line of mediocrity. Subject matter as we know it will no longer exist and very few other aspects of education will remain. The more than forty million children in our nation's schools will be insensitive and unnatural, and will be capable of only highly directive behavior, each holding identical points of view.

"Educators wishing to initiate the use of behavioral objectives in a school district first set the stage for their operations. The use of objectives is a means of creating change in the district, and the persons responsible for the change process are called change agents. Change agency is a sociological mechanism now widely used in education. Strategies for initiating and managing the change process are taught in seminars to future change agents.

"The change agent first deliberately subjects the school or district to disequilibrium and sets in motion the forces necessary to change and re-direct the school. When the intended state of disequilibrium has been achieved, the system is said to be unfrozen. To crystallize the institutional thrust in a new direction, i.e. to re-freeze the system, behavioral objectives in the three domains (know, feel, do) are written. The objectives reflect the new direction (new methods, course content, point of view, values and desired ends) for the school....

"Under PPBS management, the information input to the student will be limited; random encounter in the learning process will be eliminated; instruction will be highly prescribed; and programming toward a particular ideological, philosophical, political and social point of view will be the chief characteristic of the system.

"The greatest threat to human freedom which faces man today is a new system of weapons for mind control. Man has always been subject to enslavement by force or by economics. The technological (including chemical) mechanisms now perfected provide a new dimension in enslavement, mind control, which will dwarf the first two....

"PPBS has evolved out of a long history of developments through research in psychology, sociology, economics, mathematics, anthropology and political science. Planned Programming and Budgeting was developed from 1956-63 by Charles Hitch at the Rand Corporation in Santa Monica with federal funds. It is considered an achievement in political science, rather than an advance in economics. It is described by sociologists as a political administrative technique. Think about that when your school superintendent, principal or teacher tells you it is an improved format for accounting."

For those who want to know "who" is responsible for this mind control enslavement of the public schools, here is a bit of evidence: When the California Department of Education began working (over three years ago) on a PPBS operational model for all California schools, the international accounting firm of Peat, Marwick and Mitchell was engaged to develop the model.

The Senior Partner of this international firm is Walter E. Hansen, who is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, as well as a member of the United Nations Association of the United States.

As for the place of PPBS in the world government concept, the following quotation from Science Magazine, Feb. 1971, should tell the story:

"The cost-benefit analysis (planned programming and budgeting) of Charles Hitch, when employed at Rand Corporation in Santa Monica, California, has been listed as a political social science innovation by scholars, along with other innovations designated 'Pol' to include Lenin's theory of one-party organization and revolution, the Fabian Socialist movement of gradual transformation toward socialism, Gandhi's large-scale nonviolent political action in India, and Mao Tse-tung's peasant and guerrilla organization and government."

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

----- Part Thirteen -----

THE INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATE AND THE MAZE OF RAMIFICATIONS

"At a PTA meeting at North Hollywood High School on March 14, 1972," writes a California parent, "Dr. William Johnson, Superintendent of the Los Angeles School District, was questioned about the school district's commitment to the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System (PPBS), and what progress had been made so far. He responded:

"Myself and (J) Graham Sullivan have been meeting with Roy Ash to ask how does a large business cope with PPBS.' He stated he also 'had three-hour meetings with Tom Jones, president and chairman of Northrup Corporation, and additionally with Al V. Casey, president of the Times-Mirror Corporation, to ask how do you plan, program and budget an enterprise like the Los Angeles School District.' He also compared the L.A. School District's Decentralization to the methods used by Litton Industries."

Roy Ash, who was consulted on how to apply PPBS to the L.A. school system, has been mentioned previously in this series of letters. He is president of Litton Industries, a multinational conglomerate which reported a loss of $14.23 million in one quarter of a fiscal year, after a loss of $8.8 million the previous quarter—both losses occurring after Litton Industries had adopted performance budgeting (another name for PPBS.)

Roy Ash also served as chairman of the President's Advisory Council on Executive Organization, which recommended a major restructuring of federal departments and agencies during Mr. Nixon's first term as President. It was this Ash Commission that recommended the creation of the Domestic Council, the new White House Office of Management and Budget, the setting up of the Ten Regional Governments, the restructuring of the Cabinet Departments, etc. All of these reorganization measures were taken (or were to be taken when Congress approved) in order to install PPBS in every phase of Federal Government on a program basis.

The President carried out most of the Ash Commission's recommendations by Executive Order, but there were some recommendations on which Congressional approval was felt necessary at that time (1970).

Now, however, being "mandated" by the people to carry out the reorganization, the President has decided that he will, if necessary, defy Congress and complete the restructuring recommendations of the Ash Commission.

Hence, when the President retired to Camp David with Henry Kissinger, George Shultz, John Ehrlichman, and others, he called on Roy Ash to "help him decide how to reorganize the executive branch." Ash, according to the Wall Street Journal of Nov. 14, 1972, "is spending a week in Washington conferring with H. R. Haldeman, the White House chief of staff, and John Ehrlichman, Mr. Nixon's assistant for domestic affairs." After which conference they all joined the President at Camp David, where the reorganization plans were finalized. And then came the President's announcement:

Roy Ash would become the new head of the White House Office of Management and Budget, a position created by Roy Ash himself, and now to be occupied by Roy Ash himself; a position equal in power and importance to those positions held by Henry Kissinger as Commissar for External Affairs and by Arthur Burns as Commissar for Monetary and Credit Control.

At the same time, Nixon announced the transfer of two other key figures in the PPBS Revolution. Casper Weinberger would move from OMB to HEW, and Elliot Richardson would be shifted from HEW to DoD.

However, a significant fact should be stressed in this connection: The appointment of Cabinet heads must have the "consent and approval" of Congress; while the President's White House Executive Office Staff has been set up as a new branch of government over which the Congress has no control whatsoever. Cabinet heads must appear before Congressional Committees when summoned, to explain and defend their policies, expenditures, proposed budgets, etc. But White House Executive Office Staffmen such as Kissinger, Haldeman, Ehrlichman, and now Roy Ash, can claim a newly discovered immunity called "executive privilege", and both ignore and defy Congress. This is why Nixon, during his first term and on the advice of this same Roy Ash, began to transfer actual decision-making from Cabinet heads to the chiefs of various pre-existing or newly created White House Executive Office bureaus and agencies such as Kissinger's National Security Council, Ash's Office of Management and Budget, the White House Communications Agency, Ehrlichman's Domestic Council, The Council of Economic Advisers, the Council on Environmental Quality, the Office of Consumer Affairs, the Office of Science and Technology, the Office of Intergovernmental Relations, and National Aeronautics and Space Council, the Council on International Economic Policy, etc. These matters, in the past, would have been handled by the appropriate Cabinet Department. But, to divorce them entirely from any Congressional control (and, therefore, from any citizen control), special agencies were created and given "executive immunity." This latter is an essential element of the PPB System, because "the entire operation must be the personal responsibility of the executive head of the organization" and any Congressional—or people—control would interfere with the totalitarian nature of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System.

Already it will have been observed that the new OMB Commissar is one of the chief theoreticians and organizers of the Nixon Revolution, the "game plan" of which is PPBS. However great or small the particular "program," be it the reorganization of a single school district, or the setting up of a "World Corporation," Roy Ash is the "expert"—even though his conglomerate is said to be a money-loser (at least for taxing purposes.) But, let's learn more about Roy Ash: He's been drawing a salary of $195,000 a year as president of Litton. He'll give that up for a $42,500 salary as OMB chieftain. He'll also sell his 200,000 shares of stock in Litton for an estimated $2.5 million—a good deal if Litton actually is losing so much money after having installed the PPB System in the multinational conglomerate. Ash also is a director of the world-spanning Bank of America, the Bank-America Corporation, the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, and Global Marine, Incorporated. He received indoctrination at Harvard, then at California Institute of Technology. He is a member of the board of trustees at Caltech, along with such other promoters of PPBS as Tom Jones of Northrup, Robert S. McNamara of the World Bank, Robert Anderson of Atlantic Richfield, Robert Hansberger of Boise Cascade Corporation, Rudolph Peterson of the Bank of America, Simon Ramo of TRW, Inc., Thomas J. Watson, Jr. of IBM, etc. . . .

These men have succeeded in restructuring Caltech and in making it a real training base for PPBS operatives. An indication of this is contained in an article appearing in Caltech, the alumni publication, for May-June 1971. Under the heading "Creating the Next Discipline," eleven members of the engineering and science division faculty of Caltech "lay it on the line." Quotes: "We're a technological society and to effect change you have to understand science."

"Arms control and security problems are examples of the kinds of social problems we at Caltech should try to deal with; and in an environment that is highly skilled technically and scientifically, we ought to be able to get a line on such practical problems. This particular interest is expressed at present in our connection with the Southern California Arms Control and Foreign Policy Seminar, which Caltech and RAND Corporation jointly sponsor. Last year the Ford Foundation gave a three-year grant of $285,000 to enable RAND and Caltech to bring together people who are interested in these matters."

In Part One of this series of letters, we quoted extensively from a speech made by Roy Ash before California business men, in a meeting sponsored by the White House staff, the Department of Commerce, and the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce, on March 18, 1972. In that speech Ash predicted the formation of a world economic community by 1990. He stated that the age of national economies is at an end, will become obsolete within the next two decades. This, mind you, is the statement of the man who is to be in complete and absolute control of all "performance budgeting" of all Federal, State, and local "programs"!

He will be in the powerful position of being able to make his own predictions come true. Even more indicative of the world-mindedness of Roy Ash was a speech he made at the 1969 Awards Luncheon of the School of Business Administration of the University of California. Following are excerpts.

THE WORLD CORPORATION

In its first stages the World Corporation is even now evolving de facto—in the actual practice by a very few but increasing number of companies. In its ultimate form the World Corporation will, in law, be just that—a corporation chartered not by one country, but by a supra-national chartering agency established by agreement among nations.

...The World Corporation will be a new species. Its perspective will be different; its philosophy—if you could call it that—will be different. It will consider the whole of the world its productive place, as well as its market, and will move factors of production to wherever they can most effectively be combined... Its ownership will be transnational, its management will be transnational. Its freely mobile management, technology and capital, today's agents for stepped up economic growth, will transcend individual national boundaries. In practice, it will be devoid of any single national identity or home; figuratively, its headquarters could be on the moon. It will be domestic every place, foreign in none—a true corporate citizen of the world....

There will be many obstacles to the establishment and operation of a true World Corporation; it must proceed in stages. A first step, ~~now made possible by enterprising managers of capital and of investment and banking systems,~~ is the internationalization of business ownership. Even more important to the development of the global mentality, or culture, that must precede the World Corporation will be the step toward multinational management of companies—the integration of diverse nationalities from the board of directors level down through the corporate officers and operating management. This is perhaps the single most important key to the development of the World Corporation plus its contribution to the ultimate unity of the earth's peoples.... The issues to be faced and resolved as World Corporations emerge more fully... will tax the wisdom of heads of state, diplomats, bankers, economists, educators and several regiments of experts on international law. It will be necessary to unravel countless issues involving national sovereignty, regulatory ~~cases~~ ^{cases}, monetary systems and exchange... The peoples of the world are conditioned by nationalistic thinking. Just contemplating the existence of organizations that transcend national boundaries is frightening to some... (but) "Nothing can stop an idea whose time has come.... (and) historically economic unity has been a major force for political unity. (End of quotation).

Roy Ash "has been where the action is" in helping to develop world "economic unity" and now he is in a position to help develop world "political unity," or World Government through the development of World Corporations.

But this multinationalist who will be in one of the world's most powerful nationalist offices, appointed by a President who is intent upon converting our Government into a Corporation; this PPBS expert who is equally at home telling a superintendent how to run a school district, or telling a President how to run a Nation has somewhat against himself when it comes to running a Corporation by means of PPBS.

As of this writing, Roy Ash is president as well as co-founder of Litton Industries. In regard to the activities of that Corporation, there is considerable well-founded speculation. Senator William Proxmire, from Wisconsin, is a liberal, an Atlantic Union enthusiast (as is President Nixon), and has won much fame—or notoriety, depending upon one's point of view—from his unceasing championing of the United Nations Genocide Convention. He is, however, an opponent of waste and extravagance in Government, and is outspoken in regard to the "military-industrial" complex which grew up out of PPBS-minded McNamara's handling of Defense Department contracts with equally PPBS-minded industrial concerns, which led to exposure of the "military-industrial" complex and such strange deals as that of Lockheed.

In line with these continuing military-industrial complex shenanigans, Sen. Proxmire demanded an investigation of Litton Industries and its boss and cofounder, Roy Ash. On June 26, 1972, Proxmire reported to his Senate colleagues:

"I have asked the Securities and Exchange

Commission, the General Accounting Office, and the Navy to investigate the financial capability of Litton Industries to complete performance of its Government contracts. I have also asked Navy Secretary John W. Warner, in a letter I am releasing today, to reject proposals by Litton that the Navy pay inflated and unsubstantiated claims and take other actions in order to help the company solve its financial difficulties.

"It is becoming increasingly clear that Litton is unable to perform any of its major shipbuilding contracts without running up huge cost overruns. Litton's $450 million worth of shipbuilding claims against the Navy must be seen as an attempt to shift the costs of its own inadequacies to the American taxpayer.

"Litton executives, from the president on down, have been meeting almost daily with Navy officials in an effort to obtain a bailout from its financial plight.

"Because of Litton's cash shortages, the huge cost overruns, schedule delays, and technical difficulties encountered on its shipbuilding programs, a shadow has been cast over two of the largest ship contracts awarded in recent years.

"Litton is now 2 years behind schedule on the LHA contract and there is a serious question as to whether Litton is capable of building even the first LHA ship. The LHA contract has already been delayed with adverse effects to the DD-963 destroyer program and Litton may also be unable to deliver on that contract.

"Litton has given the Navy grounds for declaring the LHA contract in default, and continued failure to take corrective action on the Navy's part could increase the cost to the taxpayers by hundreds of millions of dollars. If the Navy does not pay the unsubstantiated portion of Litton's claims, the company could face a financial crisis of major proportions in the near future.

"For these reasons, I have asked the Securities and Exchange Commission to tell me whether Litton's annual reports correctly state the company's earnings. ... I have also asked the Commission to state whether Litton's reporting methods comply with SEC rules and regulations. ... I have asked the General Accounting Office to conduct an independent investigation of Litton's financial capability to carry out its Government contracts." (End of quotation)

The LHA contract involved the building of nine amphibious assault boats; due to the complaints of Sen. Proxmire and others, the order was cut down from nine to five boats; but Litton is 26 months behind on delivery of the boats. The DD-963 contract was for 30 new destroyers, which critics say cannot be delivered on time because Litton's shipbuilding facilities are choked with overdue LHAs. The original contracts were worth more than $3 billion, but delays and cost adjustments, says Litton, has raised the amount by $550 million more.

"In the light of this performance," says AP as of Nov. 30, "Litton's common stock has moved down from a high of $26 per share to less than $13."

Clark Hoyt, Washington correspondent for the Knight newspaper chain, opines that "Litton has encountered serious production difficulties at its Pascagoula (Miss.) yard, when it tried for the first time in the United States to apply assembly line techniques to the old art of shipbuilding."

Correction please: Assembly line techniques in shipbuilding were applied in World War II. What Hoyt should have said was: "Litton encountered difficulties when it tried to apply PPBS techniques to shipbuilding."

As we have noted previously: Rolls Royce and Edsel motor cars have tried PPBS and found it wanting; Lockheed and Litton tried PPBS and it cost the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars; Penn Central couldn't make it work economically or efficiently; George Romney threw up his hands and resigned because PPBS wouldn't work for HUD; Mayor Lindsay tried it out in the city government, and New York City is in worse trouble than ever before; likewise the New York City school system, into which Ford Foundation president McGeorge Bundy injected PPBS.

If PPBS is neither efficient nor economical, there has to be another reason for the appointment of Roy Ash as chief of OMB.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

. Part Fourteen

THE TOTALITY OF THE TAKEOVER

In The American Nightmare (Macmillan Co.) author Sidney J. Slomich, who calls himself an "expert," warns that America should beware of experts.

"I have been an expert," writes Slomich, "and I can tell you that experts gone wild—and they have—are like cancer. They know only one thing: more, more, more of the same. Nothing is more expert than cancer, nothing is a better example of power without purpose. Cancer is ignorant, but, oh, it works, it grows. . . ."

"An expert sees his small piece of reality and little else. He confuses understanding with control and makes of the latter his single virtue. One of our leading social scientists has said that the chief accomplishment of this age is to have changed so many political problems into technical ones. We see in Vietnam, as at Auschwitz, the result of technical solutions to political problems."

Slomich certainly qualifies as an "expert's expert." Bachelor's, master's, and Ph. D. from Harvard University where he studied federal and municipal government in America, political philosophy, international law, Russian history, the Soviet economy, and international relations. He did research work for the Army in Czechoslovakia, spent a number of years as an officer of the CIA, worked on strategic problems, including Vietnam, in Army think tanks—among them the Research Analysis Corporation, was with that Arms Control and Disarmament Study Group at Caltech which was mentioned in our preceding letter (No. 13) in this series. In short, Sidney J. Slomich knows just about all there is for an insider to know about the subject of this series: Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS). He has published advanced technological studies on its application to urban affairs, served as a consultant to groups installing PPBS, etc.

"In 1964," writes Slomich, "I sat in disbelief in a Washington think tank, listening to a very well-financed Army proposal to develop a computerized electronic warning system to alert the Pentagon when a Latin American country was likely to go "Red," and—the system having been perfected on paper—to rent a whole Latin American country and army to test it out. This stupid and unbelievably naive project was the product of Ph.D.s, men who call themselves and are called scientists. When this project was discovered by Chileans who observed some strangely behaving researchers, it hit the press and was investigated by Congress (Project Camelot—Ed.) . . . This is a particularly apt, yet typical, example of the allegedly scientific thinking that lies behind Vietnam and all the horrors it has brought to roost in this country and all over the world."

Now, please read carefully the following warning given by "retired PPBS expert" Sidney Slomich:

"...over the last generation, especially the last 15 years, the United States—at home and abroad—has been preoccupied, not with human life and its purpose, but with ignorant power and control—that is to say with death—and has become, along with the Soviet Union, as a colleague in mindless adversity, the planet's greatest polluter, an agent of potentially total repression, and the greatest threat to continued human life the world has ever faced. I do not like to say these things, but one must speak plainly. There is a monster on our chest. . . ."

In a previous letter in this series we indicated that governmental use of PPBS really began with the post-war Marshall Plan and its extension to include foreign aid to Western Europe and then to practically the whole world, which we volunteered to rebuild. And in this connection, we have been referred to an article by Melchior Palyi—a bona fide rather than an alleged expert in his field, which is finance and economics—that appeared in the Commerical and Financial Chronicle, May 7, 1970. His explanation and description of the workings of PPBS in post-war France, and its essential "input-output-model" will help to clarify some points in this difficult-to-describe PPBS complexity.

Centralized Planning was the fashionable thing in Western Europe at the end of World War II (except in Germany that "needed" it most, but became the greatest success without Planners.) France was in the grips of what was called Programming — the Russian Planned Economy without Communism. Presently France still has a Planning Ministry which is in the process of elaborating the Sixth Plan. France did not abolish central planning as Communist Yugoslavia did, but the French enthusiasm evaporated; business shrugs it off; the public pays scant attention to the whole thing; Labor virtually ignores it.

The French System

Planning, or Programming, must be based on forecasts. The forecasts of the French experts invariably turned out to be wide of the mark. This was true, especially also, of what became known as the "input-output-models," which were essential for their blueprints. The principle underlying these forecasting devices is very simple: the "input" of one industry corresponds to the "output" of another industry. If we know the former, the problem of how much the latter should produce is resolved automatically.

The French planning bureaucracy would call in, say, the country's car producers; each of them would estimate the number of cars of each make and size it would produce the next year (and beyond). Given these data, the steel requirement of the automobile industry can be calculated. Do the same for construction, machine tool, transportation equipment and all other major industries. The total is the steel "input" which should be equaled by the steel "output"—provided that the steel-consumers did not misjudge the prospects. But it is a virtual certainty that they will make serious miscalculations. In some under-developed countries, India in particular, such errors of judgment led to very serious wasting of capital, their scarcest resource.

How, indeed, could the experts foresee unexpected changes in consumer tastes, shifts in the channels of foreign trade, or new developments in technology? Such changes may annul in short order all advance input-output calculations. The greatest weakness of these ambitious calculations is, however, that they refer to physical quantities, not to values. But in reality, unit costs, prices, dollar volume of sales and profit margins are the overriding considerations. French programming tried to combine the best of both worlds: of centralized Soviet planning and of decentralized competitive American enterprise. It went on the rocks of the French inflation that has upset costs, and everything else.

Input/output constructions belong in the category of econometric models (econometrics is "the application of statistical methods to the study of economic data and problems—Ed.); and scarcely anyone is more critical of the validity of such models than the econometricians themselves.

Generally, they believe that no better than 50 per cent accuracy can be expected, a modest ambition indeed. If it is correct, the usefulness of the method for practical purposes is restricted to special cases.

Nevertheless, input-output analysis has a place of its own, if on a limited scale only, especially so within individual firms—wherever sudden and frequent changes in the underlying conditions are not expected....

Note what Dr. Palyi refers to as the greatest weakness of the French Planning, Programming System: It tried to combine centralized Soviet Planning with decentralized competitive free enterprise. The Soviet system is concerned with physical quantity; but the free enterprise system also must consider quality and consumer approval. When the French Planners tried to institute Planned Economy without coercive Communism, they brought on runaway inflation, and their plans ended with chaos.

Here in the United States, the Planners added to Planned Programming, the new concept of Performance Budgeting; but the Planners arrived at the same dead end: runaway inflation. And — control methods which already had been made applicable to every federal department and agency, President Nixon was forced to do the one thing he swore he would never do: set up a system of price and wage controls!

PPBS must be based on forecasts; for it is a system devised to control the future. But forecasts are inaccurate unless all elements are constant and unless unexpected changes can be prevented. In other words, if PPBS is applied to the production of automobiles, not only must the building of the cars be "predestinated" by the Planners, but so must their price, their quality and their saleability be "predestinated," and all of these with reasonable accuracy. Otherwise, the result is an "Edsel."

Conclusion: Since the Planners have determined that the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System is the method of the future, and since PPBS and free enterprise are not compatible, therefore controlled economy is the New Order for the New Society.

However, we shall not have a Planned Economy with Communism; for the United States the Planners have "predestinated" that we shall have a Planned Economy with Corporate Socialism, commonly called Fascism.

Now, let us note Dr. Palyi's last quoted paragraph: "Nevertheless, input-output analysis has a place of its own, if on a limited scale only; especially so within individual firms—wherever sudden and frequent changes are not expected."

In other words, PPBS might work within an individual firm, but it is impractical and inefficient when applied on an universal basis. And this is where PPBS carries the seed of its own destruction, because the Planners have ordered the application of PPBS to anything and everything: not only to every area of government, but to every aspect of the private sector as well. Using their own source material in proof of this:

In "A Rand Corporation-Sponsored Research Study," entitled Program Budgeting . . ., and edited by David Novick, on page XII, 5th paragraph from the top, we read:

"This book concentrates on the program aspects of the budget. It purposefully avoids problems of fiscal policy, revenue, and related issues in order to explain in greater detail than would otherwise be possible the theory of program budgeting; and it presents a limited number of illustrative examples of how this concept, now applied in the Department of Defense, might be adapted to other areas of the Federal Government. (Implicitly, the concept is also proposed for state and local government and for private business.)

"Thus, when such special subjects as education and transportation are considered in terms of program budgeting, the treatment is intended to be suggestive only and to stimulate research rather than to report on a completed study." (Italics added—Ed.)

On page 70 of the same book:

"Increased emphasis in the Department of Defense on systematic planning and programming will undoubtedly have a profound effect on industry."

Page 71 indicates the necessity for the destruction of the present Congressional System because the Constitutional limitation on appropriations (two years only) interferes with PPBS long-range budgeting:

"Though accepting the new process as an essential tool of planning, and even claiming some credit for its adoption, the House Appropriations Committee still wanted the budget format left unchanged. It is of course, a virtue of the new process that it does not require a change in budget format. Planning and programming are simply superimposed of the budget, and govern its substance, although not its form. The relationship is explicitly stated in the House Appropriations Committee report: 'Basically, each annual appropriations bill is simply an additional annual increment to the longer range Defense program.'

"The need for an extended budgetary time horizon was recognized in a study of the federal budget by the staff of the Subcommittee on Economic Statistics of the Joint Economic Committee. The generalized use of cost-benefit relationships was advocated as a means of achieving better budgets.

"In the Executive establishment, the Bureau of the Budget is encouraging the Departments and Agencies to plan, program, and budget on a longer range basis. The Bureau of the Budget, the Department of the Treasury, and the Council of Economic Advisers are cooperating in preparing longer term economic projections."

Explanation: The House of Representatives is charged with the responsibility of initiating all appropriations bills. Since the life of a Congress is but two years, the power of a Congress to appropriate money is also limited (Constitutionally, that is) to a two-year period. Otherwise, the new incoming Congress (and the people it represents) would lose control over federal spending. Thus, Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution of the United States reads: "The Congress shall have power... To raise and support armies: but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years:"

PPBS requires long-term appropriations; and for that reason the Congress and the people it represents lose all control over federal spending.

We call your attention to another publication entitled "The Computer in American Education," edited by Don. D. Bushnell of the Brooks Foundation, Dwight W. Allen of Stanford University, with Sara S. Mitter as Editorial Associate; commissioned by The Association for Educational Data Systems; and published by John Wiley and Sons, Inc.

On page 5 of this document, in reference to the use of PPBS (and the computer) in social engineering, we are told:

"Another factor that is extraordinarily and radically important to this set of relationships will be the increasing effectiveness and utilization of what we call social engineering: the systematic application of knowledge in economics and social and behavioral sciences to the design, planning, and manipulation of the society and its parts in order to attain efficiently specified goals. The stimulus is there, especially with the development of such nationwide activities as the poverty program, the extended education legislation, and—while we don't talk about it—the area of counterinsurgency. In all these instances we must be able to plan exceedingly complex programs far enough in advance to phase and operate them effectively...." (Italics added—Ed.)

Please note that "what we call social engineering" in the United States is called "psychopolitics" in Soviet Russia. It has to do with mind control and suppression of dissent; and for these purposes, Russia recently purchased some 15,000 computers. The publication from which we have just quoted, states that in "social engineering" the computer "provides an unprecedentedly powerful tool for better understanding men and their institutions, and hence for planning and for implementation of these plans."

Just as the constantly recurring "Five Year Plans" have been the absolute controlling factor of life in the Soviet Union, the more sophisticated Planning, Programming, Budgeting System is to control all factors of life in the New Society, in the new United Socialist States of America. How PPBS is insinuated into state and local government is explained in a research report on "The Application of Systems Technology to Problems of State and Local Government," by Robert L. Johnson of the Stanford Research Institute, Menlo Park, California. We are told (page 10) that:

"The increasing and accelerating centralization of executive, legislative, and judicial authority in Washington has created new and complex problems at the other levels of government. These impacts are especially critical at the local government level, where the demands for federal program supervision, monitoring, or documentation often exceed staff capabilities; and where significant and revolutionary changes must be made in local fiscal management systems (both budgeting and accounting) to satisfy federal program participation standards.

"Mandatory implementation of the Defense Department's Planning, Programming, and Budgeting System (PPBS) in all federal agencies and of the military Program Evaluation and Review Technique (PERT) as a requirement for other agencies' major industrial contracts, as well as the voluntary participation of a number of state governments in the Federal Information Exchange System (FIXS) have had a waterfall effect on local governments. These activities have imposed new information requirements (for local management of federally-financed programs, as well as for reporting program progress and status).

"(Therefore) the federal pattern (PPBS) is becoming the standard for management systems design throughout the government structure." (PPBS has become mandatory with the passage of the so-called Revenue Sharing Act).

PPBS, the monster with the computer for a brain, is the Big Brother who will be watching your every move.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

. Part Fifteen

THE RIDDLE WITHIN THE ENIGMA

In its most elemental and least confusing sense the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) is a rather complicated and highly developed method of Political and Economic Planning (PEP), the system by which the United Kingdom was socialized. PEP was developed by the British Fabian society, was transplanted in the United States during the New Deal Era. It remained for the RAND Corporation to make the system more sophisticated through the application of scientific and technological advances, especially the Computer and the Data, or Memory Bank.

It has been brought to our attention that the English historian, science fiction writer and Fabian Socialist, H. G. Wells, gave an excellent description of the machinery by which PPBS was to be manufactured, as early as 1908, in his book New Worlds for Old. He wrote:

"It was left chiefly to the little group of English people who founded the Fabian Society to supply a third system of ideas to the amplifying conception of Socialism, to convert Revolutionary Socialism to Administrative Socialism. . . . From saying that unorganized people cannot achieve Socialism, they passed to the implication that organization alone, without popular support, might achieve Socialism.

"... Socialism ceased to be an open revolution, and became a plot. Functions were to be shifted quietly, unostentatiously, from the representative to the official he appointed. . . . they worked like a ferment in municipal politics. . . . The reconstruction of our legislative and local government machinery is a necessary preliminary to Socialisation in many directions. . . . Scientific reconstruction of our methods of government constitutes a necessary part of the Socialist scheme . . . it supplies us with a conception of the methods of transition, and with a vision of a great and disciplined organization of officials, a scientific bureaucracy, appointed by representative bodies of diminishing activity and importance and coming at last to be the real working control of the Socialist state . . . the replacement of individual actions by public organization."

It was in the early 1930s, according to an official U.S. Senate report (Interlocking Subversion in Government Departments, by the Subcommittee on Internal Security, July 30, 1953), when:

"A plague of young lawyers settled on Washington. . . these prattlers were for the most part employees of the government, and had taken the oath of allegiance. But they took the position that their high purpose gave them a super-morality that could not be confused with the morality the nation had been using. They were quite above such old-fogy Tory, reactionary stuff as oaths of office or other religious antiquities. They owed allegiance — not to the United States — patriotism was for the non-thinking. . . They had an allegiance to a higher cause. The end justified the means. . . ."

These young braintrusters had the United States on the verge of collapse when World War II was started in order to make the world safe for Communism; and their Political and Economic Planning had to be delayed while military and logistical planning were the primary necessities of existence. Immediately at the conclusion of the shooting phase of World War II, the Political, Economic and Social Planning began anew. Lyndon Johnson explained the hiatus in planning when, within a month after becoming President of the United States, he went before the United Nations General Assembly to tell that body:

"When I entered the Congress of the United States 27 years ago, it was my great privilege to work closely with President Franklin Delano Roosevelt... As a member of Congress, I worked with him to bring about a profound but peaceful revolution... Now, on the world scale, the time has come, as it came to America, thirty years ago..." (Congressional Record, Dec. 20, 1963.)

In point of fact, nearly two decades before LBJ made that statement, the word had gone forth from the Plotters to the Planners, to pick up where the New Deal had left off, apply new scientific and technological discoveries to the old PEP methods, and call it the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) - or, to give it a more understandable name: Administrative Socialism - Socialism "by organization, without popular support," (the popular support to come later, as a result of education and indoctrination).

Back in 1958, when this editor first issued the booklet Terrible 1313 (long out of print and now a collector's item), we gave the following formula which was being used to promote Urban Renewal, Metro Government, Regional Government, etc.:

1. Create an "emergency" and popularize the existence of such an "emergency."
2. Present to the public a previously prepared plan that was designed to meet the "created emergency" and solve all the problems created by the "emergency."
3. Publicize, propagandize, form public action groups of "interested citizens" to promote the idea that this previously prepared plan is the only way the problems resulting from the "created emergency" can be solved or resolved.
4. Yield to "popular demand" and enact the necessary law, statute, regulation, or ordinance, in order to put into effect the "previously prepared plan" to solve the problems resulting from the "created emergency."

PPBS, while still utilizing the above formula whenever it is required, has developed a far more sophisticated formula, which we have called the "riddle within the enigma." We'll try to explain:

The "enigma" of PPBS has been explained in previous letters in this series, and deals with the mystery of how PPBS is used as a method for creating a new political, social and economic order for America, and for the world.

But there remains the deeper riddle, of how individuals and the people as a whole are to be re-educated and remade so that they will enter contentedly and even happily into this state of slavery which is called the New Order.

When referring to tangibles (manufactured products, materials and natural resources, man-hours, services, etc) PPBS has one set of meanings:

PLANNING:-Determining the final goal or end product, which is done through forecasting by "experts" who use the "Delphi technique" to decide what the final goal or end product is to be.

PROGRAMMING:-Immediate steps to be taken which will work toward the accomplishment of the final goal or end product.

BUDGETING:-The "power of the purse" applied to the programming. If the program does not contribute toward attainment of the final goal or end product, then the budget is not approved and money to implement the program is withheld. (In the final analysis, this means that the director of the Office of Management and Budget (Roy Ash at this writing) has become a virtual dictator).

The preceding is the "enigma" of PPBS, the meaning of the acronym when applied to tangibles.

But now for the riddle within the enigma, or the meaning of PPBS when applied to the intangibles such as education, mind control, behaviorism, even religion. Here PPBS takes on an entirely different meaning:

PLANNING equals UNFREEZING:-

"Unfreezing" is the term used by the experts to denote what the layman might refer to as "brainwashing;" the wiping out of all pre-conceived (frozen) ideas, concepts, beliefs, fixations, prejudices, absolutes such as truth, the sense of right and wrong, etc. In the case of schoolchildren "unfreezing" includes the elimination of all family influence, all Christian training, etc., so that an entirely new set of "values" can be implanted in the youthful mind.

PROGRAMMING equals RE-EDUCATING:-

After all the old concepts and beliefs have been erased (unfrozen) and the mind has become a "clean white sheet of paper on which the man re-makers may write what they will; then this "re-education" becomes the "programming" which is intended to fit man for the man-made World of Tomorrow (to use a phrase made famous by the Armstrongs-father and son-who have spent their lives in an attempt to make Christianity synonymous with Humanism.)

When applied to the schools, this re-education phase involves the 'taxonomic domains' which we explained in a previous letter in this series: (a) Cognitive (how one should think); (b) Affective (how one should feel); and (c) Psychomotor (how one should act).

BUDGETING equals REFREEZING:—

This is the "end accomplished," the new man in the new world; a man-made being forming the smallest unit in a Total Managed Global Society in a Government of the People, by the Experts, for the Elite.

Please note that in explaining this "riddle within the enigma" that is PPBS, we have concentrated primarily on its application to the field of education in the public schools. However, this "Unfreezing, Re-Educating, Refreezing" system applies to all government programs and especially in education's companion areas: health and welfare. But, we believe it is easier to understand (and certainly easier to explain) this riddle, if we confine our discussion to the field of education for the remainder of this letter.

The "Parents of New York United" are understandably concerned with the introduction of PPBS into the public schools of New York State. In a very important letter written to Donald H. Bragaw of the State Education Department by Janet Mellon, the State Chairman of PONY-U, Inc., a case in point is made. We quote from that letter:

The Humanists state that one of the aims of Humanist World Fellowship is the advancement of the good life on the basis of a morality determined by historical human experience and contemporary scientific research; and Humanism insists that man be treated as an end in himself. For, say Humanists, all things must be made subservient to the fullest development of the potentialities of human nature as the Supreme End of all endeavor. This is total denial of God and, as the United States Supreme Court has ruled, this is a religion without God (and) this is precisely what is contained in the social studies as spelled out ... as the method of teaching in our State schools today.

"Man: A Course of Study" (M:ACOS) program is being introduced into schools... and that or similar programs are being put into all schools in the State and Nation. It is well known in professional educator and behavioral scientist circles, that before the "Planning, Programming, Budgeting System" can be put into operation, the curriculum had to be rewritten into behavioral objectives; these 3 categories being: Cognitive, Affective, and Psychomotor... The essence of the PPB system is to be able to test or evaluate students in each of the 3 domains... The objectives pre-determine what knowledge is necessary or good, what attitude the child should have, and what action is considered desirable...

M:ACOS was designed to break down, or unfreeze, the child's values and standards, changing the child by giving him different standards and a different conception of who he is, and refreezing, to lock the child into the new self...

Have you looked at or examined the social science studies books being used in New York public schools lately? ... "Shaping the Western World," for instance, puts an emphasis not only on religion and world government, but states that Nationalism is a Religion. It also states that the holy days are the Fourth of July, Christmas, May Day. The shrines are the wailing wall, Lenin's tomb, and the tomb of the unknown soldier.

"Our children will live in yet another 'world' in the future;" is the educational jargon parroted in most all public relations material used to sell innovative programs to the public. If our schools will be concerned with teaching the children their American Heritage and follow the education law and stop slanting the curriculum and developing in them a world sense, they will be able to face the future as it develops, and not on the fantasies of the B.F. Skinners and the Wm. Glassers, and other behavioral scientists. This expanded role of the schools is well stated in one textbook which reads: "allegiance to a nation is the biggest stumbling block to creation of international government. National boundaries and the concept of sovereignty must be abolished. The quickest way to abolish sovereignty is to condition the young to another and broader allegiance. Opinion favorable to international government will be developed in the social studies of the elementary schools."...

... It has been well established that world government could exist only as a collectivist state, so just exactly what are you and your colleagues promoting? It is because parents have seen the results of collectivist governments that parents are concerned with the myriad of behavioral material in our schools, including M:ACOS, that they are justifiably concerned....

You also point out that local school people are not "servants" but educational professionals. I believe that whether they are paid by the federal, state, or local government, this money comes from the taxpayers and they are therefore civil servants. The New York Education Law Sec. 5102.12 clearly states: "The primary responsibility of the education of children rests with the parents and the State, while teachers serve merely as agents of both." In my opinion educators gave up their right to be classed as professionals when they joined labor unions.

Very truly yours,
/s/ Janet Mellon

The brief reference to William Glasser in the above, is important when considering the "riddle within the enigma" of PPBS as applied to education, since Dr. Glasser is the leader of a new "Reality Therapy" movement, a new school of psychology that is having as much influence on education today, as did John Dewey and the Progressive Education Association in a previous era.

In 1955 Dewey's Progressive Education Association found it necessary to disband and its leaders went under cover in a host of "progressive" private schools, or they went underground completely (as did the Communists of that decade). Nevertheless, the collectivism and atheistic pragmatism propounded by John Dewey and his followers has continued to have a profound effect on American education.

After Dewey came the Behaviorists, led by John Watson until his death in 1958. Combining the theories of Sigmund Freud with those of Ivan Pavlov, the behaviorist sees man as merely another type of animal, and he emphasizes external, environmental influences as being most instrumental in the shaping of man and his behavior. Watson put it this way: "The Behaviorist is not interested in his (man's) morals, except as a scientist; in fact, he doesn't care what kind of man he is."

After NEA and the textbook producers had absorbed and transmitted to the classrooms of the nation the animalistic environmentalism of the Behaviorist school, then came the Third Force School, or Humanistic Psychology. Out of this evolved such ventures as the Esalen Institute at Big Sur, Synanon, Gestalt, the various Behavioral Science Institutes, the General Semantics movement, sensitivity training, encounter and touch therapy, Glasser's Reality Therapy, etc.

And at the head of this Third Force School (since the death of Abraham Maslow) stands William Glasser—and the Third Force School has joined forces with the Unfreezing, Changing, Refreezing technicians who provide the "riddle within the enigma" that is PPBS.

Dr. Glasser says children no longer need to be prepared to "make a living," the government will take care of them; children no longer search for goals in life, but for roles in society. So the schools must change and accept the new role assigned by PPBS. A few direct quotes from Dr. Glasser: "We have to let students know there are no right answers, and we have to let them see that there are many alternatives to certainty and right answers." Again: "The truth does not make much difference basically." And yet again, his advice to teachers: "It is very unfortunate that we get so concerned that what we teach is certain and correct."

"The process of sensitizing a child involves three steps: Unfreezing his values and standards, Changing the child by giving him different standards and a different conception of who he is, and thirdly, Refreezing to lock the child into the new self. . . . After the refreezing is accomplished, it is impossible for the child to communicate with the conventional person, including his parents. He operates on a different wave length, and though in conversation he will use the same words he formerly used, the meanings of these words to him will be entirely different from their meanings as understood by his parents. The child is fully sensitized. . . . If PPBS is fully implemented, within one generation we will have a nation of unbelievably uncreative, immobilized, and unnatural inhabitants, all under the control of the very, very few talented elite who, of course, do not permit themselves to be processed through the system."

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

- - - - - Part Sixteen - - - - -

HOW PPBS PROMOTES THE NEW RELIGION FOR THE NEW SOCIETY

The messianic character of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System which now has been integrated into every phase of government activity, with its accent on Health, Education and Welfare, must be thoroughly understood if we are to comprehend the true danger of PPBS.

While posing as a managerial and budgeting system, PPBS is much more. Its controllers and change agents intend it as a means for making a new kind of man, who will be one cell in a new social body, the responsibility of a new government, the inhabitant of a new kind of world, and a believer in a new world religion.

"Behold, we shall make all things new," is the messianic slogan of these God-imitating designers and operators of a man-controlled system of evolution which is to usher in a New Order of the Ages, a very kingdom of heaven wherein Man will be God and there may be no gods before Man. And in this new man-made heaven on earth there shall be no tears to wipe away, no hunger to assuage, no desires left unfulfilled; for the new, man-made inhabitant of this New Society of the World will not possess the ability to comprehend the meanings of such words as sadness, hunger, desire. He will be conditioned to accept his appointed place with contentment, resignation, fatalistic complaisance. In the words of the economist Ludwig von Mises:

"The common man will be freed from the tedious job of directing the course of his own life. He will be told by the authorities what to do and what not to do; he will be fed, housed, clothed, educated and entertained by them. But, first of all, they will release him from the necessity of using his own brains. Everybody will receive 'according to his needs.' But what the needs of an individual are, will be determined by the authorities...."

If such self-appointed "authorities" are to condition all other men to accept their absolute dominion, in spiritual and mental as well as in physical domains, these authorities must go beyond the use of the Delphi Technique in discerning the future, and beyond the mindless Law of the Computer in judging the "here and now." They must fashion for themselves a religion which will act as a cohesive to bind these robot-like men into a social body. This requires some kind of a religion which denies the existence of a transcendent God yet proclaims the authority and infallibility of an invisible and immanent "Big Brother," who is able to open and close at will the "book of life."

The religion of Humanism best fits the aims and objectives of these New World Makers; since it proclaims that there is a god, but at the same time insists that god is man and man is god.

In a recent proselytizing effort, a letter from the publishers of Humanist Magazine contained this statement and question:

"There are millions of people in the world who are humanists. There are probably many additional millions who are humanists without being aware of it. Do you fall into this group? That is, do you reject belief in supernatural or authoritarian religion, and do you feel that the basic concerns of man should be directed toward fulfilling the human potential?"

An affirmative answer to the posed question supposedly qualifies one for membership in the religion of Humanism; and an affirmative answer may also make one a believer in the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System that is replacing the traditional American Representative Republican System of government, just as Humanism is replacing the traditional Christian belief in a Triune Godhead. For, PPBS and Humanism are complementary and "go together" like sun and day, or moon and night.

First, let's discuss Humanism; then we'll see how it and PPBS go together.

Webster tells us that Humanism is the learning, or cultural impulse, imparted by those who brought the (pre-Christian) Greek and Roman classics into new vogue during the Renaissance. But Webster defines the term as though it were but an intellectual movement, an interest in academics and the liberal arts and, at best, a philosophy of life. But Humanism is much more than this. Humanism insists that man is to be treated as an end in himself. No supernatural, no spiritual, no life beyond the grave; life is a one-way street with a dead-end. Hence, the fulfilling of the human potential should be the only concern of man.

In early Christian times the Apostle Paul confronted the early Humanists—then called Hedonists—on Mars Hill in Athens, where he told the assembled and querulous philosophers of the (to them) unknown God. The Hedonists were of the “eat, drink, and be merry, for tomorrow we die” crowd, which included the Cyrenaics and the Epicureans. The Hedonists, however, regarded intellectual pleasures as being of a higher order than carnal pleasures, and they stressed the merits of knowledge for pleasure's sake and aimed at “the greatest happiness of the greatest number,” from which derived the utopian idea that the best of worlds would be a world ruled by scientists and philosophers.

In the 14th century (Renaissance period) the Hedonists began to call themselves Humanists, and by reviving the ancient Greek and Roman—pre-Christian—ideas and ideals, the Humanists affected both education and religion.

“Primarily, Humanism is the assertion of individual, ego-centered liberties—a wholly libertine philosophy,” stated Mary Royer, M.S., who is National Chairman of the National Parents League; was a member of President Kennedy's Committee on Delinquency and Crime; and Oregon State Chairman of the National Justice Foundation of America.

“Humanism has as its goal man himself,” said this acknowledged authority. “The Christian view of man is dominated by the Doctrine of Immortality, which indicates man's special relation to God.... The teachings of Humanism are completely divergent from the teachings of Christianity when the Humanists teach that man is born good, and if left to his own instincts cannot fail to achieve happiness....

“When day after day we continue to permit children to be indoctrinated with the permissive pagan philosophies which are rampant in most social study programs; when day after day we permit children to be alienated from parents through the various money making family life/sex education materials; when day after day we permit children to be paganized, when we permit all virtue and moral values to be destroyed through the vicious techniques of sensitivity training, role playing, diary keeping, operant conditioning, etc.; when we permit the introduction of computerized taxonomy; when we permit our school boards to sit idly by, and through silence, endorse these policies; when we can trace all of these problems directly to Hedonism and Humanism; when we consider all of these things; when we accept all of these indignities, all of these onslaughts against morality and individual integrity, together with many, many more indignities and insults, only then does the grinding insidiousness, the destructiveness of these ancient, barbaric philosophies, and the complacency of the modern day educator become startlingly apparent, only then do we begin to realize how far we have strayed from our Christian principles.

“We need to conclude with one singular inescapable fact: dialectical materialism, and Darwinism, have exceedingly strong roots in Hedonism and Humanism, for both Hedonism and Humanism have flowered and taken on vigorous life under the later thesis and anti-thesis of dialectical materialism. Each is firmly and unmistakably interconnected, for the latter evolved from the former, and it is the whole of the philosophies of Hedonism, Humanism, Darwinism and dialectical materialism which run rife throughout large segments of that system of progressive education, which includes various social studies courses, as well as studies in the humanities.”

Now we must turn from the subject of Humanistic Philosophy to the newer and far more dangerous Humanistic Psychology. It is also necessary to demonstrate the interrelationship of Humanistic Psychology with PPBS, and the interrelationship of both with the rapidly developing Total Managed Global Society. And perhaps these interrelationships will be more easily understood if we show the interrelated involvements of three persons; William Glasser, Clement Stone, and Richard Nixon (not necessarily listed in the order of their importance).

"Fulfilling the human potential" is the aim of Humanism. One particular plan which is intended to develop the individual's potential is called "Positive Mental Attitude," and the adherents to this mental cult are led by W. Clement Stone, Chicago multimillionaire. Stone reckons his wealth at around $400 million and, as is the practice with many such individuals, instead of paying taxes on his earnings from the multinational Chicago-based Combined Insurance Co., his two publishing houses (school textbooks a speciality), his Alberto-Culver Co. of Chicago, his Trans-American Video Co. of Los Angeles, his Texas citrus farm, and the rest of the 95 organizations with which he is affiliated as trustee, board member, stockholder, etc.; he established the W. Clement Stone and Jessie D. Stone Foundation. Through this foundation he finances—among other things—this Positive Mental Attitude program.

Clement Stone met Richard Nixon at a time when the politician had "lost faith in himself," and Stone told Nixon about PMA. He contends that "PMA changed a broken, defeatist Richard Nixon, emotionally wracked by his losses in 1960 to President John F. Kennedy and in 1962 to Calif. Gov. Edmund Brown, into a new man in the mid-1960s."

Stone liked Nixon and is sure that his PMA (which was adapted from Norman Vincent Peale's Power of Positive Thinking) made it possible for the twice-beaten Nixon to become President of the United States.

However, Stone did not rely entirely on his faith in PMA, just to help the campaign along, Stone contributed over a half million dollars to Nixon's election fund in 1968, and was the largest single contributor to Nixon's campaign fund in 1972 (well over a million dollars personally, plus what he gathered in as Nixon's chief fund-raiser.

The necessary "connecting link" in this story is supplied by a statement appearing in the Los Angeles Times of October 8, 1972. In an article by Times staff writer Francis Ward, Stone is quoted as boasting of the "secret formula" which he gave to Nixon, and insisting that "if he didn't have PMA, he would never have been elected President." Then comes the following, and it is quoted verbatim:

"'Clem' Stone's support for Mr. Nixon is not just a matter of party loyalty; it is a clear devotion 'to the man. I could see where the course of history could be changed for the better by backing this man, regardless of what it would take,' Stone said. Since 1968, he has been determined that Mr. Nixon 'wouldn't lose because of a lack of funds.'"

More bluntly: As a corporation executive, Clement Stone was committed to PPBS; as a political executive, Richard Nixon was equally committed to PPBS; and theirs was a partnership of convenience. Together, they would "change the world for the better"—at least for their own betterment—by making PPBS a universal "control system" for the changing world!

Now, let us remember that PPBS is a Fabian Socialist System. And Fabian Socialism relies on the twin powers of legislation and education for the "selling" of its end product. Nixon, if elected and re-elected President, would be in an ideal position to become the "change agent" for the conversion of the government to PPBS control. As for the educational change agent that would be required, let us consider one William Glasser, high priest of Humanist Psychology, leader in the new Third Force in educational circles, and also creator of the new sensitivity training course which he called Reality Therapy.

At about the same time W. Clement Stone met Richard M. Nixon and decided to make him President of the United States, he was also introduced to the activities of William Glasser, M.D., who had written a book on the subject of Reality Therapy: A New Approach to Psychiatry.

The Glasser approach did not leave the Stone unturned; when the latter discovered that the former had turned from individual seances to group therapy and then to the indoctrination of whole schools, the Stone Foundation financed the establishment of an Educator Training Center, operated by Dr. Glasser for the purpose of teaching teachers how to use the PPBS methods in their classrooms. Stone also published the books Glasser found time to write and, in addition, the Stone Publishing companies put out a controversial series of textbooks called "Voices of Life Program." One critic, reviewing these textbooks that are written for grades kindergarten through 8, stated that:

"These social science textbooks are designed to impart little knowledge but concentrate on attitude change through using Glasser type methods of group discussion, inquiry technique, peer teaching and role playing. Where school districts have allowed their teachers to depart from the proven method of curriculum instruction... to this new innovative method, we often find that high IQ students become low achievers and chaos results...."

Glasser published his book "Schools Without Failures" (the title describes the content) and at about the same time he was selected as a trainer of teachers and administrators who would introduce the PPBS methods into the schools. Glasser's entre into the school system itself (his Educator Training Center had been a private venture) was through the Federally funded Title III programs. After being introduced and installed from the top (HEW), then the program was to be financed on a long-range basis through local school district funds. The following quotation taken from the agenda of a Los Angeles Calif. School District (July 7, 1971) will explain the "M.O.":

"It is recommended that the Board (of Education) ratify the action of the Superintendent, Zone C, in requesting Educator Training Center (Wm. Glasser M.D.) to conduct 18 training sessions during May and June 1971, for administrators and faculty of Sunland and Pinewood Elementary Schools, covering the planning and implementation of P.P.B.S. in the school instructional programs." (Italics added—Ed.)

Merely as a matter of confirmation of what we have already written (out of their own mouths), we quote the following from the dust jacket of Glasser's book Schools Without Failures:

"...Dr. Glasser has been a psychiatrist in private practice in Los Angeles since 1957 and has consulted widely in the correctional field.... Recently he has devoted himself more and more to education at various levels. He has taught a large group of city and county school administrators, counselors and teachers.... In order to help more people understand his ideas about education he has recently been able to establish, through the generosity of the Stone Foundation, the Educator Training Center...."

Thus, through the generosity of Clement Stone, Richard Nixon was chosen to change the American system of Government, and William Glasser (among many, many others) was chosen to change the American Educational System. Both are change agents for the promoters of PPBS, and both were able to turn a Stone for their bread (with apology for the pun which we couldn't resist).

Please don't overestimate the importance of these men as individuals. Stone is but one of many moneyed men being used to finance the proselytizing of prospects who can be converted to the faith of Humanism. Glasser is but one of hundreds of change agents being used to train other change agents for the "end product" purposes of PPBS. And Nixon could be replaced by any one of a score of opportunistic politicians who are convinced that the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System is the wave of the future, and who are trying to ride the wave toward the shifting sands of time.

And there are scores of proselytizers who preach this same Humanism, pretending that it is Christianity, attempting to change the faith of the citizenry-at-large, even as the Nixons are converting the bureaucrats and changing our form of government from a Representative Republic to a Corporate Socialist State in a Socialist World Government, and as the Glassers are fashioning Newthink citizens to inhabit this World of Tomorrow.

As an example, there is the mysteriously financed church group headed by the Armstrongs, based in Pasadena; and because they are pro-Creation and anti-Evolution, they are accepted as a Christian organization; though in every other respect theirs is the good news of Humanism (as is all other British-Israel teaching), as opposed to the Gospel of salvation through re-birth in the Spirit (John 3: 5,6,7.)

Also, through the efforts of the National Council of Churches and similar organizations in the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Churches, this same Humanism is being used to pervert and prepare man for the New Order of the Ages, which they present as being of the flesh rather than of the Spirit.

PROOFS OF A CONSPIRACY TO BUILD A TOTAL MANAGED GLOBAL SOCIETY

- - - - - Part Seventeen - - - - -

THE COMPLETE CONSPIRACY

"Quintus Fabius Maximus was a Roman general whose principal object in life was to gain power of a political nature. He was greatly esteemed as a military tactician because of his innovative strategy of not boldly confronting the enemy but, rather, by using a program of harassment and semi-containment, somewhat in the order of the present day guerrilla warfare. This did not win many battles for him, nor did he lose any; but it served the purpose of fulfilling his political ambition for power.

"Fabius had an enemy in the field, a fellow named Hannibal, who had proved to be a formidable adversary and against whom Fabius had employed his program of non-confrontation.

"When Hannibal had been in Italy for three and one-half years and no longer had his elephants, was no longer being supported by Carthage and was recruiting for his forces from within Italy, Fabius launched a frontal assault on Hannibal's twenty-five thousand-man army. Fabius' forces numbered one hundred thousand. Until that day the Roman legions had never lost a battle, but on that occasion ninety-five thousand Roman troops were slain! Hannibal lost between three and five thousand men.

"Two Roman generals rode away from the battle, one of whom was Fabius, who immediately went to the Roman Senate to plead for more men and equipment. A result of his pleadings was the birth of the expression, 'No Roman can sleep so long as Hannibal lives.' Of course the taxes were levied to provide the requested men and materiel.

"During the three day period that Fabius was pleading before the Roman Senate there was not one Roman legionnaire between Rome and Hannibal's victorious army, but amazingly, Hannibal did not move. And Hannibal is rated as one of the greatest field generals of all time!

To foreshorten the story, Hannibal was in Italy for twenty years with Fabius nipping at him occasionally. After each major altercation Fabius would return to Rome to plead again, with resultant increases in taxes. Fabius had achieved the power he desired by having his ever-present enemy at hand, by having his no-win war, and by being able, almost at will, to impose greater taxation. (Any similarity in the above tactics with those being employed in the present no-win war in Southeast Asia could be coincidental —or copied; we leave this for the reader to judge—Ed.)

"The second chapter of this story was written in the latter days of the 19th century when a group composed principally of disolute homosexuals formed an organization and, with deep appreciation, memorialized Quintus Fabius Maximus. The name of the organization is The Fabian Society of London." (All of the foregoing, save the parenthetical note, is quoted from the Prologue of a remarkable article: "The Source—of the River of Pollution," by Joseph P. Bean, M.D.

The third chapter of this story we have attempted to write in the foregoing sixteen serial installments of this weekly Newsletter. Of course, we have not completed the story, for it is current history and new developments occur almost daily. However, a series such as this must be brought to a conclusion within a reasonable time, and this last issue in the year of our Lord 1972 seems an appropriate time for ending this special series.

This does not mean that we have finished with the subject; for this would be like saying that we have finished with the recording of world and national current events. For, this Planning, Programming, Budgeting System is the key to the world of tomorrow if the Planners are permitted to continue with their "restructuring" of the world of today—and we can see no signs of effective human or positive divine intervention at this time.

So, in this last in a series of Newsletters, let us review and summarize, and take stock of where we stand:—

We are tempted to say, with the late Garett, that “The Revolution Was;” for, with the landslide reelection of Richard M. Nixon as President of the United States, the Conspirators are convinced that theirs is a mandate to complete, with popular approval, the creation of their Total Managed Global Society, while disregarding the desires, ignoring the words, and perhaps silencing or even liquidating those who oppose their Planning, Programming, and Budgeting.

Here is an overall picture of the completed structure, as we see it:

George Orwell, himself a Fabian Socialist with access to the overall Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PEP) which was developed in England, had a true vision of the way the world was to be reshaped: it was to be divided into three parts, with each of these parts vying against the others in Fabian-type no-win wars. It required two world wars to create the leader-States for these three world divisions: The United States had to be divorced from its traditional “isolationist” attitude and “forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation... quit our own to stand upon foreign ground” and interweave our destiny with that of “Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice” (from Washington’s Farewell Address, Sept. 19, 1796). After having enmeshed the United States in world controversies, then Soviet Russia had to be nourished, strengthened and made a rival of the United States. And finally, Communist China had to be awakened, armed and equipped, drawn from its isolation into the world arena, and made a rival of both the USA and the USSR. And, by them, the world would be divided into three Great Regions with their own Regional Governments, separate yet united through a series of international treaties and organizations.

These Three Regional Rivals were created and/or positioned as the result of two World Wars. But, to prepare them to assume their places in world government, certain internal political innovations were brought about.

- 1) Lenin brought about the Soviet type, one-

- party State;
- 2) To provide “people control” without undue coercion, Gandhi developed the theory of large-scale nonviolent political action;
- 3) Mao Tse-tung developed a system of peasant and guerrilla organization and government which proved ideal for the control of Eastern peoples; and
- 4) Cost benefit analysis (PPBS) was developed by Charles Hitch and associates at RAND Corporation, with U.S. taxpayer money and U.S. Government cooperation.

These four political administrative techniques—described in detail in an article by Dr. Karl Deutsch of Harvard, Dr. John Platt of the University of Michigan and Dr. Dieter Senghaas of Goeth University, Germany; published in Science, Vol. 171, Feb. 5, 1971. And these four political administrative techniques were intended to produce a Soviet Government in Russia, a Commune-ist Government in China, and a Corporative Socialist Government in the United States, with the PPB System replacing the traditional Representative Republican system, with its divisions of Governments into Federal, State, County and Community units, and its balance of powers between Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Branches.

Two unexpected events disturbed the timetable of the Planners:

On the world scene, while the United States was to be one of the Big Three, it was to be such as a part of the Anglo-Saxon Federation, which was to include England and the rest of the English-speaking nations of the world. This was the reasoning behind the creation of NATO, the Atlantic Union, the British-Israel politico-religious movement, etc. However, as a result of the enormous American aid given Europe after World War II, and the amazing rebirth of German industry, plus the unexpected competition resulting from the European Common Market, that Regional Union began to offer serious opposition to the idea of the Three-Part division of the world. And:

With the equally amazing rebirth of Japanese industry and commerce, that originator of the original East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere opposed the plan of allowing Communist China to exercise suzerainty over the island kingdom that is to Asia as England was to Europe.

England, seemingly losing out in its plan to regain its lost American Colonies, has decided to become a part of the United States of Europe. And, in an attempt to keep Japan in line, trade restrictions are once again being used (that is what brought about Pearl Harbor), and American and European-based multinational bankers and industrialists are buying into Japanese mining, manufacturing and merchandising organizations as rapidly as possible.

As a result of these unexpected happenings, the Conspirators now are said to be considering the possibility of establishing five Regional Governments instead of three; to accommodate the unhappy overlords of Japan and the United States of Europe. The alternative plan would be no better, or worse, for the people residing in the United States.

The second unexpected happening involved a slip of the tongue. Dwight Eisenhower, Democratic General turned Republican President and about to become a gentleman farmer, outsmarted his keepers and speech-makers and made a very loud reference to the dangerous "military-industrial complex" that was threatening to cost the nation billions of dollars and thousands of lives in a planned "brushfire war" in Southeast Asia.

The Computerized Socialist Control System, PPBS, was to have been a closely-guarded secret, it was not to be mentioned to the people-at-large until after having been made a permanent fixture, like the debt money system and the unbalanced budget.

The "military industrial complex" was PPBS in actual operation; and when the lame duck President of the United States spoke out against it, panic and pandemonium beset the Planners and their change agents. All the allegedly conservative politicians and periodicals immediately denied the existence of any such thing as a "military-industrial complex," and save for a few liberal outlets, the Presidential faux pas was smothered in ink and oratory. One Oregon Senator talked incessantly of "McNamara's War," but the connection between Vietnam, the Mekong Delta, offshore oil and PPBS was never explicitly explained (nor would it have been understood if it had been explained at that time, it was not until the Control System which had been used on the military, began to be used in the nation's schools, that aroused parents began to suspect the evils inherent in PPBS).

Meanwhile, on the domestic scene, inherent in the overall plan to build a Total Managed Global Society, was the necessity of changing the American form of Government at every level from the Federal right down to the individual family. The scheme called for the centralization of all political, economic and social control at one point, in Washington, D.C.; then the so-called decentralization of such controls into ten Regional Control points, to be designated as Capitols of Ten Federal Regional Districts.

These Ten Federal Regions are already formed and are in partial operation as a new level of government operating between the Federal Government and the State Governments. The fifty States have been divided between the Ten Federal Regions. Each Region has its own government, a Regional Council which is made up of appointed—not elected—officials. The Ten Regional Councils take their orders from a group that has its offices in the White House Executive Offices Building, and is called the Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations, which is headed by the Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget. The Group is, of course, made up of appointed rather than elected officials.

Getting this new level of the PPB System of government into full operation is a top-priority task of the New Nixon Administration; and when in full operation, it will function as follows:

The Washington Group will give orders to the Ten Regional Councils, which will in turn, give orders to the fifty States, and the States will then execute those orders — or their operational funds will be cut off! The States will cease to have any rights as States, and will become mere administrative branches of the Regional Governments.

Next step: To make supervision of State execution of Federal orders easier, the States themselves will be divided into Sub-Regional Governments. These Sub-Regional Districts and Governments will then replace all Counties and County Governments.

Do you see the whole picture of this proposed New World Government? —

Each State will be divided into sub-regional administrative districts;

The Nation has been divided into Ten Regional Administrations;

The World will be divided into Three (or perhaps Five) Regional Administrations;

All Orders will emanate from one Central Authority.

And that Central Authority will be composed, not of the world's political leaders such as Presidents and Prime Ministers who will merely hold administrative posts; it will be composed of executives and agents chosen by Multinational Corporation tycoons, International Bankers, and others who are the policy planners and decision makers in such organizations as the Round Table, the Bilderbergers, the Council on Foreign Relations, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, etc.

However, there yet remains much to be done before the Planners will have solidified their positions after having won the "quiet revolution."

A timely example: We have a copy of "HEW NEWS," from the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, for release on Sunday, December 24, 1972. As we quote from this official release, please bear in mind that in PPBS semantics, "decentralization" actually means the opposite, or "centralization." We quote excerpts only:

"HEW Secretary Elliot L. Richardson today outlined action by his Department in the past year to decentralize operations and 'gradually and quietly return responsibility to the people at the local level.' . . .

"He cited several moves... These included: Expanding the power of HEW's 10 Regional Directors. They now have authority to approve grants with a combined total from all Regions of $2.3 billion a year. This means, said the Secretary, that the mayor of a small city can seek funds for a community health program, for example, directly from a regional office which can approve or deny the request without having to route it through Washington... Regional Directors also are increasing their reliance on State and local governments for assistance in its program decisions... HEW has regional offices in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Atlanta, Chicago, Dallas, Kansas City, Denver, San Francisco, and Seattle."

All of this activity on the part of HEW is, of course, stop-gap action; because The Plan calls for the elimination of HEW, HUD, Agriculture, Labor, Transportation, and Interior Departments. They are to be replaced by four new cabinet posts: 1) Economic Development; 2) Community Development; 3) Natural Resources; and 4) Human Resources. "The alignment of closely related functions in four purpose-oriented departments," explains the Assistant Director of OMB, "would by itself facilitate easier planning and coordination of federal program's resources. When this improvement is coupled with the Administration's action to (give authority to officers in) the ten standard federal regions, the effective program delivery capabilities of the Executive Branch will be even further strengthened."

Also yet to be accomplished is the dividing of the States themselves into "sub-state districts," which will eventually eliminate all Counties and County Governments. A report from the 1313-based Council of State Governments says that "States are moving rapidly toward official designation of uniform systems of sub-state districts."

On Nov. 28, 1972, for example, Florida's 67 County governments were merged into 10 sub-state districts, whose appointed directors will control all inter-county affairs.

The chief characteristic of this PPB System of government—whether at world, national, state, or community level—is that it is Government by appointed rather than elected officials. And it is well to remember that appointed professionals cannot be voted out! Bear in mind that under this Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, appointed administrators will be giving the orders to the remaining elected officials, and that those elected officials will carry out those orders, or the funds they require will be withheld by the appointed administrators.

And, finally, let it be understood that this Revolution means far more than the creation of a new kind of government, it also means the creation of a new society with a new religion and a new god, and a new man with a new consciousness and a new set of values. It is to be a computerized society in which the finished products will all think, feel, and act the same.

The beginning of the defense of Freedom is to know the Truth. We hope and pray that we have helped in this defense, by presenting these Proofs of a Conspiracy to Build a Total Managed Global Society.

BIG BROTHER INTENDS TO APPROPRIATE YOUR PROPERTY

LAND USE IS THE EXCUSE

"If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen," is the advice made famous by the late Harry Truman. George Romney was most anxious to avail himself of that advice; he let it be known that he was quitting his post as Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development long before President Nixon got around to sending him the "Dear George" letter which would call for a formal resignation. Romney had found that State and local Governments were not as cooperative in the matter of their own destruction as was expected by the "experts." Romney and his bureaucratic underlings had tried hard to enlist the aid of State and County officials in the integration of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, and in the Regionalization of areas. But, somehow, the Programming did not meet the Planning goals, therefore the Budgeting had to be held up in many cases.

Indicative of the output from the top which was not being matched by the input from the bottom, was the HUD departmental Newsletter which Romney sent to all his employees under date of March 1, 1971, in which Secretary Romney announced that:

"16 additional Area Offices and one additional Insuring Office will be opened by next September, completing the HUD decentralization program begun last year. The new offices will be under the jurisdiction of HUD's Philadelphia, Atlanta, and Chicago Regional Offices. The other seven of HUD's 10 Regions completed their decentralization last year when Area Offices were opened.

"The Area Offices will be the voice of HUD for the communities with which they deal," Secretary Romney said."

Thus, in September, 1971, HUD had established Ten Regional Offices and Forty Area Offices—six months before President Nixon issued (Feb. 10, 1972) Executive Order No. 11647, which officially divided the Nation into Ten Federal Regions, to be governed by Ten Regional Councils.

The "Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents," Feb. 21, 1972, adds that:

"The President today designated 10 chairmen of Federal Regional Councils as authorized by Executive Order 11647 of February 10, 1972. They are:

Edward Aguirre, Regional Director, Department of Labor, San Francisco, California
Norman A. Erbe, Secretarial Representative, Department of Transportation, Des Plaines, Illinois

William S. Harris, Regional Director, Department of Labor, Kansas City, Mo.

Robert Lee Kessler, Regional Representative of the Secretary of Transportation, Denver, Colo.

Howard D. McMahan, Regional Director, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Dallas, Texas

Frank J. Groschelle, Regional Director, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Atlanta, Georgia

Theodore R. Robb, Regional Administrator, Department of Housing and Urban Development, Philadelphia, Pa.

S. William Green, Regional Administrator, Department of Housing and Urban Development, New York, N.Y.

John A. S. McGlennon, Regional Administrator, Department of Housing and Urban Development, Boston, Mass.

James Young, Regional Director, Office of Economic Opportunity, Seattle, Washington.

(Editor's Note: The foregoing appointments were made in President Nixon's first term of office, and there may have been changes made as his second term begins. We'll let you know as soon as such information can be obtained).

"REGIONALISM: THE QUIET REVOLUTION"

"Local government is changing itself in an effort to better meet the needs of the people.

Across the nation, cities, counties, towns and school districts that serve a common area are joining together in a regional effort to solve mutual problems. In a quiet way, regionalism is a revolution in the structure of our federal system." (Emphasis added.)

What this revolution entails was stated by Robert C. Weaver, former head of the Department of Housing and Urban Development:

"Regional government means absolute Federal control over all property and its development regardless of location, anywhere in the United States, to be administered on the Federal Official's determination. It would supersede state and local laws... Through this authority we seek to recapture control of the use of land..."

"Capturing control of the land" began in a big way with Urban Renewal programs, which were going to wipe out the ghettos in all the big cities. When that began to pall there was a great wave of Industrial Park building throughout the land. Then came a "somino" reaction to the action of trying to integrate the races: the great exodus to the suburbs began. This caused the building of convenient and impressive suburban shopping centers; and this in turn brought on the so-called "central city blight." Whole downtown districts were condemned, bulldozed, and often turned into nothing more productive than parks.

This happened in a city where the Redevelopment Agency stepped in to repeat the performance in another part of town. One of our subscribers had his offices in a 17-square block area that was slated to become a victim of the Federal Bulldozer. He went to a meeting of the City Council and the Redevelopment Agency, and made a very valid protest, in which he "covered all the bases." He later sent us a copy of his protest; and because we believe the points he makes and the charges he substantiates may help others in similar straits, we are publishing his entire speech. The name of the speaker, and his city, are omitted "to protect one who would not consent to crime." All else is exactly as the copy which the speaker sent us.

Members of the City Council of.....
Members of the Redevelopment Agency,
Gentlemen:

Once again we rise to protest this and every other redevelopment project. Once again we emphatically state that such projects are unlawful, that they make criminals of those who carry them out, and of those who cooperate with the projects. We do not participate willingly; this we want clearly understood... Since 'consent to a crime' makes one a criminal, we take this opportunity to inform you that you do not have our consent to your crimes.

Principles of common law, on which the criminal laws of this county and every other county in the nation are based, are generally very poorly understood today. However, we believe you gentlemen do know, whether you will publicly admit it or not, that it is a crime to steal, and it is a crime to covet another man's goods. You may not understand the term 'covet,' so let's call it by its common law name, 'fraud.' This project involves you in fraud. Under cover of much bureaucratic jargon, regulatory agencies of cities, states, and the federal bureaucracy have banded together into one great criminal gang to unlawfully seize private property. Generally these officials try to take cover under the law of eminent domain. But this won't do. The law of eminent domain is very strictly construed to apply only to cases of great public good (as our Constitution puts it, for the general welfare). But you propose to take the private property of all owners within a 17-block area and then resell it to other private parties. You show beautiful pictures to the general public, you paint great glowing images in the minds of any who will stop to listen, you propagandize one and all with visions of immense tax revenue from your utopian dream. And utopian dreams these always are. If the central cities of the United States are to die—and it appears they are—let them die in peace. Euthanasia by the Federal Bulldozer followed by infusion of the corpses with mountains of money extracted from us by robbery through inflation will not likely succeed in resurrecting those cities. No less than Secretary of HUD, Mr. Romney, has publicly and repeatedly declared his own projects to be wasteful and ineffectual. Free enterprise, private property, and the criminal law, are all done away with to satisfy the covetousness in your hearts. And you can't function without breaking the criminal law.

Let us spell out for you how you have already broken the law. In order for you to operate this agency you must violate the trespass laws of this county. You must go into the private homes, offices, buildings, within the area to make your appraisals. This is trespass; your hired appraisers must get a warrant to enter if they are not to be charged with the crime of breaking and entering. Oh, of course, if the property owner gives his consent to the entrance of the appraiser, then there is no criminal act on the part of the appraiser. The property owner, however, has then consented to the crime of fraudulent concealment. We did not give our consent. Your appraiser was told to get a warrant or be subject to arrest. Since he could not get a warrant without a probable cause, he left without making his appraisal, and he has not returned.

But given the consent of the present owners, how do you propose to compensate them for their loss of property? A fair appraisal value for the property, assistance in making a move, will certainly not be adequate compensation. Anyone at all conversant with the free market knows that location is a prime factor in most businesses and that years are spent building up a clientele that has established a habit-pattern of shopping there. You propose to let the businessman continue to operate his business until he has a relocation site complete with new building. You neglect to tell him that streets adjoining his business will be torn up because of demolition in adjacent areas; his customers will go elsewhere, he will find his business volume cut down, and perhaps will ultimately have to close altogether.

What about the professional men in the area? This applies to our own situation, but certainly to many others also. Our office was constructed to meet our own personal requirements; it was built by a contractor whose work we cannot replace, and it is designed to last as long as we have any need for an office. Could you possibly appraise this property at its worth to us? Are you aware that the construction cost today is 100% higher than it was when the office was built? Do you know that this is caused by the government inflation of our money supply to pay for just such projects as this Central City project?

Then consider the people who have homes in the area, who have perhaps lived in them all their lives, who find this location to be perfect for them. Can you possibly give them just compensation? No. Like all criminal gangs, you, the big government gang, will have to try the carrot first and then resort to the stick.

Thieves operate under cover of darkness as much as possible. This agency is a thief, attempting to gain title to private property by means of fraud, and therefore it operates as secretly as possible. Virtually nothing has been told the general public about this project until quite recently. In 1965 a similar grand scheme was proposed, given wide publicity, and there was such an outcry from the general public that the plan had to be dropped. This time you took great care to bring your plan close to fruition before disclosing anything of its nature to anyone other than the owners of property within the 17 square block area. It was necessary for you to lie in order to come to this hearing without arousing the public. You sent out "Newsletters" to the owners within the area. Most of these letters spoke in glowing terms of the cooperation you were receiving; none mentioned any objections. Each property owner within the area was led to believe all other owners were in hearty approval; no doubt many felt it unwise to be a lone objector. In addition, your June newsletter states that all of the appraisals have been completed—obviously an untruth, since our property has not been appraised.

We have not the slightest doubt that here tonight the rosier pictures will be drawn, and that this project will be declared to be a benefit to the City of . . . , its residents, and its taxpayers. But what has happened to similar projects elsewhere?—and what has happened right here in . . . in the near past? Let us tell you. The businesses, large and small, the free enterprise, tax-paying businesses, are robbed of their properties. They are "assisted" in attempting to move to a new location. They are appraised (if they give their consent) and supposedly given a fair value for their property. Then the demolition begins. In the meantime, however, no business would be foolish enough to invest in the area, knowing it was slated for the bulldozer. Existing businesses and homeowners would be and are reluctant to invest further funds in their properties. The tax income to the city and to the county drops lower year by year, the income from licenses diminishes as businesses close or move elsewhere; the revenue from sales taxes sinks lower. This state of things may continue for a number of years. All of the citizens of . . . pay for this forced economic stalemate; their property taxes go up to compensate for the loss of income from a formerly thriving central city. Finally, and depending upon the current whims of some remote bureaucrats in Washington, the federal government does appropriate funds for the demolition of the site. Now there certainly is no tax income or revenue of any kind coming in to the city or county from bare land owned by the city—or by the Redevelopment Agency, whichever holds the title. Those private interests who were supposed to be standing by waiting to purchase the property have had a change of heart. They are no longer interested. And the taxpayers of this city, with the taxpayers of the nation, have been forced to hand over money for the acquisition of the property.

Are you ready for the next step? That barren ground is an eyesore, and every time the city councilmen look at it their consciences twinge; so the bare ground becomes a city park. Laudable it may be, attractive to the eye, but hardly the proper result of an eminent domain proceeding. And the taxpayers? They now are forced to pay to maintain the park. But that isn't all. This lovely park, situated in the midst of a condemned area, attracts the hippies, the drunks, the vandals; they set fires in nearby buildings, and a city fireman loses his life. Who becomes an accessory to murder, in an indirect fashion?

We have now brought charges against you as trespassers, thieves, fraudulent gangs, possible accessories to murder, destroyers of homes, breakers of the peace and wasters to taxpayers monies. But we are not finished. City Councilmen who approve such projects violate their oaths of office, for you deliver your city government into the hands of the federal bureaucracy; you relinquish control of the local reins of government that you were elected to administer. Years ago you were told this would happen. At that time you denied, among other things, that you would be giving up control of the city building codes. It should be obvious to you that you have given up this control now; but it hardly could come as a surprise. We refer here to the recent press article regarding the electrical codes of the city and the necessity of complying with Washington because of the money involved. So there is a bigger gang over your gang, and it has a bigger stick.

There is no way you can regain control of this city from the hands of the Washington gang unless you refuse to take a cent of the money. By the way, you have no right to any of that money. Here your covetousness really runs rampant. By any stretch of the imagination of even the most debased, brain-washed person could it be held to be for the general welfare of those people in Texas, in Florida, in New York, or elsewhere in any of the other states, that... have its central city demolished and rebuilt by utopian dream standards? Can you justify taking private property and reselling it to private interests?

(Private persons or corporations naturally find the prospect of dealing with one entity, when dickering for property, more advantageous than having to deal with 10 or 20 or 100 separate owners. However, their initial interest cools as the time passes, for when that one entity is a bureaucratic one, the time does indeed pass.)

Can you, gentlemen, call this project right and just and good? You know you cannot. You know it is morally wrong. You do know right from wrong. You may not, perhaps certainly will not admit it. But your "Notice of Public Hearing" dated 7/7/72 calls for anyone who wishes to deny the existence of blight in the project area to come forward and be heard. We want you to know that we not only deny it, but that we consider it an insult for you to call our property 'blighted.' We also want you to know that we have no hesitation in calling the project criminal. Criminal projects are not carried out by law-abiding citizens. Gentlemen, we do not consent to your crimes.

Recently the efforts of the Washington Gang have been enlarged to include countryside as well as ghetto and central city. The Gang has been handed a very large and succulent carrot as a result of the "ecology crisis." A "Land Use Act" has been proposed by Democratic Senator Henry Jackson and approved by Republican President Richard Nixon. The carrot: Only a Federal Agency is qualified and should have the authority to determine just how every bit of land in the United States is to be used. In no other way can we the people "save the soil." John Lear, in The Saturday Review of March 6, 1971, says that "decisions about land use are made by hundreds of thousands of town and country officials" who are more interested in taxes" than ecology; whereas the use of "all lands should conform to a national pattern" and Mr. Nixon "is determined to harmonize land use with national goals." (Stalin said much the same thing as he ordered Khrushchev to murder millions in the Ukrainian wheat bowl.)

When property owners become merely property caretakers, liberty and justice will have departed from the land.

TO COMPLETE THE IMPLEMENTATION OF AUTOCRACY

YOUR PROPERTY TO BECOME BIG BROTHER'S PROPERTY

"Private property in this state eventually should be transferred to government or state agency ownership and then be leased back to individuals under rigidly controlled regulations."

This is not a quotation from the writings of Marx or Lenin, though it could be; nor is it taken from a plank in a platform of some Socialist Political Party, though it might be. Instead, it is a suggestion that was seriously advanced by the participants to a State-sponsored Planning Conference held in Richmond, Virginia last Oct. 17-19, as reported in The News of Lynchburg, Va., Oct. 22, 1972.

Startling? Then what will be the reaction when we show you that the legal and political machinery has already been installed in many parts of this Country, for the purpose of depriving you of your property and then leasing it back to some other individual or conglomerate?

Of course, it is well known that, under the misuse of the power of Eminent Domain, the property of many living in alleged 'blighted' urban areas has already been taken away from them, and they have been 'relocated' in another area. But, we are talking about the seizure of everybody's private property everywhere, by the Government, in the name of "land use."

Let us take you back to the beginning of this one facet of the Total Conspiracy, and show you, step by step, how the future public ownership of all property has been brought about:

1934 is a good year in which to start. A Congressional investigation was being held, to investigate the charges made by the superintendent of schools in Gary, Indiana, Dr. William Wirt. Having been in Washington the previous fall, Dr. Wirt had been invited to the home of a government official who thought Dr. Wirt was "one of them in spirit." Present were four other government officials and also "one of the foremost propaganda agents of the Soviet Government." The five U.S. Government officials present were key representatives of, respectively, the Dept. of Agriculture, Dept. of the Interior, Agriculture Adjustment Administration (AAA), National Recovery Administration (NRA), and the Public Works Administration (PWA). Dr. Wirt testified that these people felt the United States system of political, social and economic organization was no longer adequate to insure the wellbeing of the people. In its stead must be erected a planned economy, wherein the everyday activities of the people would be regimented and controlled through bureaus such as some of them headed. They thought, said Dr. Wirt, that remuneration for work, and investment in property should be under government control, even if the title to the property remained in private hands. Dr. Wirt charged that these persons were using their positions in the administration to further their ideas. He stated that they planned it should be believed generally that the measures they took were temporary, to facilitate recovery from the depression, but, in fact, it would further the regimented economy plan (House Report No. 1439, 73rd Congress, 2nd session, pp. 9-10.)

One year after that investigation (which was taken seriously by almost nobody until years later), in 1935, President Roosevelt set up a National Resources Committee that was to establish the guidelines for the very program that Dr. Wirt had described. The Committee urged the federal government to lead the way in setting a minimum standard of living for the inhabitants of the cities, called for a regional police force, for the abolition of slums, rigid federal zoning and building codes, new or revised State Constitutions, public housing, redistribution of industrial centers, establishment of a national Department of Transportation, for a "socially more desirable distribution" of wealth; urged the setting up of regional planning agencies, etc., etc.

One immediate result of this report was the establishment of that conglomerate of organizations which came to be known as 1313. Whereupon the National Resources Committee responded by urging "the increased use of State and National Associations of Municipalities and of municipal officials," and specifically recommended the use of the Public Administration Clearing House (the official name of Terrible 1313), for the achievement of Regional Government.

These plans had to be shelved when the New Deal foundered on the rocks and shoals of continuing depression and economic chaos which the New Deal was supposed to be able to overcome. The New Deal was rescued by World War II; but most of the dreams of a total planned economy had to await a more propitious period.

With the coming of Nixon to the White House Came the "age of technology" with its development of the computer and its data bank, and the time seemed ripe for the fulfillment of the delayed Fabian fantasy. The old New Deal plans had been revised and modernized in "think tanks" such as Rand, Hudson, the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, etc. Rand had been especially helpful to the Planners through its development of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System which was a perfect complement to the Keynesian debt-money system already installed. And —

With the coming of Nixon to the White House all the pieces began falling into place and "The New American Revolution" had been won by the time Nixon began his second tour of duty on behalf of the Planners.

Before all private property could be transferred to government ownership, however, the complete regional governance system had to be installed and in operation. This meant that a totally new system of government extending from the tiniest hamlet up to the White House itself, would have to be instated by the Planners and accepted by the people.

The first giant step was taken when Nixon issued his Executive Order of Feb. 10, 1972 establishing Ten Federal Regions and naming Ten Federal Regional Councils to govern the States and people within the Federal Regions.

The second giant step Nixon did not dare to take at that time. This consisted of the revising of all Cabinet Departments and the creation of four new Domestic Cabinet Departments which would control, through the Ten Federal Regional Councils, all matters having to do with Economic Development, Community Development, Natural Resources and Human Resources. At the time (Feb. 10, 1972) Nixon said this restructuring of the Cabinet Posts would have to await Congressional approval. However, as soon as Nixon received his "mandate" via re-election, he forgot the need for Congressional permission and began to remake his Executive Departments and agencies. Said the New York Times of Jan. 7, 1973:

"Last Friday... Richard Nixon proclaimed a massive reorganization of the Executive Branch—the most sweeping in history. He rolled out a super Cabinet and a super super Cabinet—a total of eight trusted aides and official Cabinet members—who will be superimposed on the existing Government machinery....

The President wants a Department of Human Resources... so he is bringing to the White House as Counselor... to run Human Resources.... Mr. Weinberger will keep the title of H. E. W. Secretary.

"Similarly, James Lynn, the quick-study lawyer who has been appointed as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, will be Counselor in charge of community (and) regional development;...

"Agriculture Secretary Earl L. Butz will be Counselor for natural resources in charge of resource use, lands and minerals, environment....

"So much for the super Cabinet. There were possibly five men on the super-super level, all with the title of Presidential Assistant: Henry Kissinger, foreign affairs, and George L. Shultz, Secretary of the Treasury, economic matters; H. R. Haldeman, White House administrator; John D. Ehrlichman, domestic affairs; and Roy Ash, director of the Office of Management and Budget.

"Thus on the organizational chart at least, these five Assistants are a notch above the three new Counselors. Mr. Nixon, however, said that the five 'will work immediately under me, and at my direction, to integrate and unify policies and operations throughout the executive branch of the Governments.' The three new Counselors will report to Mr. Ehrlichman...."

Thus, the new chain of command:

1. The Commander-in-Chief; under him:
2. The super-super Cabinet of five; under them:

3. The super Cabinet of three; under them:
4. The Ten Regional Councils commanding the Ten Federal Regions into which the Nation has been divided; and under them:
5. The Sub-Regional or Sub-State District Directors, who will command at the local level, eventually replacing County Governments.

It is at this fifth, or lowest level, of command, that the installation of the machinery of autocracy is not yet completely installed, and therefore all property has not yet been "transferred to government ownership." The Council of State Governments (1313), acting in cooperation with the President's Domestic Council (John Ehrlichman), is completing this last link in the chain of command. We have a copy of CSG's report "to Selected Federal officials," dated March 10, 1971, which says in part:

"The enclosed summary of sub-state districting activities was prepared as part of a Council of State Governments' study of state experience in implementing the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968.

"States are moving rapidly toward designation of uniform systems of sub-state districts...."

There follows a report from each State in the Union. Since this letter has to do with private property, we'll skip to the report on the State of Oklahoma, where land-grabbing machinery has already been installed:

"REGION VII... OKLAHOMA... has utilized a system of eleven sub-state districts since June, 1968. Senate Bill 290 of 1969 established legislative authority for state action toward further organizing the system. The eleven districts were formed on the basis of existing Economic Development Districts... Federally initiated sub-state programs are moving satisfactorily into conformance with the delineation... The districts are seen as multi-purpose and are intended to provide a basis for coordination of local planning, uniform alignment of federally initiated sub-state programs, and administration of state programs."

Now, please remember that in this letter, we are dealing, primarily, with the program by which "private property" is to be "transferred to government ownership and then leased back to individuals." And, note how the State of Oklahoma is contributing toward its own destruction:—

ceived the following information:

Please be advised that in my own State of Oklahoma—under Senate Bill No. 101 dated June 10, 1971—that a Conservation District Act was passed which:

1. Authorizes State Conservation Districts to be responsible for the "conservation" of the renewable natural resources of the State. The Act defines "conservation" as being among other things the "wise use of land." It further states that this would not only have to do with how land may be used, but would include any "change in use of land."... This Act is included to mean "all programs that have direct impact on natural resources" including but not limited to highway locations, public utilities, zoning, pollution control, and even such "human resources" as Educational Quality and Facilities, Population Trends, and Employment Opportunities. These broad definitions leave a property owner extremely vulnerable to the future arbitrary desires and edicts of the bureaucrats in power.

2. Gives the Conservation Districts the "power of eminent domain" in all cases when land or interests therein are deemed by the Directors to be necessary to carry out the purposes of the Act and which can not otherwise be acquired by consent of the owner of such land. It allows the District Directors the right to acquire by purchase, exchange, lease, or otherwise, any property real or personal within the State of Oklahoma....

3. Gives the Conservation Districts the power to maintain, administer, and improve any properties so acquired and to also sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of such properties back to such "land occupiers" that would agree to use such lands as may be consistent with the purposes of said District Directors. This would, of course, enable the Directors to spend taxpayer money to acquire property at perhaps elevated prices, bulldoze down the improvements thereon (all at taxpayer expense) and then sell or lease it back to private developers at a reduced price—thereby enriching a select few. In metropolitan areas, this is called "urban renewal." In our rural areas, it will possibly be called "rural development."

4. Gives the Conservation Districts the power to "require" contributions in money, services, materials, or otherwise from land owners or occupiers who may be extended any "benefits" under the Act. This provision is a very effective method of "requiring" a landowner to "match any funds" that the government might be willing to spend in order to accomplish its desires.

5. Gives the Conservation Districts the power to make loans of money or property and in connection therewith may pledge or obligate any property or income in the District. This provision would enable the District Directors to circumvent the County Commissioners and County Excise Board in order to accomplish its desires. And, the obligations so incurred would be passed on to not only the present taxpayers of our County, but to future generations.

6. Gives the Conservation District the power, at the discretion of the County Excise Board, to appropriate money from the County General Fund for use by the District. This would enable the District Directors, in cooperation with a "friendly" County Excise Board, to have an "open-ended no-holds-barred entree" into our County Treasury. As a point of information, the three members of our County Excise Board are themselves political appointees in that one is appointed by our County Commissioners, one by our representative State Senator (who, incidentally voted for this Act!), and one by our District Judge. And,

7. The State Commission, by administrative order, and at the request of a majority of the Conservation District Directors involved, has the power to consolidate two or more districts established under the provisions of this Act. The Commission may in the same manner also employ and/or assign technical "experts" for work within the individual Districts, and, the majority of the local Directors have the authority to assign to one or more of their own Directors or to such agents or employees such powers and duties as they may deem proper. This, of course, is the necessary entree for the Regional Political Commissars...

(At this point, the writer explains how the five Directors of each District are selected: Three of them seem to be elected by the people but (as in Russia) they first must be approved by the State Conservation Commission, which is itself a body of five appointed members. The other two District Directors are appointed directly by the appointed Commissioners. Thus is carried out the mandate that regional governance must be by appointed—not elected—officials.

The writer now concludes).

It should be apparent by now that what we are witnessing is a complete destruction of our American concept of "private ownership of property rights" and our right to be governed by elective as opposed to appointive officials. And, that the Conservation District Directors are to be used by the 'experts,' or political commissars....

...This letter is not only being written to you in order that you may know of the nationwide conspiracy that is being perpetrated through "regional government," but to also alert the citizens of my own County and State by my submitting this letter to local newspapers...

Yours very truly,

Cal Steinberger

In this new Regionalized World Government Order now being completed by the Elitist "Establishment," there is a place for an Oligarchy which will own and rule, a place for a Bureaucratic Civil Service which will administer and manage, and a place for the Proletarian Workers and Servers, but there is no place for the once free, land-owning, independent Middle Class. It is being squeezed out of existence through pressure from the top applied by the Elitist Establishment, and through pressure from the bottom applied by radicalized mobs of communists, anarchists, Panthers, Yippies and other pawns, puppets and dupes who think they are fighting the "Establishment," but who actually are financed, trained, and led by members of the "Establishment."

Words once uttered by Winston Churchill—himself an aspiring Oligarch—in reference to a war, seem unusually applicable to our own Nixonian Revolution: "If you will not fight for right when you can easily win without bloodshed; if you will not fight when your victory will be sure and not too costly; you may come to the moment when you will have to fight with all the odds against you and only a precarious chance of survival. There may be even a worse fate. You may have to fight when there is no hope of victory, because it is better to perish than live as slaves."

THE PLAN TO ABOLISH THE STATES IS AS OLD AS ROOSEVELT'S NEW DEAL

REGIONS WERE MAPPED OUT THIRTY-EIGHT YEARS AGO

There appeared in The New York Times Magazine of April 21, 1935, a map of the United States which showed the 48 States divided into "Nine Departments." Under the map was the following explanatory caption: "Map of the United States as it Might be Redrawn by the 'Revisionists'—States' Rights would be Abolished and the Country would be Divided into Nine Departments."

Accompanying that map was an article describing why, how, and when the States were to be abolished and eight, or nine, or ten Regional Departments created to absorb the States, centralizing all power in the Federal Government at Washington, D.C.

Since what was then planned is now being accomplished, we herewith republish this entire article, word-for-word as it appeared 38 years ago in The New York Times. We do this partly because of the article's historical interest, but also because it offers solid proof of the existence of a Conspiracy, and because it proves that, as FDR was wont to say, "They planned it that way."

The complete, unabridged article follows:

NINE GROUPS INSTEAD OF THE 48 STATES

A Proposal for Rebuilding the Structure of Government in Order to Deal With Issues on a National Scale

(By Delbert Clark)

Washington—There is a growing sentiment—it is still too inchoate to be termed a movement—among certain members of Congress with advanced social views and a willingness to break with tradition, in favor of drastic change in our form of government to facilitate nation-wide reforms frequently blocked by the very nature of our confederation. Since, obviously, there is political dynamite in any proposal to abolish States in so far as they provide a check upon the Federal Government, no one has yet dared to broach publicly the thesis that the abolition would be in the public interest and is, in fact, a distinct possibility in the somewhat distant future. Yet there are those who feel that the change should be made.

The reasons advanced for such a revolutionary step are on their face sound enough. A study of our recent legislative history, beginning with the imposition of a Federal income tax in the Wilson administration, reveals clearly that virtually every great national reform movement, economic or social, has brought up short against constitutional inhibitions against Federal regulation of intrastate matters.

A Federal income tax could not be imposed until the long, tedious process of amending the Constitution had been carried through. A National prohibition law could not be obtained without amendment of the Constitution. Equal suffrage had to go the same route; there is pending a constitutional amendment to permit the abolition, on a national scale, of child labor. None of these measures, good or bad, could be adopted without altering our basic law, and, what is of almost equal importance, none of them could be nullified without going through the same process in reverse.

But even these are relatively minor difficulties. It may well be a good thing that important changes are confronted with so formidable a hurdle as a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress and a three-fourths vote of the States. The really alarming feature, these men assert, is the fact that in times of genuine emergency, when traditional State sovereignty must be forgotten for the common welfare, emergency acts of the Federal Government can be effectively nullified by the fact that there exist State lines which cannot be crossed by that great national policeman.

The time has come, they say, when we should realize that the functions of the Federal Government have become much more than those of a peace officer, when the progressive welding of forty-eight States into one nation calls for recognition, through revision of what has become a cumbersome instrument of government.

This talk has arisen largely under the New Deal which has brought to the fore urgent national problems that can be met only on a national scale; proposed remedies are often virtually checkmated by the fact of State sovereignty. The industrial control features of the National Industrial Recovery Act have been repeatedly declared unconstitutional in the inferior Federal courts; the controverted Section 7a, governing labor relations, has only recently been held unconstitutional except in interstate commerce, and the term "interstate" so construed as virtually to nullify the operations of the section under any circumstances.

Attacks on the constitutionality of the power development program of the Federal Government, on its regulation of national resources such as lumber and oil, on its efforts at slum clearance, have multiplied to such an extent that New Deal administrators go about these days with their fingers habitually crossed.

And it is not always the Federal foot that the shoe pinches. Only a few weeks ago a sovereign State—New York—was told by the Supreme Court of the United States that it must not regulate the price of milk within its borders if that milk was produced in another State, since that would constitute an interference with interstate commerce.

While many of the more advanced school do not necessarily quarrel with these decisions on legal grounds, they are tremendously irked by the system which makes them possible. It takes a very great judge indeed, they admit, to fly in the face of tradition and establish an important precedent. Even those who would shy away from any suggestion of fundamental change in our instrument of government believe some action is necessary, or if not action then change of method, if all reform legislation of a national character is not to be hampered by liberal-minded court opinions.

Among those who believe the courts should accept social and economic change as a controlling factor in approving or nullifying legislation, and who are profoundly dissatisfied with the (to them) artificial barriers provided by State lines, is Senator Wagner of New York.

Senator Wagner, himself a lawyer and former justice of a high State tribunal, and sponsor in his Senatorial career of much social reform legislation, believes that adherence to the letter of a document adopted nearly 150 years ago by thirteen seaboard States, with few of our present problems, tends to make of that document a dead thing, rather than the living organism it was intended to be. Such interpretation, he believes, is contrary to the best legal thought of our whole history, and he foresees what might amount to a blockade of "public welfare" legislation unless State frontiers cease to be barriers in the path of social advancement.

There are, he pointed out recently, two major considerations before the Supreme Court when it is called upon to determine the constitutionality of a given law. The first is: "Does the legislation violate due process of law or infringe liberty of contract?" This, he added, "involves determination of whether the force of government has overstepped the boundary that separates it from freedom of the individual under our constitutional system." The second consideration is: "Has the Federal Government acted within the limits of its delegated authority under the commerce clause, or has it overstepped the boundary that separates national action from State action?"

Neither of these boundaries, said Senator Wagner, should be fixed or inflexible, because "changing social and economic conditions transmute personal questions into social questions and State issues into national issues." As an example of what once was considered unconstitutional in that it infringed on the rights of the individual, the Senator recalled a decision in 1904, when the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a New York law prohibiting employment for more than ten hours a day in bakeries. The ground for the court's opinion was that the law constituted a "meddlesome interference" with individual liberty! Yet in 1917 Congress could decree an eight-hour day for all railway employes, and it occurred to no one that this infringed upon the rights of the individual.

Senator Wagner's feeling is perhaps intensified by the fact that he is titular author of the National Industrial Recovery Act, an act which, whatever its purpose later became, was originally intended primarily as a measure of social and business reform. And it is this act which is subject to a more concerted attack than perhaps any other New Deal law. The Senator's own Labor Disputes Bill, now pending, may well face similar attack if it becomes law.

"The question of whether something affects interstate commerce and is therefore subject to national regulation," said the Senator, summing up his argument, "depends upon shifting and complex economic and social facts quite as much as the question of whether a matter is affected with a public interest to the extent necessary to justify State interference with 'freedom of contract'..."

However, Senator Wagner is not yet ready to join the ranks of those who would change our governmental system to facilitate national reform. Going back over the history and development of the Supreme Court, he sees with rising hope a slow but steady progression toward a broader social attitude on the part of that final tribunal. It is his hope and belief that the court itself will solve the problem which he recognizes as so urgent.

Others are not so optimistic. Courts are notoriously slow at best, they point out, and much harmful delay can result through legal process before a case ever reaches the Supreme bench. Any one of the inferior Federal judges could, it is asserted, easily tie up matters for a long time through mistaken judgment or too literal interpretation of the Constitution.

The Revisionists, as they are being called for lack of a better term, believe the only genuine remedy is whatever constitutional change may be necessary to get rid of the troublesome commerce clause. This, they contend, is nothing less than a minor survival of the idea that States might levy tariffs. The levying of tariffs between States was specifically forbidden in the Constitution to which they consented, but the distinction between interstate and intrastate commerce was allowed to remain. This distinction now is little more than a quibble, the Revisionists contend, and should be obliterated.

But how bring about this greater cohesion, this enhancement of the Federal Government's powers to cross State lines for the general good? The most common—albeit the most startling proposal—is to abolish so-called States' rights entirely, preserving State lines only for sentimental reasons, and reapportion the United States into eight or ten great departments, to be locally self-governed but without the power to hamstring the national government in its legislative acts.

Such a plan would envisage a national House of Representatives of the same membership and on the same basis as at present. Each member would be chosen from a Congressional district as now. The Senate, on the other hand, would be made up of an equal number of members from each department, to be elected at large.

On this basis the membership of the Senate might be the same as now, or it might be slightly larger or smaller. For example, if there were eight departments there could be twelve Senators at Large from each department. Or if there were ten departments, there could be 100 Senators, with ten from each department. Or with nine departments, there could be ninety Senators. The Governor of each department would be chosen at large by popular vote.

The matter of local autonomy, the proponents of this scheme say, could be worked out as a detail in the larger plan. It could, perhaps, apply to police and fire protection within the department, and to public schools, sanitation and the like. But taxation, general social and economic regulation, in fact, anything for which there would be no valid reason for local differentiation, would be in the province of the Federal Government.

There would be a uniform system of marriage and divorce, a uniform system of social insurance and labor regulation, uniform national banking and uniform traffic regulations. And since the departmental governors, while elective, would be responsible to the President just as county Sheriffs are now responsible to the Governor of a State, sufficient uniformity could be had in primary education and other matters intimately affecting the national weal.

To provide for strictly local expenses, a pro rata share of the national revenue would be turned over to the departments. Elimination of party duplicating systems, it is held, would make possible vast economies.

To those who suggest that such a centralization of functions would make for a tremendous bureaucracy and unutterable confusion, its proponents blandly reply that things could not be much worse confounded than at present, and add that obviously such a system would have to be worked out in minute detail long in advance of execution. As for bureaucracy, they point to the already lengthening arm of the Federal Government, and hint that it might be less wasteful if it were extended a bit further.

To the argument that elimination of this particular set of checks and balances, making it possible to enact all sorts of vital legislation by a simple act of Congress, would invite the danger of large numbers of ill-considered laws being foisted on the citizenry, reply is made that on the other hand, bad laws would be equally easy to get rid of.

There is no purpose to abolish the Constitution or deprive the Supreme Court of its self-assumed power to pass on legislation. There would still be that system of checks—the whole Federal process remaining the same, except that State governments as such would cease to exist.

Strange as it may seem, a mutuality of interest among the States follows roughly sectional lines. There are problem children, whose cases the Revisionists would weigh before tossing a State into the appropriate basket. One proposed division would be approximately as follows:

(1) Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut—all New England.

(2) New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and West Virginia.

(3) Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Kentucky and Tennessee.

(4) Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas.

(5) Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Missouri.

(6) Michigan, Ohio, Illinois and Indiana.

(7) Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas.

(8) Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah and Colorado.

(9) Washington, Oregon and California.

Obviously many quarrels would arise before this grouping could be carried to a successful conclusion. For example, there is West Virginia, orphan child of the war between the States. Virginia might want to reclaim this lost province, but on the other hand, its dominant industry would appear to place it with Pennsylvania.

Tennessee and Kentucky also present problems, particularly Kentucky. Are they North, East or South? Both would vehemently deny any affiliation, spiritual or otherwise, with the North, yet Northern Kentucky might well be affiliated with Ohio. And there is strong reason to suspect that neither would choose to amalgamate with the States along the lower Mississippi. The proponent of this particular line-up contends that their principal interest lies with the States to the east.

The problem of designations for the proposed departments would be considerable. Certainly, to avoid strife, any thought of designations suggesting present State names would have to be discarded.

The first group is simple enough—the Department of New England. But thereafter the difficulty starts. How devise a name to describe that great commercial group bounded by New York on the north and West Virginia on the south? “Department of Commerce” obviously would never do. Urbana has been suggested, or simply the Department of the Middle Atlantic.

Sloping southward to the region of chronic Statehood, the third department could be called the Department of the Irreconcilables, or merely the Department of the South Atlantic.

Group 4 might well be named the Department of the Gulf, the Department of the Mississippi, or, to please Louisiana, the Cote d’Azur.

Group 5 suggests the Department of the Southwest, or, more poetically, of the Frontier.

Group 6 would undoubtedly like to get away from “Middle West,” and might be known as the Department of the Inland Seas, or, simply, of the Great Lakes.

Group 7 suggests the Department of the Prairies, or perhaps the Department of Experimentation.

Group 8 and Group 9 are relatively easy: the Department of the Rockies and the Department Transmontane, or, if you prefer, the Department of the Pacific.

No one seems to have worked out anything resembling a definite plan for altering the Federal Constitution. The very nature and origin of our form of government are such that unforeseen questions arise. Could it be brought about by a simple constitutional amendment, and if so, would an amendment of so fundamental a nature require the affirmative vote of more than three-fourths of the States to validate it?

Aside from the strictly legal and mechanical problems involved, clearly the greatest difficulty in the path of such a profound reorganization of our political system is sheer pride of Statehood. While generally stronger in the East than in the West, this sentiment is a powerful force. There has appeared of late a remarkable resurgence of State consciousness, a self-assertiveness on the part of States some of which in the old pre-depression days hardly knew they had boundaries.

Whether the issue will ever be raised is a moot question. The revisionists may never be heard from publicly—especially if the Federal courts soon experience a miraculous transformation and begin with unanimously interpreting law in the light of social change.

AND NOW TO PURCHASE THE PEACE

ONE MORE KOREA

Neither victory nor defeat, neither war nor peace, simply a cessation of shooting in a no-win, undeclared conflict. Save for the billions spent for munitions, the denuded land, and the hundreds of thousands dead and maimed, things are as they were twelve years ago when our part in the savagery first began. All seems negative; nothing accomplished, nothing gained, except that those still living may return to their homes and some of the POWs may be reunited with their families.

The way the shooting ceased raises many questions. Perhaps it all has been mere coincidence, and it could be that we all have become overly skeptical, but the world's most skillful playwright could not have timed the final succession of events more dramatically, or more profitably for the people in power. One recalls that, at the precise time best calculated to win the most votes, Herr Kissinger announced that Peace was at Hand. Post-election events proved Sir Henry at least a very poor prophet; so heavy bombings ensued. These, however, were halted at the most propitious moment possible: just before the day the Christian world celebrates as the birthdate of the Prince of Peace. Next, just before the gala Inauguration Ceremonies were to begin, Herr Kissinger went a-winging abroad to arrange the terms of a cease-fire agreement.

By this time the Congress was becoming restive, rebellious and ready to declare open legislative and legalistic warfare upon the Executive Branch of the Government. The denizens of the White House Executive Offices may believe that theirs is a dictatorial hold over the entire Federal machine but the Congress still holds the power of the purse if it has the temerity to use that power, and too flagrant a defiance of the representatives of the people could be very dangerous. Whereupon, two days before the President was to deliver his State of the Union message to the Congress, the needed olive branch was flown from Paris by Herr Kissinger. The President secured prime time on radio and television to announce that "the Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace in Vietnam was initialed by Dr. Henry Kissinger on behalf of the United States...The agreement will be formally signed by the parties participating in the Paris Conference on Vietnam on Jan. 27, 1973, at the International Conference Center in Paris. The ceasefire will take effect at 2400 Greenwich Mean Time (7 P.M. Eastern Standard Time) Jan. 27, 1973."

Congressional response was, for the major part, as expected; no more thoughts of open rebellion; Nixon and Kissinger were jolly good fellows, etc., etc. Barry Goldwater gushingly boasted that never in American history has a President "acted so courageously.... The American people owe President Nixon a deep debt of gratitude (and) his critics owe him an apology." Ted Kennedy was relieved, Hubert Humphrey was optimistic. Senator Frank Church, himself a liberal dove, led the opposition minority by reminding all that this is not a peace treaty, "it is no more than a truce, and it may last no longer than the earlier truce in 1954 when the French withdrew."

South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu was not taken in as was the United States Congress. He told his people plainly that this was a cease-fire and nothing more. "Let me say frankly of the peace accord to be signed in three days that I only consider it as a cease-fire agreement. As to whether or not we will have real peace, we must wait and see.... In the days to come we will see if the Communists will observe the agreement."

Nixon called it "An Agreement on Ending the War and Restoring Peace," but is it any such thing? Let us look at the facts, as admitted by Herr Kissinger in his 65-minute television performance:

There are in South Vietnam some 145,000 Vietcong troops, fully armed and not to be evacuated; they are to remain in South Vietnam. They have been told by their political leaders that they are of the army of the true Vietnamese Government, and that the Army of the South is a rebel army. Exactly the same story—with variations to fit the political differences—is being told the South Vietnamese troops, who remain fully armed and determined to defend their government which is headquartered in Saigon. With armed troops still facing each other and with no political settlement having been concluded, how long can a cease-fire be expected to last?

Again: This cease-fire agreement has to do only with Vietnam. The fighting still continues in Laos and in Cambodia, where the Communists could take over with ease when and if American bombers are removed from Thai airbases and American advisers are removed from Laos or Cambodia.

OR ONE MORE CHINA ?

We began this letter by inferring that Vietnam has become "one more Korea." However, we may have been overly optimistic. Actually, this looks like "one more China." You'll remember how George Marshall—the one who was riding a horse when Pearl Harbor was attacked—went to Chungking to tell Chiang Kai-shek that he should agree to the formation of a coalition government with that agrarian reformer, Mao Tse-tung. Chiang refused, and the results are now displayed that all the world may see what happens when an alliance with the Communists is offered, and refused (just as the Nations of Eastern Europe are displayed for all the world to see what happens when an alliance with the Communists is offered, and is accepted).

Kissinger, on this occasion, went to Paris and suggested that a coalition government be formed between Saigon and Hanoi; and, like Chiang in 1945, Thieu in 1972 refused to form an alliance with the Communists. Most of Kissinger's effort from then on was expended, not in compromising with the Communists, but in forcing Thieu into accepting this so-called truce.

We hold no brief for Thieu; this has been a warlord's gangster shootout ever since the Kennedy Cabinet and the CIA arranged to erase the only honest leaders Vietnam has had in the past twenty-five years. But facts are facts and cannot forever be hidden.

We mention Communist China as an example of what now must happen to Vietnam, for yet another reason:—

In previous letters we have stated our firm belief that the International Bankers and the Multinational Industrialists are building for themselves a new Corporative Government Cabal which will supersede in authority all established political governments. We also have stated that the forces behind Nixon are determined to restructure the Government of the United States in such a way that it will become a part of this Corporative World Government, with Soviet Russia, Communist China, and the Corporative United States forming a political triumvirate which will rule the world politically and militarily, on behalf of the Internationalist and the Multinationalist Elite.

Few conservatives dare to agree with us publicly, although agents of the Cabal often boast of their plans in their own specialized and restricted-circulation publications. Now and then, in some unexpected periodical, we find printed facts, usually presented in such a way that they will create excitement and sales for the publication, but no other action or reaction.

For example, in the December 1972 issue of Saga, the magazine for men, there appeared an article dealing with America's Multinational Corporations titled Money Legions on the March, written by Edward Hymoff, which we suspect may be a pseudonym. But there are facts presented in the article that should be taken seriously. The author says:

"The American multinationals are postwar creations. Companies like Standard Oil, IBM, DuPont, Continental Can, March Pharmaceuticals, and a host of other well-known names on Wall Street's Big Board... began to fill the gap left by disabled European business firms whose industrial plants had been destroyed by Allied bombs. These American companies have grown so big that they have become mini-countries. The top man is virtually a president of a worldwide empire. He has a "cabinet" composed of his top vice presidents, a staff of economic advisers who know what's happening at all times anywhere in the world, and a vice president for foreign trade who is the equivalent of the Secretary of State in Washington. Furthermore, to keep an eye on what's happening, the multinationals have their own overseas secret agents who ferret out any information that will contribute to corporate profits.

"I pledge allegiance to my company, and to the profits for which it stands," is the unwritten oath of fidelity to these multinational corporations.... Prof. Howard V. Perlmutter of the University of Pennsylvania's prestigious Wharton School of Finance predicts that a global industrial system of some 300 multinational supergiant conglomerates will virtually control the world in the 1980s.

...IBM, for example, conducts business in 109 countries backed by a work force of nearly a quarter of a million employees... With that kind of financial power, the multinationals aren't going to let any government stand in their way...."

But author Hymoff perhaps inadvertently gives the clue as to how the multinationals will use governments for their own ends when he gives a partial quotation of a statement made by a man who your editor knew and served as a Marine way back in 1927:

"I helped make Mexico safe for American oil interests in 1914,' wrote Marine Corps Major General Smedley D. Butler, deceased, who ended his military career under house arrest. 'I helped make Haiti and Cuba a decent place for the National City Bank boys to collect revenue in. I helped purify Nicaragua for the international banking house of Brown Brothers... Looking back on it, I might have given Al Capone a few hints.' (Butler, who in the mid-30s was in line to become Commandant of the Marine Corps, addressed a luncheon and spoke his thoughts... (he) was placed under house arrest, denied promotion to Commandant and was shortly thereafter honorably retired from the Marine Corps. He became an outspoken critic of politicians and the business interests which supported them).

"Mayhem sponsored by the multinationals today is handled more circumspectly. Distinguished in appearance, soft-spoken in demeanor, business barons get together regularly to exchange notes and promote deals. Last March a number of such men who direct the affairs of the multinationals met in Versailles, near Paris. The big names were all there: execs from General Motors, Ford, Fiat, British Petroleum, Standard Oil, Armco Steel, Caterpillar Tractor, Allied Chemical, Imperial Chemical, IBM, DuPont, Anaconda Copper, and a host of other multinational representatives.... Also at this meeting were 'observers' from behind the Iron Curtain...."

The author neglects to mention that what he is describing is one of the annual meetings of the Bilderberger Group; nor does he add that, in addition to the Soviet observers, there also were participants representing the governments of all of the Nations having Central Banking facilities. But his point is obvious: The Internationals and the Multinationals may have their own Cabinets and their own secret service facilities, as well as their own banking arrangements; but it would be rather redundant for them to maintain their own armies and defense forces when, as General Butler said, they can use the standing armies of the established political powers to protect their economic interests; so they merely take control of the existing Governmental machinery and wield such power for the protection of their own interests. And the Master Plan calls for the creation of a Troika, a triumvirate of powers each equal to each of the others and each competing against the others, and all usable by the Controlling Elite; this Troika of equals to be composed of The United States, the Soviet Union, and the People's Republic of China.

To compete this new division of the world, it is necessary that Russia and China also be equal industrially and productively to the United States. That is why Multinationals now are rushing into the Soviet Union like a flood: banks, factories, car makers, hotel builders, computer constructors, data bank keepers, credit card companies, etc., etc.

ALL THIS AND CHINA TOO !

It may have seemed that we had forgotten the original theme of this newsletter. Not so. Let us now look to Asia:

One of the giant ventures of the multinational world-changers has been the development of the fabulously rich Mekong River Delta, which is a great part of the reason for the igniting of a Vietnam War in the first place. Now, if Red China is to become an equal partner in this developing World Troika, then Red China must be able to contribute something more than heroin, tobacco, and manpower for the World Traders and their Bankers. And, an ideal solution was seen long ago by the New World Builders: get Red China interested, politically and productively, in this Mekong Delta project.

But this would take time and great patience; which again partly accounts for the length of the Vietnamese War. China was isolated, and seemed quite satisfied in being so. She separated from Soviet influence because she preferred to go it alone in both Asia and Africa, and even in Cuba. Hers not to divide the world with others, but to conquer the world for herself and by herself. It took great patience and cajolery to convince Cathay that entering into a partnership with USA and USSR could be to her advantage. In the beginning, Red China didn't even want to be a part of the United Nations. It was here that Richard Nixon earned the gratitude of the Multinationals and won himself another four years in his triumvirate of White Houses. For he (though Kissinger really deserves the credit) got the great red Dragon to emerge from her hibernation and become a third part of One World instead of one of Three Worlds. In credit to Mao (if that is the right word) we are sure he would never have permitted the Middle Kingdom to open its doors to the world, had it not been for the persuasive powers of Chou En-lai, who is more modern in his methods, understands bankers and banking, and prefers to use diplomacy rather than bullets whenever possible.

Now, to demonstrate how Red China was brought into the Mekong Delta Caper (thus probably delaying the alleged peace), we are able to bring you—thanks to an alert correspondent who shall be nameless—the story from one of the Planners' own publications: the Engineering News Record, a McGraw-Hill Construction Weekly. From the ENR of October 12, 1972, page 50:

"The result of eight years' work by the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, an $18 million study of the possibility of harnessing one of the world's busiest rivers for the first time, is now in the hands of officials of Southeast Asia's four Mekong River nations, Thailand, Laos, Cambodia and South Vietnam....

"Rising in the icy wastes of China's Tibetan plateau region, the Mekong glides 2,800 miles across Indochina, then dumps its sediment into the South China Sea. On its way, the river separates Laos from Thailand, cuts a swath across the Khmer Republic (formerly Cambodia), and then splits into half a dozen branches that form South Vietnam's steamy delta rice lands.... BuRec Commissioner Ellis L. Armstrong calls the study 'one of the most interesting, impressive and potentially beneficial projects the Bureau of Reclamation has undertaken'."

So much for the background picture. Now, we quote from the December 7, 1972 issue of the same ENR:

HELP FROM UPSTREAM

Chinese are expected to join in developing huge Mekong basin

"China is believed to be preparing to extend cooperation for the first time to the four

Mekong basin nations trying to develop the big river and its tributaries into a vast Indo-chinese version of the Tennessee Valley Authority. A strong sign that such a move may be imminent is the visit to Peking recently of U Nyun, chief executive of the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE).

...Nyun's trip was aimed at laying the groundwork for active membership for China in the regional body. Nyun is understood to have briefed the Chinese on the organization's activities and specific projects in which Peking's participation or support would be most valued....

And now, the final article is from the ENR issue of December 21, 1972:

"Despite dimming hopes of an early Indochina peace settlement, representatives of the four Mekong River nations quietly went to Washington last week to tell top Administration officials how they think a major chunk of President Nixon's $7.5-billion estimate of postwar construction needs in Southeast Asia should be spent.... The governments made their low-key approach as members of the four-nation Mekong Coordinating Committee, which seeks to harness the big river and its tributaries to get the war-scarred economies moving....

"...the Indochinese nations and neighboring Thailand are eager to start the program moving. They were also heartened recently by the news that China may be ready to cooperate to some extent in the development of the Mekong....

"The Mekong group regards itself as strictly nonpolitical. Members are identified as Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam (South and North Vietnam are considered to be a single political entity)."

Need we call your particular attention to the importance of the preceding parenthesized statement? That South and North Vietnam be considered a single political entity is exactly what the Communists contend, and what the South Vietnamese have been fighting about for 20 years. And these are the terms under which Red China agreed to take part in the spending of $7.5-billion of our tax money to build an Asian TVA!

THE BATTLE FOR THE PLANNED AND PROGRAMMED BUDGET

HEAPING ASH UPON OUR HEADS

The Constitution commands that the President "shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall deem necessary and expedient." But, in these latter days of the Republic, Federal officials have begun to treat the Constitution as though it were but a multi-State treaty that was made to be broken. Hence, it came as little surprise and with little question, when the newly re-elected Nixon chose to ignore the custom of delivering a State of the Union message. Instead, he submitted a reorganization plan and another unbalanced budget.

Avoiding Congress as much as possible, Nixon chose to challenge the representatives of the people by greeting the families awaiting the return of their prisoner-of-war repatriate fathers, brothers, sons and/or husbands with the assurance that the Vietnamese War is over, but "now we are engaged in a new battle, the battle of the budget."

He chided Congress for over-spending, but he did not promise a balanced budget; his proposed budget is American history's biggest. Indeed, the time when either Presidents or lawmakers spoke of balancing the budget, now seems like ancient history. The big fight of the moment is not really about how much or how little of your money and mine is to be spent. Rather, the Great Controversy revolves around the question of where the big money is to be spent, and who is to be in charge of the spending of it. In an attempt to cover up the real issues, the national newsmedia—all seemingly on Nixon's side—speaks of a spendthrift Congress and a penny-pinching President. One newsmagazine goes so far as to announce that the "Nixon Revolution" now has become the "Nixon Counter-Revolution," and that the "old Nixon" is back in the saddle. Featured are posed camera shots of "Ash & Weinberger with Copies of the Budget at Government Printing Office, Trying to return to a simpler day of local solutions." Nixon aides are quoted as saying that this biggest budget in bureaucratic history is but the "opening barrage in a campaign to redirect social policy in this country."

But this is mostly camouflage, smokescreen and semantics. The real battle is being waged against the powerful executive Office of Management and Budget, and against the man who has been appointed to head that office, without Congressional approval, the controversial figure being one Roy Ash, late of Litton Industries.

While various and sundry lawsuits involving Ash's activities while at Litton are being aired in assorted courtrooms around the country, the Senate has before it a bill that would make mandatory Senate confirmation and approval of such appointments as that of Mr. Ash.

Senator Lee Metcalf of Montana did some important homework on the subject of OMB, and presented his findings to the Senate on January 26th. Historical facts concerning OMB are hard to come by; therefore we quote freely from Senator Metcalf's memorandum:

The purpose of legislation before our committee is to provide for Senate confirmation of appointments to the offices of Director and Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget. This would assure the Senate an opportunity to inquire into the qualifications, fitness and background of these officials which now exercise vast policy-making and managerial powers in the Federal Government. It would also provide the Congress with a greater opportunity to examine the policy-thinking of these officials and become more informed about the operations of the Office of Management and Budget, in the same manner as any other agency whose head is subject to Senate confirmation.

Prior to 1921, no provisions existed in the national government for the formulation by any agency of a single, consolidated statement of the prospective revenues and the estimated expenditure needs of the government in order to guide the Congress in determining what policies and programs should be adopted. Congress sought to resolve this problem by passing the Budgeting and Accounting Act of 1921 which, among other things, established a national budget system and created a Bureau of the Budget to advise and assist the President in developing a unified budget for submission to the Congress. The Senate felt that the director of this Bureau and his assistant should be subject to Senate confirmation. The House disagreed. The conference Committee reported the bill, which was adopted, without the requirement of confirmation. . . .

However, vast changes have occurred in both the structure and the responsibilities of the Bureau since its establishment as a small, personal budgetary staff for the President. It has become a super department with life and death control over all of the Executive branch departments and agencies, as well as over all of the policies and programs enacted by the Congress.

In the name of the President, this Bureau, now known as the Office of Management and Budget, with a staff of nearly 700, has become the chief administrative office of the Federal Government. It determines line by line budget limitations for each agency, including the regulatory commissions which are supposed to be the "arms of Congress." After Congress appropriates the money and determines its own priorities, it is the OMB that puts together the program of impounding those funds in accord with the President's priorities. . . . After Congress passes a law, it is the OMB that writes the general guidelines and regulations for the agencies to be following in the enforcement of the Congressional mandate. While the Congress is considering legislation, it is the OMB that coordinates the Executive's legislative recommendations and controls the flow of Executive Branch information which is sought by Congress in making its judgments.

When agencies disagree with each other, the OMB resolves the conflicts, whether they be over programs or management. When agency heads strike out on their own, or assert policies inconsistent with Executive policy, it is the OMB which puts pressure on the divisions and bureaus of the agencies to bring the agency heads back into line.

Since 1921, both Congress and the Chief Executive have conveyed additional powers on the Bureau (OMB) and its Director which have extended and shifted its primary role to that of a management agency with line operating authority. The Budgeting and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950 gave the Director sweeping powers over agency accounting and budget systems and classifications, over statistical, performance and cost information systems, and the preparation of cost-based budgets. These fiscal management powers were strengthened by the Congress in 1956.

Fiscal and policy control over automatic data processing equipment for the Federal Government is lodged with the OMB. The Director issues the rules and regulations for coordinating Federal aid programs in metropolitan areas under the Model Cities legislation. Under the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968, the President delegated to the Director authority to issue rules with respect to the administration of grant-in-aid funds, special and technical services to State and local governments and the formulation, evaluation and review of Federal programs having a significant impact on area community development. . . .

The Director (of OMB), along with the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, determines federal pay comparability adjustments. He issues regulations with regard to Government employee training programs. Under the Federal Reports Act, he holds the ultimate power to determine what vital questionnaires, surveys, reports and other investigative inquiries will be promulgated by the agencies, including the regulatory commissions, and what specific information will be sought. The Director is authorized by Congress to manage and monitor through investigation and regulation the hundreds of public advisory committees to the Federal agencies including making the determination as to what shall be closed or open to the public.

In addition, the Director and his staff oversee the management and expenditures of national security programs, international programs, defense expenditures, natural resource programs and many other matters directly affecting the economy and security of the country. Furthermore, the OMB manages for the President transfers of funds between classes of appropriations, as authorized by Congress; programming of appropriated funds which involves the shifting of funds within an account after Congressional clearance; and the transfer of funds from one year to the next, involving the determination and management of carry-over balances. These are subtle and complicated areas of fiscal management, but nonetheless important in the areas of national policy. . . .

The best description for this expanded management role for the Budget Bureau can be found in the President's Message and Reorganization Plan No. 2, which he sent to the Congress in 1970, and which was approved. The very name change—from Budget Bureau to Office of Management and Budget—indicated the shifting role and priorities. The President said, in part:

"Creation of the Office of Management and Budget represents far more than a mere change of name for the Bureau of the Budget. It represents a basic change in concept and emphasis, reflecting the broader management needs of the Office of the President. The new Office will still perform the key function of assisting the President in the preparation of the annual Federal budget and overseeing its execution. It will draw upon the skills and experience of the extraordinarily able and dedicated career staff developed by the Bureau of the Budget. But preparation of the budget as such will no longer be its dominant overriding concern.

"While the budget function remains a vital tool of management, it will be strengthened by the greater emphasis the new office will place on fiscal analysis. The budget function is only one of several important management tools that the President must now have. He must also have a substantially enhanced institutional staff capability in other areas of executive management—particularly in program evaluation and coordination, improvement of Executive Branch organization and information and management systems."

Senate Bill 518, which would require Senate confirmation of Roy Ash as Director of the Office of Management and Budget, was introduced jointly by Senators Sam J. Ervin, Jr. (North Carolina) and Robert C. Byrd (West Virginia). Speaking for himself and Sen. Byrd, Mr. Ervin said, in part:

"The Director of OMB is in many respects the deputy President of the United States, for this Agency has become the arm by which the President exercises power over every facet of the executive branch. The decisions made by the OMB Director are fully as important as those made by the President himself, yet neither the Director nor his deputy are accountable to the Congress. Their appointments are not subject to confirmation by the Senate and the custom has been to protect them from testifying before Congress by entering executive privilege. OMB has come to possess unbridled power. In effect, it exercises life and death power over the statutory departments and agencies—even the independent agencies—from within the White House walls. It has undertaken to revise the budgets of the departments, to impound lawfully appropriated funds, and even to terminate programs that have been authorized and funded by Congress. . . .

"The growth of OMB as a super agency accentuates the concentration of power in the executive. . . . Also serving to make this legislation necessary is the controversy that has enveloped President Nixon's choice as Director of OMB, Roy Ash. . . . Certainly the Congress and the American people should have an opportunity to scrutinize any official who will exercise powers as extensive as those possessed by the OMB Director, and to pass on his qualifications. . . ."

So much for the statements of Senators, that leave much to be desired by anyone who is the least bit conversant with that international computerized system of performance accountability called Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS). Sen. Metcalf, in his memorandum on OMB, named most of the ingredients when he defined the extraordinary powers possessed by the OMB Director, but he failed to give a name to the finished production. Either through fear or lack of knowledge (or perhaps inability to explain its complications) Senators and Representatives avoid any mention of PPBS in their criticisms of the Executive Branch. And perhaps their fears are well founded: Former Congressman John Schmitz of California did venture a few criticisms of PPBS and the denizens of the White House led a campaign for his defeat.

It seems that not a single opponent of OMB or of its controversial Director, dares to declare that the Office of Management and Budget was evolved and given its extraordinary powers—the Congress concurring in every step of its growth—because OMB was to be established as the Headquarters and the Control Center of that New American Revolutionary Plan called PPBS!

There is much criticism—valid criticism—of Roy Ash as Director of OMB. But, if his background is studied carefully, it could be concluded that just such an unscrupulous, conscienceless brain is demanded of any person chosen to manage OMB and head PPBS. Any other kind of person would fail for lack of ability, or quit for reasons of conscience.

Let us examine Roy Ash's qualifications for the Directorship of OMB; and we are using statements appearing in either The Washington Post of Jan. 2, 1973, or The New York Times of Jan. 28, 1973; both being considered worthy, credible and quotable by friends of the Nixon Administration:

In 1948 Roy Ash was working for the Bank of America, and Charles B. Thornton was employed by the Ford Motor Co. Thornton went to work at that time as assistant general manager of Howard Hughes Aircraft division. One of Thornton's first acts was to hire Roy Ash as assistant controller of Hughes Aircraft. Together, and without the knowledge of Howard Hughes, they devised a "systems control" whereby "The Air Force was unknowingly paying millions of dollars extra to Hughes Aircraft for weapons-control systems." The "irregular practices" led to an upheaval during which a number of high-ranking and reputedly honest public accountants quit rather than go on working for Roy Ash and his boss Tex Thornton. Things were getting a bit too hot for the two master-minds at Hughes; so—

Charles Litton, who had founded an electronics manufacturing company, was willing to sell his business. Thornton and Ash decided to buy, but they needed money; so Thornton went to New York City and raised $1.5 million which was used to buy out Mr. Litton (now deceased). A four-way partnership was arranged: Thornton became chief executive officer, Ash became the chief fiscal officer, Hugh W. Jamieson (a former Hughes Aircraft engineer) became the engineering head, and Emmet T. Steele was in charge of "military relations" (the most lucrative of future Litton contracts would be with the Department of Defense.)

Then Thornton and Ash began edging their partner, Steele, out of the profit picture. In 1959, Steele sued the three other men, alleging that they had deprived him of his rightful share of the Litton business through fraud and deceit. Steele won a verdict in April 1965, for a total of $7.6 million; but the judge declared it a mistrial and ordered a new trial, which would have begun last September. However, two weeks before the retrial was to begin, Steele was found dead in his Beverly Hills swimming pool. The trial was set for a later date. However, on November 28, President Nixon announced that he would make Roy Ash Director of OMB. Whereupon, Thornton and Ash were able to announce on December 5 that there had been a settlement of the Steele case: The Steele estate was given $2.4 million in full settlement of all charges. Asked why such an enormous amount of money when they might have won in the retrial, Ash told a reporter that he feared a jury inflamed by passion and prejudice might return a verdict for even more. "I think," said Ash, "that when one comes up against a widow and an orphan case, as this is, the defendants just have to look at the experiences others have had in similar circumstances."

Ash admitted that the $2.4 million "to some people sounds like a lot of money... but the number of shares that he (Steele) at that time claimed... this $2.4 million is a very small proportion of what that number of shares would be worth today."

Still pending is a libel suit brought by Noah Dietrich against Litton Industries and Tex Thornton, in which Roy Ash is indirectly involved. This, too, is a "re-trial." On March 11, 1968, Mr. Dietrich was awarded $6,125,000 in damages by a Los Angeles jury; but the trial judge ordered a new trial. The judge actually tried to order a reversal of the verdict in the original trial, but the Court of Appeals wouldn't approve, ordered another trial instead, which is due to begin next April 24. And Mr. Ash will be "a central figure just as he was the first time around," said Mr. Dietrich's lawyer.

As for the millions Ash and Thornton have made through manipulating Defense Department contracts, and through other PPBS shenanigans, no accounting can be expected and no action against Ash as Director of OMB can be hoped for. The man was made for the job, and the job was made for that kind of man. Only when Senators dare to speak out against and expose PPBS, can we expect a return to sanity and honesty in the administration of Federal affairs.

"LAND USE" IS A PART OF THE CONSPIRACY

NEEDED: THE BLUEPRINT

In his "House Divided" speech, Abraham Lincoln gave eloquent description to a conspiracy which existed in his day. He said:

"We can not absolutely know that all these exact adaptations are the result of preconcert. But when we see a lot of framed timbers, different portions of which we know have been gotten out at different times and places and by different workmen... and when we see these timbers joined together, and see they exactly make the frame of a house or a mill, all the tenons and mortices exactly fitting, and all the lengths and proportions of the different pieces exactly adapted to their respective places, and not a piece too many or too few—not omitting even scaffolding—or, if a single piece be lacking, we can see the place in the frame exactly fitted and prepared to yet bring such piece in—in such case, we find it impossible to not believe that Stephen and Franklin and Roger and James all understood one another from the beginning, and all worked upon a common plan or draft drawn up before the first lick was struck."

Today, though few seem to realize it, we are faced with a far greater, and potentially more dangerous, conspiracy than that envisioned by Mr. Lincoln, and which led eventually to the War Between the States.

However, there is this handicap; Though we see all the individual pieces, and suspect that they are part of a prison that is being assembled to enclose us all, we cannot know the true nature of the finished building unless we can have a look at the Blueprint, or the Master Plan.

We believe that, perhaps too late, the Blueprint has been discovered, and that its true nature has been concealed by its innocent public title: Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. But, having been discovered, the Blueprint remains unreadable to most because it is encoded for the Computer and its symbols and formulae are expressed in semantics and the language of expertese, so that only the Planners and their workmen are expected to be able to read the Blueprint.

Hence, we can refer to one section of this Master Plan which is called "Land Use" and unless we can decipher and translate, the whole program seems desirable and worthy of our full support.

Ecology, Environmental Equality, Economic Development; these are three of the code-terms that will be found on the Blueprint. Respectable and desirable goals in themselves, they mean one thing to the general public and something entirely different to the Planners and their agents. Such worthy terms are used to induce people willingly to surrender their property rights and submit to the socialization of the land itself. Note the sinister use of the semanticized term "Economic Development" in the following communication:

"January 29, 1973

"Mr. Bob Bartel, Liberty Lobby

"Mr. Arch E. Roberts, Committee to Restore the Constitution

"Mr. Don Bell, Don Bell Reports

"Dear Sirs:

"Please refer to Don Bell Reports dated January 12, 1973, entitled "To Complete the Implementation of Autocracy".

"As a follow-up of this report concerning my State of Oklahoma, the following information may prove useful to you: There was passed in our State, a Statute (1971 Title 19, Sections 1101, 2, 3, & 4) entitled 'Economic Development Programs' which set forth the manner in which regional government was to be presented to our citizens. Under this Statute, the County Commissioners can, by resolution, provide for the establishment of a county-wide economic development program, and may provide for the financing thereof from the County General Fund. After the passage of this resolution, the Board of County Commissioners shall create a 'county economic development advisory committee of not more than five members nor more than 15 members.' Its purpose is 'to conduct studies and prepare comprehensive plans... to inventory the services, facilities, and resources of the entire county; to promote, stimulate, and encourage... etc.' Further, 'any two or more counties may jointly and cooperatively undertake programs...; and any county may likewise cooperate with political subdivisions of the county and with other public or private non-profit agencies to achieve the purposes set forth in this act.'

"With this as background, enclosed please find copy of a letter which I sent out to influential persons within my county to alert them to this 'front.' The Osage County Rural Development Committee referred to in the letter is a committee comprised of the hired directors of the following government agencies: SCS (Soil Conservation Service); FHA (Farmers Home Administration); and USU Extension Service (Okla. State Univ.). The term 'INCOG' refers to the 'Indian Nation Councils of Government,' which is one of our eleven statewide Economic Development Districts. At the present time, INCOG is comprised of three counties: Osage, Creek, and Tulsa. The metropolitan area of Tulsa furnished our Metro center.

"Under the County Development Council 'By-Laws,' each member appointed serves for a term of 3 years and they may serve consecutive terms. Further, its officers are elected annually and are eligible for reelection. A majority of Council membership constitutes a quorum, and a majority vote of those present prevails. Voting shall be by roll call and a record call shall be kept as a part of the minutes. All vacancies due to resignation, expiration of term, or death shall be filled by nomination and majority vote of the Council.

Thus, you can see the lack of citizen, taxpayer control and perpetuation of the appointed Council. You may also note that without benefit of a secret ballot, those 'non-conforming' members may eventually be replaced.

"These 'sample By-Laws,' which have been adopted by our county Council, were developed by 'Oklahoma State University Extension Area Specialized Agents'.

"It has been interesting to note some of the appointees to this 'Council.' One is Chairman of the Osage County Housing Authority (which Authority has powers of eminent domain in this field); two are Directors of our Osage County Conservation District (with powers of eminent domain); one is even the present Chairman of the INCOG General Assembly (who is a voting member of the INCOG Board of Directors); and one is Chairman of our Osage County Mental Health Board. This is not to infer that these men are un-American or even liberal; however, it would appear that their usefulness to the behind-the-scene conspirators was at least somewhat 'desired.'

"Yours very truly,

Calvin C. Steinberger,
644 South 6

Faifax, Oklahoma 74637"

(End of extended quotation)

Accompanying the preceding communication was a copy of a letter written to the editors of six local newspapers. That letter read:

Dear.....

The enclosed information should "tie it all in together" for you, so that you might better understand what it is that I have been trying to get across to you for the past two years.

The enclosed list of names concerning the newly formed "Osage County Development Council" is to alert you to the method by which this INCOG "front" is to work. The reputation of many of these men is to be "used" in order to gain respectability and creditability for the Council.

This Council has been appointed by the Osage County Rural Development Committee (principally by Harold Murman on orders from his superiors). Its function will be to (1) Organize study committees, (2) Formulate policy for countywide planning, and (3) To communicate to government officials their findings and recommendations. Its function is not to "implement," as this will be done by and through other government agencies using the power of eminent domain by virtue of the recently passed State Senate Bill No. 101, entitled "Conservation District Act."

The Council has the power (by State Statute 1971 Title 19, Sections 1101, 2, 3, & 4), to hold "public hearings," and it is to be financed by a ½ mill ad valorem tax levy from the General Fund of our County Treasury (incidentally, without the vote of our citizens being necessary!) This levy will amount, at present assessments, to about $23,000 per year.

The information and data that is to be "fed" to this Council will be INCOG's—either directly or through the Tulsa "Office of Community Development." The Tulsa OCD is now headed by Denton Kent, former Executive Director of INCOG. The information concerning "health" will probably be funnelled down through the Tulsa Area Health and Hospital Planning Committee, which is now a legal arm of INCOG in this field.

It is important that you realize that should the taxpayers of Osage County desire to rebel against the findings of this Council, there will be no way for them to change the Council membership. This is because all vacancies on the Council (including dismissals) shall be filled by nomination and majority vote of the Council itself. It may also function with as few as five members.

It is my personal opinion that we shall see in the near future (after these County Councils have become entrenched) that all Revenue Sharing monies to be dispensed must be first cleared through the Council. By cutting off government funds that once went through, say, the Office of Economic Opportunity, the "agitators" will be told that their monies will be available through Revenue Sharing and thereby through the Council. We will then witness the necessary climate for "conflict" which will be used by the conspirators to enforce their ultimate dictatorship.

If we are to lose our cherished governmental system, which is based upon our right to be governed by elected officials (not appointive) and by our right to privately own and freely use our property, let us at least not do so out of ignorance or apathy.

(End of letter)

We are indebted to Mr. Steinberger for these letters. Although he did not mention the Master Plan Acronym, PPBS, he did show graphically and factually how the PPB System is operated to control "Land Use" at the local level. He pointed to the interlocking directorates, agencies, showed how reputable citizens are "used" to promote the long-range objectives, how Revenue Sharing will be used for the control of people, demonstrated how Land Use is a vital part of the plan for Regional Government, and he explained that the function of local councils and committees is not to "implement" but to "recommend," to communicate their findings to higher authorities, from whence all actual orders will emanate. In PPBS, only the "head man" gives the orders and approves the budget.

In Oklahoma, the "Land Use" programming is camouflaged as "Economic Development Programs," with the sub-state regions being called Economic Development Districts. In other States, we find exactly the same programming being conducted as a part of the development of Regional Government which, in its turn, is a part of the overall PPB System for world control of all resources, both natural (land) and human (people).

For example: The same program which Mr. Steinberger has described as operating under the name of "Economic Development" is called "Environmental Development" in California. In Oklahoma, the legislature established eleven regional districts; while in Florida we have ten; and in California:

"The (California) legislature has established multi-purpose governments for nine regions in the state and assigned them responsibility and authority for preparing and carrying out comprehensive regional plans ... The regional plans (must be) in keeping with state policy (because) the regional budget is linked to these plans ..."

One of our California correspondents (without whose help in original research, we would never have been able to write the booklet "Proofs of a Conspiracy") has sent us a copy of a presentation which was made to the California Legislature protesting its Environmental Development Programming which "skirts the real threat and issue facing the formulation of a General Plan Program."

"That threat," warns the writer, "involves the web of a local-state-regional-federal-international 'decentralized,' monolithic framework for environmental resource analysis called PPBS. The elements of the PPBS management-control tool are present in the EDG (Environmental Development Guide) land use proposals.... Authors of the EDG should note that other levels of government-oriented organizations are promoting the PPBS system to change land use concepts so as to destroy American rights in land tenure."

Asking the question, "How can such change take place?" the writer then answers her own question with the following rather complicated but highly important explanation (everything about PPBS is complicated, and designedly so, because it was written by its authors in computerized expertese, and trying to explain it in everyday English first requires the translation from a dead, soulless, dehumanized, code-language):—

“The process begins by sounding the alarm for environmental protection and then applying the formula of PPBS management techniques to help ‘decision-makers’ take ‘corrective’ action.

“In PHASE I, the planning and development period:

1. The ‘environmental,’ social, physical and economic needs are justified.
2. The long-term philosophical and political goals and short-range measurable objectives (or policies) are determined to meet the needs.
3. Programs are formulated to activate the goals and objectives, with program alternatives and ‘local input’ to choose from and revise. Classification systems begin to take form to aid in orderly computer account coding.
4. Priority programs of high importance to goal achievement are selected by evaluation methods applied at the state-federal funding level.
5. Then PPBS PROGRAM BUDGETING (allocating funds to ‘programs’ rather than ‘functions’) locks in the selected programs. As environmental problems cross personal, local, state, national and international lines, during Phase I, Government is Restructured and Regionalized across city, county, state and national boundaries, and Tax Reform is necessary to finance the new obligations of support.

In PHASE II, control by ‘management’ takes hold and there arises mandatory compliance by the system’s variables, called Accountability, as Program Budgeting ripens into Performance Budgeting:

1. Classification of program elements is set for funding purposes utilizing computer account codes.
2. Citizen and Non-Government Participation, which has always been essential in spurring acceptance of the political-change PPBS tool now takes on a serious educational drive into school curriculum and the communications media in the form of indoctrination for the needs of governmental control of ‘environmental’ values and resources.
3. Governmental Taxing Resources become established and committed.
4. Regional Information Systems and Computerized Data Banks are located to store performance input and output.
5. Compliance to policy standards is monitored and evaluated with Observation Systems.

6. Those resisting the controls are recycled, re-educated for compliance, and failure to change brings about termination of funds. Programs which do not further the goals and policies, but which have potential, are also recycled.

“PHASE III is the final level of Centralized Control. Rand Corporation, designer of PPBS, says of the system: ‘The first point to emphasize is that the entire operation must be the personal responsibility of the executive head of the organization. No one at a lower level has the authority or the right to acquire the knowledge required to perform the necessary tasks of coordination.’

“Under PHASE III, Law and Treaties create the Centralized authority of management (which has already raised its head at the international level.)

“Unless the present pressure and action towards PPBS application to land use and management is resisted, concepts of land tenure in the American sense, will become obsolete, and a Total, Managed, Global System will foster decision-makers who will determine the rights of private and public land and all social and economic needs of society. ... Until PPBS is studied and recognized as the ultimate weapon to revolutionize American land use concepts—changing them from the ‘unalienable’ right of persons to own and control private property to an ancient totalitarian system of land tenure—until local and State governments can resist the PPBS trap of federal money—until then, we will be subject to lose the unique freedoms and liberty that we enjoy in America today. And all that in the name of ‘environment’.” (End of extended quotation).

THE CARE AND FEEDING OF PLANNERS

THE ENDANGERING SPECIES

The world is being divided into administrative regions, the socialized states of Europe have always been divided into federal regions for purposes of centralized control, the United States of America has been divided into Ten Federal Regions, the fifty States have been or are being divided into sub-state regions.

At each of these regional levels, from the smallest sub-state planning council to the largest international regional government headquarters, there is need for an army of specially trained, uniquely regimented, dependable and obedient planners and sub-planners.

And there seems to be a dearth of properly conditioned personnel to man the multitudinous planning positions that are about to be established. So, the head head-shrinkers have found it necessary to create some new training schools.

Prime example of this is cited in an article which appeared in the Star-Ledger, Newark, New Jersey, on February 9, 1973:

RAND CORP. TO SHARE ITS KNOWLEDGE

By William Trombley

Los Angeles Times Wire Service

Santa Monica, Calif.—Rand Corp., the Santa Monica-based “think tank” that has been proposing solutions to America’s domestic and military problems for 25 years, has begun to train Ph. Ds in its special field of expertise — policy studies.

The doctoral program, probably the only one in the country operated by a private corporation, was started 2½ years ago but Rand characteristically has delayed announcement of the program until now.

“We wanted to be sure the program was running well before we started talking about it,” said Dr. Charles Wolf, a Rand economist and director of the Rand Graduate Institute, which is offering the Ph.Ds.

Rand’s two rambling structures by the side of the Pacific Ocean provide an unlikely setting for an educational enterprise.

Guards, badges, all-seeing television cameras and files marked “locked” dominate the atmosphere, especially since Daniel Ellsberg skipped out of the place with 47 volumes of “Pentagon papers.”

But not all of Rand is wrapped in a tight security blanket. In recent years, the non-profit corporation has turned some of its attention to U.S. domestic affairs, with studies ranging from educational problems to better deployment of firefighting equipment in New York City.

Now the Rand Graduate Institute has been started to train a small group of advanced students in policy analysis, which Rand describes as “the application of scientific methods to problems of public policy and choice” (and which your editor has described as the “programming” phase of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. Copies of our study, titled “Proofs of a Conspiracy...” are available at $1.50 per copy.)

The basic idea at Rand is that some of the world’s tough problems will yield to solutions based on accurate data and careful analysis. Rand’s researchers have proven they possess the skills themselves. Now they hope to teach them to others. Costs will be lower, Wolf believes, because the faculty members already work for Rand and much of the research expense will be paid by Rand’s clients (the principal client being the United States Government—and we expect you know who pays its bills—Ed.)

Aimed more directly toward the “Planning” phases of the overall PPBS operation, is a project that has been launched by the ever eager Rockefeller Klan. We are informed by one John J. Goldman, a staff writer for the Los Angeles Times, that: “Behind a plain unmarked door in a suite of offices tucked away in Rockefeller Center, a project is starting which could have an important impact on American thought as the nation starts its third century."

"The goal of the ambitious undertaking organized by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller," says Goldman, "is to construct a blueprint for state, national and international problems, to review national goals and philosophies and to present priorities for action in the years after 1976—the 200th anniversary of the republic.

"The governor first outlined his plans at a meeting of his cabinet in Albany Dec. 1. At that time he asked the officials for preliminary papers raising fundamental questions in developing new concepts and fresh thinking about society's goals (an adaptation of the Rand-developed Delphi technique—Ed.).

"The challenges and opportunities of today's world seem to have outrun both the concepts and the institutions available to manage them," Rockefeller told his advisers. "Perhaps even more significant, they seem to have outdistanced the people's confidence in their own capacity to deal with them."

"What is called for," continued Rockefeller, is a new look at the current needs of society and at the ways in which those needs can most effectively be dealt with."

Following through on his new "National and International Goals" scheme, the New York Governor induced the former Delaware Governor—Russell Peterson—to head the new think tank. According to reporter Goldman:

"Several initial steps are already under way. A talent bank is being set up for candidates to serve on study panels. These panels will include women, senior citizens and young people. The hope is to tap some of America's most innovative minds. Leading foreign statesmen, businessmen, social scientists and philosophers may also join the study groups.

"Several themes will almost certainly thread through the deliberations: problems of the world's rapidly increasing population, ways to make the federal, state and free enterprise systems more effective, means of reaching individual citizens and merging their aspirations into a broader vision of what America should be after its 200th birthday. 'The plan is to come up with recommendations at the start of the third century of America,' Peterson said in an interview. 'We'd like to have a plan that is broad.

What we'd like to do is give some judgment on some resources we can bring to bear as a nation and a world and establish priorities at using these resources....'

"The current project recalls a similar undertaking 17 years ago, two years before Rockefeller first ran for governor. At that time, the Rockefeller Brothers' Fund, Inc. issued a report on 'Prospect for America,' which commented on the problems and opportunities facing democracy." (End of article).

But, perhaps more important than either of these new activities of Rank and Rockefeller, is the use to which certain of our State-supported universities are being put in the training and development of Planners who are to assist in the shaping of The New World Society. An important case in point has to do with the University of Hawaii.

We Mainlander Americans are apt to think of the 50th State as a sort of super-deluxe resort area, a wonderful place to visit if and when we can afford the trip, and a group of islands whose chief commercial purpose is to furnish us with pineapple juice. But to those who think in geopolitical terms, the mid-Pacific location of the State of Hawaii makes of it one of the most important spots in all the world (as Roosevelt and Tojo understood so well prior to Pearl Harbor). The geographical situation of Hawaii becomes of extreme importance if and/or when the Planners complete their scheme of building a "Pacific Basin Common Market," similar to the European Common Market and thus requiring oodles and oodles of little Planners to man the bureaucratic posts of yet another Regional Government.

Like Caltec, MIT and similar places of higher technical and scientific training, the University of Hawaii is an important institution. This fact bears on what follows in the next paragraphs:

Remember Harlan Cleveland? A Rhodes Scholar, member of the Council on Foreign Relations, active ADAer, once Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs, U.S. Ambassador to NATO, onetime editor of The Reporter, a "progressive" monthly that favored Fabian designs and was financed by ADA bigwigs.

With the shift from Democratic to Republican Administrations, Cleveland left the Washington scene and went back to University work, as they all seem to do when a change in party leadership demands a housecleaning.

Well, Harlan Cleveland was asked to come out to the Islands and help run the University of Hawaii; along with one Wytze Gorter, also a member of the Council on Foreign Relations. And, suddenly, there developed a great need for a special new course at UH: one devoted to the teaching of World Order and the Concept of Planning.

WORLD ORDER AND THE CONCEPT OF PLANNING

By *William Armbruster

The concept of planning the world of the future is becoming increasingly popular in Hawaii, and the East-West Center is right in the middle of the action – in two ways. First, the Center hosted a workshop on the Design of World Order Models in July, 1972. Secondly, several Senior Fellows and students participated in the establishment of a World Order Program at the University of Hawaii.

Fifteen outstanding scholars from the United States and Asia (including the Soviet Union) attended the Workshop, an outgrowth of the World Order Models Project (WOMP). This is a transnational research project in which teams of scholars from eight regions of the world are developing designs of alternative preferred world political systems for the 1990's. The workshop participants studied the experiences of WOMP, setting the stage for continued planning of a more just and peaceful world order.

They were particularly concerned with the process of world order design, along with the question of what the world of the future should be like. Among the questions discussed in relation to the planning process were the roles of conflicting values and ideologies and the designation of those areas in which different nations could agree to cooperate. One of the more specific workshop sessions was a practice design exercise on the administration of the oceans and the measures for controlling underwater armaments. Another session was devoted to the teaching of world order design.

War and Peace

One of the highlights of the week was a public lecture by one of the participants, Saul Mendlovitz, professor of international law at Rutgers, and director of WOMP. Other participants included Georgy Arbatov, director of the Institute of the U.S.A. in Moscow; Yoshikazu Sakamoto, director of the Japanese WOMP team and professor of law and political science at the University of Tokyo; Davis Bobrow, professor of political science and public affairs and director of the Center for International Studies at the University of Minnesota; and George Kent, professor of political science at the University of Hawaii and director of the workshop.

Also participating were seven EWC Senior Fellows and faculty and two students.

The World Order Program being established at the University of Hawaii initially will exist on an informal basis. The program is concerned with the interconnected global problems of war and peace, economic welfare, justice and ecology. The program goes far beyond the short-term ameliorative adjustments in existing systems, and is directed at the formulation and evaluation of new designs for the political, social and economic structure of the future world. The World Order Program participants are idealists on one hand, deeply concerned with human values. But they are also pragmatists, working toward the concrete realization of those values.

WOMP COURSES

Courses being taught during the 1972-73 academic year include one by Professor Kent entitled "World Order Design: The Administration of the Oceans." Professor William Boyer of the Department of Educational Foundations will offer a course called "Education for a World Without War." Both professors have been involved with a number of peace research organizations, including the World Law Fund which sponsored the July workshop.

In addition to the courses specified, the World Order Program will sponsor a regular series of seminars and colloquia, devoted to the general theme of "articulating the structures of the future." Both the courses and colloquia involve people from a number of disciplines and departments, including history, philosophy, political science, religion, ecology and American studies.

The geopolitical situation of Hawaii can be classified as unique; therefore the accent on such planning courses as "The Administration of the Oceans," But the existence of such world order planning courses, seminars and colloquia, workshops where Soviet Planners compare notes with Socialist and Democratic Planners, is in no sense unique. Planning courses, public administration courses, training camps for future PPBS agents and operatives will be found in every college and university which accepts government aid and foundation grants. And after the eager little junior Planners have been graduated, like Frankfurter's little hot dogs of the New Deal days, they are found jobs and even positions at whatever level of government and in whatever capacity they seem best fitted to further the schemes of the Chief Planners (for only the top executive makes the final decisions. "No one at a lower level has the authority or the right to acquire the knowledge required to perform the necessary tasks of coordination," says the Rand book of instructions. In the final analysis, all these junior Planners turned out by all these Universities are little more than trained clerks who must obey orders handed down from the Central Headquarters. If they fail to follow orders, they are recycled until they fit into their niche, or they are discarded. And as a further control mechanism, all are "union members," their union headquarters being located at 1313 East 60th Street in Chicago, or at some similar Control Central).

An added control factor: Since PPBS has been adopted almost universally as the budget and management technique which is to be used to establish and operate this "New World Order," all teachers in public schools now are being trained in "seminars and colloquia, workshops and special classes," in the proper operation of the PPB System as applied to the training of young minds to fit into this New World Order. The teachers, too, are subject to recycling if they don't satisfy the executive heads—as are the students as well.

In other words, this business of Planning and Programming, Budgeting and then Managing this New World Order, involves world management, continent and ocean management, national management, regional management, State management, sub-state regional management, area and local management, and finally, management of each individual existing within the world system! And this requires a multitude of planners and managers. (You'd be surprised how many guards are required to maintain order in a prison camp).

Make no mistake: the final aim of all this Planning is not for the purpose of world control in any abstract sense, it is for resources control, and people are the human resource which it is deemed most important to control. As an example of people control in a local area, note the following which we have extracted from an article appearing in Pacific Business News, Dec. 18, 1972:

"The recommendation to freeze the county's population at about 500,000 came as other California governmental agencies were approaching the problem with caution. The Bay Area Metropolitan Transportation Commission, given autocratic control over the development of future transit and transportation facilities in the San Francisco Bay area, intends to use the authority to direct the future development of the region.

"If its efforts are successful, business and land development will be controlled by the transit authority. The effective control device may be the granting or denying of transit facilities — mass transit, freeways, airports, local business — to a region.

"If there is no transit or means of travel, there will be no factories or jobs, and if there is no factory or jobs, there will be no housing and there will be no regional pollution and destruction of the environment," one official said. 'We have the power to control the automobile,' said a Director, 'and we will'."

The above seems to "let the cat out of the bag" as to the real purpose of the federal government's mass transit programming; and whether a transportation authority should have the authority to direct people's lives is a debatable question.

But "people control" is the principal aim of Rand employes, Rockefeller executives, World Order Planners, and Prison Guards. And if Isaiah be a true prophet, then we who submit to such imprisonment are equally guilty with those who plan our lives for us.

"SAYING PEACE, PEACE, WHEN THERE IS NO PEACE"

SECOND SELLOUT, AND ONE TO GO

On January 27 a Vietnam ceasefire agreement was signed, but the shooting and the killing continued. On February 21 a Laos ceasefire agreement was signed, but the shooting and the killing continued. And on some date in the near future a Cambodia ceasefire agreement will be signed, but the shooting and the killing will continue. The only difference—and to us an important one—lies in the fact that, at least officially, the bullets will not be fired by American hands to tear through American bodies. But there will remain the feeling of failure because we entered wars we would not win, and the feeling of guilt because we promised the South Vietnamese and the Laotians and the Cambodians that we would protect them from the Communists, and instead we finally sold them out to the Communists.

"We have fought the war with so many illusions; let us have no illusions about the peace," warned Senator Frank Church, a long-time opponent of the wars of Southeast Asia. "The ceasefire," he declared, "at long last, brings the second phase of the Vietnamese war to a close. It permits the withdrawal of our remaining armed forces and the welcome retrieval of American prisoners of war. But it is no more than a truce, and it may last no longer than the earlier truce in 1954 when the French withdrew. A renewal of the fighting among the Vietnamese is probable, if not predictable, since none of the issues are resolved over which they fought for nearly a generation."

The Senator was wrong in one respect: the fighting was not renewed, it just continued.

And we know that the Vietcong had no intention of holding their fire. For example: There was the dispatch of February 2, filed by Ray Cromley of Newspaper Enterprise Association.

"Recently captured North Vietnamese documents," wrote Cromley, "give a timetable for Hanoi's operations in South Vietnam in the five months following the signing of the truce.

"First: Communist operatives throughout South Vietnam have been told that their headquarters will not communicate with them for five months, precisely, after the accords are signed. 'You will receive no visits and no messages from the legal operatives and no instructions from headquarters during this period,' these documents say, 'and therefore (you) must rely on the instructions herewith delivered for your actions during that period. At the end of five months you will receive detailed instructions as to what you will do then.

"Second: the communist cadre in the South is to organize on their own initiative during these five months acts of terrorism, assassination, demonstrations and resistance aimed at destroying confidence in the government, thus preparing the stage for the countrywide operations which are to be outlined to them about July 1, 1973.

"Third: Cadre are to foment incidents which will make it appear the Saigon government is breaking the accords, making certain these provocations are carried out in such a way that the truce teams are not aware of the causes, but do see the Saigon government's retaliation to what appears to be peaceful legitimate protest.

"Fourth: Concrete examples are given to techniques to be used. One example will give the flavor of the provocations Hanoi has ordered its men to organize in the five months just ahead. Demonstrations of protest are to be organized with old men and women in the forefront. These protests are to center around genuine grievances. At the start, only ordinary citizens are to be involved, with emphasis on the old and helpless. Then gradually, you will add to these demonstrations young able-bodied men with chains, knives and sticks (clubs). Finally, as time goes on, you will add skilled cadre armed with guns.

"The old are to be kept in the forefront.

But the armed men will gradually escalate the demonstrations until they turn into riots. The riots will intensify until the police are provoked into retaliation. (Since the old men and women are to be kept in front, they will bear the brunt of the police shooting or clubbing.)'

'It is essential, the captured documents say, that events be timed so that an international truce commission team is at hand to see the police retaliation—so that the team will report and publicize police brutality and convince the world Saigon is breaking the terms of the agreement.

'That is, Hanoi is planning a series of violent demonstrations carefully planned to create a chaotic atmosphere similar to Chicago at the time of the 1968 Democratic National Convention, only much intensified. The 'artillery' is to be well-organized and screened behind innocents. Public opinion is to be aroused against the police, as at Chicago.

'As indicated in the timetable, these provocations, coupled with terrorism, sabotage and psychological warfare, are to set the stage for some unidentified concerted action which is to follow five months after the signing of the truce agreements.' (End of Ray Cromley's NEA dispatch).

All of the preceding refers to the activities of Communist "civilian operatives" in South Vietnam. The well armed and well supplied Communist troops south of the demarcation line probably have similar orders: to act on their own and without specific instructions from headquarters for the next five months, always making it appear that their violations of ceasefire orders were really defensive actions against the offensive South Vietnam troops. And Hanoi will have washed its hands of the whole chaotic condition for five months, after which it will probably be necessary, in the interest of public order and safety, for the Vietcong to stage a military coup and take control of the government.

The ceasefire, of course, is failing. The Joint Military Commission, of which the United States is a member, after two weeks of figurative hand-wringing, issued an urgent appeal to Saigon and to the Viet Cong to stop all hostilities and respect the ceasefire agreement. But nobody paid any real attention.

There were about 14,000 United States troops still in Vietnam at the time of this writing, and another 44,000 in Thailand. If the ceasefire agreement continues to be ignored, U.S. bombers might be ordered back into action. But this is doubtful. Kissinger and cohorts undoubtedly knew that the ceasefire agreement would not be kept. The whole purpose of the Nixonger effort was to get the United States out of the war. This was accomplished through some strenuous prodding of Hanoi on the part of both Moscow and Peking. Repeat: The purpose was to get the United States out of the war, not to stop the war. Which makes our actions as a nation, suspect and questionable. After almost twenty years of aiding and abetting, investing in and fighting for, the South Vietnamese, now we have, Pilate-like, washed our official hands of the whole affair and, insofar as the war itself is concerned, it is just about where it was when we entered it.

In the case of the Laotian ceasefire agreement, there is little attempt to cover up the fact that we "sold them out to the Reds." Donald Kirk reported to the Chicago Tribune from Vientiane, Laos, that:

'Angry Lao officials Wednesday night accused the United States of betraying the American-supported regime here in the climactic stages of peace talks with the Communist Pathet Lao. It was entirely because of American pressure, according to these sources, that the government finally signed what is generally regarded as a highly unfavorable agreement for ending the war in this deeply divided buffer state.

'It's the greatest defeat that we have ever suffered in war or peace,' said a Lao official, reflecting the widespread views here after the agreement was signed Wednesday in the residence of Prime Minister Souvanna Phouma.

'The ink was barely dry on the ceasefire document before Lao officials began to express their deep disappointment on a wide variety of critical points.

'How can I explain to my people what they have been fighting for?' asked Sisouk Na Champassak, minister in charge of defense and one of the most powerful men in the government. He criticized the agreement first for granting 'foreign' troops 90 days in which to leave the country, and second for giving the Pathet Lao half the seats in a new Provisional Government of National Union.

'This government will be formed under the pressure of North Vietnamese troops,' said

Sisouk in an interview Wednesday evening. 'With no American bombing, the North Vietnamese can impose their will on the government.' Sisouk pointed out that the agreement called for formation of a new government within 30 days and then for withdrawal of 'foreign troops' 60 days afterward, just as the Pathet Lao had demanded.

"North Vietnam keeps 60,000 troops in the country, half of them on the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Southern Laos.

"Lao officials said the government agreed to sign the ceasefire agreement only under threat of curtailment of American military aid." (End of quotation).

The American public has never been told about the CIA's "secret war" in Laos. Now that a ceasefire agreement has been signed many of the details that might have been found only in such restricted sources as the "Pentagon papers" now will be forthcoming. Example: many previously unpublished facts were worked into a "news analysis" written by James McCartney for the Knight Newspaper chain. We do not agree with the author's analysis, nor with his conclusions; but there are many previously unpublished facts in his report; therefore we reprint important portions of his article:

The new ceasefire agreement in Laos is a vital part of President Nixon's peace program for Indochina—without which there could be no real peace.

But it is clearly a messy, ambiguous and fragile agreement—almost as messy, about as ambiguous and possibly even more fragile than the three-week-old Vietnam ceasefire.

If the Laotian deal works, however, it will accomplish two vitally important objectives:

* It will at least partially close down the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Laos, the long-time supply route for the war in South Vietnam.

* It will bring immense pressure on recalcitrant Cambodia to find a way to peace. Cambodia is still at war—still unable to sort itself out and arrange a peace agreement.

But perhaps even more significantly to Americans, the Laotian ceasefire should get the U.S. out of one of the longest, the most frustrating and most secret wars in its history. That is what the war in Laos has been.

Most Americans couldn't tell you what the United States has been up to in Laos for the past decade, and why—and for good reason. It has been the classic "secret war" of our time, shrouded in classified documents since 1964, or even before.

Astonishing as it may seem, U.S. warplanes began to bomb in Laos as early as 1964 from aircraft carriers off the South Vietnamese coast. Nine years ago U.S. air bases in Thailand sported signs that read: "Lead Alley, 300 miles north."

That bombing is support of a shaky Laotian government has been going on just about ever since. The Pentagon says it will stop now, with the signing of the agreement. In recent days, according to the Communists, the United States has been flying 400 or 500 sorties a day over Laos—some with giant B52s.

The United States, through the Central Intelligence Agency, for years has been supporting, training, supplying and paying a guerrilla army in Laos under the command of Gen. Vang Pao. At one time, in 1969, that Army numbered 30,000, according to a Senate Foreign Relations committee study, but it is now down to about 25,000.

And the United States has been supporting the Royal Lao Army, as well, and furnishing training. It also has picked up the check for a secret army of Thai "volunteers" in Laos—some 5,000 strong.

A CIA-related U.S. airline, Air America, has supplied air support for Vang Pao and for the Laotian army and performed all manner of tasks necessary to keep the government going.

At this point, there is no way of knowing for sure exactly what the United States intends to do in the future in Laos as far as any, or all, of these secret activities are concerned. The United States itself did not negotiate the Laotian agreement—it was negotiated by the Royal Lao government which the U.S. has supported, and by the Communist Pathet Lao (however, the Laotian government was told to accept the Communist demands or forego all future U.S. aid to Laos; U.S. officials did not negotiate the agreement, they merely blackmailed the negotiator—Ed.)

The Pathet Lao are indigenous Laotian Communists—the equivalent in Laos of the Viet Cong in South Vietnam.

But Secretary of State William Rogers said Wednesday that the United States will live up to the terms of the agreement to the letter. And one of the major terms is a requirement that all "foreign troops" withdraw (but 60 days after a new coalition government has been formed—Ed.)....

As far as U.S. operations in Laos are concerned, Rogers declined to give straight answers Wednesday to pointed questions. Sen. Charles Percy (R. Ill.) asked him at a Senate hearing if the United States planned to "end its para military role in Laos"—which meant: Will the CIA close up shop? Rogers replied: "We will comply with the terms of the agreement."

The problem in interpretation here is that the United States has always insisted publicly that it has complied with the terms of the 1962 Laotian agreements—and, in fact, it has been operating a secret war in violation of those agreements. The Communists have violated the agreements, too.....

("Living up to the terms of the agreement" meant that U.S. bombers were again active over Laos within 24 hours of its signing).

The inference is quite clear: In the legal and official sense, we have ended our participation in the wars in Vietnam and Laos, though not yet in Cambodia. However, there are American air bases in Thailand, over 40,000 armed forces personnel in Thailand, and the CIA has its own army and air force which can—and may—keep right on fighting and bombing as "guerrilla forces" and not subject to truce team control for that reason. In the final analysis, therefore, these cease-fire agreements are a face-saving device arranged in Moscow and Peking by Herr Kissinger for purposes of developing that new "Three Power Triangle" which the metropolitan newspapers are beginning, at last, to talk about, even as they now can talk about the "secret war" that has been waged in Laos by the CIA for the past ten years.

In this same context, Washington is now talking about doing away with SEATO, since it has outlived its usefulness in that Red China has been induced to share in the financing (with our money) and management of the Mekong Delta projects.

Similarly, the NATO Nations and the Warsaw Pact Satellites are to meet together for the first time, to arrange for a reduction of troops and war machines along the far-flung line separating East from West.

Just to make this illusion of peace even more believable to even more people. Herr Kissinger returned from meetings with Mao to announce the release of two American pilots held by the Red Chinese (what ever happened to those Korean POWs that have never been returned?) And as a further gesture of peaceful intentions "liaison offices" are to be opened in Washington and Peking—supposedly the next thing to full diplomatic recognition of each other by each other. In diplomatic jargon, "the time is appropriate for accelerating the normalization of relations."

However, lest anyone really believe that as leaders are hinting at peace, there really is peace, up flares the favorite old hot-spot in flames that could become holocaust. The Israeli "defenders" launched another series of raids into Lebanon and then capped off this series of atrocities by shooting down, apparently without warning, a Libyan airliner with 112 persons aboard, because it had become lost and strayed across the Egyptian border into an area taken by force from Egypt in that infamous Six Days War.

The seriousness of this situation lies in the fact that President Nixon—who will follow the "precedent" of declaring war without consulting Congress—has promised that the United States will defend Israel against all attackers, regardless of the reasons for the attack.

A local editorial writer who is ever a defender of Israeli policy, had a hard time with this one. He wrote, in part:

"With the shocking case of the Libyan airliner, the world again gets a glimpse into the depth of suspicion and desperation in the Mideast.... That a people so historically sensitive to injustice felt impelled to force the deaths of so many innocent persons clearly outlines the tragedy of the Mideast. Before such circumstances, what chance can there be for peace? When hatred becomes so routine, and violence so reflexive, what can be the antidote?..."

Let us pray that the "antidote" is not a transfer of our armed forces from Southeast Asia to Mideast Asia; because this is what some very powerful people would really like to see happen.

THE DAY THE UNITED STATES SURRENDERED TO COMMUNISM

TREASON, NOT DEFEAT

On November 19, 1863, an American leader spoke words which came to be remembered by every succeeding generation of Americans until, perhaps, this very last generation. He said, and who does not recall the words:

"The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain..."

It is humiliating, and saddening, and even maddening, to hear a man who claims to be speaking for the people of the United States and for their Federal Government admit publicly that over 50,000 young Americans did die in vain in a war that was fought, they were told, to stop the advance of Communism in Southeast Asia.

This time the speaker was Henry Kissinger, and he told a nationwide radio audience that the entire war had been fought in vain, that "We are not opposed to the unification of Vietnam in principle, if Vietnam is unified by peaceful means.... If the North Vietnamese ~~are~~ willing to compete peacefully, if they are willing to rely on a political process, then we don't object to their objective."

In other words, we—you and I as citizens of these United States of America—have no objection if the Communists want to take over the rest of Asia! He attempted to soften the infamy of his utterance by speaking of "peaceful" means and "peaceful" competition. But even as he uttered the words, news dispatches from Vietnam confirmed the rumor that our forces had abandoned an airbase near the demarcation line, in order that the Reds might construct a missile base there, to protect their "peaceful" intentions.

Lest the words be forgotten, or denied, let us set down exactly what was heard, and what was confirmed by the United Press International News Service:

"If the performance of one part or the other (North Vietnam or South Vietnam) is so clearly superior to that of the other it tends to achieve moral superiority over the other, that is not an American concern."

But if this is not an American concern then, we can hear the Vietnam Veteran demanding to know, "why were billions of dollars spent and hundreds of thousands of lives disarranged, disabled or possibly deceased, in the mistaken belief that this was an American concern?"

Kissinger continued:

"If the North Vietnamese are willing to compete peacefully, if they are willing to develop their country, if they are willing to rely on a political process, then we don't object to their objective."

But, until Kissinger became our Minister for Foreign Affairs, we were told that the Communist objective is to bring peace to the world by ruling the world, and that their political process consisted of utilizing the "domino theory," of causing Vietnam to fall which would cause Laos to fall which would cause Cambodia to fall which would cause Thailand to fall which would cause Burma to fall which would cause India to fall, and so on until Communist peace had been brought through the fall of the nations of the world. Do we now accept this as not being an American concern?

Why this change of policy which makes a mockery of the sacrifices of men in Vietnam and their families at home? Kissinger may have intended the following statement as an explanation, or perhaps even an apology:

"In the present circumstance, when you have a peace that has many precarious aspects after 10 years of war... not to consider what may be psychologically, politically and humanly necessary is simply a wrong allocation of priorities."

And then Kissinger spoke of the immediate priority: The allocation of money for the rebuilding of North Vietnam and its war machine, at a cost of from $2.5 billion to $7.2 billion (he gave no exact figure in his radio talk with his favorite woman-reporter, Barbara Walters of NBC). He also made it quite clear that he had no intention of honoring any invitation or subpoena to appear before any Congressional Committee to discuss the subject in greater detail; although he might speak personally and privately with some Senators and Congressmen, if he felt so inclined.

What has brought about this great change in our foreign policy? The Vietnam involvement began with our being asked, or commanded if subject to Selective Service, to help save the world from Communism; which seemingly led to our surrender to Communism; and now we are told to accept it as a "moral" and a "superior" political process.

These are some of the things our leaders said:

During the presidential campaign of 1952, when we were engaged in the Korean fiasco, General Eisenhower warned against the Soviet intent to "destroy democracy in general and... the United States in particular." He expressed that same thought nine years later, declaring in May, 1961, that "basic Soviet policies have not changed."

Former President Truman, looking back from his home in Independence, commented with his customary bluntness: "There wouldn't be any cold war if the Russians had kept their word with us. They lied to me 32 times and to President Franklin Roosevelt 16 times."

In 1964 Richard Nixon said: "The communist goal is to impose slavery on the free world. The United States goal must be nothing else than to bring freedom to the Communist world."

Even stronger was his statement which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of October 10, 1963:

"If the danger of war has been decreased, the danger of defeat without war has been substantially increased. A great new Communist offensive is being launched against the free world, an offensive without resort to war, an offensive all the more dangerous because it is so difficult to recognize it and meet it effectively.

"We cannot meet and defeat such an offensive by a static policy of defense... Our goal must not be simply to keep freedom from shrinking but to make it grow too. Our goal must be a free Cuba, a free Eastern Europe, a free Russia, a free China."

Because of such statements as these, Richard Nixon was accepted by a near majority of Americans as being fit to become our Chief Executive. Yet, having gained the office and the power and honor that accompanies the position, we now are told that we should accept Communism as a "democratic process" and that we should welcome its two major exponents—Soviet Russia and Red China—as coequal partners in a Triangular Power Alliance which should rule the world. In such a Three-Headed World Government, near the top of Kissinger's "allocation of priorities" would come the need for China to assume control over all of Southeast Asia but only after that part of the world had been made safe for the multinational investors and developers. Such "partnership" would call for Communist control of the human resources of the area, while the multinationals would be left free to develop the natural resources of the area. Slave labor plus technological know-how and government-guaranteed monopoly form an unbeatable combination for the multinational corporation's chief executive!

But the strange marriage of Communism and Corporate Capitalism is not all a matter of power and pelf; there is a kind of perverted idealism involved which attracts the dogooder and the humanist who, under normal circumstances, would shun Communism like a plague.

Whittaker Chambers fell victim to this idealistic trap, discovered that it was a trap, rebelled and tried to explain. Unfortunately, his explanations were couched in words that didn't seem to make sense at the time; for he was really writing for a future generation that could see beyond the charges and the counter charges of his "day in court" and his exposure of Alger Hiss, as well as his defense by a young opportunist named Richard Nixon. In his masterpiece, WITNESS Chambers described the central core of a humanistic philosophical tree, of which Communism per se was merely one branch. He wrote:

"Communists are bound together by no secret oath. The tie that binds them across the frontiers of nations, across barriers of language and differences of class and education, in defiance of religion, morality, truth, law, honor, the weaknesses of the body and the irresolutions of the mind, even unto death, is a simple conviction: It is necessary to change the world. Their power, whose nature baffles the rest of the world, because in a large measure the rest of the world has lost that power, is the power to hold convictions and to act on them. It is the same power that moves mountains; it is also an unfailling power to move men. Communists are that part of mankind which has recovered the power to live or die—to bear witness—for its faith. And it is a simple, rational faith that inspires men to live or die for it.

“It is not new. It is in fact, man’s second oldest faith. Its promise was whispered in the first days of the Creation under the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil: ‘Ye shall be as gods.’ It is the great alternative faith of mankind. Like all great faiths, its force derives from a simple vision. Other ages have had great visions. They have always been different versions of the same vision: the vision of God and man’s relationship to God. The Communist vision is the vision of Man without God. . . .

“Hence the Communist Party is quite justified in calling itself the most revolutionary party in history. It has posed in practical form the most revolutionary question in history: God or Man? It has taken the logical next step which three hundred years of rationalism hesitated to take, and said what millions of modern minds think, but do not dare or care to say. If man’s mind is the decisive force in the world, what need is there for God? Henceforth man’s mind is man’s fate.”

“It is necessary to change the world.” That is the key sentence in Chamber’s testimony. And he ascribed this conviction to the Communists because, in his day, they were the most outspoken advocates of the revolutionary theory that man can ordain his own destiny, that he can reshape the world and the people therein. Chambers did not live to witness the conquest by the computer, the coming-to-fruiting of the so-called age of Science and Technology; the time when the modernists and the idealists, the humanists and the atheists, most of the scientists and the technicians, and the majority of those who lay claim to knowledge and wisdom, all would join with the Communists and the rest of the Scientific Socialists and the Social Scientists in proclaiming that Man must change the world!

So that the Nixon Revolution and the Communist Revolution are not opposed to each other; they are but differing manifestations of the same Great Revolution of Man against God. Which, as Chambers asserts, is as old as the first confrontation beneath the shade of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil.

Only now, things have speeded up. For the past two decades, and especially since man walked on the moon, we have been exposed to unrelenting propaganda through all of the controlled channels of communication, including the schools and the churches, which insists that the development of science and technology has revolutionized the world; and that the principal problems of mankind all have become global. As one author phrased the propaganda line:

“The world can no longer be considered in terms of nations and the policies of national states. The only sensible approach is the global approach and the only proper method is the scientific method. The more so since the problems of modern mankind, such as hunger, overpopulation, mass culture and pollution, are becoming much more problems of science and technology than political problems. And because of their non-political nature, they offer the possibility of real collaboration between states with sharply diverging political systems and philosophies . . . For the first time in history man has reached the point where he can satisfy the needs of all people, thereby eliminating the source of revolt, injustice, misery, unhappiness and wars, and ensuring universal peace. Thus man has reached the turning point in his entire existence on earth: the era of history and politics, with all its strife, unhappiness, misery and injustice is coming to an end, and a new era is being ushered in—the era of the satisfaction of human needs, the era of human happiness. . . . If man is able to walk on the Moon, it stands to reason that he can solve the problems of war, poverty, injustice, inhumanity and unhappiness on earth. . . . the practically unlimited possibilities of production of goods, combined with the new spirit of brotherhood and cooperation sweeping the world and human society, will eliminate the problem of need and thus the problem of inequality and social justice.” (Quoted from Will America Surrender? by Slobodan M. Draskovich. Devin-Adair, 1973, $9.95).

The author of the above, after stating the case for the Revolution brought about by the development of Science and Technology, then he refutes the whole case by pointing out:

“However, the plain truth is that there is no necessary casual, inevitable connection between scientific and technological progress and man’s ability to assure human welfare and happiness. The reasoning that if man can go to the Moon, he must be able to solve all his problems by applying the same (?) methods, is based on a false and untenable analogy. Science and technology have increased man’s ability to produce and distribute material goods, they have increased his power over nature, they have increased his ability to conquer, subjugate and control other people and nations.

"However, they have not increased but decreased man's ability to solve the problems of his existence and of a meaningful life for nations and mankind. This is completely lost on a number of modern scientists whose propensity to climb into the clouds of fantasy is helped by their narrow human vision. Moreover, science and technology have, by giving man power over nature, deeply affected his sense of humility and vastly increased his craving for power. Man has proclaimed the death of God, and has arrogated omnipotence to himself. He has acquired so much knowledge and control over nature, that he can make anything. But this power has so debilitated and confused him morally, that he has become powerless to run his life properly, since he is unable to think properly about his human problems. Therein lies the main danger today: in the gap between man's scientific-technological arrogance, and his human helplessness. The champions of the almightiness of science and technology forget that for man to solve any of his human (political, social, cultural) problems, he needs first and above all a scale of values, to determine what he wants and the priority of things wanted, and second, that science and technology supply neither."

We have quoted at length from Will America Surrender, by Slobodan M. Draskovich, because the conduct of the Vietnamese conflict, the "no victory" nature of its ending and the actual surrender of Southeast Asia to the Communists, all are in line with the methods being employed by the proponents of the Scientific-Technological Revolution. Their "Systems Analysis," their "Age of Accountability" programming, their "Delphi Technique" manner of planning the future, all are part and parcel of the new methods of the Scientific-Technological Revolutionists which were installed in our government and called Planning-Programming-Budgeting-System (PPBS). As we wrote in a previous letter, the Vietnamese conflict was not waged to be won or lost; it was a laboratory, a training field, for the development of new techniques of people-control and psychological warfare. The Americans who served in that conflict were either guinea pigs or laboratory assistants. Military techniques were outlawed, and scientific experiments were conducted instead. There was but one absolute prohibition: The fighting of the war must not interfere with the construction of the gigantic Mekong Delta power and flood control complex; and we are told that there was no bombing, no shelling, no shooting in those areas where scientists, engineers and technicians directed laborers from many nations, who worked safely while battles were being fought on all sides of them, but never too near for comfort.

It began as a war to contain communism. It developed into a testing ground for Rand scientists and technicians and came to be called "McNamara's War" because Robert McNamara was the agent used to "sell" PPBS to the United States Government. As the Nixon Revolution replaced the Johnson "Bridge Building" policy, it came to be Kissinger's War, to be ended on Kissinger's terms and settled in accordance with Kissinger's plans for the future.

Finally, placing Vietnam into its proper place as a part of the giant jig-saw, let us go back to 1970 when Richard Nixon sent to Congress his message entitled, "United States Foreign Policy for the 1970's: A New Strategy for Peace." This message was the work of one man: Dr. Henry A. Kissinger. In referring to what came to be known as the "Kissinger Blueprint," the author said:

"This vision of peace built on partnership, strength and willingness to negotiate is the unifying theme of this report."

Partnership, strength and the willingness to negotiate; this is the three-pronged program which Kissinger says will produce world peace. This means partnership with Soviet Russia and Communist China, on a basis of strength shared equally by the three, and this coequal condition to be arrived at by exercising a willingness to negotiate. For the building of this Troika of Power, both Kissinger and Nixon journeyed to Peking and Moscow. And the first visible results of the workings of this Kissinger Blueprint for Peace, can be seen in the surrender of Southeast Asia to the Peoples Republic of China. But has this really brought any peace or does it even promise to bring any peace into the world? And, if so, at what horrible cost? We can only judge people and things by their fruits; and we seem to smell some very nasty figs when we think of Kissinger's ideas for peace and national security.

THE EXECUTIVE DICTATORSHIP AND HOW IT GREW

COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT REVISITED

Sometimes this editor feels like a Lewis Carroll writing of a topsy-turvy wonderland world that has become fact rather than storybook fiction. In these amazing years of the Nixon maladministration, wherein the President has shown himself to be the most successful Socialist of them all, and a far better friend of the Communists than Franklin and Eleanor would ever have dared to be; it often seems that the political left is righter than the right and that conservatives are wronger than the ADA.

Points in reference:

The New York Times, hardly a conservative periodical, is featuring a series of articles about the alarming and dangerous expansion of power in the Nixon Presidency. Historian Henry Steele Commager is quoted: "I think Mr. Nixon has gone far beyond any previous Presidents in our history." Thomas Cronin, an inmate of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions (notorious for its attempts to rewrite the United States Constitution and enact a World Constitution), is quoted as saying of Nixon: "He has systematically gone about trying to strengthen the Presidency in a great number of ways, frequently by circumventing the Constitution or expanding on past practices that were ambiguous or questionable."

Also, running currently in the Knight newspapers is a series of articles pointing out that President Nixon's Revenue Sharing program is "a cruel hoax." Mayors of large cities—Atlanta, Boston, Detroit, Gary, Miami, Milwaukee, New Orleans, San Francisco, Seattle and others—all agreed that "the symbol for revenue sharing should be the double cross instead of a dollar sign," and that Nixon's upcoming "Special Revenue Sharing" proposal is just another attempt to grab power and withhold needed revenue.

Note that the organizations and people cited in the foregoing will not be found listed in any roster of conservatives or rightists.

In contrast, and to prove our point, the March 1973 issue of a Free Enterprise and admittedly conservative publication carries an appeal for subscriptions and memberships which begins as a fair statement of the political facts of the day, but ends by being an appeal for all to aid President Nixon in his building of the Executive Tyranny. We quote:

"AMERICA'S GREATEST PROBLEM

"Too many Americans have left the solution of all of our problems up to our government, not realizing that our government today is not the same that originally upheld the three basic foundations of our freedom: 1) Our faith in God; 2) Our Constitutional Republic and 3) Our productive Free Enterprise System. What's more, left-wing pressure groups are pushing us even farther away from the form of government we need to protect us and save our freedom.

"To complicate matters further, the President can do little to improve things because the majority of both houses of Congress are against him. Furthermore, the majority of Americans fail to understand the problems of the nation or of the President because they depend largely upon the TV networks for their news — and this is strongly slanted against the President's position in regard to upholding these basic foundations of our American freedom and civilization.

"But every American can do something about this: . . . (by subscribing to the publication, by distributing its pamphlets, and by becoming a member of the organization which sponsors the paper and the pamphlets)."

Here we seem to have a classic example of the attempted use of two wrongs to make a right. Certainly, no patriot could find much of an excuse for defending this 93rd Congress; but neither could he find any justifiable reason for praising the Nixon Administration. Therefore, to support Nixon's New Federalism because you are against the Congress, or to support the Congress because you are against Nixon's policies, are equally destructive activities which but aid and abet the Socialist Conspiracy.

According to biographer James Boswell, in one of his more sardonic moods, Dr. Samuel Johnson was heard to exclaim: "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel." Without doing violence to the original declaration, we might amend it to read: "Defense of Free Enterprise is the last refuge of the Economic Cartelist and Monopolist."

Because it poses as a champion of Free Enterprise, one of the organizations that has been able to do most in increasing the ever growing monopolistic and monolithic power of the Federal Executive, is a little band of about 200 allegedly free-enterprising men of Big Business, which calls itself the Committee for Economic Development (CED).

Boasting of its close ties to the Executive Branch, CED submits that:

"...among the many mills of gratuitous advice that press their views on the government, the CED has been among the most influential. Perhaps more attention is paid to the deliberations of the CED than to almost any other organization dealing with national problems, President John F. Kennedy said in 1963."

"The CED," says Frank V. Fowlkes of the CED staff, "has spent the past 30 years thrashing out position papers on the leading public-policy issues of the day. Its credits range from development of post-World War II economic planning and full-employment budgeting to revision of federal salary scales and modification of the rules governing Presidential succession.

"Nixon Administration officials cite CED influence on recent planning in the areas of educational funding, management and evaluation of federal programs, structure of local government and the CED's traditional forte, fiscal and monetary policy."

"Equally important as a source of CED influence," continued this CED mouthpiece, "is the extent to which it has managed to infiltrate the government. Its tentacles reach down the halls of the bureaucracy and into the offices of top policy makers throughout the executive branch.

"Five of the last seven Secretaries of the Treasury have had ties to CED, as have two of the three Secretaries of HUD, five of the last 10 Secretaries of HEW, the two most recent chief federal budget officials, the current Secretary of Commerce, four of the last five chairmen of the Council of Economic Advisers, and the last three Presidential special representatives for trade negotiations.

"These and a host of other government ties —more than 30 to the Nixon Administration—put clout in the CED's otherwise soft-sell offerings. In addition to its direct influence, the CED has a substantial amount of indirect influence. Through an extensive system of interlocking memberships, the CED's views are injected into the councils of other business associations. The president of the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S. is a member of the CED board of trustees as is the chairman of the Conference Board Inc. and several dozen members of the Business Council, including its vice chairman."

The foregoing was published in the June 17, 1972 issue of National Journal, a weekly publication of the Government Research Company, available by subscription only, at $200 per year. Circulation, therefore, is quite restricted and "reproduction in whole or in part without written permission is strictly prohibited." What we have quoted from the article written by Frank Fowlkes was taken from a special reprint being distributed to members of CED by CED.

An Interesting sidelight: Although CEDman Fowlkes mentions pridefully the "interlocking world" of business groups that influence federal policy-making, pointing to the fact of interlocking directorships and memberships of CED, the Business Council (BC), the Conference Board (CB), the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM), and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States (C of C), he fails to mention the kingpin of them all: The Council on Foreign Relations, whose membership interlocks with all the others. For example: CED has 200 trustees, 44 of whom are also members of the CFR!

In this same June 17, 1973 issue of National Journal, there is a full page devoted to the subject: "Business Groups: An Interlocking World." Listed are 64 CED board members who are also members of similar groups. Using that list as a basis, but adding other names of CED boardmen derived from other sources, and adding their Council on Foreign Relations (CFR) and Bilderberger Group (BG) affiliations to complete the picture, we arrive at a partial listing, far from complete, of the visible, second-in-command membership of the Invisible Government of these United States. The Committee for Economic Development has little or no contact with the Congress; its pressure and influence are directed toward the Executive Branch of the Federal Government. Yet to be told is CED's part in the promotion of Nixon's "New Federalism" which has as its chief aim the Regionalization of the Nation and the Centralization of its Government. So, more about the growth of the Executive Dictatorship in our next letter.

THE EXECUTIVE DICTATORSHIP AND HOW IT GREW

..... Part Two

A CHILD OF THE CFR

Richard Milhous Nixon has his Dr. Henry Kissinger, Franklin Delano Roosevelt had his Harry Hopkins, and Thomas Woodrow Wilson had his Col. House. The story of the growth of the Executive Dictatorship really begins with Col. House, although he was certainly not the first to believe that the world should be ruled by a self-chosen Elite and that the important first step in that direction should consist in the conversion of the United States government from that of a Representative Republic to an Oligarchic Dictatorship. House advocated the centralization of all political and economic power in the hands of a Chief Executive whom he called an "Administrator." House wrote a novel, Philip Dru: Administrator, in which he outlined his plan and the steps to be taken to bring about this Administrative Dictatorship. Charles Seymour, House's official biographer and compiler of the four volume "Intimate Papers of Colonel House" wrote:

"Whatever the literary merits of Philip Dru, it gives us an insight into the main political and social principles that actuated House in his companionship with President Wilson. Through it runs the note of social democracy reminiscent of Louis Blanc and the revolutionaries of 1848. . . ." (Louis Blanc was a French Freemason who drew his chief support from the secret societies of the period, and whose principal work in the revolution consisted in organizing and leading the French proletariat).

Keith Kathan, in a Life Lines article published Feb. 14, 1973, utilized a different technique for "putting all the pieces together" when he wrote:

"The story begins with the English dandies in the Fabian Society of London, and thickens with its ties to the Rhodes-Milner Secret Society. Back in the 1890s the Fabians decided the world should become socialist. They formed groups, intellectualized themselves into a frenzy, sent socialists to America to lecture at Harvard, thus importing socialist ideology to the United States in the form of what was to become the Americans for Democratic Action (ADA)—which recruited Eleanor Roosevelt, Reinhold Niebuhr, Walter Reuther, Ramsey Clark, John Kenneth Galbraith and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. among others. . . .

"The Rhodes-Milner Secret Society had a vision of an English-speaking federation to rule all habitable portions of the world. People like Cecil Rhodes, Alfred Milner, Lord Rothschild and Arnold Toynbee would run things from the top. But matters went awry, or became less nobly directed or were sinister to begin with. Upon the dashed hopes of American entry into the League of Nations, and under the tutelage of Fabian Socialist and Texan, Col. E. M. House, the Council on Foreign Relations and its English counterpart, the Royal Institute of International Affairs, were formed in Paris by gentlemen's agreement. . . . What was really being formed was a London-Wall Street-Paris power combine composed of socialists and moneybags. I suppose the intent was to gain absolute power, but whatever that intent, it has become a One World Socialist precept. . . ."

As time went by, the CFR found that the burden it had taken upon itself was much too big a job for just 1500 men. It became necessary to create or take over other organizations that could specialize in particular phases of the overall program of building a One World Society. This was especially true of the domestic phases of the CFR program. The CFR helped create, organize, locate, and staff the United Nations; it took over almost complete control of the State and Defense Departments, did a meritorious job (in its own eyes) of keeping CFR members in the White House and in charge of all International Affairs.

But such activity left little time or manpower for the needed domestic changes that had to be made before the United States would be ready to take its place in a World Government.

THE CED IS BORN

CFR found itself especially overtaxed after it had helped to inveigle the United States into World War II. It had set up its "War and Peace Studies" on behalf of the State Department. This required research staffs to be supplied by CFR for four special programming categories: Security and Armaments Problems, Economic and Financial Problems, Political Problems, and Territorial Problems. CFR also had to supply 43 delegates to the United Nations Conference, had to staff the Bretton Woods Conference, handle the communications media and other propaganda mills, etc., etc.

There weren't any CFR executive-types left to concentrate on the important business of handling domestic economic affairs. So, Paul Hoffman, then of Studebaker Corp. was asked to set up a special council for this purpose. Hoffman called upon seven other CFR members to help him in the task. They were:

William Benton, former U.S. Senator, chairman of the board of Encyclopedia Britannica, former Assistant Secretary of State, former vice president of the University of Chicago.

Will L Clayton, Assistant Secretary of Commerce under Roosevelt, Under Secretary of State under Truman, National Security Training Commissioner under Eisenhower, co-founder of Anderson, Clayton & Co.

Ralph E. Flanders, former U.S. Senator.

Marion B Folsom, Secretary of HEW under Eisenhower, Board of Overseers at Harvard.

Eric A. Johnston, various positions in the Roosevelt-Truman-Eisenhower Administrations, former president U.S. Chamber of Commerce, president of Motion Picture Association of America, etc.

Thomas B. McCabe, former Lend-Lease administration, former chairman of the board of Governors, Federal Reserve System, president Scott Paper Co.

Harry Scherman, founder and chairman of the board, Book of the Month Club, Inc.

The Council for Economic Development was formed in 1942 by the above named members of the Council on Foreign Relations, for the purpose of socializing the American economy (though this would never be admitted publicly). CED interested itself in such areas as monetary and tax reform, the national economy, economic growth, etc. But CED soon learned that the very foundation upon which socialism stands is not the control of money per se, but on the control of property.

CED really came of age in 1957 when it joined with Terrible 1313 in a new area development program. In its 1957 annual report, Jervis J. Babb, then chairman of CED's Area Development Committee (president of Lever Brothers Company in his business life), is quoted:

"The new area development program, approved by the Trustees (of CED) at their May meeting in Chicago is underway... Already, close relationships have been established with organizations, both public and private, that are conducting research and administering programs relating to area development...."

Dan Smoot, in his invaluable The Invisible Government (1962), wrote:

"The CED's Area Development work has brought CED personnel into close cooperation with the collection of tax-exempt 'municipal planning' organizations housed in a Rockefeller-financed center at 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago, which has become national headquarters for the production and placement of experts—who fabricate 'progressive' legislation for government at all levels; who rewrite our 'archaic' state constitutions; and who take over as city managers, or county managers, or metropolitan managers, or regional managers whenever people in any locality have 'progressed' to the point of accepting government by imported experts as a substitute for government by elected local officials.

"In other words, through the Area Development activities of the Committee for Economic Development, the invisible government of America—the Council on Foreign Relations—has a hand in the powerful drive for Metropolitan Government. Metropolitan Government, as conceived by socialist planners, would destroy the whole fabric of government and social organization in the United States. Metropolitan Government would eliminate the individual states as meaningful political entities, would divide the nation into metropolitan regions sprawling across state lines, and would place the management of these regional governments in the hands of appointed experts answerable not to local citizens but to the supreme political power in Washington."

The above was first published in 1962. The names have been changed: Area Development now is spoken of as "Land Use," and Metropolitan Government has come to be known as "Regional Government." But what Smoot wrote in 1962, even as what we wrote of Terrible 1313 in 1958, remains as true today as when it was first written.

When CED began to cooperate with 1313, the Regional Government plan—dreamed up by socialist planners in the New Deal Era but too revolutionary to be installed at that time—began to take shape. On Sept. 14, 1959, President Eisenhower signed Public Law 86-380, which created the federal Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Affairs (ACIR). This is composed of 26 appointed members, and its principal business has been to write up the federal bills needed to give the Executive Department sufficient power to “Regionalize” the United States, and then “manage” these bills through the United States Congress and onto the President’s desk for signature into law.

Most important of such “managements” was the passage of P.L.89-136, entitled the “Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965.” This Act formed the basis for later creation of the Ten Federal Regions into which the fifty States have been fitted.

When President Nixon came to the White House, things began to happen fast, Calling it the “New Federalism,” Nixon used the powers granted in P.L.89-136 and a number of other “executive reorganization” powers granted in other bills, Nixon moved fast by the “Executive Order” route as a means for centralizing and concentrating political and economic power in the White House Executive Offices.

Nixon’s Executive Order of May 21, 1969, establishing the broad outlines of the Regional Government which was to be a part of his “New Federalism,” was something of a trial run; planners wanted to observe the quantity and quality of protests and objections which might be raised as a result of this proposed power grab.

Receiving no opposition, either from the U.S. Congress or the State Governments, Nixon then issued his Executive Order 11490 (Oct. 1969), which consolidated the various Executive Orders dealing with the setting up of a Federal Dictatorship in case of the declaration of a National Emergency. All of the previous “emergency power” orders were thus combined in one specific and complete Executive Order.

This enabled Nixon to declare his “national emergency” on August 15, 1971, and to therefore have available the dictatorial powers enumerated in his Executive Order 11490 of October, 1969. Nixon assumed a partial control over the economy by declaring the price and wage freeze which has now gone through its three phases. Meanwhile, the American people are being “conditioned” to accept the total controls that are spelled out in EO 11490.

Then, on Feb. 10, 1972, Nixon issued his Executive Order 11647 which provided that Ten Federal Regional Districts would be established, and governed by Ten Federal Regional Councils composed of appointed Federal Bureaucrats who would give orders on matters involving human and natural resources to the States within their particular Region, while accepting their orders from Federal Bureaucrats of higher rank in the President’s Executive Offices.

Then, as a sort of pre-reelection clincher, P.L.92-512, known as the Revenue Sharing Act, became law on Oct. 20, 1972. The primary function of this Act was to provide that:

“After Jan. 1, 1964 if two or more States request it of the United States Government, and at the option of the individual States, all State taxes may be collected and administered by the Federal Government.”

This Act also provides a “ceiling and floor” for State Income Taxes, and “no State may thereafter alter its tax structure without first obtaining permission of the federal government.” There also is a provision in this Act which dictates the manner in which “boundary changes, and government reorganization” can be handled.

We have mentioned just a few of the Acts and Executive Orders which have been interlaced into a “legal” pattern which spells Executive Dictatorship if and when the “Invisible Government” decides the people have been conditioned to acceptance of security at the cost of loss of liberty.

There is, you will see, no one single Act or Executive Order which spells out “Executive Dictatorship.” There are many Acts and Orders which “fit together” to complete the “legal blanket.” To name a few that are seldom considered as pieces in the completed structure:

P.L. 91-596 of Dec. 29, 1970, known as the “Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970,” was necessary in order that the Federal Government might gain control of private property usage.

P.L. 92-500 of Oct. 18, 1972, known as the “Federal Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1972,” provides for the bureaucratic control of any business, land, and equipment, under the guise of pollution control. Hidden in this Act as a sort of rider, is the power to create a corporation to be known as the Environmental Financing Authority, which is given the power to acquire private property (both real and personal) by whatever means, and to sell or lease said property.

Presently pending in the U.S. House of Representatives and already passed by the Senate on January 9, 1973, is a bill known as the "Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act of 1973" (S 268). This proposed Act provides that a State must conform to the future land-use guidelines of the federal government, and that the State's enabling legislation must include the authority of the State to prohibit, under State police powers, the use of land within areas which have been designated as "areas of critical environmental concern."

In addition to this network of Federal Acts and Orders, the States have been assisting in their own destruction by following the suggestions and advices of the Planners in CED and Terrible 1313 through the establishment of sub-regions within the States. These "conservation" or "economic development" districts conform to the ten Federal Regions and they all combine to provide a new level of government which ignores existing levels of government and looks to the Washington Executive Bureaucracy for its authority and its instructions.

When these sub-regions are fully established and functioning, there will no longer be any need for county governments, or State governments except as administrative branches of the Federal Executive.

Robert C. Weaver, professional bureaucrat, administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency from 1961 to 1966, then Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) from 1966 to 1970, made perhaps the most lucid and understandable statement ever made by a high-ranking bureaucrat, when he declared:

"Regional Government means absolute, federal control over all property and its development regardless of location anywhere in the United States, to be administered on federal official determination. Regional government would supersede state and local laws. Through this authority, we seek to recapture control of the use of the land, most of which the government has already given to the people."

But Robert C. Weaver was more than a professional bureaucrat who retired to a professional post at Hunter College because of a change in the political wind at Washington—Weaver is a trustee of the Committee for Economic Development, and was the chief utilizer of CED power and influence when CED began to be interested in Regional Government and in the control of land use "regardless of location anywhere in the United States."

Indicative of the trend is an article which appeared in the Jan. 7, 1973 Los Angeles Times:

"A 'quiet revolution' is taking place in land use control. Its cause: frustration with the multiplicity of overlapping, growth-oriented governmental planning agencies that seem to produce stacks of unused plans but few solutions to growth problems. Its result; new statewide and regional planning authorities and new legislation on the national and state level aimed at strong, state-directed regulation of land use.

"Most of those who back the tougher, broader controls on land use believe the 'pioneer land ethic'—the right to do with land as one pleases—is outdated. They see land as a diminishing resource that must be protected rather than as a commodity to be traded up to its 'highest and best use' for private gain....

"...a national land use policy act to pay most of the cost of developing state land use programs is given a good chance of winning congressional approval this year....

"The key feature (of land use plans) consists of such elements as state-wide zoning, a population policy, a resource use policy, designs to increase efficiency by creating regional local governments, and plans for energy use and water." (End of quote).

And the key points to remember when studying this conspiracy to create an Executive Dictatorship, are these:

- 1) The attack is always against property ("resource" is the key word in this connection: natural resources, meaning property; and human resources, meaning people).
- 2) There is to be a centralization of power: political power and economic power; when added together they spell police power.
- 3) Rule is to be by appointed officials who are controlled by the Executive Branch of the Federal Government.
- 4) Management of all resources, both natural and human, will be in accordance with the computerized scientific socialistic method of control which is called the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System.

REVENUE SHARING: THE ADMINISTRATIVE TROJAN HORSE

NIXON SHOULD HAVE GONE TO HELLER

The alleged "father" of revenue sharing is unhappy. He insists that President Nixon is using his "baby" for nefarious purposes. Or, in the words of David S. Broder of the Washington Post, "President Nixon is beating the birth of his (Heller's) baby as grounds for justifiable homicide of national programs to aid the poor."

Walter W. Heller, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Kennedy and now teaching the "new economics" at the University of Minnesota, began to promote the revenue sharing idea back in the 1960s. But, like the idea of establishing a liaison office in Peking, or opening a Chase Manhattan Bank branch in Moscow, the idea of revenue sharing was too wildly liberal to have a chance of adoption under a Democratic administration; for current history has shown that only a Republican administration can get away with putting into actual practice the more radical proposals of the Democratic administrations. Which is apparently okay with Dr. Heller, so long as the Republicans don't mess around with Democratic proposals and reshape them to strictly Republican ends. He (Heller) certainly does not like to see his (Heller's) brainchild used as "an excuse for a fiscal cop-out" by the Nixon administration. Heller charges that the President's proposal to shift from categorical grants to expanded revenue sharing is "a shell game. Whichever shell you look under, the federal funds you thought were there have vanished."

Heller added that "Nixon proposes to ram this 'New Federalism' down the throats of Congress; and that invites regurgitation, not digestion."

Disagreeing with Heller was Richard P. Nathan of the Brookings Institution, who served in the Budget Bureau in Nixon's first term as President, and who helped convert that bureau into the most powerful and most important office in the administration: the Office of Management and Budget.

Nathan insisted that Mr. Nixon's policy in regard to revenue sharing was not simply one of "putting the money on the stump and running." Rather, he said, the President is trying to "sort out" the functions that belong to various levels of government and decentralize those that can best be handled and financed at state and local levels.

But Heller would not agree that "the process was quite that benign in its intentions or its effects."

Of course, both Nathan and Heller evaded and avoided the real issue: that revenue sharing is an essential part of that method of centralized management and control that is called the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System; something to which both the Democratic and Republican hierarchies are committed, and therefore something that is never mentioned in political circles, since PPBS is a bi-partisan program.

In the current revenue sharing squabble, it is the contention of Democratic faithfuls that Nixon is impounding funds and killing welfare programs just to thwart the Congress and deprive the poor. This may be true up to a point. But the real purpose behind the moves has to do with the new system of programming which is being installed in all federal bureaus and departments.

To illustrate:

A story in the women's section of a newspaper dated March 21, 1973, banner headlines the statement that "a storm of protest has hit the Health, Education and Welfare Department over the Nixon Administration's proposal to limit federal money for child care services."

"More than 5,000 letters, telegrams, and petitions," says the article, "have poured into the agency since February 16 when it requested comments on revised guidelines for administering aid to families, children, the aged, blind and disabled. . . . The deluge of mail—almost all of it dealing with day care—has come from mothers, volunteers, directors of child care centers, social workers, members of Congress, civic and philanthropic agencies."

Now let's analyze this "storm" of protest:

PPBS
The general
Point.

HEW asked for comment from people and organizations, day care centers and paid workers who would suffer from the alleged cutback in funds. And five weeks later, only 5,000 letters, telegrams and petitions had been received! Is this a "storm" of protest? One would have expected at least five million letters, not a mere five thousand, if it were really a "storm of protest."

This is what we call coloring the facts for propaganda purposes. Supplementing this "protest" over cuts in day care center aid for children, in the most appropriate sections of metropolitan dailies stories have been printed about people protesting the cuts in welfare grants, OEO, health care, old age benefits, educational grants and subsidies, etc., etc.

But, don't worry, the counter-propaganda line is already established and is holding against all deluges of protests; these aid programs are not being stopped; they're just being re-programmed and de-centralized so that what should be handled through the sub-regional office of the Regional Government will be handled locally, so long as the local bureaucrats follow the rigid guidelines set down by the "boss" in the White House Executive Office.

Let us repeat: This argument about re-programming and de-centralizing is not a partisan political argument: Democratic Administrations advocated and either initiated or tried to initiate PPBS, Regional Government and Revenue Sharing, which are the three principal components of this drive toward re-programming and de-centralizing; and a Republican Administration came in to complete the job that Democratic Administrations had started and couldn't finish (as the late President Johnson admitted when speaking of Nixon's leftward progress).

The argument is in no sense a partisan controversy; it is a fight between the two branches of government, the legislative and the executive, and has to do with the authority to spend money. And it is something of a repeat performance on the part of the executive branch. Back in the days of the New Deal Social Revolution, the fight was between the Administration and the Supreme Court. The Administration wanted to install most of the socialistic innovations that had to wait for Nixon—including Regional Government and federal control of all spending via PPBS and Revenue Sharing. But the Supreme Court at that time balked and declared Acts unconstitutional when they were unconstitutional. Now it is a very similar battle, but the Congress has been cast in the role of defender of the Constitution. And even as in the 1930s, the majority of the people are on the side of the protagonist and against the defender of the Constitution.

However, the real issue is hidden from the people and, apparently, from most of the Senators and Representatives as well. The real issue is federal control of budgets: federal budgets, regional budgets, State budgets, sub-regional, county, city, township and town budgets. Through PPBS, Regional Government and Revenue Sharing, the federal executive intends to control them all, every budget for every program at every level of government.

In this move to gain absolute control over all spending of public monies, the seat of power is the Office of Management and Budget, presently presided over by Roy Ash, formerly of the multinational conglomerate Litton, Inc. A strange shifting of personnel has been going on in that Office since Nixon moved into the White House; and this provides a clue to what has been going on elsewhere in federal circles.

When George Shultz was selected as the man to go to a top position as a member of the Nixon super-super-cabinet as well as filling the post of Secretary of the Treasury, he first was shifted to the Office of Management and Budget, where he received his "master's degree" in money management. Then he went on to, presumably, higher and more important positions.

Insofar as the Nixonomics Troika (PPBS, Regional Government and Revenue Sharing) is concerned, the most important of the "old line," Cabinet-rank Departments is that of Health, Education, and Welfare. It spends the most money, touches the lives of more people, has the most and the most varied programs, and it fits almost automatically into the Regional Government scheme for controlling the "human resources" of the Nation. So, when it came time to select a second-term leader for this most important programming post, Caspar W. Weinberger was transferred from the Office of Management and Budget to that of Secretary of HEW.

Also important in the control of "human resources" is the Labor Department. This is especially true of its "manpower training" section. So, nominated to take over the post of assistant secretary of labor for manpower is one William H. Kolberg, who has been an assistant director of the Office of Management and Budget.

In the field of "human resources," one of the most important posts under Caspar Weinberger at HEW, is that of the Administrator of the Social and Rehabilitation Service. So, you guessed it: nominated to take over that post is James S. Dwight, Jr., who received his post-graduate training as an associate director in the Office of Management and Budget.

Newly named as head of the Internal Revenue Service is Donald C. Alexander, a lawyer who specializes in taxes. He did not serve an apprenticeship at OMB; but he did serve as a Treasury Department consultant from 1970 to 1972, and with Shultz running both OMB and Treasury during that time, Dwight undoubtedly received the proper indoctrination for the new post.

Simultaneously with the shift of personnel, these departments—and this is particularly true of HEW and Labor's Manpower Section—are in the midst of re-programming in order to meet the requirements demanded by the Nixonian Trio of PPBS, Regional Government and Revenue Sharing. For this reason, misunderstanding Congressmen and special interest spokesmen are accusing the Administration of impounding funds, cutting off services, etc.

While this is true though temporary, the real truth of the matter is this: All "services" are to be discontinued, and they are to be replaced with "programs." Perhaps this will be more easily understood if we use the most controversial example of the moment: OEO. This is a "service" agency which in its present form cannot meet the guidelines laid down by the Office of Management and Budget. OEO deals with individuals and families, but not with long-range objectives and the type of planning that will change society itself. It is a kind of charity, not a "program for progress." It is personal and tangible, when it should be impersonal and abstract; it treats people as people, not as numbers and computer card entries.

This should not be taken as a defense of OEO which, to our way of thinking, is indefensible. We are merely trying to explain why OEO as a "service" agency must be liquidated and its activities absorbed into a "program" which will meet the accountability and long-range objectivity of that New Federalism which depends for its dictatorial power on the Terrible Threesome: PPBS, Regional Government, and Revenue Sharing.

Perhaps our thesis will become clearer if we refer to yet another phase of Revenue Sharing for purposes of power grabbing:

On March 14 President Nixon sent to the Congress the latest of his serialized State of the Union Messages. This one had to do with our federal system of criminal justice. Which seems a bit ludicrous, coming at a time when the Nixon Team is trying to cover up its transgressions in the Watergate Caper and when the Securities and Exchange Commission charges that the Nixon Administration was "playing cozy" with International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT) and helping the giant multinational conglomerate win a favorable anti-trust settlement from the Justice Department. Directly involved, says the SEC report which, in turn, is based on the ITT's own files, are Vice President Spiro Agnew, former Treasury Secretary John Connally, former Attorney General John Mitchell, former Commerce Secretary Maurice Stans, and other top brass of the Nixon hierarchy, and with the intimation that the Great Nixon knew all about the string-pulling and signified his agreement by his silence.

On top of this, the General Accounting Office has charged President Nixon's reelection finance committee with four new "apparent violations" of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. It also appears that Ruth Farkas, the new ambassador-delegate to Luxembourg, bought her position for $253,000, in campaign contributions to help reelect Richard Nixon.

As we said, it does seem a bit ludicrous for the White House to send recommendations to Congress concerning crime control when its own record connotes crime and corruption. But, be that as it may, the President is quite proud of the record of one of his new agencies which was set up in accordance with PPBS procedures. He told the Congress (in writing, there was no personal appearance before Congress):

"At my direction, the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) has greatly expanded its efforts to aid in the improvement of State and local criminal justice systems.... But the job has not been completed. We must now act further to improve the Federal role in the granting of aid for criminal justice. Such improvement can come with the adoption of Special Revenue Sharing for law enforcement...."

However, Revenue Sharing becomes a control mechanism instead of an assistance to crime fighters when utilized by LEAA. The following article indicates how LEAA is used as an agency, not to fight crime, but to change society. We quote from the Washington Post of March 10, 1973:

"Police departments, correctional institutions and courts across the nation that receive aid from the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration were told yesterday they can no longer use minimum height requirements to deny jobs to minorities and women.

"A guideline published in the Federal Register, and effective immediately, bans the height limitation in the 40,000 LEAA-funded agencies unless height can be shown to be essential to job performance.

"The guideline is necessary to prevent law enforcement agencies from denying employment opportunities to many Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans, Japanese-Americans, and women, said the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which has negotiated with the LEAA for more than a year on anti-discrimination issues.

"Another guideline effective at once requires the agencies (local police departments—Ed.) to take 'affirmative action' to correct deficiencies in the numbers of minorities and women in their work forces.

"The LEAA, which is spending nearly $1 billion this year aiding state and local law enforcement agencies, also agreed to require jails and prisons to take special steps to recruit minorities even if they are located in suburbs or rural areas where minorities do not live.

"The national funding agency said it would cut off funds in appropriate cases against state and local law organizations with discriminatory employment practices. In the past it has not applied such sanctions."

Our favorite Congressman commented on the above; to wit:

"The Law Enforcement Assistance Administration was originally established by Congress to make the streets safe from crime by pouring billions of tax dollars into local and State police agencies. It continues to develop its bureaucratic threat to locally controlled law enforcement.

"Like all federal bureaucracies, LEAA published its compliance orders in the Federal Register. The guidelines for March 9 do not relate to crime in the conventional sense but rather indicate the LEAA leadership is more concerned with theories of social justice than with giving the American people a top notch, effective police force. According to this latest de facto order, continued funding will depend, not upon police statistics showing positive police action in crime control or in making the streets safe, but rather in achieving race and sex balance. The penalty to the police for not obeying the LEAA: the 'cutting off' of Federal funds. This new regulation is reminiscent of the old cutting off of school funds by HEW before the public schools were federalized.

"And the new LEAA guidelines may well require the busing of police officers and employees to achieve race and sex balance. Since continued funding requires State and local law enforcement agencies, jails and prisons to take special steps to recruit minorities in suburbs or rural areas where minorities do not live; if these recruits and employees do not have transportation, who can doubt that some Federal judge would even hesitate to order busing.

"Police departments, now conditioned to LEAA funds in their expanded budgets, will find these additional funds no longer an asset in upgrading law and order to combat crime, but rather a liability....

"The nationally controlled police force continues to shape up...."

(End of quote)

In connection with the above: Currently the LEAA and the FBI are in a hassle over which agency should be in charge of a National Computerized Data Bank. LEAA has its SEARCH (System for Electronic Analysis and Retrieval of Criminal Histories) which was started in 1969 with $600,000 in Federal funds. And the FBI has its NCIC (National Crime Information Center) which is an older and a more sensitive Data Bank. With LEAA utilizing Revenue Sharing guidelines, and with the FBI now being charged with having become—under L. Patrick Gray—a "political" police; it is a moot question whether the National Data Bank should be operated by LEAA's SEARCH, or by the FBI's NCIC.

But, returning to the subject of this letter: This Federal Register entry of March 9, showing how LEAA utilizes Revenue Sharing, is an excellent example of the primary purpose of this Act: To bring about the centralization of all political power in the Federal Executive through programmed budgeting and the power to "cut off" funds if all Federal guidelines are not honored and obeyed. Revenue Sharing combined with PPBS and Regional Government means that the Executive Dictatorship "continues to shape up."

WHEN SATAN'S LITTLE HELPERS WEAR THEIR WHITED ROBES

THE NEW UNIVERSAL MAN FOR THE NEW WORLD CIVILIZATION

That Satanism is on the increase has become a matter of common knowledge. Most major cities now have churches where Satan is worshipped openly as Satan and as the Adversary of Jesus Christ. Increasingly, covens are being established in communities throughout the land, where wizards and witches practice the rites of black or white magic. One of the country's greatest cities, Los Angeles, has its official witch. More and more colleges and universities are offering courses in witchcraft and in the occult arts and sciences. "The devil made me do it" has become a television-popularized excuse for wrong-doing.

Men and women and teenagers of weak character and immoral desires require some kind of "license" for their lusts and their crimes against society, so they associate themselves together in some ungodly religion because birds of a feather find safety in flocking together. People who require a ritual for murder and group participation for lasciviousness, often run to cults and occultists to save their consciences and "justify" their sins. Others, calling themselves Hell's Angels or using some similar sobriquet, spread death and depradation "just for the hell of it."

However sinister, however fear inspiring, however ungodly the activities of such, there is this consolation: these Satanists who engage in violence, run to Satan in their fear of God, conjure up evil spirits and cast spells; these all are of the extremist fringe and they constitute minority groups. However horrible, their danger and their influence usually is local in character and does not represent a grave danger to society as a whole. Even in the Middle Ages when Satanism ran rampant, the Church of true believers remained triumphant and societies at least continued to call themselves Christian.

But there is a great multitude, and a far more dangerous group who do the work of Satan while believing that they are doing the work of God. These are they who are deceived when they see Satan come as an angel of light, when they are deceived, as was the mother of us all, into accepting Evil because "it is good, and pleasant, and to be desired," and when they become convinced that man can bring about his own salvation through good works.

There is, for example, a multitude of well-meaning people who are called by their manipulators and controllers "The New Group of World Servers." These are, for the most part, sincere and good people who think they are lending themselves, their time, effort and money, to a truly worthy and God-serving cause.

If this were an isolated group of idealists promoting false ideals, they would present little problem save to themselves. But when it is realized that this "New Group of World Servers" is but one of hundreds of similar misguided zealots, and that these hundreds of groups are bound together in one coordinating body, then what these misguided light-bearers and wearers of white robes of self-righteousness are doing and promoting becomes a matter of extreme importance to all of us.

TRAIL OF THE SERPENT

By way of dramatizing this issue without exaggeration or overstatement of dangers, let us refer to The Cooperator, a magazine published by the International Cooperation Council (ICC). This ICC:

"...is a non-profit coordinating body of autonomous individuals and groups, each seeking in its own unique way to contribute constructively to the global transformation of our time. Based upon the principle of 'unity in diversity among all peoples,' ICC is an experiment whose goal is to foster the emergence of a new universal man and civilization serving the well-being of all mankind. Utilizing the methods and knowledge of modern science in concert with valid insights of religion, philosophy, and the arts, the creative activities of ICC cover a spectrum from the search into man's inner nature to dynamic social action. More than one hundred twenty-five groups are now cooperating with ICC."

ICC has its slogan:

Fostering the Emergence of a New Universal Man and Civilization
Based on Unity in Diversity Among All Peoples

And ICC has its symbol:—

And ICC has its Affirmation:—

Behind every appearance of diversity there is an interdependent unity of all life.

We affirm—

OUR DISCOVERY of a universal source of life, which many people call God

OUR CELEBRATION of the evolutionary nature of the universe

OUR PURPOSE to practice reverence for life

OUR AWARENESS of unity underlying diversity

OUR STRIVING to integrate reason and faith, science and religion

OUR SEARCH for the unities and the universals

OUR RESPECT for the spiritual insights of the prophets and sages of all times and cultures

OUR RECOGNITION of the evolving nature of our understanding

OUR SENSE of worth and our respect for persons, and

OUR FAITH in the power of LOVE to make humanity ONE

Before proceeding with the “here and now,” of this Satanic movement, let us look at the past, that we may place the present in perspective:

Particularly honored as one of ICC’s great “prophets and sages of all times and cultures” is one Sri Aurobindo, an Indian Guru who died in 1950. In fact, an article dealing with the late Aurobindo, or quotations from his collected and edited sayings, will be found in almost every issue of the quarterly magazine The Cooperator.

Born in 1872, graduated from Cambridge, jailed by the British in 1908 for his part in a bomb plot, Aurobindo was a friend and associate of the fellow revolutionist, Mohandas Gandhi. However, unlike the late Mahatma, when released from prison Aurobindo renounced political activism as such and became instead a teacher and religious leader. He founded for himself a “Center” which he named Auroville, on the east coast of the Bay of Bengal just outside the former French city of Pondicherry. When Aurobindo died in 1950, his wife took over as “The Mother” of Auroville, dubbed it “the planetary city,” secured support from UNESCO, which inspired the French architect to “develop concrete plans for Auroville to become a model city for the whole planet.” Auroville now is a “shrine city” of about 50,000 population, which is made up of people from all walks of life and from all countries, including peregrinating hippies and “children of God” from all parts of the United States.

Auroville also published a magazine with the strange but revealing name of Equals One (the same old unity in diversity theme), which is printed on pink paper and whose message is “One World Brotherhood.” One of the chief exports from Auroville is a set of arty booklets packaged in pink, which take the novice reader from “service to mankind” to the higher mysteries of the occult. The real goal of the teaching is world dictatorship and, according to research specialist Ed Dieckmann, Jr., the teaching employs “the exact methods and goal of the 18th Century Order of the Illuminati.”

But, to return to Aurobindo: Before he died in 1950 he had as a prize pupil one Michael Morphy. Murphy studied under the Guru for two years—1948 and 1949—then returned to the United States and apparently meditated and sought higher illumination for about 15 years. Then suddenly, in 1964, Esalen Institute sprang into existence on land that was owned by Michael Murphy in Big Sur, California. As though that were the awaited signal, other Ashrams, or “growth centers for human potential” began to open up in the United States and Canada, and then all over the world. This was followed by the establishment of “Intentional Communities” or Communes, such as the Children of Light Commune in Gila Bend, Arizona, the Magic Mountain in Seattle—69 of them were counted by the end of 1969. Then they began to appear in India, Japan, Central America, New Zealand, Israel, etc.

These all seemed to have been hatched from Esalen, which had been brought over from Auroville in India, which in turn had been turned into a Mecca of Awareness and a model planetary city through grants from UNESCO (most of the money being supplied originally by U.S. taxpayer payments to the U.N.)

The story has been told of how the late Dr. Maslow (Esalen) and his successor, Dr. Glasser (Reality Therapy) introduced into the public schools via PPBS, this Awareness Potential method ("your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," said the serpent to Eve). Sensitivity Training is the name given to this brainwashing therapy and, coupled with the now accepted sex education, Satan's little helpers in white robes are having the time of their lives liberating the children of the world from family ties, religious bonds and the fetters of traditional morality.

Meanwhile, there is this network of groups and organizations busily developing the New Universal Man; a network which includes Auroville in India, Easlen in California, The Temple of Understanding in Washington, D.C., and the New Group of World Servers which has its international headquarters in London and its New World headquarters in the United Nations Plaza in New York City.

An indication of how closely connected are the activities of these various groups, is given us in the following comment by Ed Dieckmann, Jr. in the winter 1969 issue of The American Mercury. He mentions the magazine Equals One, then adds:

"Where do you suppose you apply for a year's subscription to Equals One? Well, you could write to:

Navajata, General Secretary,
The Auroville Office,
Sri Aurobindo Society,
Pondicherry 2, India.

But why bother? It's much easier, and faster, to send your $6 to:

The Lucis Publishing Company,
866 United Nations Plaza,
New York, N.Y. 10017.

Address your letter to Jack H.T. Albert. And as you do, be also advised that the Lucis Publishing Company is the former "Lucifer" Publishing Co. (something about that name bothered people, so it was changed), and the outlet for Lucis Magazine, the official, self-admitted magazine of today's Order of the Illuminati."

The Lucis Trust, a "non-profit tax-exempt educational corporation" operates the Lucis Publishing Company, and another of its activities is called World Goodwill. In turn, World Goodwill distributes the literature and otherwise assists in the activities of the New Group of World Servers, which is managed by a hierarchy of Enlightened Ones (Illuminati) "whose right and privilege it is to watch over human evolution and to guide the destinies of men. In the West we call them Christ and His followers. In the theologies of the East they are called by many names. They are also known as the Agents of God, or the hierarchy of liberated souls, who seek ceaselessly to aid and help humanity. This they do through the implanting of ideas in the minds of the world thinkers, so that these ideas in due time receive recognition and eventually become factors in human life." (End of quote).

This hierarchy is said to be composed of spirit-beings who "are responsible for the spread of those ideals and ideas which have led humanity onwards from age to age. This inner centre has always existed and the great leaders of the race, in every field, have been connected with it." Listed in the hierarchy are such as St. Germaine of the Rosicrucian movement; Annie Besant of the Theosophical movement, Colonel Edward Mandel House of the Council for Foreign Relations, etc.

The following quotation from one of the Lucis (Lucifer) pamphlets should be self-explanatory:

Humanity is not following a haphazard or uncharted course - there is a plan.

Humanity determines the speed of its own evolution and the fulfilling of its own destiny under the Plan.

The success of the Plan depends upon the intelligent co-operation of all men and women of goodwill everywhere in the world.

Men of goodwill who co-operate form part of the New Group of World Servers which is working to implement the Plan.

The leaders of the New Group of World Servers are those who initiate and carry forward activities which benefit humanity as a whole. These leaders are known by their harmless, constructive and inclusive qualities. They provide the vision and mould public opinion.

Behind these leaders and the co-operating men of goodwill are the Custodians of the Plan, "the inner spiritual Government of the Planet." They are spoken of as "The Society of Illumined Minds" since they are ahead of us in development. They are also called "The Masters of the Wisdom."

Working in all the main fields of human activity and in all countries everywhere in the world, the New Group of World Servers acts as a synthesising factor within humanity and lays the foundation for right human relations and ultimate world unity.

The New Group of World Servers is not an organisation. It has no headquarters, no president, officers or list of members. It has only servers of humanity in every country occupied with the task of discovering and aiding all men and women of goodwill.

Every man and woman in every country who is working to heal the breaches between people, to evoke the sense of brotherhood, to foster the sense of mutual interrelation and interdependence, and who sees no racial, national or religious barriers, is a part of the New Group of World Servers, even if he has never heard of it by name.

Though a Lucis activity, the only members of this Group ever mentioned are dead, and therefore beyond all human interference, pressure, punishment or persecution. The suggestion seems to follow, tacitly, that any living individual who wishes to join in the work of "goodwill" should join one of the listed 125-plus cooperating groups and organizations which ordinary human beings are allowed to join, since the NGWS is reserved exclusively for the Illuminated Ones, living and dead.

A partial list of these recommended and cooperating Groups is given in each issue of the magazine, The Cooperator.

There follows, as space permits, the names of those organizations whose members are actively engaged in helping to fulfill the Great Plan of the Illuminated Ones:

THE BILDERBERGERS BY ANY OTHER NAME - - -

EUROPE-AMERICA CONFERENCE

Whenever a world crisis, monetary or otherwise, has been planned, programmed, budgeted and is about to be initiated, something can always be expected to happen:

The world leaders will call together the most important and most influential European and American financiers, industrialists, opinion molders and politicians, for a conference and briefing session. This meeting will occur at some luxurious but out-of-the-way place which can be well guarded and protected from undesired outsiders and un-screened newsmen. Here, these members of the elite are secretly briefed, their reactions gauged, and a common course of action is determined.

This secret society has come to be known as the Bilderberger Group, the name having been taken from the place of their first secret meeting. But it seems that the group was becoming too well known and too definitely identified for what it really is and what it really does; and some changes had to be made.

It all happened because of the unwanted publicity which was given to their last meeting in the United States two years ago (April, 1971) at a lodge owned by Laurance Rockefeller and located at Woodstock, Vermont. At that time a monetary shake-up was in the offing, and the utmost secrecy was desired by the Bilderbergers. However, enterprising news gatherers obtained the names of those attending the conference (which we published) and a partial agenda for the meetings (which we published). The constant chairman, Prince Bernhardt of The Netherlands, announced that "the chances for change in the world role of the United States" would be discussed.

That was in April 1971. Changes occurred shortly thereafter: Nixon froze prices and wages in August; the Regional Government structure was put into operation in February and Nixon became an admitted "Keynesian." And on the world scene: The dollar was devalued, the Bretton Woods Monetary Agreement was shelved in favor of a temporary Smithsonian Agreement and Kissinger began his secret treks to Peking and Moscow, initiating the plan whereby the world was to be divided into three parts, to be governed by three equal Regional Governments, a la George Orwell's 1984; the three being The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Peoples Republic of China, and the United Corporate Republic of America.

When a second dollar devaluation occurred, when the United States managed to bow out of the Vietnamese part of the continuing Southeast Asia War; when West Germany and Japan began protesting that division of the world into three parts in which they could find no proper and honorable place; when these and other happenings threatened to bring chaos to the cosmos, there should have been an emergency meeting of the Bilderbergers—but we could find no reference to such a conference.

Then, we discovered that the Bilderberger Group had indeed met, but under another name!

It was billed as the "Europe-America Conference" and was reportedly financed by the International European Movement; but it was attended by the same old cast of characters, chaired by Prince Bernhardt of The Netherlands, and with the American delegation headed by the Rockefeller boys.

The editorial managers of The Washington Post must have felt that it would be quite alright to print the story of this meeting, since few, if any, of the "wrong" people would realize that the Bilderberger Group had adopted an alias. Hence, the following story which appeared in The Washington Post of March 27, 1973, and which we reprint in full:

EUROPE, U.S. NOTABLES WARN OF THREAT TO UNITY (By Bernard D. Nossiter)

Amsterdam, March 26—An all-star gathering of American and European officials from the past two decades warned today that Atlantic unity is threatened on both economic and military fronts.

They expressed their fears over the "euphoria of detente" in East-West relations; talk of American troop withdrawals from Europe; floating currencies; rising trade protectionism; and the growing economic strength of Middle East oil producing nations.

Although the degree of alarm varied from notable to notable, virtually all saw dangers and only a rare figure took any delight in the way the world is moving.

The three-day "Europe-America Conference" here, attended by some 50 eminent persons, is sponsored by the International European Movement, which is thought to get most of funds from large corporations.

The European delegates included NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns, two former presidents of the Common Market executive commission, Germany's Walter Hallstein and Belgium's Jean Rey, and two former chancellors of the British Exchequer, Roy Jenkins and Reginald Maulding.

The high-powered American group included John McCloy, former Under Secretary of State Eugene Rostow and two former deputy defense secretaries, Cyrus Vance and David Packard.

Many had played central roles in creating or operating post-war landmarks like NATO and the European Economic Community.

Prince Bernhardt of the Netherlands, a serious royal consort, set the keynote by viewing "with great concern... a deterioration of the relationship" between the United States and Western Europe. He observed that Europe is increasingly anxious over the "reliability" of the American nuclear commitment, but European nations "refuse to consider what a real sharing of the burden means."

It was the address by New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, who was accompanied by three advisers, that embraced virtually all the worries dominating the talks here. He deplored the Democratic Party's proposal to reduce the 300,000 American troops in Europe and traced it to "the combination of prosperity, detente and the resulting trend toward isolationism." He was fearful that "a proliferation of East-West negotiations and the conduct of independent foreign policies with the U.S.S.R.—in areas of mutual involvement—can only increase the vulnerability of the West, and in the final analysis destroy the Atlantic community."

The present balance of nuclear strategic force, he indicated, meant that the United States could no longer be counted upon to respond to an attack on Europe. He suggested that the French and British combine forces to develop a deterrent of their own, a prospect that is already a gleam in the eye of Prime Minister Edward Heath.

On the economic front, Rockefeller saw the "monetary framework" collapsing and the "doctrine of free trade being eroded... on both sides of the Atlantic." He was concerned about the "ingeniously aggressive expansionist trade policies" of Japan and the growing Western dependence on imported oil. He urged common policies to deal with both.

For the most part, other leading figures who spoke today quarreled little with Rockefeller's gloomy balance sheet. Packard, now once again boss of an electronics firm with big defense contracts, insisted that an Anglo-French nuclear deterrent would pose "unthinkable" problems. The United States commitment could not be shaken, he indicated, as long as Europe kept up its spending on conventional weapons.

Almost alone, Jens Otto Krag, former prime minister of Denmark, welcomed the growing thaw in East-West dealings. He saw the preparatory talks for a European security conference as "the dawn of the day (for) a realistic East-West dialogue." Krag said he expected "fairly modest" results from the conference which is expected to open later this year. But he viewed it as part of a "lengthy process of gradually bringing East and West in Europe closer to each other."

The pessimists were most notable on the economic side of the equation. Henry H. Fowler, former American secretary of the treasury, called floating currencies "the easy way out." If the world did not return to a system of fixed exchange rates, Fowler said, it would "encourage protectionism and trade wars between blocks, refashion more tightly controls on capital... and weaken or drastically alter the alliances that have served the cause of peace and prosperity since World War II.

Fowler is now a partner in Lehman Brothers, the investment banking house.

Our apologies for blackening so much white paper with what appears to be mere drivel; but the lines were required so that we might read between them. And our reading goes like this: In addition to being given a new name, the Bilderbergers also are being given a new set of orders. It is very true that there has been, in Prince Bernhardt's words, "a deterioration of the relationship" between the United States and Western Europe. And it is also true that there will be, in Nelson Rockefeller's words, "a proliferation of East-West negotiations" and this detente involving the United States, Russia and China is going to make United States-European relations even more strained, perhaps destroy the Atlantic Union, unless the Nations of Europe accept and learn to live with the Triangular Power Constellation concept about which they, the Bilderbergers, were warned by Rockefeller and Kissinger two years ago at the Bilderberger meeting at the Woodstock Inn, in Vermont.

It was in the nature of a veiled threat that Rockefeller mentioned the "energy crisis," in connection with the "growing economic strength of the Middle East oil producing nations," the growing Western dependence on imported oil, etc. He seemed to be implying that Europe would "play ball" with the Triangular Constellation concept or else Western Europe might find itself "going it alone" against Soviet Russia, at a time of extreme "energy crisis."

This energy crisis ploy is very interesting: Gas rationing and ballooning prices are on tap for the United States. Yet vast oil reserves remain tapped in the continental United States; using an ecological excuse, the Supreme Court has blocked the proposed trans-Alaska pipe line, even the newly discovered riches in black gold off the coast of Southeast Asia remain undeveloped; the Middle East producers of oil are being advised to demand higher prices and better contracts or else—all of this seemingly because American engineers have discovered vast oil and gas deposits in Russian Eurasia, and the United States is supposed to become dependent upon Soviet Russia for her "depleted" oil and gas supplies!

We are told that Albert F. Gibson, in his book Dollar Destruction and the Swiss Banks, makes the statement (page 5) that: "Oil is the most strategic material in the present day world, in some ways it is more powerful than gold... If all of the world's oil were under the control of one group, the people of the world would have only two options, revolution to overthrow this group, or utter slavery."

Well; the Rockefeller Klan is the 'one group' that has a near monopoly on oil production. The Rockefeller brothers are most powerful voices in the extremely powerful "International European Movement," formerly the Bilderberger Group. These same Rockefeller Klansmen finance, and therefore control, the powerful Council on Foreign Relations. And in the strictly economic field of control, Standard Oil man (Rockefeller) Emilio G. Collado is chairman of the CFR satellite, the Committee for Economic Development.

The growing importance of CED is the subject of an article appearing in papers that subscribe to the New York Times News Service. In the article there is even the suggestion that the parent CFR may fade away as the offspring CED takes over as the most powerful pressure group in the United States.

We reprint that entire article, as it appeared in the March 30, 1973 issue of the Los Angeles Herald Examiner:

IS THERE AN 'AMERICAN ECONOMIC ESTABLISHMENT?'

By Leonard Silk of the New York Times News Service

New York—Is there an American economic establishment? If so, how much power does it have?

Those questions have acquired fresh interest with the reported decline and possible demise—as a result of the Vietnam war—of the so-called "foreign policy establishment," the body that allegedly shaped United States foreign policy from the latter part of the Roosevelt Administration until the end of the Johnson Administration.

Much less noticed by journalists and historians over the years has been its sister organization, the American economic establishment, which also came into being during World War II.

The heart of the economic establishment has been the Committee for Economic Development—as the heart of the foreign-policy establishment has been the Council on Foreign Relations.

The committee was established by a group of big businessmen, such as Paul Hoffman, former chairman of the Studebaker-Packard Corporation, Beardsley Ruml of Macys, and William Benton, co-founder of Benton and Bowles and later a United States Senator from Connecticut, who were determined to prevent a recurrence of the depression after World War II ended and government spending was cut back.

The committee was the first group of businessmen to adopt the modern fiscal creed that government has the power, through tax and spending policies, to prevent both mass unemployment at one extreme and rapid inflation at the other.

Although John Maynard Keynes and the economists who professed his doctrines were at the time anathema to most American businessmen, the committee reached out for alliances with liberal economists at America's top universities.

Like the foreign-policy establishment, the economic establishment had close ties to Harvard, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Institute for Advanced Studies in Princeton, Stanford and elsewhere, though Cambridge was the hub. Indeed, the academic, business and governmental departments of the two establishments overlapped.

The present chairman of the committee's research advisory board is Carl Kayson, director of the Institute of Advanced Study, formerly of Harvard. He is also a former deputy national security advisor to President Lyndon B. Johnson. His White House boss was McGeorge Bundy, once dean at Harvard, who is now president of the Ford Foundation.

The committee chairman is Emilio G. Collado, executive vice president of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey (Exxon). He holds an S.B. degree from MIT and A.M. and Ph.D degrees from Harvard, and has served in the United States Treasury, at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and in the State Department.

The true establishment member does not appear overly enamored of Nixon's policies, especially in the social area. Testifying before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress last week, the economic committee's chairman, Collado, sharply criticized the priorities in the President's budget for fiscal 1974 while supporting the over-all ceiling of 268 billion. In prior years, Collado noted, the administration had "strongly emphasized that the present welfare system was in urgent need of reform." (Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the President's former White House counselor on welfare, has attributed defeat in Congress of the family assistance plan to opposition from liberals and lobbyists.) However, Collado—speaking for a body that includes the heads of many of America's largest corporations—declared, "We believe that the need for welfare reform remains as great as ever, and find it disappointing that the administration provides no funds for this purpose in either the 1974 or the 1975 budget."

The economic committee chairman also criticized the decrease in funding for programs to improve the organization and delivery of health services.

"We are concerned," he said, "that the absence of reform of delivery systems in areas where uncontrolled federal expenditures are growing very rapidly will, in the not very long run, turn out to be a false saving."

Regarding the administration's decision to freeze subsidies for the building of new housing for low and moderate income families, Collado questioned "the equity and advisability of halting new commitments before the proposed new methods have been clearly agreed upon, let alone tested."

He said this would mean undue hardships for the country's "least affluent families as the growth in the housing stock falls significantly behind the growth in needs...."

(end of article)

In the foregoing article New York Timesman Leonard Silk quotes Standard Oilman Emilio Collado as being very critical of Establishmentman Nixon's fund impoundments and cutbacks in the areas of welfare, education, housing, health, etc. Publicly, that is true. It also is true publicly, of every pressure group that is in the business of molding public opinion, and CED is such a group. Privately, the game plan goes like this:

1. The plan is prepared.
2. An emergency or crisis is created.
3. The public is whipped into demanding a solution.
4. The prepared plan is presented to the public as the only feasible solution.
5. The public demands enactment of the prepared plan.
6. The prepared plan is made law because of popular demand..

And this is how republics become democracies and democracies become dictatorships. The people demand that their leaders take from them their freedom and make them slaves. The people demand price controls, wage controls, welfare and child care controls, production and distribution controls. Until at long last all is controlled. Working and eating, sleeping and child bearing, birth and death, all are controlled. And to make the people demand such controls is the hidden purpose of such groups as the Bilderbergers, CFR, CED, Common Cause, Nader's Raiders, etc., etc. And we are expected to applaud and aid in their efforts to enslave us. As author Gibson said of the group that would control all oil: we have two options, revolution to overthrow, or utter slavery.

THE BATTLE OF THE BULGING BUDGET - WRONG ENEMY, WRONG OBJECTIVE -

FROM CONFUSION TO CHAOS

Seldom in the chronicles of American government has there been so much widespread misunderstanding of an issue. Why so much of the taxpayers' money is being spent for one program, so little for another program; why the Congress demands economy in one area and extravagance in another; why the President impounds funds in one case and overspends unappropriated funds in another case; why both approve the biggest budget in history and at the same time demand less spending - these are questions that have caused so much confusion that there are occasions when the liberal New York Times seems more rational than the allegedly conservative Human Events; and when liberal Democrats seem righter than party line Republicans.

Human Events assumes that in the budget battle, Nixon is right on all counts and the Congress is wrong every time; which makes Human Events just half right:

"Clearly determined to keep a lid on federal spending," says HR's lead story on April 14, "President Nixon struck another blow on behalf of the taxpayer last week when he vetoed legislation that would have authorized the federal government to spend over $300 million for rural water and sewer grants in the next three years."

In these days when federal spending is generally reckoned in the billions, $100 million per year for three years to build sewers and water lines for farmers is hardly a budget saving affair. However, we are told that:

"Thus the President has once again tossed the spending gauntlet down before a liberal Congress.... The President's chances of getting his way have been considerably enhanced by his stunning victory in the Senate on April 3 (when) by a vote of 60 to 36-four votes shy of the two-thirds needed to override-the senators upheld the President's veto of the $2.6 billion vocational aid to the handicapped bill.

"...the President won the initial-and probably the most important contest-with the big spenders, and he managed to win the battle in the liberal Senate. The next big vote will be on the water and sewer grant veto. Again, unless this and other vetoes in the works are upheld, the end result will be more inflation and higher taxes." (The veto on the water and sewer grant was upheld-but the end result still will be more inflation and very possibly higher taxes-Ed.)

To Human Events, the President (spelled with a capital "P") is the taxpayers' hero, while the congressmen (spelled with a lower case "c") are cast in the role of collective -and spendthrift-villian.

Paradoxically, an article by Alice M. Rivlin in The New York Times Sunday Magazine of April 8, comes much nearer to telling the whole truth. Dr. Rivlin is an economist who was a pre-Nixon Administration Assistant Secretary of H.E.W., and now is associated with the policy-setting Brookings Institute. Co-author of "Setting National Priorities: the 1974 Budget," Alice Rivlin sits right up there with the big opinion molders, and she comes closer to explaining the federal government's use of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System than most similarly situated experts (although she never uses the name or the acronym PPBS-the reading public is not supposed to know about Planning, Programming Budgeting System as an integrated plan to build a new kind of world society with a new kind of world religion and a new kind of world government.

However, while trying to justify Nixon's alleged economic, Dr. Rivlin comes nigh to spilling the beans without ever indentifying them as beans. We quote at length from her article; comment and explanation will follow her presentation:

A COUNTER-BUDGET FOR SOCIAL PROGRESS

*Why Should Liberals Bleed
When the President Cuts?*

Liberal leaders have reacted with anguished outrage to the cuts in social programs in President Nixon's budget. Senator Edward Kennedy described the budget as "a ruthless reduction of this Government's commitment to its social obligations." "A retreat from social responsibility," said Senator Edmund Muskie. "An abandonment of our efforts to help those least able to help themselves—our children, our aged, our sick," said Senator Harold Hughes. And economist Robert Lekachman, writing in these pages on February 18, spoke of "the wholesale slaughter of New Deal and Great Society legislation in the President's fiscal-year 1974 budget" and called it a "reversion to Stone-Age social policy."

That's foolish hyperbole, of course, but there is still plenty of reason to be outraged by this budget if one believes the Federal Government ought to be substantially increasing, not decreasing, its efforts to improve opportunities for the poor and to increase social services for everyone:

* The cuts the President made to keep many expenditures in line with expected revenues fall disproportionately on social programs.

* Some important programs designed to assist the poor (housing, manpower training, emergency employment, legal services) have been eliminated or sharply reduced without any attempt to find another way to meet the need for which they were enacted.

* Other such programs (Model Cities, Job Corps) have been lumped together in common special-revenue-sharing pots to be spent at the discretion of states and localities (this is the "new federalism" propaganda line, but it ain't necessarily so—Ed.)

* The budget reflects the Administration's intention to dismantle the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), headquarters for the nineteen-sixties attack on poverty, and to stop funds for community action agencies, the OEO's major remaining operating program. . . .

Nevertheless, it could have been worse. . . . —and this is what makes the dilemma of the liberals so hard—almost all the cuts are in programs about which it can legitimately be said: "this money could be better spent." With some important exceptions, the social programs the President cut were outdated or inequitable or only partially effective.

The President cut the Hill-Burton hospital construction program, but even those most worried about the inadequacies of American health care do not think there is a need for additional beds. The need is for more equitable financing of health expenses and better ways of caring for people who are in hospitals only because there is no other place to put them. The President cut manpower training programs, but even those most concerned about the unemployed concede that many people who go through training programs find no job available at the end of their training or find only an unskilled job for which no training was necessary. The real need is to combine training with the creation of new jobs. The President put a freeze on new low-income housing projects, but even those most disturbed about the housing of the poor point out that present programs are inequitable and unnecessarily costly and that a new housing policy is in order. The President cut education funds for "impacted" areas with concentrations of Federal employees, but even those most worried about school finance admit that impacted area funds frequently go to wealthy school districts quite capable of paying their own school bills. The need is for a new program to channel Federal funds to districts with heavy school burdens and meager resources of their own. . . .

. . . the Congressional liberals rarely vote for cuts in on-going programs—only Neanderthals do that. Moreover, there is little political mileage for the liberals in restructuring existing activities to make them more effective. This kind of activity just yields political headaches and ammunition for conservatives. It is much easier to pick out some major problem that is quite obviously unsolved—health care, child care, hunger, pollution—hold hearings that dramatize the unmet need and then propose new programs without replacing any old ones.

Unfortunately, though, this "add-on" approach is not working anymore. Hardly any new social programs have been enacted since 1968 and, with the possible exception of day-care and child-development legislation, none seems to have strong support.

. . . Since no one really wants the Federal Government running industries or dispensing social services directly, there remain three kinds of activities involving the budget that the Federal Government can undertake to advance social objectives:

* It can use the tax system and cash transfers (such as Social Security) to redistribute income among the individuals.

* It can help individuals pay for certain kinds of goods and services that are considered essential—by providing medical insurance or housing subsidies or college scholarships, for example.

* It can give grants to states and localities

(or other institutions such as hospitals or universities) to increase their capacity to render services—with either narrow or broad restrictions on what these services should be and who should get them.

In addition, the Government can pursue social policy goals in other ways that may or may not have to do with the budget. It can impose regulations or provide financial incentives to influence how individuals behave or how institutions operate—where doctors practice, how much effort industry makes to reduce pollution or how much say parents have in the way pre-schools are run.

There is an obvious need to rethink recent approaches in all of these areas....

But although there is controversy about the success of individual grant programs, there is no controversy about the fact that there are now too many of them. The sheer number of different grant programs complicates life for local and state officials, creates mountains of paperwork for everybody and makes it impossible to provide enough funds in any one of them to do the job properly.

The Nixon Administration's response to this problem is called "special revenue sharing." Last year's budget proposed consolidating over a hundred categorical grant programs into six block grants for broad purposes, such as education, manpower training and urban community development. Congress did not take the idea seriously and appropriated the money to the individual programs as usual. This year the Administration is trying again in a new no-nonsense tone of voice, but with a small number of proposals....

(The remainder of this very long article is mostly concerned with telling liberals what they should do to cooperate with Nixon's proposals and at the same time build for themselves a more popular program which might permit them to win the next election. We do not recommend the reading of the entire article; we have brought you the best of it in these foregoing excerpts—Ed.)

Dr. Rivlin suggests, oh so very subtly, that President Nixon has adopted—wisely—the last of her three suggested courses: to give grants to states and localities — with restrictions on what is to be done with the money and who is to get it.

This is the purpose of revenue sharing and the more sophisticated "special" revenue sharing; and this is the reason for dividing the Nation into ten Federal Regions, and for dividing the States into a comparable number of sub-regions.

And behind it all is the dictatorial power of the Programmed Budget: the granting of money for the carrying out of Programs that meet Federal guidelines and promote the immediate objectives and the ultimate Plans of the Bureaucratic Dictators who run the whole show out of the White House Executive Offices.

These welfare and social programs which President Nixon seems to be discontinuing through the impoundment of funds already appropriated by Congress, or through non-inclusion in the upcoming fiscal 1974 budget, are not being discontinued. They are the programs which have not yet been restructured to fit into the overall framework of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System which had been incorporated into every level of government, including the new Regional Governance level. When any program doesn't fit into the new system, it must be restructured and recycled until it does fit. This the liberals don't seem to understand. They think their precious New Deal, New Frontier and Great Society programs are being scrapped and sent to the junk pile. Actually, they're simply being recycled.

The liberals might feel less deflated if they were reminded that it was not President Nixon who initiated this PPB System. Back in 1965 President Lyndon Baines Johnson ordered all agencies and departments of the Executive Branch of government to initiate PPBS. Even before that, this same PPBS (in a less sophisticated form) became a requirement of the United Nations for aid and assistance to all developing nations. The Philippines was used as a PPBS model as early as 1955—which accounts for the mess in which President Marcos finds himself and his country in 1973. Starting in 1960, UNESCO, with World Bank and Ford Foundation funding, established PPBS regional training and research centers in various parts of the world. In 1961, Robert McNamara, fresh from Ford and Edsel and Charles Hitch who helped develop the system at Rand Corporation, introduced PPBS into the U.S. Department of Defense (the conduct of the war in Southeast Asia is a "tribute" to the money-saving, life-saving, efficiency and accountability of PPBS). Then, in 1965, President Johnson was induced (or ordered) to initiate PPBS into all departments of government.

On April 12, 1968, less than three months after his inauguration, from the Executive Office of the President (Nixon), Bulletin No. 68-9 went out "To the Heads of Executive Departments and Establishments." Its subject was "guidelines for continued development of integrated Planning-Programming-Budgeting (PPB) Systems and outlines requirements for PPB submissions to the Bureau (of Management and Budget-Ed.)"

According to this executive bulletin from which we are quoting: "The principal objective of PPB is to improve the basis for major program decisions in the operating agencies and in the Executive Office of the President... Data are to be organized on the basis of programs, and are to reflect the future as well as current implications of decisions. As in the case of budgeting, planning and programming apply not only to current programs but to proposals involving new legislation... It is essential that the products of the PPB system—the Program Memoranda, Special Analytic Studies, and Program and Financial Plans—provide adequate bases for program decisions... To meet Bureau needs, agency Program and Financial Plan submissions are to present specified data on outputs, costs, and financing over a seven-year period: the past, current and budget years, and four future years..."

Need a translation of the above executive bulletin? Here is one that was prepared by Virginia McNeil of North Hollywood, Calif., whose assistance in the preparation of our booklet Proofs of a Conspiracy... was invaluable:

PPBS is a national computerized system of performance accountability. Governmental planning sets general, long-range, policy goals and establishes specific, measurable, short-range objectives. Then various types of programming are designed to accomplish those goals and objectives. The decision-maker, using a cost-benefit analysis, then selects the programs that are to be implemented. And finally, budgeting funds the selected programs and sets them in action. Programs are budgeted for multi-year funding (7 years), thus setting up what has been called a "perpetual-motion machine."

Once goals and objectives are established, it is necessary to change or alter (manipulate or recycle) individuals' behavioral attitudes and performance so they will make a commitment to these objectives and, in turn, carry out the program....

The computers will make a resource analysis (evaluation) of the program. Personnel or programs that do not achieve the preset, top-down goals and objectives are recycled, and failing further, are terminated or rejected. Alternative programs accomplishing these same objectives can be initiated, or new personnel can be brought in....

This systems management approach to planning is used in every executive agency of the federal government....

Decentralization, or "power to the people," or "home rule" is a vital part of PPBS. It puts the "decision making" seemingly at the regional or sub-regional level, where specially trained and selected appointed—as opposed to elected—personnel make the decisions (which are program-budgeted if approved by the budget-funder whose office is in Washington). Decentralization also calls for and creates sub-regions and equal-size districts which are necessary for computer evaluation....

Essential ingredients of PPBS are:

- 1) The division of the whole country into Ten Regions, or Provinces;
- 2) The division of each State into equal Sub-Regions or Districts;
- 3) Federal Revenue Sharing;
- 4) State Income Tax, to be collected by the Federal T-Men and returned to the States via Special Revenue Sharing;
- 5) State-wide Property Tax; and
- 6) Control of Land Use by the Ten Regional Councils.

Not the balanced budget but the programmed budget; this is the principal of PPBS. And, when a judge rules that the Executive Branch has not the power to kill OEO, he does not understand that OEO is not being killed, it is merely being recycled so that it can be programmed to conform to the long-range objectives of PPBS.

Nor do the Congressmen understand what the President told his agency heads in his Executive Bulletin 68-9: "Since the budget is transmitted to the Congress in terms of individual appropriations, there must be a clear relationship of program decisions to appropriation requests."

In other words: the Executive Branch thinks of the Budget in terms of program decisions while the Congress views the Budget as a list of individual appropriations. Unless the Congress learns what PPBS is all about, and stops it, a Dictatorship of the Bureaucracy is inevitable.

OUR NEW GOD: THE STATE

FOR HE IS A JEALOUS RULER

"And God spake all these words saying, I am the Lord thy God... Thou shalt have no other gods before me... For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments." (Exodus 20:1-6).

In the recent presidential election one State voted against Nixon and in favor of his opponent, George McGovern. Recently Elliot Richardson, the new Secretary of Defense, announced that there was to be a military cutback and certain installations were to be closed down, not overseas but here in the United States. And the State to be hit hardest by this order is Massachusetts, the one State which voted to turn Nixon out.

A crucial election is about to take place in New Jersey, an election that is important to Richard Nixon. Fort Dix is an important installation in New Jersey. Secretary Richardson said Fort Dix may be closed down.

When asked to show mercy to the thousands of young men who evaded the draft and service in Vietnam by fleeing to Canada or a place of refuge in some other country, he refused, saying at a news conference on January 31st:

"Amnesty means forgiveness. We cannot provide forgiveness for them. Those who served paid their price. Those who deserted must pay their price; and the price is a criminal penalty for disobeying the laws of the United States."

Well and good, and few right-thinking people would disagree. However, in another case involving criminals, Nixon showed amnesty which means forgiveness in a manner with which few would agree. He showed mercy—which meant forgiveness—to four federal prisoners last December 20th, so they could be home in time for Christmas. One of them was, as we mentioned last week, a Mafia leader named "Gyp" De Carlo who was described at his trial as "violent, homicidal, and a man who orders executions." According to The Washington Post, nobody in the federal law enforcement apparatus involved in the case was even aware that an appeal for release had been made until after "Gyp" had been freed by Executive Fiat. His release "created more anger and turmoil in the Justice Department than the springing of Jimmy Hoffa a year earlier."

Under Nixon's "New Federalism," which has come to be accepted by the majority as our new form of government, it appears that mercy can be dispensed as indiscriminately as can justice itself, and none may say nay to the Head of State.

We inscribe the above, giving it the religious connotation it seems to have acquired, not so much as a criticism of a head of state who at times seems to be acting like a "jealous god" who will punish whom he pleases and show mercy to whom he will; rather, we wish to point out that a new kind of State religion has been enthroned—a religion that permits a President to determine what is the law, write a new definition of justice, and administer clemency as a reward for favors and past services.

When a head of state begins to take over the prerogatives usually ascribed to godhood, we think of Caesars who were looked upon as gods incarnate in Imperial Rome. And, thinking of the men who died in Vietnam to extend the borders of an economic empire, and of the men who are still risking their lives in bombing raids over Laos and Vietnam, to our mind's eye comes a vision of brave and stalwart young men marching forward, coming to a smart and rigid halt, raising their right hands straight out in a fascist salute, and chanting, "Hail, Caesar, we who are about to die salute you!"

These were men performing a prescribed religious rite which involved the need for the shedding of blood, human blood, in a rite of human sacrifice which had to be repeated at each service attended by the head of state who also was their god incarnate, and who decreed death to whom he pleased, and showed mercy to whom he would.

And this, our modern Nation that once was called Christian but is fast becoming merely a regionalized section of a New World Order, is very like that Roman State over which mortals ruled as gods. It is true that Rome's "New Order of the Ages" did bring a kind of "peace with honor" to outposts of the empire, and did establish a system of law and order that has been emulated by modern States. But it was a kind of law and order which demanded subordination of the individual to the State, and required the worship of the Head of State, who was to the people very god incarnate.

That our own head of state may at times seem to act as did the Caesars of old, pretending to a kind of godhood in that right becomes right because he says it is right, and that what is wrong in his eyes must be punished, even to the closing down of the Boston Shipyard; this delusion of godhood is a passing passion and means little in itself.

But when the people begin to believe that the head of state can do no wrong, and that right is right because he says it is right; then the situation has become drastic indeed, and we have truly "gone a whoring after strange gods."

Let us cite examples:

1. When Richard Nixon became a politician and won a seat in the House of Representatives, he was catapulted to national recognition because of his stand against Communism. He sided with Whittaker Chambers and against Alger Hiss, and the majority applauded. When he moved to the Senate, he won the vote of the people by labeling the ultra liberal Helen Gahagan Douglas "the pink lady." When exalted to the Vice Presidency, he continued to win approbation for his firm stand against Red China and Soviet Russia. If there was in government service a man fit to fill the shoes of the late Joe McCarthy, or the equally honored Pat McCarran, Dick Nixon seemed to be the man. Certainly, the people knew him as an anti-Communist when he ran for the Presidency, and at least a part of the reason for his victory in 1968 must be attributed to the fact that he seemed to stand far to the right of Hubert Horatio Humphrey.

Yet, this anti-Communist did something for which Lyndon Johnson or Hubert Humphrey probably would have been impeached: He sent Kissinger on secret missions to the capitols of these countries, made secret deals with them, then extended the open hand of friendship to them, made trade contracts and favored nation arrangements with them; all of this without ever bothering to seek Congressional approval until after the acts were committed.

And the people who had applauded his anti-Communist stand and statements, now applauded his pro-Communist actions. It seemed right "because Nixon did it!"

2. Overspending and irresponsible fiscal management had brought the Nation to a state of bankruptcy; we were hovering on the brink of economic collapse; inflation was ruining the dollar both at home and overseas. Nixon was a Republican and an advocate of the balanced budget. The people voted for him because he promised a change, a return to sanity and solvency. But he suddenly reversed the field, called himself a Keynesian, invented a new kind of budget-keeping predicated on balance only under full employment and full production—conditions which were possible only under total war conditions. In short, he double-crossed those who had voted him into office, and joined the Fabian economists whom the people thought they had voted out of office.

And what happened when Nixon became a turncoat? They applauded his actions; seemingly because he was Nixon and Nixon could do no wrong, being the head of state and standing in the place of Caesar, who stood in the place of God!

3. Candidate Nixon said never would he interfere with the course of free enterprise; he could be counted on by one and all never to do such a dastardly thing as to clamp on wage and price controls. And the people applauded and workers and merchandisers breathed easier. Again he reversed the field and did exactly what he said he'd never do. And the people praised him because if he did it as Head of State, then it was exactly the right thing to do.

4. There were certain insiders who wanted to make sure that Nixon was re-elected. So bugs were planted at a place called Watergate; this in an attempt to search out information which might be used against the Democratic National Machine. The scheme backfired, but the people elected Nixon anyhow. Nixon protected all and sundry and the people were sure Nixon was being stabbed in the house of friends. But The Washington Post and a few other newsgathering organizations that had been hurt by Nixon over the "Pentagon Papers" caper and similar exposures, sought revenge and kept teasing the Watergate affair until finally Nixon must have felt that he could no longer protect his private I.R.A. from the questionings of Senators like Ervin and Baker. The ticklish situation was aggravated when Barry Goldwater likened the stench to that of Teapot Dome. And Martha Mitchell just couldn't wait for an opportunity to tell what she knew. "I can sit down and tell a story that will flabbergast you," said the wife of the former Attorney General.

Result as of this writing: the two Johns—John Mitchell and John Dean—are to be offered up as human sacrifices as an expiation for the sins committed by others, by many others who, hopefully, will never again be publicly suspected of or held accountable for crimes committed at a place called Watergate.

Speaking frankly and comparatively, Watergate is but a tempest in a teapot; and we refer neither to Teapot Dome nor to the Capitol Dome in making that statement. Far worse, and more damaging, crimes are committed every day on Capitol Hill. But this is not our point. We mean:

When Nixon's name was first mentioned in connection with Watergate, people refused to believe that their head of state could do any wrong. When Nixon refused to permit any of his employes to testify concerning the case, the people said he was doing the right thing. Then, when he reversed his stand and ordered them to testify, in a way which would throw the major blame on the shoulders of two whipping boys named John, the people still said he was doing the right thing!

Ergo, Caesar can do no wrong; because he is the head of state and when the State has replaced God, the Head of State is forever right, and just, and can do no evil!

In classical antiquity, the state was god walking on earth. But Biblical faith denies this; the Bible asserts that God is the maker of law and the dispenser of justice and mercy, and that the state is not the source of law, but an administrator of one aspect of God's law. Thus, the state itself is a religious institution, ministering and executing according to the Higher Law. And there are certain areas of life where it is sinful for the state to claim jurisdiction. Drafting youth for non-military services, taxing more than 10% of a man's wealth or income, controlling religion, expropriating property, debasing the coinage; all these and more are cited as acts forbidden the state.

In a few remarkable sentences, R. J. Rushdoony explained to Hillsdale College (Hillsdale, Michigan) faculty and students:

"This difference between Biblical faith and the doctrine of the state in antiquity and today is of critical importance.

"To understand the significance of this difference, let us note, first of all, that the source of law in any society or system of thought is the working and actual god of that structure. Where man is the ultimate source of law, there man is god. Where Nature is seen as the ultimate source of law, there Nature has been deified. Where the state is the ultimate source of law, there the state is the actual god of man and society.

"For the Christian, God is the highest good, and man is a creature of God, created in His image. For Aristotle, 'the state or political community... is the highest good of all... and embraces all the rest.' Man is a 'political animal,' a creature of the state whose life is defined by the state. 'Neither must we suppose that any one of the citizens belongs to himself, for they all belong to the state, and are each of them a part of the state.' For Aristotle, therefore, law and morality have a social reference and statist purpose. When Aristotle wrote his Nicomachean Ethics he made it very clear that ethics is a branch of politics because a private good can only be secondary to the statist good. Moreover, 'what is good for a nation or a city has a higher, a diviner, quality.' Education thus in morality or good-

"Clearly, the modern state follows the classical model, rather than the Biblical one. It controls education, has largely taken it over, and it defines law, not ministerially but legislatively. The difference is fundamental. Where law is ministerial, the premise is that a higher law exists, and that it is the duty of man and the state to know and apply the higher law. Man cannot create law, because he is under law and, in every area of his life, physical, biological, economic, moral, and political, he moves under law that has its origin beyond man and the natural order. Law is thus transcendental in its source and immanent in its application. It requires study, application, and amendment so that the truth of God's law can be better approximated. To cite a specific example, the Ten Commandments declare, among other things, that 'Thou shalt not steal.' This means that private property has God's sanction as the legitimate means of ownership.... The ministerial function of the state is then to expedite the freedom of private property and to protect it. If, however, we deny the transcendental source of law... then there is no moral mandate for the state to respect private property. Then the function of the law is legislative, i.e. law is what the state declares it to be. . . . The state then, instead of passing laws to conform with (God's law), creates law. There is no possible appeal against the legislative state if its premise is true. Right is what the state does. . . ."

And, by logical extension, Right is what the Head of State does, when the state has replaced God as the Creator of Law!

The author goes on to illustrate:

"In January, 1968, I was one of three speakers at a Northern California forum, with a state senator presiding. After the meeting, a state school teacher. . . . came to me angrily, outraged at my defense of freedom. In a sentence, her thesis was this, 'In the modern world, freedom is obsolete, and for anyone to suggest freedom as a live option was to be guilty of charlatanism.' For her, the only tenable social order was a scientifically planned society, and such a society requires an experimental approach, and controls, not freedom. Her thesis was a logical one, once her denial of God and God's transcendental law are granted. A world beyond good and evil has no need for morality or law; its function as a scientific society necessitates an experimental approach. In a scientific experiment, all factors must be controlled. Hence, freedom is obsolete in a scientifically controlled society."

"The practical management of a modern economy," is the aim of the scientific socialists who both advise and direct our head of state. So they experiment, and to experiment they must control, and the word of the state must not be questioned!

Of course, in this our modern state, we are commonly bribed and persuaded to submit by means of the Fabian carrot, rather than through being beaten into submission with the Communist stick. Therefore, there are groups and individuals who are openly and publicly opposed to seeing their country turned into a scientifically controlled state. Among such protesters are the conservative groups. But, for the greater part, their protests take the form of opposition to existing or proposed man-made laws; or demands for the enactment of newer and better man-made amendments or laws. Their reference always seems to be to man-made laws, not to a demand that our laws be in conformity with the Higher Law, which was the chief aim of the writers of our United States Constitution and its first Ten Amendments.

In other groups that dislike living in a scientifically controlled society, there are those who seek escape in some new form of religious experience. They reject the State as their god, but they also deny God and seek something in between that will arouse the jealous wrath of neither the state god nor the True God in whose image they were created. They seek sanctuary in cults and esoteric movements. Baha'i, Buddhism, Krishna, Scientology, Hindu meditation, spiritualism, satan worship, Rosicrucianism, Theosophy, the allegedly Christian Key 73, Campus Crusade for Christ, the Jesus Movement; all of these and others presuppose a moral order while at the same time denying or caricaturing the God Who gave the laws on which moral order must be based.

Robert S. Elwood, a professor of religion at the University of California, provides a clue in his recent book about the Jesus Movement. He points out that two movements are making great strides in America: nature worship (ecological concern has become a religious faith), and the Jesus Movement. Of the latter he says, "The Jesus Movement gives young people a simpler key to spirituality than working through the endless fantastic worlds of the drug experience or the Tibetan Book of the Dead or the Hindu pantheon. By simply 'accepting Jesus,' the converts are offered a straightforward immediate ecstasy."

Thus, Jesus becomes not a King of Kings, but a substitute for drugs and a shortcut to nirvana. This kind of a Jesus offers no opposition whatsoever to the state that has taken the place of God. Such movements as Key 73 and the Crusade which has as its goal "saturating the United States with the gospel by 1976" offers no opposition to the movement to establish a totally controlled scientific world society by 1984. In fact, such movements are designed to immobilize those who might oppose the "scientific experimentation" which is required if the scientific society is to succeed. New laws are not needed; however, a return to God's law is demanded. Because already, the abandonment of Christian premises and Godly precepts has led to the enthronement of a false god, the State. Yet, this false god is but a pretender on a throne of pretense. The King of Kings still occupies the Throne of Thrones; His Law is still the ultimate law by which all the world is judged. Let pretenders and believers of lies beware!

THE SECOND BATTLE OF WOUNDED KNEE

THE PROPAGANDA OF THE DEED

That first Battle of Wounded Knee had been relegated to the history books and forgotten, until its propaganda value was discovered by a handful of renegades and revolutionaries. Fought back in 1890, it resulted in a massacre of between 250 and 300 Indians who participated in what was to be the last stand of the Plains Indians against the United States Cavalry. Their spirit broken at last, the Sioux tribes, the Cheyenne and the Dakotas, smoked the peace pipe, moved onto the reservations assigned them by the Great White Father in Washington, D.C.

Because of its symbolic significance, the little hamlet of Wounded Knee, South Dakota was chosen by the Red Communist leaders of a handful of Red Indians, for a propaganda maneuver which was supposed to organize one more minority group. It was, and is, the third recent attempt to get the original Americans to join the forces of the New World Revolution. There was the seizure of Alcatraz Island, a partial success in that U.S. government forces failed to evict them. Then came the occupation and destruction of the headquarters of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Washington, D.C. The ravagers were not punished. And this "kid glove" treatment undoubtedly encouraged the founders of the American Indian Movement (AIM) to seize the hamlet of Wounded Knee on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota.

On February 27, 1973 some 200 renegade Indians armed with AK-47 carbines and sub-machine guns of the same type used by the North Vietnamese and manufactured in Red China, shot their way into the tiny hamlet, ransacked its one store, terrorized the local inhabitants, declared Wounded Knee to be a new and independent nation, sent a representative to the United Nations to ask for membership therein, hired Red-promoting and Black Panther-defending William Kunstler to represent them in negotiations with the United States Government, and sent out appeals for donations and other aid in their "defensive stand" against invasion by U.S. Marshalls and FBI-men.

Human Events of March 10, 1973 reported that "AIM members were being led by professional agitators with extensive criminal backgrounds. Three of the founders of AIM, Dennis Banks, Clyde Bellecourt and his brother, Vernon, have been convicted of various crimes. Banks has been convicted 15 times of charges including assault, battery and burglary. Bellecourt was convicted of armed robbery in 1954 and sentenced to two-to-fifteen years in prison. Paroled, he was convicted of burglary again in 1960. He was paroled in 1964 and last November he faced new charges of aggravated criminal property damage involving a Minneapolis restaurant. Brother Vernon was convicted of burglary in 1950 and armed robbery in 1953, receiving a prison term of five-to-forty years. The organization (AIM), according to one national Indian activist, 'was cooked up in the Minnesota penitentiary'."

A remarkably candid story—considering the source—on the curious events at Wounded Knee, appeared in Time magazine on March 26, in which it was pointed out that:

"Wounded Knee had become a kind of trap, particularly for television. It was obviously a major event that demanded thorough coverage. AIM leaders were so successful in getting their side of the story across, and so enthralled by the attention they were receiving, that they seemed willing to prolong the deadlock for the sake of more publicity. Most newsmen watched helplessly as the thin line between covering and creating news wavered."

Undoubtedly, television coverage can be blamed for making this into a national story. And as the story gained momentum "civil rights" notables began to show up at Wounded Knee and get into the act. Dick Gregory was one of the first to appear. Then that apostle of non-violence, Rev. Ralph Abernathy came on the scene: A Black leader come to advise American Indians on the passive resistance technique developed by the Asian Indians.

The March 17 issue of the Communist newspaper Daily World reported that "organizations like the National Lawyers Guild and the National Council of Churches, both on the scene, have been giving the besieged Indians legal and material aid."

Since the National Lawyers Guild has been described by the House Committee on Un-American Activities as "the foremost legal bulwark of the Communist Party," its mention in the very same sentence with NCC by the Daily World, is indicative of the new "togetherness" being exhibited by allegedly Christian organizations toward avowedly Communist satellite organizations.

More demonstrations of "togetherness" on the part of NCC: Lonnie Healey, secretary of the Communist Party's Commission of Indian Liberation, was on the scene conferring with both AIM and NCC representatives. And a UPI dispatch of March 17 reported that the Bureau of Indian Affairs police, armed with a blanket summons issued by the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council, "ordered about 20 NCC representatives to leave Wounded Knee as 'undesirables' for aiding and abetting the militant Indians." The NCC representatives, however, ignored the summons and continued to aid and abet AIM and CPUSA.

As a result of this NCC activity, AIM has received a significant amount of financial support from religious denominations and church related groups. According to the news reports we have been able to secure:

* The American Lutheran Church's Division of Social Service is credited with having provided AIM with a total of $37,000.

* AIM's original office was provided by the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of St. Paul-Minneapolis. The Archdiocese is also credited with giving $15,650 to the Minneapolis chapter of AIM and $14,200 to the St. Paul AIM chapter.

* In 1971 the Roman Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CHD) gave a reported $40,000 to help develop AIM chapters across the country. In 1972, $40,000 was given by CHD to AIM's Indian Survival School in Minneapolis.

* The United Methodist Board of Global Ministries' National Division gave some $4,000 to the AIM-led "Trail of Broken Treaties Caravan" which culminated in the physical destruction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs headquarters in Washington, D.C.

* The Episcopal Church provided $10,000 to the "Trail of Broken Treaties."

* The November-December 1972 issue of IFCO News reported that the Interreligious Foundation for Community Organization (IFCO), with headquarters at 475 Riverside Drive in New York City (the same address as the National Council of Churches), reported that "The AIM mission has been facilitated by $30,000 of IFCO funds over the past four years."

* On January 22 the World Council of Churches (WCC) announced that its controversial Special Fund to Combat Racism had granted $6,000 to AIM.

Because of these and similar grants, a movement that was born in a penitentiary in Minnesota in 1968, has become a national organization with chapters in some 65 cities across the Nation. When AIM invaded the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Washington, D.C. instead of being forcibly evicted, they were given a grant of $66,000 from the Office of Economic Opportunity—a bribe to persuade them to leave the building and the city without committing any further violence or destruction in the Nation's Capitol.

And with that kind of encouragement, the leaders of AIM moved from Washington to Wounded Knee, where they decided to establish their own national capitol.

The seizure of Wounded Knee is an example of what Communist Regis Debray calls "The Propaganda of the Deed;" a further move in the drive to gain recruits from the Indian population, especially the young.

For the past fifty years or more, since about 1913 to be more precise, there has been developing a certain modus operandi whenever there has been a need for the exploitation of grievances so that social changes may be brought about or new socializing programs initiated. First, arrangements are made for the financing of such exploitation through tax-exempt organizations such as Foundations or church-related organizations. And second, the "experts" at exploitation are called in to provide the necessary manpower and field leadership. The Communists are the real experts at this type of sabotage and vandalism. They are specially trained and conditioned for this type of work, and they accept such calls in the spirit of the dedicated crusader.

Now, the Indian situation in the United States has, over the years, presented an excellent opportunity for the exploitation of national aspirations and admittedly legitimate grievances—the record of the Great White Father in dealing with the original inhabitants of this land, is deplorable indeed.

However, the vast majority of American Indians have shown little interest in communism as a political weapon or as a way of national life. True, Reservation Indians are socialized by our own government, but this does not make them agitators or activators, and they have remained impervious to Communism as a movement.

Nevertheless, the Communists have tried, and a study of the efforts to make the Indians again militant and anti-white, is important because of recent events at Alcatraz, Washington, and Wounded Knee:

Back in the New Deal era, the Bureau of Indian Affairs was under the Department of the Interior, which was headed at that time by Harold L. Ickes. Ickes was a long-time member of the American Civil Liberties Union, which had been cited by a previous committee of Congress as a Communist front. And ACLU had played an important part in the New Deal legislation for Indians. One of the underlying principles of the ACLU plan was to make of the Indian Reservations Communist-type communes. The idea was to abolish all private property, stop allotments to individuals and keep all property in a tribal institution where ownership of all things would be held in common.

The Indian schools, with controlled and captive audiences of little children, became the ideal testing grounds for the propaganda and brainwashing techniques that later were to be introduced into public schools throughout the country. One such effort was a book, New Russia's Primer, written by Russian Communist M. Illin and translated into English by George S. Counts, a follower of John Dewey and his progressive education. In the book's preface it was stated that anyone who read it could never believe in the capitalist system. In Mr. Count's own words, the book was written for the express purpose of indoctrinating young children with the ideas and ideals of Communism.

This leftist influence in the Department of the Interior and in the Bureau of Indian Affairs continued through the years. So, if there are more Indian militants today than at any other time since that first Battle of Wounded Knee in 1890, blame our own Federal Administration for making it possible.

* * *

On Dec. 6, 1972 Congressman H. R. Gross released Legislative Report No. 1198 which contained considerable information that did not find its way to the controlled press, concerning the circumstances of that "Trail of Broken Treaties" which led to Washington, and then later to Wounded Knee. We quote from that Legislative Report:

* * * * *

On Constitution Avenue in the Nation's capital, across the street from the huge Interior Department building and within a stone's throw of the Washington Monument grounds, stands the four-story building housing the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA).

On November 2 about 200 Indian militants and troublemakers, some of them with criminal records, invaded the building and forced suspension of the activities of the Bureau's more than 400 employees. Having for all practical purposes driven the BIA officials and employees from the building, the Indians took possession, defied federal authorities to remove them, and began an incredible orgy of looting and destruction.

Outside the building, while the systematic looting and wanton destruction was taking place, squads of riot trained police and other law enforcement officers awaited orders to put a stop to this lawlessness and destruction of federal property.

The orders never came. The spineless federal government refused to act. The destruction continued.

On November 6, Federal Judge John Pratt, in Washington, issued an order that the Indians be evicted from the building by 6 p.m. that day. Promptly a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals nullified that order and set 9 p.m. of Nov. 8 as the hour for eviction if the premises were not vacated.

It is interesting to note that the action of the appeals court postponed the confrontation until after the election on November 7!

In the meantime, representatives of President Nixon worked out a deal whereby $66,000 was given the leaders of the outlaws to finance their transportation out of Washington. By 9:15 p.m. of Nov. 8, with the $66,000 in blackmail having been distributed, the last of the destructionists vacated the building they had wrecked.

Returning to Washington after the election, this Member of Congress heard reports of the unbelievable devastation that had been wrought at the Bureau of Indian Affairs and decided to personally visit the scene. Every office in the four-story building (with the exception of two which had been partially cleared) was a shambles. The floors were littered with broken glass, letters and documents from the files which had been ransacked.

There was scarcely a piece of unbroken or undamaged furniture in any office. The legs from desks and tables had been broken off and fashioned into weapons. Costly electronic equipment, including typewriters, tape and dictating machines, had been battered--most of them beyond repair.

There was scarcely an upholstered office chair or davenport, the covering of which, leather or cloth, had not been slashed and made useless. Gaping holes were punched through wood paneling and plaster in the walls of offices. Venetian blinds were torn to shreds. Walls had been smeared with paint which will necessitate the repainting of every wall and ceiling in the building.

Practically no picture or painting of value was left. The glass was broken from the frames and the pictures or paintings stolen or destroyed. The glass enclosed exhibit of priceless Indian artifacts was shattered and the contents stolen.

In the building's main toilet facility, iron bars were used to shatter all the enamel stools and lavatories. Then the outlaws used the floor upon which to urinate and defecate.

While police stood by, under orders not to intervene, at least two trucks were loaded with files and carted away. It is understood that not even the Federal Bureau of Investigation was permitted to make an effort to protect irreplaceable government records.

Preliminary estimates placed the damage to the building and its contents at $800,000. It is now estimated that the cost of repairing the physical damage to the building and its contents, plus the cost of restoring the records--where possible--will more nearly approximate $1,500,000.

The Indian outlaws said they came to Washington to redress past grievances and described their action as the Trail of Broken Treaties. But the savage, senseless destruction was denounced by the leaders of Indian tribes across the country. Chief Webster Two Hawk, president of the National Tribal Association which represents the 147 tribes that occupy the nation's reservations, described the building wreckers as "revolutionaries" and denounced the federal government for letting them get away with it. Another of the chiefs, Roger Jourdain, of the Minnesota Chippewas, said he was dumbfounded at the damage that had been done and added: "If you and I did the same thing, we'd be in prison."

But the question that must be answered is who in the Nixon administration permitted a band of outlaws to take control of a government agency, wantonly destroy and steal hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of government property and then gutlessly bribe them to leave the shambles they created. And from what source came the funds that were used as a bribe?

(End of Legislative Report)

The latter question has been answered: the $66,000 that was used as a bribe came from the Office of Economic Opportunity.

But the seizure of Wounded Knee was just one more example of the permissive lawlessness that has become something of a hallmark of the Nixon administration. Although there were sufficient law enforcement officers on hand to put down the siege, somebody in Washington refused to grant permission for them to restore law and order. Ralph Erickson, special assistant to Attorney General Kleindienst, at one time told the militants that they could leave without arrest and with no charges being filed at any later date, if they would leave their weapons and their names behind.

Vernon Bellecourt, who calls himself Day-break Man, alias Waubun-New-Wi-Nini, and is national director of the Indian American movement as well as a convicted criminal, left Wounded Knee to call on the United Nations "to intercede on behalf of all American Indians." He urged the U.S. to end the "longest undeclared war in history" and demanded the restoration of more than 60 million acres of land. He said, "Indians are emerging once again as the red man, the sovereign nation, the aboriginal people of this part of the universe."

So, through a kind of coalition of the NCC and the CPUSA, with the Federal OEO aiding and abetting, we are presented with a "manufactured crisis." Such crises are planned deliberately for a purpose which is seldom revealed until it is too late for anyone to do anything but go along with the "plan to deal with the crisis," the plan having been drawn up before the crisis was even initiated!

As F.D.R. used to tell his friends and associates: These things don't just happen; they are planned that way.

And if we discern the plans aright in this particular series of events, we can expect a long hot Indian summer.

AND NOW . . . THE YEAR OF EUROPE

A NEW ATLANTIC CHARTER?

Accepting the responsibility but not the blame for the Watergate Affairs, Richard Nixon blamed nobody, criticized nobody, praised Haldeman and Ehrlichman, referred to other erring Palace Guardsmen as people "whose zeal exceeded their judgment, and who may have done wrong in a cause they deeply believed to be right." He then tried to wash his hands of the responsibility of the Watergate scandal by turning the whole mess over to Elliot Richardson, a kind of bureaucratic utility infielder who plays any position on the Administration Team when a first-stringer gets benched.*

By handing "the whole thing" over to the newly designated Attorney General, Nixon hoped that he had heard the last of Water-

Elliot Richardson began his public career as a law clerk studying under the late and controversial Felix Frankfurter. Passing the Bar, he established a home base as a member of the Boston firm of Ropes, Gray, Best, Coolidge and Rugg, where he has a desk when temporarily out of a public position. In 1952 Richardson became a lecturer on law at Harvard, in 1953 became a staff assistant to U.S. Senator Leverett Saltonstall. In January 1957 he was appointed by President Eisenhower to be assistant secretary of legislation in H.E.W. When Kennedy succeeded Eisenhower, Richardson became a special assistant to Attorney General Bobby Kennedy. In 1964 Richardson was elected Lt. Governor of Massachusetts. When Nixon became President, he named Richardson Assistant Secretary of State under William Rogers. Then when Robert Finch flew back to California, Richardson replaced him as Secretary of H.E.W. With Nixon's reelection, Richardson became Secretary of Defense. And now, through player default, Richardson will assume the position of Attorney General with full authority to do what he will in regard to the Watergate Affair. There is much criticism because he is a regular member of the Administration Team; and the situation is comparable to that of a defendant being allowed to appoint his own prosecutor, judge and jury. With such a setup, who needs a defense attorney?

gate (he hasn't, nor have we). He explained: "I must now turn my full attention to the larger duties of this office." And he reeled off a list of international and domestic priorities that he said deserved the presidential attention he had been compelled to focus on Watergate in recent weeks.

It has been said that Richard Nixon is a man who tried to carry out literally the Biblical injunction about not letting the left hand know what the right hand is doing (although Jesus was referring to the giving of alms, not to foreign aid and revenue sharing). In one hand Nixon, at least officially, holds the reins on foreign affairs, and in the other hand he holds the reins on domestic affairs. He tries to keep those on one hand from knowing what those on the other hand are doing; and he tries to keep Congress in the dark about what both hands are doing.

But there is this physiological handicap: In the act of hand-washing, one hand must help the other. Thus, Nixon's involvement at Watergate will influence his wheeling and dealing at the Brandenburg Gate, at the Japanese Diet, and at the Capitol of the maturing United States of Europe.

In a mess domestically because of Watergate and other indiscretions, Nixon may be in an even worse mess internationally because he moved too fast with too little to back up his plays.

Specifically, in his cultivating of new and questionable friendships with Russia and Red China, Nixon has alienated those old friends in Europe, and those post-World-War-II friends Japan and West Germany. Realizing his mistake, perhaps too late, he now has declared this to be "The Year of Europe" and both he and Kissinger will be trying to rebuild neglected bridges.

Kissinger had already started "The Year" with his "U.S. Blueprint for a New Atlantic Charter" which he had outlined in a speech at the annual meeting of the Associated Press on April 23rd in New York City. Willy Brandt, socialist leader of West Germany was in the wings waiting to talk to the President even as the latter washed his hands at Watergate. Nixon will retaliate with a grand tour of Europe this fall. Additionally: That Conference on Security and Cooperation, attended by representatives of 32 European nations plus the United States and Canada, is drifting along in Helsinki. East-West talks on reducing troop levels in Europe are in progress in Vienna. The European Common Market technicians are in session in Geneva allegedly trying to compensate the United States for losses to American exports resulting from Britain's entry into the incipient United States of Europe. The SALT talks have resumed. The "Committee of Twenty" is preparing to meet in Washington in a few weeks to lay the groundwork for the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund, where the still unsolved problem of establishing a new and acceptable international medium of exchange will be re-tackled. There's a meeting of the member nations of GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) coming up this fall.

All of the preceding and more go to make up "The Year of Europe." And it may be a most unhappy year for the United States of America, and especially for the Administrators of the Federal Government of the United States of America.

In order to understand what is happening, it is necessary to turn back the pages of history:

THE FIRST ATLANTIC CHARTER

The United States emerged permanently onto the world political scene shortly before entering World War II as a belligerent. There had been an attempt to embroil America in world intrigues on a permanent basis with the creation of the League of Nations. But the United States, by virtue of Senate rejection, refused to be drawn into the plot as a Nation. However, on August 14, 1941, off the coast of Newfoundland, U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt and British Prime Minister Winston Churchill issued a joint statement of peace aims for the world. This first Atlantic Charter:

"declared that their countries sought no aggrandizement, post-war territorial changes should be made only with the consent of the peoples involved, self-government and self-determination should be restored to those nations deprived of them by the war, access should be established for all nations to the raw materials and trade of the world, all nations should collaborate to improve economic standards, a peace should be made which would guarantee all nations freedom from fear and want, all nations should have freedom of the seas, and the use of force should be abandoned in international affairs and all aggressor nations would be disarmed" (Universal Encyclopedia, 1967).

An Inter-Allied Conference was held in London, Sept. 24, 1941, at which time twelve nations approved and signed the Charter and the signatories were called United Nations. On Oct. 30, 1943 the U.S., U.S.S.R., United Kingdom and China (Chiang Kai-shek) issued the Moscow Declaration, proclaiming the necessity for establishing a permanent international organization. At the Teheran Conference of Nov.-Dec. 1943, Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin called for UN cooperation in the post-war world. At Dumbarton Oaks, Aug.-Oct. 1944, the foundation of the permanent organization was laid. At Yalta, Feb. 1945, Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin agreed to meet in San Francisco in April 1945 to draw up the final charter for the UN. The Charter was drawn up, received final ratification Oct. 24, 1945 (United Nations Day).

However, by these actions, the original Atlantic Charter had become a World Charter, and the need for a more limited, regional organization was felt, especially after the "cold war" began. The UN Charter held provision for the creation of Regional Organizations within its framework and authority. Hence, NATO was a natural and a welcome development because it was looked upon as a defensive alignment against Soviet advancement in the post-war years. In the same vein of defensive thought, SEATO was established to halt Red Chinese expansion in Asia. NATO was hailed by the nations of the Atlantic Pact and by those who dreamed of the Atlantic Union, just as was SEATO hailed as their way of salvation by Japan, Free China and the Philippines.

But with the advent of Nixon and Kissinger to places of power, things began to change drastically. They began to neglect Europe and their SEATO allies, spent their time and effort in cultivating the friendship of both Soviet Russia and Red China, to the detriment of Free Europe and Japan. With the cultivating of friendship with Red China, the need for SEATO ceased to exist, and that regional arrangement is comatose, moribund, and succumbing to death without dignity. The same can be said of the Atlantic Pact unless Dr. Kissinger is able to put over his new Atlantic Charter.

You see, Nixon and Kissinger and whoever tells them what to do, when to do it, and to whom, did far more than alienate the friendship of Japan, Germany and Free Europe. They were planning to reduce these three to positions of secondary importance in a World Confederation. They, Nixon, Kissinger and "whoever," began to plan a New World System wherein there would be Three Great Powers; a Triumvirate composed of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Peoples Republic of China, and the Corporative States of America. In any such division of the world, Japan, Germany and Free Europe would become but subsidiaries, regions, provinces (even as the fifty States of the United States are to become parts of provinces and sub-regions in the new Corporative Government set-up that is being instituted).

Japan has exhibited her resentment by cancelling a previously scheduled visit to the United States by Emperor Hirohito, and by announcing that President Nixon will not be invited to visit Japan. Willy Brandt did obey the summons to visit Nixon; but he came, not as a Chief of State, but as a very important citizen of West Germany on a very informal visit. Brandt is being used as a liaison officer between the United States, Europe and Russia. He visits with Leonid Brezhnev in Bonn on May 18 to 22. Then Brezhnev comes to the United States in June. Finally, Brandt will act as a sort of official host to Nixon when the latter visits all of Europe in the fall. Meanwhile, Brandt will try to "sell" Kissinger's new Atlantic Charter to a reluctant and even recalcitrant Europe.

The Kissinger Plan is being heralded (by its hired backers) as a type of New Marshall Plan for Europe. But it also is being lauded because it is one more step toward the full realization of Clarence Streit's "Union Now" form of world government. John S. Knight, editorial chairman of the Knight Newspaper chain, attended that AP meeting at which Kissinger Marshallled his Plan, and wrote a column for his notebook, in which he declared, in part:

"The Hon. Henry Kissinger...delivered a serious and thoughtful address on our future relationships with Western Europe and Japan... At one point Kissinger said: 'The era that was shaped by decisions of a generation ago is ending. The success of those policies has produced new realities that require new approaches. The revival of Western Europe is an established fact.'

"But it is also a fact that U.S.-Western Europe relations have been sorely strained by the competitive realities. The ravaged nations of World War II, first reinvigorated by U.S. benefactions under the Marshal Plan, have since become economic giants and fierce competitors in the world's marketplace. The same general observation applies to Japan.

"In recent years, we and the Europeans have differed on matters of trade and currency values. The European financial community has long been distressed over our inability to get American fiscal affairs in order....

"James Reston of the New York Times compared Mr. Kissinger's policy statement to the famous Marshall Plan speech of Secretary of State George C. Marshall at Harvard almost 26 years ago. Reston... added that Kissinger, like Marshall, 'recognized that the United States and Europe had reached another critical point in their relationships. He was asking Europe to come back with suggestions for a new Atlantic Charter of partnership.

"As I listened to Dr. Kissinger, I was reminded of Clarence Streit's Atlantic Federal Union, an idea promulgated by Mr. Streit in 1939 and energetically pursued by him ever since. The Streit proposal would summon a convention of NATO allies to explore the idea of an Atlantic Federal Union. Richard Nixon, as a United States senator in 1951, cosponsored a congressional resolution to accomplish this end.

"Streit believes that President Nixon still favors such action by Congress. He quotes from a Nixon letter dated March 10, 1973, which says in part: 'As a goal and concept I have favored it for many years... I want you to know that my longstanding position on the concept and the goal which you are seeking to achieve by the resolution has not changed.'

"The Atlantic Federal Union resolution passed the Senate this year. It was approved by the House Foreign Affairs Committee by a 2-to-1 majority, but on April 10 was referred back to the committee by a House vote of 210-197.

"So there is a substantive parallel between Dr. Kissinger's remarks to the Associated Press and Mr. Streit's 'Federal Union of the Free.' Here is what Mr. Streit has to say:

"I cannot welcome too warmly Dr. Kissinger's speech nor stress too strongly its far-reaching importance. It did not mention such words as "federal" or "union," but does make a very powerful case for our answer to the problems with which Dr. Kissinger dealt... Dr. Kissinger's speech should help to expedite favorable action on the resolution... There is no question but that President Nixon would support it.'

"Mr. Streit did concede that Kissinger's call for a 'new Atlantic Charter' seems to refer to an agreement between heads of government... He is appealing directly to the heads of government, including Japan, to undertake future negotiations in a spirit of give and take. As he said: 'The Atlantic nations must find a solution for the management of their diversity, to serve the common objectives which underlie their unity. We can no longer afford to pursue national and regional self-interests without a unifying framework. We cannot hold together if each country or region asserts its autonomy whenever it is to its benefit and invokes unity to curtail the independence of others.'

"In short, Dr. Kissinger is talking about a pragmatic approach by governments... Mr. Streit, on the other hand, wants to confer with people, not governments..."

(End of quotes from Knight's notebook)

Whether it be by governments or by peoples, world government is still world government. Kissinger takes the high road and talks to heads of state, Streit takes the low road and talks to parliaments of people; but their destination is the same. And their method is the same in this respect: both men are striving for world government by way of Regional Unions first. Streit wants to begin with a Union of all the Free Peoples of the World; meaning, specifically, union of all the English-speaking Nations of the world; this to be followed by other Regional Unions and, finally, a World Government to govern the Regional Governments.

Kissinger, on the other hand, envisioned a division-by-decree, a splitting of the world into three Regions by order of the heads of state of the Three Great Powers of the World, or, more simply, by decree of the three heads of state: Nixon, Brezhnev, and Mao Tse-tung.

But there is every indication that Kissinger and his partners have gone too far too fast. The people in Southeast Asia are not behaving as they promised Dr. Kissinger they would, and the Mekong spree has developed a hangover. Nixon is in real trouble at home and even with the words and actions of such as Ron Reagan and Tom Connally to lend him support, he just might not survive the pollution at Watergate.

And now, with Western Europe and Japan refusing to submit to the dictation of the Triangular World Constellation, Kissinger has been forced to adopt the alternate plan, which provides for the division of the world into five regional administrations, instead of the three regional administrations about which Dr. Kissinger talked to, and sold the idea to, Leonid Brezhnev of Soviet Russia and Chou En-lai of Communist China.

So that, now, if the Master Planners have their way (and if Richard Nixon interferes with their program, he is expendable), when "The Year of Europe" has run its course, the world will have been divided into:

- 1) The United States sphere,
- 2) The Russian sphere,
- 3) The Chinese sphere,
- 4) The European Common Market sphere,
- 5) The Japanese sphere.

Kissinger, therefore, has a new selling job to do on the political leaders of Russia and China, since the world now is to be divided five ways instead of three; and as this letter is being written, Kissinger is in Moscow, conferring with and explaining to Brezhnev about the necessary change in plans.

What Kissinger will not tell Brezhnev or any other political leader (and that probably includes Richard Nixon), is this:

There will be established these five Regional Administrations, but they will not be independent or self-governing. Because all orders and directives will emanate from One Central Authority. This Central Authority will not be composed of political leaders such as presidents and prime ministers. Such political leaders and heads of state will hold merely administrative posts. The Central Authority will be composed of executives chosen by multinational corporations, by the financial establishment, by the industrial and financial rulers of the world.

This is a world revolution that overshadows all the political manipulations which are allowed, to bemuse us and serve as camouflage and smokescreen so that we cannot see that this new kind of world control also means the creation of a new kind of world society with a new religion and a new god, and a new man with a new consciousness and a new set of values; a computerized society in which the finished products will all think, feel and act the same.

Succinctly: when mole hills such as Watergate become mountains that threaten thrones something even more sinister is occurring on the other side of the mountain.

THE MORALITY CRISIS

THE BLISS OF IGNORANCE, OR THE ARROGANCE OF POWER?

"Nothing in politics just happens," wrote Harold Levine in Smoke Filled Rooms—The Confidential Papers of Robert Humphreys. "There is always someone who sets the stage for it, writes the dialog, rehearses the actors, prompts them from the wings. True, sometimes the play takes on a life of its own; the actors begin to ad-lib; the scenery collapses, the audience joins in the action...."

Richard Nixon's appearances on the public stage—as Representative, Senator, Vice President, President, and would-be Administrator of the Universe—have all been marked by a series of crises. Nixon himself admitted as much in his book Six Crises.

Perhaps the first of these crises to be given national prominence occurred when Nixon began his campaign for the Vice-Presidency in 1953. The New York Post of September 18 headlined a front-page story:

"Secret Rich Men's Trust Fund Keeps Nixon In Style Beyond His Salary." The story was picked up and blown out of all proportion by pro-Adlai Stevenson newspapers, but there really was such a fund. And it had been placed at Nixon's disposal because, according to The Washington Star, Nixon had interceded in a Justice Department case involving a tax rebate of more than half a million dollars for a firm owned by Dana Smith, a Pasadena lawyer. Smith had established the fund, in payment for services rendered. Public disclosure of the trust fund caused pandemonium in Republican ranks. There were demands that Eisenhower do what George McGovern was to do twenty years later when running-mate Sen. Eagleton became too much of a load to bear to the polls: Eisenhower was told to drop Nixon from the ticket. But Eisenhower delayed, waited to see what Nixon might do to meet "the crisis."

This is where Nixon's hatred for newspapers began to develop. The Post had initiated the smear, The Star had published the details of the Dana Smith case, and although Nixon kept trying to explain that his case was not unique (Adlai Stevenson had two such trust funds from which to draw campaign expenses), the newspapers made no attempt to help Nixon in his campaign. So he turned his back on the newspapers and, for the first time in political history, staked his future on a live television appearance before a nationwide audience.

This was the famous "Checkers Speech." Senator Nixon delivered an emotion-laden speech that detailed the history of the fund, leaving out a point or two, and adding that someone had also given his family a cocker spaniel, "Checkers," which his two little girls loved, and they weren't going to give it back.

Stevenson supporters described the speech as "soap opera schmaltz and mawkish ooze," (similar language would be used to describe a "Watergate" speech by Nixon 21 years later). But it was one of the most effective political speeches ever delivered. Nixon's political skin was saved, his sins were forgiven by the Republican Party Bosses, and Eisenhower put his arms around the returned prodigal and called him "my boy." And victory for the two became inevitable.

Ten years later a second "crisis" came up in the political life of Richard Nixon, one that seems to have a direct bearing on the current "Watergate Crisis," because so many of the same characters were involved. Richard Bergholz, political writer for the Los Angeles Times, retold the story, which was published in the Times Friday, May 4. We reprint Bergholz's story:

DEMOCRATS LINKS NIXON TACTICS IN '62 TO WATERGATE

A California court case that was settled nine years ago demonstrates that President Nixon and some of his associates have a history of "political espionage," a Democratic official charged here Thursday.

A San Francisco judge found that Mr. Nixon, then a private citizen, and H. R. Haldeman, then an advertising executive, had engaged in political fraud in 1962, said Nate Holden, president of the California Democratic Council.

With that judicial finding, Mr. Nixon cannot escape personal culpability in the Watergate scandal, Holden contended at a Greater Los Angeles Press Club news conference.

"Many of the same characters now so prominently mentioned in connection with the Watergate affair have a track record of involvement in political espionage," Holden said. He mentioned Haldeman, the now resigned White House chief of staff who was Mr. Nixon's gubernatorial campaign manager in 1962; John Ehrlichman, the outgoing White House domestic affairs adviser who was a 1962 campaign aide; Maurice Stans, the Nixon campaign finance chairman in 1972 as he was in 1962; Ronald Zeigler, presidential press secretary who was a press aide in 1962, and others.

Despite their part in the 1962 operation found by the court to be false and misleading, Mr. Nixon "went right ahead and hired them to play roles of authority and responsibility in his 1972 campaign," Holden said. "He turned them loose with no restrictions even though he knew what they were capable of doing. That makes him personally and directly culpable."

Holden said the CDC has a special interest in the case because in 1962, Mr. Nixon and Haldeman tried to frighten California Democrats into voting for the Republican candidates by alleging CDC was a left-wing extremist group. The Democratic leadership went to court in the 1962 campaign to stop the operations of an organization called the Committee for the Preservation of the Democratic Party in California. The organization was a phony, the suit alleged, and was financed by and run by the Nixon campaign team. Democrats sought $500,000 in damages. Unlike most lawsuits stemming from political campaigns, this one was not dismissed after the votes were counted. In October, 1964, two years after the election, San Francisco Superior Judge Byron Arnold signed a stipulated judgment holding that the Nixon campaign had contributed $70,000 for the support of the Committee for the Preservation of the Democratic Party in California. The decree held that both Mr. Nixon and Haldeman had approved a committee circular addressed to registered Democrats and both had agreed the Nixon campaign would finance it. The court also found that Mr. Nixon stipulated that his campaign had financed the operations because he believed his election would be aided by reflecting adversely on candidates endorsed by CDC. The Nixon-financed circular held that CDC was "un-American," and Holden said the CDC position—favoring the admission of Red China to the United Nations, a moratorium on nuclear testing, and trade with Communist nations—have since "been embraced, every one, by Nixon himself."...

Roger Kent, then California Democratic national committeeman and one of the plaintiffs, said recently in San Francisco: "The reason the Republicans agreed to a stipulated judgment is that they didn't want Mr. Nixon to have to give a deposition in the case. He knew all about it. It was totally a Nixon campaign idea and a fraud."

(End of article by Richard Bergholz)

By his tactics in that 1962 gubernatorial campaign, Nixon alienated the conservative voters of both major parties, and he left town after his defeat by Pat Brown, went to New York to remake his image. But before leaving, he displayed, publicly, his hatred of the newspapers. The morning after his humiliating defeat, he called a press conference, made his famous "farewell to politics" speech, lambasted the media for their bias, ending with "You don't have Nixon to kick around any more" (how wrong he was!).

Nixon had lost to Kennedy in 1960, to Pat Brown in 1962, now had to avoid the 1964 campaign (Barry Goldwater's debacle), that he might emerge again as a candidate in 1968 when the party found itself facing a leadership vacuum which even Nixon could fill victoriously when LBJ chose not to run and Humphrey filled in.

So Nixon was called by Rockefeller and the CFR Establishment to come to New York, where a place had been prepared for him in the Wall Street law firm of Mudge, Rose, Guthrie, Alexander and Mitchell (the same John Mitchell who was to become Attorney General and later be indicted for complicity in the Pentagon Papers and the Watergate connection).

Nixon moved into Nelson Rockefeller's apartment building at 810 Fifth Avenue, into the same apartment where Nixon and Rockefeller had arranged that infamous "Compact of Fifth Avenue" (in 1960 (when Rocky remarried, he moved to another apartment on the other side of the building; Nixon moved into Rocky's old apartment, making them neighbors all during Nixon's stay in New York City.

Firmly established in the White House after defeating Hubert Horatio Humphrey, Nixon began to weed out the old-line Republican career men and bring in his old staffers from the West Coast: Haldeman, Ehrlichman, etc. The Eastern Establishment handled the 1968 election campaign and the "old pros" would never engage in such a senseless and unnecessary escapade as the Watergate break-in.

But when the 1972 re-election campaign began, in positions of power were such men as H.R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman, John W. Dean III, Maurice Stans, Jeb Magruder, Herbert Porter, Donald Segretti, Kenneth Parkinson, Herbert Kalmbach, Charles Colson, Egil Krogh Jr., Hugh Sloan Jr., Robert Mardian, Dwight Chapin, Gordon Strachan, Frederick LaRue, John Mitchell, G. Gordon Liddy, Howard Hunt, James McCord, etc.

And early in the campaign came Watergate. The complex contained the Washington residences of some Senators and Congressmen, John Mitchell, Maurice Stans, Rosemary Wood who is President Nixon's private secretary; and in one of two office buildings at Watergate the Democratic Party had rented an entire sixth floor as its National Headquarters. Directly across the street from Watergate is the ten-story Howard Johnson Motel. And it was from a room in that motel that the Watergate spies did their eavesdropping on Democratic Headquarters by means of sensitive electronic equipment which they had planted in the Democratic Headquarters offices. They heard and transcribed conversations, telephone calls, etc. That went on for several weeks. Then, on the night of June 17th, the spies broke into the offices of the Democratic Party. They had planned to steal records, set up more "bugging" devices, install hidden microphones, etc. After picking the lock of one door to get in, they put tape over the latch, so it would close but wouldn't catch while they were working.

A building guard making his rounds, spotted the tape and removed it. Discovering that the tape was gone, the spies merely put more tape on the latch and went on about their nefarious errand. Making his rounds once again, the building guard spotted the retaped latch. This time he called the Washington police, who caught the spies red-handed.

Before the explosion, the fuse sputtered for a long time. The conventions, the campaign, the election, the inauguration ceremony; and there was no explosion, just sputterings. After Nixon's second term began, now and then the White House would make a statement to the effect that nobody in the White House or its executive offices had any knowledge of, or had anything to do with, the Watergate affair. That any Presidential aide was involved, was vehemently denied time after time. But those newspapers that Nixon hated wouldn't let the matter drop so easily. Names were named: Haldeman, Ehrlichman, Mitchell, Kleindienst, Stans, and Dean. All denied and continued to deny, until the lid blew off on March 23rd. It was on that day that U.S. District Court Judge John J. Sirica made public a letter to him from convicted conspirator James W. McCord, Jr. The letter charged perjury at the trial of the "Watergate Seven," and the public then began to demand more details, which The Washington Post and New York Times—still smarting from their involvement with the Pentagon Papers—were eager to supply.

On April 17th, the President announced that he had learned of "serious charges" and that he was personally taking over the investigation of possible White House involvement—a probe that had been handled from the beginning by Dean. Two days later Jeb Magruder implicated both Dean and Mitchell in the plot. Next day, Dean was ready to implicate Haldeman and Ehrlichman. On April 27th, FBI Chief Gray resigned. And that seemed to start the exodus. On April 30th the President received and accepted the resignations of Haldeman and Ehrlichman, had requested the resignation of Dean. The President then, after the manner of his "Checkers Speech" of 1952, called for TV time to make a personal appearance. He insisted that he had first learned of the Watergate affair on June 17th, while in Florida. He was "appalled at this senseless, illegal action... immediately ordered an investigation."

"Until March of this year," continued the President, "I remained convinced that the denials (of complicity by his aides) were true and that the charges of involvement by members of the White House staff were false."

Then came the explanation that "during my 27 years in politics I have always previously insisted on running my own campaign for office." But he decided "as the 1972 campaign approached, that the Presidency should come first and politics second."

So, he didn't know what the boys were doing although he must bear the responsibility for their actions since they were working for him. Then, in a finale clearly reminiscent of "Checkers," he told of the list he had made on Christmas Eve of the goals that he hoped to achieve in his second term as President. Then he spoke of the special four-year calendar he had given each of his staffers on Inauguration Day, on each of which he had written an inspirational paragraph. And finally, he said,

"God bless America, and God bless each and every one of you."

"Soap opera schmaltz and mawkish ooze," said Nixon's opponents of his Checker's Speech; but the people forgave and accepted and elected. The same sentiments were expressed after Nixon's Watergate Speech, but this time the people did not forgive, did not accept, and would not have re-elected him had the speech come before an election. So, secluded at his Florida retreat, Nixon had an aide completely dis-associated from both Watergate and Pentagon Papers read a firmer denial: President Nixon was unaware of the Watergate operation, said the White House aide; he had no part in cover-up activities and never offered clemency to anyone in the case. Any suggestion to the contrary in any of these areas is untrue, said the voice that substituted for Nixon. Had the President said it himself, the "firm denial" might have had more impact.

Previously scheduled had been a $1,000-plate fund-raising dinner for the 1974 congressional campaign, at which Nixon was to be the speaker. Planners had a difficult time selling tickets but did manage to assemble a fair-sized audience. At the May 9th dinner, the President again alluded to Watergate:

"President Nixon told Republican campaign contributors last night he will get to the bottom of the Watergate scandal and not let it keep him from making 'the next four years better than the last four years,'" said the AP report. "Mr. Nixon said he is keenly aware of concern among Republicans and the public in general about the Watergate developments but pledged he is meeting the issue head-on. 'I can assure you that we will get to the bottom of this deplorable incident,' the President said. . . . He said he won a clear mandate in last year's landslide election and intends to follow it up regardless of the Watergate case. 'We are not going to allow this deplorable incident to deter or detract us from going ahead and achieving the great goals the overwhelming number of Americans elected us to achieve in 1972,' Mr. Nixon said."

And if it were only Watergate, Nixon's promises might suffice to still the angry waves of public resentment. But there is the Nixon record, which contains similar unethical vote-getting ploys. There are the incidents surrounding the Pentagon Papers escapade, when a doctor's office was raided just as the Democratic Party offices had been raided. It is slowly coming to light that the Pentagon Papers disclosures had nothing to do with national security in the conventional sense; but there was fear that their publication might disclose the fact that Vietnam had been a gigantic RAND-DoD laboratory, that it was a testing ground for psychological warfare tactics, that ownership of offshore oil areas and development of the Mekong Delta complex were the real reasons for the unnecessary prolongation of the war; and there was the additional fear that the failure of the politico-economic management system known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System might become known.

Then there was the ITT affair, the Vesco disclosures, the case of the forged cables, and on and on. George McGovern may have been right about one thing: he said that was the most corrupt administration in American history.

Shana Alexander wrote in Newsweek (which is a part of The Washington Post complex, the latter having been awarded the Pulitzer Prize for its work on the Watergate story): "Drunk with power, cockeyed with arrogance, unseasoned by political experience, untempered by much human feeling and unencumbered by any political ideals beyond the ideal of remaining in office, the Nixonmen were susceptible to the contagious, pernicious lunacy of power...the Nixonmen didn't even know the difference between disagreement and disloyalty...they had no moral weight...they seem not to have fully understood the difference between right and wrong... What does one make of a man who writes, as Ehrlichman did in his letter of resignation, 'I have always felt that the appearance of honesty and integrity is every bit as important...as the fact of one's honesty and integrity?'"

We suppose there has been scandal and corruption in every administration since the time of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr. Sin has always abounded and it can't be legislated away. Yet, there is this sobering observation:

An immoral administration can be lived with and tolerated for a time, but an amoral administration is a harbinger of the decline and fall of empires. History proves that this always happens when people put their trust in men.

NOW THEY CALL IT "MUNDIALIZATION"

ECONOMIC INTEGRATION NOW, POLITICAL UNION CAN WAIT

They coined a new word to fit the new plan. For the past thirty years the talk has been of World Government. But in most parts of the world, the dominant theme of our time has come to be a resurgence of nationalism, between and within nations, and this has been especially true of the newly formed mini-nations of Asia and Africa. The major powers of the world take their troubles to the chartered authority of the United Nations only as a last resort; and when they do call on the UN, they do it merely to "save face" and maintain their "image" in the eyes of other nationals.

So, the real powers that be have just about given up on the idea of establishing a world government per se, because economic and financial integration of the world can be brought about long before any actual political union can be achieved:

So, the emphasis is now being placed on the creation of One World economically and financially — the political and militarily policed One World can come later. And this shift in emphasis calls for new words, new definitions, new semantic forms. The term World Government is no longer fitting and proper. Instead of a World Government, we are to have a World Corporation, or a series of Corporations dealing with various products and services. And Corporations don't use the same words as do Governments. Their officers don't govern, they manage; and so on.

A new word was coined: Mundialization. We couldn't find it in any dictionary. But there is an English word bearing the same root: mundane, which Webster defines as meaning "of or pertaining to the world." Hence, Mundialization means "the act of forming a one world establishment." In other words, here is our old enemy "One World," presented without the onus that is associated with "World Government."

Let us reason together: That we are in the midst of a revolution has been declared by almost everyone in authority, including our last three Presidents. We have been told that this revolution involves the creation of a "New Federalism," a new Nixon Doctrine in foreign affairs, Regionalism and Revenue Sharing in domestic governance.

But we have not been told, publicly, that the weapons being used in this new revolution are psychopolitical weapons. For example, we are being brainwashed into the acceptance of new concepts of civil liberty, new attitudes toward government regulation of wages, prices, incomes and life styles, new ideas regarding morality, new attitudes toward sex and unisex, etc.

Now, let us suppose that Watergate and the other scandals involving officials in high places have been deliberately planned and stage-managed and overplayed by the media, especially television, in order to make the people distrustful of their form of government, and to condition them for the acceptance of a new kind of government.

Let us also suppose that the United States dollar was deliberately "dethroned" as an international exchange currency because of its "nationalistic" implications, and so that a new kind of "world currency" can be forced upon all nationals. Suppose, too, that inflation is being permitted, is even being encouraged, to gallop, so that new forms of currency and currency control will be accepted by, and even demanded by, the people.

The fact is: this "revolution" is not a new American revolution, it is a World revolution and its planners and executors intend to, in Madison Avenue semantics, "start a whole new ball game," in which economic and financial world integration will precede the establishment of an actual political World Government.

This is, in fact, the principal theme of an article written by a banker who is President of the North American division of an International banking house. Bank of California has its "wholly-owned subsidiary," the Bank of California International, which has its main office at 2 Wall Street, New York City, and whose officers are available for "consultation on marketing and investment" in the countries of Europe, South and Central America, and in Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Thailand, Singapore and Indonesia.

This Bank of California International has its limited circulation publication called "Spotlight on Mundialization." And in the Spring 1973 edition, William S. Pfeifle, president of the Bank of California, North America, writes on the subject of "Multinational Business and Banks Hasten World Integration." We present excerpts from that article:

Although a dominant theme of our time is the resurgence of nationalism between and within nations, the economic and financial integration of the world continues to proceed at a pace some light years ahead of the political equivalent. This despite national boundaries, often chaotic currencies and exchange controls, and differing economic systems and ideologies with their inherent contradictions. This international integration, particularly apparent to multinational bankers, promises to gain momentum as the Nixon Doctrine moves the world further from confrontation to great-power equilibrium, to an era of pragmatic peace.

For example, we learn that subsidiaries of the world's multinational corporations account for an annual output of over $450 billion, roughly one-seventh of the world's total gross national product of $3 trillion and surpassing the GNP of every nation except the U.S. and the U.S.S.R....

U.S. international banks are of course following their multinational customers abroad, in the process upping the assets of their overseas branches between 1965 and 1972 by eightfold to around $75 billion. Over 50% of these assets are in London, the world's major Eurocurrency center which now counts more American banks than New York....

The main attraction is the world's first truly international money market, the Eurocurrency market for offshore funds, which remains singularly unyielding to control by any one nation and basically aloof from monetary-policy machinations at the domestic level.

... The ease with which international trade and finance break the trans-ideological barrier to many must be amazing. Opening in London this year is the Anglo-Rumanian Bank Ltd., perhaps the first East-West joint banking venture. London is also to be blitzed by new East European bank branches as well as by several from West Germany. The Russian bankers are coming to Tokyo with the signing of a reciprocal banking accord, and U.S. bank representatives are moving to Moscow. While East-West ventures have for some time ceased to be a novelty, Germany's Anker Co. is the first to work out a division of labor between 2 communist and 2 capitalist countries. Cash-register components are produced in Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Hungary. in Yugoslavia we find East Europe's first multinational corporation, Energoinvest, a conglomerate active in the U.S., Canada, Mexico and with plans for other world areas.

The Nixon detente with Moscow has led to negotiation of the most massive trade agreement in history, the $45.6 billion LNG exchange. If approved by Washington, the U.S. will get needed fuel and export sales, while the Russians will benefit by needed economic development and currency for buying capital goods. Last month we saw the first U.S. import of Soviet fuel for consumer use, an ideal backhaul cargo for tankers delivering grain to Russia....

Mundialization of the world's economy is very evident in the United States. Overseas investors participate in more than 15% of all trades on the New York Stock Exchange for a gross volume of $30 billion annually. Assets of agencies and branches of foreign banks operating here increased threefold in the 1965-1972 period... Foreign direct investment in the U.S. in on the upswing... One German computer firm plans investments of some $100 million over the next 7 years, for example.

As the world moves to merge financially, it is difficult to discuss U.S. multinational banks separately from their overseas counterparts... Throughout the world major banks are expanding beyond national borders, mobilizing funds via deposits and borrowings on a global basis to meet the growing demands of multinational customers, linking with foreign banks and consortia, establishing subsidiaries in a variety of markets to offer such diversified services as investment banking, global cash management, financial counseling, multinational-multicurrency credit lines, leasing, discounting, insurance brokerage, travel services and computer software services. Security houses and investment banks are similarly going global....

We may ultimately see a world central bank, its tasks made easier by the better economic equilibrium between nations which economic integration is bringing about... An oft-quoted prediction maintains that the world will be run by 300 titans by 1985, the avant garde of a new international order. This would not be politically acceptable if it became apparent and it is not....

As the debate continues on international monetary and trade reform...on the feasibility of multinational controls...while waiting for the world to catch up politically, multinational businessmen and financiers can be expected to continue rationalizing the world's resources, internationalizing capital and consumer markets, meeting needs as vast as the opportunities, in the process further integrating the global economy. The ensuing interdependence, the vested interest in the welfare of others, will be an effective safeguard for peace in a pragmatic era." (End of excerpts from an article by Banker William S. Pfeifle).

The import of the preceding is quite clear: The multinational executives and the International Bankers are wearied from waiting for the politicians to establish a de facto World Government, so they are proceeding on their own economically and financially, and the politicians can follow as they will and as they must; economic and financial considerations outweigh political and even military decisions from this time onward.

Complementing the words of Bank of California's Pfeifle is an article appearing in the current issue (May 21, 1973) of U.S. News & World Report: "Why 'Multinationals' Are Under Fire At Home, Abroad." The article says that there are "about 3,600 American companies that have at least one foreign subsidiary," and that "about 200 of these have overseas operations large enough to be considered truly 'multinational' and they include some of the heavyweights in American business: General Motors, Mobil, International Business Machines, International Telephone & Telegraph, Western Electric, Rockwell International, U.S. Steel, Boeing and Du Pont—companies whose names are as well known in many foreign countries as in the U.S."

William I. Spencer, president of the First National City Bank of New York City (and the world) is quoted: "The political boundaries of nation-states are too narrow and constricted to define the scope and sweep of modern business." These "new globalists," he adds, consider the entire world as a market, and search everywhere for fresh technology, talented people, novel processes, raw material, ideas and capital.

And they are not going to allow any nation or any government to stand in their way. And Richard Nixon is not about to stand up against them. Instead, he has joined them. In his April 10 trade message, he said:

"American investment abroad...has meant more and better jobs for American workers, has improved our balance of payments, and has generally strengthened our economy.'" Once again, Nixon's credibility gap was showing.

Anyway, the word has been given: the Governments of the world may cooperate, or else. And Government's way of cooperating seems to consist primarily of abandoning the idea of World Government as originally envisioned by the World Parliamentarians, World Federalists, backers of the United Nations, etc.; and adopting, instead, the concept of Regionalism. This plan calls for the division of the whole world into Regions according to geographical, political commercial, industrial and human and natural resources considerations. At present this Regional Plan seems to call for the division of the world into Five Regions, to be administered respectively by the United States, Russia, China, Japan, and the European Common Market.

Additionally, within these Five Super Regions, the Nations themselves are to be divided into Federal Regions. This has already been accomplished in the United States, whose fifty States have been redistributed into Ten Federal Regions, this having been done by Executive Order on the part of President Nixon.

Now we are informed that Soviet Russia is to follow suit! Because of the extreme importance of this development, both from the world as well as the American point of view, we are reprinting an entire article which appeared in The New York Times of May 4, 1973. Remembering that in the USSR the various Republics are similar to our various States (which are really Republics), note how the same Regional Plan which was forced upon us, is now being forced upon the peoples of the Soviet Union:

SOVIET IS REGROUPING ITS 15 REPUBLICS INTO 7 BIG PLANNING REGIONS

(By Theodore Shabad)

Moscow, May 3—The Soviet Union has quietly begun a controversial consolidation of its national planning regions that may ultimately erode the significance of individual Soviet ethnic republics as economic planning and management areas.

A new seven-region system grouping republics into larger planning units has been adopted in connection with the drafting of an ambitious 15-year plan that will outline basic investment and development policies for the Soviet Union until 1990.

The consolidated regional system, which is being introduced in the face of persistent nationalistic sensibilities, is part of a growing trend to ignore particular interests of the republics in an effort to achieve more efficient coordination and long-term planning of the complex Government-run economy.

The detailed local planning of economic development will, at least for the immediate future, continue at the republic level. But the basic, over-all national development policies will in future be based on the new regional planning units.

The regional reform was foreshadowed last December by Leonid I. Brezhnev, the Soviet party leader, in a keynote speech marking the 50th anniversary of the formation of the Soviet Union as a nominal federation of republics.

Now that a relatively common level of development has been reached by the various republics, Mr. Brezhnev said, future economic decision-making in the 15-year plan should be for the good of the country as a whole rather than focus on the interests of individual republics.

Mr. Brezhnev's broad policy statement was amplified by more detailed proposals in economic and technical journals, some of which went so far as to suggest that the boundaries of some of the Soviet Union's 15 republics might be modified if they were not in keeping with efficient economic regions. In an effort to shift the focus from the political sensibilities of the various ethnic areas to one of national efficiency, Soviet information media have also been working hard to generate an over-all "Soviet" nationalism and a national pride in economic achievements to replace the fragmented ethnic loyalties among the country's hundred-odd nationalities.

The new regional planning program is an attempt to depart from existing republic boundaries in allocating capital investment to the development of the Soviet economy. The potentially far-reaching decision to establish the new consolidated national planning regions was disclosed in the April issue of the Government's planning journal.

There are three European regions that figure in the 1975-90 plan; they are a combined north-central region, a southern region, and a combined Volga-Urals region. The four Asian regions are Siberia, the Far East, Kazakhstan and Central Asia.

In allocating four regions to the Asian part of the Soviet Union and only three regions to the developed European portion, the economics planners appeared to focus on the future development of the Asian potential.

The consolidation of planning regions has affected the interests of individual republics, especially in the European West. For example, the Baltic republics and the Byelorussian Republic have been combined with the adjoining Leningrad and Moscow regions of the Russian Republic in the new north-central region. Similarly, the new southern region combines five republics—Moldavia, the Ukraine, Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan—with the northern Caucasus portion of the Russian Republic. The new separate Volga and Urals regions are being combined into a Volga-Urals region to point up common problems of development. The Volga-Urals has been one of the most rapidly growing sections of the Soviet Union in recent decades.

One wonders if the Soviet information media told the hundred-odd nationalities within the U.S.S.R. that this new type of Regionalism would bring about decentralization and home rule? That's the way Regionalism was sold to the people of the United States.

It is true that Regionalism provides for more efficiency and lays the groundwork for the introduction of the political administrative technique known in the United States as PPBS. Computerized control of resources — both natural and human — is required if world economic and financial integration is to be achieved; and the computer is the heart of the system. Ergo The New York Times of May 7, 1973 reports that "The Soviet Union and its East European allies have unveiled their new unified system of computers at a Moscow exhibition, including a machine capable of 500,000 operations per second. The most powerful computer in the series, with a speed of two million operations a second, is still in the design stage. ... The Soviet-bloc system was made compatible with International Business Machine's 360 Series to open the way for the importing of some computers from the West. ... The latest Western effort to interest the Soviet Union in the importation of computers was made by Frank Borman, the former astronaut who recently visited Moscow as a vice president of Eastern Air Lines. ..."

The new phrase should read: "We'll have world integration, whether we want it or not. By depression and collapse if necessary."

CLOSING THE GATE AFTER THE WATER HAS LEAKED

THE POISON IN THE CUP OF "ELECTION REFORM"

The irony of the situation does not become apparent until one recalls a bit of history concerning Richard Nixon and election reforms.

After the 1968 federal elections (even as after the 1964 federal elections) there was much concern over alleged, but never fully investigated, election campaign malpractices. Congress, therefore, passed an election reform measure in 1970, but President Nixon vetoed it. In 1972, with another federal election coming up in November, the Congress passed yet another election reform measure. With Nixon running for re-election in 1972, a veto this time would have been viewed with suspicion and the Democratic candidate—then expected to be Sen. Muskie—would have gained many votes by any such action.

So, in April, 1972, the new election reform act was passed. But, months before that the Republican fund raisers got busy and gathered in millions of dollars in contributions before the new Election Reform Act became effective. Then, because they were seeking more millions in campaign funds, and didn't want to be bound by the new law, they started collecting hard cash from out-of-the-country banks, etc. That's what the indictments of Mitchell, Stans, Vesco, etc. are all about; the Republican fund raisers violated just about every section of that new election reform law. A goodly amount of the money thus raised and unreported was then used to finance the Watergate caper.

All in all, so many laws were violated that nobody has made a complete listing; but, in addition to violations of election laws, Nixon's friends and helpers:

- * Tailed members of candidate's families in search of things that could be used to discredit the opposition candidates;
- * Assembled dossiers on the personal lives of all opposition candidates;
- * Forged letters and distributed them under candidates' letterheads, discrediting Muskie, Humphrey, Jackson, and leaving McGovern as the only "honorable" candidate

- on the Democratic ticket;
- * Leaking false information to the press;
- * Throwing campaign schedules into disarray;
- * Seizing confidential files;
- * Planting provocateurs to disrupt rallies;
- * Investigating and threatening potential donors to the Democratic campaign;
- * Rigging false opinion polls and sending to the President's office thousands of telegrams to create the impression that his war policies were enthusiastically supported by the people;
- * The Attorney General of the United States discussed illegal wiretappings and burglaries but took no action against the persons who made those criminal proposals in his presence;
- * The President's lawyer and the head of his domestic policy staff discussed the proposition of throwing certain incriminating documents into the Potomac River;
- * The acting head of the FBI burned up incriminating documents;
- * A member of the White House staff directed the burglary of the psychiatric files of a defendant in a pending criminal case, and the help of the CIA was obtained for that burglary, in direct violation of yet another law;
- * The President's chief domestic adviser met twice with the federal judge presiding over the Ellsberg trial, offering the judge the directorship of the FBI while the case was being tried;
- * A White House staff member sent one of the Watergate criminals to the State Department to fake diplomatic cables involving President Kennedy in a murder case;
- * The Nixon Administration, in 1971 and 1972, admittedly placed wiretaps on telephones of its own officials and on phones of reporters of three newspapers;
- * The White House repeatedly issued false statements about the Watergate affair.

This handful of incidents only begins to convey the unlawful and illegal efforts of ruthless men to destroy the political opposition, violate the election laws, and do violence to the very nature of the American political and legal system.

And with this background from which to operate, Richard Nixon, after having profited from the violation of every election law on the books, sent to Congress a request for a new set of election laws, and the appointment of a blue ribbon task force to investigate the matter of federal elections and suggest new laws for next year's candidates to break.

This is the irony of the situation of which we made mention in the opening paragraph of this letter.

Representative John Rarick also thought it ironical, because he told his fellow Congressmen:

"The latest affront to the American electorate is the announcement from the White House that the President recommends the creation of a nonpartisan commission on Federal election reform. In fact, he even accompanied his message with a copy of a proposed bill that he would like to have Congress rubberstamp into law.

"In his message to the Congress, the President said: 'Many separate proposals for such reform are now pending before the Congress in light of recent disclosures of widespread abuses during the Presidential campaign of 1972....'

"Overlooked for some reason in the statement is any acknowledgement that the Congress had already enacted in April of 1972, the Federal Election Campaign Act. Nor does the President mention that many of the 'widespread abuses' complained of, came about because the passage of that legislation caused desperate efforts by some to avoid disclosures after the act became effective.

"Now the President, reacting to emotional front page publicity of 'widespread abuses during the Presidential campaign of 1972' and without giving the existing law enacted by Congress a chance to work, seeks to use the taxpayers' money to create another study group which would cause more election interference, redtape, and control over the masses of elected officials not involved in any way in any of these 'widespread abuses.'..."

"This seems to be another instance of the pot calling the kettle black. Or, perhaps a more accurate comparison would be: closing the gate after the water has leaked."

That a man who won reelection by following a campaign trail strewn with broken laws should now want those laws repaired and fortified, seems somewhat ludicrous. But, Nixon's action in this respect becomes more sobering, and more typical of his political life style, when it is realized that there is an ulterior motive behind this seemingly straightforward request for new reform laws: Nixon is attempting to change the manner of election of all federal office-holders, especially the terms of office of U.S. Representatives and U.S. Senators. Here is the message the President sent to Congress:

To the Congress of the United States:

A thorough-going reform of campaign practices in our Federal elections ranks high on our list of national priorities.

Many separate proposals for such reform are now pending before the Congress; in light of recent disclosures of widespread abuses during the Presidential campaign of 1972, many more will doubtless soon be made.

I believe that reform is essential, and urgent; I also believe it is vital that these proposed reforms be carefully considered not singly, but in their relation each to the others, and that this be done in a nonpartisan context.

Therefore, I recommend creation of a Nonpartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, to be established as quickly as possible and to be charged with examining our entire pattern of campaign practices and with recommending a comprehensive set of reforms. A proposed Joint Resolution to accomplish this accompanies this Message.

The Commission I propose would be composed of seventeen members. Eight of these would be chosen by and from the Congress, two Democrats and two Republicans from the Senate and two Democrats and two Republicans from the House of Representatives. It would also include the national chairmen of the two principal political parties, and seven other, public members, to be selected by the President. No more than four of seven public members shall be members of the same political party. To further ensure its complete independence, the chairman and vice-chairman would be selected from among the members of the Commission, by the Commission itself.

The Commission's mandate would be as broad as the Federal election process itself. Nothing would be excluded. It would be authorized to examine the cost and financing of campaigns, including proposals for alternative methods of financing; laws on reporting and disclosures; the elimination from campaigns of violence and the threat of violence, and infringements on the right of privacy; curbing vote frauds; the length of political campaigns; the use and abuse of techniques such as television commercials, polling and computerized direct mail; methods of curbing the entire range of unfair or unsavory campaign practices; and anything else the Commission might consider desirable for a comprehensive reform of Federal elections and campaign practices.

It would be directed to make its final report to the Congress and the President no later than December 1, 1973. It would also be encouraged to make interim recommendations during the course of its work, in order to expedite their consideration by the Congress.

Because it bears an intimate and vital relationship to campaign reform, I recommend that the Commission also consider the question of whether the length of the terms of office of members of the Senate, the House of Representatives or of the President should be changed.

If the Commission is to complete its work promptly, in order to allow the Congress time to consider and possibly to act on its recommendations prior to the 1974 Congressional campaigns, it is, of course, essential that the Commission begin its work soon and pursue it expeditiously. For my part, I shall do all that I can to facilitate this, and I urge the Congress to take swift and favorable action on this proposal.

Richard Nixon.

The White House, May 16, 1973.

Do you see the snare and the delusion contained in this Message to the Congress? It just happens that every one of the reforms mentioned by the President is already provided for explicitly or tacitly in the Reform Act passed in April, 1972, and any further study by a blue ribbon commission would be redundant, time-consuming and a waste of taxpayers' money. What is needed is strict enforcement of existing laws, not passage of more and possibly unenforceable laws.

All of the President's proposed reforms are already provided for except those contained in the next-to-last paragraph of the President's Message to the Congress:

... whether the length of the terms of office of members of the Senate, of the House of Representatives or of the President should be changed.

In his "Text of an Address by the President on the Federal Election Reform to be Taped for Use on Radio," Nixon expanded on this revolutionary proposal:

"There is another matter of crucial importance to our election process, which I am also asking that the Commission consider. That is whether the Constitution should be amended to change the length of the terms of office of members of the House, of the Senate or of the President.

"Many political scientists have suggested, for example, that the President should be elected for a single, non-renewable six-year term, instead of being eligible for two four-year terms. The Commission could well consider the merits of this proposal.

"Another change it might consider is whether members of the House of Representatives should be elected for terms of four years instead of two.

"Personally, I have long favored the four-year term for members of the House, with half of the members elected every two years. Members serving for two-year terms have to spend one of every two years running for reelection, with the result that they serve one year and run one year. This not only places an enormous burden on the member himself; it also can work to the disadvantage of his constituents and of the country. By reducing the extraordinary campaign burden on its members, I believe the House of Representatives could be made a more effective instrument of government."

Here the man who has earned the sobriquet of "Tricky Dick" engages in hyperbole to the point of ridiculousness, when he says that Congressmen "serve one year and run one year." Sometimes the second session of a Congress is adjourned early in order to permit Representatives to go home and face their constituents and try to face down their political opponents; but if the legislative business of the year was not finished, then the Representatives return to Washington after the election campaign, perhaps as lame ducks, to finish the year's legislative business. If the fact of a near election and the fear of losing it causes Congressmen to vote on measures with much fear and trembling, that's as it should be if they are responsible to the voters rather than responsive to political bosses.

What Nixon might have said—and this would have been much nearer the truth—is that it takes time and money to "train" Congressmen to be submissive and obedient to the "powers that be" in Washington. It takes perhaps a year to determine whether a new Congressman is going to go along with the herd or become a maverick, as in the case of, say, John Rarick. To the self-appointed rulers in Washington, it seems a waste to spend one year testing and training a man only to get one year's service out of him. Now, the six year Senate term is ideal in this respect, the four year Presidential term ought to be extended, and the House membership ought to be for at least four years. So reasons the "Invisible Government."

TO ALTER WITHIN THE FORM

But the important issue is this: Under the pretense of appointing a blue ribbon commission to study election reform, the real purpose is to re-write the Constitution of the United States and change the relationships of the three branches of government: legislative, executive, and judicial; and add a fourth branch: Regional Government, or what Rexford Guy Tugwell, the oldtimer New Dealer, called the Regulatory Branch.

"Many political scientists have suggested" Constitutional changes, said Nixon. He did not say that these political scientists were men connected with or sympathetic toward the propaganda efforts of a California Think Tank called the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, which is headed by Robert M. Hutchins, and at which Center Rex Tugwell wrote a suggested new Constitution for the United States.

In our booklet "Damn the Constitution," published in 1970 but now out of print, we exposed the plan to destroy the present United States Constitution, replacing it with a Constitution drawn up by this Rex Tugwell and approved by the Center, which is a tax-exempt organization financed by tax-exempt Foundations.

It seems that the Nixon Revolution intends, not to replace the Constitution as Tugwell proposed, but to rewrite it, so that it will conform to the main proposals of the Tugwell version. For example: a longer term for the President, for Senators (who would become elder statesmen serving as members of an advisory body with little real power) and an extended term for members of the House.

Also: Tugwell's version called for the establishment of a fourth branch of government which would replace the States and set up in their place a number of Regional Republics; this fourth branch to be called the Regulatory Branch (Nixon calls it the Regional Branch), with a National Regulator in charge (Nixon calls it the Office of Management and Budget, and Director Roy Ash is in charge.)

Tugwell's version also called for the establishment of a series of public corporations, which would be under the supervision and control of this National Regulator. Nixon has followed this pattern, but he has not found it necessary to actually alter the Constitution to do so. However, the business of changing the duties, responsibilities and terms of office of elected officials does require Constitutional amendment.

Ergo: Create a blue ribbon Commission to agitate for such amendments under the guise of promoting election reform!

In our booklet "Damn the Constitution," we wrote:

"In Tugwell's Regulatory Branch, we can see how Corporate Fascism (or Nazism) and National Socialism (or Communism) are, in the final analysis, one and the same thing!

"Simply stated: Under the Fascist or Nazi system of government, control of industry, commerce, business, the professions, and the activities of people, is accomplished through public corporations. Under the Socialist or Communist system of government this control is accomplished through commissariats or soviets. . . . Different methods, but each designed for the same purpose: to regulate the activities of the Nation and its citizens."

"The National Regulator," wrote Tugwell in his proposed new Constitution, shall charter all corporations or other enterprises. . . . Enterprises may be restrained by the Regulator when they restrict access to, or increase prices of goods and services. . . . There shall be a Commission responsible to the Regulator (to control prices, wages, services, activities.)"

Revolution Within the Form! Tugwell's Regulator is Nixon's Director of OMB who, by means of Regional Councils, Budget Control and Revenue Sharing, is able to "Regulate" or "Manage" the entire Nation and its citizens. However, impeding absolute totalitarian control is this Constitutional requirement for electing officials by the people for comparatively short terms.

One possible solution: Create a crisis like Watergate to convince people that the election process is corrupt, that something new is needed; then present a Plan which will minimize the importance, power and prestige of elected officials, including Presidents. . . .

Of course, punishment to fit the crime is the real need, not Commissions to write new definitions of crime. And, if the Congress approves this blue ribbon Commission plan, it is simply helping to forge its own chains.

RESTRUCTURING TO ACCOMODATE CORPORATE SOCIALISM

PREFACE:

On May 23, 1973, Congress surrendered to the Office of Management and Budget, some 60 statutory powers and responsibilities previously delegated to the Congress. The official act of surrender came about when the House of Representatives failed to override a Presidential veto.

"The will of Congress," declared Congressman Joseph P. Addabbo of New York, "is being continually subverted by the Office of Management and Budget, whose director is responsible only to the President. It is particularly important on this day, when we are about to vote to override the Presidential veto of the bill to force Senate confirmation of the OMB appointment, that we realize just how far this usurpation of the checks and balances within Government has progressed. We are at the point today where the decision of this nameless, faceless group of people in OMB is more important and carries more weight than does the legally constituted work of Congress.... While it is true that Congress is the servant of the people, it is not true that Congress must be the servant of a group of bureaucratic bookkeepers whose view of national priorities is limited purely by the costs of projects."

Later in the morning, as the House prepared to vote, the Speaker laid before the House the President's veto message. Then Congressman Chet Holifield of California explained that on May 13, 1970, the House had passed Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1970, which plan reorganized the old Bureau of the Budget, renamed it the Office of Management and Budget, and conferred upon it, via the Executive Office of the Presidency, the 60-odd powers that previously had been the responsibility of the Congress. Holifield explained that "This bill which the President has vetoed contains a reversal of our action on the 1970 plan. It recaptured to the Congress all of those powers we gave away. This bill also required that the Director of the Office of Management and Budget be confirmed by the Senate...."

There was some discussion before the vote;

but every Congressman who spoke to override the Presidential veto missed the real gist of the issue!

Several Congressmen affirmed that Congress had surrendered its power of the purse to OMB, that its absolute power over the budget made OMB more powerful than Congress itself, that Congress had now become merely a rubber stamp in the hands of the Executive insofar as money matters were concerned. Which was true enough. But far more important was the fact that the power of Management had been combined with the power of budget-making. That the comptroller had also become the manager, was the point missed absolutely by the Congressmen who spoke either pro or con, perhaps through ignorance or oversight, perhaps deliberately. In any case, Congressmen spoke of OMB's monetary powers, but not once did any one of them mention OMB's new Management powers. It was as though they were discussing the old Budget Bureau instead of the new Office of Management and Budget! (Italics used for emphasis).

And, of course, Congress had not the power of its own convictions, the President's veto was sustained, and Roy Ash has replaced Congress as the General Manager of the Government of the United States (and of the individual States, too, if the whole truth be told.)

And therein lies a story; a story of how our Representative Republic became a Corporate Socialist Republic.

This revolutionary conversion is the result of a long-range Planning, Programming and Budgeting System which was adopted by the Planners more than half a century ago, and whose progress can be traced from 1913 to and through World War I, then from 1932 to and through World War II, and finally from the end of World War II to and through the establishment of what is being called the New Federalism.

in this Letter, due to lack of space, we can deal with but one phase of the takeover, and that one phase all too briefly:—

THE TRIUMPH OF REGIONALISM

Back during the days of the New Deal the Fabian Brain Trusters dreamed of doing away with the (then) 48 States and setting up in their place Federally controlled districts, or regions, similar to the already established Federal Reserve Bank districts. These districts, or regions, would be governed by Administrators appointed by and responsible to the Chief Executive in Washington, D.C. In order to measure the public attitude toward such a plan, there was published in The New York Times of April 21, 1935, a map of the United States depicting "Nine Groups Instead of the 48 States."

An accompanying article presented "A Proposal for Rebuilding the Structure of Government in order to Deal with Issues on a National Scale." All the alleged advantages of such a Federal Plan were spelled out in the article. But it was admitted that this was a long-range objective and that it would be many years before such an aim could be achieved (and the article was right; it was not until Richard Nixon became President that the Regional Plan was actually put into operation, by Executive Order.)

Meanwhile, to prepare the way for such a grandiose scheme of centralized Federal control of the Nation and its people, an organization was needed which could influence, advise, educate and collectivize the thousands upon thousands of elected and appointed State, County, City and Community governing officials. For such an operation a central, national headquarters was selected on land provided by the Rockefeller family and administered by the University of Chicago. This headquarters came to be known as "1313" because of its address; 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago, Illinois.

At 1313 the national headquarters of some twenty-five national organizations have been established. They are, in the order of their age:

American Public Works Association
Municipal Finance Officers Association
Public Personnel Association
National Association of Attorneys General
National Governor's Conference
International City Managers' Association
American Municipal Association
American Public Welfare Association
American Committee for International Municipal Cooperation
Council of State Governments
National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials
Public Administration Service
National Association of Assessing Officers

American Society of Planning Officials
Federation of Tax Administrators
American Society for Public Administration
National Association of State Budget
Officers
National Association of State Purchasing Officials
National Association of Municipal Clerks
National Legislative Conference
Conference of Chief Justices
Interstate Clearing House on Mental Health
National Association of Counties
National League of Cities
U.S. Conference of Mayors

The manner in which 1313 works is perhaps best described by means of a "real life illustration." On May 11, 1973, Anne Garni of Santa Cruz, California appeared before a meeting of the Council on Intergovernmental Relations to protest against the "Governor's Local Government Reform Program." Here is a part of what she said at the meeting, which was held at San Jose, Calif.:

"In Santa Cruz, we have a so-called 'Model City Charter,' drafted by the National Municipal League (an affiliate of 1313-Ed.), which provides for an all-powerful, appointed administrator, the City Manager, who owes his allegiance to his organization, the International City Managers' Association (1313), and not to the taxpayers who support him. The voters cannot recall this man, and it would take five of the seven members of the Council to fire him. Our Charter does not even require that this man be a citizen. It states only that he become a bona fide resident of the city after his appointment.

"The members of the City Council—the elected representatives of the people—are forbidden, under penalty of law, from interfering with the City Manager or any of his department heads. A violation would be punishable by up to six months in jail, a $500 fine, and the loss of the Council seat. In practice, the elected officials are little more than window dressing, retained merely to keep up the pretense of still having a responsive, representative government.

"The City Manager is an advocate of Regional Government and has stated that it is 'a wave of the future; that political boundaries are arbitrary lines.' City Managers are trained to guide elected officials toward appointive, regional government which merges local, state and the federal government under the authority of the executive branch of the federal government. . . .

"When elected to the City Council, the new official automatically becomes a member of the League of California Cities (a division of 1313's National League of Cities—Ed.) The tentacles of the public administration system (1313) begin to fasten their grip on the new member, pulling him away from his constituents and into the bowels of the bureaucratic machinery that has superimposed itself over our republican form of government....

"The following are excerpts from one of the League (of California Cities) resolutions, passed at the annual conference held in San Diego in 1970: 'Whereas, the proliferation of problems which cut across the traditional boundaries of local government entities has necessitated the creation of regional governmental agencies which overlap cities and counties, the Councils of Governments should be required by statute. The regional organizations shall be granted such regulatory and taxing powers as necessary to carry out the regional functions.'

"This resolution not only eliminates the established boundaries of cities and counties, but it also disfranchises the voters and removes all control of expenditures and authority from elected officials within the regions.

"Governor Reagan's Reorganization Plan of 1969 (model supplied by 1313's Council of State Governments—Ed.) authorized the Council on Intergovernmental Relations to divide our State into planning districts, which is the first step in developing Sub-State Regionalism. On February 11, 1970, the CIR adopted the nine regional division.

"... It should be obvious to anyone who will look at the records, that Ronald Reagan has not served the people of this State as their elected leader... If Reagan has not served the people, it must be deduced that he is serving the invisible government of public administration. So, let's look at his record as a participant in this government:

"After serving within the ranks of the Governor's Conference (1313), he was chosen to fill the vacancy created when Governor Nelson Rockefeller resigned from the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) in 1970...."

(End of extended quotation)

And that brings us to the next step in the long-range plan:

Originally 1313 was a group of organizations without legal or official status. 1313 and its affiliates and satellites could advise, lobby, propagandize, offer various services to the State, County and local governments, and act as a kind of labor union and employment agency to appointive positions such as City and County Managers. But 1313 had no legal standing with the Federal Government. To remedy this lack and thereby make all of the 1313 organizations quasi-official agencies, there was created the aforementioned Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR).

ACIR is composed of 26 members, 20 of whom are appointed by the President of the United States, and who usually are chosen from the ranks of 1313 members; three are appointed by the President of the Senate, and the remaining three by the Speaker of the House. ACIR has been called "the heart of the New Federalism," and was established for the obvious purpose of planning and implementing programs that would lead to the centralization of all controls within the Executive Branch of the Federal Government.

From a digest of information taken from ACIR reports, we learn that:

- * ACIR's work covers three major areas: 1) Taxation and Finance; 2) Governmental Structure and Functions; 3) Program Implementation.
- * ACIR's recommendations for State action are translated into draft bills and proposed Constitutional amendments. These proposals are brought to the attention of key legislative and executive officials of all the States, as well as other interstate groups and individuals.
- * ACIR devotes a major proportion of its time and resources to encouraging implementation of the recommendations it makes to the legislative and executive branches of Federal, State and local governments.
- * Legislation to implement ACIR's recommendations to Congress is usually introduced by U.S. Senators and Representatives who are members of ACIR.
- * During the year, the ACIR staff maintains liaison with various national groups (1313 organizations) representing State and local governments, and with the Administration's Office of Intergovernmental Relations.
- * The creative partnership between Federal, State, and local governments in responding effectively to old and new social, economic and developmental needs in urban and rural America can only flounder unless antiquated State Constitutional provisions are revised.

The 12th Annual Report of ACIR states that: "Substate regional bodies are proliferating. Federal programs encourage their formation to meet specific Federal objectives such as metropolitan planning (HUD), resource conservation and development (USDA), community action (OEO), cooperative area manpower planning (Labor), comprehensive health planning (HEW), and law enforcement (Justice)."

And this same ACIR report named the next steps that were taken toward completing the long-range plan:

"The President in Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1970, established a Domestic Council to coordinate domestic policy formation; and an Office of Management and Budget to strengthen his managerial control. The plan was heralded as giving the President the machinery to oversee the evolution of federalism."

"Federalism," or the "New Federalism" is the name given to the Regional Governance Plan which was established by Executive Order.

Finally, as a sort of climax to his first four years in office, President Nixon signed the Revenue Sharing Act on October 20, 1972. In signing it, Nixon said: "We expect great things from this program—and we are going to be watching for them. I am asking the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations to monitor and evaluate the results of revenue sharing. The enactment of General Revenue Sharing represents only the first part of our comprehensive design to reform the institutions of government. . . .

"In my State of the Union address nearly two years ago," the President continued, "I outlined a program which I described as a 'New American Revolution—a peaceful revolution in which power (is) turned back to the people—a revolution as profound, as far-reaching, as exciting as that first revolution almost 200 years ago.' The signing today of the State and local Assistance Act of 1972—the legislation known as General Revenue Sharing—means that this New American Revolution is truly underway."

Nixon's "New American Revolution" is as an echo to words spoken before the United Nations on December 17, 1963, by Lyndon Baines Johnson: "I worked with him (Franklin Delano Roosevelt) to bring about a profound but peaceful revolution."

As a correspondent observed: "The dictionary defines 'revolution' as a sudden change in the government of a country; the overthrow of one form of government and the setting up of another.' President Nixon and his army of revolutionaries are overthrowing our Constitutional Republic and are replacing it with a Socialist Dictatorship. Is that 'returning power back to the people,' or is it forcing power on the people?"

"The New American Revolution is peaceful only because the people cannot see the invisible, de facto government that has been gradually taking over powers granted to the Congress and the States by our Constitution. Just as local government appears to maintain its representative image, so too have the three branches of the federal government and the State governments maintained their visible structure."

An invisible revolution within the visible form, is a fitting definition of Nixon's New Revolution. And the most invisible and most difficult-to-discern part of this Revolution is the system of political administrative techniques, called simply the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System that undergirds this Regional Governance Plan, and gives it its absolute power. As Dr. Joseph P. Bean has said: "The PPBS system of governance gives us a new type of government, a government by appointed rather than elected officials. The men we send to Congress can no longer help us—they will be powerless. The elected officials at all levels will lose their power. At the top will be the new executive staffmen: Kissinger, Shultz, Ash....Under these super-bureaucrats will come the appointed men of the ten Regional Offices, and under them will come the appointed men of the sub-regional offices. We will be governed by regulation, not by law. It is important to understand the difference between regulation and (civil) law. Laws are those duly enacted statutes by elected officials at the local, State and Federal levels of government. Regulations are the internal rules of agencies, bureaus and departments which are imposed upon us. They do not have binding power upon us as far as the Constitution is concerned. But in practice, they are as binding upon us as law. It is said that we already are a people governed by regulation rather than law. This places us at the whim and caprice of persons who are appointed rather than elected. We have no way of getting at them. We can not remove them from office (even Congress failed in its attempt to remove Roy Ash). They rule without our consent...It was a quiet revolution, not a coup d' etat in the usual manner."

And thus was our government restructured within the form, to accomodate Corporate Socialism.

THE DRAMA OF THE DISAPPEARING DOLLAR: DROWNING IN A SEA OF MANIPULATED DEBT

IT WAS PLANNED SO WELL AND SO VERY LONG AGO

Months after the President had devalued the dollar for the second time, the House of Representatives was voting to devalue the dollar for the first and second time. The ex post facto nature of the procedure was noted by most of the Congressmen, and their utter helplessness was put into words by Mr. James A. Burke, Massachusetts Democrat:

"This has to be one of the most impotent gestures or idle exercises this Congress is called upon to engage in—voting on devaluation. What are the options open to a Congressman on a vote like this? Pathetically, either to vote to approve a devaluation effected months ago... or to vote to reject the devaluation effected months ago and set off another major monetary crisis and consternation and near-panic in the money capitals of the world. Neither alternative can have much appeal to any member of Congress who feels he has been sent down here to Washington by his people to participate in the decisions of Government, to have a say and to influence the course of events.

"... this Congress has been called upon to ratify, after the facts, a deal negotiated by this administration, overseas, with foreign central bankers.... Prior to the summer of 1971, for a Government of the United States even to contemplate devaluation of the mighty U.S. dollar was unthinkable, tantamount to political suicide. But having gotten away with it once, having tried it and liked it, this administration, in what can only be considered a bold and brazen move, is back again for a second devaluation.

"And this is not the end of it. Something far more insidious is going on. Apparently three times was considered too brazen even by this administration. We have had, in effect, a third devaluation going on right before our eyes; only instead of being a formal devaluation requiring Congressional approval and all the publicity this involves, the administration has entered into agreements with foreign governments whereby those governments have floated their currencies, and under these arrangements our currency has gone down (more). In effect, we have had, and are still having, a third devaluation, through the back door so to speak. And I suspect this is very much what we can expect for the future. Not too long ago when (Treasury) Secretary Shultz was testifying before the Ways and Means Committee on which I serve... I asked Secretary Shultz, if devaluation is as good as you say it is, I suppose we will have more and more. His reply should be listened to by everyone: 'That might be too much of a good thing, Congressman.'..."

It all seems to fit into a pattern, a plan that was laid out decades ago and is now nearing fulfillment. And the fulfillment may mean real tribulation for the people of the United States. For nearly two years now, some bankers, economists and monetary experts have been hearing rumors about a new issue of red-colored bank notes being stockpiled in banks throughout the United States, in preparation for a "crisis" at which time all the Federal Reserve greenbacks would be called in. People would be forced to trade their paper money for this new issue of redbacks, at a ratio to be set by the Federal Reserve Corporation at that time.

This would be revaluation with a vengeance, and would solve the inflation problem for a time—but for a short time only since the new currency would be fiat money in the strictest sense of that term.

Whether this is just rumor, we do not know. But we do know that this is a common procedure in countries where the national currency is backed by neither gold nor silver. We were in Japan at the beginning of the United States occupation of that country in 1945 when all Japanese currency was called in and replaced with a new, devalued, currency. We can tell you that surrendering their yen hurt them far more than surrendering their sovereignty to the 'United Nations.'

Nor do we know whether any such issue of redbacks to replace our greenbacks would be a signal for the actual installation of a world currency. But this we have learned: With the Conspirators there are long-range plans are there are current programs, and it is important to be able to distinguish between the two.

Where their current programs are involved, there are certain selected writers and speakers whose columns and commentaries are used to keep the followers informed of what is about to happen, what attitude is to be assumed, and what actions are to be taken in regard to the happening. One such weather-cock is C.L. Sulzberger of the New York Times News Service. On June 6th Sulzberger was in Paris, testing the monetary trade winds. And his column which was published in many American newspapers on June 7th is important when it is read as a "monetary weather forecast." He writes, and we quote:

Paris—On June 5, 1933, President Franklin Roosevelt signed a bill abrogating the gold standard and 40 years later the effects are still being felt. Following World War II, a new accord sought to avoid the opposing dangers of extreme monetary nationalism and excessive international integration of the gold standard system. This arrangement, designed at Bretton Woods and formalized in the International Monetary Fund, agreed that gold would remain the primary international asset for settling debts but that the dollar, then backed by 57 per cent of the free world's gold, would be the key currency.

However, trade rose far more speedily than the gold supply. So a kind of "paper gold" called Special Drawing Rights was invented. But the problems of money and financing commercial exchanges have never been solved since the days when currencies could be converted at fixed rates into gold.

Lenin, who sneered at the precious metal, said: "When we conquer on a world scale, I think we shall use gold for the purpose of building public lavatories in the streets." Nevertheless, he added, Soviet gold would be sold at the highest possible price. He added: "When living among wolves, howl like wolves."

Meanwhile an extraordinary hodgepodge of international money developed: the artificial rouble bloc, the dollar, sterling, franc, yen, mark and other normal currencies; SDRs, Eurodollars and new credit devices such as travelers checks and credit cards, and finally the wampum used to adjust barter in backward countries.

France, for many years, urged that the priority status of gold be restored and that its price be doubled. The United States opposed this. One consequence was that when the machinery started to fall apart and Washington raised the monetary gold price to $42 an ounce, the free market value zoomed to triple that figure.

The Smithsonian agreements of December, 1971, established new parities and the dollar was devalued. But by then there had been a vast shift in wealth. Forty-five per cent of world gold reserves are now held by European central banks and 6.5 per cent by individual Europeans. European and Japanese central and private banks had acquired perhaps $150 billion in assets.

These developments have created a horrendous confusion. The free world is in the middle of its biggest economic boom since the Korean War. There is abundant monetary liquidity. Trade is gaining at a record rate of increase. Yet there is also bad inflation everywhere. And no one can reckon what money is really worth.

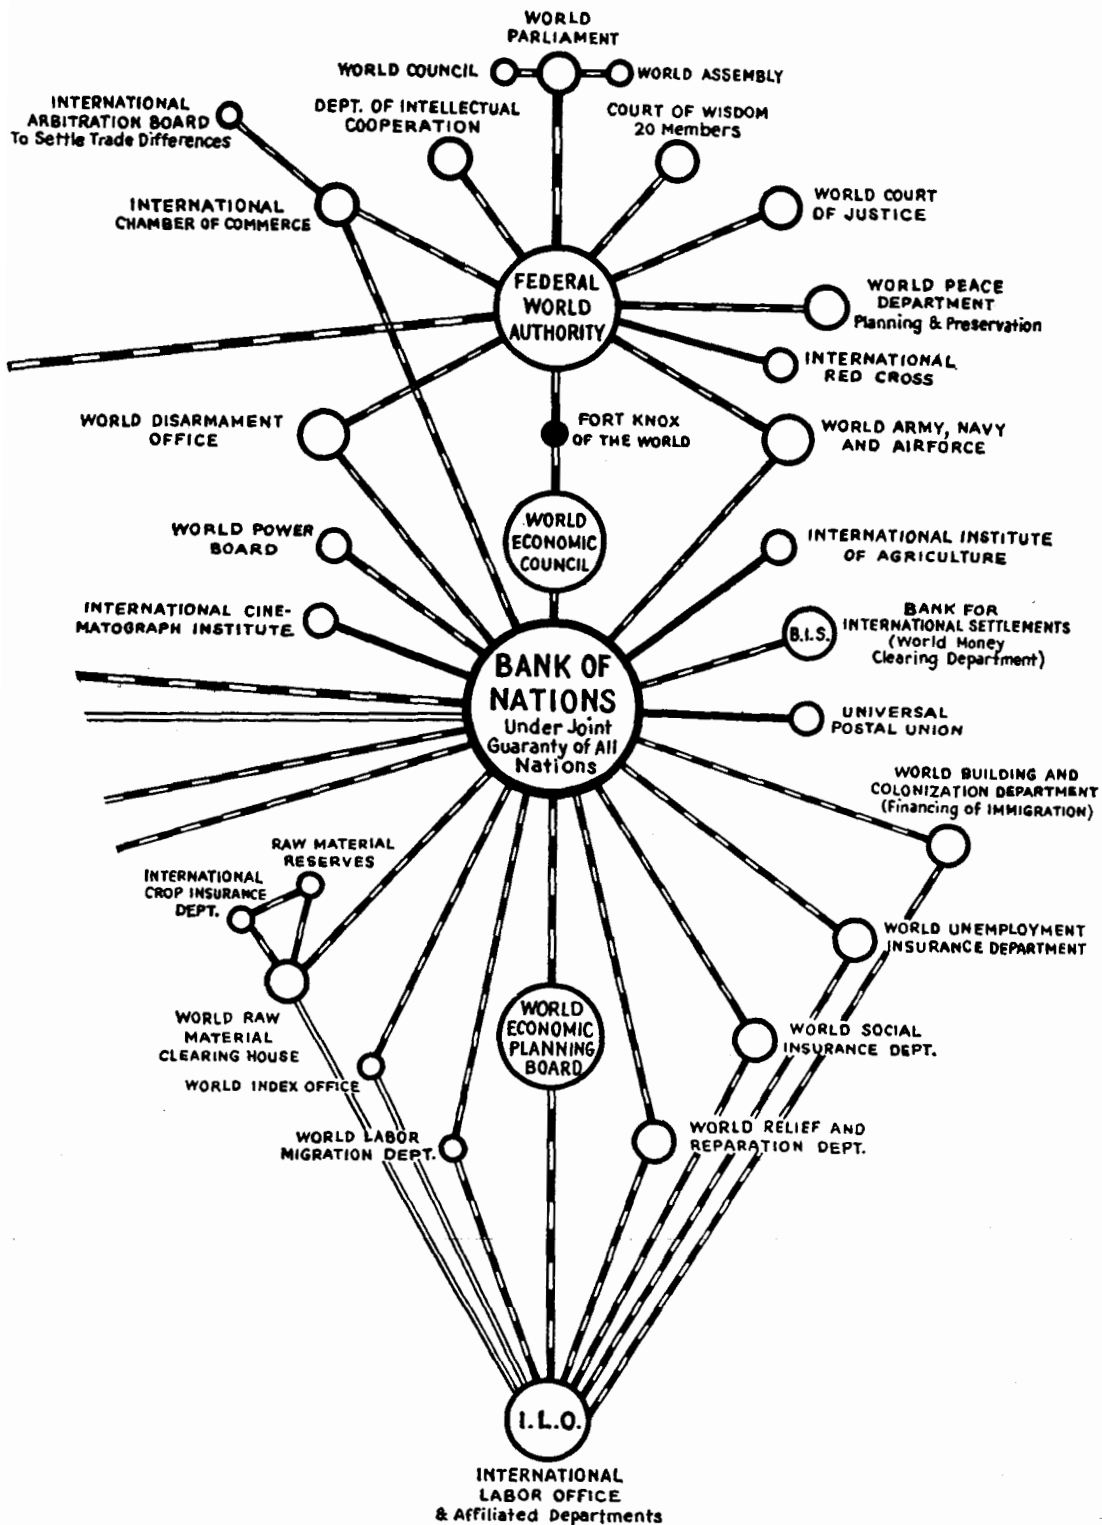

There is no confidence in the dollar. Not even Washington promises to defend it. The U.S. government implies it wants commercial concessions to insure against another devaluation. And national banks around the world are not prepared to part with their gold holdings at the present official price. They would like to dump their dollars instead, and have enough to swamp the market.

The entire cockeyed system stimulates increasing rivalry and dissension among the Americans, Europeans and Japanese. Something dramatic will have to be done to compose the present mess compounded of boom, inflation and a senseless hash of monies.

(End of column)

The key phrase is the final phrase: "A senseless hash of monies." This could be interpreted to mean that the boom and the unchecked (even aided and abetted) inflation are being used to create a "crisis" which is to be "resolved" through the issuance of a "new money," perhaps even a new world currency. This would involve the use of the old Marxist trick of manipulated dialectic: the thesis (gold-based currency), as opposed by the antithesis (a hash of currencies), to be resolved into the synthesis (an entirely new currency).

This would be a current program, as distinguished from but leading toward, fulfillment of the long-range objective, which is the establishment of a Global Corporate Socialist System, with a World Authority and a World Bank to bring about and maintain a World Economic Amalgamation (a political amalgamation being of secondary importance).

This Chart is excerpted from the book "Plan for a Permanent Peace," by Hans Heymann, published by Harper & Brothers in 1941. It depicts the Central Organizational units of a World Authority which is designed to attain worldwide economic integration under a system of Global Corporate Socialism. Stressing economic rather than political authority and control, this may be the Federal World Authority designed to replace the faltering United Nations.

Let's consider this long-range objective:

Remember how Marx fled from Germany to England to establish Communism as a system of economic totalitarianism? And how Paul Warburg came from Germany to the United States to set up our central banking system (the Federal Reserve Corporation)? And how Henry Kissinger came from Germany to the United States to amalgamate capitalism and socialism?

There was yet another who fled from Germany to the United States for a special purpose, which purpose was so very important that he was given little or no publicity, and whose name is even unknown save to the key conspirators and their initiates who are concerned with monetary and financial matters. This man's name was Hans Heymann, a professor of economics who took refuge at Rutgers University, and who wrote a book (Plan for Permanent Peace, Harper & Brothers, 1941).

There was another "German Jew," one of the "300 who secretly rule the world," as he inferred in his book In Days to Come, published in 1921. Rathenau was an industrial magnate who was in charge of the supply of German war materials during World War I. He was foreign minister in the Weimar Republic, and during that time, in collaboration with Hans Heymann, he concocted a plan for a World Authority and a World Bank which, according to Rathenau and Heymann, would assure permanent peace. Rathenau showed the plan to others of the "300" at various summit meetings, and he was to present the plan to the Sound Currency Association in London. But two days before that meeting, Rathenau was assassinated by "a group of misled, irresponsible young men."

"After Rathenau's death," wrote Heymann, I decided to continue this work. I called on Gustav Cassel at Stockholm University and on Vissering, the President of the Netherlands Central Bank, and in '23 visited England and the United States. In conference with Paul M. Warburg and Governor Benjamin Strong of the Federal Reserve Board... MacKenna, President of Barclay's Bank in London... the Banker Jacob Goldschmidt, President of one of the German "Big Five", and others (it was decided) the plan was premature... and it was the privilege of Mr. J.P. Morgan to initiate the first international bank four years later (in 1930)."

What actually seems to have been decided was that Heymann's plan was too bold a venture for the 1930s, and that this should be classified as a long-range objective, not as a current program. So Heymann was given a chair at Rutgers, where he perfected his—and Rathenau's—plan and put it all in a book of limited circulation (we have been supplied with a copy by a friend who shall be nameless for unnamed reasons).

On page 3 of this letter we have reproduced a portion of a chart drawn by Heymann. It depicts the central core of a Federal World Authority and its accompanying World Bank. Surrounding this Core is a planetary system consisting of three Regional Banks (the Europa Bank, the Inter-American or Hemisphere Bank, and the Oriental Bank), and supplementing these are the Regional Authorities, with the various nations divided into Federal Regions and sub-regions, and with all authority emanating from the Federal World Authority, the World Economic Council and the Bank of Nations. Note the many specialized World Departments, Boards, and Institutes shown on the chart which is reproduced overleaf, and you'll get the general plan of this World Authority as outlined by two "German Jews" back in 1922. Note, too, how the overall plan seems to fit into the present setup of the Specialized Agencies of the United Nations, the Regional Authorities such as NATO and the Warsaw Pact Nations, and the Regional Government Program being worked out presently by Henry Kissinger on behalf of CFR and the Anglo-Saxon Round Table Groups.

Is this The Master Plan, and is this the time for its installation? There are these facts: 1) the current accent is on economics rather than politics; 2) multinational corporations have become governments within themselves and are more powerful than most national governments, so that; 3) national governments have begun catering to and modeling themselves after these corporations. And, Heymann's Plan is a functional economic mechanism to integrate the world's economy and give it a new monetary system. Therefore, this could be the Master Plan, and this may be the time chosen for its inauguration. We'll have more to say on this subject in some of our future letters.

THE BEAR THAT FLIES LIKE A DOVE

COEXISTENCE WITH HONOR?

Senator Henry Jackson was a member of the minority in Congress; unlike most of his colleagues in the Federal Legislature, he was against the visit of Leonid Brezhnev to the White House and Disneyland at this time. "Mr. Brezhnev will be coming here right in the fury of the Watergate hearings," said the Senator from Washington State, "and surely he's not so high principled that he's going to forego the temptation to take advantage of that situation."

We might remind the Senator that this works two ways. President Nixon also needs to take advantage of the situation. He needs, very desperately, to divert the attention of a nation of circus-watchers from the center ring where the Watergate act is being performed. A whole menagerie of trained animals, each acting on cue, as ringmaster Sam Ervin holds the chair and snaps the whip, bemuses television viewers; but the act is becoming a kind of melodrama in which the arch villain has not yet been revealed. And there is suspense and speculation because more and more watchers wonder what part Richard Nixon really is playing. There is need to divert attention to the other two rings. So —

Over the right ring there are the aerial acts; high prices that have been soaring higher and higher through the air with the greatest of ease and in defiance both of the law of gravity (supply and demand), and of the artificial restraints of "Phase Three." And the acrobats in that inflationary spiral, whirling upward and upward until they were about to crash through the roof of the Big Top, to come hurtling downward and thereby cause a catastrophic depression.

So, after prices had reached the highest point possible without bringing about pandemonium and mass hysteria on the part of the spectators (consumers), Nixon stepped up to the microphone and froze prices. But, to keep on the good side of the money managers and the conglomerated industrialists, he did not freeze interest, dividends and profits. Nor did he freeze wages—and this was so obviously a political ploy that even his script-writers couldn't find a reasonable excuse for freezing one side of the inflationary spiral without freezing the other side as well.

But, back to our maligned metaphor: In this right ring of the circus, where the aerialists have been frozen in their act, the President built greater suspense by announcing that this is an interim freeze, a 60-day emergency measure to be followed by a new and as yet unwritten, Phase Four Economic Control Program.

And now, over in the left ring (if you happen to be sitting on the right side of the circus Big Top) we are to have what some observers might justifiably call a sick clown act, a summit meeting featuring Richard Nixon and Leonid Brezhnev in the starring roles. It is in an act such as this that Nixon feels he is at his best; and his performance, he hopes, will draw the attention of the circus-watchers from the Watergate animal act and the economic high-wire and trapeze acts.

Senator Jackson and the few for whom he spoke, feared that this visit of Leonid Brezhnev was a dangerous thing. This is to be far more than a mere courtesy call, and some very serious horse-trading is on the agenda. "This is a very risky time for him (Nixon) to be bargaining with the head of an extremely powerful country in terms of trying to work out disagreements that run very deep," said the Senator from Washington State."

Howard Flieger, who succeeded to the editorship of U.S. News & World Report upon the death of David Lawrence, led the media minority in viewing with alarm this visit of the Secretary General of the world's oldest and best disciplined Communist Party. Flieger wrote, in part:

"There is a very real danger that the tide of euphoria which could be set in motion by a Nixon-Brezhnev meeting could lead to serious miscalculations costly to America. . . . What they (the Russians) stand to gain from friendly co-operation with the U.S. far exceeds anything that they could possibly gain through strident or clandestine adventures in the Middle East or in Southeast Asia—adventures that would jeopardize their relationship with Washington. But that does not mean Russia's Communist leadership has abandoned its long-term objective—to establish the Soviet Union as the unparalleled world power. In fact, the Brezhnev strategy is designed to use Moscow's relationship with America as a double-edged sword toward that end... The Soviet leader sees in the aura of good feeling the best opportunity so far of solving Russia's domestic problems and perhaps eventually achieving an economic stature equal to that of America—just as the Soviets have reached a balance of nuclear power with the United States....”

An unusually objective background report on the Nixon-Brezhnev summit meeting was written by William L. Ryan of Associated Press. We reprint parts thereof:

Between them, the Americans and Russians have whipped up an enticing batch of icing for their detente cake. But painfully visible and rock-hard lumps remain beneath, created by generations of cold war.

The Soviet-American summit... represents an attempt by the two leaders to keep their countries off a collision course. At the same time, each hopes to reap benefits for his own side. But neither is likely even for a moment to entertain the notion that genuine peace is either at hand or around the corner. Not peace, but peaceful coexistence has broken out.

Some remarkable and even revolutionary things have been going on in advance of the visit of Leonid Brezhnev, the Soviet Communist general secretary, to President Nixon beginning Monday. American capitalists have been roaming the Soviet Union, talking about and even sealing big deals. Westerners who, not many years ago, might have viewed any high Communist as a personification of menace now profess to find Russia's boss Communist a man of engaging charm and business wisdom.

On the other hand, Russians read things in their papers that are practically unbelievable. The same Soviet journalists who devoted themselves industriously to lambasting everything American have accustomed themselves to casually dropping names like Rockefeller, Ford, American Can, Pepsi-Cola, and so forth. All are mentioned in tones of respect. Soviet readers are told that some Americans are showing “common sense and realism,” and the clear implication is that there can, after all, be such a thing as a good capitalist. Instead of giving readers the impression that absolutely nothing is right about American society, the press has taken to telling them some things are even good, like the organization of the American consumer economy.

The Soviet press scarcely mentioned the Nixon Administration's Watergate woes, and what little it did say was phrased with delicate care.

Yet Brezhnev and other Communist leaders repeatedly warn that peace must not be allowed to go too far, to interfere with the ideological war or to permit wide open East-West contacts that might have contaminating effects.

“The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has always held and still holds that the class struggle between two systems, Communist and capitalist, in the economic, political and of course ideological domains will continue,” said Brezhnev in a recent speech.

All he promised to do was to “strive to shift this historically inevitable struggle to a path free from the perils of war.”

The Russian military, however, seems to have less faith than the civilian politicians in the blessings of peaceful coexistence. The military press harps on a need for “constant vigilance and readiness to deal a rebuff to any intrigues of the aggressive, reactionary circles of imperialism.” That means the United States.

But the civilian press assures critics that “positive changes” in the world climate were forced on the capitalists because of the might and authority of the U.S.S.R. It tells them the policy now combines “flexibility and firmness” and creates “more favorable conditions externally for the building of communism in our country.” This means that in an atmosphere of relaxed tension, internal problems can get more top-level attention.

The Russians and Americans indeed have taken long strides in some areas. Particularly trade and commerce, each for its own compelling reasons. Also, there is likely to be a look of progress at the Washington summit on how to bring the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) into a new and complex phase dealing with offensive weapons. (End of article).

Before his departure for the United States, Communist Party General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev did a most unusual thing: he held a press conference in the Kremlin, a conference for foreign correspondents, and especially for American foreign correspondents. He desired to make two points:

- 1) It would be inconvenient for him to intervene in any way in the Watergate affair. "The thought never entered my head," he said, "as to whether President Nixon had lost any influence, or gained any, as a result of Watergate." And;
- 2) The Soviet leader denied that there was any "so-called Jewish problem in this country. I have a very warm-hearted feeling toward Jews in the Soviet Union."

Behind all these press statements and commentaries coming from Moscow and Washington, there is this impression, often hinted but never openly admitted: Leonid Brezhnev heads a group that intends to complete the industrialization of a Socialist Empire, while Richard Nixon heads (at least for the nonce) a group that intends to complete the socialization of an industrial empire.

One who seems to understand this better than most, because he has studied the conspiracy longer than most, is the once outspoken but now retired Father Coughlin. We have not seen a copy of his "farewell sermon." All we know about it is what the newspapers printed. But at least one "key statement" seems to remain in context in the newspaper account. So, we reprint what the paper printed on June 12, 1973:

More than 1,200 people crowded into St. Mary's Catholic Church in Detroit for what the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin says was his last public appearance.

Father Coughlin, the controversial 'radio priest' of the 1930s told the jammed church, "I'm too old. I haven't too long to go and I know it." During his 35-minute sermon, the 82-year-old priest called for a battle against the new devil, which he said was "the international industrialization with its whole materialistic concept of life."

Father Coughlin said "Save the rich class from paying taxation is its philosophy. It has its own philosophy of lust instead of purity, sex instead of soul."

People are still worrying about "a communism that has shot its bolt and that is surrendering to the money of the industrialists, of the oil barons," he added.

"Communism is passe and you don't know it. (But) it's not passe in its philosophy. It's still the same materialistic concept.

He said the United States must revive its devotion to God and fight continuously against "the new anti-Christ."

Father Coughlin drew an audience of millions before World War II with his aggressive radio broadcasts attacking the "New Deal" and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, communism, "international bankers," and Jews. He retired in 1966 as Pastor Emeritus of the Shrine of the Little Flower in nearby Royal Oak.

Communism is passe, though its philosophy endures; this is the key sentence. And, the venerable patriot might have added that capitalism is also passe, the capitalism that we traditionally associated with free and private enterprise. A "Peoples Capitalism" has replaced it, one with the same materialistic philosophy usually associated with Communism. Marx, were he living today, would have explained it in terms of his dialectical materialism:

Thesis: Capitalism

Antithesis: Communism

Synthesis: Corporate Socialism

There is not yet, of course, the open, public marriage of Western Capitalism and Eastern Communism, which is to produce the New World Order. Nixon and Brezhnev go to their summit to arrange the betrothal, but they go with reservations; for there still must be maintained a certain air of competition, to keep the people bemused and subservient. There must be the very formal working out of arms limitation agreements, leading eventually to total disarmament after a "World Authority" has been armed. As Brezhnev warned his charges, military wars may end but it is not yet time to end the "ideological war," and there are certain things about the American governmental and social system that would prove quite "contaminating" to the Communists. Constant vigilance is essential, say the Soviet leaders.

As for American reservations in regard to the Communist system, there is one official manifestation of our animosity and belligerence toward Communism, which should be regarded as an official memorial to our national hypocrisy. We call it "Captive Nations Week."

Each third week of July has been set aside by Congress and approved by the President, as a time to remind us in the United States of the nations still held in the bondage of communist imperialism. Congress passed the first Captive Nations Resolution in 1959 and President Eisenhower signed it into law. Khrushchev was quite disturbed at the time because the subjugated peoples held captive by their Communist jailors were the Achilles heel of Soviet power and he feared an American policy directed toward their liberation.

But, from the very beginning, it was an empty promise to the captive peoples. We—our Government, that is—promised to help free them, but actually turned its back on them and refused to help them whenever they tried to help themselves, as with the Hungarian freedom fighters. Later on, we—our Government, that is—helped sell out the Nationalist Chinese and put in their place in the United Nations, with veto power in its Security Council, the slavemasters of the Communist Peoples Republic of China. Our Captive Nations Week Resolution became a broken promise to the hundreds of millions of people of the captive nations. Instead of helping to free them we—our Government, that is—gave their Communist masters the equipment and the materials with which to forge their chains. That we may realize the full extent of this official deceit here are the names of the people or nation and the year of Communist domination of each of them:

(List compiled by Lev. E. Dobriansky of Georgetown University, chairman of the National Captive Nations Committee and president of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America.)

Henry Kissinger was asked about our official duplicity in regard to the captive nations, and this was his ambiguous response:

“We, of course, support the right of nations everywhere, including Eastern Europe, to determine their own fate. But obviously, circumstances have changed since the period when these resolutions were first introduced and when there was an expectation that there could be violent upheavals or peaceful changes of government rapidly into a different form of government. I think a realistic expectation now has to be that while these governments may move in a more democratic direction over a period of time, the sort of transformation that was foreseen in the 50s, the violent transformations, have failed disastrously in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. That sort of transformation is less likely under current conditions, not because of the policy of this Administration, but because of the way the international situation has generally evolved since the end of the war.” (Henry Kissinger on a TV briefing, June 27, 1972).

In other words, Resolutions, like Treaties, are just pieces of paper, made to be broken whenever adhering to them would interfere with the superseding policy of expediency that has characterized our foreign relations—as well as those of the Soviet Union and Red China—for the past quarter of a century.

No wonder there is such a credibility gap that, even discounting Watergate and rigged elections and criminal conspiracy on the part of so many of the former White House Staffmen, a shudder shakes the whole land when citizens thereof contemplate what may be decided in conversations between the questionable Nixon and the unpredictable Brazhnev.

What does seem probable: These two are conferring because, we repeat, one wants to complete the industrialization of a Socialist Empire, while the other seeks to complete the Socialization of an industrial empire. And we will know little of what actually transpires at this Summit, because we will be entertained (?) by the Watergate hearings and kept in a state of worry when not being entertained because of the high cost of living which Nixon has allegedly frozen, and the inflation which he really has given another boost upward by a sin of omission.

And we are not mimicking Nixon when we say, “May God have mercy on us all.”

BUT IT'S ONLY 1973, MR. ORWELL!

IT COULD HAPPEN HERE

Congressman George Brown is a California Democrat who exemplifies the antithesis of conservatism. Philip Roth is a writer of best sellers of pornographic suasion. We wish to praise neither Brown nor Roth; they are not our kind of people. However, there are times when a Devil's Advocate should be heard, and his words taken as a warning of potential danger ahead. For that reason, we reprint the following from the Congressional Record of Monday, June 11, 1973, pages E 3970-71.

Hon. George E. Brown, Jr. of California in the House of Representatives

Mr. Speaker, one of the main techniques upon which President Nixon has depended during his administration has been the about-face. Rather than maintaining a coordinated, progressive, and logical method of operation, Mr. Nixon has relied on the element of surprise to help him carry out his programs, both foreign and domestic. His trips to Peking and Moscow, in the context of his political career as a red baiter, demonstrated what has become his standard operating procedure in foreign policy. And in domestic affairs, one need only remember his creation of the wage-price freeze only 5 months after he had requested Congress not to renew the law which empowered the President to institute such a freeze. In virtually every policy area, from the war in Southeast Asia to Supreme Court appointments, surprise has been the key to presidential actions under this administration.

As the Watergate scandal has unfolded, we have seen Mr. Nixon continuing to rely on the element of surprise. His March 17 announcement of—and I quote—"new evidence" in the Watergate case was a reversal of his previously adamant denials of White House involvement, while the April 30 resignations of four key members of his staff completely changed the direction which the Watergate case took.

In the future we can expect more surprise announcements from the President. In this expectation, Philip Roth has written an article which appeared in the New York Review of Books dated June 14 which speculates on the nature of one such possible upcoming surprise. Mr. Roth's article is written in the form of an imaginary presidential announcement which we might expect in the future. The text follows:

* * *

*The President Addresses the Nation
(by Philip Roth)*

My fellow Americans:

I have an announcement to make to you tonight of the greatest national importance. As you know, the Senate has voted this afternoon to remove me from the Office of the Presidency. That, of course, is their right under the Constitution of the United States of America, and as you know, I have not interfered in any way with their deliberations on this matter, as I did not interfere some weeks ago when the House of Representatives arrived at their decision after their own deliberations. They have a right to express their opinion, as does any American, without Presidential interference or pressure of any kind from the Executive Branch. That is what is known as the separation of powers. You probably know by now that there were even members of my own political party among those in the Legislative branch who voted to remove me from the Presidency. I consider that to be a vigorous and reassuring sign of their independence of mind, and of their personal integrity. I applaud them for their actions, which can only strengthen the democratic processes here at home, and enhance the image of American democracy abroad.

However, according to the doctrine of the separation of powers, the Executive branch has an equal voice in the management of government, along with the Legislative and the Judicial branches. That, after all, is only fair. It is what is meant by "The American Way." Moreover, the President, which I am, has the sole responsibility for safeguarding the security of the nation. That responsibility is spelled out in the oath of office which, as you all know, every President takes on Inauguration Day. President Washington, whose picture you see here, took that oath. So did President Lincoln, pictured here. And so did our great President Dwight David Eisenhower, whose grandson has just completed serving his country in the United States Navy and is married to my daughter Julie, whom you see pictured here. My other daughter, Tricia, is pictured here in her wedding dress. And of course standing beside her is my wife Pat. My fellow Americans, I owe it not only to these great American Presidents who preceded me in this high office, but to my family, and to you and your families, to respect and honor that oath to which I swore on the Holy Bible on my Inauguration Day. To speak personally, I just couldn't live with myself if I went ahead and shirked my duty to safeguard the security of the nation.

And that is why I have decided tonight to remain in this Office. My fellow Americans, though I respect the sincerity and the integrity of those Senators who voted earlier today for my removal, I find, after careful study and grave reflection, that to accept their decision would be to betray the trust placed in me by the American people, and to endanger the security and the well-being of this nation.

As you all know, there has never been an American President yet who has stepped down in the middle of his term of office because of Congressional pressure of any kind. That is something for which there is just no precedent in American history—and, let me tell you, straight from the shoulder, I don't intend to break the record my predecessors have established of standing up under fire.

You know, no one, I don't care which party he belongs to, expects this Office to be a bed of roses. If he does he shouldn't run for the Presidency to begin with. As the late President Truman put it—and you remember, Harry Truman didn't always see eye to eye on everything with us Republicans—"If you can't take the heat, you shouldn't be in the kitchen." Well, I happen to pride myself on the amount of heat I've taken over the years—some of it, as you older folks may remember, in a kitchen in the Soviet Union with Premier Khrushchev. But in the name of the American people, I stood up to Premier Khrushchev in that kitchen; and in the name of the American people, I am standing up to the Congress tonight.

Richard Nixon is not going to be the first President in American history to be removed from office by the Legislative branch. I am sure that is not the kind of President that the American people elected me to be.

Frankly, if I were to give in to this Congressional pressure to remove me from office, if I were to come on television tonight to tell you, yes, President Nixon is quitting because he can't take the heat, well, that to my mind would constitute a direct violation of my oath of office, and I would in fact voluntarily step down from the Presidency, out of a sense of having profoundly failed you, the American people, whose decision it was to place me in office in the first place.

My fellow Americans, during my years as President, I have as you know devoted myself to one goal above and beyond all others: the goal of world peace. As I talk to you here tonight, negotiations and discussions are being conducted around the globe by Dr. Kissinger, Secretary Rogers, and key members of the Department of State to bring peace with honor to America, and to all of mankind. These negotiations are taking place at the highest diplomatic level and necessarily in secret—but I am pleased to report to you tonight that we are pursuing them with every hope of success.

Now I am sure that no one in Congress would willingly or knowingly want to endanger the chances of world peace, for us, for our children, and for generations to come. And yet, by calling upon the President to pack up and quit just because the going is a little rough, that is precisely what they are doing. And that is precisely why I will not quit. I happen to care more about world peace now and for generations to come than about making myself popular with a new of my critics in the Congress. Oh, I am sure that the easier choice would be to retire to San Clemente and bask there in the honors and tributes that we Americans lavish upon our former Presidents. But I prefer to take the hard road, the high road, if that is the road that leads to the end of warfare and to world peace for our children and our children's children. My fellow Americans, I was raised to be a Quaker, not a quitter.

Now I have to say some things to you that you may not care to hear, especially those of you who try to think the best of our country, as I do myself. But tonight I must speak the truth, unpleasant as it may be: you deserve no less. My fellow Americans, I understand there are going to be those in Congress who will not respect the decision I have announced here tonight, as I respected theirs, arrived at earlier in the day. We have reason to believe that there are those who are going to try to make political capital out of what I have said tonight from the bottom of my heart. There are even going to be some who will use my words to attempt to create a national crisis in order to reap political gain for themselves or their party. And, most dangerous of all, there are some elements in the country, given to violence and lawlessness as a way of life, who may attempt to use force to remove me from office.

Let me quickly reassure you that this administration will not tolerate lawlessness of any kind. This administration will not permit the time-honored constitutional principle of the separation of powers to be subverted by a disgruntled, ambitious, or radical minority. This administration intends to maintain and defend that great American tradition that has come down to us unbroken from the days of the Founding Fathers—the great tradition of a President of the United States duly elected by the people of the United States, serving out his term in office without violent interference by those who disagree with his policies. Disagreement and dissent are, of course, in the great tradition of a democracy like our own; but the violent overthrow of the elected government is something that is repugnant to me, as it is to every American, and so long as I am President, I promise you that I will deal promptly and efficiently with those who advocate or engage in violence as a means of bringing about political change.

In order to discourage those who would resort to violence of any kind, in order to maintain law and order in the nation and to safeguard the welfare and well-being of law-abiding American citizens, I have tonight, in my constitutional role as Commander-in-Chief, ordered the Joint Chiefs of Staff to place the Armed Forces on a stand-by alert around the nation. The Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have also been advised to take all necessary steps to ensure domestic tranquility. The National Guard has already been notified and throughout the fifty states units are being mobilized for duty. Furthermore, state and local police have been encouraged to request whatever assistance they may require in the way of personnel or equipment, in order to maintain law and order in your communities.

My fellow Americans, I swore upon taking this office to safeguard this nation and its citizens, and I intend to stand on my word. No one—and that includes Congressmen and Senators, just as it does the armed revolutionary—is going to tell the American people that they cannot have sitting in the White House the President they have chosen in a free and open election. And I don't care whether that President happens to be myself, President Washington, President Lincoln, or President Eisenhower. I give you every assurance tonight that the President you, the American people, elected for a second four-year term will not permit the votes you cast so overwhelmingly in his favor to have been cast in vain.

God bless each and every one of you.

Good night.

(Congressman Brown now speaking):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate that Mr. Roth's article is a purely fictional and speculative piece of work. This presidential address has not actually been delivered by Mr. Nixon — yet.

(End of Remarks)

Speechwriter Roth, author of this yet-to-be-delivered Presidential Proclamation, is admittedly prejudiced wherever and whenever Richard Nixon is concerned. Among his works of fiction there is the vituperative political satire, Our Gang (starring Tricky and his friends). This novel concerns a President of the United States, Trick E. Dixon and the coterie surrounding him. As "imagined" by Roth, there is Tricky Dixon, First Lady Pitter, Vice President What's-his-name, Attorney General Malicious, Defense Secretary Lard, Mr. Heehaw of the FBI, Mayor John Lancelot of New York City, former President Lyin' B. Johnson, the murdered brothers John F. and Robert F. Charisma, Jacqueline Charisma Colossus, the Rev. Billy Cupcake, news commentator Erect Severehead, etc. All in all, a very abusive book, not even recommended by the New York Times book reviewer, Dwight MacDonald.

Nonetheless, Roth's imagined Presidential address should be taken seriously. Because it could happen!

In fact, the President has defied or ignored the Congress in so many important ways, to imagine him also ignoring an impeachment decision, and defying the Congress that imposed it, is not at all beyond the realm of possibility.

Congress has already ceded to the Executive branch sufficient authority that, at any time the President should deem it advisable he can declare an Executive Dictatorship, and neither Congress nor Court could do anything to stop him!

When Government gets out of hand and can no longer be controlled by the people, short of violent overthrow as in 1776, there are two sources of power which are used by the dictatorial government to keep the people in line: the Police Power and the Power of the Purse (through which the necessities of life can be withheld). And both of these powers are no longer balanced between the three Federal Branches, and between the Federal and the State and local Governments. These powers have been taken over, with the permission of the Federal Legislature and the State Governments, by the Executive branch of the Federal Government and all attempts to reclaim that lost power have been defeated.

Stated simply: the dictatorial power of the Executive rests primarily on three bases: Executive Order 11490, Executive Order 11647, and the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System which is operated through the new and all-powerful Office of Management and Budget.

E.O. 11490 is a compilation of some 23 previous Executive Orders, signed by Nixon on Oct. 28, 1969, and outlining emergency functions which are to be performed by some 28 Executive Departments and Agencies whenever the President of the United States declares a national emergency (as in the defiance of an impeachment edict, for example). Under the terms of E.O. 11490, the President can declare that a national emergency exists and the Executive branch can:

- * Take over all communications media
- * Seize all sources of power
- * Take charge of all food resources
- * Seize all forms of transportation
- * Control all highways and seaports
- * Seize all railroads, inland waterways, airports, storage facilities
- * Commandeer all civilians to work under federal supervision
- * Control all activities relating to health, education, and welfare.
- * Shift any segment of the population from one locality to another
- * Take over farms, ranches, timberized properties
- * Regulate the amount of your own money you may withdraw from your bank, or savings and loan institution

All of these and many more items are listed in 32 pages incorporating nearly 200,000 words, providing an absolute bureaucratic dictatorship whenever the President gives the word.

Executive Order 11647 provides the regional and local mechanisms and manpower for carrying out the provisions of E.O. 11490. Signed by Richard Nixon on Feb. 10, 1972, this Order sets up Ten Federal Regional Councils to govern Ten Federal Regions made up of the fifty still existing States of the Union. They are:

REGION I: Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont.

Regional Capitol: Boston

REGION II: New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands.

Regional Capitol: New York City.

REGION III: Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, District of Columbia.

Regional Capitol: Philadelphia.

REGION IV: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee.

Regional Capitol: Atlanta.

REGION V: Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Wisconsin.

Regional Capitol: Chicago.

REGION VI: Arkansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas.

Regional Capitol: Dallas-Fort Worth.

REGION VII: Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska.

Regional Capitol: Kansas City.

REGION VIII: Colorado, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Wyoming.

Regional Capitol: Denver.

REGION IX: Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada.

Regional Capitol: San Francisco.

REGION X: Alaska, Oregon, Washington, Idaho.

Regional Capitol: Seattle.

Supplementing these Ten Regions, each of the States is, or is to be, divided into sub-regions, so that Federal Executive control is provided over every community.

Then, controlling the budgeting and the programming at every level is that politico-economic system known as PPBS.

The President need not wait for some emergency such as an impeachment ouster. He can declare a National Emergency at any time, and freeze everything, just as he has already frozen wages and prices. And the Congress, and the States, are powerless to prevent such an Executive Dictatorship, unless Congress moves to revoke these extraordinary powers before the Chief Executive moves to invoke them.

OUR COMRADE, THE COMMUNIST GANGSTER

TRIBUTE, CONTRIBUTION, OR PAYMENT FOR PROTECTION?

The leader of the gangster mob which keeps a third of the world enslaved came, saw, and conquered the resentments and reservations of a majority of the body politic of this other greatest nation. With the arrival of Leonid Brezhnev, the Watergate was closed, the people of the nation were entertained with a barrage of newscasts about detente, with action shots of movie stars giving the Russian bear hugs and closed fist salutes, and with stories about a much friendlier and more enlightened Soviet Union. And the smiling gangster leader got everything he came to get; how much more, we'll all be told sometime in the future. As one newsweekly said, "Not everything that Mr. Nixon and Mr. Brezhnev discussed behind closed doors was put on public record. In fact, it may be years before the full significance of their talks becomes evident."

The Watergate dredgings — odoriferous as they were, even before John Dean's stirring up of even worse Potomac stanch—had no effect whatever on the course of the Summit discussions. It was as if here were two birds of a feather, neither of them looking upon the other's aberrations as sinful, or as unusual conduct. One columnist—not an American columnist—observed:

"Recommendations approved by President Nixon on July 15, 1970, have been described by Senator Sam Ervin as the product of 'a Gestapo mentality.' They are equally the product of an NKVD mentality. The recommendations—to bug, to burgle, to spy, the better to collect domestic political intelligence—have always been the stock in trade of the Soviet secret police. So why should Brezhnev, of all people, be shocked? Imitation is, after all, the most sincere form of flattery."

To be sure, there were protests over the visit and the honors showered upon the visitor. But such protests were not allowed to develop into public demonstrations; and most written protests were never printed in any newspaper. There was, for example, the open letter signed by the leaders of three groups of Americans of Czechoslovakian,

Hungarian, and Polish heritage, and addressed to Brezhnev. It cited abuses, many of which are already being experienced by people in the United States, as well as by people behind the so-called Iron Curtain; abuses of the type which led to a Revolutionary War back in 1776. There is nothing really new in this letter, but it does serve to remind us of the things that have befallen the people of East-Central Europe, and to warn us of the things that are about to come upon us in the United States unless we begin to bestir ourselves in the defense of freedom. A part of that Open Letter reads:

"1956 in Hungary and Poland, 1968 in Czechoslovakia and 1970 in Poland again have shown clearly the eternal unquenchability of man's desire to be free, whatever the odds against success, whatever the sacrifice required. Americans of Polish, Hungarian, Czech or Slovak descent will never recognize the Soviet domination of East-Central Europe. We cannot condone in words or even in our minds any summit meeting, treaty declaration or tacit understanding which promotes or acknowledges the subjugation of our sisters and brothers. The claim of the nations of East-Central Europe to independence and liberty is not based on sentiment or politics. It is deeply rooted in history, in culture and in law. No matter what sort of puppet government they may maintain, we do not mean to see that claim abandoned. . . .

"Guided by the traditions, convictions and principles expressed above, we call upon you. . . (to) hasten by every honorable and reasonable means the arrival of the day when the men and women of Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland will stand again free from Soviet military and ideological domination, in liberty and justice.

Czechoslovak National Council of America
—Prof. V. Busek, President.

Coordinating Committee of Hungarian Organizations in North America—Istvan B. Gereben, Executive Secretary.

Polish American Congress, Inc.—Aloysius A. Mazewski, President."

Even more exasperating than the fact of enslavement of these millions of helpless and unhelped millions, is the manner in which they are kept under subjection. Any one doubting the inhuman methods employed by the gangsters led by Leonid Brezhnev, should read the book The Anti-Humans, by D. Bacu, who spent seven years in Romanian prison camps, and describes the horrible methods employed to de-humanize people under Communist domination. He comments: "When the United States has progressed to the point reached by Romania in 1948, there will be no place on earth to which Americans can flee, and there will be no one to hear their screams." (The Anti-Humans, by D. Bacu. 270 pages, cloth cover, $5.00. Published in English by Soldiers of the Cross, Englewood, Colorado 80110).

Most readers will be familiar with the fact that concentration camps are very much in existence in Soviet controlled areas, and that such hell-holes are used for the "correction" of all who will not conform to the Communist control of government as well as society and the individuals comprising society. But few on this side of the Atlantic have heard much of the development of psychopolitical punishment as a means of keeping the more intelligent and enterprising Russian subjects in Line.

On Tuesday, June 19—while Communist Comrade Leonid Brezhnev was being given the Red Carpet Treatment at the Washington White House—a remarkable article appeared in The Vancouver (Canada) Sun. Under the banner headline "We Must All Fight Medical Crimes," Dr. Norman Hirt—himself a psychiatrist—tells how mental institutions are being used as torture chambers in Soviet Russia. A special introduction to the article reads:

"SILENCE"

"On April 18, The Vancouver Sun carried a report of 7,000 people being held in psychiatric institutions in the Soviet Union under fake psychiatric diagnoses. Much of the evidence to support this charge is in the hands of University of British Columbia psychiatrist Dr. Norman Hart. Through a document-smuggling network that stems from the U.S.S.R. and branches out to Britain, France, Israel and the U.S., Dr. Hirt and his colleagues have collected a 'trunkful' of evidence.

"When The Sun telephoned the World Health Organization in Geneva last April, Dr. Thomas Lambo, head of the section on mental health and assistant director-general of WHO, expressed his concern, promised to look into it immediately and report on what was being done about the situation. A week later The Sun was told Dr. Lambo had left for a vacation. Registered letters were sent to Dr. Marcolino Candou, director-general of WHO, to Dr. Lambo, and to the presidents of the Canadian and World Medical Associations. To date, not one medical group has even acknowledged receipt of the correspondence, nor has any action of any kind been taken, lending credence to the mounting fear that a Second World War Germany is unfolding behind the Iron Curtain while the world majority remains as usual—silent. (Signed) Karen Moser."

There is a distinct fear that this conspiracy of silence exists, not merely to hide from the world the fact that such atrocities are being committed behind the Iron Curtain, but because the practice of the art and science of Psychopolitics has become so widespread, throughout the world, that a curtain of silence is being lowered to protect psychopoliticians in the United States as well as in Soviet Russia.

According to Lavrentia Beria, former head of the Russian Secret Police, "Psychopolitics is a solemn charge. With it you can erase our enemies as insects. You can cripple the efficiency of leaders by striking insanity into their families through the use of drugs. You can wipe them away with testimony as to their insanity. . . . You can change their loyalties. Given a short time with a psychopolitician you can alter forever the loyalty of a soldier in our hands or a statesman or a leader in his own country, or you can destroy his mind. . . . Use the courts, use the judges, use the constitution of the country, use its medical societies and its laws to further our ends. . . . And when you have succeeded you will discover that you can now effect your own legislation at will and you can, by careful organization of healing societies, by constant campaign about the terrors of society, by a pretense as to your effectiveness, make your capitalist himself, by his own appropriations, finance a large portion of the quiet conquest of the nation."

Psychopolitics is defined as "the art and science of asserting and maintaining dominion over the thoughts and loyalties of individuals, officers, bureaus, and masses, and the effecting of the conquest of nations through 'mental healing'."

In this connection, it should be recalled that the government-sponsored think tank, RAND, Inc., has indirectly admitted that the Vietnamese War became an experimental laboratory for the testing and perfecting of the techniques of psychopolitical warfare. This was true of both sides in that war; the Communist as well as the American psychopoliticians were at work developing their skills on the front lines, behind the lines, in prison camps and hospitals, and through all communications media. These facts should be born in mind as we reprint the more pertinent parts of the article which appeared on page 6 of the June 19 issue of The Vancouver Sun:—

WE MUST ALL FIGHT MEDICAL CRIMES

(By Dr. Norman Hirt)

Try to picture these events:

Doctors in police uniforms covered with white coats observe a steel wire cage three feet in all its dimensions. Inside this cage a naked being flails about helplessly in a drug-induced convulsion.

A fifteen-year-old girl is held down by six or seven aides and forcibly injected with drugs that cause over-tranquilization and may leave her with permanent brain damage.

A person tied hand and foot is stretched on a bed and lies in excrement for days on end, unfed, and on occasion beaten at the written orders of a doctor.

These are not descriptions from some sort of fiction. They are a few of the hundreds of incidents described, experienced and witnessed by people, including an ex-psychiatrist and ex-KGB (secret police) men, who have escaped from behind the Iron Curtain.

These incidents are occurring today in what are called "special mental hospitals" now being run by the secret police in Russia. In a non-political effort attempts are being made to reveal and condemn these crimes so that they will cease....

When a Canadian brief presenting some of the evidence of the Moscow-based repressive psychiatric atrocities was brought to the attention of the World Medical Association...the WMA...failed to even investigate the Russian allegation. One year later the same WMA office denied any knowledge of the Russian incidents. Chief leaders of many Western-based psychiatric and medical groups, including the American Psychiatric Association and the World Psychiatric Congress, have either deliberately avoided the issue or else have passed ambiguous, weak and non-specific resolutions suggesting that if such a practice is going on anywhere (the actual country is not spelled out) then it is really not very nice.

Reports from psychiatrists and others behind the Iron Curtain indicate now that as a direct consequence of western medical apathy, the number of "special hospitals" is increasing....

There are three ways to become guilty of crime: To commit it yourself, to be a direct accomplice, or to stand by and watch without intervening.

There have been and always will be some individual doctors who do not and cannot live up to these noble concepts. In contrast to the oath, however, we have begun in our time to see a new and unbelievable twist. Barbaric medical practices are being deliberately developed. Doctors are controlled by political bigots so that what is created is in fact a dangerous and absurd distortion of the fundamental humanitarianism of the medical model. Often the practice begins with what appears to be benign or heroic reasons. In the end it is mankind that suffers. For, in the U.S.S.R. for example, it is the most creative and original people who are being repressed and destroyed....

It is urgent that concerned citizens ask governments to reconsider trade agreements with a country that practices medical sadism openly as an instrument of repression.

...In the U.S.S.R. not only are the special hospitals increasing, but psychiatrists who have gone to the defense of their own patients or citizens illegally coerced, have themselves been jailed—or simply disappeared along with their families and friends.

The Serbskii Unit (D.P. Serbskii Scientific Institute of Forensic Psychiatry of Moscow) is a typical example. It is the co-ordinating centre for an expanding number of what are called "special mental hospitals." Surrounded by high stone walls, electrically-controlled metal gates and machine-gun-armed guards, this institution and those like it resemble small fortresses rather than medical centres.

The chief building in Moscow contains "research and diagnostic units," isolation rooms and wards in which unusual forms of interrogation and 'treatments' take place. Doctors, some wearing KGB uniforms covered with white coats, minister to their "patients" in strict secrecy and without outside legal control. The selected victims have little chance of escaping the cruel jaws of this growing medical horror. They are subject to new definitions of mental illness, arbitrary changes in commitment laws, special ambulances and drivers who forcibly pick up "suspects"—that is, people who speak out at public meetings—special psychiatrically-chosen false witnesses, and kangaroo courts.

"Truth serums," drugs that cause permanent brain damage, fever, shock and uncontrollable seizures with muscular contractions, are only a small part of the chemical weaponry created for this special secret police branch.

The original architect of this psychiatric malfeasance, Dr. Daniel Lunts, a psychiatrist, is a former Stalinist informer. Through his connections within the legal structure he has helped to frame those ambiguities into the wording of Soviet law so that the commital for "enforced psychiatric treatment" of "socially dangerous persons" becomes brutally simple to execute....

Soon after Stalin's rise and Serbskii's death this centre was taken over by a clique of psychiatrists who by then had already formed a union with the secret police.

The methods of incarceration and torture in these centres were crude and arbitrary. From texts published in Russia we learned, for example, that from 1953 to 1955 Sergei Pisarev, an important party member and one of the founders of the ruling Russian group, was committed by this group of KGB psychiatrists for enforced psychiatric treatment. His "illness" at that time was that he had criticized the fabrication by the secret police of the notorious phoney doctor's plot against Stalin.

This trial and others like it were also used as crude tests of party loyalty. At that time, to bring Pisarev to trial would have given him a voice. To murder him would have created political turmoil and a martyr as well. A "madman's" story would be suspect.

With Khrushchev's coming Pisarev was eventually released. Angered by what he saw as well as by what happened to him, Pisarev's vocal efforts led in 1955 to the formation of an investigative commission (to study) the misuse of psychiatry in Russia....The findings of this commission called for fundamental and radical reorganization, and the process of reform actually began. (But) the pressure group, unchanged since Stalin's time and fighting for its unholy life, caused all those connected with the (reform) commission to be removed one by one from the central committee. Their report was then taken out of circulation.... Since then other similar victims (of "mental healing") have tried to end this practice. Each in turn has been placed in a mental hospital at one time or another. No changes have been made except to bring more sophisticated methods into use....

On record today are the histories of well over 300 German doctors who in the Hitler era deliberately and consciously vivisected, castrated and murdered by poison gas, acid injections and other "medical" means, thousands of men, women and children.

They performed these acts with the freedom given to them by politically motivated laws. Without any pangs of humane conscience these "doctors" wrote about their experiments, photographed them, read and published papers about them for "learned" societies. Until the collapse of the Third Reich these doctors rationalized their bizarre behavior as being "scientific and for the good of the state and mankind."...

Evidence of parallel medical crimes against humanity occurring at the present moment in the U.S.S.R. and elsewhere accumulates daily.... It is still a living social abscess that stinks up medical history and will never be overlooked and forgotten.

(Conclusion of excerpted parts of an article in The Vancouver Sun, 6/19/73)

The foregoing was not reprinted merely to expose the psychopolitical methods being practiced behind the Iron Curtain. In fact, Dr. Hirt's article pulls punches, doesn't tell even half the story, since his interest is in psychiatry rather than in psychopolitics. Russian experiments in scientific brainwashing, in the psychic and parapsychological fields, in the behaviorist sciences; these are never published openly and would not be believed by most people if they were.

But even as Russia grows more like the United States technologically and industrially, the United States is growing more like the Soviet Union politically and coercively.

Communist-controlled countries have their periodic purges to liquidate political opponents. And now we learn that the Chief Executive of this Nation has his list of "200 enemies," many of whom have already been subjected to bugging, FBI surveillance and IRS investigation.

It can happen here, and it can be true that "there will be no place on earth to flee, and no one to hear our screams." But there is always a remnant and, having gone through the worst, perhaps they'll look to the Lord and say, "Thanks, we needed that!"

REGIONALISM - THE REVOLUTION THAT WAS

THE DOMESTIC ASPECTS OF A GLOBAL CONSPIRACY

In a government publication, "Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Urban Affairs of the Joint Economic Committee, Congress of the United States, May 19-26, 1971," there appears the following statement:

"Regionalism: The Quiet Revolution"

"Local government is changing itself in an effort to better meet the needs of the people. Across the nation, cities, counties, towns, and school districts that serve a common area are joining together in a regional effort to solve mutual problems. In a quiet way, regionalism is a revolution in the structure of our federal system." (Emphasis added.)

Whenever President Nixon or any member of his Executive Establishment speaks of Regionalism, it is called "The New Federalism;" and whenever any particular part of the overall scheme is singled out for comment—PPBS, Regional Councils, Revenue Sharing, Consolidation, Decentralization; etc.—each of these is a part of "The New American Revolution."

However, it is misleading to refer to any of this as "new." The whole plan has been "in the works" for nearly half a century. As we shall show you, using their own words as proof:

"Regionalism," was first tried out on the American citizenry by means of an article appearing in The New York Times of April 21, 1935. There was a map which now is cropping up once again in conservative papers and newsletters. The map was of the United States, on which the States had been collectivized into nine "Departments." Under the map was a line of type, reading:

"The Map of the United States as it might be Redrawn by the 'Revisionists'—States' Rights would be Abolished and the Country would be Divided into Nine Departments."

We reprinted the article written by Delbert Clark which accompanied that map (Don Bell Reports 1/19/73). Highlighted were such remarks as: "State Sovereignty must be forgotten for the common welfare," and "But how bring about this greater cohesion, this enhancement of the Federal Government's power to cross state lines for the common good? The most common albeit the most startling proposal is to abolish so-called states rights entirely, preserving state lines only for sentimental reasons, and reapportion the United States into 8 or 9 great departments, to be locally self-governed but without the power to hamstring the national government in its legislative acts."

Thus was The Plan first presented to the public, that the public reaction might be tested—a kind of elementary Gallop Poll procedure. And, even with readers of The New York Times as the polled persons, it became obvious that the Americans of that generation were not going to permit the abolition of their States. So, "The Plan" became a long-range objective, and a network of organizations was established, to carry out the various programs required to "condition" the people of the United States into acceptance of The Plan.

The Planners would move, step by step, through the programs of the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the New Frontier, the Great Society, the New Federalism; all of these being names for the various stages in the march toward Corporate Socialism.

The Programming required the taking over of existing organizations, or the creating of new organizations, for the carrying-out of the various programs. To tell it in their own words:

"In 1929 the International City Managers' Association moved from the University of Kansas campus to the campus of the University of Chicago at the invitation of Charles E. Merriam, then chairman of the Political Science Department of the University of Chicago, and upon the recommendation of Louis Brownlow, a former city manager and a past president of ICMA.

"Encouraged by the financial support of the Spelman Fund, other organizations soon followed ICMA to the University of Chicago campus. Within two years, these included the American Legislators Association (now the Council of State Governments), American Municipal Association (now the National League of Cities), American Public Welfare Association, the Municipal Finance Officers Association, Civil Service Assembly (now Public Personnel Association) and the Governmental Research Association, among others. Eventually many of these organizations were located at 850 East 58th Street.

"In 1930 Public Administration Clearing House (PACH) was founded with Brownlow as its first director. PACH developed and conducted common services, including the Joint Reference Library, and assisted the several associations in various other ways. Increased demands from state and local governments for consulting assistance and the need for a joint research and publishing agency led in 1933 to the establishment of Public Administration Service.

"During the next several years, kindred organizations came to Chicago. Their increasing numbers and their expanding programs brought the need for additional space. The Spelman Fund granted monies to the University of Chicago to construct and maintain a building to house these organizations on land provided by the University. The buildings at 1313 East 60th Street was completed in 1938 (sic). Construction of a wing in 1961 provided additional space and facilities." (Quoted from a pamphlet published by "1313 Center for Public Administration," 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago, Illinois, 60637.)

So, the Planning was announced as early as 1935. The Programming was carried out by the network of organizations headquartering at 1313. As for the Budgeting; reference has already been made to the Spelman Fund. To complete the story, the following is quoted from a letter written, and signed, by J. William Hess, Archivist for the Rockefeller Foundation (the archives are located at 333 West 52nd St., New York, N.Y. 10019).

"Social Science Research Council. Formed in May, 1923, by the American Economic Association, the American Sociological Society, and the American Political Science Association. It was at first referred to as the Social Research Council; the longer name was used as early as November, 1923. The Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial contributed $20,500 to the organization in 1924.... On December 29, 1925, the Memorial appropriated $25,000 to the Council. ... The Council also had support from the Russell Sage Foundation, the Carnegie Corporation, and the Commonwealth Fund. After it absorbed the Memorial in 1929, the Rockefeller Foundation continued to support the Council.

"Council on Foreign Relations. Incorporated on July 25, 1921, in New York State. It was supported by memberships and contributions and began publication of the quarterly, Foreign Affairs. The Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial appropriated $150,000 in 1927.... After the merger with the Memorial, the Rockefeller Foundation continued to support the Council....

"Public Administration Clearing House, Chicago. This organization was formed in 1930 at which time it received a grant from the Spelman Fund of New York; this was done in co-operation with the Social Science Research Council. By 1930, the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial had been merged with the Rockefeller Foundation. At the time of this merger in 1929, the Spelman Fund of New York was created to continue some of the interests of the Memorial. The Memorial had been somewhat interested in public administration: in 1927, it made grants to an organization called the National Institute of Public Administration. The Rockefeller Foundation also supported public administration projects through direct grants and through the Social Science Research Council and other institutions."

(Notes on the above: The Laura Spelman Memorial Fund was established by John D. Rockefeller, Sr., in memory of his departed wife, Laura Spelman Rockefeller. The letter from the Rockefeller Foundation archivist also includes information concerning Rockefeller support of the National Bureau of Economic Research, the Russian Institute at Columbia University, the Brookings Institution, the Institute of Pacific Relations and other Rockefeller Foundation satellites and subsidiaries which are not pertinent to the subject matter of this particular newsletter.)

We have been using their own words, taken from their own correspondence and publications, to show how it was done: Their long-range Planning was accomplished years and years ago; their step-by-step Programming has been carried out just as they planned it, and the Budgeting was provided by means of money grants from the Rockefeller and other Foundations, from certain extremely wealthy families who were to benefit most in terms of guaranteed, permanent power.

There were established all the necessary councils, commissions, agencies, bureaus, associations, research centers, clearing houses, training schools for personnel, placement services for appointees who were destined to replace local, elected officials;

all the paraphernalia and the services required to bring about this Quiet Revolution were headquartered in this 1313 Center.

In her excellent work, "The Overthrow of the United States Constitution," Bernadine Smith wrote:

"From here (1313) they Planned and engineered a socialistic society and set about to alter the mechanics of American government in such a way that the embracing of socialism would be the only recourse. Existing organizations were infiltrated and 're-directed.' The change-over was going on so gradually, so slowly, that not many noticed. Trained under socialistic professors in the universities were a new breed of 'thinkers' whom they deftly placed in managerial capacities in all levels of government. They gave support to like-thinkers who gravitated to Congress and to others who sought election as public officials on other levels. . . . The '1313ers' set up a Mail Order Law Factory, and from here they wrote 'model' laws that would convert America to a socialistic government. . . . Congressmen and others in state legislatures were found who were willing to take these bills—'slip bills' as they are called—and introduce them by filling in their names as the authors, getting assigned numbers under which to file the bills, filling in appropriate blank spaces with information that would complete the bill. And so it has been in almost every state that laws were introduced that facilitated the change-over from constitutional government to regional government, while at the same time a great many supporters in the Congress were accomplishing the same objective on the national level." (Quoted from The Overthrow of the United States Constitution, by Bernadine Smith, 215 East Amber Way, Hanford, California 93230. Single copy: $1.00).

For most of the years of its existence, 1313 had concentrated its efforts at the State, County, City and community levels. A look at one of the 1313 complexes—the Council of State Governments—will explain much of the modus operandi employed. We quote from a 1313 publication:

Not listed specifically in the above are the "Mail Order Laws" which are prepared and distributed to State Legislators, ready for introduction as bills. Out of this complex also came the drafts of these new and "up-to-date" State Constitutions which have been or are being adopted State by State—all in preparation for the acceptance of Regionalism, which will render State Governments superfluous and unnecessary.

As we noted previously, the first years of 1313's activities were devoted to State and local governments. But, when it came time to begin the introduction of the various phases of governance now called the "New Federalism," 1313 found that it needed a beachhead in the Federal Government, as well as in State and local governments. So, in 1959, the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) was established. ACIR works with 1313-controlled intergovernmental groups in each State, and also works closely with the White House Executive Offices, especially with the Office of Budget and Management, and with the Domestic Council, the President being chairman of the latter. (It is this Domestic Council which consolidates and directs the activities of the Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations which, in turn, is responsible for the proper functioning of the Ten Federal Regional Councils.)

The interlocking chain of command is most revealing: Kenneth Cole is the executive director of the Domestic Council, which governs the Under Secretaries Group; the associate director of OMB (which governs the PPBS operation) is chairman of the Under Secretaries Group which, in turn, governs the Ten Federal Regional Councils. And Robert Merriam, who is chairman of ACIR, is the son of the late Charles E. Merriam, one of the co-founders of 1313.

Perhaps this is what the President means when he speaks of decentralization and returning the power to the people.

THE FEDERAL "LAND USE" ACT A PERIL TO PRIVATE PROPERTY

Senate Bill 268, passed on June 21, 1973, is titled "Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act," and is described as:

"A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to guidelines established by the Executive Office of the President, to make grants to assist the States to develop and implement State land use programs and to coordinate land use planning in interstate areas; to coordinate Federal programs and policies which have land use impacts; to coordinate planning and management of Federal lands and planning and management of adjacent non-Federal lands; to make grants to Indian tribes to assist them to develop and implement land use programs for reservation and other tribal lands; to encourage research on and training in land use planning and management; and for other purposes."

Following this descriptive title there are approximately 15,000 words comprising the legislative power-pack that, if also passed by the House and then signed into law by the President, would spell the end of the traditional concept of the private ownership of land as originally conceived and understood under the American system of Constitutional government.

Passed in the Senate by an overwhelming vote of 64-to-21 under the sponsorship of Senator Henry M. Jackson, Washington Democrat, this measure follows the pattern of the Revenue Sharing Act and similar PPBS-enabling legislation, in that federal grants are to be given States if and when they comply with federal guidelines in regard to land use.

Little attention was given this bill by the communications media. So occupied with the Watergate hearings that other Congressional doings are hardly noticed, newspapers overlooked S. 268, with one important exception. Human Events of July 7 noted that proponents of the bill argued that federally-approved State zoning programs were necessary to preserve the country's environment and provide for balanced economic development, and "supporters of the measure, including a surprising number of conservatives, maintain that the bill is a voluntary grant-in-aid program intended merely to encourage the States to develop their own zoning programs and not an attempt by the federal government to force a national program upon the States."

"Critics, however," said Human Events, find this hard to believe. As Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R.-Ariz.) pointed out in floor debate, the measure tells the States they will get millions of dollars in federal aid simply by setting up a land-use planning scheme under a 'process' approved by Washington.

"The catch is that this so-called process entails so many specific provisions that are subject to federal approval that instead of carrying out their own zoning plans, the States will find themselves acting as mere agents for the federal government."

"One such provision calls for the federal government to review each State's planning process to ensure that it conforms with federal guidelines. Another demands that each State have a State Planning Agency with authority to carry out the will of the federal government as outlined in the bill. Still another requirement provides that the States must have a program to regulate land sales or development projects which, in Sen. Fannin's words, 'goes so far as to require the State to "determine whether there is a need for the proposed project, and whether it should proceed".'

"Perhaps the greatest opening toward federal control, however, is the provision giving the Interior Department the power to ensure that the States restrict the use of 'all areas of critical environmental concern which are of more than statewide significance.' So broadly does the bill define what is meant by these 'critical' areas, in fact, that almost any land could be considered subject to federally dictated zoning restrictions.

"Included in the measure's definition of 'areas of critical environmental control,' for instance, are geographic areas whose

'development might substantially impair the historic, cultural, scientific, or esthetic values or natural systems or processes within fragile or historic lands.'

"Moreover, while the bill makes State compliance voluntary for the present, an amendment sponsored by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D.-Maine) directs the Council on Environmental Quality three years from now to recommend to the Congress 'any requirements or procedures necessary to assure that the national land use policies are implemented. (This threatens a more mandatory approach in the future. Indeed, in introducing the amendment, Muskie, whose vaunted Clean Air Act continues to aggravate the energy crisis, admitted that to threaten the States was exactly what he had in mind. Said Muskie: 'This is something like the psychology of a second shoe falling. The (land use) bill is the first shoe, and will give a clear indication, if adopted, to the States that Congress is serious about this business. If the States do not respond effectively, Congress is thinking of sanctions in three years.' (An even harsher amendment, sponsored by Jackson, that would have applied immediate sanctions against States choosing not to comply had been rejected a short time earlier.)

"Thus, it is clear that, at least for its more ardent supporters, the Senate-passed measure is but a way station on the path to greater federal control. But even if, fulfilling the hopes of some of its conservative supporters like Sen. James L. Buckley (C.-R.-N.Y.), the bill stopped at encouraging statewide zoning programs and did not lead to federal control, it would hardly merit support from property owners. Indeed, statewide zoning could prove nearly as harmful as a federal program.

"Describing such a statewide program as in Vermont, for instance, former Vermont Assemblyman John McClaughry has observed that 'there is probably no more direct route for the consolidation of government power over the individual citizen than the direct control over all land use in his state.'

According to McClaughry, Vermont's system has resulted in numerous adverse effects:

* First, the procedural problems encountered in obtaining permits from the State's district environmental commissions have a strong deterrent effect on any kind of development or improvement of land.

* Second, new requirements for expensive soil testing and contour surveying on all lots smaller than 10 acres have driven the cost of a small homesite lot from $400 to

$1,000. As a result, farmers who may have sold several small building lots for needed cash, instead have decided to sell off their whole farms in larger pieces. Consequently, many Vermonters who would like to buy small homesites for building their homes are now unable to do so. Meanwhile, says McCaughry, by encouraging farmers to leave farming, the land-use law has done more to destroy the State's desirable rural character than its zoning provisions have done to preserve such an environment.

* Third, by increasing the cost of building lots, the statewide zoning set-up has reduced the supply of new low-cost housing in the State, instead channeling the land into developments for wealthy out-of-state second-home buyers. This, says McCaughry, has led to a serious housing problem in Vermont.

"Despite these and other difficulties engendered by statewide zoning in one State that has tried it, the Jackson measure, if passed by the House, will extend such so-called land-use 'planning' nationwide.

"A particular danger is the erosion of constitutionally guaranteed property rights that land-use restrictions place upon property owners. As Senators Fannin, Clifford P. Hansen (E.-Wyo.) and Dewey F. Bartlett (R.-Okla.) pointed out in a minority report against the Jackson legislation, 'The 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States provide that "private property" shall not be "taken for public use, without just compensation".'

"The critical issue, however, is how far the use of property can be restricted without compensating the property owner for diminution of value. It is conceivable, for instance, that a State government, in restricting the development of a piece of property so as to preserve it as a habitat for wildlife, might vastly reduce that property's value to its owner. Yet nothing in the Jackson measure guarantees that owners will be compensated for such losses. Indeed, on the contrary, the bill forbids the States from expending any grant money for this purpose.

"With all of its dangers both to the rights of the States and of American property owners, the Senate-passed land-use bill is nothing short of revolutionary. A similar bill is expected to be reported out of the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committees shortly after the July 4th recess.

"Unless there is a determined public outcry against the House bill—hardly likely given the near total blackout in news coverage the scheme has received thus far--there is a grave danger that the power-grabbing Jackson measure might become law. Following is the vote by which the Senate passed the Jackson land-use policy bill:

Va.), Chiles, Church, Clark, Cranston, Eagleton, Fulbright, Gravel, Hart, Hartke, Haskell, Hathaway, Hollings, Hughes, Inouye, Jackson, Johnston, Kennedy, Magnuson, Mansfield, McGee, McGovern, McIntyre, Mondale, Montoya, Moss, Muskie, Nelson, Nunn, Pastore, Pell, Randolph, Ribicoff, Sparkman, Stevenson, Symington, Tunney, Williams.

(End of extended quotation from Human Events, 7/7/73).

The concept of land control is an essential element in an overall scheme for total control of all citizens. The "land control" objective was lucidly explained at a State-sponsored Planning Conference held in Richmond, Virginia, Oct. 17-19, 1972:

"Private property in this state eventually should be transferred to government or state agency ownership and then be leased back to individuals under rigidly controlled regulations."

This Senate Bill 268 is, then, as Human Events states, but a way station on the road that leads to total control of all property by a Central Government.

As we have noted, and shown by documentation in previous letters, the overall scheme revolves around a management and control mechanism known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. Its essential ingredients are:

- 1) The division of the Nation into Ten Regions, or Provincial Districts;
- 2) The division of each State into equal Sub-Regions or Districts;
- 3) Budgetary and financial control through Federal Revenue Sharing;
- 4) Imposition of State Income Tax in all States, to be collected by the Federal T-men, and returned to the States via federally controlled Revenue Sharing;
- 5) State-wide property tax, zoning, etc.;
- 6) Control of the use of all land by the Ten Regional Councils which govern the Ten Federal Regions.

The passage of the Jackson Land Use Bill is partial fulfillment of step number six in the above. Note that the Senate Bill provides that all of its provisions are to be carried out "pursuant to guidelines established by the Executive Office of the President." This means, of course, that the Land Use Program will be an essential part of the Regional Governance Program which has already been set up and is in operation at this very moment, overriding State statutes and municipal ordinances whenever and wherever any conflict exists.

Also, as we have previously indicated, the key points to remember when studying this overall conspiracy (of which land control is a part), are these:

- 1) The attack is always against property;
- 2) Economic power is to be added to the existing political power; and when combined they add up to Police State Power;
- 3) Rule is to be by appointed officials who are controlled by the Executive Office of the President;
- 4) Management of all resources, both human and natural (land, etc.), will be in accordance with the computerized, scientific socialistic method of economic and political control which is known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS).

Let's note the progression of this conspiracy from yet another angle:

Our last letter (July 6) dealt in part with an organization called the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR). We quote from ACIR's 12th Annual Report: "Substate regional bodies are proliferating. Federal programs encourage their formation to meet specific Federal objectives such as metropolitan planning (HUD), resource conservation and development (USDA), community action (OEO), cooperative area manpower planning (Labor), comprehensive health planning (HEW) and law enforcement (Justice)." And now can be added to the list: Land Use (Interior).

This same ACIT report stated: "The President in Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1970 established a Domestic Council to coordinate domestic policy formulation; and an Office of Management and Budget to strengthen his managerial control. The plan was heralded as giving the President the machinery to oversee the evolution of federalism (or regionalism, or the quiet revolution—Ed.)"

Thus was established the administrative machinery: 1) the various departments and agencies to formulate the programs; 2) the Domestic Council to consolidate the various departmental programs into one package that will bring about the "evolution" of the plan, or the long-range objective; 3) the Office of Management and Budget to provide overall management of the consolidated program (PPBS); and 3) the Ten Regional Councils and the substate regional bodies to administer the consolidated program at the Regional, State, and sub-state regional levels.

To assure that this new kind of government machine operates efficiently, two things are essential:

- 1) Control of all tax money; and
- 2) Control of property.

Control of tax money is to be accomplished through Revenue Sharing. This is explained in a pamphlet issued from the Executive Office of the President by the Domestic Council, entitled "The History of Revenue Sharing," from which we quote:

"The skeletal plan was developed by a committee headed by Counsellor to the President, Arthur F. Burns, who is now Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. . . . Taxes are collected most efficiently by the highly centralized Federal tax system. Each general purpose unit would receive its proportionate share of revenue based on how much money it raises locally. These units of government will be able to serve as laboratories for modern government. Revenue Sharing is an idea whose time has clearly come."

From a booklet issued by the Treasury Department's Office of Revenue Sharing, we quote this additional information:

"The Office of Revenue Sharing consists of mainly attorneys, economists, analysts, and administrative specialists who will evaluate, administer, and verify the multibillion dollar program through audit and compliance measures. In the case of a unit of local government which spends money on non-priority expenditures, the local government will pay over to the (Treasury) Secretary an amount equal to 110 percent of any amount expended out of its trust fund in violation of the Revenue Sharing Act."

Thus, spending local money for anything not within federal guidelines means that the local governmental unit (city, county, or State) will be punished by being forced to pay back the principal plus 10% interest!

Stated simply: Revenue Sharing means that federal agents will collect all the taxes, then will return a part of what has been collected to the local government unit, if the local unit abides by the terms of the program laid down by the federal authority. Is this not coercion, plain and simple?

But, as Senator Muskie might have said, only one shoe has been dropped. The second shoe is control of property, or land use regulations, federally initiated and federally administered. And Senate Bill 268 is a giant step in the direction of the loss of property rights for every unit of local government, and for every citizen who owns real estate!

Not a shot has been fired in this peaceful, profound, quiet, New American Revolution. But make no mistake about it, "The New American Revolution is truly underway" (the quoted words are those of Richard M. Nixon). Pollution problems, the crime wave, the energy crisis, oppressive taxation, inflation, shortages of housing, food—these are a few of the problems that have been created by these revolutionaries in government. The reason? As one correspondent wrote:

"The reason is as old as politics itself. It is the Hegelian principle of bringing about change in a three-step process: thesis, anti-thesis and synthesis. First step: Creation of the problem. Second step: Creation of opposition to the problem. Third step: Solution—a solution which would have been impossible to impose without the proper psychological conditioning of steps one and two."

The enactment of a Federal Land Use Act is perhaps the final step in the fulfillment of their pre-planned "Solution." Is it not time that "Christian Reconstruction" become something more than a slogan?

REGIONAL BANKING IN TOMORROW'S CHECKLESS WORLD

COMPUTERIZED CURRENCY?

"Regionalism is the wave of the future," says a government report dealing with the ten standard Federal regions which have been established to handle—at the regional level—the duties and services of the Departments of Labor; Health, Education and Welfare; Housing and Urban Development; Transportation; the Environmental Protection Agency; and the Law Enforcement Assistance Agency (this last named being the nucleus of a developing National Secret Police Organization, according to some expert observers).

Just as this Regional Government System threatens to eliminate the need for State and County Governments, a suggested new banking system would eliminate the need for the local, community banker, and for Savings and Loan Banks, etc.

The establishment of the Federal Reserve System first brought about the dividing of the Nation into Twelve Federal Reserve Districts, for purposes of financial control. Now, with the Nation also divided into Ten Federal Regions for purposes of political control; it seems that the financial controllers and the political controllers are joining together in a system which would provide a financial record of every individual on a Master Computer Tape located at the Regional Capitol.

Local banks would be replaced by "automated banking machines" which would be placed in "industrial centers, department stores, air and bus terminals, civic centers and other high-volume areas." The banking machine would be connected to the Master Computer at your Regional Capitol, where your financial status would be kept on tape; and your friendly local banking machine would be able to cash your check, take your deposit, make a loan if your recorded financial status permitted, and even provide you with video financial-counseling services.

The scheme was outlined about a month ago before a meeting of the Virginia Bankers Association, and we have a report of same which appeared in the Washington Evening

Star and Daily News of June 20, 1973:

REGIONAL BANKING WAVE OF FUTURE?

(By Philip M. Kadis)

... In a speech before the Virginia Bankers Association last week, Frederick Deane, Jr., president of the Bank of Virginia Co., presented his view of the shape the banking future will take. Among his predictions:

The withering of state boundaries for banking and the emergence of as many as 20 large nationwide banking systems.

Establishment of regional holding companies with affiliates engaging in a wide variety of nonbanking financial services.

Growth of correspondent banking services into money-service banks which will charge fees for services that will be based on computer programs too costly and complex for individual banks and holding companies to develop efficiently.

Opening of an office by a major English, German or Japanese banking conglomerate in the Hampton Roads complex with full-scale banking services.

Deane said he foresaw a regional banking market stretching from Charlotte, N.C. to Baltimore, with heaviest concentration in Virginia and the Washington area suburbs.

"There is good reason to focus on the Maryland-District of Columbia-Virginia trade area when considering the development of regional holding companies," Deane told the 80th annual convention of the association at the Homestead in Hot Springs, Va.

"This is where it is likely to happen first—as a way of resolving the many competitive problems now faced by the District banks, and because the holding company movement has achieved a maturity in Virginia, and the Southeast generally, that today is lacking elsewhere, except on the West Coast."

Deane's "bank of tomorrow" and its retail-oriented branches would be linked to a super-computerized electronic funds transfer system that would usher in the checkless society.

There would be remote, automated banking facilities without tellers in industrial plants, department stores, air and bus terminals, civic centers, and similar high-volume areas. Management of these centers, Deane said, may be restructured as an industry-owned utility.

Distinctions between such financial institutions as banks, savings and loans, credit unions and finance companies will begin to blur, Deane predicted, citing conclusions of the Hunt Commission Report on financial institutions.

"The extension of banking powers to thrift institutions is being hurried along by three forces," he said. "First, technology and the designing of an electronic funds transfer system; second, a competitive imbalance primarily stemming from developments in the bank holding company movement; and third, certain basic changes in our market economy and how it operates.

"One change is that thrift no longer is enshrined as a national folkway; people would rather have it—a car, a boat, a TV, whatever—now than save for it, and savings is what the thrift industry is all about."

Accompanying the breakdown in geographical and competitive barriers, Deane said, will be a more "extensive and intrusive" role for government regulatory agencies.

"The trend toward a single federal bank regulatory agency appears inevitable," Deane said. "Probably this superagency will be the Federal Reserve or a reconstituted extension of the system developed along the lines suggested a decade ago by recently retired Governor J. L. Robertson."

The role of state governments will shift from an emphasis on an examining function to issues such as consumer rights or chartering entrants into the marketplace, Deane said. "Compelling this change primarily is the fact that state boundaries and interstate branching restrictions appear as anachronisms in the world of electronic banking," Deane said.

"One must even ask if there is any meaning to a state or federal charter in the environment we have been discussing. It is difficult to conceive of one, at least in the traditional sense."

The advent of electronic banking will open the institutions to that portion of the population—estimated at 25 per cent to 30 per cent—that now is outside the banking mainstream, Deane said.

To assist in facilitating the changes that he felt were inevitable. Deane proposed the formation of a Virginia Bankers Association "Hunt Commission" with representation from the nonbanking community as well, to analyze the state's banking and financial structures and propose changes.

(End of article)

The foregoing "regional banking" scheme seems to be a very definite and important part of the New Federalism, and is also a further development of the plan to establish a Federal World Authority with its Bank of Nations, which together comprise a system of Global Corporate Socialism.

In our Don Bell Reports of June 8, 1973, we reproduced a portion of a chart drawn up more than 30 years ago by Hans Heymann, a German-Jewish refugee who had been a friend and associate of Walter Rathenau, a German-Jew who was "one of the 300" who ruled Europe secretly. After Rathenau's assassination, Heyman completed the plans for this World Authority, whose principal feature was a Bank of Nations. Stemming from this Central World Bank were three Regional Banks: the Europa Bank, the Oriental Bank, and the Inter-American Bank.

Then, branching outward from these three Regional World Banks were the various National Banks (ours is the Federal Reserve Corporation.) Then, branching downward from these National Banks were the domestic branches, or Regional Banks (these are the subject of Banker Deane's Report which has been reviewed in this letter.)

In our previous letter we wrote:

"Is this The Master Plan, and is this the time for its installation? There are these facts: 1) the current accent is on economics rather than politics; 2) multinational corporations have become governments within themselves and are more powerful than most national governments; so that 3) national governments have begun catering to and modeling themselves after these corporations. And Heymann's Plan is a functional economic mechanism for integrating the world's economy and giving it a new monetary system. Therefore, this could be the Master Plan, and this may be the time for its inauguration."

We might have added that the uncontrolled inflation and the seemingly planned international monetary mess are further indication that the Money Barons are about to make some changes and put some new program into operation.

Some very strange things are happening. For instance: On Tuesday July 17, the dollar hit a new low on world markets. West Germany intervened to prop it up, the Federal Reserve Corporation sold foreign paper and bought U.S. dollars on the European market but the dollar still sagged. Next day there was a token recovery that kept the value of the dollar at better than nothing. All of this dollar teetering is no longer unusual; but, usually, whenever the dollar sinks to a new low, gold rises to a new high. This time the dollar sank but gold remained on an even keel; it did not react to the dollar sag. Unusual things of this kind just are not natural, and suggest special manipulation for some special purpose.

Equally worrying is the sudden Japanese monetary invasion of the United States. The Washington Evening Star and Daily News of July 6, 1973, announced that of the top 20 foreign banks in the United States, eight were Japanese, headed by the well heeled Bank of Tokyo, with some $3.6 billion in its American operations.

Too, not far behind England and France in investing in United States property and in building industrial sites on this continent is Japan. The San Jose (Calif.) News, for example, recently announced that:

"A Japanese auto manufacturer and a major maker of home appliances may set up factories in San Jose, Mayor Norman Mineta said. The mayor, just returned from Japan with a delegation of industry-hunters said teams of Japanese industrialists will begin to arrive here this month to look over the Valley for possible manufacturing sites."

The unusual part of this is that American industrialists, financiers and politicians went to Japan not to seek outlets for United States production and investments; they went to Japan to invite the Japanese to bring their money and their plants to the United States!

A rather remarkable account of that trade mission to Japan appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of June 1, 1973. Here are excerpts:

JAPAN'S INTEREST GROWS IN INVESTING IN UNITED STATES (By Elizabeth Pond)

Tokyo--Japanese investments in the U.S. may be an idea whose time has come. At least this is what the sponsors of Tokyo's first "invest in U.S.A. seminar" hope.

As they packed up their displays Wednesday to go on to Osaka, representatives of the 36 participating American states and territories told reporters that the seminar results have surpassed their expectations.

Wayne Gentry, executive director of the trade-development division of the Washington State Department of Commerce was typical in his enthusiasm. "We were not prepared for the response we found here," he commented. "It was far beyond our expectations."

Many Japanese businessmen approached the Washingtonians with specific project ideas for the Pacific Northwest. Many made future appointments for follow-up discussions when they will be in the U.S. later this year.

Some indicated they had been studying the American market for several years and now are ready to go ahead with investments. All of the Washington State literature was exhausted and more had to be airmailed from Seattle.

The Tokyo seminar was a low-budget affair ($75,000) sponsored by the U.S. Department of Commerce, the National Association of State Development Agencies, and the U.S. Embassy in Tokyo on the American side, and by the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the influential Federation of Economic Organizations, the Foreign Trade Council, and Japan External Trade Organization on the Japanese side. . . .

Similar seminars have been held before in Europe and South America. Essentially the idea is to put the states that would like to attract foreign investment in touch with potential investors. In particular, the participating states would like to attract Japanese investment in manufacturing plants. . . . The Japanese just now are becoming interested in manufacturing investments abroad. Heretofore they have concentrated on raw materials procurement, real estate, and hotel and service industries in their foreign investment. Pollution, a labor shortage, and industrial overcrowding at home now are making it more desirable for Japanese companies to expand production abroad.

. . . As sketched by seminar participants, there are a number of advantages to Japanese investors in the U.S. What the Japanese fear might turn out to be America's new protectionism might shut out expanding Japanese exports in the future, but Japanese companies manufacturing in the U.S. would have free access to the U.S. market. They would then be able to respond quickly to changing market preferences in the U.S. too --as in the case of YKK zippers in Macon, Ga. Furthermore, the wage gap is closing rapidly. Seminar spokesmen described American wages as only double Japanese wages at present, and projected that Japan's huge wage hikes will bring wage equality with the U.S. within 10 years.

We reprinted the foregoing because it is an excellent graphic example of the present trend toward eliminating national boundaries and creating a One World Economy, with Oriental industry operating side-by-side with Occidental industry, and with the multinational corporation functioning as a law unto itself, whether the officers of that corporation be Japanese or United States citizen, Britisher or Frenchman.

Even more to be condemned: Here are representatives of American States and Cities going to foreign countries and appealing to foreigners to come to the United States and buy land, build factories, and turn out products for sale to Americans, with the profits from such sales going into the vaults of the foreign-based multinational corporations!

It is a peculiar thing indeed when American industrialists and financiers build their plants and invest their money in foreign countries to the detriment of the American economy and American labor, while foreign industrialists and financiers are invited to build their plants and invest their money in the United States, and this at the invitation of Federal and State officials!

There is no surer way to establish a World Authority and renounce all so-called National Sovereignty; without a whimper and with official blessing.

There is yet one more way in which this World Authority is being established, and that is by the surrender of the seas to an agency of this World Authority. Known as the "Seabed Treaty," it should be called Legalized Piracy of the High Seas.

In 1970—a fateful year for our former Republic—President Nixon announced a "new oceans policy," which declared that the "resources of the seabed beyond a... depth of 200 meters (218.8 yards)... is the common heritage of mankind." The President's policy went on to declare that the governing of the high seas, and the seabed beyond territorial limits, should be placed in the hands of "an international regime" under the direction of the United Nations. The revenues produced by this "international regime" from licensing undersea exploration for oil, natural gas, and minerals are "to be used for international community purposes, particularly economic assistance to developing countries."

The "international regime" envisioned by President Nixon, would consist of 12 members from the developing countries, 6 from the most industrialized nations, 2 from landlocked or shield-locked states, and a "Tribunal of from 5 to 9 judges to be elected by the (Security) Council."

Sounds very humanitarian, does n't it? And that "common heritage of mankind" concept is right out of the Socialist handbook. But there is a catch to this Seabed Treaty idea that only the mineralogists would know anything about. We are told that:

Three minerals basic to steel production are found in abundance on the ocean floor. They are small size rocks commonly called "manganese nodules," but they also contain cobalt and nickel. Oceanographers agree that these manganese-cobalt-nickel nodules comprise the largest mineral deposits on this planet. Ironically, the top steel-producing nations of the world—the United States, Japan, West Germany and France—must import these basic metals. Moreover, with the exception of Canada, none of the land-based deposits of these essential elements exist in the major non-Communist countries of the world. Therefore, each of the steel-producing countries must import their stocks of cobalt, nickel and manganese from the Communist countries, or from the unstable regimes in the emerging nations.

As a Nation, we have the opportunity, the technology, and the ability to develop this greatest natural resource in the world: the seabed. But, under the tenuous concept of "the common heritage of mankind," our federal government is anxious to put the Nation in a position where it and other industrialized Nations of the world must depend on the Communist bloc or the Communist controlled emerging Nations. Steel production in Western Nations would be at the whim of their avowed enemies!

And the Communists didn't suggest this Seabed Treaty; our own President did it!

In this letter we have exposed a few of the larger pieces of a gigantic jigsaw puzzle which, when all the pieces are in their assigned places will complete the formation of a World Authority.

Refusing to accept the Truth is a sure road to destruction, nationally and personally.

THE INVISIBLE CLOAK CALLED NATIONAL SECURITY

COVERING A MULTITUDE OF CRIMES

John M. Ehrlichman, former Chief Aide to the President of the United States, told the Senate Watergate Investigating Subcommittee that in his not too humble opinion, it was perfectly right and proper for the President to authorize his executive department employees to commit burglary.

The statement came during a discussion of the act of breaking and entering into the offices of Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist on Labor Day weekend in 1971. When the burglary was disclosed last April, it led to the dismissal of criminal charges against Ellsberg on the grounds of improper government conduct.

Ehrlichman maintained, however, that it was not improper conduct on the part of the government. To the contrary, the President of the United States has every right to approve such a burglary, and he cited a federal statute as proof of his assertion.

Senator Sam Ervin disagreed. "This statute has nothing to do with the burglary. It only says . . ."

Ehrlichman cut him off: "It has to do with the United States Constitution . . ."

"No, sir," thundered Senator Sam, "That's not the purpose of this statute. The Constitution takes care of itself. . . . This statute has only to do with the interception or the disclosure of wire or oral communications."

But Ehrlichman was adamant. He insisted that the statute made the Presidential power perfectly clear. Then there followed this exchange:

"Ervin: "Is it your opinion, then, that the President can authorize burglaries?"

Ehrlichman: "I submit that there is in (this statute) ample congressional recognition of the President's inherent constitutional powers . . ."

Ervin: "Well, Mr. Ehrlichman . . . the Fourth Amendment says the right of the people to be secure in their persons, their houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated."

Whereupon, all else having failed, the final argument was presented: It was okay for the President to authorize burglary if it was in the interests of National Security.

And, insisted Ehrlichman and his lawyer, who also got into the act, burglarizing the offices of a psychiatrist was done in the name of National Security. And none could gainsay . . .

* * *

On April 30, 1970, President Nixon appeared on national television and told the American people that since 1954 American policy had been to "respect scrupulously the neutrality of the Cambodian people." He said that for the five years prior to that time "neither the United States nor South Vietnam has moved against" North Vietnamese sanctuaries in Cambodia.

Even as he said those words, as the Pentagon now admits, American B52 bombers had been making raids on Cambodia; 3630 raids in which more than 100,000 tons of bombs had been dropped where the President said none had been dropped. American servicemen had also served, and died, in Cambodia before April 30, 1970. For fourteen months, the Pentagon, the State Department, and the White House kept secret these facts, even lying to parents and wives whose sons and husbands had been killed in Cambodia, telling them that the deaths had occurred in Vietnam, ordering field officers to forge the death records to back up the lies.

Pentagon spokesman Jerry Friedheim, who fed the lies to the press all those months, had an interesting observation. He said they "weren't smart enough to foresee" that one of those officers might disclose information about those secret bombings and the falsification of documents. They didn't anticipate that a certain Major Hal M. Knight would come home and tell how he had been ordered to falsify records in order to cover up the truth. In other words, intimated Friedheim, if they had been smarter, they would have told a different and less detectable set of lies.

Said columnist Tom Wicker: "This was a deliberate and knowing lie, broadcast in person to the American people by their President. Neither the claim that it was not really a lie but 'a special security arrangement,' nor the contention that other presidents have done it, is a justification; both are indictments of the 'security' mania that distorts national life. And this episode clearly calls into question the credibility of Mr. Nixon's television address of April 30, 1973 when he claimed innocence of wrongdoing in the Watergate matter."

So, we reach this official conclusion: It is permissible for the President and other high ranking officials in the Federal Government to lie to the people, if their lie can be classified as being in the National Interest!

* * *

Since Kissinger's first visits to Peiping and Moscow, there has been a scramble on the part of American based companies to engage in trade with the two Communist countries. However, a list of such companies is not released by any agency of the Federal Government because, they say, it is not in the National Interest for such a list to be published; for reasons of National Security, it is deemed inadvisable for the American people to know what companies and corporations they may be subsidizing with tax dollars in this industrialization of Russia and China.

Of course, anyone taking the time and effort to read the right publications, can compile such a list, questions of National Security to the contrary notwithstanding. And this is just what was done by people working with the Cardinal Mindzenty Foundation. In a supplement to the Mindzenty Report of June, 1973, it is stated that:

"Under the U.S. Department of Commerce's Export Administration Act, Section 7(c), the names of companies involved in trade with the Communists are to be kept in strict secrecy for 'national security' reasons. The only way anyone can find out which companies are involved is by carefully studying the financial columns and business publications.

"The following list was compiled from such publications as the New York Times, Barron's, Newsweek, Time, Washington Post, Chicago Tribune, Wall Street Journal and Moody's Industrials, and the Communist publications, the Daily Worker and Political Affairs."

Because we believe, as does the Cardinal Mindzenty Foundation, that it is in the National Interest of the people to know what companies and corporations are trading with or seeking trade with the Communist nations, we are publishing, with grateful acknowledgement of the research effort entailed, the original Mindzenty list as of June, 1973, plus some additional information obtained from other sources:

NEW EXPERIMENTS IN PROGRAMMING YOUR CHILDREN TO CONDITION THEM FOR LIFE IN THE NEW SOCIETY

"SAY IT ISN'T SO..."

We received a letter dated July 21, 1973. It began like this: "Dear Don Bell, tell us we are wrong. We began a naive study of PPBS when we knew nothing about it over a year ago. Our findings have led us to think almost exactly like your reports that I am now reading with a slight scare (it all may be true.) William Glasser has been in Wisconsin, addressed all public school teachers in WEA Convention last year. The "Schools Without Failure" principle is already incorporated in seven of our elementary schools. PPBS was targeted for here but under protest went to Dallas, Texas; Roy Ash is head of OMB (not approved by the Senate since this is only a 'minor' officer, ha.) The 10 Regional Divisions are in place by executive order, et al. Say it isn't so. What happens now?..." Signed by an American history teacher in Kenosha, Wisconsin.

There was one important misrepresentation in the letter, only a part of which is quoted. The writer referred to a "naive" study of PPBS which had been begun by their group, which calls itself "Kenoshans Concerned for Their Schools." We received a copy of that "naive" study; and we beg to differ with the writer; that study is in no sense naive; it is merely limited. It exposes the influence and power that PPBS exerts on public schools and in the educational field. It does not deal with the total impact and importance of PPBS, but confines itself to what PPBS is doing to the schools. As it should, since the study is directed to "Kenoshans Concerned for Their Schools." The article appeared in the November and December, 1972, issues of Immaculata Magazine, which is published by the Franciscan Marytown Press, Kenosha, Wis. (Yes, the church and private schools also have need to beware of PPBS). Here are important excerpts from that study:

A wave of change is roaring through the public school system in our country, though few Americans seem conscious of it. The transformation is sweeping through not only the structures, but the philosophy, spirit, methods and content of American education. It is amazing that changes so far reaching are taking place without the American people being made aware of their radical potential, and having had a chance to take a position and make known their will on the matter.

These radical changes had their immediate beginning back in 1965 when the U.S. Congress passed the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965... Title III of this Act called for a program of grants to set up "supplementary educational centers and services" in the States. The purpose of these centers would be two-fold: first, to stimulate and help the States provide "needed educational services not available in sufficient quantity or quality." Secondly, they would stimulate and help the States develop and establish educational programs to serve as models for regular and elementary school programs....

These (educational centers and services) are apparently all gathered together under a complex called "the Planning-Programming-Budgeting System" (PPBS). Each State board of education is to submit its plans for these educational centers and services, to the U.S. Office of Education for approval by the U.S. Commissioner of Education. The Commissioner, of course, as a condition for approving these grants, must see that there is fiscal control and fund accounting procedures to assure proper use of the funds. He is also to arrange for annual and other reports enabling him to determine whether the funds granted have been effectively used to improve the "educational opportunities" of the persons in the areas served. Data banks are to be set up enabling the Commissioner to check on the "correctness" of these reports....

Thus for the first time, with the introduction of PPBS, we have federal control of what programs will actually go into our public schools....

Thus for the first time, with the introduction of PPBS, we have federal control of what programs will actually go into our public schools....

... PPBS uses the philosophy of Benjamin Bloom. Bloom and several other psychologists and educators reportedly got together a decade ago and redefined the purpose of education as "behavior modification." The chief purpose of schools, in other words, is to change the behavior of the student. Bloom and his group decided the students' behavior had to be changed in three areas or "domains": 1) cognitive, 2) affective, and 3) psychomotor. In the "cognitive domain" the student must gain needed knowledge and learn to recall it. In the "affective domain" the student must learn the "right" attitudes, feelings and values about things. In the "psychomotor (action) domain" the student must learn the needed skills, arts, crafts, etc., including social and political action.

... If the government is to program the students with the "correct" values, attitudes and feelings, and keep a check on how these things are progressing, it will have to ask very personal questions.

This marks the first time... that the Federal Government has attempted to bestow on itself the right to program children with officially approved attitudes. By natural right, this responsibility belongs primarily to the child's parents. Parents in turn may delegate some of this responsibility to individual teachers, provided they are convinced of the latter's competence and integrity. But by what right does the Federal Government now step in and presume to tell the teachers they must inculcate in the students government-selected attitudes and values...? It's becoming clear that the name of the game is Mind Control.

Going a step further is Dr. William Glasser, psychologist... (who) is important because large numbers of programs based on his psychological and educational theory are reportedly coming out of PPBS "educational centers." Glasser holds that in our affluent society children no longer need to work for a living. As a result they are no longer searching for a goal, but for a role, an identity. The school must help them find their proper identity. Unfortunately, the identity Glasser gives students conflicts violently with the view of reality held by believing Christians.

So what we are getting is not merely a mammoth federally controlled education monopoly, but a mammoth, nationwide agency for mind control of our youth...

(End of quotation)

As an example of how new experiments in education are introduced by way of PPBS, we have a copy of a 29-page "Summary of the School Application for Participation in the Early Childhood Education Program," which has been introduced in the Burbank Unified School District, Burbank, California.

This program, which was adopted on July 19, 1973, by the Joaquin Miller School, introduces an "individualized diagnostic-prescriptive program" which includes parent education, attitude surveys of the pupils, attitude surveys of the teachers, elimination of graded report cards, remediation, medical and psychiatric treatment for pupils who "failed the screenings," etc. Implied but not specifically spelled out is parental permission for the school authorities to use drugs and other means to bring about "behavior modification" in the more difficult individual cases.

But the chief purpose of this particular program seems to be an attempt to "educate" the parents of elementary grade pupils, to get the parents to "go along with" the mind control methods being employed upon their children.

The promoters of PPBS have discovered a fundamental weakness when the control system is used in the public schools. The educationists have discovered that when they cannot gain control of the child in the early, formative years, it may be too late to condition the child and make of him the finished, end-product of their desires. The educationists insist that the one thing they cannot be sure of overcoming is the set of values that may have been instilled in the child by the parents during those first most impressionable years.

Hence, it is felt that if the educationists can get the parents to go along with them in their re-educational ventures, those early life values may be erased and new attitudes, feelings, actions and reactions built into the child's mind.

Project Head Start was one of the programs initiated to overcome this age barrier. But Head Start was not a real success. In the first place, it brought the "wrong class" of children into the clutches of the educationists. The children of "affluent, middle class families" were seldom enrolled in the Head Start program because it was felt that Head Start was designed for working mothers and needier families. But, more importantly, the children who were enrolled in Project Head Start were already too old to be easily conditioned; all of the already-implanted attitudes and feelings had to be erased from the child's heart and mind before the "comprehensive Child Development Program" could be started.

Recently, Harvard educationists believe that they have found an answer to the problem in an educational program designed by a Dutch psychologist. The following, from the Washington Post of July 7, 1973, tells the whole story. We reprint the article:

SUBURBAN SCHOOLS BEGIN TESTS OF CHILDREN AGED TWO WEEKS

(By Andrew Barnes)

Brookline, Mass.—For most of the babies born in this Boston suburb during the rest of this year, public school will start at the age of two weeks. It will not be the school of books and yellow buses, but an experimental program aimed at producing children who earn better grades six years later.

A baby's first introduction to this unusual education will be a new and thorough test of his mental and physical development, administered by a physician from Harvard Medical School. These tests will continue until the baby enters regular school.

The other major aspects of the experiment will be instruction for parents in how to do a better job of raising children. No one style of child rearing will be advocated. Rather, parents will be taught to understand the likely effects of what they are doing, and the possible alternatives.

The experiment was conceived when school officials found that even here, in a wealthy community where most children do well on tests and get into choice colleges, some children get to school at the age of six already in a "cycle of failure," and they never pull out of it. Brookline schools, for all their excellent reputation, did not make much difference for these children. Those who started behind, stayed behind. Attempts to prevent these school failures by starting children in school at four years of age, and then three years of age, like the national Project Head Start, have not proven consistently effective.

The Brookline Early Education Project, known here as BEEP, is focussing on even younger children, and on families instead of schools, as the result of research by Harvard educator Burton L. White. White's central conclusion is that a child who is six months behind at the age of three "is not likely ever to be successful in his future educational career."

The education of children in these earliest years is up to families, and yet "we do not prepare prospective parents to do the job of helping children acquire the foundation requirements for formal education," according to White.

Robert Sperber, Brookline's superintendent of schools, was persuaded by White's ideas, and the Carnegie and Robert Wood Johnson Foundations have given $750,000 for the first two years of what will be a five-year tryout of White's proposal.

And so, all over this town of 60,000 there are posters proclaiming "Give your child a good start. BEEP will help you, mothers and fathers, with diagnostic exams for your new baby, with educational ideas, and much more, free."

BEEP's medical aspect begins with an hour and 15 minutes of neurological tests. The physician follows an intricate pattern of stroking and thumping to test reflexes, clapping his hands and clicking his fingers to see the child react, pushing on the newborn's feet to see how strongly he pushes back. The doctor shines lights into the baby's eyes, spins him around to see whether the eyes can keep up with the body's motion. Changes in the baby's mood, from smiling to bawling, are also noted.

The reactions on these tests vary with age, and the tests are repeated every three months.

The Dutch physician who developed the test, Heinz Prechti, has been able to use it to identify problems of tiny infants that lead to later school failures, and the Harvard doctors hope to be able to duplicate Prechti's results.

To allay apprehensions, Dr. Melvin Levine assures parents their child cannot "pass" or "fail" the Prechti test. The results are intended to spot development peculiarities that may cause the doctor to suggest remedies to avoid later difficulties.

The examinations will also spot hearing loss and bad eyesight so they can be corrected before they become major obstacles to a child's learning.

The family instruction aspect of BEEP is of tremendous importance to the child's later school success, Professor White believes. "If the mother does a fine job in the pre-school years, subsequent educators, such as teachers, will find their chances for effectiveness maximized," White has written.

Teaching parents to do a better job means seminars with child development experts and other parents, home visits, and use of the BEEP facility, conveniently located next to a midtown shopping center.

The central theme of the seminars and home visits is assisting a parent in observing the child's development. As Martha Rogers, one of the home visitors, describes it, she begins a visit by asking what a baby has been doing. The mother's first answer is often, "Oh, nothing much." She is then able to elicit from the mother that the baby has used new words, or learned to handle new words, or learned to handle new situations. She also helps parents perceive how they are acting toward their baby.

The home visitor might make the parents aware of alternative ways of handling their child. To a mother who kept her infant in a playpen all day, it might be suggested that more varied surroundings would interest the baby and help it grow.

Rather than teaching any particular techniques, the visits and seminars will focus on the situations and problems of the individual families in each group. Simply providing someone to talk to about the problems of being a parent will be important in improving the job parents do, the BEEP organizers believe.

Parents are encouraged to drop in at the BEEP offices. There is a room where the mothers can sit and chat, a coffee pot down the hall and a playroom for older children. Educational toys can be borrowed, free, and there is a library of books about children and families. For many parents, this is the first exposure to the varied materials and ideas that are available.

If this all sounds a little formal and instructive, the parents more often see it as helpful and enjoyable. "Little things we can try with our babies," and assistance in understanding their development were welcomed by all the mothers present in the center recently.

All the children in BEEP will get the full diagnostic testing. They will be divided into three groups, at random, for the home visits and seminars. One group will cost $400 per child, one $800, one $1,200 varying according to the amount of followup the staff will provide. The foundation grants will meet all expenses. The intent is to find out how expensive such a program needs to be in order to be effective. Because BEEP is an experiment, voluminous records are kept, but nothing is written down that parents may not see. The program is voluntary, and so Professor White says potential charges of meddling in the private affairs of the family are not valid. "I have no desire to help any family that doesn't want to be helped."

Offering the program to all families in the community, not just to the poor, will make it more politically acceptable here, and possibly elsewhere, as well, White says.

If it works, BEEP has "an interesting potential for drastically altering the way public money is spent for education," White says. "I want to see if we can make a difference of real significance," he says. "We need to be able to show something fairly dramatic." Success will be measured in terms of standardized tests, and also by tests of capability and maturity in non-school areas. If a whole class of abler children and parents is indeed the result, teachers will have to be retrained, and the entire reading and arithmetic curriculum may have to be redrawn, according to Superintendent Sperber.

Plans call for 225 children in BEEP by next Jan. 1, with about 60 being black and Spanish speaking from Boston included, to create a more representative sample than the white affluent Brookline population.

The hope is that at least 100 will stay in the area for the next 6 years so their school success can be charted. They will be compared with a control group of children one year older who have not taken part in BEEP.

(End of article)

BEEP is an experiment, Brookline is the laboratory, the volunteering parents and the victimized children are the guinea pigs. In other cities other experiments are being conducted. Faceless psychotherapists, theorizing behavioral scientists and groping educationists are seeking the better method for creating a controlled environment in which childrens' behavior can be made to conform to a new set of standards dictated by this elite group which intends to produce "a new type of humanoid for a new type of society." And the cradle-to-grave monitoring of the activities and the minds of the American people seems essential to the success of the Builders of the New Order.

Cradle-to-grave monitoring is easier in a Communist Police State. The babies are separated from their parents at birth and are "conditioned" in a controlled environment for life in a controlled society. The women have been "liberated" and have equal rights; which include the right to share with men the privilege of digging ditches, building communal nurseries for children, or whatever the ruling elite commands. The women are free from the obligations accompanying the state of motherhood, because the State is the mother of them all. To produce this same society in America without using the bayonet is their Great Experiment.

THE GREAT FINANCIAL INVASION OF THE UNITED STATES

CHICKENS HOME TO ROOST

"Mr. Speaker," said Congressman Spark M. Matsunaga, Democrat from Hawaii, "as an American who has been mistaken for an Eskimo, an Indian, a Chinese, a Korean, and even a Japanese diplomat, I rise to express my gratitude for the vast majority of good and tolerant people in this our great country. I am prompted to do this because yesterday (Aug. 1), when a reporter asked Mr. John J. Wilson, the distinguished attorney for former White House aides H. R. Haldeman and John J. Ehrlichman, whether he thought that the questions put to Mr. Haldeman by Senator Lowell Weicker were fair, Mr. Wilson reportedly replied:

"Oh, I don't mind Senator Weicker, what I mind is that little Jap."

"By his ill-timed name-calling, Mr. Wilson could have been referring to the visiting Prime Minister from Japan, but he evidently was referring to my good friend and colleague from Hawaii, U.S. Senator Daniel K. Inouye."

The remainder of Rep. Matsunaga's speech is a defense of Americans of Japanese ancestry, especially of Senator Inouye, who is a veteran of World War II, was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, Bronze Star, Purple Heart, and "literally gave up his right arm in defense of his country." Thus, Lawyer Wilson's reference to "that little Jap" seemed as ill-advised as were many of the other statements he made while defending the former Palace Watch Dogs, Haldeman and Ehrlichman.

However, Rep. Matsunaga himself suggested, perhaps unconsciously, that there may have been a "Freudian slip" involved in the use of the ill-advised phrase. Mr. Matsunaga said Mr. Wilson "could have been referring to the visiting Prime Minister from Japan." But he also could have been referring to Kuranosuke Saito of Japan's Fuji Bank; to Koji Asai of Japan's giant Sumitomo Group of banking, mining and manufacturing interests; to Masaharu Matsushita of the gigantic electric industrial company of that name; to the godfather of the Mitsubishi multinational conglomerate; or to any one of the titular heads of the Zaibatsu (the Japanese name for those family-controlled corporations that supposedly were broken up after World War II.)

We know that Japanese-made products have virtually taken over the market in the United States in many categories. What is not so generally known is the extent to which the Japanese industrial, manufacturing and banking interests are moving into the United States and building plants in this country, or buying up existing American plants.

This Great Japanese Invasion is more than financial and industrial; it is also cultural. Last September, the Mitsubishi Group gave Harvard University one million dollars "to promote Japanese-American cultural understanding." A few weeks ago, Japan's giant Sumitomo Group gave Yale University two million dollars for the same stated purpose, and gave another one million to the New York-based Japan Society. An official of the Japan Society who did not wish to be identified, said there was every hope that the Sumitomo gift "could be, ah, refreshed at the end of five years, if the program is a success." And Koji Asai, who recently retired as president of the Sumitomo Bank, said, "Perhaps our gift will stimulate other contributions," from others of the Zaibatsu.

In the June 1973 issue of Finance, there is a most revealing article entitled "Those Imperial Japanese: The World Is Their Oyster." A sub-head to the article notes: "In just three years Nippon's moneymen have built the third largest international branch-banking system, rivalled only by those of Britain and the U.S. They already boast $20 billion in foreign exchange reserves, 300 overseas banking offices, $6.3 billion invested in banks abroad—including sizeable chunks of some top American institutions. At home, meanwhile, they've provided the rest of the world with one of the most dynamic capital markets in history. Rising sun? These days, it never sets on the Japanese banking empire.

Following are excerpts from the article appearing in Finance, June 1973, and written by Anthony Broy.

Once the private enclave of the British and Americans, international banking has a new face and an unfamiliar accent—Japanese. In Latin America, Africa, the Near East, in Southeast Asia, on the Australian, North American and European continents, U.K. and U.S. bankers are feeling the hot breath of competition—and the hot money of investment capital—from the banks of Japan...

“With the advent of the 1970s,” one financial commentator notes, “Japanese banks set up their most important strategic goal: to internationalize the content and scope of their operations.” Toward this objective, they have—in the span of just three years—established the world’s third largest overseas branch-banking system... Agencies, branches or representative offices can be found in cities as distant from one another as Djakarta, Toronto, Dusseldorf, Los Angeles and New York. Emulating Japan’s industrial and commercial firms... Fuji Bank, with $18.5 billion in deposits, has joined six multinational affiliates or associates in the Euro-Pacific Financial Corp. and the Asia-Pacific Capital Corporation, among others...

... prosperity literally forced Japan to break out of its cocoon and spread its wings internationally... national policy now decreed that the banks internationalize without reservation. Discarding its position that overseas banking should be the specialized preserve of a few selected institutions (primarily Bank of Tokyo), the government also abandoned restrictions on lending by overseas offices of Japanese banks and controls on the borrowing of Eurodollars and short-term funds. The result was a mushrooming of Japanese banks in most of the world’s financial centers...

Moreover, many big Japanese trust banks concentrate on projects involving concerns in their family groups, financing “sister company” joint-venture investments with foreign enterprises. Hence, Mitsubishi Trust, for example, is a principal supplier of financing for Caterpillar Mitsubishi, Mitsubishi Monsanto, and Mitsubishi TRW—all joint ventures with American companies. And it also supplied 10 percent of the capitalization of Diamond Lease Co., a three-way venture in equipment leasing with Chase Manhattan Mitsubishi Corp. and the Mitsubishi Bank...

Thus, in April 1972, Fuji and Sumitomo, along with three smaller Japanese banks, purchased 90,000 shares of First National City Corp., the holding company for Citibank. Then last June four more Japanese banks... acquired 100,000 shares of Chase Manhattan Corp. And this past February, Fuji, Dai-Ichi Kangyo and eight other Japanese banks purchased 100,000 shares of Bankers Trust New York Corp., on the open market for about $6.7 million.

(End of excerpts from article in Finance)

Of course, the Japanese are not alone in their eagerness to buy up pieces of American industry. The British, Germans, Swiss, and the oil-rich Arabs all are pouring money into the United States, buying up shares, real estate, factories, banks, whatever they can buy at bargain rates. An article written by Ronald L. Soble of the Los Angeles Times Service, indicates the extent of this “Buy America” spree on the part of foreign financiers and multinational expanders. We quote therefrom:

More and more American workers are awakening each day to discover that they have become employes of a company with headquarters in London, Geneva or Tokyo. Foreign investments are flooding into this country, brought on by a mass of largely unrelated international economic pressures. While U.S. companies still are expanding abroad, the direct investment pendulum has begun to swing the other way. Europeans, Japanese and others are wheeling and dealing to get a piece of the American pie. Arab interests are currently negotiating to acquire ownership in a number of U.S. oil companies in exchange for access to the Arabs’ massive oil reserves.

Japanese businessmen are investing heavily in real estate. In California alone, they have purchased several landmark hotels including the Sheraton-Palace in San Francisco.

Reports abound among New York investment bankers of European interest in U.S. companies — British, German, Dutch and Swiss interest, for example, in chemical, machinery, food, insurance and other industries. There are rumors on Wall Street that the giant Hitachi Ltd. of Tokyo is discreetly looking at possible acquisition of Magnavox Co.

Direct investment also includes building from scratch. Volkswagenwerk GA has expressed interest in constructing an assembly plant in the United States...

According to government figures, direct foreign money invested in U.S. plants and equipment amounted to $7.4 billion in 1961 and is expected to climb above $16 billion this year.

This compares to approximately $90 billion that this country has directly invested abroad, and the fact that the United States—the world's greatest industrial power—is becoming the target for foreign money is a concept difficult for many Americans to grasp.

Nevertheless, two devaluations of the dollar, $80 billion in excess cash in foreign hands and a depressed U.S. stock market have made American companies a bargain for foreigners—and have triggered the new economic invasion.

So far, the United Kingdom leads in investor interest, followed by Canada, the Netherlands and Switzerland. Richard C. King, executive director of the Los Angeles-based Center for International Business, estimates that Japan should eventually become one of the largest direct foreign investors in this country. (End of quotation).

"In an amazing surge of progress over less than half a decade, Tokyo has joined New York and London as an elite world financial capital—in the process outstripping in importance such older money centers as Paris, Frankfurt, and Zurich."

So stated Finance, a magazine of, by, and for the moneymen of the world. Pointing out that capital markets do not arise from, nor operate in, vacuums, that they thrive only in bustling economies, the unsigned article explained and predicted:

"In the late nineteen sixties and early seventies, Japan's manufacturing ingenuity, her low-cost production and aggressive marketing abroad, increased foreign exchange surpluses to eyebrow-raising levels, making the yen one of the world's most sought after and soundest currencies. Once in very short supply and heavily regulated, Japanese capital has now reached the cornucopia stage. Its vaults overfull, Japan has begun actively exporting capital.

"Tokyo is a reflection of Japan's economic prosperity, her political and social stability—characteristics indispensable to development of an international financial market. The world's most populated city and a nerve center of industry and commerce, Tokyo will be the funnel in decades to come through which Japanese capital will be channeled to deficit-capital institutions and countries. It is axiomatic that Tokyo's Kabuto-cho will become the Wall Street of the Asian economic sphere.

"In less than five years, Tokyo will have achieved these features of an international financial capital:

* a vibrant stock market, trading both domestic and foreign issues;

- * the presence of foreign brokerage houses and foreign branch banks in depth;
- * an active domestic and international investment banking market, including bond financing for governments and the private sector;
- * a private placement market;
- * a call market."

Before we attempt to "put the pieces all together" and arrive at any sort of conclusion, there is a "mystical" piece that must be fitted into the financial jig-saw puzzle. The following is from Time, August 13, 1973:

A MYSTIC AT THE IMF

Economists are often accused of indulging in mysticism; in the case of Hendrikus J. Witteveen (pronounced Wit-uh-vain) it is a simple statement of fact. A brilliant academic who twice was Finance Minister of The Netherlands. Witteveen is also a vice president of the Sufi movement, a muslim sect that is dedicated to mysticism and to meditation.

Last week the modest and withdrawn Witteveen, 52, got a job in which he will have need of inner peace: he was appointed managing director of the 125-country International Monetary Fund. That body must construct a new world financial system to replace the one that has been destroyed by dollar devaluations.

The Nixon Administration blocked reappointment of Witteveen's predecessor, Pierre-Paul Schweitzer, a Frenchman, because U.S. officials felt he had taken sides against the U.S. The monetary atmosphere, however, is becoming less testy. Last week an IMF committee representing 20 nations made much progress toward a consensus on outlines of a reformed system. Moneymen are optimistic that a written agreement on the bases of a new system can be approved at the IMF meeting next month. (End of article).

Now, let's put the pieces together, and see what kind of a picture we have:—

Early in the Twentieth Century international financiers and cartelists began to sense that national, political, governments were restricting their growth and "cramping their style." Noting that it was impossible to do away with national governments, they did the next best thing: They began to place their agents in important government posts and they began to work through national governments to attain their ends. At the same time they began planning for an eventual World Authority which would render National Governments obsolete.

First important step was the establishment of Central Banks to work with National Governments and take over the management of the Governments' monetary machinery. The Federal Reserve System was introduced in the United States by international financiers who came from Germany with that purpose in mind. Thus, the United States became a "Central Bank" Nation. Later, these Central Bankers would get together and create a World Bank.

Procedures varied in the different Nations, but here in the United States, the pattern is plain: Since they were working in and through the political machinery of the Government, it was necessary that the Federal Government have the money to expand its activities and services. Hence the Income Tax Amendment to the United States Constitution.

As a necessary second step, it was essential that the financiers and cartelists be able to use their money for the development of their programs and goals, rather than for the payment of income taxes. So, under the guise of doing good works, great tax-exempt Foundations were established.

Meanwhile, on the world scene, certain of the National Governments were becoming restive and uncooperative, and a so-called World War became advisable (and profitable for the financiers and cartelists.)

World War was useful for two other reasons: 1) It would be a giant step toward the eventual establishment of a World Authority that would render National Governments obsolete and 2) It would provide for the setting up of a new form of government under which economic considerations would become more important than political considerations.

Let us define our terms:

By a political system of government, we mean one which is concerned with protecting the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness of the citizens.

By an economic system of government, we mean one which is concerned with providing jobs, recreation, economic security, health, education, and welfare to its subjects.

As we are using these terms in this letter, a political system of government is one in which government is the servant of the people; while an economic system of government is one in which the people are servants of the government.

After World War I, the United States became the standard for political systems of government, while Communist Russia became the standard for economic systems of government.

World War II, the Cold War, the succeeding "limited wars" in Korea and Southeast Asia were Hegelian in progression: with the U.S. Government as the thesis and the Russian Government as the antithesis, there could evolve the synthesis: a World Authority in which economic considerations would supersede political considerations and make all National (political) Governments obsolete and unnecessary, and continuing to exist merely as administrative divisions of the World Authority.

Financial developments supplemented these political happenings. Working within and through the U.S. Government, the financial and cartel Elite began to develop and redevelop the world's industrial output. The dollar was declared to be "as good as gold" at Bretton Woods; U.S. dollars and American know-how were poured out upon the world. The inevitable result: American technology plus cheap foreign labor and reduced production costs drove U.S.-made products off the world markets. This led to the creation of mammoth multinationals which enriched the Elite but left America and Americans broke. Finally, the "good as gold" lie was phased out by way of devaluations.

Now it is time for the present financial system to be phased out. Bilderberger head Prince Bernhard has his man, the mystic, Witteveen, at IMF to bring in the New Order of Finance.

Concurrently, it is time for the traditional U.S. political system also to be phased out. Hence the wholesale attacks on politicians: McGovern, Eagleton, the Democratic Party; then Nixon and The Watergate, now Agnew and the hopes of the Republican Party in 1976.

The real cues came when OBM and PPBS were installed, with total accent on economics rather than politics. And the latest: Welfare Statist Attorney General Elliot Richardson announces that the Justice Department is to be "depoliticized." That freshly coined word should put the whole picture in better focus.

AND THEN COMES POLITICAL BANKRUPTCY

EVEN MASS MURDER TO PROTECT THE GUILTY?

On Sunday July 15, 1973 there appeared the first of a series of three installments of a most remarkable story, in the Seattle (Wash.) Post Intelligencer. Whether the story is true in all its details and aspects, we do not know. But we have heard of no libel suits, and there seems to be a general conspiracy of silence regarding the accusations made in the series of articles.

On the front page of the Sunday edition of the newspaper, there appeared the following four-column headline: "Plane Passengers Murdered To Protect Nixon, Say Two." A sub-heading explained:

"On Dec. 8, 1972, an airliner carrying convicted Watergate burglar E. Howard Hunt's wife, Dorothy, crashed as it was about to land in Chicago. Since then, claims of sabotage and murder have been receiving increasing national publicity. This is the first of three articles detailing the charges and, as far as they are known, the circumstances of the crash that killed 43 men, women and children. Reporter Mort Young spent weeks researching the story, interviewed the key accusers, Sherman Skolnick and Alex Bottos and many others, including a Justice Department agent described as being a 'hit man' with the alleged mission of killing Mrs. Hunt."

Following are excerpts from this sensational story:

* * * * *

It was a conspiracy, say Sherman Skolnick and Alex Bottos. They charge that United Airlines Flight 553, en route from Washington D.C. to Chicago, was sabotaged in order to murder a dozen passengers aboard the Boeing 737.

They had to be killed to protect Richard Nixon. They were to be killed, say Skolnick and Bottos, because they had joined forces to implicate the President in the Watergate affair and other illegal actions undertaken to insure his re-election.

At least four of the dozen, say the accusers, were blackmailing former Attorney General John Mitchell. At stake was a $40 billion deal with the Soviet Union to import Russian natural gas into this country. "And if 30 or 40 other people had to die with them," said Bottos, "they would. And they did."

"It's like the whole Ervin Committee gets on an airplane and the motors fall off," said Skolnick. "Oh yeah, an accident."

The destruction of Flight 553 involved a sweeping conspiracy, the two men say, to protect the President and Mitchell. There is another conspiracy to clinch the gas deal—"contrary to the foreign policy of this government," according to Bottos. "Sixty people in the Midwest have been killed or have disappeared," Skolnick asserted. He offered no details.

The two men have been making their charges for the past six months on radio talk shows and in the underground press. Partial accounts appeared in what Skolnick calls the "establishment press." (But) because lies are printed about him, he says, he no longer cooperates. Nevertheless, he and Bottos were interviewed. What they said, and their testimony at a June 13 hearing called in Chicago by the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) which investigates crashes, add up to a macabre super conspiracy involving federal agencies, the intelligence community, powerful corporate interests and the underworld.

That their claims have not been dismissed out of hand—except by the many the pair accuse—is based primarily on Skolnick's past successes.... Two Illinois State Supreme Court Justices resigned after he brought conflict of interest charges against them. Evidence he supplied led to the indictment and conviction on bribery charges of former Illinois Governor Otto Kerner. Another Skolnick probe brought about the redrawing of the state's election districts.... Skolnick (42, confined to a wheelchair and head of the Committee To Clean Up The Courts) contends that "in 10 years we've never been proved wrong. We're not infallible, just careful."...

Flight 553 had to be destroyed, according to their theory, because Mrs. Hunt was on the point of carrying out her jailed husband's threat to "blow the White House out of the water," Skolnick said, quoting Watergate "wireman" James McCord's statement to the Ervin Committee....

According to Skolnick, Dorothy and Howard Hunt were both CIA agents. Mrs. Hunt had documents with her on the plane "sufficient to impeach the President."... He also claims that natural gas company officials and others on board the flight were attempting to blackmail former Atty. Gen. John Mitchell....

NTSB and other aviation experts, including pilots, stress that no conclusions as to the cause of Flight 553's crash can be made at present. The evidence is still being evaluated. They believe the plane was not sabotaged. Nevertheless, the testimony given by Sherman Skolnick and Alex Bottos dealing directly with the last minutes of Flight 553 are being checked out.

"Sherman may not always reach the right conclusions," says a supporter of his. "But he always seems to have his facts straight. Every time."

(End of quoted excerpts from story in the Seattle Post Intelligencer)

So, now it appears that mass murder of men, women and children may have to be added to the list of crimes lurking in the slime and murk of The Watergate. It is true, perhaps, that even such a revelation would cause little shock to the benumbed body politic. There have been so many revelations of lawbreaking and corruption, lying and deceit that it would take a monstrous revelation of evil to really shock the American people. Furthermore, people have become so distrustful of their leaders that they will believe anything of them, or nothing of them. A kind of political bankruptcy has come upon the Nation, to such an extent that even a truthful statement from the President on his connection with Watergate would not bridge the credibility gap that separates the people from their federal administrators.

We recall an editorial that was published at the time it was revealed to the people that American B52s had been conducting bombing raids over Cambodia for years, and that the officials responsible had lied about it, and had ordered their underlings to file false reports so that the American people would not know about the raids. The editorial was headlined: "Nation's Had Enough Of Deceit After Deceit." The editor wrote, and it is fitting that we quote:

"Deceit has been such a standard practice from the very beginning of U.S. military involvement in Indochina that the revelation of American B52 raids into Cambodia prior to May 1970, hit with barely a thud." - Detroit Free Press.

The Free Press goes on to point out that the American people have been lied to about Indochina by the military and by at least the last three administrations. "There is a danger," says The Free Press, "that we could become so conditioned by official deceit that we would expect it, or at least not react to it. We must not allow that to happen."

Historically, and I speak only of this century, official deception has been a standard tool of international diplomacy and intrigue. It has brought on wars at frightful cost in blood and resources, and all without prior knowledge of the American people.

Example: On May 7, 1915, a German submarine torpedoed the Lusitania off the coast of Ireland with a loss of 1,198 lives. The Lusitania was a British (Cunard Line) passenger steamer carrying tons of munitions to England at a time when Great Britain and Germany were at war. Prior to the Lusitania's departure from New York, the German Embassy published a notice to prospective passengers in The New York Times warning that the ship's cargo consisted of contraband goods, and that passengers would travel at their own peril.

THE THEORY

It must be recalled that the United States was a neutral nation in 1915 when the British-owned Lusitania went to its doom in a war zone. President Wilson sent several notes of protest to Germany, causing the resignation of Secretary of State William J. Bryan, who considered the messages too severe. A wave of indignation over "German barbarism" swept the country, and helped condition the American people to our own involvement on April 6, 1917. It is now suspected that the Lusitania was cynically directed into the war zone by the British admiralty on the theory that its sinking would hasten the day when the United States joined Great Britain as an ally against Germany. If this theory defies credence, I suggest you read "Lusitania," a fascinating book by Colin Simpson.

EXAMPLE: In 1916, President Woodrow Wilson was re-elected President of the United States with the slogan: "He Kept Us Out of War." Within five months we were at war.

EXAMPLE: President Franklin D. Roosevelt without the knowledge of the American people, was using U.S. ships to patrol the North Atlantic for the British well before we were at war with Germany. This action was in direct violation of the Neutrality Act.

EXAMPLE: Assessments of the Vietnam War furnished Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson by Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara and Gen. Maxwell Taylor were excessively optimistic and completely unrealistic. At one point, McNamara was reassuring the White House that a number of combat troops would be home for Christmas....

EXAMPLE: In the Presidential campaign of 1964, President Johnson told the voters that he would not send American boys to Southeast Asia to do what Asian boys should be doing for themselves.... Within three months, Johnson was escalating the war in Vietnam.

EXAMPLE: On August 2-4 of the same year, it was reported that U.S. destroyers Maddox and C. Turner Joy had been attacked by North Vietnamese torpedo boats in the Tonkin Gulf. President Johnson ordered retaliatory action, and on August 7, the Congress approved the Tonkin Gulf resolution giving the president power to "take all necessary measures to repel any armed attack against the forces of the U.S., and to prevent further aggression." The country cheered, and Johnson used the Tonkin Gulf resolution to justify escalation in 1965.

Subsequent investigations disclosed that there was no substantial truth to the Tonkin Gulf attacks and, years later, an embarrassed Congress voted an amendment to repeal the resolution, and President Nixon signed the repeal into law on Jan. 12, 1971.

EXAMPLE: The Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO-1954) was perhaps the greatest deception of them all. Contrary to representations made by John Foster Dulles, John F. Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson and Richard M. Nixon, SEATO did not call for an automatic response to aggression in South Vietnam. SEATO provided only that in case of aggression, the signatory powers should act in conformance with their constitutional processes. This we never did.

THE RATIONALE

We come now to recent disclosures that the U.S. has been clandestinely bombing Cambodia since 1969, prior to our May 1970 troop incursion into that country. Yet Secretary William P. Rogers assured the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in early 1970 to this effect: "Cambodia is one country where we can say with complete assurance that our hands are clean and our hearts are pure. Our best policy is to be as quiet as possible, to avoid any action which appears to violate the neutrality of Cambodia."...

Incredibly, former Air Force Secretary Robert Seamans has stated he never knew that 3,630 raids by Air Force B52s had been secretly carried out over Cambodia for 14 months in 1969 and early 1970....

...Whereas the people should be given the truth, they are instead fed mouthfuls of government propaganda. The Vietnam involvement was a colossal deceit from the day of its inception, a deceit compounded by three Presidents. Even now, can we really be sure that it will end on August 15, the day Congress decreed that the bombing will cease?

Or will we see another "clean hands and pure hearts" deception?

(End of editorial, July 29, 1973)

Stronger editorials have been written, more and perhaps greater deceptions (such as the Pearl Harbor manipulation) could have been cited. But the amazing thing about this editorial is that it was written—and signed—by John S. Knight of the Knight newspaper chain. The source makes the message more impressive; when a recognized liberal lays aside political prejudices, charges both Republican and Democratic Administrations of the past and the present, with deceit and double-crossing of the people they are supposed to be representing, and "tells it like it is," then what he says carries a little more weight than usual.

And he is right to suspect more deceit in the alleged end of a war in Indochina. The Administration made it very plain that it was bowing to the dictate of Congress only as a matter of expediency. The bombers remain at their Thailand bases, but reconnaissance and observation planes will continue to fly over Cambodia, and should they be fired at, American bombers will start "defensive action." And, just to provide yet another loophole: the new Secretary of Defense, James Schlesinger, held a press conference to announce that the United States commitment to South Vietnam still exists "in a general way." He said that "if Hanoi were to make the mistake of outright aggression against South Vietnam, I think that the President would request support from the Congress and the American public; and in that event I believe he would have that support to the fullest." Which means, simply, that a kind of truce may exist but that actual war might break out all over again.

As for The Watergate, President Nixon has bumbled and fumbled so obviously, that one wonders if he assumes that "the President can do no wrong" and therefore cannot be held accountable; or is he so enmeshed in the weirs of Watergate that he'd rather sink than try to swim? He again took to the television to try to regain that confidence which the people have lost in him. He also offered sop to the printed media by issuing a special white paper. But Nixon was at his worst in both essays. The consensus: He defended the office of the Presidency, which is not under attack; it is the man, not the office, which is on the spot. Instead of explaining his part in The Watergate, he asked Americans to tell their Congress to quit investigating Watergate. As one editor wrote:

"The President who created an administration which produced the greatest White House scandal in American history pledged that, if Americans would just forget it, he would 'bring a new level of political decency. Sadly, we must conclude that this nation is no longer willing to trust blindly in the face of suspicious circumstances. . . . Watergate has gone too deep, and become too complex. . . . The speech won't do it; the tapes might."

But, the President isn't about to turn loose of those tapes. Originally, he promised that he would obey the dictate of the Court in the matter of releasing the tapes, either to Investigator Cox or to the Ervin Committee. But now he's broken another promise:

The President sent a young lawyer to the courthouse to present a new brief; one that said, no matter what the Judge decided, the President would hang onto those tapes as long as he, the President, decided to hang onto the tapes.

There is yet another side to this Watergate mess which is yet to be explored. With the Committee to Re-elect President Nixon on the spot and with several members of that committee liable to go to jail, corporation after corporation now comes forward to admit that amazing amounts of money were handed over to the re-election committee. Such contributions from corporations are illegal, but certain corporation heads seem anxious to "fess up" nonetheless. Vast sums also were contributed to the McGovern campaign fund, often by the same corporation that supported Nixon. They gave their donations to both parties. Why? A Manion Forum "Footnote of the Week" explained:

"Maurice Stans told the Senators investigating the Watergate burglary that as Treasurer of the Committee to Re-elect President Nixon, he collected more than $50 million from contributors. . . . What brings this big money in ever larger chunks is not the personal popularity of any particular candidate. Large contributions come directly or indirectly from businessmen who feel that they must pay tribute to the almost limitless power of any President of the United States to soften up or side-track any one of the thousands of Federal regulations that plague American business enterprises today. . . . Political campaign contributions are regarded as a form of insurance against the unforeseen obstacles that may pop up before the contributors as they thread their way through the growing thicket of bureaucratic rules and regulations that permeates our private enterprise system today. . . . This is what the Watergate mess is trying to tell us. I hope the Senators get the message."

In private life we call this paying protection money to the gangsters to prevent our business establishment from being wrecked. Is there any different name for it when Big Brother takes the place of the Godfather?

Two years ago one of our correspondents wrote of what was coming upon us, and said "virtually everyone will be forced to become a lawbreaker to survive." Then he added:

"Whether it be Babylon, Greece, Rome, France, Germany, England or the early American colonies, history tells us this is the inevitable course of the low road of bureaucratic intervention. Attempts to gain prosperity at the expense of individual freedom has always ended in the loss of both. The ultimate end is moral, economic and political bankruptcy, the inevitable receiver for which is a dictator of some type."

Is there an alternative? 28 years ago we stood on the deck of the U.S.S. Missouri on the occasion of the end of a great war, and we heard a great American say: "The problem is basically theological and involves a recrudescence and improvement of human character that will synchronize with our almost matchless advances in science, art and literature, and all material and cultural developments in the past two thousand years. It must be of the spirit if we are to save the flesh."

28 years later, the answer remains the same.

RESTRUCTURING THE FEDERAL REGENCY

"JUST CALL ME EXCELLENCY"

It came as no surprise whatever to observers of the Washington scene when Herr Doktor Henry A. Kissinger was awarded the title of Secretary of State, William P. Rogers having dutifully resigned to make the nomination possible. It was merely a matter of timing: Rogers wanted to quit months ago but was told to occupy the office until the propitious moment had arrived, even as Herr Kissinger had been told that he must first rebuild those bridges between the United States and Europe and Japan, the bridges which he had burned while playing up the friendship of the U.S. Government for the governments of Russia, China and Israel.

So, Kissinger was able to announce that in his conduct of the foreign policy of his country of residence, he would play no favorites. He was duly proud of the fact that only in the United States could a man of alien birth achieve such a position of responsibility and authority. He would not give up his former post; he would maintain an office in the White House while at the same time taking over the office of Secretary of State, and moving a part of his personal staff to the new building.

While remaining as a personal aide where he might give advice and consent to the President of the United States on matters large and small, he would be in a position to speak for the President—even on matters related to The Watergate—before appropriate Congressional Committees; except that, he would never disclose to anyone the subject matter of any conversations between the President and himself or any other conferee or conversationalist. In other words, Henry Kissinger will tell Congressmen anything they want to know if he, Kissinger, wants them to know it.

In this age when political scientists are replacing politicians as managers of our country and its people, the rise of Henry Kissinger has been meteoric. Kissinger had been brought to the United States by his father, a German-Jewish political refugee from the Hitler regime. While yet a student at Harvard, the young Kissinger became a protege of Nelson Rockefeller. Taken into the headquarters of the Council on Foreign Relations for special training, he soon became known as an expert on foreign affairs. He worked hard for the nomination of Nelson Rockefeller and the defeat of Richard Nixon but, after the latter became President, Henry Kissinger was almost immediately appointed Nixon's top adviser on National Security. And he is one of the very few remaining original appointees of President Nixon, the rest having resigned for personal reasons, having been asked to resign for political reasons, or having been caught in The Watergate Dragnet.

Once Kissinger's position was established in Washington, he set up what amounts to a parallel government under his own personal control, with a staff of 110 people working for him.

The eminent researcher Frank Capell noted that "Kissinger, along with a number of his associates, was known in intelligence circles to be a security risk...thus we now have a security risk in charge of our national security." Capell confirmed that the emotionally unstable Communist, Daniel Ellsberg was a personal protege of Henry Kissinger. Kissinger recruited Ellsberg as one of a special panel of foreign policy experts selected to formulate an Indochina policy for Richard Nixon. Capell also insists that Kissinger approved the plans for the burglarization of the office of Ellsberg's psychiatrist; the break-in being designed to provide an excuse for throwing the case against Ellsberg out of court.

Perhaps we are suggesting guilt by association, but the name of Rand Corporation comes to surface out of this maze of coincidences:

The Indochina war was a Rand Operation, in that Vietnam became a laboratory for the study of psychopolitical warfare techniques, as well as for the operational testing of PPBS (Planning, Programming, Budgeting System), which was to be introduced into every phase of our national life as a psychopolitical management system.

Daniel Ellsberg was employed at Rand, and it was from this same Rand that he stole the so-called "Pentagon Papers." And it was Henry Kissinger who allegedly entered into a contract with Rand Corporation to prepare a report on "the feasibility of restoring political, economic and cultural relations with Cuba" (one of the first acts to be expected from the new Secretary of State after his confirmation by the Senate—this latter being a foregone conclusion.) Kissinger had other dealings with Rand; one of them being a study of how the anti-Communist government of Brazil might be made to fall without seeming to have been pushed.

These references to Rand Corporation are important because this is the think tank that developed the managerial control system (PPBS) which is designed to provide a new form of government for a new society; a government by management specialists and political scientists who are agents of The Elite. This is a control system under which all elected officials (even Presidents and Vice Presidents, to say nothing of Governors and Mayors when their time comes), are to be denigrated and even disgraced; while selected specialists such as Henry Kissinger and Roy Ash, Eliot Richardson and Caspar Weinberger, George Shultz and Arthur Burns, and others of their ilk, are to be exalted and placed in positions of real authority as agents of The Elite.

The Rand Corporation assumes further importance when we recall that Communist Ellsberg was placed there, and protected by Henry Kissinger, both of whom are members of that secret government cabal known as the Council on Foreign Relations. Also: another of Kissinger's close associates is Helmut Sonnenfeldt, who has accompanied Kissinger on his trips to Communist countries. Sonnenfeldt has been accused of transmitting secret State Department information to agents of both Israeli and Soviet Intelligence, and while J. Edgar Hoover lived, an open-and-shut case against him was prepared by the FBI. But William P. Rogers, retiring Secretary of State and then Attorney General, refused to prosecute Sonnenfeldt on the grounds that such prosecution would result in revealing information which might be embarrassing to the United States. Interestingly, Helmut Sonnenfeldt has recently been nominated as Under Secretary of the Treasury. In this position, he would be in charge of the financing of U.S. trade with Communist countries.

Interesting too, at about the time Sonnenfeldt's case was being quashed and Daniel Ellsberg was being moved into Rand Corporation, the English Intelligence Digest reported that the Soviet Secret Police (KGB) had penetrated the staff of Rand.

In his first press conference after having been named as the future Secretary of State while at the same time remaining in the position of Richard Nixon's alter ego, the correspondents asked him how he should now be addressed, and Kissinger quipped: "Just call me Excellency."

THE NEW EXECUTIVE ORDER

However, the "excellention" of Henry A. Kissinger is just one phase of a multifaceted restructuring program that has been transpiring while we the people were being bemused by the Watergate disclosures, and confused by Phase Four of the progressive economic dictatorship under which we are forced to exist.

Tucked in between his seven crises, Nixon had several dreams. He wanted to be the man responsible for establishing the guaranteed annual income for his subjects. But a dispute over terms and agencies between his assistants and the Congress, caused this dream to remain unfulfilled.

He wanted to redesign and redirect the Presidential Cabinet structure. Specifically, he wanted to do away with the Departments that rendered services to the people, and replace them with Departments that managed things for the people (while at the same time managing the people, too.) His plan called for, to use his own words:

"A Department of Community Development, a Department of Natural Resources, a Department of Economic Affairs, and a Department of Human Resources... to replace the present Departments of Interior, Commerce, Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare, and Housing and Urban Development, and Transportation. And the Department of Agriculture would be streamlined... Several Federal agencies would be drawn into the consolidation process as appropriate."

Since Cabinet Secretaryships needs must have the advice and consent of Congress, Nixon did not dare to restructure the entire Cabinet setup without first obtaining Congressional approval. Most of his restructuring moves could be set in motion by the issuing of an Executive Order; but not this revolutionary change in the structure of the Executive Branch. Twice President Nixon asked Congress for the authority to begin restructuring the Cabinet Departments. But this was one place where Congress was unyielding.

It was a part of Nixon's plan to establish these four new Departments and then have them operate at the State and local levels through the ten Federal Regional Councils which he had already established by his Executive Order No. 11647 of February 10, 1972. However, since he could not change the Cabinet setup, he was forced to change the Federal Regional Councils setup. And this is what this new Executive Order No. 11731 of July 23, 1973, is all about. The principal changes: The Agriculture Department is brought in as part of the Regional Governance system, and the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget is made dictator over them all.

Congressman John Rarick of Louisiana is either the only Congressman in Washington who fully understands the Regional Governance danger, or the only Congressman in Washington who has the courage to speak out against what he calls "Regional Government by Executive Order." On July 30, he had inserted in the Congressional Record the following explanatory remarks:

On February 10, 1972, President Nixon signed Executive Order 11647, titled "Federal Regional Councils," and embarked this Nation on a course of regional government, dividing the country into 10 Federal regional districts. At the time, I remarked in the Record of-

"The vast powers which, without congressional approval... placed in the hands of the President and his heads of departments and agencies (control) over food supply,

EXECUTIVE ORDER 11731

Amending Executive Order No. 11647 Relating to Federal Regional Councils

On February 10, 1972, I formally established Federal Regional Councils for each of the 10 Federal Regions, and established an Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations to strengthen and improve services to the public at the regional level. I have now determined that the mandate of the Federal Regional Councils should be broadened to include the coordination of direct Federal program assistance to State and local governments (as well as grant assistance as now provided), that the membership of the Councils and the Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations should be changed, and that the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget should be substituted as Chairman of the Under Secretaries Group in place of the Associate Director of that agency.

Now, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America, sections 1, 2, and 3 of Executive Order No. 11647 of February 10, 1972, are amended to read as follows:

Section 1. Federal Regional Councils. (a) There is hereby continued a Federal Regional Council for each of the ten standard Federal regions. Each Council shall be composed of the principal regional officials of the Departments of Labor, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, Agriculture, the Interior, and Transportation, the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

The President shall designate one member of each such Council as Chairman of that Council and such Chairman shall serve at the pleasure of the President. Representatives of the Office of Management and Budget may participate in any deliberations of each Council.

(b) Each member of each Council may designate an alternate who shall serve as a member of the Council involved whenever the regular member is unable to attend any meeting of the Council.

(c) When the Chairman determines that matters which significantly affect the interests of the Federal agencies which are not represented on any such Council are to be considered by the Council, he shall invite the regional director or other appropriate representative of the agency involved to participate in the deliberations of the Council.

Sec. 2. Functions of the Council. The Federal Regional Council shall be constituted as a body within which the participating agencies will, under the general policy formulation of the Under Secretaries Group, and to the maximum extent feasible, assist State and local government by the coordination of the Federal program grants and operations through:

- (1) the development of better ways to deliver the benefits of Federal programs over the short term;
- (2) the development of integrated program and funding plans with Governors and local chief executives;
- (3) the encouraging of joint and complementary Federal grant applications by local and State governments;
- (4) the expeditious resolution of conflicts and problems which may arise between Federal agencies;
- (5) the evaluation of programs in which two or more member agencies participate;
- (6) the development of more effective ways of allocating Federal resources to meet the long-range needs of State and local communities;
- (7) the supervision of regional interagency program coordination mechanism; and
- (8) the development of administrative procedures to improve day-to-day cooperation on an interagency and intergovernmental basis.

Sec. 3. Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations. The Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations is hereby continued and shall be composed of the Under Secretaries of Agriculture, the Interior, Labor, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, and Transportation, the Administrator of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, the Deputy Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Deputy Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, an Associate Director of the Domestic Council, and the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, who shall serve as the Chairman of the Group. When the Chairman determines that matters which significantly affect the interest of Federal agencies which are not represented on the Group are to be considered by the Group, he shall invite an appropriate representative of the agency involved to participate in the deliberations of the Group. The Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations shall, consistent with the objectives and priorities established by the President and the Domestic Council, establish policy with respect to Federal Regional Council matters, provide guidance to the Councils, respond to their initiatives, and seek to resolve policy issues referred to it by the Councils. The Under Secretaries Group, under the Chairmanship of the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, shall be responsible for the proper functioning of the system established by this order.

Richard Nixon.

The White House, July 23, 1973.

money and credit, transportation, communications, public utilities, and other facets of the lives of our people. (Congressional Record, Feb. 16, 1972)."

This EO divided the United States into 10 separate and distinct Federal regions, to be administered and controlled by 10 Federal Regional Councils. All the administrators are appointed and serve at Executive pleasure and are not subject to voter approval. Additionally, Congress has no review of the activities of these regional functionaries.

The power of the Federal Regional Councils was recently extended and amended by Executive Order 11731 issued on July 23, 1973. Under the new order, the Departments of Agriculture and the Interior are now "regionalized." Other changes will be noted in the new Executive Order (which is reprinted in this letter-Ed.)

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) set up the groundwork for the 10-region concept. Congress, in drafting the legislation establishing the ACIR, exempted this important Commission from legislative oversight. The ACIR is, therefore, sheltered from congressional inquiry into its activities and spending of taxpayers' money. The voters have no investigative powers over the Commission which takes credit for laying out the controversial 10 standard Federal regions....

It is interesting to note that the chairmanship of the regional government bureaucrats is under the control of the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget, another agency not under congressional oversight.

Regionalization of our sovereign States with control centralized in Washington will inevitably reduce the status and power of State governments. The impact of "regional government" by Executive Order has a far-reaching and revolutionary effect on the ideal of "government by laws rather than men."

(end of quotation)

Having concluded that the proposed Cabinet restructuring job was impossible during this Administration's tenure, it was decided to "make do" with what was at hand and was possible without further Congressional authority. So, Executive Order 11731 was signed and given the power of law.

And, just as soon as EO 11731 was signed, the powers began to move. Cloaking the program as "home rule" and "returning the power to the people," all those dreams that Nixon had dreamed (or had been told that he had dreamed) and had been laid aside, now began to assume the potentiality of reality. The following article is sufficient evidence of our contention:

NIXON AIM-SHIFT FEDERAL AID TO THE PEOPLE

By Robert S. Boyd
Miami (Fla.) Herald
Washington Bureau Chief

President Nixon's advisers are preparing a broad package of programs to help low-income Americans pay for food, shelter, education, health and other necessities of life. It tentatively includes such things as:

- *Housing vouchers, rather like food stamps, that poor or elderly people could use to help pay their rent or mortgage payments.
- *A national health insurance plan, with the government picking up part or all of the premiums for lower-income people.
- *A more generous food stamp program to help poor people meet the soaring cost of groceries.
- *A greatly expanded system of federal scholarships to help middle and lower-income families send their children to college.
- *A new federally financed welfare system that will guarantee all families a minimum standard of living.

The proposals, now being refined in the cabinet-level departments, will go to the White House for Nixon's approval this fall.

... Chief architects of the new programs are (Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Caspar) Weinberger and James T. Lynn, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. Their two huge departments handle the bulk of the domestic aid operations of the federal government. Under an earlier White House reorganization plan, since scrapped, Weinberger was to be the government's over-all "human resources" coordinator, and Lynn was to supervise all "community development" projects.

The Weinberger-Lynn proposals will be the core of the Nixon Administration's substitute for President Johnson's "Great Society" and "War on Poverty." (end of quotation.)

Revenue Sharing, PPBS, Federal collection and disbursement of all tax monies; these assure economic slavery when the regime's restructuring has been completed.

WHAT REALLY HAPPENED ON THE "WATERGATE" PLANE?

THE SETTING

On December 8, 1972, an airliner carrying Dorothy Hunt, wife of the convicted Watergate burglar, E. Howard Hunt, crashed as it was about to land in Chicago. Since then, claims of sabotage and murder have been receiving increasing national publicity.

In our Don Bell Reports No. 33, August 17, we quoted excerpts from a three-part story that had been published in the Seattle Post Intelligencer. We had no intention of delving any deeper into that sensational story.

However, the "underground" Los Angeles Star, August 27, carried an "exclusive" article announcing that the Watergate Plane is now the subject of a Congressional investigation, as a result of the charges made by Sherman Skolnick, Chairman of the Citizen's Committee to Clean Up the Courts.

Since this alleged murder and sabotage may become a front-page story in metropolitan dailies in the near future, it seems appropriate that we should tell "the rest of the story" before it becomes bent and twisted by professional "cover-up" artists. We have a copy of the original charges, as written in narrative form by Sherman Skolnick, whose investigative work led to the Congressional inquiry. We shall publish his charges. But, first, here are excerpts from the article which appeared in the Aug. 27 issue of the Los Angeles Star:

EXCLUSIVE!

By David A. Collins

Congressman Jack Brooks (D-Texas), chairman of the powerful Governmental Activities Committee announced that his committee is looking into the plane crash which took the life of Dorothy Hunt, Watergate payoff woman and wife of Watergate conspirator E. Howard Hunt. Brooks, according to an Earth News press release dated August 3, said his committee was looking into charges that the December 8 crash near Midway airport in Chicago was the result of sabotage.

Brooks also revealed that Congresswoman Cardiss Collins (D-Ill.) was on his Governmental Activities Committee. Congresswoman Collins is the widow of former Congressman George Collins who died on the United Airlines flight 553 crash last December. Mrs. Collins was recently elected to fill the seat vacated by her husband's death.

... Over the July 4th holiday when most of Washington was vacationing, members of the Brooks committee staff were working overtime. (Sherman) Skolnick and Alex Botos, a key witness to the valuables and documents stolen from the Watergate plane, asked for and received a conference with staff members of the Governmental Activities Committee....

(End of quotation)

Of his Citizen's Committee and the work it has done, Mr. Skolnick wrote:

"The Committee is a not-for-profit, public interest research group devoted to investigation and research into corruption and related matters. Our credential: Among the matters opened up by us -

"(a) Illinois Supreme Court mess where half the court resigned in the wake of our charges (1969); (b) forcing the government to prosecute Judge Otto Kerner, former Governor of Illinois and federal appeals judge, of bribery, perjury, and extortion. Chicago news media called the Committee a 'liar' when the charges were first made in 1969. The media offered no apology upon Kerner's conviction. The government prosecuted Kerner on less than 1% of what we accused him of.

"(c) The Committee educates the public on how to identify and expose government agents-provocateurs involved in creating chaos, such as setting the stage for martial law, including the 'Chicago 7'; (d) research on political assassinations in the U.S. and helping to clear black secret service agent Abraham Bolden, sent to jail on a frame-up because he tried to tell the Warren Commission that President Kennedy was murdered with the help of the C.I.A. (e) Identifying public officials linked to gangsters by business deals. (f) 100 million dollar bankruptcy scandal, opened up by us December 1970, and still unresolved, involving both U.S. Senators from Indiana, and the Chief Federal District Judge and another District Judge of the Indianapolis Federal Court. The specific details take up 21 pages in the Congressional Record, April 25, 1972, pp. E4255 to E4275." (End of quotation).

Following is Sherman H. Skolnick's statement, as it was originally published in The Utah Independent, a subscription weekly, $6 per year, 2459 Major Street, Salt Lake City, Utah 84115.

* * * * *

SABOTAGE OF THE WATERGATE PLANE

1. THE PEOPLE. Upwards of twelve persons connected in one way or another with Watergate, boarded United Air Lines flight 553 on the afternoon of December 8, 1972. They had something in common. That week there had been a gas pipeline lobbyists meeting as part of the American Bar Association meeting in Washington, D.C. It was conducted by Roger Moreau. His secretary was Nancy Parker. Among those attending were Ralph Blodgett and James W. Krueger, both attorneys for the Northern Natural Gas Co. of Omaha, Neb. Associated with them were Lon Bayer, attorney for Kansas-Nebraska Natural Gas Co.; Wilbur Erickson, president, Federal Land Bank in Omaha. This was a belligerent group determined to blow the lid off the Watergate case. Reason: Former U.S. Attorney General John Mitchell, and his friends running the Justice Department, were putting the spear into Northern Natural Gas. Some officials of that firm and its subsidiaries were indicted on federal criminal charges, September 7, 1972, in Omaha, Chicago, and Hammond, Indiana. Charge: bribery of local officials in Northwest Indiana and Illinois in order to let the gas pipeline go through. (Chicago Daily News 9/8/72.) To blackmail their way out of these charges, the Omaha firm had uncovered documents showing that Mitchell, while U.S. Attorney General in 1969, dropped anti-trust charges against a competitor of Northern Natural Gas—El Paso Natural Gas Co. The dropping of these charges against El Paso was worth $300 million. A spokesman for Mitchell belatedly claimed, in March 1973, that Mitchell had "disqualified" himself in 1969, because Mitchell's law partner represented El Paso. The Justice Department, under Mitchell, dropped the charges. Period. About the same time Mitchell, through a law partner as nominee, got a stock interest in El Paso. Gas and oil interests, such as El Paso, Gulf Resources, and others, contributed heavily to Nixon's spy fund, supervised by Mitchell.

Pipeline official Krueger was carrying the Mitchell documents on the plane. He had told his wife that he had in his possession irreplaceable papers of a sensitive nature. For months after the crash his widow demanded United Air Lines turn over to her his briefcase. It later came out in the pipeline trial in Hammond, that Blodgett had been browbeating federal officials, to drop the criminal charges—just prior to the crash. (Chicago Tribune, 5/18/73).

Dorothy Hunt, Watergate payoff woman, who offered executive clemency directly on behalf of Nixon to some of the Watergate defendants, was seeking to leave the U.S. with over $2 million in cash and negotiables that she had gotten or stolen from CREEP (Committee to Re-Elect the President.) She and her husband, E. Howland Hunt, the Watergate conspirator, were a "C.I.A. couple," two agents "married" and living together. Early in December 1972, both were threatening to blow the lid off the White House if (a) he wasn't freed of the criminal charges and (b) they didn't both get several million dollars. (See memo of Watergate spy James McCord before the Ervin Committee, N.Y. Times 5/9/73). Hunt claimed, according to McCord, to have the data necessary to impeach Nixon. McCord said matters were coming to a head early in December 1972. Mrs. Hunt was unhappy with her job of going all over the country to bribe defendants and witnesses in the bugging case. She wanted out. Mrs. Hunt was on the way to arrange to take her money out of the country, possibly Costa Rica (Vesco), through Harold C. Carlstead, whose wife was Mrs. Hunt's cousin. Carlstead does accounting and tax work for mobster businesses in the Chicago area. He operates two Holiday Inn motels in Chicago's south suburbs—at 174th & Torrence, Lansing, Ill.; at 171st & Halsted, Harvey, Ill. Carlstead's motel on Torrence is a favorite hangout for gangsters and dope traffickers such as "Cool" Freddie Smith, Grover Barnes, and the late Sam DeStefano, to name a few. Mrs. Hunt had (aa) $10,000 in untraceable cash, (bb) $40,000 in so-called "Barker" bills, traceable to Watergate spy Bernard Barker, and (cc) upwards of $2 million in American Express money orders, travelers checks, and postal money orders. (Testimony before the N.T.S.B., June 13-14, 1973). Carlstead issued a fake "cover" story that (she had only) $10,000—a story swallowed by the establishment press.

Mrs. Hunt got on flight 553 with Michele Clark, CBS network newswoman (who was going) to do an exclusive story on Watergate, Mrs. Hunt, Mitchell and Nixon. The story could have destroyed Nixon at the time. Ms Clark had lots of insight into the bugging and cover-up through her boyfriend, a C.I.A. operative. In the summer of 1972, prior to any major revelations of Watergate, Ms Clark tried to pick the brains of Chicago Congressman George Collins, regarding the bugging of the Democratic headquarters (Testimony 6/14/73 of Cong. Collin's public relations director.)

After the crash, Michelle Clark's employer, CBS network News, ordered and demanded that her body be cremated—possibly to conceal foul play.

Also on the plane were four or more people who knew about a labor union that had given a large "donation" to CREEP to head off an indictment of a Chicago labor hoodlum (matter currently being investigated by the Committee.)

For many years, like clockwork, one Chicagoan went to Washington on Monday and came back Friday afternoon on flight 553 or its equivalent: Lawrence T. O'Connor, Apt. 5C, 999 N. Lake Shore Drive, Chicago. On Friday, Dec. 8, 1972, he received a call from someone he knows in the White House telling him not to take 553 but to go instead to a special meeting.

Also getting on flight 553 was a "hit-man," pursuing Mrs. Hunt and others, and going under the "cover" of being a top narcotics official with DALE (Drug Abuse Law Enforcement). He used the name Harold R. Metcalf. He is an unusual "narc;" he works directly for Nixon. Metcalf told the pilot he was packing a gun, and so Metcalf was assigned seat B-17, near the stewardesses jump seat and also near the food galley and the rear door. After the crash, he walked out of the cracked open fuselage wearing a jumpsuit. A former Military Intelligence investigator, who used his credentials to get into the crash site identified the person posing as "Harold Metcalf" as an overseas C.I.A. parachute spy (Testimony, N.T. N.T.S.B. 6/14/73). Also see Metcalf's statement about being a "narc" and his gun, (N.T.S.B. Docket SA-435, Exhibit 6B, p. 17, surviving passenger statements). Metcalf evidently supervised certain foul play, possible cyanide, directed at certain passengers, but he didn't know of the over-all plan. One of our staff investigators confronted Metcalf about a week after the crash: (a) Metcalf, supposedly a government narcotics bigshot, knows nothing about dope. (b) In response to our question, "Did you know the plane was sabotaged?" he blurted out half a sentence: "It was not supposed to..." Turning purple, he then left the room. Evidently, he was a double cut-out, an espionage term for an operative to be himself eliminated by someone else. His survival was an oversight. (Testimony, N.T.S.B., 6/13-14/73).

2. THE PLANE. To do a proper job in sabotaging a plane, you have to know its weaknesses. This particular Boeing 737, N9031U, had chronic trouble, in the month preceding the crash, with its Captain's altimeter and its air data computer—two of the most important instruments on the plane. (N.T.S.B., Docket SA-435, Exhibits 11A, 11B, 11C, maintenance data). The Captain's altimeter, for example, must operate at 28 volts D.D. (Exhibit 9C, page 7). An increase in amperage or voltage in the electrical system would cause the instruments to malfunction.

The plane was delayed in departure by about 10 to 15 minutes; enough time for a skilled person to strip down the bus bar at a certain point and install a device that shorts out upon descent. The government's own records show the later manifestation of this. In the last 15 minutes of flight, circuit breakers began popping in the cockpit, causing the tail flight recorder, the aid data computer, and other instruments to short out. The transcript of the sole surviving record, the tape of the Cockpit Voice Recorder, shows this from the intra-cockpit discussion. (Exhibit 12A).

Capt.: "Sounds to me a circuit breaker, perhaps."

2nd Officer: "Hah?"

Unidentified Voice: (Deleted, probably by the FBI).

Capt.: "Yeah, I just meant, I thought you'd check everything, ah." (The Cockpit Voice Recorder, when found was turned over to the FBI.)

Flight 553 needed its instruments; visibility was 1 to 2 miles, ceiling varied from 400 to 600 feet, with some low clouds, as low as 100 feet. As for the National Weather Service, their Runway Visual Range Recorder wasn't working. (Exhibit 5K.)

A major radio navigational instrument is the airport outer marker, also called by the street name it's on. The outer marker at Midway Airport is in the vicinity of 87th & Kedzie, and is called by some the Kedzie localizer. The Midway Airport outer marker stopped working as 553 approached it....

3. SOME OF THE INTENTIONAL BLUNDERS ON THE GROUND:

(a) In the last 15 minutes of flight 553 its speed was erratic. It was being watched by some of the most sophisticated radar equipment and computers in the world. Yet, although they claim they told him to slow down, after 23 sweeps of the radar he was still going 210 knots per hour. He was being watched by Chicago Approach Control, O'Hare Airport (15 radar sweeps per minute).

(b) The approach controller later admitted he had forgotten to give 553 approach clearance. The 553 crew thought they were in a holding pattern.

(c) They steered 553 in behind a propellor plane, Aero Commander N309VS, and caused 553 to drastically close the gap between them.

(d) They stopped watching 553 from O'Hare too soon (called a premature hand-off). Midway does not have precision radar.

(e) In violation of regulations, they were working two planes for the same runway at the same time — 553 and the Aero Commander.

(f) Although there was only about a 6 mile an hour wind, they told 553 to go to runway 31 Left, having no glidescope, an important navigational aid giving altitude and azimuth....

4. THE AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS paid no attention to the fact that 553 had (a) too much velocity, (b) too fast a descent, and (c) was far off course.

5. WITH CIRCUIT BREAKERS CLICKING, and instruments malfunctioning, the cockpit crew of 553 tried to switch to standby power.... Eleven witnesses on the ground said 553 had no lights!

6. In the first five minutes and the last five minutes of flight the pilot is supposed to be flying the plane. But: in the last few minutes before the crash the co-pilot (1st officer) and 2nd officer were flying. This supports the contention that the pilot was dead or disabled (from poisoning or other foul play).

7. Because of the instruments malfunctioning and the attempt to use standby power the speed brake apparently was triggered. Two witness' statements and testimony, and circumstances, show the plane stopped dead in the air and then fell (note small area of ground damaged by plane: 500 feet by 90 feet.)

8. CYANIDE. The pilot, prophetically named Capt. Whitehouse, and 6 of the Watergate passengers had a high cyanide content, higher than they could have gotten from a so-called aircraft cabin fire. Whitehouse had 4 times as much as necessary to kill him....

9. THE F.B.I. After the crash we made public statements that 200 F.B.I. and D.I.A. people, refusing to show their credentials, had taken over the crash site, coincident with the crash or just shortly before. We were called "liar." Then, on June 13, 1973, Chairman John Reed of the National Transportation Safety Board told the House Governmental Activities Subcommittee that he sent a letter to the FBI (stating) that: (a) never in living memory had the FBI acted as in the flight 553 crash. Reed said 59 FBI agents came into the crash zone shortly after the crash; (b) proceeded into Midway Control Tower and took over the tape relating to flight 553, without asking permission, (c) before the N.T.S.B. investigators could do so, the FBI conducted 26 interviews, including those of surviving flight attendants. The FBI interviews were completed within 20 hours of the crash.

For six months, they claimed we were liars when we said 200 FBI and DIA were in the crash site coincident with the crash. Now they admit 50 were there. Witnesses living in the crash zone tell us that the FBI types were there before the Fire Department. (The Fire Department responded within one minute after the crash). The FBI kept a medical team OUT of the crash zone, although one member of the team said he heard someone in the plane crash screaming.

10. THE ROBBERY. In-flight or post-crash, a highly sophisticated airplane robbery gang, never caught in ten years of operation, came into the possession of (a) the Mitchell documents and (b) Mrs. Hunt's valuables. Known as the Joseph Sarelli mob, they were arrested on or about January 12, 1973, for another unrelated in-flight plane robbery. They are made up of former aircraft technicians and "fences," those who handle stolen goods. The case was put together by Nixon's Strike Force in Chicago, who didn't know that their star witness was also a staff investigator of ours: Alex J. Bottos, Jr. A few days after he surfaced sitting at the N.T.S.B. hearings the week of Feb. 27, 1973, with Skolnick, federal marshalls seized Bottos, without the formality of a hearing, trial, or conviction, and put him into a so-called Federal Prison Hospital in Springfield, Missouri, a maximum security dungeon. Jack Anderson describes it as a political prison. Bottos was released by public clamor, in Chicago and elsewhere, including picketing in front of United Air Lines offices in downtown Chicago. Bottos had been kept falsely imprisoned for 40 days. The strike Force was fearful their case against Sarelli et al would also extend to Watergate.

Bottos and a friend of his, Joseph Zale, both of Gary, Indiana, had infiltrated the Sarelli mob and purported to be their "fences." Both saw samples of the items stolen from flight 553. The government wanted both silenced so they could not testify at the re-opened crash investigation June 13-14, 1973. Zale was indicted on a frame-up the day before the hearings. Both bravely came to the N.T.S.B. hearings—Bottos in a bullet-proof vest, and Zale, fearful of being arrested at any moment. The Strike Force's own documents show Bottos infiltrated the Sarelli mob. The Strike Force, however, did not want their star witness going around saying the same mob also was involved with flight 553. The flight 553 valuables, connected to Watergate, have now apparently been "fenced" for about $5 million. Who bought? Nixon? Mitchell?

11. THE COVER UP. Note this chronology:

(a) December 9, 1972, one day after the crash, White House Aide Egil (Bud) Krough, Jr., also involved in the Ellsberg burglary caper, was appointed Under Secretary of Transportation, supervising the National Transportation Safety Board and the Federal Aviation Administration, the two agencies supposedly going to "investigate" the crash of flight 553.

(b) December 19, 1972, White House deputy assistant to Nixon and secretary to the Cabinet, Alexander P. Butterworth, is appointed the new head of the F.A.A. Butterworth, an air force officer for 20 years, was also CIA-Aviation liaison.

(c) Dwight L. Chapin, Nixon's appointment secretary, becomes, five weeks after the crash, a top executive with United Air Lines, at their home office in Chicago. Chapin has no previous business experience. At the original crash hearings in Feb. 1973, he threatened media people with reprisals if they mentioned sabotage; reprisals such as using Clay Whitehead, Nixon's communications czar, to seek the break-up of the networks on anti-trust charges.

(d) Even before the crash, Herbert W. Kalmbach, Nixon's personal attorney, has been the lawyer for United Air Lines and Marriot Corp., which has an airplane-in-flight food service for airlines.

12. The original N.T.S.B. hearings on the 553 crash started Feb. 27, 1973. When they refused our documentation and testimony regarding sabotage and robbery, we sued them. The upshot was re-opened hearings June 13-14, 1973. Skolnick produced over 1300 pages of documentation and five witnesses.

13. THE MEDIA. The establishment media has lied about the crash of flight 553 from the beginning. Several of the establishment papers, radio, and TV, told a monstrous lie; that we had no documentation at the re-opened hearings. Some smaller radio and TV stations have given a fairer presentation....

This Fact Sheet, which is a brief outline and summary ... is printed and circulated by the Citizen's Committee to Clean Up the Courts, Sherman H. Skolnick, chairman. 9800 So. Oglesby, Chicago, Ill. 60617....

AND THEY STILL CALL IT EDUCATION

"GETTING CHILDREN TO "LEARN HOW THEY TICK

"Children at school are invited to repeat to the class 'the lie you often tell about yourself'...to write their own obituary notice...to talk about their loneliness...to drop counters into a cup after predicting how many they will get 'on target'...to express anger through noise and action.

"What are they doing? They are playing games, certainly, but they are also learning—and taking part in a Unesco experiment in international understanding which has been tried out over the past 18 months in 16 schools in Austria, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Hungary, the United Kingdom and the United States."

These are the opening paragraphs of a news release issued as one of a group of "Unesco Features, a fortnightly bulletin for press, radio and television" by United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, 7 place de Fontenoy, 75700 Paris.

Unesco's Institute for Education in Hamburg which is running this particular project, explains that "while not neglecting the purely cognitive aspect, it tries to integrate social and affective learning more fully into the school curriculum. In other words, the attempt is to move from the transmission of facts towards getting the children to learn 'how they tick'...Emphasis is on getting children to learn by themselves, not teaching them. Each of the games suggested creates a 'learning experience' from which the pupils draw their own instruction, so the project is right in the mainstream of modern attempts to reform education."

"...One British teacher trying the 'self-exploration game,' which aims at increasing self-understanding, tried Situation No. 4—'Do Something Uncontrolled'—and found his shoes removed and thrown out of the window. (...this illustrates the kind of crisis that teachers on the project must be prepared for.)"

Another Unesco "educational" experiment involves children in schools in Colombia. We are told that: ✓

"There are 3,120 children in Colombia today who have a chance of growing up to be enlightened adults in the full sense of the word—free of prejudices and taboos, able to bring up the number of children they desire and aware of their role in shaping their own lives and those of generations to come as they take an active part in their country's development... Before too long this new form of schooling, which combines sex education and study of population and environmental problems with the usual subjects... may be extended to the Colombian educational system as a whole."

Yvonne Tabbush, who is Unesco Regional Information Officer for Latin America, with office in Santiago de Chile, explains what she witnessed in some of the schools:

"The boys at Bolo primary school showed us neat exercise books in which they had drawn and written what they had learned about genetics throughout the term. The fourth grade girls at Nuestra Senora del Rosario trooped onto the stage one by one to explain, by means of photos and charts, the process of conception, gestation and birth... The children spoke of changing traditional patterns, of their parents' attitudes to what they were learning and sometimes to their resistance to progress: 'They need classes too, but we try to teach them.'... the curriculum is constantly re-evaluated and adapted to needs and concerns. As time is the great problem, suggestions are made for cutting down on details and descriptions of places and events—the old standbys of geography, history and biology—and emphasizing instead the concept of environment, demography and the ecosystem, giving more time for reflexion and analysis rather than rote of learning and memorizing..."

"And so the experiment proceeds with checks and balances, pre-tests and post-tests in the 24 schools where the project is being carried out, and a parallel selection of 21 control schools where classes have not been changed, the results being compared at each stage to calculate the impact of the new teaching and evaluate changes in attitude. When all the tests have been checked, codified and analyzed, discussed with educational leaders and the teachers who took part in the experiment and with representatives of the Ministry of Education, the National Population Council, the Council of (Catholic) Bishops and the Parents' Association, the guidelines should be ready for the preparation of a national programme of population education." (End of quotation from Unesco Features).

A few words of explanation are in order:

The United Nations Organization is set up like a World Government (which its creators intended it to become after a few structural changes had been made). The UN has its legislative branch, composed of two bodies: the General Assembly and the Security Council. The General Assembly, or lower house, bears some similarity to our own House of Representatives, in that it is made up of representatives from each of the member States. But there is this important difference to be pointed out: Our House members are elected according to the population of the States they represent, so that the large but sparsely populated Alaska has but one Representative, while the smaller but heavily populated New York State has 39 Representatives. In contrast, in the UN General Assembly, each State, regardless of size or density of population, has but one representative (save for the USSR which has three), thus belying the fiction that the UN is a "democratic" organization.

the UN's "upper house" or Security Council differs from most legislative bodies in that ten of its fifteen member nation representatives are elected every two years, while the Big Five (USA, USSR, UK, France and China) hold their seats permanently, and their representatives (called Ambassadors) also have the power of veto; this fact again belying the fiction of "democracy."

The United Nations Organization also has its Judicial Branch, the world Court, or the International Court of Justice; fifteen judges elected for 9-year terms by the General Assembly and the Security Council.

These two branches, the legislative and the judicial, could be written off as little more than expensive nuisances. Now and then the UN "legislature" will issue a sanction against some State, perhaps Rhodesia or Israel; the sanction will either be vetoed by one of the Big Five, or it will be ignored by the indicted State. Only the United States ever seems to pay much attention to any United Nations decree. The same can be said of the World Court; nobody ever gives much thought to its decisions.

But the "Executive" or "Administrative" branch of the United Nations is an entirely different matter. Not that Secretary General Kurt Waldheim and his staff are of great importance, they do little more than keep the records straight and manage the UN Headquarters in New York City. However —

Somewhat similar to our President's Cabinet and the various bureaus, agencies, authorities and administrations which make up our Executive Branch of federal government; the UN also has its special councils and agencies; bureaucracies wherein resides the real power of the United Nations. These are regulatory agencies which derive their power not from UN Headquarters, but from treaties which are signed by the various National Governments and administered by these UN agencies. For example: the so-called World Bank (International Bank for Reconstruction and Development) and the International Monetary Fund do not derive their power from their relation to the United Nations as such, but from the fact that multilateral treaties are signed by the member Nations, naming these organizations as official custodians and managers of international financial matters involving Nations.

UNESCO is such an international bureaucracy, deriving its powers from the fact that the nations have signed an international agreement giving Unesco diplomatic immunity and powers which actually supersede the powers granted by the United States Constitution.

To put it more simply: If the United Nations ceased to exist as an organization, we'd still have to deal with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the International Labor Organization (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the World Health Organization (WHO), the World Bank, the International Development Association (IDA), the International Finance Corporation (IFC), the IMF, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), the Universal Postal Union (UPU), the International Telecommunication Union (ITU), the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO), the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

Many of these international organizations are important, beneficial, and offer no threat to the integrity or security of any nation. Unesco, however, is not one of these. Its activities in the educational field have become little more than attempts to build a World Community. As Unesco itself says:

"Creating world understanding, of course, has always been the aim of Unesco, whose Constitution lays down that 'since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed.' For the past 20 years, attempts to build these defences have been made in Unesco 'Associated Schools', now numbering more than 900 in 62 countries..."

These "Unesco Associated Schools" are better classified as laboratories, where the many schemes promoted by behavioral scientists, social scientists and educationists are tried out, using the children of various races, religions and nations as guinea pigs for their experimentations. Two such experiments were discussed at the start of this letter. When these Unesco experiments are proved successful in mind control efforts they are then recommended to National and State Boards of Education, and introduced into school systems in the United States and throughout the world.

It should be noted that the management and control method known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, was tried out and adopted in Unesco Associated Schools before it was forced upon American school systems. It should also be borne in mind that this movement which aims at "programming the product (the future citizen) for existence in the newly programmed society," is not an American phenomenon. It is a world-wide movement which aims at mind control for the masses of the world, with only the children of the Elite to be spared. This concept was perhaps best explained by the late humanist and one world advocate, Bertrand Russell. In his book, The Impact of Science on Society, pages 29 and 30, he wrote:

I think the subject which will be of most importance politically is mass psychology... This study is immensely useful to practical men, whether they wish to become rich or to acquire the government... Its importance has been enormously increased by the growth of modern methods of propaganda. Of these, the most influential is what is called "education"... What is essential in mass psychology is the art of persuasion... It may be hoped that in time anybody will be able to persuade anybody of anything if he can catch the patient young and is provided by the State with money and equipment... This subject will make great strides when it is taken up by scientists under a scientific dictatorship... The social psychologists of the future will have a number of classes of school children on whom they will try different methods of producing an unshakable conviction that snow is black. Various results will be arrived at. First, that the influence of home is obstructive. Second, that not much can be done unless indoctrination begins before the age of ten. Third, that verses set to music and repeatedly intoned (as in hard rock—Ed.) are very effective. Fourth, that the opinion that snow is white must be held to show a morbid taste for eccentricity...

Although this science will be diligently studied, it will be rigidly confined to the governing class. The populace will not be allowed to know how its convictions were generated. When the technique has been perfected, every government that has been in charge of education for a generation will be able to control its subjects without the need of armies or policemen. As yet there is only one country which has succeeded in creating this politician's paradise.

(first published in 1952)

Along the lines suggested by Russell, after the "scientists" and their computers were given control over "what is called 'education'," the term education was itself redefined. It now has become the objective of education to "measure and diagnose the child in order to prescribe a program that will develop his feelings and emotions, his values and loyalties toward predetermined objectives." Traditionally, the purpose of education was to impart knowledge and to develop skills, while at the same time instilling Christian character. But today, the way a pupil feels and reacts is said to be more important than how much he knows, or how much skill he has. As one of our correspondents said: "Conditioning people to behave according to predetermined behavior patterns becomes the objective of educational institutions. Drawing it right down to basics, we are talking about conditioned responses in human terms. Pavlov experimented on dogs!"

The same kind of experimentation is going on right now, with children instead of dogs, in schools throughout the Nation; indeed, in schools throughout the world. Two such experiments have been cited in this letter. We wrote, in our Don Bell Reports of August 3, of other experiments, of one in which the experimentation begins when the child is but two weeks old! It seems that time has proved Bertrand Russell to be wrong in one respect: He thought that indoctrination would have to begin before the "patient" was ten. It seems that "scientific experimentation" has shown that the indoctrination must begin before the child is, not ten years old, but only ten weeks old!

Although this mind conditioning was started seriously by Unesco more than twenty years ago, and although we have had our share of educationists such as John Dewey, William Heard Kirkpatrick, Harold O. Rugg, George S. Counts, Theodore Brameld, and others of like persuasion, the real perversion of our entire public school system did not begin until after the Federal Government began taking over control of the schools.

Prior to 1965 there were local, elected, school boards and State heads of education that could make direct decisions regarding educational programs, textbooks and curriculums, because they were funded at the State and local levels.

But it was in 1965 that the means for the actual restructuring of education in the United States was provided by the passage of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which gave the federal government its actual control over school systems. President Johnson once remarked that he considered the passage of this Act the most significant single piece of legislation of his entire administration.

1965 was an ominous year in other respects. That was the year when President Johnson issued the order which introduced the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) throughout the Executive Branch of the Federal Government. 1965 was also the year which unleashed the actual restructuring of governmental processes and formally included education as a legitimate Federal Government function.

Since then we have seen the national administration establish Federal Offices of Human Resources, the Office of Child Development, Head Start Programs, a National Institute of Education, a National Committee of School Finance, a National Office of Child Development, special tuition programs, day care centers, etc., etc. All of these, and other national offices are tools for the total control of all future generations by the State.

PPBS is the systems management tool made possible through computer technology, to affect the planned changes desired by the Elite of which Bertrand Russell spoke. As one California Assemblyman, Robert Burke, expressed it: "If you know what you have to start with, and know what you want to end up with, it's possible to design a system that will make the precise changes required."

The management system is perfected, in PPBS. But the "formula for change" is not yet worked out to the satisfaction of the Elite's behavioral scientists, educationists, and change agents (their own designation for the operators who are trained to affect the changes in the attitudes and behavior of the masses; the students of mass psychology spoken of by Bertrand Russell.) That is why there are so many different experiments still being conducted in schools and communities: the perfect formula to make PPBS perfectly effective in education, is still being sought. And your child may be their guinea pig without your ever knowing it before it is too late, if that child is going to a public school.

Some time ago Mrs. Mary Thompson of Santa Clara, California, who has been opposing PPBS and the new education for a number of years, was asked what could be done to stop this planned take-over of the Nation's future generations. Her answer still seems valid:

1. Stop thinking of these various education innovations as separate, isolated, individual programs. All of education today is part of the total concept of programming the product, the student. . . .
2. Stop participating in citizens committees and goals committees, and answering questionnaires for data purposes. Your answers are analyzed with a view to identifying the nature and scope of resistance to programs, and how to circumvent such resistance. If you do choose to be on a committee, do so for the purpose of obtaining information and issuing your own statements publicly as long as you are allowed to, from within the committee, in order to educate the general public as to the nature of the process.
3. Instruct your children not to supply personal information or answer personal questionnaires in school, or discuss any subjective or introspective matters in school. Teach them how to recognize data collecting techniques.
4. We believe the time has come to establish private schools to keep our children from falling victim to the behaviorists while there is still opportunity to do so. Be aware of the fact that there is a plan (the Voucher system) lurking in the wings to bring the private schools into the national control, alongside the public schools which are already under federal control.

OUR SUPER-SECRET DIRTY TRICKS AGENCY

THE CIA UNDER FIRE AT LAST?

"The Watergate affair has given added impetus to congressional efforts to put an end to the awesome ability of the Central Intelligence Agency to undertake covert military and paramilitary operations, and restore the CIA to its intended role as a gatherer and evaluator of intelligence," said Congressman Herman Badillo, New York Democrat.

"Under five Presidents, and with at least the tacit assent of Congress," Badillo said, "the CIA has been able to establish an enormous, far-flung apparatus that frequently has assumed a major, and in my judgment improper, role in American foreign policy. The Bay of Pigs fiasco, the covert operations in Vietnam as disclosed in the Pentagon Papers, and the not-so-secret war in Laos are but a few examples of the CIA's ability to make and execute foreign and military policy outside the purview of Congress and the public."

Because of Watergate, a new name has been given to covert activities such as those mentioned by the New York Congressmen.

They are called "Dirty Tricks." But the CIA refers to them as "Clandestine Operations," or "Covert Actions," and the list includes a wide range of political, propaganda, economic, cultural and paramilitary activities. Such activities have included such practices as:

- * Giving support and assistance to political parties in election campaigns in foreign countries.
- * Establishing dummy foundations to provide funds for private organizations that are engaged in scholarship, propaganda, labor, youth, and cultural affairs.
- * Setting up ostensibly independent private companies, including allegedly private airlines.
- * Arranging coups d'etat in foreign nations, training, financing, and leading private armies and air forces in foreign wars and civil wars.
- * Helping to establish secret and security police organizations in foreign countries.
- * Many other cold war ploys which would amount to acts of war if engaged in openly.

Little is actually known about the CIA's dirty tricks, because agents are sworn to secrecy, and reports are made to no one. But L. Fletcher Prouty, a retired Air Force Officer, served formerly as liaison officer between the Pentagon and CIA, particularly in matters having to do with clandestine activities—or dirty tricks. In his book The Secret Team, Col. Prouty states: "Henry Kissinger is the titular head of the intelligence community's clandestine operations reaction faction. His appearance as a one-man power center is simply due to the fact that he fronts for the Secret Team and the secret intelligence community."

"President Nixon has given a clear signal that he places a high value on covert operations," asserts Andrew Hamilton in an article appearing in the September 1973 issue of the magazine Progressive. Hamilton also points out that Nixon's "new Director of Central Intelligence, William Egan Colby, fifty-three, spent his adult life in Dirty Tricks, beginning with OSS guerrilla operations in World War II and culminating in a twelve-year stint as one of the CIA officials most deeply involved in the Vietnam war. Colby was CIA station chief in Saigon from 1959 to 1961. From 1962 through 1967 he was chief of the Far East Division of the Clandestine Services, the formal title of the operating arm of the CIA. From 1968 to 1971 he was involved with the 'pacification' program in Vietnam, first as deputy and later as ambassador in charge. In 1971-72 he was back in Washington again as Executive Director (number three man), at the Agency. When that post was abolished in a reorganization this year, he became head of the Directorate of Operations, which runs the Clandestine Services (Dirty Tricks Department of the CIA—Ed.)"

The Central Intelligence Agency was established in 1947 by President Harry Truman. There were a number of wartime intelligence agencies—notably the Office of Strategic Services (OSS)—which either had no need for further existence or had become suspect because of their pro-communist sympathies (notably the OSS); and the CIA was founded to absorb such wartime agencies. In fact, the OSS was of such character that General Douglas MacArthur would not permit it to function in any capacity within his Far Eastern Command. The OSS did operate in other theaters, however. Your editor was shot down over the China coast March 22, 1945 and upon escape through China to Kunming, was "propositioned" by OSS agents to quit his radio network correspondent's position and join the OSS. During the conversations which ensued the stark hatred of Chiang Kai-shek, dislike of General MacArthur, and admiration of Mao Tse-tung and General Vinegar-Joe Stillwell, were made so apparent as to be disgusting. Of course, we stayed with the radio network and later was able to rejoin General MacArthur's Command Headquarters.

Of the OSS which became the CIA, the eminent research specialist Frank A. Capell recently authored an intelligence report which we reprint:

* * * * *

At the time the CIA was established in 1947 its purposes, as set forth under the National Security Act, were to coordinate the intelligence activities of the several government departments and agencies in the interest of national security and advise the National Security Council in matters concerning intelligence activities of government departments, to make recommendations and to prepare intelligence reports. Its predecessor, the OSS, created during World War II, had been heavily infiltrated with Communists, Communist sympathizers, and radicals. Among its members were Carl Aldo Marzani, later identified as a Communist; Robert T. Miller, III, who was a contact of Soviet courier Elizabeth Bentley; Leonard E. Mins, who refused to deny being a Soviet agent when he was on the witness stand; Philip Keeney, who took the Fifth Amendment Concerning his Communist activities; Donald Wheeler, identified by Elizabeth Bentley as being engaged in Soviet espionage; George S. Wuchinich, identified as a Communist; Jane Foster Zlatovsky, identified as a Soviet agent, etc., etc.

Some interesting members of the OSS included Joseph and Stewart Alsop, writers and journalists; the late Ralph Bunche, UN official; Nicholas Deak, millionaire banker; John K. Fairbank, Harvard professor identified as a Communist; C. Douglas Dillon, former Treasury Secretary; Noel Field, identified Communist; John Gardner of Common Cause; Fisher Howe, State Department security risk; Herbert Marcuse, radical revolutionary Marxist; Leonard Meeker, now a U.S. Ambassador; Walt Rostow, a security risk and former top secret adviser to the President; Arthur Schlesinger, Harvard professor; Joseph Sisco, State Department official; and Arthur Goldberg, former Supreme Court Justice who was the liaison between the Communist underground in Europe and the OSS, and who has an established Communist front record.

The OSS knowingly and over the objections of J. Edgar Hoover, recruited not only known Communists but also veterans of the infamous (subversive) Abraham Lincoln Brigade and members of the Brooklyn, N.Y. organization known as Murder Incorporated, who had been exposed as contract killers.

Over 1000 former OSS personnel were transferred into the CIA and, in addition to this, numerous others were taken into the CIA on the recommendation of Harold "Tim" Philby, a British Soviet agent who helped set up the CIA. Within the organization there are career officers and agents. In addition to these professional men there are experienced hired agents, cooperators and conduits. In clandestine activities, the names of persons involved are not generally known even among high ranking CIA officials....

The CIA is prohibited by law from operating within the U.S. Nevertheless, it is known that it conducts numerous activities including the publishing of books, through "cut-outs" and conduits. In Washington one of the CIA conduits is Operations and Policy Research, Inc., 4000 Albermarle St. N.W., Washington, D.C. It has two affiliates: General Advisory Association, and Institute for Cross Culture, at the same address. Operations and Policy Research, Inc. was incorporated August 11, 1955, under Title 29, Chapter 6 of the Washington, D.C. Code. Its certificate of incorporation states "The particular business and objects of said corporation shall be to conduct basic and applied research, participate in educational activities and advise on matters relevant to all phases of government and private policy formation and operation." President of the organization is Evron Kirkpatrick, formerly an OSS officer, later deputy director of State Department Intelligence and Research, and an official of the CIA. Vice President of the organization is Max M. Kampelman, an attorney who was formerly on the research staff of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, subsequently legislative counsel to Senator Hubert H. Humphrey and since 1956 a partner in the law firm of Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver and Kampelman. Another incorporator was Arthur Lazarus, Jr. The organization gives grants which may be for the stated purpose or a conduit payment for CIA services.

There has been a close interlocking between the Rand Corporation in Santa Barbara, California and the CIA. Daniel Ellsberg, who has been named by a conservative Paris newspaper as a Soviet agent, was employed by the Rand Corp. at the time he admittedly pilfered the Pentagon Papers, copies of which were given to the Soviet embassy before being given to the New York Times. Ellsberg subsequently has been identified as a long time CIA agent. Ellsberg, a protege of Henry Kissinger ever since he was a student under Kissinger at Harvard, is believed to have been an employee of the CIA while he was an "advisor" in Saigon.

James R. Schlesinger, now Secretary of Defense, was temporary director of the CIA for several months, during which time he caused the dismissal of over 1,000 employees, a purge of some of its best men. Within the CIA there are leftwing factions and anti-Communist factions and Washington sources believe most of those purged came from the anti-Communist ranks. Defense Secretary Schlesinger was also formerly with the Rand Corporation in Santa Monica.

(End of quotation from Frank Capell's Confidential Intelligence Report.)

The CIA was established through the authority of the National Security Act of 1947, and its 1949 amendments. This Act permits the CIA to keep secret its budget, organization, personnel strength, identity of personnel, and other operational and administrative details, notwithstanding other provisions of law, and to spend money without regard for normal Government procedures.

In addition to these enormous powers, three other points stand out:

First, the agency is answerable directly to the President, and to the President alone (though we presume that it is really answerable to Henry Kissinger in his role as Director of the National Security Council).

Second, the CIA is free from Congressional or public scrutiny.

Third, its duties encompass much more than the routine collection and evaluation of intelligence data. When it was being set up, even Secretary of State George C. Marshall warned that "the powers of the proposed agency seem almost unlimited and need clarification."

Though secrecy surrounds the agency, it is more or less authoritatively reported by Washington sources that are nominally reliable that the CIA presently has about 16,500 regular employees and operates on a visible budget of about $750 million. However, the CIA has the use, without cost, of "surplus equipment" from other departments such as State and Defense. Then, as head of the U.S. foreign intelligence community, the Director of CIA has the responsibility for coordinating the activities and reviewing the budgets of all other U.S. intelligence agencies and operations. These activities—most of them under Defense Department auspices—amount to almost $4 billion per year, not counting the CIA. All in all, this puts over four billion dollars a year in the hands of the CIA Director, to spend as he decides. No wonder Washington legislators refer to it as the multi-billion dollar agency whose spending can not be scrutinized, criticized, or minimized.

The CIA is divided into four main divisions, called "directorates." They are:

Intelligence, which collates, analyzes, and disseminates intelligence data collected by all U.S. intelligence agencies and from unclassified sources.

Science and Technology, which oversees research and development of technical systems, such as spy satellites, etc., analyzes scientific and technical data, and circulates its findings to the various interested Departments of the Executive Branch.

Administration, under which are lumped such functions as supply, finance, training, medical services, communications, etc.

Operations, which is the Dirty Tricks Department of the CIA. According to Andrew Hamilton (op. cit.) "The Directorate of Operations constitutes the covert side of CIA, known as the Clandestine Services. Officers of the Clandestine Services generally pose as officials of some other U.S. Government agency or private organization, and sometimes use false names." (In the case of the alleged sabotage of the "Watergate Plane," there was one person who posed as a Justice Department official, used a false name, and may have served cyanide cocktails to some of the passengers. See Don Bell Reports of August 31 for details.)

Under this "Directorate of Operations," or Dirty Tricks Department, there are a number of specialized staffs whose names will give some notion of the range of CIA work:

* Foreign Intelligence (espionage and political reporting);

* Counter-Intelligence (reporting on operations of the intelligence services of other nations);

* Covert Action and Political Action (secret financing of various youth, labor, cultural and academic groups, operating clandestine radio propaganda outlets, large-scale efforts to influence foreign elections); * Special Operations (planning, supporting and directing paramilitary operations); and * Technical Services (wiretapping, lie-detector operations, illegal entry, false identities, disguises, etc.)

Most of the CIA's Dirty Tricks are carried out by large regional divisions of the Clandestine Services Directorate. There is the Domestic Division, which operates within the United States, illegally since the CIA Charter prohibits such activity. Then there is the Western Hemispheres Division, which has interfered with elections in Brazil, Guatemala, Haiti, Chili, Bolivia, etc.

The Far East Division is the largest of these regional divisions. This organization allegedly supervised (at the request of President Kennedy) the general's coup against South Vietnamese President Diem in 1963. This CIA Division worked with and helped finance a wide range of clandestine and special operations which were proposed by the Rand Corporation. Best known of these joint "laboratory type" operations came to be known as the Phoenix Program, and was headed by William Egan Colby, the present CIA Director.

The Near East-South Asia Division is now becoming very active: favored-nation relations with Israel counterposed with need for Arabian oil making this a hotter-than-ever part of the world. One particular CIA exploit that received considerable publicity was the CIA-plotted coup which overthrew Premier Mohammed Mossadegh of Iran in 1953 and returned political power to the Shah (the latter being more friendly toward the Israelis.)

The CIA's African Division was deeply involved in Congo affairs during the 1960s. The patriotic Moise Tschombe was played against independent West European industrialists and financiers, with the mineral and precious stone wealth of the area as the coveted prize.

The CIA's European Division was responsible for a massive infusion of funds into Italy and France in the post-war years, for the purpose of controlling elections. The CIA is said to have provided a large annual subsidy for the Italian Christian Democratic Party in the 1950s and 1960s. The CIA is also said to be deeply involved in Greek internal politics.

Just how deeply the CIA is involved in the current Chilean political crisis is a question to which many Senators and Representatives in Washington are demanding an answer.

Here at home, you will recall the civil strife brought about by race riots, assassinations, freedom marches, lootings and burnings, in the 1950s and 1960s. In that connection, we call your attention to the following which is taken verbatim from Andrew Hamilton's article which appeared in the September issue of the Progressive:

"For many years during the 1950s and 1960s the Covert Action staff in Washington ran one of the most remarkable CIA activities: the large-scale subsidization of a wide range of youth, academic, cultural, propaganda, and labor organizations in the United States and abroad. Among the long list of beneficiaries of the payments, which ran as high as $100 million a year, were the National Student Association, the Asia Foundation, the American Newspaper Guild, Radio Free Europe, and the Congress for Cultural Freedom (which sponsored Encounter magazine). The Covert Action staff, under Cord Meyer, Jr., now CIA station chief in London, set up numerous dummy foundations to distribute the money, using a wide number of legitimate charitable institutions as co-operating go-betweens. . . . These subsidies, exposed in 1967, were terminated, but the Covert Action staff remains in business. According to informed sources, its annual budget continued at about the $100 million level in 1971. . . .

"Two points stand out: (Dirty Tricks operations in foreign nations) were often mounted not against hostile countries, but against neutrals or allies. And they frequently resulted in creating and sustaining repressive regimes. The CIA has been accused by well informed U.S. officials of helping to establish 'anti-subversive' police units in a number of countries which have then used them to repress all liberal political opponents."

"The Clandestine Services," says a former CIA official, "never developed a philosophy that 'our job is to spy.' They have always had the desire to manipulate things." With the German-born Kissinger in a position to manipulate the manipulators, just think how events, and people, are going to be manipulated in the future. A ban on Dirty Tricks might narrow the credibility gap a few feet.

THE "NEW SOCIALISM" IN THE UNITED STATES: THE PLANNERS TO REPLACE THE POLITICIANS

THE "TECHNOSTRUCTURE" AND THE MARKET SYSTEM

"There is undergoing within this Nation," wrote a Florida couple to their congressman, "a planned, systematic, organized effort to change our system of government. This new system of government is one that will be controlled by bureaucrats, not answerable to the people, free from the influence of election, referendum or recall."

Therein lies the key to the understanding of much of what is occurring politically and economically within the United States in this last half of the Twentieth Century. Those who are to rule over us in the future will not be those whom we elect, but those who are appointed. The election process will not be discontinued, but it will come to mean nothing more than it already means in totalitarian State: the nominees will be selected by the Central Party Presidium and we will be commanded to vote for or against the selected nominee (never a nominee of our own choice.)

Of course, it won't make any real difference who is elected anyway, because the whole election routine will be merely an exercise in "participatory democracy" to make the people feel that they still have some part in the formation of governments (this feeling will engender loyalty when things are going well, and a sense of guilt when things are not going so good.) The elected officials in such a government will merely serve as mouthpieces, whipping boys, and rubber stamps (as the case dictates) for the appointed officials, who will really rule the Nation and its proletariat, on behalf of the Elite which will rule them, and the world.

Too far-fetched to be believable? Actually, such a situation already exists, but most people won't believe it because it has not yet been affirmed by The New York Times. But, how else can one explain the present predicament of elected officials, and the honor and glory and trust being accorded such appointed officials as Henry Kissinger, Elliot Richardson, Caspar Weinberger and Roy Ash, to name a few?

The current sequence of downgrading the politicians and their immediate staffs, and the consequent upgrading of all non-partisan appointees, began with the character assassination of all Democratic aspirants who had even the remotest chance of defeating Nixon in 1972, notably Henry Jackson and Edmund Muskie (Ted Kennedy knew better than to run in 1972, and they shot George Wallace.) The uncanny nomination of George McGovern was a model of professional intrigue and dirty-trickery, as was the 1,000 per cent backing given Tom Eagleton, only to be withdrawn at the time when it would do the politician-defamers the most good.

The Democratic politicians of presidential caliber thus having been defamed and disgraced, the next step would be to "go and do likewise" to the front-running Republican politicians. And Watergate did exactly that! Remember, the Watergate caper would serve no purpose whatsoever in defeating the Democratic candidates; they were already defeated long before any bugging began. But Watergate, hushed up until after the election, could serve a great purpose in downgrading Nixon and his "1,000-year Reich-staff," even as all the Democratic prototypes had already been politically drawn and quartered.

History shows that things much worse than Watergate have happened in previous campaigns and administrations. But never before had so much publicity and name-calling ever been permitted or encouraged. Nor have so many layers of evil ever been exposed to the public. Why?

We believe that the time had come for all partisan politicians and their henchmen to be denigrated, and for all planners and permanent bureaucrats to be exalted. Because this new system of government that was being installed called for non-partisan bureaucrats and planning specialists, rather than elected administrators and legislators.

How else can one explain the dilemma in which Mr. Clean (Spiro Agnew) finds himself? Having evaded and avoided all connection with and contamination from Watergate, the dirty tricksters went back into Agnew's personal history before he became a politician of national repute, and dug up allegations of payoffs for favors rendered to Baltimore builders and contractors. The facts of the case are not pertinent, whether Agnew is guilty or innocent is not important; the important thing is to smear the politician who is most likely to succeed. Politicians are fair game for the new era builders, because the time has come for a new system of government.

This should not be construed as any exoneration of politicians. Generally speaking, politicians as a class have become so corrupt that they deserve whatever exposure they get. In the case of Richard Nixon, for example; not only has he fouled his own nests, but he has disgraced the Office of the Presidency by doing exactly as the Planners dictated, reversing his public stand on almost every principle on which he ever took a stand, from anti-Communism to anti-price and wage controls, and all points between. So that, every word of the following criticism of Richard Nixon, written by a correspondent whom we shall not identify, is well aimed and hits the target:

September 8, 1973

Open Letter To:

President Richard Nixon
The White House
Washington, D.C.

Mr. President:

As a lawyer you must appreciate the irony of a litigant's building his case on a document he, himself, has ignored, circumvented and even lent the power of his position to its final destruction.

I refer, Mr. President, to our United States Constitution (the document) and you (the litigant) who invoked it to lend credence to your claim of Executive Privilege in your quarrel with Congress and the Courts anent Watergate.

Where in our Constitution (a compact between the States and the Federal Government) is there provision for the Chief Executive to abolish those States? Yet, you, by Executive Order 11647 set up ten Regions with a framework of appointees answerable to Federal regulations. Our Constitution states, Article 4, Section 3: "No new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of another State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as Congress." That legislative power you usurped. To all practical purposes there are no Sovereign States. Their elected officials are but expensive anachronisms to perpetuate the myth that we choose our representatives to govern us. Without the State-Federal compact our original Constitution is inoperative!

A second, more damning example (since this involves the destruction of our national sovereignty) of your contempt for our Constitution (whose protection you seek) lies in the Mutual Relations Pact you signed with Leonid Brezhnev May 19, 1972, in Moscow.

Article 6, paragraph 2 of that Pact reads: "The USA and USSR regard as the ultimate objective of their efforts the achievement of general and complete disarmament and the establishment of an effective system of international security in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations."

Where, in our Constitution, Mr. President, is the Chief Executive authorized to enter into an agreement with a foreign nation to disarm the United States of America and to trust the "security" of the American people to the jurisdiction of the United Nations?

Further, you have gone on record as favoring Atlantic Union, a supra-government of Atlantic Nations in which our Country would be but one of a Federation of States with common defense, taxation and economy.

You have recommended also Senate ratification of the UN Genocide Treaty which, in effect, would repeal the Connally Amendment and place your fellow Americans under the jurisdiction of the World Court, depriving us of the safeguards of our American Constitution—that Constitution you, in your present extremity, have invoked.

Noting the destruction your Executive Orders and Agreements have wreaked, a court of law might well ask, "Does such a document as the original United States Constitution still exist to serve as a defense for American citizens—including the President of these United States?"

Since you have abrogated the Constitution, on what do you base your claim of Executive Privilege?

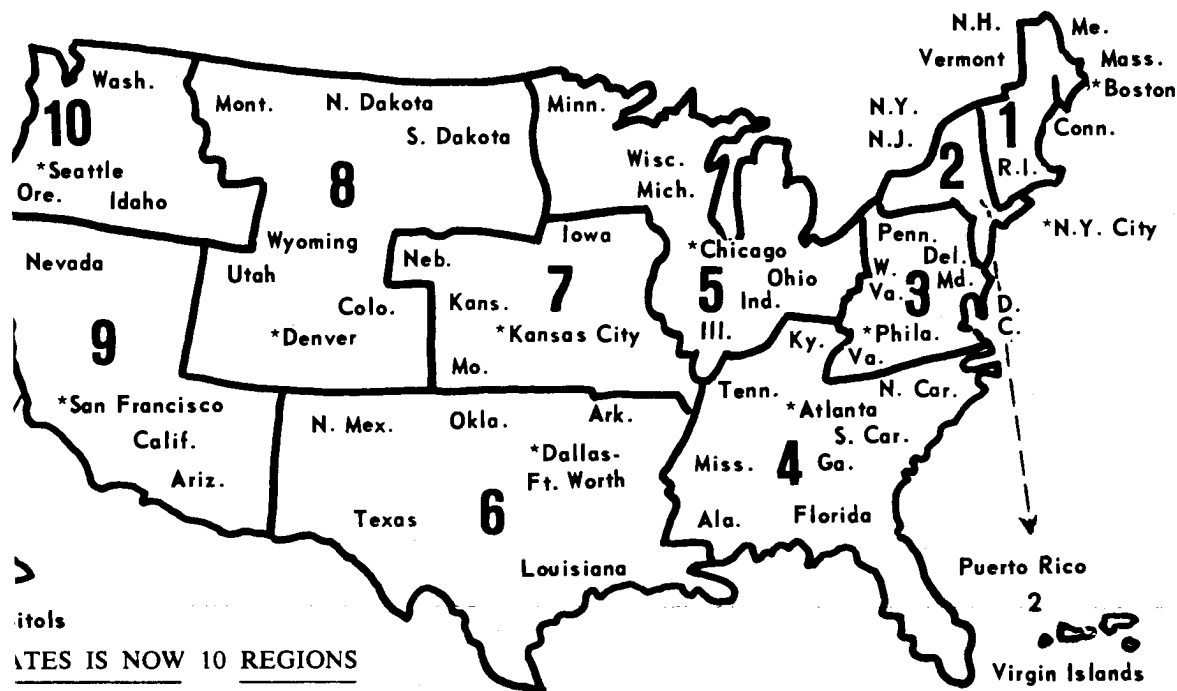

Sincerely,
(name withheld).

Perhaps these crude, corrupt, criminal, and often asinine machinations can be more easily explained and understood if we first realize that there was one single, overriding purpose behind every dirty trick and Machiavellian maneuver; that purpose being to change our system of government. And to the change agents, the end justifies every means, including that of sacrificing their own leaders if such act seems propitious.

We quoted a Florida couple at the start of this letter. Their statement is pertinent, so permit us a further quote:

"Planning is the first step toward accomplishing any totalitarian government, for the people (Occidental people, that is) do not succumb to manipulation of their lives when it is done openly... And so the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) has become a system covertly imposed. It is a totally inter-related management system wherein each sub-system is linked together. ...After PPBS was installed in every executive department of the Federal Government, the Budget Bureau was restructured and it became the Office of Management and Budget. The entire PPBS framework is now managed from the OMB.

"Next, plans were made and completed for dividing the Nation into Ten Regions. Each Region has its own capital (see above map for details-Ed.) ...

"Essential to implementation of PPBS will be Revenue Sharing and a State-imposed (but Federally-collected) Income Tax.

"The PPBS will not work effectively under our form of Government; but the Elite Planners are committed to the use of PPBS, because it is the best way yet discovered and put into practice whereby the Controlling Elite can totally manage society. Therefore, since the system cannot be changed, the form of government must be changed to fit the system."

Does this help to explain the otherwise unexplainable events that have taken place at Democratic Political Conventions, at the Watergate, on the Watergate Airplane?

This practice of defaming elected officials and exalting appointed officials is nothing new in the history of modern so-called democratic governments. Back in 1908, the eminent British historian, science fiction writer and for a time leading Fabian Socialist, H. G. Wells, wrote a non-fiction book titled New Worlds For Old. In the book he told what the program was to be, and exposed the machinery by which it was to be developed. One thing he did not foresee: the perfecting of the Computer, which is essential to the working of the system. Otherwise, Wells was quite accurate when he wrote:

"It was left chiefly to the little group of English people who founded the Fabian Society to supply... the amplifying conception of Socialism, to convert Revolutionary Socialism to Administrative Socialism.... Socialism ceased to be an open revolution, and became a plot. Functions were to be shifted, quietly, unostentatiously, from the representative to the official he appointed.

... Scientific reconstruction of our methods of government constitutes a necessary part of the Socialist scheme... It supplies a Scientific Bureaucracy, appointed by representative bodies of diminishing importance and coming at last to be the working control of the Socialist State, the replacement of individual action by public organization."

In our day, the one person who is free to write about and propagandize for public acceptance of this new system of government is John Kenneth Galbraith, who seems to fancy himself to be the American counterpart of the late British Maynard Keynes, and who says that what we need in the United States is "a new kind of socialism," although what he describes is little more than the old Corporate Socialism (Fascism) that has been brought up-to-date through the use of computer banks and the application of that technoscientific control system which we know as PPBS.

In 1958 Galbraith wrote The Affluent Society in which he played on the theme that production for private profit caused public squalor. Nine years later (1967) his book titled The New Industrial State, explained why, in his opinion, our system produced "such an overabundance of dog food and such a shortage of decent housing, medical care," and general welfare.

Those two preliminary tomes paved the way for his latest, Economics and the Public Purpose, in which he conditions us for the end of what's left of free enterprise and prepares us for the coming of the managed society in the managed State.

Galbraith first makes it clear that government should be a matter of economics, not politics as we know the term, and "the growth of power in both public and private bureaucracies is now the decisive force in economic and political life."

Galbraith uses the term "technostructure," by which he means the lawyers, accountants, advertising men, engineers, and salesmen who run the great corporations. This technostructure is the real power center in the United States, and each giant corporation is like a government within itself.

Contrasting and competing with this technostructure is what's left of the free enterprise system, which Galbraith calls the "market system" and which he characterizes as the world of "the farmer, repairman, retailer, small manufacturer, plumber, television repairman, service-station operator, medical practitioner, artist, actress, photographer and pornographer - the last refuge of the individual entrepreneur."

Then, speaking as a confirmed Fabian Socialist, Galbraith engages in a bit of semantics and changes terms in midstream. The technostructure becomes the "planning system" and he laments the fact that there is still a semblance of a "classical market" operating in this world of small business. Happily, however (for Galbraith and his ilk), the "planning system" is steadily accumulating ever greater power, and the dominant "planning system" is exploiting the weaker "market system."

Galbraith then points out that this accumulation of the power of a few hundred large corporations to exploit the rest of the United States economy is an extraordinary political accomplishment.

Since this "planning system" controls technology, finance, communications and markets, and since the mature corporations function like a government, the sensible thing for the Government itself to do is to become a gigantic "planning system" and function like the great corporations function.

Galbraith does not use the terms familiar to students of the "revolution" and the New Order which it is to produce, because he is writing for the general public. But what he would be saying if he were using accurate rather than semantic terms, is this:

The CFR, ÇED, 1313, Bilderbergers, and other representatives of the Corporate Structure are really running the country; so let's get with it and plan with the Planners, and create, in place of a government, a gigantic Federal Corporation, a "planning system" to handle all the things the private corporations can't handle monopolistically: health, education, welfare, control of rugged individualists and entrepreneurs, etc.

In other words, let us become, in truth, a New Industrial State (Galbraith's term), and convert our representative republic into a Federal Corporation.

This is the "New Kind of Socialism" which is being forced upon us through the establishment of Regions to replace States, Revenue Sharing to replace local control of governmental functions, PPBS which is government by regulation as opposed to government by law, and with appointed Planners replacing elected officials at every level of management.

And it is happening here!

THE LAND USE BATTLE INTENSIFIES

THE FURY FOR FEDERAL CONTROL

"The Council on Environmental Quality has called land use control the quiet revolution," said a Congressional adversary of pending legislation which would give control of the use of all privately owned land to State and Federal appointees.

"It is, indeed, a revolution," continued the Legislator. "The reason it is quiet is because the American people have not been truthfully informed as to the depth and consequences of this revolution.

"The Federal Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act, which pranced through the Senate last June by a vote of 64-21 has been labeled as potentially 'the most dangerous and destructive piece of legislation ever passed by the Senate.' Related bills currently before the House possess the same destructive force found in the Senate version (H.R. 2942, H.R. 6460 and H.R. 10294, all of which are similar to S. 268, which passed the Senate in June—Ed.)

"The land use scheme now under consideration is the same old 'big carrot and big stick' approach that has been used so successfully in the past to entice State and local governments into accepting federal edicts, despite local needs or wishes. Under the current proposal, States would receive federal grants to develop and implement comprehensive land use planning programs. A State which fails to develop a plan suitable to the Washington bureaucrats will find the 'big stick' waiting nearby. Up to 21% of a State's federal grant funds for highway, airport and conservation could be withheld from those States which hold self-determination in higher regard than they do the demands of unelected employees and political appointees.

"The proposed land use planning programs amount to nothing more than federal control over the use and disposition of private property. This is an area that, under the Constitution, the Federal Government is prohibited from possessing. The legislation is being peddled to the public under the guise of being an environmental protection measure. But land use control and environmental planning are two separate and distinct matters...."

Echoing the sentiments of the Congressman whom we have been quoting (Rarick, of course; who else in the House of Representatives can be consistently quoted on conservative matters?) is the Phoenix Gazette, which came out against federal land use programs after Arizona's Senator Paul Fannin—who originally co-sponsored the Senate Bill—was alerted to the danger and came out against S. 268. An editorial in the Phoenix Gazette is reprinted herewith:

LAND USE TYRANNY

For all that land use planning has to recommend it, Arizona and every other State would be better off with no planning at all than with planning directed from Washington that would usurp local control and all but confiscate private lands.

With Washington having bungled so much on so many local scenes, it is surprising indeed that the majority of the Senate Interior Committee would report out (and that the Senate as a whole would approve so overwhelmingly) legislation that would make Uncle Sam a Czar over land use everywhere in the Country. Yet that is precisely what happened.

To his great credit, Arizona's Sen. Paul Fannin, who cosponsored the bill with the hope of providing federal assistance and cooperation for local planning, is blowing the whistle on the version that came out of the committee.

Sen. Fannin says the Land Use Policy Act as it reads now "would do great violence to our traditional American rights," certainly an accurate description. If Washington gets to decide on land use, the States, other local governments and the people will have no say in the destinies of their neighborhoods and communities.

In effect, property owners would be reduced to landless serfs beholden to the lord of the manor in Washington. With Washington controlling its use, titles to property would become worthless scraps of paper in a modern system of feudalism.

Under the Land Use Policy Act, areas of "critical environmental concern" would be subject to severely limited uses. According to Sen. Fannin, that provision is so broad that it "is not folly to say that in some States every square foot of private and State land could fall within such a limitless definition."

Oddly enough, lands owned by the Federal Government, which in Arizona at least are threatened by very real environmental hazards, would be exempt from designation as areas of critical concern. What sort of foolishness is this?

Because the bill provides no compensation to land owners whose property values would be reduced or even demolished by the environmental provisions, the measures very likely would be unconstitutional. The Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation.

If it becomes law, however, the courts would be left with the sticky question of deciding when a restriction becomes a "taking" of land. Litigation on that issue could continue for years, during which property owners might lose investments, and the results could be disappointing.

All in all, the Land Use Policy Act is a dangerous piece of legislation that promises to do little good for Americans but could do a lot to destroy their rights.

(Reprinted from the Phoenix Gazette)

TIME MARCHES IN

As the Council on Environmental Quality said, this was a "quiet revolution," but it lost its quality of quietness when it got bruited around by privately circulated newsletters and privately financed papers such as the Vermont Watchman, that the federal planners were about to steal all rights to private property. The "quiet" revolution began to get noisy, and the revolution faced defeat unless public support could be mustered. Some national publicity and some very persuasive propaganda seemed advisable. So -

The current (October 1) issue of Time, the Weekly Newsmagazine, carries a special 16-page section, complete with illustrations, on the subject of land and its use in the United States. The propaganda angle is subtle, and is hinged on the proposition that there is a "New American Land Rush" that must be controlled through land use legislation.

That there is a land rush is obvious, and it is a part of the movement to unload Federal Reserve money because it is no longer a safe way to store wealth, and also because land is a better hedge against inflation and monetary insecurity than stocks and bonds whose value is reckoned in terms of Federal Reserve promissory notes which we call cash (mistakenly, of course).

This rush to convert from greenbacks to something more enduring in value, is not confined to land. Indeed, as U.S. News & World Report of October 1 points out: "The boom in the sale of art, jewels and other precious items in the U.S. is turning into a phenomenon of world-wide proportions. Internationally famed auction houses report buyer interest in old masters as well as modern paintings on a scale as never before. Antique furniture, old ceramics, gold coins, rare stamps, even silver bullion are in growing demand everywhere."

This desire to convert Federal Reserve notes into something of more enduring value has also sparked this "New American Land Rush." Without ever mentioning this fact, Time uses the land rush as a springboard from which to dive into an appeal for land use control. Says Time:

"Land, as a physical quantity, seems almost changeless, altering shape only over aeons under the pressures of erosion and volcanic eruption. But the economic and social use that man makes of the land is changing as rapidly as anything in America. An enormous—and disruptive—land boom is grossly inflating prices; a new social attitude is replacing the old idea that a man could do with his property as he damn well pleased. In this special section Time first examines the dimensions, causes and consequences of the new land rush, which far surpasses frontier land fever. It then compares prices of acreage in various parts of the country, contrasts the experiences of happy and unhappy home purchasers, and gives some tips on how to avoid being rooked when buying land. Finally, it explores the new ways in which communities are trying to control and guide development for the good of society, and focuses on some of the powerful individuals who determine how the country uses the land on which it builds and lives."

After this introductory blurb, there follows a masterpiece of propaganda built upon a factual foundation so cleverly that few readers will fail to be deceived into wanting—even demanding—that Senator Jackson's Land Use Policy Act which passed in the Senate so handily, is legislation that must become law.

Here are excerpts from the Time production: "The states are probably as much at fault as communities themselves for such abuses of land-use controls. They have neglected their constitutional right to control land use within their borders, making local governments—which are much more susceptible to pressures by local power groups—accept that responsibility by default. But now the states will have to recover their original power, whether they want it or not. Congress is almost sure to enact a major law this fall that will force states to oversee all development of their land. Drafted by Senator Henry M. Jackson, chairman of the powerful Interior Committee, and passed by the Senate by a 64-21 vote last June, the National Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act does not fix policy at all. Instead, it provides $1.1 billion over eight years to help states devise a process of planning and ‘methods of implementation’ for their plans. . . . If Jackson had his way, the Government each year would withhold from recalcitrant states an increasing percentage of their annual federal funds for highways, airports and land- and water-conservation programs. . . . To proponents, including the Administration, the penalties are absolutely necessary to prod the states to action. To opponents, the penalties present an unnecessary ‘gun at the Governor’s head.’

“The penalties should be enacted if for no other reason than that most states are traditionally reluctant to accept planning. Tough minimum standards should also be written into the act. . . . Many other new approaches are needed. Among them:

“Regional Planning authorities should be encouraged wherever possible. . . . New Towns should be more strongly created. . . . Zoning Rules should be updated and upgraded in almost every community. . . . Cluster Planning should become the rule rather than the exception.” (End of quotation from Time.)

The Time special section on land use is a most remarkable production. It begins by being informative, then becomes opinionated, shifts its editorial gears into the areas of gentle persuasion, and finally gets down to the stern business of telling the Congress what’s wrong about its present bill, and ends up by telling the people how they should demand action that will sell them into slavery via national control of all land over which flies the Stars and Stripes.

In a preliminary House debate on the subject, Rep. Steven D. Symms, Idaho Republican, sliced through the propaganda screen and presented some facts. He told his colleagues:

“I marvel at the callous enthusiasm Government planners have for regulating the lives of our citizens. Having succeeded in regulating production, transportation, personal safety, communication, and our moral lives, Uncle Sam is now exploring the possibility of tying up private land in a jumble of red tape. Supporters of this measure—including a surprising number of conservatives—maintain that the bill is a voluntary grant-in-aid program intended merely to encourage the States to develop their own zoning programs—not an attempt by the Federal Government to force a national program upon the States. I find this hard to believe. Every bureaucratic measure enacted has started out under a similar guise.

“You see, the catch is that this so-called voluntary process entails so many specific provisions that are subject to Federal approval. Instead of carrying out their own zoning plans the States will soon find themselves acting as mere agents for the Federal Government. For example, one provision requires Federal supervision to insure that the State planning process conforms to Federal guidelines. Another provision requires each State to have a planning agency with authority to carry out the will of the Federal Government. There is also a requirement that the States regulate land sales.

“Proponents of this measure are parading their plan through the Congress under the banner of environmental protection. Look at the bill closely. I seriously question whether it is land we are protecting. I suspect what is being asked of this Congress is to protect the collectivist schemers. . . .

“In my letters to the citizens of Idaho who are appalled by this bill, I have said that it is an erosion of constitutionally guaranteed property rights. I have often questioned at what point erosion becomes a flash flood. The fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States provide that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Thus, the critical issue is how far the use of property can be restricted without compensating the property owner for diminution of value. This bill forbids the States from expending any grant of money for compensations of this nature.

“There is one last aspect to this bill that strikes me as very clever indeed. We are not proposing to just strip the American people of their rights to private property. We are going to let them finance the operation.”

Other Congressmen who have spoken out against this Federal land grab include the following Representatives who made the following statements:

Angelo D. Roncallo, New York Republican:
"It is not popular these days to oppose any legislation labeled as environmental by its sponsors. In this bill the word 'environment' is a libel, not a label... I do not believe that an appointed State official should be empowered to make local zoning determinations, rather than local officials who must answer to the electorate for their actions and who must live day in and day out with the visible results of their decisions. I fully subscribe to the principle that the level of government closest to the people governs best... Who is going to control the State zoning czar sitting on top of his power pinnacle? A Federal bureaucrat even further removed from the man on the street... Mr. Speaker, the Land Use Planning Act is one of the worst and most dangerous pieces of legislation to come down the pike in many years."

Philip M. Crane, Illinois Republican:

"Just where is Congress' authority to remap the United States? The Federal Government derives all its power from the people with whom all power originally resides. According to constitutional theory, the Federal Government has only so much power as the people delegate to the Federal Government through the States by the process of constitutional ratification and amendment... There is no constitutional mandate for Congress advising States and certainly not coercing States... If we are to maintain any fidelity at all to Congress' constitutional power, we would somehow have to fit the land use bill into the constitutional scheme... However, the advocates of the land use bill are not citing the Constitution... Theirs is a pure power argument, that might makes right... The House land use bill subsidizes State-wide planning. What this actually means is that the Secretary of the Interior can... decree a national policy of land use. Soon the only people interested in State boundaries will be Rand and McNally."

Harold L. Runnels, New Mexico Democrat:

"Throughout our history the fifth amendment has guaranteed the citizens of America that their private property would not be taken without just compensation. With the passage of the Senate bill and with reports such as the Rockefeller Task Force Study on Land Use coming out, this right is under attack. The Rockefeller Report is concerned about the traditional views that the Supreme Court has taken on these guaranteed rights of property owners and hopes that the Court will begin to reconsider its past decisions and come up with a more 'modern' approach. By this the task force means that from now on development rights on private property should rest with the community, instead of with the property owner. This is a dangerous approach—it not only challenges the meaning of property rights as we have known them but could well destroy them."

John H. Rousselot, California Republican:

"It is indeed ironic to think that the government that was formed 200 years ago to protect the private property of individuals in a new, free country is now making a power grab for that property... As is the case with so much of our far-reaching Federal legislation, the land-use bill extends the fingers of Federal Government into the very fabric of our tradition of local control and private property ownership. Prof. Murray N. Rothbard in his book, For a New Liberty, writes: 'Property rights are human rights, and are essential to the human rights which liberals attempt to maintain.'... If private property is indeed the key to individual freedom, as our history back to and beyond Magna Carta indicates, then we will indeed be giving away basic rights by passing the proposed land-use bill."

J. Kenneth Robinson, Virginia Republican:

"Under this bill there is a great deal of concern expressed for environmental quality, but very little for the rights of the individual or the autonomy of local government. The fact that this bill serves as a door opener for further threats to private property and individual freedom is (shown by) a statement by Senator Edmund S. Muskie (who said of the Senate bill): 'This is something like the psychology of a second shoe falling. The bill is the first shoe, and it will give a clear indication, if adopted, to the States that Congress is serious about this business. If the States do not respond effectively, Congress is thinking of sanctions in three years.'..."

"The German free enterprise economist, Wilhelm Roepke, describes quite eloquently the importance of private property to a nation of free men:

If property, together with its inseparable concomitant, the law of inheritance, ceases to be one of the natural and primary rights which need no other justification than that of law itself—then the end of free society is in sight."

THE TREND TOWARD NATIONAL DESTRUCTION

WHICH HAND HOLDS THE DAGGER?

The contrast should seem incredible to any Nationalist who loves his Country:-

On the one hand, our Federal Government spends an average of $100 billion each year building and maintaining a modern national defense establishment because, according to this same Federal Government, we must constantly be on guard lest enemy nations attack and conquer us, or overrun any of the nations who are said to be our friends, and whom we have promised to protect. Lest there be any misunderstanding as to the identity of those enemy nations, this same Federal Government has assured us that our chief enemies are Soviet Russia and the Peoples Republic of China.

However, on the other hand, we spend other billions of dollars, feeding and training, equipping and strengthening these military juggernauts who have promised to destroy us just as soon as we have made them strong enough to do so. That they may also destroy each other is small consolation because, though they may hate each other, their hatred for us is greater.

Such a contradictory policy of spending billions to keep ourselves strong, while at the same time spending billions to help our enemies grow stronger still, is a policy that doesn't make sense; unless our own national leaders are bent on destroying us as an independent Nation and making us subjects of and subject to a World Authority.

First, let us make it perfectly clear that our own Federal Government, or at least the Legislative Branch thereof, does consider the Russian Bear and the Chinese Dragon to be the chief enemies of the American Eagle:

Recently, the Senate Committee on Internal Security released a report on national security which contains the following statement:

"One of the Government's essential rights is that of self-protection. Without it there can be neither political potency nor territorial integrity. A Nation's willingness to protect itself determines, to a large extent, its vulnerability to enemies.

"The United States has virulent enemies from within and without and in many cases these two cannot be separated. Incredibly, this nation's right to protect itself and the right of Congress to fully inform itself seems to be out of fashion in some circles. . . . There are skeptics who will argue that the Soviet Union and Red China have in recent years moderated their ways, that they are no longer engaged in global subversion. All the solid evidence, regrettably, points to the opposite conclusion. . . ."

The first appalling incongruity is this: The fiscal budget (the figure will go up before the year is ended) calls for the spending of 57.2% of that Federal budget on National Defense; $98.1 billion in round numbers. But - as a result of treaties and executive agreements, we have contracted to permit the Soviet Union to have and hold a greater military establishment than our own! Here are facts concerning the present military hardware of the USSR and the USA which come from the Pentagon:

Russia has more land-based nuclear missiles than the United States, and is testing newer and better ones. They have 1,590 intercontinental missiles each capable of destroying a metropolitan area such as New York, Los Angeles, or Washington, D.C. We have only 1,054 missiles of this type.

In nuclear missile submarines, the Soviet Union has 48, we have 40. And they have another 18 under construction. They have 2,290 planes and missiles capable of delivering nuclear warheads; we have 2,000. They have 64 AMB's defending Moscow; we have not a single anti-ballistic-missile of this type. Russia has a 20-to-1 lead in surface-to-air weapons, and a 5-to-1 lead in interceptors.

We are spending billions building bigger and better attack and defense machinery, but so is Russia; and the signed contract (treaty) promises that we will allow Russia to stay ahead of us in the amount of military hardware on hand at any given time!

Aside from military hardware, per se, the eagerness with which the Executive Branch and its favored corporate executives rush to make trade deals with the Soviet Union and Red China, borders on the suicidal. We have an example before us as we write this letter. It is a copy of Solar News, Vol. XIX, No. 16, a house organ "published for employees of Solar, a division of International Harvester Company, San Diego, California. Dated August 23, 1973, the issue features the "almost miraculous" delivery of a gas compressor to the Soviet Union. The center fold is a 23½-inch by 15-inch litho reproduction of the employees who made the delivery possible. The caption under the photo reads: "TO MOSCOW...with pride. Many of the packaging plant employees who helped build the Model 74 gas compressor took a few minutes out of their lunch period last week to gather around for this portrait by Ron Jones. Then it was put on a truck bound for Houston. It will be loaded on a Soviet ship and transported across the Atlantic, eventually going to Moscow where it will be displayed with a Saturn Mark II generator set at the Nefta Gaz Expo in October."

The lead story is reproduced in full:

SOVIET GAS COMPRESSOR ORDER FULL OF CHALLENGES

Logistics Require Dovetailing of Vendor Work; Soviets Expected to Visit here for Inspection

Clipped to an easel in Roland Paquette's office is a flip chart used in briefings to describe plans for meeting terms of the Machinoimport contract.

The agreement contains conditions for the record $25 million-plus sale of more than 35 Centaur gas compressor sets to be delivered to the Soviet Union by next April. President Morris Sievert recently picked Paquette to manage the project.

One page of the hand-lettered presentation depicts one of the challenges that must be met in the next eight months. Across the top of the page, titled shipping logistics, are the names of Lemon Grove, San Diego and Long Beach, names of Solar and installation department suppliers who will fabricate key components for the sets that will push natural gas through transmission lines in the Soviet Union.

Below these are names of Tulsa and New Orleans, other subcontractor locations. Lines lead from these boxes and other squares to a circle at the bottom of the page. The circle represents Houston, the port where the Soviet ships will receive the crates containing the compressors and associated equipment between November and April. The illustration shows the complexity of coordinating the work of Solar manufacturing groups and that of the subcontractors so that the shipments leave Houston on schedule.

If they don't, he said, the division is liable for stiff penalties under the terms of the contract hammered out by a Solar sales team and Soviet officials during months of negotiations. The contract was signed late in June. Likewise, if the equipment arrives in Houston long before it is to be loaded Solar would have to pay large storage costs.

One of the conditions of the pact is that sets be shipped complete. A complete set includes the gas turbine-powered compressors, scrubber, pipe skid, filter and exhaust silencer and gas cooler. These components will be mounted on six skids and linked at the sites of several stations.

(End of article)

The foregoing is reprinted as an example of how happy these multinational corporations are to get contracts from the Soviet Union. The U.S.-based multinationals (like International Harvester) are especially "proud" to serve the enemy, because they haven't taken any risk whatever; they are sure to get paid for their products and their services. The ultimate customer, that is, the Soviet Union, Red China or any of the other Communist dominated countries may never pay for the goods they receive. But that will make no difference to the U.S.-based multinationals, because if the Communists don't pay their bills, you and I will pay them, out of the taxes we pay the Federal Government!

That's why the multinationals can play it safe. The Federal Government has set up a system whereby credit can be established and receipt of payment guaranteed.

The Federal Government is just as anxious to promote trade with the Red Nations as are the Multinationals. As an example, the New York Times of Sunday, September 30, 1973, carried a special 32-page section dedicated to "Exports. Growth Market of the 70's." Sponsored by the U.S. Department of Commerce, and with editorial material being supplied by the Department's Bureau of International Commerce, announcement was made that Secretary Dent has "streamlined" his Commerce Department so that "formerly separate domestic and international trade activities of the Department are now in one unit: the Domestic and International Business Administration" (DIBA). We are told that within DIBA are four operating bureaus:

Bureau of International Commerce, Bureau of Competitive Assessment and Business Policy, Bureau of Resources and Trade Assistance, and Bureau of East-West Trade. In a special article dealing with this new Bureau of East-West Trade we are told that:

“Opportunities for United States trade with the Soviet Union, the East European countries and the People’s Republic of China are expanding rapidly. These countries are turning to the West for technology, financing and equipment to fulfill their plans to develop extractive industries, to modernize plant and equipment, and to increase both heavy and consumer outputs.”

So, “the U.S. Government is creating a framework for East-West trade that will allow American business free play in concluding transactions and, at the same time, help it overcome the difficulties involved (in commercial relationships between a free market economy and the centrally planned and administered Socialist economies.)”

If you desire to trade with a Communist country, and are worried about getting paid, there is this official advice:

“There are many sources of financial assistance available to exporters. ... You have a wide choice of financial institutions that are prepared to provide international financing and marketing assistance to exporters. More than 200 banks have qualified international banking departments... The U.S. Government also participates in the financing of America’s exports. The Export-Import Bank of the United States (Eximbank) offers direct loans for large projects and equipment sales that usually require longer term financing. It also cooperates with commercial banks in the United States and abroad in providing a number of financial arrangements to help U.S. exporters offer credit to their overseas buyers. Eximbank also provides export credit guarantees to commercial banks that in turn finance export sales; and, through the Foreign Credit Insurance Association (FCIA), provides insurance to American exporters which enables them to extend credit terms to their overseas buyers.... One of FCIA’s major forms of coverage is the master policy, designed to provide under one policy substantially automatic coverage for all of an exporter’s sales to overseas buyers on credit terms ranging up to five years. The policy may provide political risks coverage only, or comprehensive risks coverage....

“Other organizations which offer forms of export financing assistance include the Overseas Private Investment Corporation...

and Private Export Funding Corporation. ...”

(End of extended quotation)

Through these Government-financed and Taxpayer-insured agencies, any U.S.-based exporting firm can be assured that it will suffer no loss due to non-payment when exporting goods or services to Communist countries. If Russia or China doesn’t pay, the American taxpayers will.

The “favored treatment” of Communist Nations provides further aggravation to the American taxpayer, to say nothing of the financial loss involved in such deals. An example was furnished by Senator Jesse A. Helms, Republican, North Carolina. He was one of only two Republican Senators who voted against the appointment of Henry Kissinger as Secretary of State (Sen. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., of Connecticut, was the other.) In his speech in the Senate, Sept. 21, 1973, Senator Helms said, among other things:

“Let me emphasize... that it is not my purpose to doubt Dr. Kissinger’s sincerity. But it is my purpose to suggest that he has been sincerely wrong... Dr. Kissinger possesses the kind of brilliance which may be blinding in academic circles, but it does not hold up with the folks back home who are accustomed to the practical approach to making their judgments. My people know, for example, that they are paying more for food because of the grain deal last year with the Soviet Union. They know that we sold too much, too cheap, too secretly. They know now that our granaries are nearly empty. They know that the scarcity of wheat and the scarcity of food grains has driven up the prices in the whole food chain. They know that this triggered the administration’s disastrous attempt at price controls which, in turn, drove chickens, beef, and pork off the market.

“The Soviets in fact bought 25 percent of our wheat crop. They paid $1.50 a bushel and the price today is $5. The taxpayers will end up by paying $400 million to subsidize the big grain middlemen and the Soviets who profited by the deal. Our shipping and railroad freight was seriously disrupted by the magnitude of the transaction... All of this came about because of the intense desire by Dr. Kissinger to make concessions to the Soviet Union....

“These (trade and other) agreements (made by Kissinger) may be brilliant semantic constructions, but they paper over the fact that no meeting of minds is contained in them... The mentality of Dr. Kissinger’s most important work is alien to our thought, and, as such, is a deception on the American people (the speaker's assumption being that Kissinger thinks like a Communist and therefore makes agreements in Marxist semantics, therefore deceptive—Ed.)

“We come, then, to the fundamental discussion: Is detente real, or is it a semantic illusion? It is certainly real in the sense that it is a strategy currently being pursued by the Soviets to advance their aims. But what are their aims? Published intelligence reports from England report that Soviet Party Secretary Brezhnev has been at great pains to explain the basic principles of Soviet policy to the East Europeans. Detente, Brezhnev has been saying, is a tactic designed to build up Soviet strength militarily, and economically. At the end of a 10-year period, the report says, the Soviets expect that their power will have increased to such an extent that they can gain the upper hand over the West. . . .

“I see no logic in the assurances that the Soviet willingness to take us to the cleaners is any sign of real accommodations, or the slightest indication that they have abandoned their intent to build a world based on Marxist-Leninist principles—by force, if necessary, or by subterfuge if that is the easiest way. . . . I believe in bargaining, but not in surrender. . . .”

We fear that Senator Helms, however excellent his arguments against Herr Kissinger, may have overlooked a point: While it is true that Brezhnev intends to build a world based on Marxist-Leninist principles, is there any reason to believe that Kissinger and his superiors do not share that same intention with Brezhnev?

We hope that, in this letter, we have made it perfectly clear that arms limitation agreements and East-West trade negotiations are most advantageous to the Communist hierarchy and to the Communist Party members, who constitute the “upper class” in all Communist dominated countries. We also hope that we have made it equally clear that East-West trade is most advantageous to the U.S.-based Multinationals, because there is no risk involved in such trade.

But arms limitation agreements and East-West trade arrangements are not advantageous to the United States and to its tax-paying citizenry.

Nor is the strengthening of Communist Nations of any help whatsoever to the bulk of the inhabitants of Communist dominated countries. The common people will continue to be treated as slaves, and the slave labor camps will continue to provide the manpower needed for the economic survival of a Socialist State.

We are told that things are much better in Soviet Russia in the areas of consumer goods, food, working conditions, clothing, housing, transportation, etc. For the Communists this is undoubtedly true; but for the people themselves?

On Sunday, Sept. 23, 1973, the Washington Star-News featured an extensive article, “Soviet Labor Camps: The Nightmare That Does Not End,” authored by its staff writer, Brain Kelly. In ordering the article placed in the Congressional Record (Sept. 24, page E 6004), Congressman John Ashbrook, Ohio Republican, commented:

“The Star-News and Mr. Kelly cannot be commended too highly for attempting to call attention in the Washington area to current information on existing labor camps in the Soviet Union. No other time could be more opportune to remind Members of Congress and executive branch officials of the brutal, inhuman conditions under which flesh-and-blood victims of Soviet oppression exist from day to day. It is depressing to consider that these victims can expect little or no help from some American businessmen who are launching elaborate trade plans with their Soviet slavemasters. Nor is help apparently coming from U.S. officials who, like the new Secretary of State Kissinger, cannot meddle in the Soviet's internal affairs. Fortunately, there are indications that the American people—they keep the businessmen in business and the officials in office—are beginning to sense something phony, false, and fraudulent about the cries of ‘peace,’ ‘detente,’ and ‘peaceful coexistence’.”

The article—based on testimony given by former inmates—estimates that there are over 1,000 such camps and perhaps as many as ten million religious and political prisoners in them. Average life of a prisoner is said to be ten years; so a mass arrest of “political” prisoners occurs every decade as a means for replenishing the waning supply of labor camp slaves.

Let us pray that Rep. Ashbrook is right, that the American people really are beginning to sense something phony, false and fraudulent about our present policies, both foreign and domestic.

JUST WHO IS PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES? AND FOR WHOM IS HE RUNNING THE COUNTRY?

"My country remains committed to the goal of a world community."

Those were among his opening words when the newly appointed Secretary of State addressed the United Nations General Assembly. Making it perfectly clear that he had adopted the United States as "his country," the Nation's German-born Secretary of State asked that "this (UN) assembly move with us (the United States) from detente among the big powers (Soviet Russia, Red China and United States) to cooperation among all nations, from coexistence to community" (Italicized and parenthesized words added.)

"First," according to Kissinger, "a world community requires the curbing of conflict. . . . a small planet, so bound together by technology and so interdependent economically, we can no longer afford the constant eruption of conflict and the danger of its spread." (Shortly after uttering these words, as though the words might be a kind of signal, conflict did erupt in the Middle East.) "Second," Zionist Kissinger told the UN Assemblage, "a world community must have the widest possible membership." Therefore, North and South Korea should become the 133rd and 134th members of the UN, and Japan should be awarded a permanent seat on the Security Council, alongside the other five with the veto power: Soviet Russia, Red China, United Kingdom, France, and the United States.

"Third," Herr Heinrich told the world body, "a world community must assure that all its people are fed." Therefore, a World Food Conference is to be held in 1974 to discuss ways and means to maintain adequate food supplies for the world, and to determine the methods to be employed to force all nations in a position to do so, to contribute supplies for a World Food Bank.

Coincidentally: At the recently held world monetary conference at—of all unlikely and unexpected places—Nairobi, Kenya, East Africa, the very same demand for a World Food Bank was made by the World Money Bank's Robert Strange McNamara. This led to the announcement that Nairobi had been selected as the site of the world monetary conference because it had also been chosen as the probable site of the world food conference and likewise the site of the future World Food Bank. Ergo, Nairobi must be prepared to take its place as a cosmopolitan city; it must be Metroized, Bureaucratized, internationalized like the American New York City, the British London, the European Paris, Brussels, Geneva, Stockholm, etc. The holding of a world conference is the first step in "internationalizing" and denationalizing a city.

"Fourth," said the man who now speaks for Uncle Sam in all matters of foreign affairs and domestic security, "a world community cannot remain divided between the permanently rich and the permanently poor. Let us therefore resolve that this assembly, this year, initiate a search—drawing on the world's best minds—for new and imaginative solutions to the problems of development."

(Again, this is an echo of the same idea, expressed in almost identical words but without the guttural accent, by World Bank agent McNamara, at Nairobi.)

"Fifth and finally," said Playboy Kissinger who is said to fancy himself as the 20th century Disraeli, "a world community must harness science and technology for the benefit of all. We must begin to match our remarkable technological skills with our equally remarkable technological needs." In this latter connection, Kissinger spoke of the energy crisis, the population explosion and the world food shortage, at least two of which are artificially created by the men who place men like McNamara and Kissinger in positions of power and authority.

Kissinger's five point program for building the world community (which duplicates McNamara's program for building the world community, and which is a program laid down by somebody bigger than both of them) was presented to the United Nations as your program and mine, since he spoke for the President of the United States who, at least legally, does speak for all of the citizens in his capacity as President.

Kissinger's second important speech was delivered before a convocation called by the ultra-liberal Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. At our press time, we had been unable to obtain a copy of the Secretary's somewhat "restricted" speech but for what it's worth, we reprint The New York Times report of that address:

KISSINGER CITES RISKS IN PUSHING
SOVIET TOO HARD ON EMIGRATION
(Special to The New York Times)

Washington, Oct. 8—Secretary of State Kissinger warned tonight that there were limits to how far the United States could press Soviet leaders for changes in their system without running the risk of reviving the cold war and increasing international tensions.

Speaking at the start of a three-day foreign-policy convocation in Washington, Mr. Kissinger devoted much of his largely philosophical address to American relations with the Soviet Union and the "goals of detente." He strongly defended the Administration's much-criticized efforts to extend normal trade status—most-favored nation treatment—to the Soviet Union without linking it to a more liberal Soviet emigration policy toward Jews and others.

Senator J.W. Fulbright, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the other speaker tonight, supported Mr. Kissinger's attack on the Congressional efforts led by Senator Henry M. Jackson, Democrat of Washington, to make such a linkage.

"The Russian people have lived under dictatorship throughout their history," he said. "It is not for us, at this late date, to try to change that by external pressure, especially at a time when there is a better chance than ever to build a cooperative relationship between the Soviet Union and the United States."

Mr. Kissinger said this dispute with Congress had spawned "an intense debate" in America, and he acknowledged "a genuine moral dilemma." But he said that although the Administration would continue to urge humane principles on Moscow, "the issue comes down to the limits of such efforts."

"How hard can we press without provoking the Soviet leadership into returning to practices in its foreign policy that increase international tension?" he asked. "Are we ready to face the crises and increased defense budget that a return to cold-war conditions would spawn?"

"Is it detente that has prompted repressions—or is it detente that has generated the ferment and the demand for openness which we are now witnessing?"

Mr. Kissinger's speech to the association "Pacem in Terris III" (For Peace on Earth III), was released to the press in advance. The convocation is sponsored by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions and has brought together several thousand specialists on foreign affairs. The title comes from an encyclical of Pope John XXIII in 1963, that led to convocations in 1965 and 1967.

Mr. Kissinger stressed that the Administration was not turning its eyes from the repugnant policies and would "never forget that the antagonism between freedom and its enemies is part of the reality of the modern age."

"We are not neutral in that struggle," he continued. "As long as we remain powerful we will use our influence to promote freedom as we always have."

"But in the nuclear age we are obliged to recognize that the issue of war and peace also involves human lives, and that the attainment of peace is a profound moral concern," he said, arguing that in the long run more could be gained by improved relations with the Soviet Union than in pressing it too hard. (End of New York Times article).

We are sure that Kissinger voiced more than moral platitudes in his address to Pacem in Terris III, but The New York Times evidently chose to report only on that part of his speech which bore on the refusal of Congress to grant most-favored-nation-trade status to Soviet Russia so long as the Soviet government refused to allow Russian Zionists to emigrate to Israel without restriction or excessive payment for the privilege. To make what we have reprinted even more specious, Kissinger's speech was written before the Arab-Israeli conflict began.

Nevertheless, Kissinger is in a peculiar position: He is a Zionist and will give the Israeli government every possible aid and comfort. Yet, he must continue to be friendly toward Soviet Russia, and must appear to be fair toward the Arab Nations that are rich in oil. For these reasons, Kissinger's actions will speak more honestly than his words so long as his superiors find it expedient to make the people of the world believe that the Soviet and the Israeli governments are antagonistic toward each other, and so long as the myth of an energy crisis involving Middle East oil is perpetuated (in reality, only 7% of our petroleum supplies comes from the Middle East. It is Europe that is dependent upon Arabian oil, not the United States—though the oil monopolists don't want you to know this.)

Anyway, Kissinger's actions included the following: His very first important speech was addressed to world leaders via the UN Assembly, where he advocated World Community, which is synonymous with World Government or World Authority. And his second important speech was delivered before that Fabian Socialist Think Tank known as the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, where he promoted open trade and friendship with the Communist Nations of the world.

As for Kissinger's words: They might have been taken from carbon copies of speeches that have been made by Robert Strange McNamara since the latter became a principal agent of the World Bankers and the Multinational Developers who seek control of the resources of the world (human, as well as natural, resources).

It seems important to recall that this Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions has established quite a record for itself since being set up by the Fund for the Republic, this latter organization having been divorced by the Ford Foundation because of its left-wing and radical activities—and to be cast adrift publicly by the Ford Foundation for its far-left leanings meant that the Fund must have been leaning figuratively on the Iron Curtain itself! (We hear that the Ford Foundation does help the Center along with a few hundred thousand dollars now and then—but this is not publicized.)

This Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions is the brainchild of Robert Maynard Hutchins and his intellectual buddies. Hutchins was Chancellor of the University of Chicago, the University that Rockefeller built and the home of Terrible 1313. While at Chicago U. Hutchins and the late Henry Luce (Life, Time, Fortune, etc.) got the idea of founding a propaganda organization which they called the Commission on Freedom of the Press. They gathered around them a group of left-wing intellectuals, many of whom are now deceased:

- Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Harvard University;
- John M. Clark, Columbia University;
- Reinhold Niebuhr, Union Theological Seminary;
- John Dickinson, University of Pennsylvania;
- Robert Redfield, University of Chicago;
- William E. Hocking, Harvard University;
- Beardsley Rummler, Macy & Co.;
- Harold D. Lasswell, Yale University;
- Arthur M. Schlesinger, Sr.; Harvard;
- Archibald MacLeish, former assistant Sec-

- retary of State;
- George N. Shuster, Hunter College;
- Charles E. Merriam, University of Chicago.

These, together with Rexford Guy Tugwell who joined the inner group later, comprised the cream at the top of the Fabian movement in the United States in the 1940s.

Hutchins then organized a new group, the Committee to Frame a World Constitution. To his original stable of Fabians he added: Richard P. McKeon, Mortimer J. Adler, Giuseppe A. Borgese, Wilber G. Katz, all of the University of Chicago; James M. Landis of Harvard, Charles H. McIlwain of Harvard, Stringfellow Barr and Scott Buchanan, formerly of the University of Chicago. This group of eggheads did write a new World Constitution, which was to replace the UN Charter at a propitious time.

In 1969 the British Fabian publication, Humanity issued a special number in which this World Constitution was reprinted. The editorial is important, and we publish excerpts therefrom:

"...AN IDEA WHOSE TIME HAS COME"

Believing it to be a document of outstanding importance, likely to mark the beginning of a new era of humanity, and providing the basis of world law and order, we have discarded the normal style of our journal and have devoted its limited pages to the full text of the Preliminary Draft of a World Constitution. Since it was first published in Common Cause, the monthly journal of the Committee to Frame a World Constitution, this "epochal document" as it has been described on the other side of the Atlantic, has been reproduced in the Saturday Review of Literature and the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists (U.S.A.). Already more than 130,000 copies have been sold in America and translations into French, German, Italian and Russian are underway. This Humanity edition is the first to be made available in Europe. (End of quotation from editorial).

This Committee to Frame a World Constitution formed the nucleus of the staff of the Fund for the Republic, which later transferred from Chicago to Santa Barbara, Calif. where it established The Center. Present letterhead of the Fabian think tank uses both names:

THE CENTER for the Study of Democratic Institutions/The Fund for the Republic, Inc. Box 4446, Santa Barbara, California 93103

Also important: Common Cause was the name of the publication which first printed this Preliminary Draft of a World Constitu- tion. John Gardner formed his Urban Coalition and in the spring of 1970 "set about to raise $500,000 in seed money for his present, broader venture. He got half of it from men like John D. Rockefeller III, John Hay Whitney, George Stevens, Norton Simon, Arthur Krim, Sol Linowitz, and the (IBM) Watson brothers" (quotation from The New Republic, March 20, 1971.) With this money John Gardner formed the new pressure group to which he gave the old Hutchins' name: Common Cause!

Yet another strand must be woven into the fabric of this particular conspiracy: After Hutchins & Co. completed the draft of the World Constitution and moved his gang to the West Coast, New Dealer Rexford Guy Tugwell was commissioned to take charge of the writing of a new Constitution for the United States of America. That story and its implications were detailed in our booklet: Damn the Constitution (copies no longer available). The World Constitution and the new Constitution for a United Republics of America were to complement each other:

The World Constitution would grant the government of the World Community (to use Kissinger's term) the following powers:

- * To establish agencies which would develop natural resources and elevate physical and intellectual standards everywhere;
- * To expropriate public and private property whenever and wherever deemed necessary;
- * To decide natural boundaries, and form new nations and unions;
- * To regulate immigration and emigration and grant federal passports;
- * To pay old age pensions, unemployment relief, health insurance, maternity and infant care, public education, provide a sufficient amount for pleasure, entertainment and recreation for the people of all regions of the world who are deemed too poor to provide such pastimes for themselves;
- * To grant special rights to individuals as it sees fit;
- * To operate a World Bank which will provide a world currency;
- * To seize property ("what we usually call private property is the property of all mankind and must be subordinated to the common good");
- * To impose a federal tax on all individuals.

The Government of the United States would then become a Regional Republic with administrative powers over the whole territory which will also be divided into administrative regions and sub-regions (this latter part was completed with the establishment of Ten Federal Regions with their governing councils.)

In short: A Welfare World, comprised of Welfare Regions or Republics, all governed by a Central World Authority, but administered locally by Federal Regional Councils that manage and control their regions by means of a Planning, Programming, Budgeting System provided them by a Central World Authority. Such a management and control system would require no elected officials at either national or regional levels; appointed administrators would do a more scientific and efficient job when acting as the impersonal agents of the Central Authority.

We repeat: Elected officials would be unnecessary; appointed Presidents and Vice Presidents would be more efficient, since their administration would not depend on the will of the people, but they would derive their power from the consent of the Ruling Elite!

And, in view of the current political chaos, with people being told—and believing—that a change in our form of government seems to be needed; this master plan which McNamara and Kissinger and other appointed administrators are promoting, may be the very reason for the Watergate and Agnew crises. When changes are sought, crises are created to make the changes seem essential!

In a current best seller concerning scandal in government there are these words, which seem appropriate:

"The enemy wasn't a Communist, or a Marxist or a Maoist or a Lumumbaist. Those were merely convenient titles. . . . No matter the reasons, even the justifications; no matter the rationalizations, filled with motivational theories and diplomatic convolutions. The enemy was people. A few in control of millions upon millions; and these few, with their newly found power and technology, were subject to human weakness and their own fanatical commitments. The rest of the world had to be prepared to deal decisively, emphatically, overpoweringly with this enemy;" that is, with the powerful few who are in control of the millions upon millions of people.

Let there be no misunderstanding about it: Only a totally dedicated, God-fearing and Christ-motivated people can challenge this powerful few, and remain free.

LIFE WITHOUT LIBERTY OR PROPERTY?

BIG BROTHER REPLACES GOD

"No person shall be...deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is—or was—our specific guarantee against governmental encroachment against those unalienable rights with which we are endowed by our Creator, and which are designated in the Declaration of Independence as "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

But lately the Federal Government has been honoring the Constitution only when it is to the Government's advantage to do so, and ignoring or overriding the Constitution when that basic Charter interferes with the Government's overweening desire to gain full control over the liberties and properties of the lives under its jurisdiction.

As examples, there are the wage and price controls, the minimum wage law, the effort to disarm all law abiding citizens through Federal gun control laws so that only out-laws will be armed. One of the most brazen and potentially murderous of these controls is the new ignition interlock on 1974 cars which keeps the car from starting unless the driver and front-seat passenger have buckled their seat belts. True, car buyers who feel—with reason—that seat belts are dangerous, can assert their independence in this respect by hiring an expert mechanic to cancel out the mindless, meddling interlock; but the control gadget increases the cost of every new car by about $50; and you have to pay an expert mechanic to disconnect the pesky thing; it isn't a do-it-yourself operation.

Another federal control mechanism that is interfering seriously with the important job of maintaining law and order, especially in the smaller cities and in rural areas, is a new set of regulations issued by the Law Enforcement Assistance Agency (LEAA). This is one of those federal agencies that already works through the Federal Regional Governance program, whereby the Nation is divided into Ten Federal Regions, each with a Capital and with absolute power over States, Counties and Cities in certain areas of government. LEAA is looked upon as the potential National Police Agency if and when federal control becomes absolute.

The following article from The Macon (Ga.) Telegraph of October 11, 1973, illustrates the manner in which this particular set of controls operates:

LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES IN AREA MAY LOSE FUNDS

A new state requirement strengthening services in police and sheriff departments may cause ten of Middle Georgia's 18 law enforcement agencies to be ineligible for federal crime funds after July 1, 1974. The Macon Police Department and the Bibb County Sheriff's department will not be affected by the new rules, an official said.

The rules, approved last week by the State Crime Commission, require law enforcement agencies to have 24-hour patrol service, radio communications and file crime reports with the state Criminal Justice Information Center in Atlanta.

Some 10 agencies may not be eligible for grants under the Law Enforcement Assistance Agency (LEAA) unless they meet minimum state requirements for such grants, said Charles Howell, executive director of the Middle Georgia Area Planning and Developing Commission. . . . A non-voting member of the State Crime Commission, Howell said he opposed the adoption of the requirements. "These are fine goals for the smaller departments to work toward, but they should not have been adopted for minimum standards," the planning official said.

The resolutions are an attempt by the crime commission to force smaller cities and county agencies to merge their operations, Howell said, adding that he does not think this will be the outcome.

The above is, incidentally, an excellent example of "slanted" reporting. The article, to be objective, should have shown that the State Crime Commission adopted the new regulations because the whole State might have been denied federal funds if it had failed to meet the guidelines set down by the LEAA. And it should also have been noted that the "10 agencies" which are to be denied federal funds, have nothing to do with 24-hour patrols and radio communications, but with the refusal of these agencies to lose their identity by merging with other agencies. In other words, six police departments and four sheriff's offices refused to "Metroize" their operations; and at least one of the ten (Twiggs County) was not denied federal funds, but "rejected the Federal Funds, because of the restrictions which would have been thereby imposed upon Twiggs County" (quotation is from a letter from a resident of this Fourth Region whose capital is in Atlanta, and who adds: "Let's have more Counties like Twiggs!")

We have cited a few, but there are numerous other federal interferences which could be cited as examples of Big Brother's desire to dictate and assume control over your every action. But this furor for federal control has been especially evident in the past few years in the various federal moves to gain control over the use of every square foot of land in these United States.

We should like to start at the very beginning of this "land use" controversy and by so doing, perhaps give our readers some additional ammunition with which they may fight to preserve their right to the physical extensions of their spiritual freedom.

First, however, we need some definitions:

Brainwashers have implanted the idea that Communism, Fascism, and Socialism are three different theories; that Communism is extremely leftist, that Fascism is extremely rightist, and that Socialism lies in between the two extremes. Actually, the three terms are synonyms, and their differences are only in the manner of their operation. Communism means state ownership of property and the means of production; Socialism means state control of property and the means of production; and Fascism is a form of Socialism in which corporations, departments and commissions exercise monopoly control over property and the means of production; the Government acting as a kind of holding company over this conglomerate of corporations.

But what does ownership mean but the right to control? If property is nominally in the hands of the citizen or a group of citizens, but the state controls it, in effect the state is practicing the right of ownership of that property. So, you see, Communism, Fascism and all the other variations of Socialism are really the same thing.

And when Government controls wages and prices, controls the makers and drivers of automobiles, tells the citizen how many vitamins he may take when they are neither toxic nor habit forming, tells a police department how many people it must employ and of what size, sex, and color this is Socialism regardless of the form of government under which the controls are exercised.

The brainwashers also would confuse us on the meaning of the term "capitalism." They say that capitalism is the opposite of socialism. This isn't true. The socialists also use capital just as do those in the free enterprise system. There are banks in Soviet Russia and Red China and the fortunate ones in those countries have bank accounts; some even have television sets and automobiles, and some may live in private homes rather than communes, crowded apartments or condominiums. This is true of all Socialist systems, be they Communist, Fascist, Fabian, Welfare State or what have you. The people and their governments, and the government agencies, buy and sell and trade in terms of capital. The difference is this: The Socialist system is Monopoly Capitalism, while the Free Enterprise system is Competitive Capitalism. In a socialist state all capital is controlled in a state monopoly, even as all other property is controlled by the state (but not necessarily owned by the state.)

It is also important to understand clearly the difference between monopoly enterprise and free enterprise. When the production of a certain product or the providing of a certain service (as health care) is permitted to fall into (or is given into) the hands of a monopoly—be it an individual, a group of individuals, or a government agency—the spirit of competition is eliminated entirely. Thus, because there is no real incentive to build a better mouse trap or render a better service, the quality of the product or service tends to go down. The cost of the product or service, on the other hand, tends to go up (as with the postal service). This is necessarily so because natural man is a sinful and selfish creature. If a person has a monopoly, why should he build a better product or render a better service when he can get the same reward for producing an inferior product, or rendering an inferior service? And if he has no competition, why should he not charge as much as he can get away with charging? This is especially true of government monopolies, because government services are not charged directly to the recipient, but are levied in hidden taxes and in budgeting systems over which the people have no real control, and no other supplier of the product or service.

The free enterprise system has the opposite effect because here competitive capitalism—as opposed to monopoly capitalism—tends to keep the quality up and the price down. The producer or provider of services must constantly compete on an equal basis with competitors in the same field of endeavor. If he doesn't keep up the quality of his product or service, his competitors who offer a better product or service, or an equally good product or service at a lower price, will take his business away from him. He also must keep the prices down. He may need to lower his price from time to time to keep his business, for a competitor may find a more economical way to produce the same quality product and undersell him. Thus, the best product is sold at the lowest feasible price to the public. The customer, i.e., the public, is the beneficiary in the free enterprise and competitive capitalistic system; just as the public is the loser in the socialist and monopoly capitalistic system. (Adapted from a paper prepared and published by Pastor R.H.Goetjen, Route 4, Box 130, Sedro Woolley, Washington 98284.)

Please do not think that in the above we have attempted to contrast the present Russian vs. American systems of economy. As a matter of statistical fact, free enterprise is in its death throes in these United States and is confined primarily to the few small, independent businessmen and manufacturers who have not yet been starved out or gobbled up by the conglomerates and the multinationals which have grown so large and powerful that they operate like governments on their own. Additionally, the multitude of federal controls and regulations, the subsidies and grants-in-aid, the government operated industries and public power projects, the cradle-to-grave care and keeping of professional welfare recipients; these all combine to make of the once free enterprise Republic, a Socialist Democracy of the Fascist type.

Property, incidentally, is more than meets the eye*. This statement will sound strange

* The title "Property is More than Meets the Eye" and much of what follows in this letter, is quoted from, or adapted from, an article by the Rev. Claude Bunzel, Curator of Independence Hall and Colonial Research Library, Knott's Berry Farm, Buena Park, California. Material used by permission of the author and compiler.

in a generation that is rapidly growing more humanistic and materialistic. The traditional definition of property is one of those things that has been turned upside down in the past two hundred years.

Property, in the original sense, is more than meets the eye, because property is an extension of human character. It is what each of us is on the inside that determines what we will want to acquire in the way of "property," and what we will do with it and how we will use it once we have acquired it. The honest and the dishonest man, for example, may want many of the same things; but obviously they will employ different methods to obtain what they want. It is their individual character, what each is inside, that makes the difference.

Sir William Blackstone will help to show us something of how this present day concept of property came into being. Blackstone was admitted to the bar of Great Britain in 1745. He was elected to Parliament in 1761. He became Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in 1770, and continued on that bench until his death in 1780. But his chief claim to fame came from his scholarly and authoritative Commentaries on the Laws of England published between 1765 and 1769. Here are some paragraphs from his essay on the Origin of Property. If some of this comprehensive wisdom seems a little too difficult to grasp, please bear in mind that we are quoting from McGuffey's Sixth Reader. How many public school sixth graders of today would understand, or even be able to read the following words of Blackstone's?

"In the beginning of the world, we are informed by Holy Writ, the all-bountiful Creator gave to man dominion over all the earth, and 'over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moved upon the earth.' This is the only true and solid foundation of man's dominion over external things, whatever airy, metaphysical notions may have been started by fanciful writers upon this subject. The earth, therefore, and all things therein, are the general property of all mankind, exclusive of other beings, from the immediate gift of the Creator. And while the earth continued bare of inhabitants, it is reasonable to suppose that all was in common among them, and that everyone took from the public stock, to his own use, such things as his immediate necessities required.

"These general notions of property were then sufficient to answer all the purposes of human life; and might, perhaps, still have answered them, had it been possible for mankind to have remained in a state of primeval simplicity, in which 'all things were in common to him.'...

"Thus, the ground was in common, and no part of it was the permanent property of any man in particular; yet, whoever was in the occupation of any determined spot, for rest, for shade, or the like, acquired for the time a sort of ownership, from which it would have been unjust and contrary to the law of nature to have driven him away by force; but, the instant that he quitted the use or occupation of it, another might seize it without injustice."...

Then Blackstone proceeded to outline the rise of societies and the many problems which inevitably arose: "But when mankind increased in number, craft, and ambition, it became necessary to entertain conceptions of a more permanent dominion; and to appropriate to individuals not the immediate use only, but the very substance of the thing to be used. Otherwise, innumerable tumults must have arisen, and the good order of the world been continually broken and disturbed, while a variety of persons were striving (to determine) who should get the first occupation of the same thing, or disputing which of them actually gained it..."

"In the case of habitations, in particular, it was natural to observe that even the brute creation, to whom everything else was in common, maintained a kind of permanent property in their dwellings, especially for the protection of their young; that the birds of the air had nests; and the beasts of the fields had caverns, the invasion of which they esteemed a flagrant injustice, and would sacrifice their lives to preserve them. Hence a property was soon established in every man's house and homestead; which seems to have been originally mere temporary huts or moveable cabins, suited to the design of Providence for more speedily peopling the earth, and suited to the wandering life of their owners, before an extensive property in the soil or ground was established."

There is considerably more to this essay which must be left out because of space limitations, especially illustrations and examples of the development of the principle of private property, such as the need "to establish a permanent property in their flocks and herds," and "the exclusive property" of wells for watering flocks and herds. There are likewise some learned sentences on the promoting and encouraging of "the art of agriculture" and the "assistance of tillage," which "introduced and established the idea of a more permanent property in the soil than had hitherto been received and adopted."

Blackstone's essay closes with this paragraph: "Necessity begat property; and, in order to ensure that property, recourse was had to civil society, which brought along with it a long train of inseparable concomitants: states, governments, laws, punishments, and the public exercise of religious duties. Thus connected together, it was found that a part only of society was sufficient to provide, by their manual labor, for the necessary subsistence of all; and leisure was given to others to cultivate the human mind, to invent useful arts, and to lay the foundations of science." (From McGuffey's Sixth Eclectic Reader, Revised Edition, American Book Company, New York, 1879, pp. 410-415.)

"Be fruitful, and multiply and fill the earth," was God's original command to Adam and Eve and their posterity. But the evil that had entered the human heart when man fell from his created innocence, went with man wherever he went. So, came the Flood as God's judgment upon a wicked world, with only Noah and his small family (eight souls) saved, through whom God would continue the carrying out of His sovereign purposes.

After the waters of the Flood subsided, and Noah and his family were able to set their feet on dry ground once again, God repeated to Noah what He had first said to Adam: "Be fruitful, and multiply and fill the earth. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon the animals of the earth, and upon every bird of the air... into your hands they are delivered."

Thus did God give man dominion over the earth, and make him steward of all the material benefits the earth had to offer. Later, God would ordain and sanctify the right of the individual to have and to hold, and to control the use of private property. He commanded:

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's." (Exodus 20:17).

This commandment is, of course,—and should be—just as applicable to governments and to groups, as to individuals.

LIFE WITHOUT LIBERTY OR PROPERTY?

. Part Two

MY LAND IS YOUR LAND?

November 2, 1772, was an important day in the life of the English Colonies that later were to become the first thirteen of the United States of America. It was on that day that Samuel Adams rose up before a meeting of 300 alarmed people in Boston, who were getting more and more angered by the oppressive measures of their central government located in far away London, England. Mr. Adams felt that some means of communication was needed, so that the leaders in the various Colonies could be kept informed of events and circumstances, and of the measures that should be taken in an effort to preserve life, liberty and property. And Mr. Adams moved that a Committee of Correspondence be established. Since it was his idea, Mr. Adams was asked to author the first paper. He entitled it "Rights of the Colonists." He began his powerful document with the words:

"Among the natural rights of the Colonists are these: First, a right to life. Secondly, to liberty. Thirdly, to property; together with the right to support and defend them in the best way they can."

Later on in the letter, Samuel Adams wrote: "The absolute rights of Englishmen and all freemen, in or out of society, are principally personal security, personal liberty, and private property. . . . The supreme (political) power cannot justly take from any man any part of his property without his consent in person or by his representative."

Commenting on his great-grandfather's document on "Rights of the Colonists" over a hundred years later (1865), William V. Wells wrote: "Here is embodied the whole philosophy of human rights, condensed from the doctrines of all time, and applied to the immediate circumstances of America. Upon this paper was based all that was written or spoken on human liberty in the Congress which declared independence; and the immortal instrument itself (The Declaration of Independence) is, in many features, but a repetition of the principles here enunciated (in Adam's "Rights of the Colonists")."

Twenty years after Samuel Adams wrote of life, liberty and property, James Madison, who is known as the "Father of the Constitution," also wrote on the subject of property. In 1792, Madison wrote:

"This term (property) in its particular application means 'that dominion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world, in exclusion of every other individual.'

"In its larger and juster meaning, it embraces every thing to which a man may attach a value and have a right; and which leaves to every one else the like advantage.

"In the former sense, a man's land, or merchandise, or money, is called his property.

"In the latter sense, a man has property in his opinions and the free communication of them.

"He has a property of peculiar value in his religious opinions, and in the profession and practice dictated by them.

"He has property very dear to him in the safety and liberty of his person.

"He has an equal property in the free use of his faculties and free choices of the objects on which to employ them.

"In a word, as a man is said to have a right to his property, he may be equally said to have a property in his rights.

"Where an excess of power prevails, property of no sort is duly respected. No man is safe in his opinions, his person, his faculties or his possessions."

Though written nearly two hundred years ago, James Madison's words are particularly applicable today, for again "an excess of power prevails," and we are, once again, no longer safe in our opinions, in our person, in our faculties, or in our possessions.

THE BASIC FACTS

Before proceeding to the specific subject of private property in land, it is important that we be reminded of some of the vital provisions and safeguards contained in Holy

Scripture and in the basic civil documents which are the foundation stones of what has been called the American Way of Life:

The Bible proclaims the importance of private property, in that He is the giver and we are the stewards. There is, however, ever existent and rampant evil, and property rights are not necessarily observed, either by men or by governments of men. Therefore two basic laws were laid down by God Himself—He wrote them with His own hand the first time they were engraved on stone—that have to do with private property. There is the Eighth Commandment, “Thou shalt not steal,” and the Tenth Commandment, “Thou shalt not covet” (Exodus 20:15 and 17).

Following through and asserting accord with the Word of God on the subject, the Declaration of Independence announced what then seemed to be an entirely new concept among governments: that man’s rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness (property) come to him from God, not from whatever government or party happens to be in power.

Still conforming to The Word, civil governments are instituted among men to “secure” (guard, or protect) man’s God-given rights.

Again: Whenever a civil government betrays its legitimate but limited role as guardian of those God-given rights, the people have the right to alter, or even “abolish” that government.

It is the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States, that especially spells out the safeguarding of our property rights, whether the property be of a material or a non-material nature. Here are some specifics:

A man’s opinions are his personal property. He has a right to hold his opinions, and to make them known publicly—provided he can get someone to read them or listen to them. It is the First Amendment that guarantees this aspect of “property.”

The Second Amendment guarantees each citizen the right “to keep and bear arms”—for the obvious reason of protecting his “life, liberty, and property.”

Protection against “unreasonable searches and seizures” is the subject of the Fourth Amendment. Notice that our own person is recognized as a vital form of property rights: “The right of the people to be secure in their persons, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated...”

And, as was noted in the first letter of this current series of letters, the final clause of the famous and much abused Fifth Amendment is very specific: “No person shall be ...deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.”

Still another expression of this larger view of the meaning of property has come from the Honorable George Sutherland, who was an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1922 to 1938. He said: “It is not the right of property which is protected, but the right to property. Property per se, has no rights; but the individual—the man—has three great rights, equally sacred from arbitrary interference: the right to his life, the right to his liberty, the right to his property.... The three rights are so bound together as to be essentially one right. To give a man his life but deny him his liberty, is to take from him all that makes life worth living. To give him his liberty but take from him the property which is the fruit and badge of his liberty, is to still leave him a slave.”

Finally, in testimony before the old House Committee on Un-American Activities, on October 18, 1957, Bishop Fulton Sheen gave the following explanation of the true meaning of “property”:

“A man is free on the inside because he has a soul that he can call his own. Wherever you have the spirit you have freedom. A pencil has no freedom, ice has no freedom to be warm, fire has no freedom to be cold. You begin to have freedom only when you have something immaterial or spiritual.

“Now, freedom must have some external guaranty of itself. The external guaranty of human freedom is property. A man is free on the inside because he can call his soul his own; he is free on the outside because he can call something he has his own. Therefore private property is the economic guaranty of human freedom.

“Suppose now you concoct a system in which you want to possess a man totally. On what conditions can you erect a totalitarian system so that man belongs to you completely? One, you have got to deny spirit; two, you have got to deny property.

“This is why the existence of God and private property are both denied simultaneously by communism. If a man has no soul, he cannot allege that he has any relationship with anyone outside of the state. If he has no property, he is dependent upon the state even for his physical existence. Therefore the denial of God and the denial of freedom are both conditions of slavery." (Note: This statement was made in 1957. Since that time it has been found necessary to allow the possession of some private property in communist countries; not to inculcate a sense of freedom in the individual, but to make it possible for the state itself to survive. If farmers in the USSR had not been permitted to call a few feet of soil their own, and cultivate that soil as their own and sell the produce as in free enterprise, then Nixon and Kissinger might be sending far more American wheat to USSR at our expense, to keep communism alive.)

PROPERTY IN LAND

So much for a discussion of private property in general; now let us become more specific.

We have mentioned Samuel Adams. It is not surprising, therefore, that the watchword of the Sons of Liberty was "Liberty and Property." For the Colonists, property and liberty were concepts related to localism. Therefore, the Federal government was not permitted to have any authority over a man's personal property; even State governments were forbidden this area of control. Property went with political power, and both had to be local. Also, trustworthy wealth was landed wealth, not money or merchandise as such. Liberty rested on this sense of localism; responsibility and liberty began at home, not in some faraway capital city.

Thus, in the early United States, the county was the basic American unit of government. Land and personal property taxes were the province of the county, and the county only. Likewise criminal law; men were tried for alleged crimes at the County Court House and if convicted of a capital crime, were hanged in public, usually on the Court House grounds. Political power emanated upward from the County to the State, and from the State to Washington; not from the National Government downward, as at present. As R. J. Rushdoony wrote in his invaluable This Independent Republic:

"For some generations in United States history, the primary importance of the local and county units governed political life. Presidential elections could not compete in importance with state politics, and local and sectional interests governed federal elections, so that Federalist, Republican, American Democracy and Whig elections were often heavily influenced by non-federal factors. After Washington, no president at least through Lincoln, could be said to be a nationally popular figure, because the federal government did not sufficiently dominate or control the republic to give such stature to a president."

In the beginnings of the Republic, local elections were far more important than State and National elections; and in local elections only freeholders—property owners—were permitted the vote. James Fenimore Cooper, author of The Last of the Mohicans and other American classics, explained why:

"The governments of towns and villages, for instance, are almost entirely directed to the regulation of property, and to the control of local interests. In such governments universal suffrage is clearly misplaced, for several grave and obvious reasons, a few of which shall be mentioned. The laws which control the great and predominant interests, or those which give a complexion to society, emanate from the states, which may well enough possess a wide political base. But towns and villages regulating property chiefly, there is a peculiar propriety in excluding those from the suffrage who have no immediate local interests in them."

James Madison seriously considered the question of writing into the Constitution itself, the stipulation that only freeholders should be permitted to vote in federal elections (which were at first limited to the popular election of Members of the House of Representatives; Senators were elected by the State Legislatures, and Presidents and Vice Presidents were selected by the "un-instructed" members of the Electoral College). Madison explained:

"In future times a great majority of the people will not only be without landed, but any other sort, of property. These will either combine under the influence of their common situation; in which case the rights of property & the public liberty, will not be secure in their hands; or which is more probable, they will become the tools of opulence & ambition, in which case there will be equal danger on the other side."

James Madison uttered these words, and many more in similar vein, during one of those famous debates which occurred at the Constitutional Convention. When Madison had concluded his remarks, then Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania stood up to voice his fear of even the members of the House of Representatives being elected by popular vote, unless the vote were limited to freeholders.

"The Constitution as it is now before us, threatens this Country with an Aristocracy. The aristocracy will grow out of the House of Representatives. Give the votes to people who have no property, and they will sell them to the rich who will be able to buy them. We should not confine our attention to the present moment. The time is not distant when this Country will abound with mechanics & manufacturers who will receive their bread from their employers. Will such men be the secure & faithful Guardians of liberty?

... Children do not vote. Why? because they want prudence, because they have no will of their own. The ignorant & the dependent can be as little trusted with the public interest."

The idea of welfare recipients and government employees having the right to vote, would have been unthinkable to the framers of the Constitution; and the only reason that the franchise was not limited to freeholders—land owners—in the Constitution itself, was because the delegates felt—and rightly—that this was a matter which should be left to the determination of the States. And most States at that time were very jealous of the privilege of the franchise. In many States a man not only had to be a land owner in order to be able to vote; he had to be a confessing Christian landowner.

We recall these things because it is vital for us to understand the importance of land control and land use regulations. The basis of county government (the building block used to construct both State and National governments) is its power to tax property, property in land in particular. To break down this liberty of the local property owner to govern himself by introducing the control of his property by property-less voters, is to destroy the foundations of society in the American and in the Christian sense.

And to take the control of land away from the county and the local voters, and give this power to State governments, to say nothing of giving it to the National government, is to destroy the foundations of our system of government!

To even consider the idea of regional zoning ordinances, or State land use statutes, or Federal land use guidelines, would have made the Founding Fathers fight the Revolution all over again (even as they did in a sense in the War of 1812).

"The relationship of property and liberty is critical at the county level, and the centrality of county politics in early American history is unduly neglected," wrote R. J. Rushdoony. "It's neglect has contributed substantially to the decline of the American system.

"Attempts to eliminate the county as obsolete and redundant are thus attempts to destroy America as a republic and a federal system. Indirect attempts have also been prevalent. Two may be cited in passing. First, federal subsidies have undermined the independence and authority of county governments. Second, state-sponsored property-tax exemptions for war veterans have produced two generations of men who are unmindful of the burdens placed upon property and the erosion of property rights.

"The continuing vitality of the county, however, must not be discounted. Neglected by voters who are ignorant of its importance, it is indeed often heavily weighed with incompetent and dishonest men. Nonetheless, it is an area where thousands of dedicated men are waging a major battle for the American system."

The foregoing was, and remains, an accurate description. However, it now is incomplete. It was published in 1964. That was before the 1313-based Metrocrats had begun the destruction of local governments, the merging of county governments, and the creation of Regional Authorities which crossed over State boundaries and looked to Washington for money and power, ignoring both State and county governments when the occasion required such action. Also, it was not until 1970 that there was established the new Regional Governance System, so that the original United States and its territories were divided into Ten Federal Regions for administrative purposes, making both State and county governments obsolete, save as stop-gap administrative agencies of the Federal Bureaucracy. Moreover, it was not until 1972 that Federal Revenue Sharing came into being, with its subsidiary scheme—still to be implemented—for the collection of State-levied income taxes by federal tax collectors, so that Washington would have the power to control all government programs at all government levels, by means of the newly installed but little talked about management and control system called PPBS.

Now, control of the budgeting of all planning and programming at all levels of government, to be successful, demands also the control of all land and its use within the United States. So it was that a group of Planners, meeting in conference a year ago at Richmond, Virginia, announced that: "Private property... should be transferred to government or state agency ownership and then leased back to individuals under rigidly controlled regulations."

LIFE WITHOUT LIBERTY OR PROPERTY?

- - - - - Part Three - - - - -

BIG BROTHER AND THE LAND

"Some years before he became the Father of Our Country, George Washington spent the summer of 1749 surveying in Northern Virginia. On July 24 he laid out the town that eventually would bear his name and become the county seat of Rappahannock County. That was the last significant planning done in our county until last Thursday evening, when everybody went down to the court house to talk about a zoning law."

This was the opening paragraph of a recent column by the professional conservative, James J. Kirkpatrick. He went on to deplore the "zoning hysteria" that is sweeping the country, noting that if his home county, with a population of only 5,199, must get around to zoning laws, then "no community in the nation need despair of local action." He then shifted to a criticism of the current Federal Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act which has passed the Senate and awaits action in the House, remarking:

"I suspect there is vastly more to this bill than meets the eye. This bill has a nose like a camel; it has an edge like a wedge. I listened to the fervent declamations of its sponsors, whooping it up for states' rights, and I ask when Scoop Jackson and Hubert Humphrey (the bill's chief sponsors) got all that crazy about states' rights. What I hear is the squeak of a door opening; I hear the first shoe falling." The author finishes his personal testimony against federal land use legislation by declaring that he wants the use of his land determined in Washington, Virginia, not in Washington, D.C.

Most landowners will find themselves in complete agreement with Mr. Kirkpatrick's published sentiments. But there is one thing about this article that could be misleading. And that has to do with the time element. Perhaps the Planners just got around to the subject of zoning and land use in Washington, Virginia a few weeks ago. But if that be true, it is one of the very few places in these United States to escape the land use Planners for so long a time. Because, this desire to control the use to which every single square foot of land in the United States can be put, is a power that the power hungry Fabian Socialists have coveted for at least half a century.

At the risk of boring our readers by repeating something we have already published (DBR 1/12/73) we should like to go back in memory to the year 1934, when the Brain Trusters were trying to socialize the United States completely and irrevocably in FDR's first term as Benevolent Dictator of the Nation—and they might have succeeded had it not been for nine Supreme Court Justices who thought more of the writings of James Madison than a future Court would think of the writings of alien-born Gunnar Myrdal.

In 1934, a Congressional investigation was being held, one not unlike the current Watergate investigation, though there was no direct radio or television coverage of the proceedings, and the daily newspapers ignored the investigation. It had to do with some very serious charges that had been made by the superintendent of schools in Gary, Indiana, one Dr. William Wirt.

Dr. Wirt had been visiting in Washington, D.C. in the fall of 1933, and he had been invited to the home of a government official who thought that Dr. Wirt was "one of them in spirit." Also present were four other government officials and "one of the foremost propaganda agents of the Soviet Government." The five U.S. Government officials present were key representatives of the Department of Agriculture, the Agriculture Adjustment Administration (AAA), the National Recovery Administration (NRA), and the Public Works Administration (PWA). Dr. Wirt testified that these people felt the United States system of political, social and economic organization was no longer adequate to insure the well-being of the people. It was time for a Change, and there must be established a planned economy, wherein the activities of the people would be regulated through bureaus. They thought, said Dr. Wirt, that remuneration for labor (wage control) and investment in property (land use) should be under federal government control, even if the title to the property remained in private hands. Dr. Wirt said much more, but his sworn testimony that land use was a part of the plan for establishing a "regimented economy" is the point we wish to stress in this letter.

One year after that investigation (which no one seemed to take seriously until years later) and in furtherance of the plans of these change agents, President Roosevelt set up a National Resources Committee that was designed to establish the guidelines for the very program that Dr. Wirt had described.

In 1937 this committee submitted its report to President Roosevelt. The report urged the Federal Government to lead the way in setting a minimum standard of living for the inhabitants of the cities, called for a regional police force, for the abolition of slums, for rigid zoning and building codes, for new or revised State Constitutions, public housing, redistribution of industrial centers, establishment of a National Department of Transportation, for a "socially more desirable distribution of wealth," and urged the setting up of Regional Planning Agencies.

That first Planned Revolution was never really completed, because the revolution was swallowed up by a World War which had become an "economic necessity." And not much was heard of Regional Governance and Land Use and Planning Assistance until Richard Nixon was maneuvered into the White House as a result of the election of 1968. And then, according to Nixon himself, the New American Revolution began. However, insofar as land use is concerned, the action began in 1964. In that year Congress voted to set up a commission to review the "status of public lands held by the federal government." Nothing new or unusual about such a Land Law Review Commission, except for its composition and the attempt to pervert the purpose for which it was formed.

The commission was composed of eighteen members: six from the Senate, six from the House, and six who represented various private interests. And among the six private members chosen was Laurance Rockefeller, a longtime activist in profitable conservation causes and brother of CFR leaders David, Nelson, and John, Jr.

As soon as the Land Law Review Commission met, a power struggle developed. Representative Wayne N. Aspinall (D-Colorado) was the Congressional leader and he wanted to keep the work of the committee more or less to the subject of "public" lands. But Laurance Rockefeller wanted to investigate the use of all land, both public and private. A big feud developed between Aspinall and Rockefeller, which President Lyndon Johnson settled by compromise: he created a new group which he called the White House Conference on Natural Beauty. He named Rockefeller chairman of the new organization, and Aspinall became chairman of the old Land Law Review Commission.

The Aspinall Committee didn't get around to turning in its final report until 1970, and by that time Richard Nixon had become President of the United States, with considerable help having come from the Rockefeller Brothers. And, when Aspinall's report was handed in, the ecology claque on the Rockefeller Conference on Natural Beauty, hit the proverbial roof. Everything about the Aspinall report was said to be wrong. Nixon also tried to compromise, he borrowed the tactic that had been used successfully by LBJ, and named a new and "more important" task force, The Citizen's Advisory Committee on Environmental Quality, and Laurance Rockefeller was to be chairman of the new group. But Laurance was miffed, refused to be appeased, dropped all of his "official" chairmanships, and set up his own Independent Task Force on Land Use. He wanted no federal grants, this was to be an independent "citizen's action" committee. So it was financed copiously by the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, Laurance Rockefeller being the chairman of the Fund as well as the Land Use Committee.

This Rockefeller Task Force began by repudiating practically everything contained in the official Aspinall Report, and then began putting together a blue print for the total control of land in every State. Nixon seems to have ignored the Aspinall Report, because when he came out with his land use recommendations in his State of the Union Message of 1971, those recommendations were almost exactly what Laurance Rockefeller's "independent task force" had recommended. The President announced that, in addition to a federal "grant" program to promote the land control plan, he wanted federal sanctions against States failing to pass legislation "to regulate the siting of key facilities such as airports, highways, and major private developments." Just what was meant by a major private development was not spelled out, the bureaucrats would "make a judgment" on each individual case.

Congress seemed a little worried about the whole subject of "land use" and nothing was done about Nixon's recommendations in 1971. But in 1972, Senator Henry Scoop

Jackson came up with a land control bill that might have been written by William K. Reilly, an attorney who put together the Rockefeller Report on land control (Reilly had been borrowed from Russell Train's Council on Environmental Quality, to draw up the land control recommendations.)

Jackson's first land use bill was S. 632. It stipulated that within three years each State would be required to draw up a comprehensive land control plan for State and private property holdings. Federal funds were to be cut off from States that didn't follow the federal guidelines.

Senator Herman Talmadge of Georgia became the chief opponent of the bill and succeeded in getting it watered down considerably. But it remained a dangerous bill, and at one time during the Senate debate, Talmadge shouted angrily: "I want to make it clear that no federal official can sit here in Washington and determine how every acre of land in the United States will be used."

The majority of Senators evidently did not agree with the Georgia Democrat, because S. 632 did pass the Senate handily. However, the House was very busy with a lot of other bills, and S. 632 "died in the rush for pro-rogation," which means that the House adjourned before getting around to action on Jackson's S. 632.

Congressman Wayne Aspinall, by the way, learned what Richard Nixon may just now be finding out: that when you step on Big Brother's toes (Laurance Rockefeller's toes in Aspinall's case) you have decreed your own death as a politician. In the 1973 elections, Wayne Aspinall was defeated in the primary by a narrow margin and a friend of the Rockies, an obscure law professor at the University of Denver, Alan Merson, was elected. Then, having served his purpose, Merson was defeated in the general election, and went back to teaching law at Denver U.

Since what Rockefeller wants, Rockefeller generally gets, it is important to know just what was proposed in the final Rockefeller Task Force Report, which Laurance Rockefeller submitted on May 24, 1973, to Russell Train, chairman of the President's Council on Environmental Quality. Russell Train, incidentally, is an old protege of Laurance Rockefeller, having worked for him previously as chairman of the Conservation Foundation, one of Laurance's pet projects.

The following is quoted from an article by Richard E. Band, which appeared in the Review of the News for August 22, 1973:

"Among the many (Rockefeller) proposals there were three blockbusters:

"First, the federal government should ensure that the states clamp stringest regulations on the resort-home business. A cottage by the lakeside or the seaside, you see, should remain a privilege reserved to people with huge estates, people like the Rockefellers and the Fords and the Kennedys. Middle class folk can get on perfectly well without such extravagances. . . .

"Also, the Rockefeller report suggests that builders in undeveloped areas be forced to buy and preserve open spaces to insulate them from further building. Innocent enough, but could you really think of a better way to strangle suburban America and stunt the growth of a property-holding middle class that refuses to vote for the Rockefellers and their type — the sort of people who have moved, say, to Florida, Texas, Arizona, or California in search of new opportunity and relief from the cities?"

"A third chilling Rockefeller 'suggestion' was that the federal government be empowered to take over any private property at the owner's death if the Secretary of the Interior deems it of 'national significance.' Doubtless Big Brother would pay the 'fair market value' of the land to the survivors; but what if they loved the property and wanted to keep it for their own use and that of their children? Have seven hundred years and more of legal protection in this area simply gone up in smoke overnight?"

"In point of fact, Laurance Rockefeller even hints that the courts could juggle our property laws so perversely that the federal government would not have to restore the full market value of this confiscated land to the owners. . . . In other words, if Big Government cannot raise funds to compensate landowners, it should seize the property anyway under some convenient legal pretext. There is a technical term for this sort of activity. It is Communism."

(end of quotation)

The importance of this Rockefeller Report lies in the fact that it has the support of the Rockefeller-backed organizations—both official and independent—that are on the "Environmental Quality" kick. We are not against ecologists and environmentalists per se, but when they become so narrow in mental vision that they would save our countryside by destroying our Country, then we're agin 'em; especially when they go so far as to revoke the laws of inheritance in order to destroy property rights.

But, to continue: This Rockefeller report on land use was ushered into the legislative chambers by way of the Environmental Quality Council, where it was picked up by the previously mentioned Senator Scoop Jackson or some member of his staff, and then became the chief ingredient of the new bill which was introduced by Jackson, given the number S. 268, passed by the Senate and sent to the House for action by that body.

If passed by the House, or if a similar bill comes out of a Senate-House compromise conference, the bill is sure to be signed by whoever is in the White House at the time. This is most certainly true if Nixon remains as President, because he has already asked for legislation of exactly this type. An excellent discussion of Nixon's attitude on land use control appeared in a California newspaper dated Sept. 19, 1973 (we have the clipping but not the name of the paper.) Under the heading Nixon and Land Control, there is the following commentary:

If you are going to be free, you will have to be free some place.

This statement will make a lot more sense after you have thoughtfully considered what President Nixon and the Congress plan to do with federal control over land use—that is, federal controls over the use of privately owned land. Nixon has proposed, and Congress is acting on, a proposal to award state legislatures monetarily for adopting federally approved land-use laws and for withholding such rewards from such state legislatures that do not pass the sanctioned laws. The President urged Congress to enact a law that would support the kinds of land-use policies which he said the states themselves must ultimately adopt.

In urging this legislation, the President stated, "Land use control is perhaps the most pressing environmental issue before the nation. How to use our land is fundamental to all other environmental concerns."

Mr. Nixon is 100% correct. Land is basic. If the individual is free to develop his property he is free. On the other hand, if the landowner must get a by-your-leave from some politician, he is not free. That is what we mean when we say, that to be free a person has to be free some place. For example, one of the reasons the Puritan fathers came to the wilderness was that it provided a place where they could be free—at least for their line of beliefs.

You might wonder how either the federal government or the state governments derive their capacity to interfere with land development from the Constitution. The answer is, they don't. Their rationale is twofold:

- (1) land zoning and planning is an exercise of governmental police power, and
- (2) police power is "prior" to the Constitution.

By the term "prior" the zoners and planners mean that police power would be a part of any workable government, and hence was understood to be a part of the governments that were set up under the U.S. Constitution and the several state constitutions. (This is also referred to as an "implied" power that is said to exist without actually being enumerated in the Constitution—Ed.)

By this line of reasoning, any government could legitimately do anything by classifying the desired activity as a police power (or an implied power—Ed.)

Mr. Nixon along with his associates and some of his apparent political enemies, is rapidly building a reputation for a Constitution-be-damned attitude. For this much is certain, that the framers of the Constitution had two objectives. One of these was to frame a workable government. The second objective was to put a limit on the police power of that government. The Constitution itself contains the restrictive language, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." (Amendment X)....

The effort of Mr. Nixon, his associates and the Democratically controlled Congress to bribe the State Legislatures to adopt federally sanctioned land-use laws is a corruption of the Constitution. It has become a familiar pattern. (End of quotation).

The enactment of a Federal Land Use Act would probably be the final step in the plan for the complete socialization of the United States of America. For, without control of one's own property, one is without personal freedom. As the free enterprise economist, Wilhelm Roepke, has said: "If property, together with its inseparable concomitant, the law of inheritance, ceases to be one of the natural and primary rights which need no other justification than that of law itself—then the end of free society is in sight."

THE TURNING OF THE SCREWS ON OIL PUMPS IS WORSE THAN THE WATERGATE OVERSPILL

BLACK GOLD VS. PAPER GOLD

"If the existing foreign policy of our country is being made and carried out for the benefit of the American people," said a Congressman, "then something is wrong. Right now it appears to be the United States and Israel against the rest of the world. And if what we read is correct, even Israel is not behind us."

Presidents Nixon and Kissinger assured us that this was to have been "the year of Europe." But, instead of patching up the diplomatic bridges, Kissinger has been busy burning them down, chiefly because the nations of Western Europe refused to follow Kissinger's lead in aiding Israel and in condemning the Arab Nations as aggressors without reason.

The rift between Europe and the United States has been widening for more than a decade. Not a single one of our former allies in Western Europe approved of our policies toward Southeast Asia. They felt we had no right to send troops into Viet Nam, and they continued diplomatic recognition of the communist governments of Asia against our strong official protest because, our State Department felt any enemy of the United States should also be the enemy of those Nations which had received so much aid and assistance in the post-war years. But England, France, Italy and West Germany didn't approve of our involvement in Southeast Asia, and didn't mind saying so. The situation should have cleared itself up when the United States finally withdrew its armed forces from Vietnam and ended its military engagements in Asia. But, by that time, the detente with Russia had started, along with the US double cross of free China and the embracing of the Peoples Republic.

The Nixon-Kissinger dream of world security envisioned a Triangular Constellation composed of USA, USSR, and PRC, with the rest of the nations of the world being mere satellites within that Constellation. Japan and the Euromart Nations made such a fuss over this proposed arrangement—ruining the US dollar as an international exchange medium in the process—the Grand Design had to be altered and a Pentagonal Constellation was suggested: a World Authority with five power centers; the United States, Russia, China, Japan, and the United States of Europe.

But this new arrangement was still in the talking stages. Europe had to be appeased and the old traditional close ties restored. That's what "the year of Europe" was all about. And Nixon was to have made the Grand Tour, welcoming the Common Market countries into the New World Alliance. He was to reassure Western Europe that military security would not be loosened, that our new friendship for Russia and Red China would not affect our friendship with the Nations of Western Europe, that multinational trade conditions would be bettered because of the new Five Way World Authority, etc.

But Nixon's Grand Tour never happened, because there was a Middle East Explosion that shook the world and among other things, widened the rift between the United States and Europe even more. The NATO members didn't like the high-handed way in which Kissinger jumped into the Arab-Israeli conflict without even advising them of what he was cooking up with Russia's Brezhnev, and then expecting them to go along with his decisions, regardless of what they might entail in the way of oil shortages with a cold winter coming on. As one editor noted:

"It is no easy situation. Europe's diplomats and bankers have been traditionally close to the ruling families in the Arab nations. The closeness has been tightened by the emergence of oil as an ultimate weapon in waging economic and diplomatic war. Western Europe depends on the Arabs for 80 per cent of its fuel. Britain is in an extreme bind, dependent on the Arabs for 90 per cent of its oil supplies. In truth, the United States is the only industrialized nation in the free world that could get along if the Arabs closed all the valves in the oilfields... even such totalitarian allies as Greece and Spain withheld endorsement and cooperation in the American airlift of supplies to Israel; it was to be expected that Britain, France and West Germany would be reluctant in the face of Arab threats. What faced Europe during the Middle East military crisis was the question of whether it had sufficient economic and political strength to withstand an Arab cutoff of oil. Clearly, Europe felt helpless."

Kissinger was said to have been so angry with European Nations because they would not do his bidding, that he threatened to let NATO wither away and disappear. At a closed session of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on Monday, Oct. 29, Kissinger said he was "disgusted" with NATO because its members did not support him and his policies in the Middle East crisis. "I don't care what happens to NATO, I'm so disgusted," said the new Secretary of State. And, on the following day he met with a group of Western European members of parliaments, and bawled them out for not supporting him. Both Willy Brandt of West Germany and Edward Heath of the United Kingdom protested Kissinger's high-handed attitude. Their words might have been summed up, undiplomatically, with the remark that in Kissinger's case blood might be thicker than oil, but this was not true in the case of the Common Market which would go into cold storage if Arabian oil were cut off.

The real points of controversy and disagreement were explained in an article in the Washington Star-News of Oct. 27, 1973. We repeat that article:

UNITED STATES BLASTS NATO ALLIES

The Arab-Israeli war and this week's worldwide U.S. military alert apparently have strained relations between the United States and its European allies.

Government officials in several North Atlantic Treaty Organization nations were said to be upset because President Nixon did not consult them about the alert and because of comments he and the State Department made about the allies' behavior in the Middle East crisis. Nixon said at his news conference last night: "Our European friends hadn't been as cooperative as they might have been in attempting to work out the Middle East settlement." He noted that Europe gets 80 percent of its oil from the Middle East while the United States gets only 10 percent from them. He declared that Europe "would have frozen to death this winter unless there had been a settlement."

Earlier, State Department spokesman Robert J. McCloskey said America's allies had "separated themselves publicly from us" during the crisis when "we would have appreciated support."

Much of the American concern apparently centered on the unwillingness of the European allies to allow bases inside their territories to be used as relay points for arms shipments to Israel. U.S. officials said that West Germany formally protested such use of the bases. . . .

Nixon said he ordered the worldwide military alert Thursday (Oct. 25) because of indications of possible Soviet troop movements toward the Middle East. Prime Minister Edward Heath of Britain, President Georges Pompidou of France and Chancellor Willy Brandt of West Germany reportedly were informed of the alert after it was in effect and their advice was not sought beforehand, even though some of the alerted bases were in Europe. When asked to comment on the matter, a European at NATO headquarters in Brussels said an alerted U.S. base is a potential Soviet target and host governments should be consulted about base operations.

"If you have an American base in your country, and the Americans suddenly put it on alert, you might decide you wanted to take a long ride away from the neighborhood," the European said.

Other European diplomats were concerned about the big-power consultations on the Middle East between the United States and the Soviet Union (with the vitally interested European nations being excluded and ignored—Ed.)

* * * * *

"Disgusted" because the nations of Europe wouldn't cooperate blindly, Kissinger obviously took upon himself the role of peacemaker. Thus, as The New York Times of November 4 reported: "They flew to Washington one by one last week—Ismael Fahmy, the Egyptian Foreign Minister on Monday, Golda Meir of Israel on Wednesday, and Mohamed Z. Ismail, the Syrian Vice Foreign Minister on Friday. . . . It was a significant change from the postwar situation in 1967. Then, after the Israelis crushed the Arabs in the Six-Day War, Egypt and Syria broke diplomatic relations with the United States. This time the Arabs seem intrigued by the idea of dealing with Washington and testing President Nixon's pledge to mediate in the crisis — mostly, it seems, through his new Secretary of State."

(Correction Please:—Egypt and Syria were not intrigued by the idea of dealing with Washington; they were instructed to do so by their military provisioner, Leonid Brezhnev of the Soviet Union. There is every reason to believe that the military alert was preplanned by Kissinger and Brezhnev, and that on his last visit to Moscow, Kissinger made arrangements to assume the role of mediator, and that the Arab nations were so informed.)

Significant indeed were the words of a CBS radio commentator who seemed to find himself in the peculiar position of being pro-Israel and anti-Kissinger at one and the same time (as are those who don't realize that Communism and Zionism are political bedfellows). This commentator said, in part:

"...The Middle East cease-fire has become the political hemlock of the super-powers, which the Arabs and Israelis must swallow, or else. Both Arab and Israeli soldiers found it incredible to hear their own commanders give orders to cease fighting. However, can a cease-fire or a permanent peace be achieved when the super-powers played a major role in fueling that conflict?..."

"What we are witnessing in this cease-fire of the latest Middle East War is a repeat of the United States policy during the 1956 Suez crisis. The Eisenhower Administration blocked the British, French and Israeli military drive on Suez in association with the Soviet Union. Because of that policy in 1956, President Eisenhower was later compelled to send United States Marines into Lebanon in the summer of 1958 to frustrate further Soviet trouble-making. It is highly likely that the United States may make a similar decision regarding Israel in the future....

"The current cease-fire...is similar to the frustrations felt by the American commanders in Vietnam. The United States political leadership consistently denied a military solution and opted for a political one. As a consequence, nearly ten months after a political settlement in Vietnam, both parties are now seeking to solve their differences by military and not political means. The Middle East faces an identical fate...."

Whatever the future of this once Holy Land that witnessed the establishment of the New Jerusalem which is free, and the destruction of the Old Jerusalem "which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar" (Galatians 4); as the unstable cease-fire continues, three things have been happening: 1) Kissinger has taken it upon himself to act as Prince of Peace to Arabs and Israelis, has re-established diplomatic relations with Egypt. But otherwise his negotiations are secret deals; we do not know what success he may achieve on a temporary basis. 2) The nations of Europe have decided to disregard Kissinger and work out some peace proposals of their own; and 3) the Arabs have decided their black gold is far more valuable than the world's paper gold, and they have begun to bargain from strength.

From Brussels came the following dispatch as of November 7:

"The nine countries of the European economic community Tuesday adopted a joint statement on the Middle East conflict that urged Israel to withdraw from occupied Arab lands. The statement was clearly aimed at placating the Arab nations, from which the Common Market receives most of its oil supplies.

"In a related development, Japan Tuesday also called for Israeli withdrawals. Japan faces a loss of 40 per cent of its entire oil imports because of the Arab production cut-back. The Japanese Cabinet took the action at the request of Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ohira. It edged that country closer to diplomatic support for the Arab countries involved in the oil cutbacks.

"The European community's action indicated that the Arab world is succeeding in its tactic of using an oil boycott threat to put pressure on Western Europe. One Common Market member, the Netherlands, already has become a target of the boycott because of its allegedly 'pro-Israel' stance.

"The wording of Tuesday's statement was a sign of how anxious the community is not to antagonize the Arabs further. It called on Israel to 'end the territorial occupation which it has maintained since the conflict of 1967' and declared that peace in the Middle East is incompatible with 'the acquisition of territory by force.'

"The statement also backed the Arab contention that any peace settlement must take account of 'the legitimate rights' of the Palestinian refugees.... In referring to the latest Middle East war, it urged a return to the ceasefire lines of Oct. 22—a move that is being resisted strongly by Israeli because it would permit the escape of some 20,000 Egyptian soldiers encircled by Israeli forces." (End of quotation).

The ten Arab Nations are in the process of changing their strategy: regardless of the arms and munitions they receive from Russia (which are manufactured by means of the machinery and technical know-how supplied by the United States) the Arabs are no match militarily for the Israelis (who are supplied by the United States). However, if the conflict can be altered from a military war to an economic conflict, then the Arab Nations are among the strongest in the world.

There is yellow gold, that precious metal so highly regarded by all humankind that it will retain its value though thrones topple and Babylons burn. There is also black gold, the oil stored deep in natural vaults and storehouses, also extremely valuable when withdrawn and converted into petroleum products. The Arab Nations are possessors of vast quantities of this black gold. Then there is paper gold, a synthetic fabrication whose only value lies in the fact that it is accepted as a kind of international trading stamp by world and central banks. Paper gold, and all other unbacked paper currency, is valuable only so long as people place sufficient confidence in it to accept it in exchange for merchandise, and so long as governments accept it in payment of taxes.

But its "value" varies from day to day and from country to country. And the Arabs have come to realize that it is foolish to trade their black gold for paper gold, when they can just as easily trade it for yellow gold.

As Kuwait's Minister of Finance and Oil, Abdul Rahman S. Al-Ateequi, said in an interview with CBS news correspondent, John Sheahan:

"Why should I produce more oil and give it for unguaranteed paper money? Why should I produce oil, which is my own bread, my livelihood, and give it for a price which next year will be devalued for so much percent? That means that I am sacrificing so much percent for somebody else who is giving me unguaranteed paper money."

The Arab countries are, therefore, changing with the times. The new strategy is explained in the following news analysis by Jean-Claude Hazera of the Agence France-Presse.

10 ARAB NATIONS WIELD OIL WEAPON, WILL ORDER PRODUCTION CUTS OF 25%

Kuwait--The 10 Arab oil-exporting countries have decided to use the "oil weapon" with a heavier hand. They announced an immediate 25 per cent cut in output as compared with September. On Oct. 17 they had opted for a phase 5, per cent per month cut, and this process will come into play again from next month onward.

The ministers who reached the new drastic decision refused to make any comment on the political purport of their fresh move. But their meaning is obvious if one refers to their comments on Oct. 17 when the Middle East war was raging on two fronts. At that time, the oil producers called their decision an "appeal" and a "warning" to the Western countries. The earlier decision was intended as a slow-acting weapon in a war that was expected to be long.

But the intention of the new cutback was to create a shock, to demonstrate the strength and solidarity of the Arab nations at this critical moment when the Middle East is suspended between war and peace.

As regards solidarity, it is interesting that the move has created uniformity among the 10 countries concerned....

It is important, too, to note that the weekend move implies the drawing up by each country of three lists: Friendly countries, "enemy" countries, and neutral countries.

It is specifically laid down at this time that friendly customers will get the same amount of oil as during the first nine months of the year.

Since the United States and the Netherlands (listed as enemy nations--Ed.) account for less than 25 per cent of the Arab countries' clientele, the rest must be taken out of supplies to the so-called neutral customers.

Saudi Arabia has already drawn up its three lists but there appears to have been some difficulty in agreeing on who is in which list. Japan, for example, a major customer for Arab oil, is hard to pigeon-hole. Some countries regard Japan as neutral and others would prefer to regard it as friendly....

The discussions over the weekend were lengthy.... The ten countries attending were Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi, Qatar, Bahrein, Iraq, Egypt, Syria, Algeria and Libya. These OAPEC (Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries) members account for more than half of the world's oil exports....

Summary: Domestically, we have little need for Arabian oil; but US-based monopolists drill, produce, process, buy, transport and sell Arabian oil in Europe, etc. Theirs' is the shortage, they must pay higher prices for their product. Therefore, we in the United States must make up the loss by paying more for less oil and gas; and by having an "energy crisis" as we are forced to share the pinch with the multinationalists. Sic transit gloria Americi.

PUSHING THE PANIC BUTTON

NIXON'S LATEST CRISIS

"As the cold days of winter draw near," commented the Congressman, "the emotionalism associated with the energy shortage has fanned that shortage into such crisis proportions that it now approaches a wartime emergency status.

"The President's request for new powers to restrict American citizens' liberties and to curtail our life style are more far reaching than those imposed during any wartime situation we have known.

"By Executive Order, the President has already stopped the conversion from coal to gas; imposed a 10% reduction in airline flights; cut back heating oil for homes and offices by 15%; nationalized the temperature in federal buildings at 65 to 68 degrees, limited all federal vehicles to a top speed of 50 mph and proposed expediting of nuclear power plant licensing. Gasoline and heating oil rationing may be just down the road. The President has also sent emergency legislation to Congress seeking additional rubber stamp authority.

"The average American who is forced to curtail his activities because of arbitrary rules and regulations will soon begin looking for those responsible. The answer is not so simple as many news analysts would have us believe. Emotionalism of the hour makes it easy to shift the blame for fuel problems to Arab oil reductions. But, Americans need look no farther than Washington, D.C., to see that much of the energy dilemma is traceable to shortsighted planning by the Administration.

"Except for the proposals to speed the licensing of nuclear power plants and the funding of research and development of alternative sources of energy, no action is under way to increase production or refining capability in the U.S. No consideration has been given to the possible development of fuel from agricultural products—an annually renewable energy source. No immediate action is being taken to suspend the requirements for anti-pollution devices on motor vehicles, which are estimated to waste an additional 12.5 million gallons a day.

"The President has sought Congressional approval to regulate the scheduling and allocation of fuel for public carriers. There has been, however, no mention of one great savings of valuable fuel, and that is by discontinuing the massive busing of children to achieve racial balance. Reportedly, some school districts have even considered changing the school year to avoid heating classrooms, but no one would demand suspending the massive busing. Apparently, massive busing is more important to social planners than saving fuel.

"It will be a dark Christmas this year as electrical curtailments prevent outdoor holiday lighting, but I hope that the attention of the American public will not be diverted in seeking the guilty parties."

These were the comments of John R. Rarick, U.S. Representative from the 6th Congressional District of Louisiana; one of the few public officials who dared to voice a suspicion that there is more than meets the eye or assails the ear in this current "crisis."

Whether there is a real shortage of fuels is no longer material, a crisis has been declared to be in existence, Executive Orders have been published confirming this, and there will be rationing, regulating, and additional taxing of the people. These are things over which American citizens have no control; those who control the fuel and its distribution can do as they will without restraint if they wish to create a shortage at the consumer level. Interesting in this connection are the following news items.

From the Seattle Post-Intelligencer of Nov. 8, 1973:

"Washington—(AP)—A government report released yesterday indicates that fuel oil exports in 1973 'will drastically surpass 1972' despite a serious shortage in this country. A Cost of Living Council study requested by Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., predicts that 53.3 million gallons of fuel oil will be exported during 1973, a 284 per cent increase over 1972.

"However, the study said, '1972 was a depressed year and the rise in 1973 appears to be a return to a historical export level.' 'Apparently the lure of big profits is persuading major oil companies to export desperately needed fuel oil despite the shortage here at home,' Aspin said."

As for oil company profits, an editorial appearing in The Wall Street Journal of Oct. 26, 1973, is important reading:

THOSE OIL COMPANY PROFITS

Our heart goes out to the oil industry, now choking with embarrassment over third-quarter profits. At the very moment the Arabs have us in an oil squeeze and the nation is being asked to turn down the thermostats to save fuel, the oil bigs are forced to admit a tidal wave of earnings. The Exxon Corp., biggest of all, turned a $628 million profit in the third quarter on revenues of $7.32 billion, a spectacular earning surge of 80% over the same period of 1972. Mobil's profits are up 64% to $231 million. Gulf Oil jumped 91% to $210 million. Shell is less shamefaced with an earnings jump of only 23%...

On the same subject of oil company profits, Rep. Michael Harrington, D-Mass., inserted the following remarks in the Congressional Record of Nov. 6, 1973 (p. E7090):

"... We have listened for years to the complaints and warnings of the major oil companies that profits must go higher or the industry would not have enough incentive and capital to explore for and develop new reserves. Recently, the 'oil shortage' has been invoked by the major oil companies as the rationale for a massive advertising campaign extolling their civic virtue, urging the deregulation of natural gas, contending that environmental safeguards have made the development of additional energy reserves unworkable and expensive, and otherwise painting a picture of inadequate profitability for the industry. These figures, however, tell a different story.

"What is to be done? The Nation faces a national energy crisis, one which threatens the quality of life at home and the integrity of our policies overseas. Price controls have been imposed, but they are notably lenient for the oil industry, containing as they do 'production incentives' for the major companies. It is an appalling situation: a crisis is at hand, but oil companies are making record profits, under price controls.

"The truth is that the major oil companies have amassed so much power and influence that they can prosper at the expense of the American public and the American economy. While the small independents in the petroleum field have been going out of business, the majors have been growing fat. They have a virtual monopoly on the most vital energy resources of the country and, like the trusts of the late 19th century, they will continue to hold their monopoly until they are required to surrender it...."

Also most interesting is the indication that, while the local dealers and retailers, and the domestic consumers of oil and gas are to feel the pinch of this shortage, the shortage will not hurt the multinationals and the big industries!

This seems to be the gist of what Herbert Stein went to Europe to tell the multinational industrialists there. The Los Angeles Times Service, Nov. 15, 1973, carried the following article:

STEIN: NO OIL CRISIS LIKELY FOR INDUSTRY

Bonn—A 15 percent cutback in nonindustrial use of energy would "pretty effectively" isolate American industry from the energy crisis, Chairman Herbert Stein of the President's Council of Economic Advisers said here Wednesday. Stein described the energy crisis as critical, and said that if the Arab embargo continues, "some interference with total production in the United States is likely." The government's policy was, he said, to minimize the effect, both on production and employment. "It seems to me that if this policy is followed rigorously, the effect on production will be small," he told German businessmen and economists at a luncheon here.

"A cut of about 15 percent in nonindustrial uses of energy—that is, in home heating, private automobile transportation and some commercial enterprises—would pretty effectively insulate the productive sector from the energy shortage."

This could be done either by allowing prices to rise to encourage domestic fuel production and limit consumption, or by administrative methods, including rationing, Stein said. But, he emphasized, that, whatever ultimate decision is made, the need was for "strong action," and soon. "We must move promptly, by one means or another, to cut nonessential uses of energy," he said.

Stein minimized the oil price issue as fairly unimportant in the energy crisis. Doubling the price of crude oil would only mean a 3 per cent rise in the price of all goods and services, he maintained. He said that in trying to forecast price levels in 1980, the supply of money would be more important than the supply of oil. . . .

So, you see, it is the ultimate consumer—the individual American—who is to bear the full burden of this deliberately—or foolishly—created energy crisis. Not only will the individual consumer pay more for less gas and oil and gasoline; he also will pay at least 3 per cent more for anything else he buys, because the manufacturer will simply add his fuel and energy bill to the sales price of whatever he produces.

As this letter is being written, comes the announcement that it is the Nixon-created nemesis, the Office of Management and Budget, headed by Roy Ash of Litton Industries infamy, which will determine just how we are to be ruled and regulated, deprived and taxed, as a result of this artificially created crisis (we use the adverb advisedly.) Tim O'Brien of the Washington Post News Service seems to have the latest word:

“As predictions grow that the nation may face gasoline rationing as early as January, the government is working frantically to develop a system avoiding the gross abuses that accompanied rationing during World War II. An Office of Budget and Management Task Force has been charged with the job of developing techniques and options for rationing. . . . Efforts are just beginning, but the options have been narrowed down to these:

- * A coupon system similar to that used during World War II. The coupons would be turned in at service stations and would not be transferable. During World War II, the basic allotment was three gallons a week, but drivers who used their cars for business were allowed more, based on miles travelled a week. Certain car owners—firemen, policemen, clergymen, politicians and reporters—were allowed unlimited gasoline.
- * A ‘free market’ coupon system, in which the coupons would be redeemable for cash and transferable among car owners.
- * A tax system, in which gasoline would be heavily taxed by the federal government—perhaps from 30-40 cents a gallon—thereby driving down demand. This option, the planners said, is not strictly speaking a rationing system.
- * A combination of coupons and taxes.
- * Mandatory allocations of gasoline to service stations rather than to individual customers.

“‘These alternatives are our working skeletons,’ a rationing planner said. ‘What we are doing now is flushing them out—analyzing the costs of administering each program, trying to make the programs equitable for poor people, trying to account for the thousands of factors involved, such as the worth of coupons, the criteria for who gets how much gas. Rationing is horrendous.’ . . .

“Most planners expect that mandatory allocations of gasoline to service stations will be the first step in a series of increasingly tough actions. . . . Said a government planner who asked to be unnamed, ‘Rationing to service stations is the easiest proposal to administer. The service stations, in turn, will set gallon limits to their customers, and drivers will simply have to wait their turn.’ . . .

“Should mandatory allocation prove insufficient, the scenario would next call for ‘free market’ coupon rationing. The ‘free market’ coupons would be introduced as an alternative to the much abused coupon system of World War II, in which black market activities nearly turned rationing on its head.”

SCARE TALK ?

In our opinion, it is a sad commentary on the state of the Union when Don Bell finds himself agreeing with Ralph Nader. Let us qualify that admission: We are repelled by Nader’s suggested treatment for the Nation’s ills, all he has to offer are large doses of camouflaged socialism; but his diagnoses of particular ailments are often accurate. For example, in San Francisco on the night of Nov. 15, according to UPI, Nader told the American Nuclear Society that “the energy crisis is just scare talk.” Nader attacked President Nixon’s recent energy message for “what he did not say.”

“Nixon did not mention,” Nader said, “that 70 per cent of the nation’s energy is consumed by commerce and industry. He did not mention massive over-illumination by industry, nonessential items like aluminum beer cans that can best be described as congealed electricity, gas guzzling monsters out of Detroit, and the reverse rate structure by which the biggest users pay the lowest rates. . . . The aim of the oil industry, he said, was only to boost prices, build the Alaska pipeline, win freedom for offshore drilling, get rid of pollution structures, and squeeze the independents out of business.”

In addition to Nader’s notations, there are other details that are worthy of mention: First, with the help of certain American-based multinationalists, notably one Armand

Hammer and the Rockefeller Brothers, vast oil and natural gas fields in Siberia are being developed. The Soviet Union will want an export market, and Western Europe is such a potential market. Prior to the Arab embargo, Europe depended on the Mid East for its essential fuel. Russia, in egging the Arabian oil supplying nations into using oil as a war weapon, might have been double-crossing its own alleged allies in order to replace the Middle East as Europe's chief supplier. Meanwhile and secondly:

While an Arab embargo does not seriously endanger the United States, it has created a really serious oil shortage in Europe, one which the Soviet Union cannot yet relieve. However, as a stop-gap measure, and since gasoline sells in Europe for about three times its price in America, it could be that American-based oil companies are reaping huge profits by sending to Europe the gas and oil which should be sold in the United States; thus causing an actual shortage in the United States and, at the same time, causing an increase in the price of gasoline and heating oil in the United States, so that in the long run, American and European prices both will come to be comparably high.

Nonetheless, whether the energy shortage in the United States is artificially created or real, makes little difference to the ultimate consumer, because there remains the shortage, which has created a crisis, and which in turn has been of great aid to Nixon in his fight to stay in the White House.

Congress finds itself in the position of talking about impeachment of the President while at the same time acting as his rubber stamp. For the Congress must obey the President, since it has given Nixon the power to force obedience. It should never be forgotten that through a series of Executive Orders which the Congress permitted to become law through inaction, the President has the power to declare martial law, and nothing could stop him so long as the Pentagon stays on his side.

Controversial columnist Jack Anderson was the first to mention this in a nationally syndicated column. Anderson pinned the fact on the "hot summers" of the late 1960s; but he did give national publicity to a little known danger of dictatorship if and when the man in the White House (whoever he may be at the time) chooses to give the order.

Anderson does not mention Executive Order 11490, signed by Nixon on Oct. 28, 1969, which gave the President full power to declare a state of dictatorship. Anderson only refers to one of several of the emergency plans stemming from that Executive Order. Anderson also says that Nixon initiated the plan. Actually, President Kennedy was the initiator of the scheme. Otherwise, Anderson's report is factual and accurate. Here are excerpts from his syndicated column which appeared in subscribing dailies on Nov. 15, 1973:

NIXON HAS A PLAN USING MARTIAL LAW

One of President Nixon's earliest acts after he moved into the White House was to draw up contingency plans for the call-up of federal troops in case of a domestic crisis.

The planning was intended to cope with the widespread riots and demonstrations that rocked the nation in the late 1960s. The President has the power to implement the plans, however, any time he feels conditions "make it impractical to enforce the laws."

Some high officials, aware of Nixon's belligerent attitude toward his Watergate critics, wonder whether he would use his emergency powers to hang on to the presidency if he should be faced with impeachment.

Sources close to the President insist he loves the United States too much to tamper with its democratic institutions. He is also showing a new willingness to consult congressional leaders. But this hasn't entirely stopped the worried whispers, which we have heard at the highest levels of government.

The plans are ready for him to declare a state of emergency...if he should choose. One classified document, known as the "Interdepartmental Action Plan for Civil Disturbances" outlines the responsibilities of the Defense and Justice Departments in the event the armed services are mobilized. This detailed plan, which includes sample proclamations and executive orders for the President to sign, was delivered to Nixon on May 19, 1969. He initialed the "approve" line and then scribbled "Good Planning" in the bottom margin. Although the emergency plans are over four years old, they have been updated and reflect present policy....

This energy crisis could be the forerunner of a far greater crisis; one of revolutionary proportions!

THE DEVELOPING WORLD CORPORATION

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS, MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS, AND NATIONAL GOVERNMENTS

"The multinational corporation not only promises the most efficient use of world resources, but as an institution, it poses the greatest challenge to the power of a nation-state since the temporal position of the Roman Church began its decline in the 15th century."

So stated George W. Ball, former U.S. Under Secretary of State, former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Organization, member of the Council on Foreign Relations, member of the Steering Committee of the Bilderberger Group, an executive with the international banking house of Lehman Brothers, etc.

Confirming Ball's opinion and adding evidence in substantiation are, among others:

Hon. Sam Gibbons, D-Fla., in a discussion paper on multinational corporations: "No multinational corporation in its right mind would voluntarily submit to government regulation."

An unidentified Dow Chemical Company official admits to a continuing dream of "buying an island owned by no nation, and of establishing the world headquarters of the Dow Company on the truly neutral ground of such an island, beholden to no nation or society."

Anthony Sampson, author of the book, The Sovereign State of ITT, observes that multinational corporations invariably regard governments, like other obstacles to management, as nuisances to be circumvented or overcome.

On February 7, 1972, there was held a White House Conference on The Industrial World Ahead, which was called A Look At Business in 1990. Chairing the meeting was Roy Ash, then president of the multinational Litton Industries, later to be appointed Director of the expanded and restructured Office of Management and Budget.

On May 18, 1972, Ash appeared before the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce to say, among other things:

"So, as we look ahead to the world economy of 1990 we already see some parts falling into place. World business already is rapidly increasing. Multinational corporations are increasingly a fact of world business. Governments are beginning to perceive the meaning, problems and opportunities of a world economy. High on official agendas, world-around between now and then, will be programs to reconcile national interests, the forces of world business and international objectives. For, in the final analysis, we are commanded by the fact that the economies of the major countries of the world will be interlocked. And since major economic matters in all countries are also important political matters in and between countries, the inevitable consequence of these propositions is that the broader and total destinies—economic, political and social—of all the world's nations are closely interlocked. We are clearly at that point where economic issues and their related efforts can be considered only in terms of a total world destiny, not just separate national destinies, and certainly not just a separate go-it-alone destiny for the United States." In other words, World Government would be forced upon us, not through political necessity, but for economic expediency; not by intranational government, but by multinational corporations!

Foreshadowing what was to come:

When the Federal Trade Commission brought suit against the multinational Xerox Corporation, officials of the corporation refused even to meet with representatives of the commission, because "We don't believe the Federal Trade Commission is the appropriate forum for the resolution of the problems of multinational corporations." Cooler and wiser heads intervened, pointing out that the time had not yet come for a climactic confrontation between a federal government and a multinational corporation."

A recent AFL-CIO report pointed out that multinational corporations already "hold nearly $300 billion in cash reserves, more than twice as much as is held by all central banks and monetary institutions. This huge financial power is used to dictate policy to governments, menace workers and even the independence of nations.'"

What we know about the multinational corporations (which we shall refer to as MNCs in the remainder of this Report) should be sufficient to make us extremely fearful of their power and potential. They are giants, in size and influence. They are growing twice as fast as the estimated 5 percent per year growth of the world economy. If MNC sales were compared to the gross national product of the various countries, 51 of the world's greatest money powers would be MNCs, 49 would be countries.

According to a report issued by the United Nations on the subject, the top 15 MNCs of the world, with their total sales in 1971, and the percentage of those sales which were made in foreign countries, reveals, in the order of their size:

General Motors. Total sales: $28.3 billion. 19% foreign sales in 21 countries.

Exxon. Total sales: $18.7 billion. 50% foreign sales in 25 countries.

Ford. Total sales: $16.4 billion. 26% foreign sales in 30 countries.

Royal Dutch/Shell. Total sales: $12.7 billion. 79% foreign sales in 43 countries.

General Electric. Total sales: $9.4 billion. 16% foreign sales in 32 countries.

IBM. Total sales: $8.3 billion. 39% foreign sales in 80 countries.

Mobil Oil. Total sales: $8.2 billion. 45% foreign sales in 62 countries.

Chrysler. Total sales: $8.0 billion. 24% foreign sales in 26 countries.

Texaco. Total sales: $7.5 billion. 40% foreign sales in 30 countries.

Unilever. Total sales: $7.5 billion. 80% foreign sales in 31 countries.

ITT. Total sales: $7.2 billion. 42% foreign sales in 40 countries.

Gulf Oil. Total sales: $5.9 billion. 45% foreign sales in 61 countries.

British Petroleum. Total sales: $5.2 billion. 88% foreign sales in 52 countries.

Philips Gloeilampfabrieken. Total sales: $5.2 billion. No figures on foreign sales but has subsidiaries in 29 countries.

Standard Oil of California. Total sales: $5.1 billion. 45% foreign sales in 26 countries.

MNCs, worldwide, are doing about $500 billion worth of business a year. This is one-sixth of the whole world's production, or more than the entire gross national product of Japan. To put it another way, each of the top ten MNCs has annual revenues larger than the gross national product of two-thirds of the countries of the world.

Furthermore, foreign investments of MNCs has begun to erase national boundaries. For example; Germany has more capital invested in textile and chemical plants in the State of South Carolina than anywhere else in the world outside of West Germany itself. The largest Swiss MNC, Nestle Alimentana S.A., does 98 percent of its business outside of Switzerland. Japanese investments in the United States are phenomenal, especially in California and Alabama. By the same token, U.S.-based MNCs are said to control over 50% of all European production. As an example: U.S.-based MNCs control over 90% of Europe's production of micro-circuits.

But the home base seems to have less and less to do with the production site. Fortune Magazine's latest list of the 500 largest MNCs shows that 200 are foreign-based, but with enormous holdings in the United States.

This is a kind of internationalism that is not only wiping out national boundaries, it also defies control by national governments and is bringing on a new kind of World Authority in which money is king and in which politics must become subservient to economics in all respects.

And this is where the Bilderberger Group comes into the picture!

If you will glance again at the top 15 MNCs which we have listed, you will notice that two of the 15 are Dutch-based MNCs; Royal Dutch/Shell and Philips. It so happens that Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands is said to be an important figure in both of these MNCs, as well as in Societe General de Belgique, another huge MNC with worldwide holdings.

MNCs existed even before World War II, but they were not considered to be dangerous to, or actually in competition with, national governments. However, from 1949 on, MNCs began, not so slowly but surely, to dominate world markets. Example: one of the first, and still the sixth largest, MNC was IBM. By 1969, it had two manufacturing plants in the United Kingdom, two in France, three in West Germany, two in the Netherlands, one each in Italy, Sweden, and Belgium. In addition, there were research laboratories in Switzerland and Austria. As a British Fabian analysis noted: "When faced with the activities of a firm like IBM one can only feel that national boundaries seem irrelevant."

As George Ball remarked, the multinational corporation posed "the greatest challenge to the power of a nation-state since the temporal position of the Roman Church began to decline in the 15th century.”

Because of this challenge and to work out a “new scheme” for world control, in May, 1954, there was held a three-day meeting of the power elite of Europe and the United States. Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands hosted the meeting, which was held in Oosterbeek, a small town in Eastern Holland

FOR YOUR INFORMATION

Ford and the Bilderbergers

November 2, 1973

The Honorable Gerald R. Ford
H-230
U. S. Capitol

Dear Jerry:

It has been brought to my attention that your name has been associated with a group known as the Bilderbergers. This was reported in your biography in Who's Who in America. The Bilderbergers, I am given to understand, are a secret or quasi-secret international organization or movement which has been linked with representatives of foreign governments and international people of great wealth and influence, whose aims may or may not coincide with those of the American people.

Inasmuch as President Nixon has nominated you for the office of Vice President of the United States, a decision in which I will be called upon to cast my people's vote, I would greatly appreciate your advising me if you have ever been a member of the Bilderbergers or directly participated in any of their functions.

If your answer is in the affirmative, will you kindly supply me or the committee charged with investigating your qualifications to hold the office of Vice President with a detailed explanation so that the American people can know fully who the Bilderbergers are and what is their goal and mission. I would greatly appreciate your early reply.

Sincerely,
John R. Rarick
Member of Congress

November 10, 1973

The Honorable John R. Rarick
1525 Longworth House Office Building
Washington, D.C.

Dear John:

Your letter of November 2 asking my relationship if any, with the Bilderbergers, has been received.

In 1963, as I recall, I was invited by Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands to attend a meeting of the Bilderberg group in Stockholm, Sweden. I accepted for two reasons: First, I was informed that the U.S. delegation included outstanding which boasted a luxurious hotel called the Hotel de Bilderberg (from which the group derived its name.) Most important American guest at that first meeting was David Rockefeller of the Rockefeller Multinational Empire. Also present were other MNC executives, prime ministers and ministers of state, past and present, diplomats, leaders of the Socialist International, International Bankers, etc.

business and industrial leaders from the United States plus a number of high ranking U.S. government or former government officials from our country. I was also informed that the delegation from the other nations would be of similar stature. Secondly, my Congressional District (Fifth Michigan) at that time had better than 50 percent citizens with a Dutch heritage. Prince Bernhard had visited my District when he came to the United States in 1952. Under these circumstances, a rejection of this invitation from Prince Bernhard would have been most ill-advised and certainly misunderstood by many of my constituents.

In 1964 I attended another Bilderberg meeting for one day at Williamsburg, Virginia. Again the invitation was extended by Prince Bernhard. Although invited in 1965 I regretted on the basis that my new duties as Republican House Leader precluded me from being away from the Congress in Washington, D.C. for the three or four days scheduled for the meeting in a European nation. I have received no subsequent invitations after 1965 and, therefore, attended no other meetings of the group. The two meetings that I did attend in 1963 and 1964 I found most interesting. The individuals, in attendance from all nations, represented a cross section of business, labor and government. It was a gathering of individuals with a wide range of political philosophies and, therefore, most challenging.

The agenda covered a myriad of subjects that were of interest to the parties present, all relating to the well-being of the Free World. Everyone had an opportunity to speak freely on each subject and most of those in attendance did. Obviously there were many divergent views. There was no effort at any time to reach a consensus and a plan of action. No resolutions were approved. No determination was made to implement any program under the sponsorship of the Bilderberg group, most certainly no program was advanced, adopted or endorsed, whose aim could be characterized as not coinciding with the American people.

I hope this information is satisfactory but if you have further questions please call on me.

Warm personal regards,
Gerald R. Ford, M. C.

Prominent at this and/or subsequent meetings (which have been held at least once each year since that time) were Baron Edmund de Rothschild of the House of that name, C. Douglas Dillon of Dillon Read & Co., Robert McNamara of the World Bank, Sir Eric Roll of S.G. Warburg & Co., Ltd., Pierre Paul Schweitzer of the International Monetary Fund, George W. Ball of Lehman Brothers, etc.

Two years after the first Bilderberger Group meeting, there was formed a Steering Committee of 39 members, fifteen of them being from the United States, every one of the fifteen being an officer or member of the Council on Foreign Relations!

Those 15 CFR members who also became members of the Steering Committee of the Bilderberger Group were George W. Ball, Gardner Cowles, John H. Ferguson, Henry J. Heinz II, Robert D. Murphy, David Rockefeller, Shepard Stone, James D. Zellerbach, Arthur H. Dean, Gabriel Hauge, C. D. Jackson, George Nebolsine, Dean Rusk and General Walter Bedell Smith.

There also is an Advisory Committee, which is said to be just as important, and just as close-mouthed about its activities, as the Bilderberger Steering Committee. On this Advisory Committee have been, or are, the following Americans, who happen also to be officers or members of the Council on Foreign Relations: Joseph E. Johnson, Dean Rusk, Arthur H. Dean, George Nebolsine, John S. Coleman, General Walter Bedell Smith, and Henry J. Heinz II.

Gary Allen wrote, in his None Dare Call It Treason (hard cover edition, January 1973):

"As this is written, there have been 29 Bilderberger meetings (two more have occurred since that writing—Ed.). They usually last three days and are held in remote, but plush quarters. The participants are housed in one location and are protected by a thorough security network. Decisions are reached, resolutions adopted, plans of action initiated, but only Bilderbergers ever know for sure what occurred. We must assume that these people did not congregate merely to discuss their golf scores (or to trade their opinions of world affairs without ever coming to an agreement on what action should be taken, as suggested by Gerald Ford in his letter to Rep. Rarick—Ed.)."

"Why all the secrecy," asks Gary Allen, "if there is really nothing to hide? Why do the Ford, Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations finance the meetings if they are not important? Yes, why?"

At a meeting which took place at Laurance Rockefeller's Woodstock Inn at Woodstock, Vermont on April 23, 24 and 25, 1971, one local newspaper, the Rutland Herald, was able to obtain some scanty information on what the meeting was all about. The April 20, 1971 issue of the Herald reported:

"A rather tight lid of secrecy was being kept on the conference.... A closed-door meeting was held in Woodstock last week to brief a handful of local officials on some phases of the conference. One participant of the meeting insisted Monday that the officials were told the meeting would be an 'international peace conference.' However, other reliable sources said the conference will deal with international finance.... The Woodstock Inn will apparently be sealed up like Fort Knox.... No press coverage will be allowed, with the exception of issuing a statement at the close of the meeting on Sunday."

Present at the meeting was Henry Kissinger, errand boy for the CFR-Rockefeller Cabal, Nixon's Number One Foreign Policy Advisor and later to become Secretary of State. He reportedly shocked the foreign dignitaries attending the meeting by bringing with him an uninvited and unnamed female companion. Shortly after this Bilderberger meeting, Kissinger made his first secret trip to Peking, to arrange for the acceptance of Red China into the family of trading nations. Also soon afterward, there occurred an international monetary crisis, as a result of which the United States dollar was devalued.

Because of the tight secrecy surrounding these Bilderberger meetings, we can judge what happens and what decisions are made at them, only by 1) observing the world-changing events which occur after a meeting has been held, and 2) by noting who attends the meetings. In this latter connection, it should be noted that Bilderbergers are International Bankers, Multinational Executives, past or present Government Officials, Heads of the Communications Media, and selected writers, speakers and opinion molders, all of whom are approved by the CFR!

Gerald Ford's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, the purpose of the Bilderberger Group would seem to be to make the world the footstool of the Multinationals. And if this means the end of nation-states, so be it, say the Bilderbergers.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AND LAND USE REGULATION

PLANNERS OF DICTATORSHIP

"It is increasingly clear that, in the 20th Century, the expert will replace the industrial tycoon in control of the economic system even as he will replace the democratic voter in control of the political system... In general (the individual's) freedom and choice will be controlled within very narrow alternatives...."

This rather revealing quotation is from the book, Tragedy and Hope, by Professor Carroll Quigley, a widely known historian who taught at Princeton and Harvard before taking his post at Georgetown University's Foreign Service School in Washington, D.C.

We reviewed this book, pointed out its importance, and quoted extensively from it, in our series of Letters entitled And the Barbarians Captured the Beloved Country, published in 1966 (the books are now collectors' items). Recently, Dr. George S. Benson of The National Education Program, Searcy, Arkansas, obtained a copy of Prof. Quigley's book, reviewed it, and confirmed what we had said of the book in 1966. Dr. Benson writes, in part:

"One of the bombshell revelations of Professor Quigley's book is its documentation on the formation of a secret society known to its insiders as 'The Circle of Initiates' and with the objective of gaining political and governmental control of the world through expansion of 'The Circle' into the major countries.... Professor Quigley apparently finds no fault with the goal of the secret 'Circle' whose subsidiaries, under the names of 'The Round Table' and 'The Establishment' now function in the United States and other major countries. His book says that 'The Establishment' in the U.S. has virtually controlled the two major political parties (and even financed some Communist activities).... He seems to believe that consolidation of political and economic power in the hands of an elite of 'experts,' in spite of its suppression of individual freedom, constitutes an advancement for mankind. The system he foresees would be a form of State Socialism, with Government bureaucrat 'experts,' evidently chosen by the secret society, controlling the social and economic lives of the people.

"Political, government and economic developments in the United States in recent years would seem to indicate how such a scheme of consolidated power and control could be progressively instituted. On the day I began writing this series of columns, the New York Times published a comprehensive article on 'The nationwide movement toward land-use regulation.' The Times said the movement 'poses an array of important and rather inescapable policy decisions that the public is going to be called on to resolve.' Here are the significant paragraphs:

"The concept of land as a purely private commodity to be regulated by economics seems to be giving way to the concept of land as a national resource.... Implicit in the new "land ethic" are two fundamental shifts of power. One is movement of the initiative in land-use planning from individual owners and developers to the general public, acting through governmental agencies. The other is a certain redistribution of wealth implied in large-scale land-use control: Individual freedom to maximize profits from land is replaced in various decrees by collective decisions about the disposition of land. Any way you spell it out, this is State Socialism, and it follows the Marxist Socialist maxim which calls for the abolition of private ownership of property and redistribution of wealth. Quigley's book significantly says 'The Establishment' has exerted a controlling influence on the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Christian Science Monitor, and other powerful media."

(End of extended quotation)

Dr. Benson agrees, then, that land-use regulation is State Socialism, following the step-by-step pattern laid down in Quigley's book. Another who agrees is Congressman H.R. Gross, Iowa Republican. Several weeks ago, he warned in a report that:

"One of the most insidiously socialistic bills that has come before Congress since I have been in Washington is currently making its way through the House, having already been approved by the Senate with scarcely any notice being paid to it by the press of the nation. It is S. 268, a bill by Senator Jackson, of Washington, which would effectively destroy the rights of landowners that have existed since Anglo-Saxon times.

"This extremely dangerous legislation would take away the rights of property owners to determine the use of their land and put it in the hands of distant bureaucratic planners, some of them in the State capitals, but those with the ultimate authority in Washington, D.C.

"This national land use bill, if it passes, is the answer to the prayers of those who would place ever more controls on the individual freedoms of the American people. It is the obvious child of the ecological zealots who have already panicked Congress into passing so-called environmental protection measures that are likely to wreak far more havoc than benefit.

"The Jackson bill would effectively strip the States and local governments of their traditional rights in planning and regulating land use by using the tried and proven formula of dangling huge federal 'grants' before them as inducements to surrender their planning functions to the 'horde of federal bureaucrats. The bill is replete with the familiar litany of the liberals—wholesale damnation of Americans as a selfish, unprincipled people—a people who, in this case, use their land 'unrelated or contradictory to sound environmental, economic and social... considerations. The 'sound considerations,' of course, are only those with which the super-liberals agree.

"And the bill contains iron clad provisions which make it plain that those 'sound' uses for land will be determined and dictated from Washington. For example, it gives a veto power over land use plans to the federal Environmental Protection Agency and to the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

"But it also allows the 'planners' of the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, HEW, Transportation, Treasury, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Council on Environmental Quality, the Council of Economic Advisors and the Office of Management and Budget to object to or approve any land use plans of the several States. It goes almost without saying that the bill also creates a huge new bureaucracy to oversee and wield vast power over citizens...." (Italics added for emphasis—Ed.)

If and when national land use regulations are issued en masse, the chief bureaucratic conglomerate to assume control over the use of private land (or should we say formerly private land?) will be the Environmental Protection Agency, which has already set up the machinery for control of the use of every square foot of land within the United States and its territories and protectorates.

As a result of the activities of what Congressman Gross referred to as the ecological zealots, the National Environmental Policy Act was signed into law January 1, 1973, to "maintain conditions under which man and nature can exist in productive harmony, and fulfill the social, economic, and other requirements of present and future generations of Americans." President Nixon appointed a Council on Environmental Quality to coordinate activities at the federal level. Then, on December 2, 1970, the United States Environmental Protection Agency was created, "bringing together for the first time in a single agency the major environmental control programs of the Federal government.

In due time, as Executive Orders paved the way for the establishment of Ten Regional Governments within the United States, the EPA took its place as one of the Federal agencies working out of the ten regional capitals, and its regional directors forming a part of the Regional Councils which governed those ten regions into which the United States had been divided.

The President's Reorganization Plan No. 3 assigned the following functions to EPA: The Federal Water Quality Administration transferred from the Department of Interior.

The National Air Pollution Control Administration—a new bureau.

The Bureau of Solid Waste Management another new bureau.

The Bureau of Water Hygiene—yet another new bureau.

The Bureau of Radiological Health—transferred from HEW.

The Federal Radiation Council—another new one.

Also transferred to EPA were responsibilities and authorities for:

Establishing standards for environmental chemicals—from the Atomic Energy Commission;

Establishing tolerances for pesticide chemicals—from HEW.

Registering and labeling of pesticides—from the Department of Agriculture;

Conducting research on pesticides—from several departments;

Conducting research on ecological systems—from the Council on Environmental Quality.

Then Congress passed and the President signed into law the Noise Abatement Control Act, and EPA became the official federal noise abating agency.

That should have kept EPA quite busy; but since land control also was in the works, EPA "experts" started making plans. Seminars and workshops were held on "The Relationship Between Land Use and Environmental Protection."

We have a copy of "A Briefing Document for the Joint Meeting of the President's Water Pollution Advisory Board and Air Quality Advisory Board," but the document seems more concerned with land than with water or air. Presented at a meeting held March 27-31 1972 at the Center for Environmental Studies at Argonne National Laboratory, Argonne, Ill., it has to do with "The Relationship Between Land Use and Environmental Protection. Following are direct quotes without comment:

Simply stated, the mandate of the EPA is to define environmental quality standards and to provide leadership and assistance to state and local governments in establishing programs designed to achieve and enforce these standards...it is (now) necessary ...to enter a second stage in which environmental protection is viewed within the broader perspective of urban and regional development...The environmental impact of land use development is pervasive in that almost all forms of economic activities--residential, industrial, transportation, recreation, etc.--have contributed to some instances of environmental degradation...

The public institutions most concerned with guiding land use are primarily the planning agencies. The term 'planning agency' refers to any of several organizational forms with various scopes of responsibility at different levels of government...Planning at the metropolitan and regional level has undergone dramatic change in the last few years with the enormous increase in the number of councils of government (COGs). The rapid increase in the number of COGs and the regional planning agencies in general, is directly attributable to their favored treatment by the federal government. Starting with the initial funding authorization in the 1965 Housing Act, federal matching funds have been available to regional councils for an increasing number of programs... The 1966 Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act added additional strength by empowering such agencies to review applications for federal grants from public and private bodies... As of April, 1971, the federal Office of Management and Budget had designated 403 metropolitan and regional bodies, commonly called "clearing-houses," to conduct such reviews....

The system of land-use guidance techniques used by planning agencies may be divided into five categories: advice, controls, inducements, development, and acquisition. Advice is the oldest and most frequently used device. Such plans seldom carry any legal authority... Controls, especially land-use controls, have been the major tools used by local governments to implement their plans... Inducements or incentives have been used to attract particular land uses and developments which contribute to certain objectives... Public land development or public works had a great effect on shaping and directing growth through construction of transportation systems, public institutions and utilities...

Finally, acquisition involves the direct purchase of lands...

In addition to its traditional role in the management of public lands, the federal government currently engages in a broad range of land use-oriented activities... Other than the EPA, the key federal agencies which currently have responsibilities in one or more of these areas include the departments of Commerce, Defense, Interior, Agriculture, HEW, HUD and Transportation, as well as the Atomic Energy Commission, the Federal Power Commission, and the Office of Economic Opportunity... Although EPA now has the legal authority to establish land use controls, this authority is at present limited, indirect, and in some areas implicit rather than explicitly defined (hence the need for Senator Jackson's Land Use Act-Ed.)

The preceding requires little comment; but it should be emphasized that the EPA and other planning and regulatory agencies that are to exercise dictatorial power over the use of all land within the United States, are to operate at regional levels through the Ten Federal Regional Councils, and that all land use programs are to be cleared through and approved by the Office of Management and Budget (meaning direct application of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System to land control throughout the United States.)

It is also important to understand that this Regional Governance scheme with its PPBS control mechanisms is an international conspiracy, and that land control in the United States is but part of planned land control on a worldwide scale. This is made clear in the following article which is from the New York Planning Review, winter-spring 1972 issue. Our thanks to Col. Arch Roberts of the Committee to Restore the Constitution for having called this item to our attention:

The United Nations sponsored a symposium on the training of planners for comprehensive regional development in Warsaw 14-28 June, 1971, with the government of Poland as host. The principal participants were delegates from twenty developing countries. It was an interdisciplinary meeting. Three divisions of the UN Department of Economic and Social Affairs were involved: the Division of Community Development, the Division of Public Administration, and the Centre for Housing, Building, and Planning. Other UN agencies, such as WHO, took part. Several international non-governmental organizations were represented by Charles Asher: the International Federation for Housing and Planning, the Interamerican Planning Society, and others. The AIP (New York Metropolitan Chapter) was represented by Samuel R. Moses.

For purposes of this symposium, "region" was a sub-national area, larger than the formal political boundaries of province or city. Not much time was spent in defining regional boundaries. The Final Report says: "Flexibility should be maintained in delineating regions to assure their compatibility with national requirement of socio-economic development and with rapidly changing economic, social and technological developments."

It was also promptly recognized that regional planning encompassed economics, sociology, geography, engineering, physical planning and other disciplines. It was also asserted that an understanding of the methods and values of regional planning must be acquired by the administrator, as well as the planner, indeed, also by the "political decisionmaker" and specialists in "sectoral planning," such as agriculture, public health, etc.

The inevitable debate arose over the "leadership of regional planning development teams." From whatever discipline the "leader" comes... he must "possess capabilities to generalize, coordinate and exercise a comprehensive approach based upon an interdisciplinary viewpoint.

There must be special training to develop these skills. "As the men move into administrative positions, they should get training in managerial and administrative functions."

For the developing countries, "training" seemed to have two quite different foci. On the one hand, need was expressed for high-level post-graduate centers of teaching and research to broaden knowledge. A Polish participant who had worked in Ghana said that, upon leaving, he had recommended the creation of a national section of the Regional Science Association. But an equally important training need was presented: the medium-term and short-term courses for persons already employed in the public service or about to enter it. Related to this training, an American observer suggested setting up a national section of the Society for International Development. His proposal was supported by the Ethiopian participant, himself a member of SID. There was an extensive technical discussion of regional statistical and information systems (PPBS-Ed.) and their harmonization with sectoral and central statistics. The regional systems should include not only economic statistics but data pertinent to social development. The symposium naturally considered the role of international agencies—governmental and non-governmental—in aid of training planners: resources, teaching materials, exchange of information... The symposium urged the United Nations to issue a Regional Development Planning Newsletter and convene further meetings. There rings in your reporter's ears the plea of a delegate from a small African country: "We have identified seven natural regions, but I have only five competent planners. What am I to do?"

(End of quotation from New York Planning Review)

So, you see, in promoting Regional Governance on a worldwide scale, there are two "quite different foci" to be considered: In the developing countries, the elite already has control of the land, and the need is for "experts;" while in the developed countries (like the United States), the elite has the "experts," and the need is for control of the land.

THE DICTATORIAL NATURE OF SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

THE IMPACT OF PSRO

In 1961 a socialist organization issued a pamphlet entitled The Case for Socialized Medicine. On page 34 of the pamphlet, under the heading "What To Do," there appeared the following instructions:

"We can do everything possible to encourage Federal intervention in the financing of medical costs on a bit-by-bit basis. And we can work to direct such intervention so that if it isn't socialized medicine proper, at least it paves the way for socialized medicine. To this end we must give high priority to attempts to amend legislative proposals in ways that'll involve the government in medical standards (their emphasis), and in a way favorable to cooperative and group medicine." (From The Case for Socialized Medicine, published by The Call Association, 303 Park Avenue South, New York City, a non-profit foundation.)

The promoting of socialism on a bit-by-bit basis has become most obvious in the medical field in the United States. When Wilbur J. Cohen became assistant secretary of HEW under President Kennedy, the pace of the socialist takeover of the medical profession accelerated noticeably. A man with a past record of communist front affiliations, Cohen was one of the many who fled from Washington to find sanctuary in some university (Michigan, in Cohen's case) when the Red Purges began; only to return when McCarthy, the principal purger, was himself purged and probably murdered.

Allen K. Brineyk MD, then vice president of the Los Angeles County Medical Society, attended one of those White House Conferences that were so popular in the 1960s, and he wrote of his association with Wilbur Cohen, giving the following appraisal:

"Mr. Cohen... indicated that he had also served as consultant on England's National Health Service Act and with the Canadian Government in its Health Care plans... He had just returned from a trip to England and said that the system was certainly superior to ours (which is, indeed, debatable), meeting the needs of the British people with the willing cooperation of the British Medical Profession (which is false)...

"Mr. Cohen's attitude was that the government has the right, if not the duty, to take from those earning more to give to the needs of those earning less..." (Excerpted from an article by Dr. Briney which appeared in The Bulletin of the Los Angeles County Medical Society, Jan. 18, 1962).

We mention Wilbur Cohen particularly because it was he who designed the plan of amending Social Security legislation in order to introduce socialized medicine into the country, exactly as the original socialist The Call had instructed. Marjorie Shearon, in her book Wilbur J. Cohen, the Pursuit of Power, published in 1967, declared:

"To gain his ends, Cohen has deceived five Presidents regarding Social Security legislation. He has deceived Congress. Pushing, manipulating, and scheming, he finally, in 1965, steered through Congress the bill known as Medicare, designed to nationalize medicine for ten percent of the population. ... The inevitable and predictable administrative chaos has ensued. Nothing that Congress can do, short of repeal, will undo the terrible damage already done by Medicare. The law is administratively unworkable, enormously expensive, and anathema to elderly patients, physicians, and hospitals. The man responsible for this medical calamity now hangs around the neck of President Lyndon B. Johnson like an albatross—a threat to the Nation's health and a political liability." (Under LBJ, Cohen was in complete control of HEW until the changing of the guard when Nixon went to Washington as President.)

Medicare led to Medicaid and scores of legislative attempts to repair the damage that had been done to the Nation's health care machinery through federal interference. Hospitals became overcrowded, services suffered along with patients, doctors spent more time with federal forms and papers, less time with care of patients. Costs began to soar for those who still paid their own medical bills. Nothing seemed to help, and fewer and fewer young men and women chose healing and helping the physically helpless as a profession.

In an attempt to repair the damage already done through political interference with the medical profession, another amendment was quietly tucked away in the 989-page Social Security Act which was passed during the final minutes of the 92nd Congress.

Known as the Professional Standards Review Organizations (PSRO), this law provides that:

"The confidential medical records of every patient treated under any of the numerous government-sponsored health care programs will be open to inspection by PSRO inspectors—which amounts to legalized burglary. Medical and psychiatric records would become public records. This plundering of doctors' offices is necessary for HEW to develop 'norms' to cover care, diagnosis and treatment of the ill. Once compiled, these 'norms' will be used to computerize the standards that doctors must use in treating patients.

"Doctors who fail to conform to these Washington-dictated 'norms' of treatment and prefer to rely on their professional training and experience face suspension from practice and fines up to $5,000. Some physicians have already notified their patients that after January 1, they will no longer treat cases whose fees are paid directly or indirectly by Social Security. Few doctors desire to practice their profession with a PSRO bureaucrat looking over their shoulders at their every medical decision. And few patients can blame the medical men who refuse to allow the government snoopers to invade the privacy of people under their treatment" (from a statement by Rep. John Rarick who, with a number of other members of Congress, has introduced a new bill, H.R. 11444, which would "remove this shadow of Big Brother government from the treatment rooms of our hospitals and our doctors' offices.")

The highly respected National Health Federation Bulletin for November, 1973, deals with the problem of PSRO. The article follows:

PSRO – PROFESSIONAL STANDARDS
REVIEW ORGANIZATION
(By Willadean Vance)

(An AMA-conceived plan, adopted by HEW and enacted into law, introduces a new, foreign philosophy of health care in America in which government bureaucrats will dictate standardized procedures in care, diagnosis and treatment which must be followed by providers of health care services, and which will make doctors' patient records available to government bureaucrats.)

"Rigid federal government controls on private medical records starting next January, 1974, will destroy personal doctor-patient relationships," says Dr. James R. Privitera of Covina, California, in an interview with John Steinbacher, managing editor of Health Gazette, and myself.

"The thing that hurts most," moans Dr. Privitera, "is we are sold out by the American Medical Association, without even a chance of being heard when they had their legal department draw up this PSRO bill that sold us out!"

The PSRO referred to by Dr. Privitera stands for Professional Standards Review Organization to be administered and controlled by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare under the Secretary of HEW, Casper Weinberger, who may become known as the first American Health Czar.

Professional Standards Review Organizations were established as legally-recognized government-related agencies by Public Law 92-603 passed by the 92nd Congress and signed by the President on October 30, 1972.

The law established regional PSROs as well as a national PSRO within HEW, was crowded into the very complex Social Security bill which had been before Congress for at least two years. But the PSRO section, at the last minute, was pushed into the bill consisting of 989 pages and consequently, was not given proper study or hearings and was given practically no publicity. Even the Senator who introduced the PSRO bill had no idea of how far-reaching it was, or the influence it would have on the practice of medicine. It has been said by one responsible member of the medical profession that this single act forms a basis for greater changes in the practice of medicine than had been provided by any health legislation in the history of this country.

A Professional Standards Review Organization is, basically, a peer review committee and there is nothing new in the concept of peer review committees in the medical community. Most hospitals, for example, have long had one or more peer review committees. For instance, there may be a tissue review committee composed of a few qualified members of the hospital's medical staff, having the responsibility of examining tissue removed surgically. This serves to deter unnecessary surgeries, encourage greater surgical competence, and to protect the patient's welfare. Peer review committees, whether within hospitals or within a local medical society have thus served well and have undoubtedly enhanced the quality of care available. However, these peer review committees have been voluntary and private, have come from within the profession itself, and is a demonstration of the efforts of the profession to police itself.

Now, with the enactment of the PSRO legislation, however, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare must set up a national review panel to be known as the Professional Standards Review Organization which, in turn, will contract with regional review panels or peer review committees to become the official government-associated PSROs. Under the terms of the law, if the HEW PSRO feels that the regional PSRO is not doing an effective job in carrying out the dictates of the national organization, the contract can be terminated and the national PSRO (HEW) can take over.

The basic concept of PSRO is that the government should assume authority over what has been a private function of a private professional medical society. The concept originated with the AMA legal department and was introduced into Congress as the Peer Review Organization section of the AMA-sponsored Medicare bill (AMA's brand of national health insurance) and was done so without the approval of the AMA House of Delegates. (Note: As this letter is being written, there is in progress at Anaheim, California, an AMA convention where this matter of PSRO approval is being debated. The AMA hierarchy is defending PSRO, but the rank-and-file members are rebelling. The final outcome of the controversy was unknown as this is being written—Ed.)

The controls which the PSRO law imposes upon the providers of health care services are beyond belief and cannot be covered in detail in this article but will be explored in depth in future articles. The excuse given for imposing controls is that "the costs of the Medicare and Medicaid programs have skyrocketed far beyond early estimates" and thus the government must step in to reduce these costs. Politicians justify the interference on the premise that the federal government is subsidizing health care and government can properly control anything it subsidizes. Their excuse based on "too much fraud in medical charges have been uncovered" falls rather flat when the records show that a total of only 16 doctors have been convicted in all fifty States in the six years since Medicare-Medicaid began under Social Security. This averages three physicians per year for the entire country—a threat?

At present, the law is applicable only to care which may be paid for in whole or in part under the Social Security Act. This is the health care presently given some 80 million aged, poor and disabled persons. In addition, if (or when) a national health insurance plan is enacted which probably will cover everybody, the PSRO rules and regulations will be applicable to every doctor in his care of every patient.

Under the PSRO take-over, doctors can be suspended from practice and fined up to $5,000 for failure to comply with the stiff rules laid down by the PSRO under which he practices, or the federal PSRO in HEW. This is the reason why some physicians have already notified their patients they no longer will treat patients whose fees will be paid directly or indirectly, in part or in whole, by Social Security. They have done this not because of dissatisfaction over a fee schedule, but rather, because they feel they can no longer practice 'good' medicine and give the patients the type of care the patients deserve when the government dictates the type of treatment to be rendered, the laboratory procedures which may be done, the length of hospital stay, etc.

Further, these physicians violently oppose the loss of the customary confidentiality between doctor and patient since all the physician's records must be made available to the bureaucracy and ultimately all records relating to patients will be fed into a master computer.... Under this arrangement there would be no necessity for the government to send a "Plumber's Unit" to burglarize a doctor's office to obtain medical records, because the information would be readily available in the government's computer.

The PSRO law requires also that "profiles" be prepared and maintained on each health care provider as well as the patients. Though the law itself does not go into detail, this apparently is a device to computerize, for instant recall, a short, vivid, biography giving the most outstanding characteristics of every act of every physician in diagnosing, prescribing, treating, discharging and charging every patient.

The PSRO law further provides for the standardization of treatment of every disease. One of the responsibilities of each regional PSRO is to prepare a schedule of "norms" covering the care, diagnosis and treatment based on typical patterns of practice in its region, including typical lengths of stay in institutional care by age and diagnosis. For example, if you were suffering from a cold, you may be permitted to see the doctor only once or perhaps twice; the drugs he may use must be selected from the "approved" list; the doctor possibly will not be permitted to x-ray your chest unless he is prepared to furnish justifiable evidence of why he suspects you may be developing a complication such as bronchopneumonia, and the schedule of "norms" may limit your professional care to a period not to exceed five days.

All this began when the chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee asked the AMA to prepare guidelines to help control excessive health care costs and a plan whereby the profession could effectively police itself—or face the possibility that the government would do the policing.

When the medical bureaucrats take over, the so-called "norms" will not permit a physician to use his experience and judgment in treatment, and waiting for the central data bank to send instructions could be uncomfortable—especially when the government seemingly can't even answer a letter in less than ten days.

Readers of the National Health Gazette recently read the shocking story broke by managing editor John Steinbacher from a novel he unearthed by John Spivak called The Medical Trust Unmasked, a story of the gigantic AMA conspiracy. Author Spivak had written how the AMA was a dead giveaway in 1897 when he read their original Incorporation papers, stating their purpose then, as a society, was to "Federate into one compact organization the medical profession, of safeguarding the material interests of the medical profession, of securing enactment and enforcement of medical laws... and of directing medical opinion in regard to state medicine"... enough said!

When the Sherman anti-trust act came along a couple of years later, the AMA quietly changed the papers to read: "To promote the science and art of medicine" to avoid embarrassment, without changing their original plans one whit. The seed planted in 1897 is to be harvested in 1974 in spite of Spivak's early warning, "The time will come, and soon, when the laymen who dare to consult a practitioner not approved by organized medical societies will be arrested and prosecuted!"

The Association of American Physicians and Surgeons, to which Dr. Privitera belongs, joined by three physicians, has filed suit in U.S. District Court in Chicago challenging the constitutionality of the Professional Standards Review Organization Law. This will be a significant case and one we will be watching.

Doctors all over the country are beginning to inform their patients of the evils contained in the PSRO Law. Doctors reading this article may wish to use it, and others to follow in future issues, to tell the story. The article may be reproduced without permission if credit is given its source. Also, doctors will find articles in the National Health Gazette (1110 South Pomona Ave., Fullerton, Calif. 92632) telling the story. The Gazette may be purchased for 25¢ per copy in lots for distribution to patients. (End of article from November 1973 issue of the National Health Federation Bulletin.)

(Readers desiring further information concerning the campaign against PSRO, may also write to the Association of American Physicians and Surgeons, 2110 Enco Drive, Suite N-515, Oak Brook, Illinois 60521.)

SUMMARY: With PSRO, we are witnesses to the destruction of the traditional doctor-patient relationship that previously characterized the Christian and American attitude toward healing and health care services. In place of this, we can visualize the creation of a nationally-standardized long-range computerized system of examination, diagnosis, prescription, and impersonal treatment of patients, as though they were German Bugs receiving their mechanical check-up or their seasonal tune-up via the computer that is plugged into its working parts and driving mechanism.

And something else has been added: Notice the constant reference to regional PSRO, and the taking over of the regions by HEW, if the regional program does not complement and conform to national planning!

If you are familiar with the aims of the Regional Governance scheme, and its accompanying management and control method known as Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, you will recognize PSRO as the method being used to enslave a professional group whose services are vital to the Nation.

When they would have said, "Physician, heal thyself," He replied, "No prophet is accepted in his own country." (Luke 4:23-4). Perhaps this is a case where the patients must heal the physicians.

OSHA - THE MONSTER THAT DEVOURS THE SMALL INDEPENDENT BUSINESSMAN

THE INDUSTRIAL POLICE FORCE

"The response to the current difficulties we are facing with regard to energy has been all too typical of our response to so many other problems," commented Congressman Crane of Illinois. "What is called for is increased Government coercion, the creation of huge and expensive new bureaucracies, and the provision of virtually total and unchecked power to the executive branch of Government.

"The concept of gas rationing, advocated by so many who insist upon telling us that it is inevitable, is a typical example of this kind of thinking. Gas rationing would be unfair to everyone. With more than 100 million cars on the road, it would require a huge bureaucracy to implement. . . ."

This growth of huge bureaucracies since President Nixon returned the "power to the people" through the creation of ten Federal Regions and a network of subordinate sub-regions within the fifty States, is a phenomenon that has escaped public notice, and a kind of bureaucratic dictatorship has been developing to enslave us while our attention has been diverted by Vietnamese involvements, Kissingerian meanderings, election scandals, Watergate aftermaths, resignations of old and installations of new Vice Presidential nominees and incumbents (Eagleton and Agnew replaced by Shriver and Ford), food and energy crises, etc., etc. All these have obscured the surreptitious conversion of a Representative Republic to a Bureaucratic Dictatorship in which elected men are defamed and appointed officials extolled.

While a new form of Governance was being installed, and a new system of Planning, Programming and Budgeting control was being incorporated so that bureaucratic dictatorship would seem both possible and plausible, a new kind of police force was also being organized: a nationwide network of federal agents charged with the responsibility of harassing small businessmen, industrialists, commercial establishments and service organizations; in fact, they were to ride herd on all who employed other men in their business establishments, allegedly in order to protect the health and well-being of all who were employed by others, and especially by small manufacturers and industrialists.

This creation of a Federal industrial police force, called the OSHA (from the name of the act which made its creation possible, the Occupational Safety and Health Act), came about in the following manner:

On December 17, 1970, the House of Representatives, eager to adjourn and get home for the Christmas holiday, passed without properly examining or even discussing, the Occupational Safety and Health Act. The Senate followed suit and, on December 29, President Nixon signed the bill and OSHA became Public Law 91-496.

As written, OSHA covers more than 4 million businesses and 57 million employers in the United States. Every employer in the country, whether he employs one person or ten thousand persons, is subject to the whims of these OSHA snoopers, armed with their unconstitutional powers and their ridiculous regulations (which we shall look into later in this Letter.)

Not too much has been heard about OSHA up to this point in time (as the bureaucrats are wont to idiomize the language), because it takes time to get a whole new army of federal agents properly trained and stationed throughout the Ten Federal Regions with their scores of sub-regions, where such agents can properly harass every employer in the Nation. As Congressman James Abdnor, South Dakota Republican, told his colleagues in the House of Representatives on November 7, 1973:

"The full impact of the Occupational Safety and Health Act upon the small businessman is yet to be measured. There is no doubt, however, that a visit from the OSHA inspector is awaited with fear and dread by most of them. They are all aware of what the consequences of such a visit can bring: they are at a loss to begin to comprehend, much less comply with the myriad of standards they are faced with. Editor Harold Jones of the Redfield, South Dakota Press, discussed this recently in an editorial which I believe merits the thoughtful consideration of my colleagues. He wrote, in part:

“In 1970, Congress passed the Occupational Health and Safety Act... It has taken since then to organize the bureaucracy, and employers are just now beginning to feel the crunch of governmental enforcement. The trouble is that the law is many, many pages long and it has generated complicated rules and regulations that, it is said, would fill a 17-foot bookshelf. Large companies with legal staffs and safety experts have been busy trying to interpret what they have to do to live up to the regulations. Small and medium sized companies depend on the general advice of their trade associations and wait in trepidation for the OSHA inspectors to show up for a surprise visit. The inspectors have the power to levy stiff fines on the spot and even close down plants found in violation—needless to say a traumatic experience for employer and employee alike, which benefits no one’...”

But, let's start at the beginning, and see how this industrial police force grew and grew until small businessmen fear OSHA like Russians fear the OGPU:

As soon as Public Law 91-496 was enacted, a new office in the Department of Labor was created, to deal exclusively with the execution of the new law—the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Occupational Safety and Health, and he was empowered with investigative, enforcement and punitive powers unequalled in the history of the Republic.

R.D. Patrick Mahoney, a research specialist, recently wrote a series of articles which were published in three successive issues of the Texas Tribune. In the following, we borrow some facts, some figures, and some direct quotations, from those articles.

Public Law 91-496 purports to guarantee to every employee in the United States a place to work “free from recognized hazards that are causing or are likely to cause death or serious physical harm.” Therefore, all employers must comply with standards set by the Secretary of Labor. One section of the law decrees that the States may submit their own safety plans, but such plans will not be accepted unless they meet the federal standards, and continued “governmental monitoring” must be expected because, despite President Nixon's words to the effect that all “power must be returned to the people,” there are some cases that are not to be included. As Nixon said in a statement of January 5, 1971, there are certain powers “that can't be returned to the people.” Here, then, is the PPBS principle at work:

If a State-submitted employee safety program is accepted by the Labor Department, and if continual OSHA snooervision finds that the State program is in accord with the overall plans of the Federal Government, then the Federal Office of Management and Budget will provide the State with up to 90% of the subsidization required to finance the State program. But, of course, federal money is inevitably accompanied by that unshakable shadow, federal control.

Yet another arm of this federal policing agency—the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH)—calls for mandatory record-keeping by the employer, so the OSHA investigators will be able to keep an eye on how much money each employer is spending on the health and safety of his employees. And if the businessmen of America find keeping up with the OSHA provisions too costly, then they can borrow money (federal loans with interest) to pay the high cost of complying with OSHA standards—that is, if they voluntarily agree to meet all OSHA standards, no matter how ridiculous those standards may be.

As soon as the OSHA program began to roll, enforcement officers were promptly recruited from every corner of the United States, with salaries sufficient to provide ample stimulation for efficiency in their jobs; i.e., to guarantee that every employer in all of the United States comply with the 248 pages of safety regulations already written (seven of those pages deal exclusively with the all-important subject of step-ladders.)

At last count, as of mid-October, 1973, Federal Region VI (whose capitol is Dallas) boasted three OSHA-men earning salaries of $26,168 each per annum, six OSHA-men who earned $22,328 each per year, nine OSHA-men each of whom earned $18,906 per year, and three OSHA-men who were being paid $13,162 per year; a total of $621,570 in yearly salaries for industrial policemen in Region VI alone — and there are ten such Federal Regions in the Nation!

Under the provisions of OSHA, no advance warnings will be given to employers before these OSHA policemen descend upon them. Indeed, this “no-knock” provision is so strict that anyone giving an employer advance warning of an OSHA inspection visit is subject to a strict penalty. Senator Clifford O. Hansen, Wyoming Republican, calls this a "gestapo technique."

A year after the passage of OSHA in 1970, although the new bureaucracy was hardly off the ground, complaints began pouring in from all over the country, and some Congressmen began to realize what they had done to the small businessmen of America.

McNeill Stokes, general counsel of the American Subcontractors Association, told a hearing of the House Select Committee on Small Business:

"The roles of the Secretary of Labor and his inspectors under the (OSHA) act are analogous to all-powerful federal policemen who are given the authority to make the laws by regulations and to enforce those laws without search warrants....The citizen's only recourse is to appeal to the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, which is essentially a police commission sitting in Washington, D.C....Incidentally, the OSHA Review Commission has taken the position that if you choose to appeal, they have the authority to increase your penalty, which also has a chilling effect on administrative procedures, and they have done so in several cases."

Stokes gave this example: John Beall of the Beall Construction Company in Lincoln, Nebraska, was fined $244 for an alleged violation of the OSHA safety code. Beall felt he couldn't afford to contest the charges so he paid the fine of $244. However, he did protest the practice which he considered unjust, in a letter to his Senator in Washington, Senator Carl Curtis. Senator Curtis followed the usual procedure and forwarded the complaint to the respective agency for an answer. Stokes told of the results:

"Approximately three days later, federal agents reinspected the work site, and alleged that Beall had not corrected the safety violations. Beall was fined $750 for each day that the safety violations had not been corrected. The total fine amounted to $31,744—a high price to pay for exercising a citizen's right to communicate with his elected representative. Mr. Beall must take the offensive to prove himself innocent and contest the daily penalties which he, as a small businessman, finds economically depressing since the fine is double his annual income."

In view of the alleged energy crisis which is said to involve the handling of oil, it is interesting to note that OSHA is demanding the refurbishing of certain oil equipment. An OSHA regulation requires that all cast iron valves on oil storage tanks be replaced with steel valves. Compliance with this regulation would mean that thousands upon thousands of these valves would have to be replaced—at a cost estimated by Congressman Price (R.-Texas) of from $10 for the simple valves to as much as $10,000 each for the sophisticated master valves. This despite the fact that, according to safety experts in the oil industry, these valves have absolutely no bearing on safety.

Just what safety precaution is involved in the shape of toilet seats, we leave to your imagination; but OSHA regulations require that all toilet seats that are round must be changed to those with open fronts.

As for ridiculous regulations concerning record-keeping, Lewis Barbe, a Fort Worth insurance executive, testified before the House Select Committee on Small Business:

"There is a purposeful, willful, malicious inflation of the accident statistics to indict business and industry. If a girl who is working in an office cuts her finger on a piece of paper, and she cannot use that finger for the rest of the day, the employer has to fill out a supplemental form, post it to a log, and post that to a summary." These records must be on hand for perusal when the OSHA inspectors next visit the employer, at an unexpected time and in a gestapo-like manner.

Taxpayers' money is now being spent by the millions to finance an educational program on OSHA designed to make employees feel that there must be a special federal police force to protect them, the employees, from those big bad wolves, their employers.

In one pamphlet published by the OSHA bureaucrats, entitled "Recordkeeping Requirements," the employee is advised that "Any employee who believes that he has been discharged or otherwise discriminated against in violation of this provision (which has to do with alleged harassment because the employee filed a complaint or testified against an employer) may, within 30 days of such illegal action, file a complaint with the Secretary of Labor. The Secretary of Labor is authorized to investigate the matter and to bring action in the U.S. district court for appropriate action, including rehiring or reinstatement of the employee to his former job with back pay."

This particular pamphlet is causing real trouble between employees and employers. Researcher R. D. Patrick Mahoney reports that in a warehouse in Texas "an employee manifested rank insubordination to a supervisor—a situation that could have resulted in a complete breakdown of order had the insubordination been condoned. In this particular instance, the employee threatened to call OSHA officials because a cardboard box was temporarily blocking an aisle; however, the supervisor was a man of stature—both physically and morally—and was able to solve the problem with little trouble (and the OSHA police were not summoned).

“Unfortunately, this type of problem is not isolated,” continued Mr. Mahoney. “Businessmen all over the nation are reporting similar incidents. OSHA has become a device promoting not safety, but disharmony, and class warfare...”

“And what else are the taxpayers’ dollars buying these days?” asks Mahoney.

“Free 60-second television commercials—appearing in prime time—praising OSHA, and advising employees on procedures for reporting their employers for non-compliance with OSHA regulations.

“A Job Safety & Health magazine is now being published monthly, with multi-colored covers and coated stock, franked free to all recipients. Perhaps the businessmen of America cannot afford to publish such professional magazines to promote their own businesses; however, their taxes are putting out this magazine at a cost of approximately $22,600 per month.

“And what is in the magazine? The January, 1973 issue contained an article entitled, “Work Without Fear,” written by the associate editor, citing the ‘growing activism’ in job safety and health. James Weeks, from the Urban Affairs Center at West Virginia State College, is pictured instructing union members on the vices of hazardous substances on construction jobs. On page 21 of the same issue, Robert D. Moran, chairman of the OSHA Review Commission states that Congress should take action to

- ‘1) change our name to the United States Court of Occupational Safety and Health, and
- ‘2) transfer us from the Executive branch to the Judicial branch.’

“That’s all that this nation needs, a Supreme Court of OSHA, with Robert Moran presiding.

“Those who administer OSHA have become widespread and firmly entrenched over the past few months. There are now ten regional offices, 49 area offices, 2 district offices, and 14 field stations. In 1970, there were 970 employees, at a total expenditure of $15,200,000; this year, there are 1,708 employees, at a total expenditure of $36,456,-

000. By June, 1974, the OSHA administrators will be filling 1,844 positions and costing the taxpayers $67,500,000.

“Others are making money on OSHA, too. There is a new publication, entitled OSHA Report, published by Lawrence Stessin as a subsidiary publication of Man & Manager, Inc., which is geared to teach the businessmen how best to comply with the myriad OSHA regulations.

“One of the leading questions of management, according to the August 1, 1973 OSHA Report, concerns methods of relief from such police state tactics as those presently being used by OSHA inspectors. The skillful answer given in OSHA Report is as follows: ‘There are plenty of bills in the hopper designed to ease the burden of the employers, but chances of passage appear slim.’

“OSHA Report further suggests that the businessman contact his local OSHA area office, which ‘has expert personnel who can provide authoritative answers.’

“The psychology used here is that there is absolutely no use fighting the law; therefore, when one complies, he can best do so by subscribing to OSHA Report.

“However, it doesn’t seem that the American businessmen see it that way. And at least 18 of the 23 members of the Texas Congressional delegation in Washington do not see it that way, either. And yet...

“It appears that an observation made by the chairman of the House Select Committee on Small Business, to Congressman Steiger (House father of the OSHA legislation), is quite correct: ‘Some people say, Mr. Steiger, that in toilets is the only place that we know what we are doing’.” (End of extended quotation.)

But the creators of such monstrosities as this OSHA police force know exactly what they are doing. OSHA is just one more step on the journey toward the total managed global society.

THE ROCKY CAMPAIGN TRAIL THAT LEADS TO WORLD GOVERNMENT

THE POWER AND THE GLORY

The Rockefeller family has an undeniable propensity for stockpiling wealth, and an almost equal proclivity for gaining power. And there exists the suspicion that the Brothers Four would like to be known as the First Family of the World. But there is a lack of charisma, and the glory that often accompanies power and pelf has been lacking ever since John D. Rockefeller, Sr. tried to get people to love him by handing out dimes (while setting up tax-exempt foundations to save his dollars.)

But, in the upcoming year of our Lord 1974, it would appear that the Brothers Four will be trying harder than ever before to gain the glory that the world has been withholding. True, two of the Brothers have held high positions of trust and power, as governors of New York and Arkansas. But there are far greater glories than these. So —

Nelson Rockefeller has ended his 15-year reign as governor of New York, and insists that he now will devote his time and energy to the running of two bipartisan commissions which he heads, one dealing with the environment, while the other is concerned with "critical issues" which are going to face the Nation (especially if Nelson ever heads the Nation.) And, while he disavows any immediate interest in becoming President (or Vice President by appointment as a stop-gap measure looking toward nomination in 1976), there isn't a single politician around who isn't convinced that Rocky's major reason for leaving Albany is to begin actively pursuing the No. 1 executive job in the Nation. Because this will be the fourth and final time; Rocky will be 68 when the Republicans next nominate a candidate for the Presidency.

We'll return to Nelson's plans later in this Letter; but permit us to bring up a few other pertinent details before proceeding with his presidential aspirations:

What happened to Spiro Agnew, and what is happening to Richard Nixon because of their running feud with the communications media, is sufficient evidence of the fact that any man who hopes to stay on top in the political world, had better be able to get along with the members of the Fourth Estate, that is, editors, reporters, columnists, newscasters and commentators.

In this connection, on November 1, a large newspaper charged that the power to influence the thinking of the majority of Americans is concentrated primarily in the hands of "a very small number of media brokers" on the Eastern seaboard. Of course, this is not news to regular readers of this newsletter, but it is pleasingly shocking that a daily newspaper would admit as much.

The statement appeared in the Shreveport (La.) Times, in an editorial. Stanley Tiner is chief editorial writer for the paper, so we presume he is the author of the following paragraphs taken from the editorial:

"There can be absolutely no question that the vast powers of opinion-making lie primarily in the hands of a very small number of media brokers concentrated on the eastern seaboard of the United States. Virtually all of these, in fact, are located in New York City, with their extended arms of opinion also stationed in Washington, D.C.

"The three electronic networks—CBS, NBC and ABC—and the New York Times, Washington Post and the two wire services, the Associated Press, and United Press International, form a cartel of corporate persuasion, the likes of which has never before existed in world history.

"What is happening today is literally what these gigantic news purveyors tell us is happening. American opinion in 1973 is largely the product of the networks, wire services, the New York Times and the Washington Post reporting."

As a sort of postscript to the above, The Councilor, a conservative paper also published in Shreveport, added the following:

"The Shreveport Times statement is similar to the position on this subject taken by The Councilor. The Councilor has stated that

"nearly every American is the victim of 'pre-thunk' notions prepared for them by the three TV networks, the New York Times, the Washington Post and several slick magazines. Almost all of these are controlled by families related to each other by blood and marriage, and which migrated to the U.S. from Bavaria with the apparent intention of changing the social structure and government of the United States."

Now, let us add our own postscript to the preceding: The owners, publishers, editors, and/or principal columnists, commentators or reporters of these communications media that form the "cartel of corporate persuasion the likes of which has never before existed in world history," are members of a private club known as the Council on Foreign Relations, the chairman of the board of which private club is David Rockefeller, other prominent members being Nelson A. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, III, and Rodman C. Rockefeller.

Consequently, when the Rockefeller Brothers want to make their opinion a majority opinion, they merely go to their fellow members of the CFR and ask that "the word be given."

It is not surprising, therefore, that the Rockefellers get big headlines when they want same, and receive the silent treatment when silence better serves their purpose, as when David hosts The Bilderbergers, or when their chief overt foreign agent, Henry Kissinger, flies to London to report to the members of that most exclusive and prestigious organization, The Pilgrims Society of Great Britain (which he did on December 12, 1973—more about this later if space permits.)

From their own communications cartel, the Rockefellers always receive the kind of treatment they desire. Examples:

John D. Rockefeller III spent much time and effort and taxpayer's (foundation) money compiling a book to which he gave the name The Second American Revolution. His theme: A blissful and harmonious wedding of communism and capitalism is attainable through "a humanizing of capitalism and wider use of planning techniques."

John D. III received excellent publicity, the book was forgotten because it wasn't worth remembering; but the idea was planted by excellent and well-placed write-ups in the New York Times and the Washington Post.

Recently, for no really explainable reason, the New York Times News Service chose to publicize the idea that David Rockefeller was a pretty important guy because he was hobnobbing with Communist leaders. For no good reason other than to illustrate how images are created by the news cartel, we quote from this article which was released for publication on November 18, 1973.

THE BANKER SITS WITH HEADS OF STATE

(By Tom Buckley)

The man who runs the garage at the Chase Manhattan Bank Building had been keeping watch. When he saw David Rockefeller leave the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, 100 yards or so to the west on Liberty Street, he shouted, "Okay, Chester." The chauffeur, Chester Erb, drove the maroon Cadillac limousine up to the ramp of the basement. It was waiting at the curb with the doors open when Rockefeller, trailed by his bodyguard, Tom Swanzey, strode up. Rockefeller, the chairman and chief executive officer of the bank, the third largest in the world, which he and his family control, slid into the back seat, where a vice president and a visitor already were sitting. Just as the car was about to start for the Wall Street heliport, Joseph V. Reed, Jr., who is Rockefeller's chief of staff, squeezed himself into one of the jump seats. He opened a scarlet folder on which was printed in black, "For Immediate Action," and began ticking off problems that had arisen in the previous few hours. Many of the references seemed cryptic to an outsider and perhaps less than cosmic in importance, but others danced and shimmered with the genuine luster of great importance.

Rockefeller had attended a meeting of the International Monetary Fund in Nairobi, Kenya, a few days earlier. From there he had gone to South Africa where he announced that the bank would make extensive investments in tribal enclaves, or Bantustans, there. At the end of the week he flew off to Tokyo to attend a meeting of Japanese, American and European business leaders.

"We've heard from the prime minister," Reed said. "He said that even if Kissinger is in Tokyo, it won't interfere with the dinner he is giving for you." Rockefeller nodded. . . . In the 12 years since Rockefeller became the president of the bank—he moved up to chairman in 1969—he has grown accustomed to meeting with heads of state. In the past year or so Rockefeller has conferred with Chou En-lai, Leonid Brezhnev and the leaders of most of the eastern European countries, among many others. He has come to be regarded as a spokesman for enlightened American capitalism and as a symbolic figure, too, by virtue of his family's enormous wealth and its leadership in philanthropy and the arts... Like the heads of the powerful states he is on familiar terms with, Rockefeller is encircled by an aura of power that is reflected in the way he moves from place to place. In fact it may be greater than theirs, since it is built on solid investments rather than the shifting sands of political maneuver. On this day, as it happened, the aura was scarcely glimmering. Rockefeller being on his way to Albany to officiate at a cocktail party celebrating the opening of an office of the bank there...

On the return trip from Albany, Rockefeller offered his companion a lift into the city and then a drink at his home. "You won't be able to stay long, I'm afraid," he added. "I've got a couple of Russians coming in at 9." Leading his guest to the vast drawing room of his house, one of four, he poured Scotch highballs and sat back in an easy chair. Relaxed, but still cautious, he measured his words as carefully as his whiskey. Economic regulation was basically undesirable, he said, but the use of energy might have to be made subject to some controls in view of looming shortages. Although he deplored the fact that some persons with incomes of $1 million and more a year could avoid paying taxes, he thought the tax structure should not be hastily tampered with.

While the New York Times pictures David hobnobbing with heads of state and being very upper crust indeed, the Times tries to humanize Nelson and make him lovable. For while David is the youngest of the brothers, he really runs the show, while Nelson is supposed to handle the politics and make the Rockefellers popular; a very difficult task indeed, but the New York Times and the Washington Post have agreed to help.

As an example, notice the propaganda pitch of the following which appeared in the New York Times of Sunday, December 16, 1973, wherein the Governor becomes merely Rocky:

HE STARTED ON TOP AND STILL HAS CONFIDENCE HE CAN GO HIGHER

(By Francis X. Clines)

"Are you Rocky?" - a small boy stopping the grinning campaigner on the streets of New York.

"Yes, sir." - Nelson A. Rockefeller's reply.
"Gimme a dollar." - the small boy.

Right from the beginning, there was the word "Rocky." It seemed an amalgam of the ordinary man's wish to clip the awesome name of Rockefeller to mortal size, and to bestow an affectionate designation that Americans reserve for family pets.

Mr. Rockefeller began as a favorite in New York and as far as the ultimate poll, the ballot, reveals, he is leaving as a favorite after four straight victories. He will resign Tuesday, restless as ever, with most people convinced he still wants to be President and making one final try for the White House...

Mr. Rockefeller, when he was not off moving in the national arena, was Manhattan-oriented. He might fly out of New York City on a mid-day mission, relaxing, perhaps, with an aperitif. He would return in his customized twin-jet where he enjoyed a late-night glass of milk and an Oreo cookie....

He took the view that his privileged background required more of him. When complimented once for being a good dancer, he replied: "Yes, I had two choices. I could have become a gigolo or I could have become a Governor." In making his choice, Mr. Rockefeller showed the ability to stir public emotions over the years. There are liberals who claim his finest hour was when he withstood the jeers of the Goldwater convention in 1964; but there are party loyalists lately who appreciate his near blanket defense of President Nixon.

Several years ago, the Governor was asked if he could recall the first time he thought about running for the White House. He replied: "Ever since I was a kid. After all, when you think of what I had, what else was there to aspire to?"

So, you can see by the glossy treatment being accorded them by their favorite newspaper, the Rockefellers are off and running; David to become sovereign over commercial, industrial and monetary affairs of the world; Nelson to become president and political potentate in a New World Order which Nelson calls the New Federalism.

The campaign strategy will revolve around this new commission Nelson has created: the Commission on Critical Choices for America. At a time when the Watergate scandals have caused everyone to take a second look at the methods employed to raise money for the financing of presidential election campaigns, and when Congress is toying with the idea of requiring the federal financing of campaigns, Rocky has come up with an idea that puts Nixon to shame as an election-fund raiser.

This Commission on Critical Choices is a Rockefeller creation from start to finish; and it is designed to make the Rockefellersespecially Nelson—appear to be the only ones who know what's wrong with the country and how to save it. For a man who has wanted to be President ever since he was a kid who had everything else, this is the most brazen and unethical campaigning plan ever conceived. Because future campaigns are going to be carefully watched and the money spent on same probably limited to something like $50,000 per campaigner.

But Nelson says his Commission is going to need to spend perhaps as much as $20 million between now and 1976. He and brother Laurance tossed in one million dollars each to start the kettle boiling (tax-exempt money from the Brothers Fund, of course). And Nelson asked Congress to contribute three million, which the Senate has turned down up to this point in time. But, one way or another, depend on it: American taxpayers are going to finance that multi-million dollar Commission, and the Commission is going to pull every string it can find, in an effort to move Nelson Rockefeller into the White House.

Human Events of December 22, 1973, had a commendable article dealing with this latest Rockefeller ploy. We quote therefrom:

* * * * *

CAN ROCKY SHAKE LIBERAL IMAGE?

Even before he announced his resignation, Rocky was out on the hustings, peddling a line he hopes would be more acceptable to the delegates who will comprise the Republican convention in 1976. In the words of the New York Times, Rocky, in his quest for power, has begun "shedding his liberal image." To a certain extent, the Rockefeller shift has paid off.

Sen. Barry Goldwater, Rocky's bitter opponent in the 1964 elections, has forgiven the governor's past sins and blessed him as an acceptable candidate three years hence. When the governor made several forays into the Far and Middle West recently, he received warm ovations for his tough line on welfare and crime. Even in the South, where Rocky's name has been an anathema, the governor is getting praise these days.

While Rockefeller has moved somewhat more to the right in recent years, however, there is no evidence that this "creeping conservatism" is anything more than a tactical, opportunistic maneuver, or that his ideas spring from a deep-rooted philosophy held, for instance, by such conservative politicians as Gov. Ronald Reagan and Sen. Jim Buckley (Human Events said they are conservatives, we didn't). There is much to question about Rocky's conservative conversion. For example:

While Rocky has been making conservative noises of late, this year he tried—but failed—to get the Republicans to endorse a liberal Democrat, Robert Wagner, McGovern's New York campaign manager in 1972, for mayor of New York City. When State Sen. John Marchi, a veteran Republican and a moderate-conservative, won the GOP nomination, Rocky intentionally torpedoed the campaign.

In creating the much discussed Commission on Critical Choices for America—which is expected to help Rocky capture the Republican nomination with tax-exempt donations and at least $3 million in federal funds from the Congress and various agencies—the governor tried to pack the commission with dyed-in-the-wool liberals... For example, among the panelists are Joseph Swidler, a strong public power advocate; Bess Myerson, a McGovernite and an aggressive advocate of regulating business; Nancy Hanks, a stout believer in channelling federal funds to the arts; Daniel Moynihan, chief pitchman in Nixon's first term for the Family Assistance Plan; and Joseph Kirkland, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO. Furthermore, the staff of the commission is in the hands of liberals. Henry Diamond, a Ripon-thinking Republican, has taken over the Commission's executive directorship at $50,000 a year... Even more indicative of the panel's slant is that Stephen Berger is study director and has the most influential role in determining who will be in charge of preparing the various studies that are to be done by the Commission. Berger is a liberal Democrat and was a campaign manager in 1970 for Richard Ottinger, also a liberal Democrat, who lost to Jim Buckley in the 1970 New York Senate race.

Hence, in the view of many, Rocky still has a long way to go before he can make a convincing case that he has become an "acceptable" candidate for the 1976 Republican nomination. (End of article).

* * * * *

Frankly speaking: Unless 'President' Ford names Rocky Veep and then himself resigns, we doubt that Rocky will ever make it to the White House. But—this Commission on Critical Choices for America can be far more dangerous than any individual involved. For out of it will come a New Federalism. We'll watch, and report.

THE ENEMY WILL TRY HARDER IN 1974

THREE STRIKES AND OUT?

About two hundred years ago, give or take a few weeks, an outraged and irate citizenry staged a Boston Tea Party, a demonstration of protest against a distant and dictatorial government whose actions had become "a history of repeated injuries and usurpations all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states."

A few months later the fiery patriot, Patrick Henry, arose at the Virginia Convention to deliver an address which ended with the immortal words: "A just God presides over the destinies of nations... There is no retreat, but in submission and slavery... Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! - I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty, or give me death."

About fifteen months later the Continental Congress appointed a committee of five to draw up a Declaration of Independence. The task fell to Thomas Jefferson and, with minor changes, his draft was approved and published on July 4, 1776.

Those patriots won a war, but they did not form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, or secure the blessings of liberty to themselves or their posterity.

Among the most serious problems were those of commerce between the States and lack of a stable currency. The term "not worth a continental" became a synonym for worthlessness. Too, the original Articles of Confederation provided for no Executive Department and no permanent Judiciary to settle arguments that arose between the States. The one branch of government, the Congress, had to rely for funds upon the good will of the States (not such a bad idea, at that, but hardly practical.)

The real problems of State did not begin to get solved until after a Constitutional Convention was called, and a new form of Government established; a Republic, if we could have kept it.

Then, about a hundred years ago, the Nation was at another point of crisis. The humanitarian cry of "Slavery" was the emotional ingredient that brought on the War between the States, but the real reason had to do with European banking houses who wanted to take the government into debt in order to bring the United States Republic under their control. Once in debt to the Bankers, the United States would have been embroiled in the troubles of the Old World a hundred years ago; a situation that did not actually transpire until 1913 and later.

Abraham Lincoln saw what was coming, and stated: "I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me, and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. Corporations have been enthroned. An era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until the wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed."

Because of that speech, and the attitude which prompted it, as well as the actions resulting from that attitude, Lincoln was assassinated. According to recent scholarship, Lincoln's assassination was directed by a man who served as a special financial advisor to Confederate President Jefferson Davis, and who was, in reality, an agent of the Rothschild interests, one Judah P. Benjamin.

However, Lincoln's fear for the country because "Corporations have been enthroned" did not become an immediate danger, since there was "the winning of the West," an astounding period of agricultural and industrial growth, which made corruption in high places and the reign of the money power more difficult and less important than at a later period in United States history, when trust busting and Tammany Hall tactics uncovered some of the corruption.

Two hundred years ago, the crises that accompanied the birth of a new Nation; One hundred years ago, the crises accompanying attempts to prevent the death of a Nation torn asunder by the greed of alien money masters; and —

Today, with the Nation on the verge of its bicentennial celebration, yet another series of crises threaten its death and its devouring by a monstrous World Authority. Not only has justice departed from the land, so also has honest and trustworthy leadership. As an example, Ernest van den Haag is a psychoanalyst, a lecturer in sociology and psychology at the New School for Social Research, and a friend and defender of Richard Nixon. It speaks volumes that a professor at the American equivalent of the London School of Economics (both are Fabian Socialist in slant), should write a defense of Republican Nixon. It is also of importance that William D. Pawley, Miami friend of Nixon and allegedly a conservative Republican, should pay for the insertion of this Fabian defense of Nixon in selected newspapers. Here is how that defense begins, and we are quoting from The Miami Herald of December 26, 1973:

"Suppose Mr. Nixon were guilty of everything he is accused of. Money was collected illegally from corporations which expected favors in return. He encouraged assistants to find out who 'leaked' Government secrets, or to improve his electoral fortunes, by committing burglaries, tapping wires, preparing silly 'enemy lists' or trying to get the IRS to audit the tax returns of 'enemies.' Suppose that Mr. Nixon tried afterwards to sweep these things under the rug. And that, contrary to promises, he fired a prosecutor who became too inconvenient and that some fought-over tapes disappeared. Finally, suppose he borrowed money to buy residences in California and Florida, made profits and found ways to reduce his tax liability, and to have excessive public funds spent on his residences.... Suppose (these accusations) were true. Should they determine our judgment of his Presidency?"

Social Scientist van den Haag then goes on to insist that Nixon should not be judged so harshly for whatever sins he may have committed, because he was merely following in the footsteps of Presidents who had gone before him. It seems that Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy, Johnson, all had done things just as bad, perhaps even worse, than Nixon; yet none of them had been persecuted as Nixon is being persecuted.

According to the lecturer at the New School for Social Research: "President Roosevelt deported more than a hundred thousand Americans from California and imprisoned them... FDR left Alger Hiss and fellow travelers in important positions. Harry Truman... called the accusations against Alger Hiss a 'red herring.'... Kennedy's election was stolen; LBJ's dealings with Bobby Baker were notorious...

Then comes the clincher: Nixon is being persecuted because he once prosecuted Alger Hiss! The following is a direct quote:

"Chambers indeed risked his life, and Mr. Nixon his career to root out Hiss and friends. They didn't get much help. Everybody at Harvard testified for Alger Hiss and now wants to prosecute bad old Richard. Watergate is being used to redeem Hiss and Mr. McGovern, and the liberal sponsorship of both.

"But what does Watergate prove? That Mr. Nixon has defects? Mr. Nixon is not hated because of his many defects, or mistakes, or misjudgments. He is hated, hated profoundly, and feared, for what he has accomplished, for his virtues rather than his vices. There is a lot of hate."

The preceding may seem, at first reading, to be a defense brief for a President, but it turns out to be a condemnation of all Presidents, including Richard Nixon.

And the inference is that any elected official is going to be a crook, and that Nixon is no worse than any other recent President (except, maybe, Eisenhower, who is omitted from Haag's list).

The conclusions that we are supposed to draw from this and similar political essays which come a dime-a-dozen these days are:

- 1) Government in this space-age world has become so very scientific, so technical, so specialized, that we can no longer expect ordinary elected officials—most of whom are merely lawyers—to run things efficiently, or even honestly. So;
- 2) We should look upon our elected officials as mere figureheads, left-over relics from a former decadent and now supplanted governmental system, kept in office merely to please the masses, as are the unneeded but retained kings and queens of Great Britain and some European countries. However,
- 3) The actual running of governments must be left to specially trained specialists, experts, managers, scientists; men such as Heinz (now Henry) Alfred Kissinger, Arthur F. Bernstein (now Burns), George Shultz, Roy Ash, William Simon, Casper Weinberger, etc.

In other words: the Executive Branch and its Regional Governance apparatus which is to supersede the States, must be run by appointed managers rather than elected officials.

Now, the remaining Legislative Branch might well stem the tide and reverse the trend toward bureaucratic dictatorship. But, there is a total demoralization of the government in Washington, and the Congress may be applying the finishing touches to our former republican form of government. In the final hurry-up minutes of the session, before adjournment, Congress passed some bills that should cause a conservative to shudder. Here is an example:

TRADE BILL TRADES OFF U.S. JOBS AND WEALTH

Dec. 21, 1973—Americans are bombarded daily with news of some new shortage. A beef shortage, a gasoline shortage, a newsprint shortage and a score of others have been reported. The latest indignity to the American taxpayer was the news that in the near future we can expect a toilet paper shortage. Perhaps this latest affront will cause such public outrage that the international giveaway and tradeaway specialists in the federal government will realize at long last that we must put the best interests of the American people first in all our dealings with foreign powers.

But many of the bills passed by Congress, and the administration's international policies, are a far cry from that goal. The Trade Bill which passed the House on December 11 is a prime example of putting foreign interests above both those of business and labor in this country.

The authors of the Trade Bill obviously expect widespread unemployment if the provisions of the bill are implemented. The bill goes to great lengths to outline the "benefits" that the government will provide to Americans thrown out of work because of "import competition." The government will dole out some money to the "injured" workman, retrain him in a new field, and even help him to relocate in a strange part of the country. What generosity. How much more economical and beneficial it would have been to have never imposed this unnecessary hardship on our working people in the first place.

There are similar provisions in the bill to "protect" American businessmen, many of whom are expected to be wiped out by the ill effects of the law. The small businessman is in the same boat as the workers he employs. This bill is simply anti-labor and anti-business.

The only advantages of the proposal will be realized by the international cartels who have the economic power to expand and protect their own economic interests. Their interests may not necessarily coincide with those of the American people. The windfall from the balance of payments monopoly will be reaped by a select handful of large businesses, not by small businesses of labor.

A more apt name for the Trade Bill is the Tradeoff Bill because it trades off and redistributes U.S. jobs and wealth worldwide.

(Editor's note: Reference in this article is to the Trade Reform Act of 1973, which President Nixon signed into law under protest because it did not accord Russia "favored nation treatment" in trade policies. The Congress balked at this provision, not because it was not in the best interests of the United States, but because of alleged mistreatment of Zionists in Russia who wanted to emigrate to Israel. Nixon signed the bill, unwillingly, because it was the only trade bill possible in 1973, it was "this trade bill or none.")

This un-American activity of helping multinationals and foreign countries at the expense of American labor and small business is in line with the new "World Authority" design, which is the new strategy for establishing a World Government. Conservative columnist Paul Scott gave some details of the "strategy revision" which is being effected. Scott's report is confirmation of much that has already been published in earlier Don Bell Reports and Closer-Ups. Here is a part of the Paul Scott Report:

"Supporters of world government are changing their strategy to accommodate the plans of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger for the building of a 'new international order' and 'structure for peace.' This is the report of Richard N. Gardner, Professor of Law and International Organization, Columbia University, and former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization during the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. A leader in the world government movement, Gardner is a close associate of Kissinger and understands his thinking and methods of operation. Gardner ... spelled out the strategy change from the direct to the indirect approach to bring about world government, stating:

"Our best hope for the foreseeable future seems to be, not in building up a few ambitious institutions...but rather in the more decentralized, disorderly and pragmatic process of inventing or adapting institutions of limited jurisdiction and selected membership to deal with specific problems on a case-by-case basis as the necessity for cooperation is presented by the relevant nations.

“In short, we are likely to do better by building our house of world order from the bottom up rather than from the top down... The hopeful aspect of the present situation is that even as nations resist appeals for “world government” and “the surrender of sovereignty,” technological, economic and political interests are forcing them to establish more and more far-reaching institutions to manage their mutual interdependence.”

“... With Kissinger’s new assignment taking him deeper into the international monetary trading system, the law of the sea, the protection of international environment, world population problems, and the global politics of food and energy, Gardner contended, the Secretary of State would begin looking for new solutions through more effective international institutions at the global and regional levels....”

Building “from the bottom up” and at “regional levels” seems to be the new strategy; and fitting exactly into this plan has been the division of the United States into ten federal regions, and the division of the individual States into federally budgeted sub-regions.

This also means that the drive for regional governments at the international level will be intensified. Atlantic Union will take precedence over the United Nations, the latter being acknowledged to be hopeless as a nucleus for an actual World Government. Accent will be on the specialized agencies of the UN, which operate through treaties and conventions and actually have little to do with the parent UN body itself. And, added impetus will be placed on the completion of Atlantic Federal Union.

Under date of Dec. 15, 1973, Clarence Streit of Federal Union, inc., sent out a year-end report and an appeal for additional funds to finance the work of persuading Congressmen to pass that long-pending Atlantic Union Resolution. Streit wrote, in part:

“Dear Federal Unionists and Friends:

“A glance at the headlines flaming from our enclosed symbol will show that 1973 has been, by the toughest test, the most successful by far in Federal Union’s 34-year history... One way this resolution can clear the few remaining hurdles and be enacted is by backers persuading some 20 of the 210 nay-voters of last April to reconsider and agree to join the 197 yeasayers. They have all 1974 until the November election to do this in, and it is planned to start this effort in January... A major force behind the proposal’s swift advance was President Nixon’s decision March 2nd to back it publicly. I must testify to the outstanding creative courage he thus showed, for, I know that all five predecessors toyed with taking that step, but none ventured to. Maddeningly (again), soon after President Nixon did, Watergate increasingly absorbed media, Congress and White House attention. Then came Mideast war, nuclear alert, NATO split, the monetary-economic peril, energy crisis. But this complex of dangers arms Atlantic Union backers with a powerful case for gaining the few needed vote changes....

“When 18 oil-happy feudal Sheikhs, Kings, dictators enjoy unity’s proverbial power by darkening our Xmas and keeping families apart now, can any of us hesitate to help federate the free? Sacrifice? What god worth worship doesn’t require such proof?

Sincerely,

(signed) Clarence Streit.”

Yes, the last paragraph, including the lower case “g” in “god,” is exactly as in the original letter, from which we quoted. Streit lists the hurdles that must be cleared before any Bill becomes U.S. Law. This is important general information. Highlights: A Bill must be introduced in both House and Senate, gain committee hearings in both Houses, gain a favorable recommendation from the relevant Executive Department, gain clearance from the Office of Management and Budget, pass House and Senate Committees, gain floor clearance in both Houses, obtain floor action, win majority vote in both Houses, get President’s signature within the time limit—and the Bill or Resolution or whatever has become Law.

However, there’s an easier way these days: The President is requested to sign an Executive Order which is published in the Federal Register and, unless this Executive Order is rejected by the House and the Senate within a certain time limit, the Order assumes the force of Law. This is a procedure that becomes doubly dangerous when Congress is not in session. And the next four weeks are truly perilous for the Nation.

EAST-WEST TRADE AND THE ENERGY CRISIS

THE NEW PILGRIMS

When U.S. Secretary of State and Rockefeller agent Henry Alfred Kissinger flew to London to address the Pilgrims of Great Britain on Dec. 12, 1973, the event was hailed as "a major statement of U.S. policy toward Europe." It was a remarkable speech in that Kissinger was arrogant, critical, almost dictatorial, sounding very much as would a Roman addressing a people over whom the suzerain demanded obedience in all external affairs.

He said that the new policy of detente that exists between the United States and the Soviet Union, and between the United States and the Peoples Republic of China, automatically altered relationships between the United States and her former allies. Also, the growth of European unity has altered the nature of the Atlantic Alliance. But, while it was perfectly in order for the U.S. to make deals with Russia and China without consulting Britain in advance, it was not permissible for Britain to make deals on her own without first informing the United States of her intentions.

Here are a few direct quotes:

"We have no intention of restricting Europe's international role to regional matters. . . . Europe's unity must not be at the expense of Atlantic community, or both sides of the Atlantic will suffer. . . . I would be less than frank were I to conceal our uneasiness about some of the recent practices of the European Community in the political field. To present the decisions of a unifying Europe to us as faits accomplis not subject to effective discussion is alien to the tradition of US-European relations. This may seem a strange complaint from a country repeatedly accused of acting itself without adequately consulting with its allies. There is no doubt that the United States has sometimes not consulted enough or adequately, (but this was) usually under pressure of necessity. The attitude of the unifying Europe, by contrast, seems to attempt to elevate refusal to consult into a principle defining European unity. To judge from recent experience, consultations with us before a decision is precluded, and consultation after the fact has been drained of content. For then Europe appoints a spokesman who is empowered to inform us of the decisions taken but who has no authority to negotiate. . . . the United States should be given an opportunity to express its concern before final decisions affecting its interests are taken. . . ."

Stripped of its verbiage, Kissinger is here telling the overlords of what's left of the British Empire that it is right and proper for the United States to conclude agreements with Soviet Russia and Red China without consulting with the Nations of Europe, even though those agreements do affect the interests of the Nations of Europe; but when the shoe is on the other foot, it is not permitted for the Nations of Europe to conclude agreements between themselves without first consulting with the United States!

According to Webster's Dictionary, the word suzerain is defined as "a dominant state controlling the foreign relations of a vassal state but allowing it sovereign authority in its internal affairs."

And according to Kissinger, the United States exercises suzerainty over the States of Europe! This is the New Imperialism!

But, is Kissinger speaking to the Pilgrims of Great Britain as an agent of the United States, or as an agent of the economic empire of the Rockefellers? Or, are the two about to become one?

The important part of Herr Henry's message to the British Pilgrims had to do with the energy crisis, which was planned and produced by the multinational monopolists, whose chieftains happen to be David Rockefeller of the thirty-six varieties of Standard Oil, and Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands and Royal/Dutch Shell, both of these economic imperialists being associated with the very influential Bilderberger Group; one financing it and the other running it.

There was a time, not too long ago, when the Pilgrim Society was the most important, most powerful, and most exclusive international club of them all. Its members were the royalty, the creme de la creme of the elite of two continents. Their chief goal was, to bring back those lost Colonies which are now called the United States of America, and make them once again a part of a worldwide Anglo-Saxon community which would rule the world. There are two groups, the Pilgrims of Great Britain, and the Pilgrims of America. Memberships are interchangeable, however, as are citizenships. For example, British Pilgrim Churchill became an honorary American citizen, and American Pilgrim Eisenhower became an honorary citizen of the United Kingdom. Any newly appointed British Ambassador to the United States must appear before the Pilgrims before taking up his diplomatic duties; and by the same token, any American Ambassador to the Court of St. James must first report to the Pilgrims of Great Britain. The meetings always include a toast to the Queen (or King) and members then stand at attention while the orchestra plays God Save the Queen (or King). On May 22, 1963, Dwight David Eisenhower, Honorary President of the Pilgrims of the United States, was feted at a special banquet held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City, at which time he was presented with a medallion, on which had been engraved the inscription: "Dwight David Eisenhower, in recognition of his great contribution to the cause of Anglo-American unity."

Present at the banquet were the Ambassadors to the United States from the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, as well as their representatives to the UN. And, representing the Council on Foreign Relations and the Rockefeller interests were John D. Rockefeller 3rd, Winthrop Aldrich, John Hay Whitney, Lewis W. Douglas, Eli Whitney Debevoise, Arthur H. Dean, Thomas K. Finletter, Allen W. Dulles, Grayson Kirk, General W. C. Westmoreland, and others.

So, you see, just ten years ago, the Pilgrim Society was a very important society. But, in 1973, instead of sending a Rockefeller, a Whitney, an Aldrich, or at least an Anglo-Saxon, these New Imperialists sent a German born refugee who began his speech by jokingly telling British royalty that "my forebears missed the Mayflower by some three hundred years," and then proceeded to tell them what they'd better do if they wanted to remain in Uncle Sam's good graces.

We think the real reason for this command performance had to do with the manufactured energy crisis. The British had to be told, in not-so-diplomatic language, just what they were supposed to do and how they were supposed to do it. Kissinger told the Pilgrims:

"The only long-term solution (to the energy crisis) is a massive effort to provide producers an incentive to increase their supply, to encourage consumers to use existing supplies more rationally and to develop alternate energy supplies.... To this end, the United States proposes that the nations of Europe, North America and Japan establish an Energy Action Group of senior and prestigious individuals, with a mandate to develop within three months an initial action program for collaboration in all areas of the energy problem....

"The group would have as its goal the assurance of required energy supplies at reasonable cost. It would define broad principles of cooperation, and it would initiate action in specific areas:

- To conserve energy through more rational utilization of existing supplies;
- To encourage the discovery and development of new sources of energy;
- To give producers an incentive to increase supply; and
- To coordinate an international program of research to develop new technologies that use energy more efficiently and provide alternatives to petroleum. The United States would be willing to contribute our particular skills in such areas as the development of the deep seabed.

"The Energy Action Group should not be an exclusive organization of consumers. The producing nations should be invited to join it from the very beginning with respect to any matters of common interest. The problem of finding adequate opportunity for development, and the investment of the proceeds from the sale of energy sources would appear to be a particularly important area for consumer-producer cooperation...."

And this last paragraph, of course, refers to the development of those oil and gas fields in Siberia.

One wonders: What Kissinger told the Pilgrims is very similar to what William Simon is telling Americans in authority -

- To conserve energy through more rational utilization suggests the rationing of fuel;
- To give producers an incentive suggests the increasing of the price of gasoline and fuel for heating purposes;
- To coordinate an international program of research could mean helping Russia to grab her "fair share" of the petroleum and natural gas market.

Meanwhile, the industrial nations of the world—United States, United Kingdom, West Germany, Japan—must cut back dangerously on production, pay higher prices for less food and fuel, face mass unemployment, risk recession or worse; all of these things and more because of a manufactured crisis? A crisis that may have been created for the purpose of bringing the "have" nations down and the "have not" nations up—especially Soviet Russia and Red China—so that all "trading nations" of the world will be equal?

Specifically, the principal goal of the New Imperialists "at this point in time" is to develop East-West trade. And the only thing that Russia has which the world can use is oil. As Rep. Ben Blackburn, Georgia Republican, pointed out in a recent article in the Wall Street Journal:

"Soviet consumer goods range from non-existent to shoddy. The Soviet non-military technology is either non-existent or 20 years behind ours; consequently, there is no—or hardly any—Soviet technology that we can use. They do have some raw materials, but the export of raw materials earns relatively little in foreign exchange over a period of time. Americans will have to drink an ocean of vodka just to balance the Pepsi account! ... The only items seriously discussed that the Soviet Union has and that we really need are natural gas and petroleum...."

However, as Rep. Blackburn points out: "we can more quickly and cheaply pipe oil from Alaska and develop gas reserves untapped on the North American continent." So, in order to make the development of Russian petroleum appear essential, it is necessary to create a world-wide energy crisis, one that must be made to last for years, just as Kissinger, Simon and other "experts" have been telling us. And an extended energy shortage will amply justify the exploitation and development of Soviet petroleum preserves.

And why should this operation be such an exciting adventure to the New Imperialists? The answer is obvious: They want to sell things to the Russians, and they want to make things in Russia that can be sold elsewhere; and the only way that Russia can become an equal trading partner is to make Russia oil-rich!

However, the American people will pay two ways for this internationalist adventure. They will suffer the hardships brought on by an extended fuel and food shortage which could bring back the conditions of the Great Depression of the early 30s. And, those Americans who are still able to pay taxes are going to be forced to pay a major share of the cost of developing those Soviet oil fields! There are federal organizations already set up and operating which will be able to siphon off American tax dollars and send them off to Russia and China to promote East-West Trade! Among the foreign trade programs which can be used for this purpose are the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, Domestic International Sales Corporation, Private Export Funding Corporation, Foreign Credit Insurance Association, Commodity Credit Corporation Credit Sales Program, Private Investment Center of the Agency for International Development, and last but hardly least, the Export-Import Bank. All of these, and a few more, are supported directly or indirectly by the American taxpayer, and all of them can be used to promote and finance East-West Trade.

In our last Closer-Up we quoted Armand Hammer of the Occidental Petroleum Corporation, who spoke of the production, sale and distribution of Soviet oil and gas. He said, among other things:

"...It will require a certain amount of financing which I believe will be satisfactorily worked out again by the Ex-Im Bank and the Japanese counterpart of the Ex-Im Bank. George P. Shultz, U.S. Treasury Secretary, is in Japan at present (9/12/73) and undoubtedly discussions are going on there right now...."

A closer look at this Ex-Im Bank should raise a few taxpayers' eyebrows. Dr. Peter Beter, a former counsel to the Export-Import Bank of the United States, is the author of a book, The Conspiracy Against the Dollar, (published by George Braziller, Inc., One Park Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016. 110 pages, $1.95). Dr. Beter refers to the period through which we are beginning to go, as the period of stagflation. He writes:

"During this period of stagflation America would also be engaged in East-West trade. Credit facilities would be stretched to the breaking point. All the client followers of the corporate aristocracy... would exhort the Export-Import Bank of the United States to extend credit to its foreign buyers...."

"Eximbank is a very important tool for the forces of the New Imperialism. They can force it to borrow huge dollar amounts from the U.S. Treasury in order to finance East-West trade.

"A flagrant example of stretching the usual banking terms of Eximbank is the financing of a plant to produce trucks and engines on the Kama River in the town of Naberjnaya Chelny, 550 miles east of Moscow. This financing was approved March 21, 1973. Eximbank's usual length of term for loans range from three to five, or seven years for a limited class of products. However, the repayment period for this loan is 12 years with a grace period of 4½ years; in effect, a total of 16½ years before the first repayment is made!

"The government of the Soviet Union guarantees to Eximbank its credits extended or guaranteed by Eximbank to the Bank for Foreign Trade of the USSR (Vneshtorgbank). Normally, credits extended by Eximbank are deposited in United States banks where the foreign importer draws on the credit to pay the American exporter. Not in this case, however. Eximbank's portion of the money will be deposited directly into the coffers of the Vneshtorgbank in Moscow.

"Participating, too, in the overall loan of $192.1 million is Chase Manhattan Bank (Note: The author fails to mention that Chase Manhattan Bank cannot lose money on the deal, because David Rockefeller's bank loan is guaranteed by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation and the Foreign Credit Insurance Association. Taxpayers may lose, but Chase Manhattan won't—Ed.)

"Eximbank credit facilities will be used for many such projects in the East-West trade shuttle during the stagflation period. To do this it will have to dip into its reserves! In addition, billions of taxpayer dollars will be used for such East-West trade.... Huge exports of wheat and other agricultural commodities to these countries will cause some food shortages, transport dislocations, and greatly increased costs in business activity.

However, the cost of oil products will soar because their prices are arbitrarily established by the (New Imperialist) dynasty and the corporate aristocracy....

(End of extended quotation; italics added in last paragraph for purpose of emphasis).

If what Dr. Beter states is true—and he was a counsel for the Export-Import Bank of the United States—then this Eximbank is going to be a key factor in East-West trade and in the Energy Crisis. Not too surprisingly then, is the announcement that:—

President Nixon recently nominated William J. Casey to be President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States. His nomination had not been confirmed by the Senate before its adjournment, but the matter is pending before Senator Sparkman's Senate Banking Committee, and Sparkman stated that action had been postponed until some "additional information is obtained." Here is some information that would be pertinent.

William J. Casey is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations and currently has the title of Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs. Many eyebrows were raised among Washington security officers when Nixon named Casey to this post. A thumbnail biography should explain why:

During World War II Casey served in the Communist-infested OSS, worked with Arthur Goldberg and David K.E. Bruce, the latter now representing the United States in Communist China. Between 1962 and 1965 Casey was involved as a defendant in three law suits. At the time of Casey's nomination for Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, there were revelations that he had been named in two civil actions alleging breach of the security laws which he would supposedly be enforcing as chairman of SEC. He was also the subject of an investigation by a New York grand jury alleging peculiar actions in regard to SEC decisions involving Robert L. Vesco and International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation. When ITT was being investigated on three separate anti-trust suits, one of them involving an alleged gift of $400,000 to the Republican presidential campaign in 1972 in exchange for settlements favoring ITT, there was the case of the mysterious disappearance of some 13 documents which had been subpoenaed by the House Investigating Committee and which apparently ended up in the Justice Department, where they were kept out of the hands of the investigators, because once any material that may be used in a criminal investigation is in the hands of the Justice Department, it is no longer subject to congressional subpoena. William J. Casey allegedly caused the files to disappear, to the gratification of both ITT and the Nixon Administration. Perhaps as a reward, Casey has been named to head Eximbank.

While handling economic affairs in the State Department, Casey's chief duty was to promote trade with Communist countries. Now, with taxpayers' money to invest for such promotions, he will be a very important person in the eyes of the New Imperialists, who are willing to use our money while at the same time rationing our food and fuel supplies.

But, they must be wondering just how much peacetime regimentation the people will accept without rebelling. 1974 should be a very interesting year.

APPOINTED MANAGERS - THE NEW RULING CLASS

THE FEDERAL CORPORATION

"The issue will no longer be who is the candidate in an election - any charismatic can be president if he can take and deliver orders." So wrote a correspondent who recalled that "a new ruling class whose ascent to power was inevitable, was predicted by James Burnham over 30 years ago in his book, The Managerial Revolution. He identified 'managers' as a new type of professional with command of essential skills quite distinct and towering above the capabilities needed for fairly routine jobs. Rule over the United States would be obtained through state ownership and control, with appointed managers rather than elected officials in control."

The current denigration and mistrust of elected officials, from the President of the United States on down to the Mayor of a city, has been brought about to a large extent because managers have been trained and are ready to take over, and the government itself has been restructured in such a way that the take-over by the new ruling class seems not only logical, but desirable.

This new breed of "managers" was conceived, nourished, developed, trained and poured into public management positions by the use of funds supplied by foundations—Ford, Rockefeller, Carnegie, Alfred P. Sloan, etc. The funds were used to finance special courses at colleges and universities where these new "managers" were trained. Post-graduate courses were often provided by such management-minded organizations as the Council on Foreign Relations (Henry Kissinger being an excellent example of such a trainee.) The 1313 Conglomerate was able to train, unionize, and provide a job-placement service for such public management categories as City Managers, Metro Managers, Regional Council Officials, etc.

And Big Business began to provide the top-echelon of managers for this new kind of government.

When the federal Bureau of the Budget was restructured and expanded to become the Office of Management and Budget, then the Revolution was won. Looking back:—

In 1972 and the early months of 1973, the Great Controversy between the Congress and the Executive had to do with the impoundment of funds which had been appropriated by the Congress for specific uses, and which the Office of Management and Budget refused to spend as directed. The real reason for the impoundments had nothing to do with trying to cut down on expenses and live within the federal budget; rather, OMB had not yet placed its stamp of approval on any specific Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS) for the particular expenditure which had been designated by Congress. OMB wanted it understood that it, the OMB, was the managerial control center between the all-powerful Central Government and the subservient State, County and local governments. The Congress could—and should—appropriate the money, but OMB would determine just how, where, and when, the money would be spent.

Of course, Congress was angered, and most rightfully so. Its authority was being taken from it by a new, upstart bureau which the Congress had only recently permitted the Chief Executive to establish as a Management Center. There was a Congressional move to require formal Senate approval of any man selected to head OMB. But the move was defeated, and the controversial Roy Ash was named OMB Director.

Shortly after this impoundment controversy had come to a boil, the whole affair was drowned by the Watergate overflow. Then came the alleged energy crisis. Meanwhile, OMB continued to grow and increase in power and importance.

As an example, we quote from a recent column by the eminent Edith Kermit Roosevelt:

CONTRACTING OUT THE GOVERNMENT

Washington—The beleaguered administration faces a new charge of "big business bias" with the disclosure that the Office of Management and Budget, headed by a former big conglomerate head, would contract out to private industry much of the vast bulk of military base operations. The services to be replaced are now performed by 185,000 military personnel and career civil servants at 74 installations. The military presently has control of these operations in order to "run a tight ship" in time of war or other national emergency. But under a still unpublished proposal by OMB, the military would have to go through a contractor at each base, who would control the support functions. The effect would be to civilianize vital support functions with a resulting erosion in the command responsibilities of Navy, Air Force, and Army.

The OMB proposal not only covers such support services as commissary, food service, postal service and base hospitals but also extends to more sensitive matters such as law enforcement, transportation and base supply. Also embraced under the new plan are transient aircraft maintenance, computers and audiovisual services.

A number of military men are privately voicing objections to the OMB plan to their Congressmen. Obviously, security and the prevention of sabotage become more difficult when a non-military, private party is involved. Each of the three Services is expected to provide its initial official responses to OMB's proposed schedules for contracting out by the end of this month.

Meanwhile, Rep. Jerome R. Waldie (D-Ca.), who secured a copy of the text of OMB's proposal, has charged in a press conference here:

"OMB's proposal was understandable and perhaps even inevitable in view of the previous background of Roy Ash, now head of OMB. Ash was the former Chief Executive for Litton Industries, a major corporate contractor of services to the military, and among those corporations most likely to receive any new contracts to provide the base operational support services."

According to documents in the California Legislator's possession "the proposal has the approval of the highest levels within the Office of Management and Budget." Presumably, the highest levels would be Director Ash.

Significantly, the OMB proposal calls for all work to be contracted out by one contractor per base, eliminating any possibility that small, specialized companies would be able to compete for a portion of the work. This ensures that the contracts will go to such corporate giants as ITT, RCA, and, of course, Ash's former company, Litton.

Ash's former conflicts of interest have long been a subject of criticism on Capitol Hill.

Some of them are detailed in a paper entitled "The Case Against Roy Ash" that was inserted in the Congressional Record on Feb. 26 of last year by Sen. Les Aspin (D-Wis.). The compendium reads in part:

"The Washington Star-News Pentagon reporter, Orr Kelly, recently obtained a copy of the minutes of a meeting between top Navy personnel and Litton officials, including Ash. According to this record, written by an Admiral in attendance, Ash threatened—as part of Litton's attempt to heist approximately $400 million in bailout funds which the company needs to pay for its miserable performance on the five-ship program—to go over the heads of Navy officials and take his case to John Connally and the White House. With Litton still trying to grab $400 million in bailout funds, and Ash, its former chief executive, publicly expressing an interest in the Navy's budget, Ash's conflict of interest is hard to ignore." (Note: The Defense Department is currently preparing a suit against Litton for failure to fulfill its defense contracts. Ash's conflict of interest seems really to be in conflict with the Nation's best interests—Ed.)

Obviously, Navy officials and professional service men are concerned first and foremost with providing for the proper defense and security of this Nation and not in guaranteeing the profits of an individual conglomerate. Hence, some big commercial interests would like to see their responsibilities downgraded. What is worth emphasizing too, is that this contracting out of government functions has nothing to do with genuinely free enterprise in the traditional sense. What is being created under the OMB proposal are inefficient "cost-plus" contracts which guarantee profits for those companies who are awarded the contracts.

Furthermore, past conversions demonstrate that corporations submit bids which show an initial savings in comparison to the number of dollars spent on the Civil Service function. Then after the first year of having a function contracted out, the costs increase substantially in the succeeding years. The result is that these increased costs of the contractor erase any initial military cost savings which might have been realized. (End of column).

The idea of "big business" taking over the management of United States defense establishments carries some ominous overtones which spell danger to our Nation, and to what's left of our government itself. However, before offering further comment on the strange circumstance of OMB making such a proposal, we should like you to read one more article which further demonstrates the scope and area of activities being taken over by OMB.

If Nixon had any special plan to fight unemployment, under normal circumstances such a plan would be announced by Nixon himself, or by his press secretary, or perhaps by the Labor Secretary if he and the President were in agreement on the plan. Under no circumstances would one expect to hear a Deputy Director of the Budget telling the Nation what "Nixon's Plan" is going to be. Nevertheless, the following article was released by Associated Press for publication in dailies of Dec. 26, 1973. The following is reprinted from the Santa Cruz (Calif.) Sentinel of that date:

NIXON'S PLAN TO FIGHT UNEMPLOYMENT

Washington (AP)—The Nixon administration plans to step up federal spending quickly next year to create new jobs if unemployment reaches close to six per cent, Deputy Budget Director Frederic V. Malek says. Malek said plans to inject money into the economy might include increasing the rate of federal construction or military procurement. The injection would be made if the jobless rate, now 4.7 per cent, approaches "the high ends of our estimates," he said. Administration economists have said the fuel shortage could push the jobless rate close to six per cent next year.

Malek also told the Associated Press that the fiscal 1975 defense budget will have to go up, possibly as much as $5 billion. The new federal budget over-all will be tight, in the range of $300 billion, and carry a sizable deficit, he said:

Excerpts from the interview:

Q. Because of the energy crisis, it appears the federal budget deficit is going to be larger than you originally thought. About what will be the size of the deficit in fiscal 1975?

A. First of all, the deficit is not going to be influenced that much by the energy crisis. In fact, the impact is going to be less than one per cent. It's less than a $3 billion impact, when you take into account added unemployment benefits plus the funds for energy research and development, plus a couple of hundred million for cost of living adjustments because of price increases.

Q. That's on the energy crisis. But, considering the budget as a whole and the other programs that have to be funded, you are still going to have a sizable deficit, aren't you?

A. We are going to have a deficit in fiscal 1975. It's really too early to say what the size of that deficit is going to be. The budget we're looking at now is in the $300 billion range. We have a range of $6 billion to $8 billion. The final determination of how much the budget is will depend on the latest economic data that is available, the latest advice of the President's economic advisers, and his determination of what the appropriate fiscal policy is, balanced against the programmatic considerations. Along about early January we will be coming to a determination about what the total should be...

Q. What about national health insurance? How much is in the budget for that?

A. Well, the national health insurance won't have much of a budgetary impact in 1975. So we don't have to factor that into the budget very much. Let me tell you a couple of more things on the total size of the budget. We are predicating the 1975 budget on the fact that inflation is going to be the No. 1 economic problem. Therefore, we are trying to keep spending down. We are trying to come in with a very tight budget. Now, you might ask how a $300 billion range is consistent with a tight budget? We are going to have about $273 billion in expenditures in fiscal 1974. We've got built in, before we or Congress get a chance to work on the discretionary programs, about $25 billion increment in noncontrollables. What I mean by noncontrollables are those programs that are fixed by prior legislation. Individual entitlement programs are the biggest portion of that—Social Security, medicare, medicaid, public assistance, veterans benefits, unemployment benefits, civil service retirement benefits and the like.

Q. It doesn't sound like you are going to have many new initiatives in fiscal 1975, except for the start of the national health insurance program, because of the tight budget situation.

A. There are a number of other things that are being considered for the President's State of the Union address. There are two ways to answer that comment. One, there are a heck of a lot of initiatives that we've already proposed that haven't been acted on yet that we think merit consideration. Among those is further action on the President's new federalism program, mainly, enactment of the four special revenue-sharing acts. The other way of answering that is there are going to be some other new initiatives, some of which will come out in the State of the Union and others of which will come out in the budget... We're considering welfare reform again... There's the possibility of an urban mass transit revenue-sharing program, where we combine the city highway funds with the urban mass transit funds into a single fund and distribute on a proportionate basis to the cities and states.

Q. On the economy, is there any change in the administration's forecast of the economic impact of the energy crisis? Your economic advisers said recently there would be no recession, but unemployment might rise close to six per cent.

A. We firmly feel that there will not be a recession. We're trying to put together the budget in a way that helps avoid a recession. Now, that's somewhat contradictory to say, Well, we're keeping it down to avoid inflation but we're putting it together to avoid a recession. We're going to be watching very carefully the unemployment trends on a monthly basis. If we see we're approaching the top range of our estimates, we're going to do something to inject into the economy some stimuli. Our staff is working on a categorization of those kinds of things that can be done that can provide an injection into the economy... And as we watch the economic trends that are developing—you might call this an unemployment watch—if we are approaching the high ends of our estimates, we are prepared to take those actions that will avoid unemployment going much higher... I can't give you too many specifics on that, because it's something we're developing now...

(End of quotations from Malek interview)

SUMMARY:—The Congress and the people customarily look to the President of the United States for the annual State of the Union Address and the Budget Report in accordance with the commandment laid down in the Constitution. But it seems that the President has been pre-empted by an assistant director of the Office of Management and Budget, a manager whose appointment need not be confirmed by the Senate, a man protected by executive privilege and responsible to no man other than his immediate superior, Roy Ash, who also is appointed to his czardom and is in no way responsible to the electorate or to the representatives of the electorate.

Similarly Roy Ash, as director of OMB, pre-empted the Presidency, the Pentagon and the Congress in laying down plans for the restructuring of American military bases. If you have been following the headlines, you will have noticed that appointee Henry Kissinger pre-empted the President in all foreign affairs, just as George Shultz speaks for the President in "Nixonomic" affairs, and William Simon in "energetics." And so on down the line. They speak, and the President approves. As our correspondent implied, it no longer matters who is President, any man will do if he can take and deliver orders, and approve orders given by the appointed managers who really run the show!

This seems to be the game plan:

1. The Office of Management and Budget, through the Regional Governance establishment, and absolute control over the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, will exercise dictatorial control over all domestic governing bodies.

2. The Treasury Department through William Simon's "crisis control" (he is said to be slated to replace the resigning George Shultz shortly), will control the people, even as OMB controls governing bodies, by means of rationing, and through the use of the Internal Revenue Service as a police to keep all individuals in line (corporations are classified legally as "individuals," unless they become conglomerates or multinationals, in which cases they tend to become "governments" in their own right.)

3. While OMB is keeping government and public bodies under strict control, and while IRS is keeping the people under strict control, appointee Kissinger will be keeping—or trying to keep—other Nations under control.

Thus has developed the Federal Corporation, with its New Ruling Class operating through Appointed Managers. And our only worldly hope of liberation lies in the fact that the people at large are beginning to ask questions. May they ask the right ones, and demand the right answers!

THE UNMAKING OF THE PRESIDENCY

"I DO SOLEMNLY SWEAR..."

The Constitution of the United States of America is a wonderful and surprisingly complete and up-to-date civic bible. But it doesn't waste words specifically outlining the duties of the President. The Congress, on the other hand, is given a long list of definite and carefully enumerated duties: The Senate is given specific responsibilities, particularly in connection with maintaining a check on the Executive Branch of the Government. The House is given certain particular responsibilities, especially with appropriation and revenue bills. And the joint Congress has a long list of prescribed powers, that list ending with the power to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

In contrast, the various powers and duties ascribed to the President, aside from treaty-making, vetoing undesirable legislation and acting as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces, are pretty well summed up in one sentence: "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

Now, most Americans are, by this time, more or less familiar with the erosion of the powers conferred upon the Senate by the Constitution. The Congressional power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, ..." was relinquished to a private corporation bearing the title of Federal Reserve Corporation. Very general laws and enabling acts were passed, permitting the various Executive departments and bureaus to work out the details and specifics in what has come to be known as "administrative law." The Executive Branch was permitted to become a law-making branch—unconstitutionally—by virtue of the publication of "Executive Orders." The Supreme Court also was permitted to become a law-making body through the issuance of Supreme Court decisions that—again unconstitutionally—came to be regarded as "laws of the land." And so on...

There likewise has been an erosion of the powers of the Presidency, but this has not been so obvious as the degeneration of the Legislative Branch, because the Executive erosion has been, for the greater part, from within, and has not been clearly visible from without. The Office of the Presidency might be likened to those "whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness" (Matthew 23:27).

It could be that the current President had delusions of regality, wanted to be isolated from his subjects and even from his ministers of state (as former Interior Secretary Hickel charged), organized a "Prussian Guard" to keep away all except those of similar regal stature and those who could qualify as cronies. Perhaps he saw it as his duty to sit in one of his three palaces, issuing ultimata and expecting executive inferiors to interpret, define and execute such orders.

Or it could be that he was never his own boss, could not stand on principle but had to change his position on vital issues as directed and, having no defense, could merely cry with extended palms turned upward that, "I am not a crook," and then hope and pray that he would not be forced to prove the statement.

Or, there may have been other reasons, or justifications, or even exonerations; but the final results are catastrophic to the office of the Presidency and to the Republic for which it spoke:

Under the guise of "returning the power to the people," the President has really relinquished the power to appointed managers and bureaucrats over whom neither the Congress nor the people have any power or control!

By obtaining Congressional approval of certain Executive Reorganization Plans, a vast "Executive Offices" complex was created, and staffed with managers and specially trained change agents whose appointment required no Senate approval or confirmation, and who were protected from Congressional overseeing by a misuse of the shady doctrine of executive privilege. And to such appointed managers and change agents was given the power of absolute control over various phases of governance. Such appointees were "designated and empowered to exercise, without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President" certain specified executive functions!

Notice the wording of the above, which is taken from one of the many Executive Orders of like manner: The President relinquishes all power over a bureau chieftain over whom the Congress also has no power! Thus, a man like Roy Ash of OMB becomes an absolute czar in his particular realm of governance.

This delegation of presidential authority was first brought to our attention when we read Executive Order 11609, of July 22, 1971. This is a very long and detailed order "delegating certain functions vested in the President to other Officers of the Government." Here is a part of that Order:

"By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

"Sec. 9. Office of Management and Budget. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget is hereby designated and empowered to exercise, without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President, the following...

"(5) The authority of the President... to approve contracts for acquisition of land subject to limited rights reserved to the grantor and for the acquisition of limited permanent rights in land adjoining park property....

"(6) The authority of the President... to approve regulations relating to the rental of substandard housing for members of the uniformed services..."

In this same Executive Order 11609, certain Presidential functions were delegated "without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President," to various departments and agencies, including the General Services Administration, Department of the Treasury, HEW, Department of State, Department of Defense, and the Civil Service Commission.

This seems to have marked the beginning of the delegation of Presidential authority—without any curb or control—to unelected heads of bureaus and agencies. It would be impossible, in one short letter, to trace the growth of this transfer of power from the hands of elected representatives to those of appointed specialists. Therefore, permit us to concentrate on just one phase of this reorganization (restructuring) of the federal executive: the area having to do with the control of water and water resources has not been adequately explained. Ergo:—

Nearly five years ago, on May 29, 1969, the President issued from his Key Biscayne, Florida "palace," a statement having to do with the creation of an "Environmental Quality Council" which was to be a Cabinet level advisory body "the structure of which in some respects parallels that of the National Advisory Council and the Urban Affairs Council."

We quote from the President's statement:

"For the purposes of this order, plans and programs (of the Council) may include, but are not limited to, those for or affecting: 1) development, restoration, and preservation of the beauty of the countryside, urban and suburban areas, water resources, wild rivers, scenic roads, parkways and highways; 2) the protection and appropriate management of scenic or primitive areas, natural wonders, historic sites, and recreation areas; 3) the management of Federal land and water resources, including fish and wildlife...5) interstate arrangements, including Federal participation where authorized and necessary"... (We have italicized those parts of the above order which have to do with water resources, not because of the greater importance of this subject, but because this is the focal point of this particular letter).

About two years after the issuance of the preceding statement, President Nixon was able to issue an Executive Order establishing Ten Federal Regions with their Ten Regional Councils. The Environmental Quality Council then gave way to the Environmental Protection Agency which was given Cabinet-level authority, and whose Deputy Director would become a member of the ten-member Under Secretaries Group For Regional Government. This latter Group would operate under the all-powerful chairmanship of the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget. The Under Secretaries Group would hand down general policy to the ten Federal Regional Councils which would take their overall direction from OMB, by means of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System.

Now, these Federal Regional Councils would be all-powerful in their particular areas, which are classified as the activities which are under the control of the Departments of Agriculture, Interior, Labor, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, Transportation, and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, the Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Environmental Protection Agency.

As powerful as is this new system of governance, it is not a complete system in itself. This is because the restructuring program begun in 1969 was not carried out in full. You will remember that the President had called for the scrapping of the original Cabinet Departments which are represented in this Regional Governance Scheme, and their replacement by four Super-Cabinet Departments "concerned with our communities, our earth, our economy, and our potential as individuals" said the President as he called for the creation of:

- 1) A Department of Community Development,
- 2) A Department of Natural Resources,
- 3) A Department of Economic Affairs, and
- 4) A Department of Human Resources.

But Congress refused to go along with this particular part of the restructuring program. And, just possibly as punishment, we have had a series of crises which permitted the establishment of substitute agencies to control the four areas involved:

- 1) Revenue Sharing to control community development;
- 2) An Energy Czar to control natural resources such as petroleum, coal, etc.;
- 3) A price and labor control system to regulate economic affairs; and
- 4) Threats of a rationing system which will join IRS and other agencies in the control of human resources.

Now, the rationing of food and fuel will go a long way toward the total control of all humans. But one other natural resource is even more important: water!

Which brings us to the subject of Regional Water Basins, a master plan for the control of water resources throughout the United States by means of the creation of 22 river-basin regions.

First, an historical background is required:

The idea of doing away with the States and dividing the Nation into Regions is not new. As early as 1913 the Nation was divided into twelve Federal Reserve Regions—and almost immediately thereafter came the suggestion that these twelve districts form the foundation for a new type of federal governance which should encompass the political and economic as well as the monetary control of the Nation. The idea was, of course, much too radical to catch fire at that time in history.

Later, with the coming of the New Deal, there was advanced the scheme for dividing the Nation into Federal Districts which would replace the States and State Governments. Again, too early for fulfillment.

A little later, with the establishment of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the promotion of various "public power and irrigation" projects, the Nation was divided into public power districts. And this also led to suggestion that the States be done away with and the Nation divided into regions drawn according to the sources of public power. Again, too radical and too soon.

One other scheme showed greater promise: the dividing of the Nation into Water Resources Regions. This plan was promoted in the 1960s, and the following article which appeared in the publication Public Opinion, Friday, Sept. 22, 1967, is self-explanatory:

UDALL SUGGESTS STATE OF POTOMAC

*By M. P. Kilpatrick
(4th of a Series)*

How would you like to live in the State of Potomac without a vote? Secretary of Interior Stewart Udall at his press conference to introduce the report of the Potomac Planning Task Force voluntarily suggested that the counties of the basin be rearranged into a state. He said that state lines were drawn by surveyors and did not draw together communities of like interests and he thought that a better system would be states based on watersheds.

Later in the conference he was asked how the Interior Department planned to provide for voting when none of the proposed compacts make provision for an expression of thought by the people. He said the State of Potomac was a thought and was presented as an interesting idea. However, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare (John W. Gardner, now head of the Urban Coalition and Common Cause—Ed.) had the same idea for a rearrangement of the states and mentioned it in a public speech earlier this year. (End of article)

An 8-page tabloid-size publication complete with maps and charts, which explains the entire scheme in rather sensational fashion, is available from the Tri-State Natural Weather Ass'n, Inc., Mecca Manor, R. D. 1, St. Thomas, Penna. 17252. "Rather than fight 50 strong State governments," declare the editors, "America has been broken into 22 river-basin systems that will fragment the States and reassemble them under river-basin commissions."

The editors of this publication look upon this scheme as a plan providing for the "Internal Capture of the United States," which will bring about a "new government of America, operated by citizens from another country - by 1975!"

The idea of foreigners taking over this country is one of the favorite stratagems of those who would create a strong, collectivized central government, ostensibly for protection from a foreign enemy, but actually for the purpose of accomplishing a take-over of the Nation from within. Our enemies are in Washington, D.C. and New York City, not in Moscow and Peking. When this Nation is destroyed, it will be destroyed from within. This should not be construed as down-grad- ing our need for a strong National Defense organization and our need for constant guard against the machinations of International Communism. But the greater danger is domestic, not foreign.

Nor do we look upon this 22 River-Basin Scheme as an isolated, self-contained plan for the capture of America. Rather, we see it as a master plan for the control of water in the United States, and as a complement and supplement to the Regional Governance System which has already been established.

If an Elite Internationalist Cabal desired to gain absolute control over all of the Natural and Human Resources of this Nation, the monopolistic control of all production facilities would be necessary, the rationing of food and fuel would be essential, but even more necessary would be the control of all water supplies. The control of water, of course, demands the control of all land; and this River-Basin Scheme is the one way to bring about the control of water.

It is not surprising, therefore, that we find this plot mentioned in various Executive Orders which have the effect of making the Director of OMB the Water Czar of America! To wit, and the following is a direct quote from the government publication of "Presidential Documents for the week ending Saturday, November 24, 1973":

WATER RESOURCES PLANNING FUNCTIONS

Executive Order 11747, November 7, 1973
Delegating Certain Authority of the President Under the Water Resources Planning

Act, As Amended

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget is designated and empowered to exercise, without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President, the functions vested in the President by (1) sections 104(b) and 204(3) of the Water Resources Planning Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1962a-3(b) and 1962b-3(3), respectively), with respect to reviewing plans, or revisions thereof, of river basin commissions established pursuant to that act and transmitting those plans or revisions thereto to the Congress with appropriate recommendations; and (2) section 301(b) of the same act (42 U.S.C. 1962(b) with respect to approving rules, procedures, arrangements, and provisions relating to coordination of Federal planning assistance programs and utilization of Federal agencies administering related programs.

Sec. 2. The Chairman of the Water Resources Council is designated and empowered to exercise, without the approval, ratification, or other action of the President, the approval function for standards and procedures vested in the President by section 103 of the Water Resources Planning Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1962a-2).

(signed) Richard Nixon

The White House, November 7, 1973.

(Filed with the Office of the Federal Register, 4:41 pm., November 7, 1973)

To complete the story: these 22 River Basin Commissions over which OMB has absolute control, were also established by Executive Orders, each of which begins with the statement: "The Water Resources Planning Act... provides for the establishment of river basin water and related land resources commissions."

So, the procedure is simple: the Congress passes a general Act, planners provide the details and specifics, and the President then grants absolute power to some appointed manager over—in this instance—the water supply and land resources of America. Thus does a Representative Republic become a Bureaucratic Dictatorship.

THE PLOT TO DESTROY THE DOLLAR

DAYS OF DISAPPEARING VALUES

"The worst inflation in a quarter century," was the modest admission of the Bureau of Labor statistics in its review of consumer prices for 1973. The story, as released by the Knight Washington Bureau for publication on Jan. 23, 1974:

"Consumer prices rose 8.8 per cent in 1973, the worst inflation in a quarter century, and more than wiped out average gains for the year, the Government reported Tuesday. The Bureau of Labor Statistics said the prices soared 1.5 per cent more than wage increases last year, leaving the average American worse off in December than he was when the year started. The bad news seemed to augur ill for the Nixon Administration's efforts to prevent a new round of fat catch-up pay hikes that could lead to even more inflation. AFL-CIO President George Meany strongly hinted that, as far as organized labor is concerned, the government's 5.5 per cent wage guideline is out the window...."

"A number of pace-setting national labor contracts will be up for negotiation this year, including those in steel, aluminum, car and telephone industries, covering a total of about six million workers.

"Herbert Stein, the normally optimistic chairman of President Nixon's Council of Economic Advisers, was conspicuously silent on the meaning of the latest consumer price figures. Stein's constant refrain as prices skyrocketed last year was that the Americans were better off than they realized and were more than making up for inflation with big boosts in income. But the newest government statistics shattered that argument. Nixon had no direct comment on the latest economic news...."

"For the entire year of 1973, the story was a wave of higher food prices that finally crested only to be succeeded by an even bigger wave of higher energy prices. The higher energy prices still have not reached their peak, prompting the predictions that little relief is in sight for at least the first half of 1974....(End of quotation.)"

In confirmation and explanation, the Inter- national Harry Schultz Letter states that we "ain't seen nothing yet," that 1974 will be a year of wild inflation. Harry Schultz, not to be confused with George Shultz of the U.S. Treasury Department, is an economic consultant who has been making economic forecasts for the past several years, and says he's been 78% correct over the past decade in predictions concerning economic, political, monetary, financial, social and military matters. Not having read his forecasts in past years, we'll have to take his word for it; but any man who can command a consultation fee of $900 per hour must have a better than average credibility rating. And here is what he wrote in his first January issue, 1974:

"Many are predicting deflation to take over if business slumps and profits shrink. I say: Inflation will continue unabated in '74. The pace may in fact accelerate. I fear inflation will be with us not only in '74 but for the rest of the decade. When government took over money printing from private banks they got the power to sustain inflation. This was abetted by creation of the IMF, which virtually is an engine of global inflation. Traditionally, and more so now than ever, only a coup d'etat, a revolution, ends uncontrolled inflation. Don't look for market forces to bring it on, for all governments are now socialist, in varying degrees, and they subvert the market forces, at least on the surface. Money will continue to be debased, people will continue to get poorer, some will starve, but an illusion of relative prosperity will be maintained through money floods, i.e., inflation through excessive credit and money creation. The inflation rate will ebb and flow, but will not become net deflation....1974 will be a bad year, yea a horrible year, the worst, I suspect, in a century....It'll be a year of slump plus galloping inflation, the worst of two worlds.... A screaming headline in London's Daily Mirror recently read, in letters two inches high, on page one, across six columns: "Is Everybody Going Mad?" They speak of the mood of anger, frustration, bewilderment, and the anxious feeling that the country is drifting toward breakdown, with the nation becoming ungovernable. What the Mirror reflects about the United Kingdom can be said, in widely varying degrees of many if not all nations, with the United States being a close second for the prize of most chaotic country. UK wins but US isn't far behind." (End of quotation from International Harry Schultz Letter No. 311, Financial & Economic Research Corp., P. O. Box 1161, Basel 4002, Switzerland, $177 per year.)

What Dr. Schultz says is reflected in the current (Jan. 28) issue of US News & World Report. Ironically coincidental, page 15 bears the headline: "Cruellest Tax-Inflation's Bite—Any Relief In Sight?" and the very next feature (page 18) is a pictogram illustrating the "Rising Mountain of Federal Debt ... and a Skyrocketing Interest Burden." Without ever saying outright that the Federal Debt is the cause and inflation the effect, US&WR does give vital information:

"The government's debt, under President Nixon, is rising at a rate unmatched since the days of World War II—and adding some unpredictable strains on the nation's economy. By June 30, the national debt will reach 480 billion dollars—just under a half trillion. That would be 121 billion, or 34 per cent, more than when Mr. Nixon took office in January, 1969.

"The debt now in prospect for midyear is the equivalent of $2,262 for every person in the U.S. ...

"Just how much is 480 billion dollars? The vast size comes into better focus when you consider that it is equal to more than a third of the nation's total output of goods and services in a year; nearly half of all the income people make in a year; five times the amount business spends on new plants and equipment; or more than two and a half times the size of consumer debt.

"Increasing even more rapidly than the debt is the interest the government must pay. In the year that ends June 30, the cost of carrying the debt will total 29 billion dollars—double the cost of just six years ago and equal to $237 per person in this country. One dollar in every 9 spent by the Government goes to pay interest on the debt. Only outlays for defense and Social Security rank higher among budget expenditures.

"The very size of the debt and its rapid growth create serious difficulties in financing new budget deficits. While the Administration urges the Federal Reserve System to make money abundant and relatively cheap as a cure for possible recession, the Government's competition with other borrowers for money makes this difficult to accomplish. Furthermore, economists note, all this Government borrowing through the banking system 'creates' money and adds to inflationary pressures." (End of quotation.)

Also adding to inflationary pressures is a new Federal Financing Bank which will make it easier for smaller Federal bureaus and agencies to borrow money. According to Business Week of January 12, 1974:

"Three times in an average week, one or another of the federal lending agencies taps the nation's money markets for cash—to the tune of $40-billion a year. And new agencies keep appearing all the time. Newcomers include the Student Loan Marketing Assn., the Rural Telephone Bank, and the new borrowing arm for Amtrack called the U.S. Railway Assn. Now, there is talk of an Energy Bank to finance development of energy resources (plus a new one announced after this article was published: a bank to finance independent oil producers and distributors who have been driven into near bankruptcy by the "Big Seven" oil monopolists—Ed.)

"In an attempt to rationalize this agency scramble for funds, legislation creating a Federal Financing Bank has just been signed into law. Proposed by the Nixon Administration more than a year ago, the FFB represents a significant, if imperfect, first step toward making agency financing more efficient—and at a lower cost (?—Ed.).

"Instead of going to the market itself, an agency that needs money can alert the FFB. The FFB, in turn, will sell its own securities in the market a number of times each year, doling out the proceeds to the needy agencies." (End of quotation).

One could think of a number of things wrong with such a centralized system that works to the advantage of the mammoth investment houses; but for our present purpose, let us limit ourselves to the notice that such a Federal Financing Bank is bound to add a few more twists to the inflation spiral.

There are those who do not understand the way inflation works. State Senator H. L. Richardson of California wrote an article a few months ago which explains the term in every day Americanese, without the double talk and semantics employed by money managers. He wrote:

There is probably nothing more talked about, yet totally misunderstood, as inflation. Housewives picket against supermarkets, butchers, meat packers and cows. The businessman blames the unions and the unions blame management, while both ask for some kind of inflation controls. The President recommends eating fish while our Governor (Reagan) attributes rising meat prices to an act of God.

Americans look upon economics as something akin to mysticism, conjured up in the brew pots of Academia, understood only by those who hold doctorate degrees from Harvard or the London School of Economics. This myth of economic mysticism is not denied by contemporary practitioners of the monetary art.

Inflation is really easy to understand, once you push aside all of the confusing semantics that surround it, and look at the simple basics.

Basic Number One: What does the word "inflation" mean? It means exactly what it says: inflate, blow up, expand. Blow up? Expand? Expand what? Money, what else? Inflation means that the government expands, blows up the paper dollars in circulation. The federal government inflates the amount of money in circulation.

When more paper money is created by government, this new money, in effect, waters down the money that the citizens now have, diluting their buying power. Look at it as pouring water into a glass of wine. The diluted wine has less quality.

Prices of meat and potatoes and all other commodities are established by what people are willing to sell them for and what people are willing to pay when they buy—supply and demand. The amount of money in circulation on the one hand, and the amount of goods on the other, establishes the price (in a free market economy—Ed.) This process gets out of whack when government prints up a new batch of money and dumps it into the economy. This causes prices to rise because there is more money around to bid up the goods. . . .

Question Number Two: Why would the federal government do this to us? That, too, is simple to answer. Why not? The federal government needs money to feed its voracious appetite. There are only two ways that the government can get this income. The first is taxation, but sooner or later there comes a time when people start complaining about heavier and heavier taxes.

It's not long before those in government find an excuse to turn to the printing presses. This is what has been going on for years and years. The federal government has been the culprit all along. Somebody has to pay for all the programs that initiate from Washington. The bureaucrats haven't the nerve to tax us directly for all the nutty programs that have emanated from the banks of the Potomac, so they have resorted to inflating the money supply as the answer.

Inflation is the cruelest of all forms of taxation, because it strikes those who can least afford it—the elderly on fixed incomes, retired pensioners, the poor. Inflation robs the frugal, depletes your savings and eventually destroys the nation itself.

Inflation is to economics as cancer is to the body. It saps your energy and destroys the body that supports it.

Next time you pay more for the meat in the market, don't cuss the poor farmer, put the blame where it belongs—on the liberal federal politician who keeps the printing presses running while he spends you into oblivion!

This is a very good definition of inflation, and what it does to people and nations. But, perhaps you'd like a more academic, more professional, explanation of the technique of inflation. Robert Anderson was Secretary of the Treasury in 1959, when he said in a speech:

"Suppose tomorrow morning I want to write a check for $100 million, and the Treasury does not have the money. I call the Federal Reserve Bank and ask, 'Will you loan us $100 million at 3½% for six months if I send you over a note to that effect?' The officer of the Federal Reserve Bank would naturally say, 'I will.' He would merely create that much money subject to Reserve requirements by crediting our account in the sum and accepting the government note as an asset. When I finished writing checks for $100 million, we would have added $100 million to the nation's money supply. This is one of the principles by which the 1940 dollar has shrunken to 41 cents with a quadrupling of our money supply." This was said by the Treasury Secretary in 1959; today the 1940 dollar has shrunken to 25 cents. In other words, we must now spend four dollars to buy what we could buy for only one dollar in 1940.

And as the late Al Jolson was wont to say: "You ain't seen nothing yet!"

Germany in the 1920s provides the classic example of runaway inflation, and no doubt you've heard the story; but in this critical time, we all need to be reminded of the danger that faces us. Howard Flieger, editor of U.S. News & World Report, had the same belief when he told the following story, editorially, on December 24, 1973:

"Kurt Lachman is an old friend—an American citizen who grew up in Germany and lives there now.... Kurt lived through the inflation that all but devoured Germany 50 years ago.

"In 1921," he said the other day, "the rise in the value of foreign currencies and in domestic prices in Germany came steadily and gained momentum.... The situation helped businessmen who were in foreign trade, and it helped those who were allowed to raise prices. But it didn't help at all the people living on fixed salaries and incomes. And it didn't help retailers who had to sell their goods at controlled prices while the cost of restocking with the same goods rose constantly. Harsh laws were being applied to retail trade that prevented the marking up of goods beyond a certain percentage above cost. Under this system, only those merchants who broke the law could survive.

"Blue collar workers got raises. But these lagged behind the rise in prices. White collar employes, civil servants and professional people dropped even further behind. It reached the point where the pay of a university professor was down to that of a doorman.

"By 1923 the runaway was at full gallop. Printing of federal money was being farmed out because the state presses couldn't keep up with the job. Some cities began printing their own money.'

"At that time Kurt was an assistant editor of one of Germany's leading newspapers.... Listen as he described a payday in 1923: 'Large laundry baskets filled with paper money had to be carried into the editorial conference room where the editors would sort it out, count it, and distribute the pay. As soon as somebody got his bundle, he'd rush out to buy whatever he could. Anything was more valuable than money.

"More and more people turned to speculation and blackmarketing in cloth, precious metals, foreign bills and so on. The result was that the output of industry sagged. Because of price control and rationing, goods were scarce in the cities. Foraging in the countryside became commonplace. The railroad stations were jammed with people going out to the peasants to bargain for food...

"German currency reached 4.2 billion marks to the U.S. dollar. Finally, it was brought down to earth with a thud—by stripping off the ciphers and revaluing the mark at 4.2

to the dollar. If you had 4 billion marks that morning, you had only 4 marks by sunset.

"Ugly story, isn't it? There is an unreal quality about it. But it happened. Who is to say it could never happen here?"

(End of quotation)

In August, 1922, Germany's money supply stood at 252 billion marks. In January, 1923, it was 28 quadrillion. In November, 1923, it had reached 497 quintillion—that is 497 followed by 18 zeros. This runaway inflation of the money supply stopped, finally, when the old mark was replaced by a new Reichsmark—but that was a temporary alleviation, because the currency crisis really ended with the establishment of a National Socialist Dictatorship, headed by Adolf Hitler.

But the danger in 1974 is not a new kind of dollar and national dictatorship alone, but the possibility of a new kind of currency and a world dictatorship. There is the deep suspicion that The Planners—who are not hurt by inflation or recession—are encouraging both (Peter Beter calls it stagflation) in order to introduce an entirely new system of control: a moneyless, number system made possible by the birth of the computer in 1946. Instead of money, a computerized entry in a universal data bank! No more checkbooks to balance, the computer would tabulate your worth; no more debts to pay, the computer would stop your credit if you were about to exceed your value to society; no more taxes to pay, they'd simply be deducted from your worth balance. The computer would tell you when you could afford a new car, or a better condominium, or your very own child or children. What freedom!

Only one small prerequisite: For such a system to work, every person must have a number. If a man, or woman, or child, refused to be known by the number assigned him by the Computer, there would be no way to incorporate such a person into the system. As a Prophet once said: "No man might buy or sell, save he that had... the number..."

You already have the number (Social Security); but the Centralized Computer Bank is not yet completed, and the pinch of inflation and recession has not yet made the people cry out, demanding the new system. Think it over, while there yet may be time....

THE FEDERAL REGISTER GETS SOME PUBLICITY

THE POWER OF THE PRESIDENT TO BYPASS THE CONGRESS

There is a peculiar anomaly which affects the vast majority of the people of this day and age: start a rumor about a person or a group of people, and people will probably believe the rumor without question; but you may shout a truth from the housetops, and people won't believe it unless they see it in a newspaper, read it in a national publication, or hear it over television or radio.

Example: Publications such as Don Bell Reports, and the readers of publications such as it, have been trying for years to tell the "dispossessed majority" about the dangers inherent in the fact that Executive Orders are law once they are published in the Federal Register. We have reprinted the executive orders which are most dangerous; but we have been treated by that "dispossessed majority" exactly as compatriots were treated in the "McCarthy Era" when they were accused of "seeing a Red under every bed."

Well, perhaps a nationally circulated "Sunday Newspaper Magazine" by the name of Parade has given us a real break. By publishing an article entitled "How Little-Known Presidential Orders Affect Your Life," perhaps the doubting-Thomases will begin to give a bit of credence to some hard facts which you and I have been trying to get them to understand for lo these many months.

While this article is certainly not required reading for regular subscribers to Don Bell Reports, and although the author of the article has selected some of the less dangerous Executive Orders as his examples, and has omitted mention of any of the really perilous powers the President may invoke if and when he deems such action necessary, the fact still remains that:

Because this type of "double witness" is often required in order to get people sufficiently aroused so that they will even consider the possibility that "this could happen here," we are reprinting the entire article which appeared on pages 11 and 12 of the January 27, 1974, issue of Parade,

The Sunday Newspaper Magazine:

HOW LITTLE-KNOWN PRESIDENTIAL ORDERS AFFECT YOUR LIFE

By Mark Johnson

Washington, D.C.—How much do you know about Executive Orders and Presidential Proclamations?

Do you know that under an Executive Order signed by President Nixon the Agriculture Department can examine farmers tax returns?

Do you know that the Administration once contemplated giving Watergate figure Jeb Magruder a cushy job by means of an Executive Order—to circumvent the need for Senate confirmation?

Do you know that Executive Orders and Presidential Proclamations are having an increasing impact on your daily life and activities—without even your Congressman being aware of it?

Rep. Jerry L. Litton (Mo.), a freshman Democrat in the House, one day last year was riffling through a relatively obscure government publication called the Federal Register when he came upon a curious item called "Executive Order 11697." Plowing through the bureaucratic jargon, he discovered that this Executive Order, signed by President Nixon, granted unprecedented authority for the Agriculture Department to examine the supposedly confidential federal tax returns of every farmer in the country.

Litton, who represents a rural Missouri constituency, was indignant. His outrage sparked a series of Congressional hearings which revealed that the Agriculture Department three years earlier had indeed asked for statistical data from the Internal Revenue Service—in a form which would have protected the secrecy of individual farmers' tax returns—but the White House had gone far beyond that request and authorized inspection of individual tax reports.

Two Senate committees are quietly investigating the use of those orders and proclamations, but most Americans know very little about the subject despite the growing national concern over concentration of power in the White House and the attention the Watergate scandal has focused on President Nixon's particular affinity for government by fiat.

The Final Step

Executive Orders and Presidential Proclamations are precisely that—the final step in the unilateral exercise of power on the part of the President involving neither consultation with Congress nor substantial notification to the public. All that is necessary for an order or proclamation to go into effect is that it be printed in the Federal Register, a daily publication similar in function to the legal notices published in many newspapers by state and local governments. The purpose of the Federal Register is ostensibly to provide public notice of all executive branch actions, but it has a very limited circulation, even in Washington. "This publication... is not everyday reading for the average farm family," explained the official of one agricultural group during Congressional hearings on the controversial plan to open farmers' tax returns to bureaucratic inspection.

That incident, however, was not an isolated one. The current round of Washington scandals has produced two examples of the Nixon Administration's questionable use of such Presidential orders, the first involving Jeb Stuart Magruder, deputy director of the Committee for the Re-Election of the President throughout the 1972 campaign year. In return for his loyal service in that post and an earlier stint as a member of Nixon's personal staff, the White House wanted to reward Magruder with a prestigious and highly paid government post.

One Serious Problem

There was, however, one serious problem to be over come: The type of policy-making job Magruder and the White House were considering traditionally requires Senate confirmation. The Watergate scandal, in which Magruder was a major figure, was just heating up at that time, and neither the White House nor Magruder wanted to risk a confirmation hearing at which the nominee could be grilled about alleged illegal and improper activities in the Nixon campaign organization.

The solution was proposed in a Feb. 28, 1973, "administratively confidential" memo written by Jerry Jones, the White House patronage chief. The document was later disclosed by John W. Dean III after his dismissal by the President as White House counsel.

Jones' memo listed nine possible jobs for Magruder, seven of which would have required the issuance of a Nixon-signed Executive Order to either create a new position or exempt an old one from the Senate confirmation requirement. For example, Jones suggested the possibility of making Magruder an assistant secretary in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, a move which "would require cancellation of E.O. (Executive Order) 11251 and re-issuance of an E.O. to make the position a P.A. (Presidential Appointment.)" Similarly, said Jones, it "would require cancellation of E.O. 11262 and a new one issued in its place" if Magruder was named director of the Interior Department's Bureau of Recreation.

Decision On Magruder

The intent of the memo was clear: The White House was planning to use the President's power to issue an Executive Order as a device to provide a political patronage post for the second-ranking official of the Nixon campaign organization and, at the same time, avoid Senate confirmation hearings. (Magruder eventually was given a $36,000-a-year job at the Commerce Department, one of two on Jones' memo which did not require issuance of an Executive Order, but he remained in that position for only about 45 days before being forced to resign because of the mushrooming scandal.)

The second Watergate-related incident involves the Associated Milk Producers, Inc., one of three dairy farmers' cooperatives which contributed a total of more than $500,000 to the Nixon campaign concurrently with a White House decision to raise the government's price support level for wholesale milk products. In late 1970, Nixon received a letter from Patrick J. Hillings, a Washington lawyer who long has been a personal friend and political ally of the President. Hillings noted that AMPI, his client, was working with two key Nixon fund-raisers "in setting up appropriate channels for AMPI to contribute $2 million for your re-election."

'The Democrats Only Took...'

In the very next paragraph, Hillings noted that the Tariff Commission had recommended four specific quotas which the domestic milk producers sought to have imposed on imported dairy products. However, Hillings noted, "No Presidential Proclamation has been issued" to put those commission recommendations into effect. "The problem is this: The dairy industry cannot understand why these recommendations were not implemented very quickly. The longest the Democrats ever took to implement a Tariff Commission dairy recommendation was 16 days."

Again, the message was unmistakable: The dairy farmers were willing to contribute $2-million to Nixon's 1972 campaign, and all they sought in return was his signature on a Proclamation. (Two weeks later, the President signed the Proclamation, and shortly thereafter the milk producers' heavy political contributions started to flow.)

The only Presidential Proclamations which most Americans hear about are those which officially designate Thanksgiving Day or Be Kind to Your Neighbor Week, usually signed amid a flurry of publicity. But others, unnoticed except by devotees of the Federal Register, can have far greater effect on the ordinary citizen. For example, the Special Senate Committee on the Termination of the National Emergency has recently discovered that for 40 years the United States has been living in declared states of national emergency which, in theory, give the President the power to suspend civil liberties guarantees, declare martial law and summarily take control of both public and private institutions.

Four National Emergencies

Each of those national emergencies went into effect through the single act of the President signing a Proclamation. At this very moment, the country is under no less than four such officially declared states of national emergency, including one proclaimed in 1933 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt because of a financial crisis during the Depression. Also still on the books is a Proclamation issued in 1950 by President Harry S. Truman at the start of the Korean conflict, and the two Nixon-imposed declarations of national emergency, one proclaimed in 1970 because of a strike by postal workers and another relating to the 1971 devaluation of the dollar.

"There is no formal accountability for the most crucial executive decisions affecting the lives of citizens and freedoms of individuals and institutions," warned the co-chairmen of the Senate committee, Sen. Frank Church (D.-Idaho) and Charles McMathias (R-Md.) "Few of these vital executive decisions are revealed to the Congress of the public except under irregular, arbitrary or accidental circumstances."

The two Senators noted that although federal law requires publication of all Executive Orders and Presidential Proclamations in the Federal Register, "there are no standards or requirements under which particular executive decisions must be designated" in either category. As an example, they cited the National Security Action Memoranda of Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, and the National Security Action Directives of President Nixon, all of which are withheld from the public and Congress even though they represent decisions "in areas of gravest importance."

William C. Miller, staff director of the committee, notes that "there must be only a handful of people in the country who understand how to read Executive Orders, when they are published" but he says "our greatest concern is with what is not recorded—those orders signed by the President on defense, national security and other sensitive matters which are withheld on the grounds that they contain classified information.

Roosevelt & The FBI

Similarly, Miller says, the committee has received information that the Federal Bureau of Investigation's entire domestic intelligence program, a focal point of considerable controversy in recent years, was never authorized by law but was initiated under terms of an Executive Order issued by Roosevelt during a state of emergency declared in 1939.

In another case, Rep. John D. Dingell (D.-Mich.) startled his colleagues in the House last year by successfully challenging the entire appropriation for the Vice President's 40-member staff on the grounds that it was never authorized by law, only an Executive Order. As Dingell pointed out, the Constitution forbids the appropriation of any money to finance government activities which are not authorized by law, yet the nation's second highest official has been functioning for years with a staff whose only legal authority is an Executive Order.

The Police Power Issue

Joe L. Pecore, assistant counsel of the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, recalls an incident relating to an environmental protection law approved by Congress in 1969. "The act was designed to protect public park land, but it didn't include any authority for police powers. Nevertheless, President Nixon, citing that bill as his authority, issued an Executive Order restricting snowmobiles and other off-the-road vehicles on public land—and that order included police penalties for violators."

Both Miller and Pecora noted that when they began their study of this little-noticed but awesome Presidential power, they were unable to find copies of Executive Orders and Presidential Proclamations anywhere except at the office of the Federal Register and the Library of Congress. Neither the Justice Department nor the White House had a complete file, and Congressional committees seldom received copies of orders relating to their areas of jurisdiction. "What we're really talking about," concludes Miller, "is the accountability of the executive branch of government for its actions—and we're certainly not satisfied with the system as it now exists."

(End of article)

While we should be grateful to the editor and the publisher of Parade Magazine for permitting researcher Mark Johnson to tell so much in such a widely read publication about the "awesome power of American Presidents to bypass Congressional wishes through notices in the Federal Register," it is unfortunate that nothing was written about two particular sets of Executive Orders:

There is one set of Executive Orders which is bringing about the actual destruction of our form of government and replacing it with a vastly different form known as "Regional Governance."

And there is another set of Executive Orders which, when invoked by Presidential Proclamation, will install a Bureaucratic Dictatorship. Elected officials will be replaced by appointed department and agency heads who will control all public and private activities within the Nation.

This has been called The Silent Revolution. On March 27, 1969, President Nixon signed an Executive Order which divided the Nation into Ten Federal Regions "to better coordinate the activities of all levels of government." Actually, the plan was to over-ride State and local governments with a Dictatorship of appointed Regional Bureaucrats.

Then, on February 10, 1972, the President "formally established Federal Regional Councils for each of the 10 Federal Regions and established an Under Secretaries Group for Regional Operations." And finally, on July 23, 1973, President Nixon signed Executive Order 11647, which placed the overall direction of the Federal Regions in the hands of the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

OMB is also the central headquarters for a new management and control system known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. This control system, operating through these Ten Regional Councils and the sub-regional councils which operate at the local level, assures absolute control—by OMB—over every local governmental plan and/or program. To strengthen the centralized control, Federal Revenue Sharing was introduced, so that State and local governments are dependent upon the federal government for financial aid.

Robert C. Weaver, former chief of Hud, said this: "Regional Government means absolute control over all property and its development regardless of location, anywhere in the U.S. ... It would supersede state and local laws."

The Regional Governance System is not yet perfected; there is need for new land use laws, for the control of water and waterways (the Potomac River Compact is an example), and there is need for better control over all phases of health, education, and welfare. However, the mechanism for absolute dictatorship is almost completed.

The other side of the Regional Governance coin is revealed in Executive Order 11490. This is a compilation of some 23 previous Executive Orders, was signed by President Nixon on October 28, 1969, and outlines the emergency functions which are to be performed by some 28 Executive Departments and Agencies whenever the President issues a Proclamation declaring a National Emergency. EO 11490 provides that the Executive Branch can take over all communications media; all sources of power and energy; all food resources; all transportation; all highways, airports and seaports; all railroads, inland waterways and all storage facilities; can commandeer all civilians to work under federal supervision; control all activities relating to health, education and welfare; can shift any segment of the population from one locality to another; can take over farms, ranches, timberized properties; and can regulate the amount of your own money you may withdraw from your bank, or savings and loan institution.

A President who "will fight like hell" to save his job could proclaim a Dictatorship to prevent his impeachment. These extraordinary powers should be revoked by the Congress before they are invoked by the President.

SCORPA VERSUS ACIR

THE COUNTER-REVOLUTIONARIES

The old Roman bread-and-circus syndrome still serves its purpose in placating the populace while the nation is destroyed from within. The people are confused and bemused by such spectacles as Watergate and the expectancy of impeachment. They are frustrated and irritated by food shortages, gasoline shortages, leaping inflation and vanishing jobs. But they are mollified by food stamps, unemployment compensation, health care, free education, half a hundred welfare plans and "eat now and work later" schemes. Thanks to the money magicians the mind benders and the opinion molders, the majority remains contented and unaware of impending disaster.

Meanwhile, the "New American Revolution" proceeds apace with only the top-level manipulators and a small army of alerted twentieth century Minute Men (most of whom are women) really knowing what is going on behind the scenes.

One particular segment of those who have eyes to see and ears to hear the political rumblings behind this silent revolution, are the promoters of ACIR on the one hand, and the backers of SCORPA on the other hand. The promoters of ACIR are the revolutionaries who are determined to establish and perpetuate a new form of governance in the United States and eventually throughout the world; while the backers of SCORPA are the counter-revolutionaries who seek to defeat the aims of ACIR and to retain the representative republican form of government that was originally established through acceptance of the Constitution of the United States which likewise guarantees a republican form of government to every State.

Most simply stated, then, ACIR is anti-Constitution, while SCORPA is pro-Constitution; and in the traditional sense, ACIR is anti-American, while SCORPA is pro-American. But such a simple statement is neither sufficient nor satisfying in these troublous times. And many of our readers have asked us to acquaint all of our readers with the aims and achievements of SCORPA. Hence this letter. However, before SCORPA can be understood, ACIR must be explained:

ACIR is an acronym, the full name being the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, was established in 1959 for the purpose of implementing regional (or Metro) government. SCORPA is the condensed name for Statewide Committees Opposing Regional Plan Areas, was founded in 1965 and at this writing has branches in Oregon, Arkansas, California, Louisiana, Maryland, and Montana.

Now for a more detailed description of the conception, birth and growth of ACIR:

The first giant steps in a Great Conspiracy were taken in 1913. Paul Warburg of the German banking family of that name and relative of the Rothschilds, came to the United States to establish a Central Bank similar to those the International Bankers had already established in England, Germany, France, Italy and the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. Warburg concocted the Federal Reserve Act, concealed its real motives in some 4,000 words of fine print. Senator Nelson Aldrich, grandfather of today's Nelson Rockefeller and brothers, pushed the Federal Reserve Act through Congress and succeeded in having Paul Warburg named its first Chairman of the Board. Whereupon, the Rockefellers and the Warburgs established an International Bankers' partnership which survived two World Wars and continues today.

In that same year, 1913, the Sixteenth, or the Income Tax Amendment which had been borrowed from the Communist Manifesto, was ratified. So was the Seventeenth Amendment, which destroyed the House of the States (as the U.S. Senate was originally intended) and made of it merely an upper House of the People by ordaining that U.S. Senators should be elected by the people, rather than by the peoples' State representatives.

And giant step number four in the year 1913: the first of the Rockefeller Foundations was established, exempted from all taxation in perpetuity, and to be followed by Carnegie, Ford, and scores of other similar Foundations whose money would be spent, at least in part, in financing other giant steps that would be taken by the Great Conspirators.

In order to gain control of American foreign policy with the aim of working toward the establishment of a World Government, the Council on Foreign Relations was founded in Paris at the close of World War I. Although the work of the arch-conspirator Col. E.M. House (the Henry Kissinger of the Woodrow Wilson Administration), the CFR was of little consequence until about 1927, when a banking cabal headed by the Rockefeller Brothers took over the financing and the supervision of the organization. Since that time, CFR has grown in power and importance until it now is known as the Invisible Government of the United States.

But the CFR was, and is, concerned primarily with foreign affairs. A similar organization seemed needed for the control and direction of domestic affairs, particularly with governmental affairs at federal, State and local affairs. Consequently, there was established a Public Administration Clearing House at 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago. Hence the nickname 1313. The Rockefeller family had established and endowed the University of Chicago, and 1313 was set up on land provided by that University, while the activities of 1313 were financed by the Rockefeller and other Foundation grants.

Soon after its establishment, no less than 25 organizations had joined the Public Administration Clearing House, each of which is concerned with some phase of domestic government at Federal, State, County, and/or Community level. Among its other activities 1313 has been responsible for the training and placement of appointed public administrators who now are in control of all levels of government within the United States. This transfer of responsibility from the elected officials to appointed administrators has been going on for over fifty years, and has begun to reach its zenith with appointed administrators now actually running the executive branch of our federal government (as exemplified in Kissinger, Shultz, Ash, etc.) Fifteen years ago, 1313 and its affiliates had gained control over State and all lower levels of government through its various selective organizations such as the Council of State Governments, National Governors' Conference, International City Managers' Association, American Society of Planning Officials, and so on.

But there now existed a need for a more direct tie-in with the Federal Administration itself. So, The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations was established in 1959 for the purpose of implementing regional government — the merging of the State and local governments into appointed regional organizations controlled by the executive office of the President of the United States, and under the chairmanship of the Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget (Fred Malik) "who shall be responsible for the proper functioning of the system."

"The system" utilized by ACIR is partially explained in an ACIR publication: "Commission recommendations for State action are translated into draft bills and proposed Constitutional amendments which constitute ACIR's State Legislative Programs. These proposals have been made available in separate 'slip bill' form. They are brought to the attention of key legislative and executive officials of all the States, as well as other interstate groups and individuals."

"Mail order legislation for the States," prepared by the agents of the Planners. Then elected officials are duped into "authoring" the legislation which is planned to bring about this "New Federalism" by way of regional organizations and economic controls, the latter through the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, and the highly publicized and misunderstood Revenue Sharing system.

After ACIR began to function and the PPBS management and budget control mechanism had been forced upon every federal department, then came the next series of steps:

Our country was divided into ten federal regions via an Executive Order signed by President Nixon on March 27, 1969. On February 10, 1972, via Executive Order 11647, these ten regions were staffed, each with a Council composed of the regional directors of the principal federal grant-making agencies: Health, Education and Welfare (HEW), Housing and Urban Development (HUD), Department of Labor (DOL), Department of Transportation (DOT), Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA), Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). Then on July 23, 1973, the President amended this EO with a new one: Executive Order 11731 which added two agencies: Department of the Interior (DOI), and the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA). And the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) was given the responsibility for assisting the President in developing "efficient coordinating mechanisms to implement Government activities and to expand inter-agency cooperation."

And exactly how does ACIR fit into this scheme of federal regionalism? Perhaps the question is best answered by publishing a petition which was framed by the directors of SCORPA. Thousands of copies of this petition have been distributed throughout the United States and Congress is being pelted with signed petitions demanding an investigation of ACIR. If you wish a copy of the following petition, prepared for signatures, then send a self-addressed envelope and a request for the sample petition to SCORPA, Powell Butte, Oregon 97753. The petition reads:

PETITION

Relative to Redress of Grievances under Clause 8 of Rule XXII, U.S. House of Representatives, which provides for the Presentation of Petitions by the Speaker as well as by a Member of the House.

To The House Of Representatives Of The United States of America

Whereas the Constitution of the United States of America provides for a republican representative form of government, with the separation of powers divided among the legislative, judicial and executive branches; and

Whereas the powers delegated by The Constitution to the federal government are relatively few and limited, and those rights and powers which are reserved to the sovereign State governments or to the people are multiple and inherent; and

Whereas the federal Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) was initially created by Public Law 86-380 (amended by PL 89-733) upon faulty premises and in violation of The Constitution; and

Whereas constitutional violations exist under PL 86-380. Specifically paragraphs (1) and (3) of Sec. 3(a), in that six positions on the 26-member board of ACIR are occupied by three U.S. Senators and three U.S. Congressmen, in violation of the U.S. Constitution, Article I, Sec. 6 (2) which states in part: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States. . . ."; and

Whereas the structure of ACIR further consists of elected officials whose loyalties have been transferred from their constituents to the service of their particular organization within ACIR, namely: the Council of State Governments (CSG), Governors Conference (NGC, national), National League of Cities (NCL), U.S. Conference of Mayors (USCM), National Association of Counties (NACO); and

Whereas the above named organizations, forming a majority voting control of fourteen (14) members of the 26-member board of ACIR, join to establish a form of non-representative executive rule by administrative procedure thereby usurping Constitutional Government; and

Whereas the aforementioned organizations relate to and partially comprise a syndicate of like-purposed affiliates and adjuncts linked by interlocking directorates and/or common purpose (one principal location being at 1313 E. 60th St., Chicago, Illinois, with others located at Lexington (Ky.), New York, NY., Wash. D.C., and elsewhere; and

Whereas ACIR aggressively sponsors programs which flout constitutional provisions, drafting recommendations and implementing "legislative or administrative action to carry out the recommendations" (ACIR M-17, 1968, p. 11) through the mechanism of the ACIR structure; and

Whereas ACIR operates a "law factory" and distributes pre-packaged legislation throughout federal, state and local governments, preempting the right of citizens to form their own laws through their representatives elected for that purpose; and

Whereas components of ACIR, namely the National League of Cities and the U.S. Conference of Mayors have formed a subsidiary NLC-USCM, Inc., non-registered, which produced action apparently in violation of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act (which is under inquiry by the U.S. Department of Justice); and

Whereas a component of ACIR, namely National Association of Counties abused its tax-exempt status by lobbying on political issues including but not limited to the then proposed Census of 1970 statute; and

Whereas the organizations represented on the ACIR board are involved in conflict-of-interest because they suggest controversial concepts, plans and policy to the ACIR; and their agents, as voting individuals on the ACIR board, approve said concepts, plans and policies; which conflict-of-interest is compounded because the members of ACIR (some in dual offices forbidden by the U.S. Constitution and some State Constitutions) who are U.S. Senators and Congressmen, State Governors (actually administrative advocates), state legislators, county commissioners, mayors and councilmen also implement said concepts, plans and policies in their "home" jurisdictions, in deference to ACIR, in addition to influencing policy in jurisdictions not their own, by implementation of ACIR policies; and

Whereas Article IV, Section 4 of The Constitution states, "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and

Whereas the very existence of ACIR's federal-state-local collusion is a violation of both the word and the meaning of our federal Constitution and the 50 State Constitutions in that ACIR sabotages the rights reserved to the sovereign States and usurps the rights of citizens; and

Whereas the proposed bill, H. H. 6869, stemming from citizens' request to amend PL 92-463 (which exempts ACIR from legislative overview by Congress) has been given no hearing, and no consideration of the measure is contemplated in the 93rd Congress, thus denying citizens the right to be heard; and

Whereas ACIR promotes an implacable drive to eradicate local and state governments under ACIR's concept of regional governance; and

Whereas ACIR solicits not only federal tax funds for its operation but also receives state and local government treasury funds, and funds from tax-exempt foundations, to finance ACIR's above described instances of destruction of constitutional governments; now therefore be it

Resolved that the Statewide Committees Opposing Regional Plan Areas (SCORPA) respectfully request relief from the oppression being exerted upon individual citizens and their constitutional government because of ACIR's goal to destroy constitutional government and local independent units of government; and

Be It Further Resolved that a Congressional investigation be made into (a) the workings of the federal Commission ACIR, and (b) into the activities of the aforementioned organizations, the Council of State Governments, National Governors Conference, National League of Cities, U.S. Conference of Mayors, National Association of Counties, and other related private so-called "public interest groups," quasi-official, and public administration organizations which unduly influence public appointees and elected representatives of the citizens; and

Be It Further Resolved that this petition be assigned to the appropriate committee or committees of the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate, for action.

The following information is taken from various ACIR reports and publications:

ACIR organization covers three major areas:

1. Taxation and finance
2. Governmental Structure and Functions
3. Program Implementation.

The Commission devotes a major—and growing—proportion of time and resources to encouraging implementation of the recommendations it makes to the legislative and executive branches of Federal, State and local government.

Legislation to implement ACIR recommendations to Congress is usually introduced by United States Senators and Representatives who are members of the Commission.

The Council of State Governments includes most ACIR bills in its annual volume of "Suggested State Legislation" (copies of which volume of "mail order" legislation are sent to all important officials of every State for suggested State action—Ed.)

Attempts by the States to modernize their basic charters (State Constitutions) and to revamp the structure and organization of their governmental branches are basic ingredients of the continuing drive to put more muscle on federalism's frame. (Emphasis added.)

The Commission and its key staff members submitted statements and testified before House and Senate committees on legislation of vital interest to federalism.

The creative partnership between Federal, State and local governments in responding effectively to old and new social, economic and developmental needs in urban and rural America can only flounder unless antiquated State Constitutional provisions are revised.

* * *

The above statements taken from ACIR publications certainly indicate that ACIR is working toward the establishment of a "New World Order" through a "Silent Revolution" that will bring about a Corporative Socialist Dictatorship.

Inflation, shortages, crises; these are among the problems created according to the Hegelian formula: Thesis, create a problem; Antithesis, create opposition to the problem; Synthesis, provide a solution to the problem, a change impossible to engineer without the psychological conditioning of Thesis and Antithesis. Yes, it was planned that way, and ACIR helped do the planning.

THEY WILL NEVER STOP TRYING UNTIL YOUR PROPERTY IS PEOPLES' PROPERTY

CONTROL OF YOUR LAND

The Network of Patriotic Letter Writers recently issued the following timely and important bulletin:

* * *

The right of private property guaranteed to the people under the 5th Amendment of the Constitution and respected as fundamental to individual freedom, is being cancelled in the name of "environmental concern." The establishment of a Federal "land czar" is well along the way. In June 1973 the Senate passed S. 268, entitled "Land-Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act" and a similar bill, H.R. 10294, identified as the Udall Bill, is now before the House of Representatives.

Commenting on these land grab bills, the Indianapolis News declared: "The potential danger is obvious since it is an axiom of economic life that he who controls the land can control the people that dwell on it."

The States are falling into line with the Federal land-use control by appointing their own land-use commissions to carry out the dictates of the Federal government. For example, under Pre-Print Assembly Bill 1, submitted by Assemblyman Paul Priolo, a California State land-use commission would assume authority over all matters involving real estate, thus neutralizing the California Real Estate Commission and all local government agencies. Similar transfers of authority have been accomplished or are in the process of being accomplished in each of the 50 States. Under this dictatorial plan each State will be forced to carry out the land-use orders of the Federal government or be denied Federal grants and revenue sharing funds.

Also, an editorial in the Lynchburg (Va.) News stated: "When individuals within the confines of their communities are denied the right to determine the use of their land, but must conform to a national policy set mainly by others, they have lost their first and most precious freedom. For, if government controls the use of land, the people have been dispossessed in their own country."

Under S. 268 and H.R. 10294, the Federal bureaucracy is to be expanded to mammoth proportions. It would create The Office of Land Use Policy Administration, The Inter-Agency Advisory Board on Land-Use Policy and an ad hoc Federal State Joint Committee (or committees.) The Interagency Advisory Board on Land Use will in turn be composed of the following Federal Agencies:

- * The Director of the Office of Land Use Policy Administration, who shall serve as Chairman, with representatives of the:
- * Department of Agriculture,
- * Department of Commerce,
- * Department of Defense,
- * Department of Health, Education and Welfare,
- * Department of Housing and Urban Development,
- * Department of Transportation,
- * Department of the Treasury,
- * Atomic Energy Commission,
- * Environmental Protection Agency,
- * Council on Environmental Quality,
- * Council of Economic Advisors, and
- * Office of Management and Budget, which has over-all supervision.

S. 268 further provides that the Office of Land-Use Policy Administration "shall develop and maintain a Federal Land-Use Information & Data Center, with such regional branches as the Secretary may deem appropriate." Thus:

The Federal government would have data bank information readily available on every property owner in every State in order to make decisions as to how he may or may not use his private property.

As Senator Carl T. Curtis said, in opposing passage of S. 268: "What we are doing here is embarking on a program in which the Federal government determines land use...for all private people. The land involved might be the smallest lot in a city, it might be a 5-acre patch, or a farm of 10,000 acres... A very few years from now, if we embark upon this measure, the great power of the Federal government will be used to determine the use of all the land in the country."

To avoid total government control of all private property, H. R. 10294 (the Udall Bill) must be defeated. Write to your Congressman to uphold Constitutional law by voting no on H. R. 10294, since the so-called Land-Use Laws and Regional Government from which they spring, are attempts by Federal Agents to change the form of government in the United States. Send copies of your letters to your Real Estate Board, Chamber of Commerce, and to heads of political, civic and fraternal associations. For more details write to Col. Arch Roberts, Suite 990 Savings Bldg., Howes at Oak, Fort Collins, Colorado 80521.

"The States are falling into line with the Federal land-use control by appointing their own land-use commissions to carry out the dictates of the Federal government," notes this bulletin, because "each State will be forced to carry out the land-use orders of the Federal government or be denied Federal grants and revenue sharing funds."

The Method of Operation is a familiar one: Suggested legislation to be enacted at the State level is prepared by the experts who work through the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR). This is the agency which, as described in our Don Bell Reports of February 8, 1974, operates a "mail order law factory" and distributes pre-packaged legislation to the State governments. At the State level, some official or organization takes the prepared bill, alters it a bit to fit conditions in the State involved, gives it a title and a number, and then proceeds to shove it through the State Legislature, or gets the Governor to recommend it; and then that State is in line for Federal handouts and revenue sharing so long as all Federal guidelines are observed and obeyed.

It follows, then, that in the case of this pre-packaged Land-Use Planning at the State level, if you've seen one Plan you've seen them all, with slight variations to adapt the Plan to local topography and economy.

It so happens that the Landowners Steering Committee, Box 729, Lyndonville, Vt. 05851 has recently completed a summarization of the Land-Use Plan which has been submitted for adoption in the Green Mountain State. Believing it to be a fair sample of the Plan that has been adopted, or is about to be adopted, in every State, we submit that summary, with our thanks to the Vermont

Watchman of January 1974, from which we are quoting:

LAND USE PLAN SUMMARIZED

On December 27 the Environmental Board approved its proposed 1974 State Land Use Plan and sent it to Governor Salmon. The Plan covers 41 double spaced typed pages. The Watchman cannot publish it in its entirety, but in the following summary hopes to present its provisions as objectively as possible.... Though the specific provisions and format may change, the central goal of complete State control over all land use is likely to remain, disguised one way or another.

CLASSIFICATION OF LANDS: The Plan requires the division of all land in the State into seven zones. These are:

URBAN: Existing cities and urban communities and adjacent areas sufficient to support growth for at least ten years at a development intensity of more than 2,000 persons per square mile (3.1 persons per acre.)

VILLAGE: Not an urban area or adjacent thereto, but which is settled at one principle building per acre or more, and has a retail center or provides services to the surrounding area.

NATURAL RESOURCE: Areas with potential for agriculture, forestry or mining, and which have one or more of the following characteristics: some physical limitations for development, not convenient to shipping or jobs, no direct access to improved roads, or "include irreplaceable, limited, or significant natural, recreation, scenic, historic or other resources."

CONSERVATION. Areas of five square miles or more, essentially undeveloped, predominately forested, not on improved roads and having one or more of the following characteristics; Potential for forestry, physical limitations for development, in excess of 1500 feet altitude, aquifer recharge potential, or "irreplaceable limited, or significant natural, recreational, scenic, historic, or other resources."

RURAL: All areas not within one of the foregoing zones, generally close to existing communities, convenient to shopping and employment, not having physical limitations for development.

ROADSIDE. Area within 100 feet of the right of way of an interstate, state, or state-aid highway within a rural, natural resource or conservation area.

SHORELINE. Land lying within 100 feet of any water-course draining ten square miles or more, or any lake or pond of 20 acres or more.

PURPOSES OF THE ZONES

URBAN: to provide for residential, commercial, industrial, and other development.

VILLAGE: "to support the traditional role of the village as the focus of many of the economic and social activities of the surrounding community."

RURAL: "to provide for the development of housing at low to moderate densities to meet the needs of Vermont's residents" and "to provide for the development of vacation homes..." (No mention of commercial or industrial facilities.)

NATURAL RESOURCE: To provide for agriculture, forestry, and mineral extraction, protect scenic and recreational resources.

CONSERVATION: "To protect Vermont backlands."

ROADSIDE: To regulate development which "imperils highway safety, makes wasteful and uneconomic use of land, or is wholly inconsistent with maintenance of the scenic character and quality of the rural, natural, resource and conservation areas of the State."

SHORELINE: "To protect the character and quality of shorelines, reduce the hazard of flooding to life and property and to preserve reasonable access to shorelines and waters of the State."

CONSERVATION ZONE: The Land Use Plan presented to the Legislature will have a map of one zone only, the conservation zone. Within this zone the Environmental Board will exercise full zoning control. No more than one principal building per 100 acres will be allowed. Other conditions may be improved. Towns may petition for changes in this zone.

LOCAL PLAN APPROVAL PROCESS: After adoption of the Land Use Plan by the Legislature, the towns will have until April, 1975, to present a plan, map, and zoning bylaws to the regional planning commission, certifying them to be in conformity with the State Land Use Plan. Within 90 days the regional planning commission shall transmit the plan, map and bylaws to the State Environmental Board with its recommendations. The Board shall afford a hearing to objecting parties and state agencies.

"If no request for hearing is filed or after public hearing the Board finds that the town plan and zoning ordinances do further the purposes of the State Land Use Plan, and are consistent with the provisions thereof, the Board shall approve the town plan and zoning ordinance." Subsequent amendments must go through the same process. To win the Board's approval, the local plan must comply with sixteen criteria. Among these are, for instance:

"(5) Allocates land for residential, commercial, industrial, and high intensity public uses at intensities of development consistent with the State Land Use Plan."

"(13) Identifies the housing requirements of persons of all income levels, considers the consequences of other elements of the plan on the provision and availability of such housing and provides a reasonable program for implementing the housing principles set forth" in the 1973 capability and development plan.

Other criteria relate to rates of growth, recreation, renovation of village centers, regulation of strip development, historic resources, airport hazard zones, etc.

If the local zoning plan meets with the approval of the State Environmental Board it becomes part of the State Land Use Plan.

FAILURE TO SUBMIT PLAN: If a town fails to submit its plan and bylaws as required, the regional planning commission shall initiate the process for the town, "in cooperation with the town."

FAILURE OF APPROVAL: If the Environmental Board refuses to approve the local plan and bylaws, then "the subdivision of land through sale and lease into parcels of less than 10 acres in size or construction of principal buildings which exceeds an intensity of development of one principal building for every 10 acres shall be unlawful." If the town has municipal sewer service, six buildings per acre will be allowed; if it has both sewer and water, twelve buildings per acre will be allowed.

ROADSIDE AND SHORELINE: Until a town has a plan and bylaws approved by the State Environmental Board, the Board shall exert zoning control over every building and every lot in roadside and shoreline zones. For a town plan and bylaws to secure approval, they will presumably have to contain the same regulatory provisions.

INTENSITY OF DEVELOPMENT: To secure Environmental Board approval, town bylaws will generally have to prescribe these levels of development:

Urban and village zones: "As is established under an approved town plan and zoning ordinance." Where the regional planning commission establishes the zones for a town, six and twelve buildings per acre will be allowed, depending on availability of public water and sewer.

Rural zone: one principal building per five acres.

Natural resource zone: one principal building per 25 acres.

Roadside zone: generally, no lot with less than 400 feet of frontage.

Shoreline zone: generally, no lot with less than 200 feet of shoreline.

ACT 250 PERMIT: Larger developments and subdivisions are required to be in conformity with the State Land Use Plan to get a permit. In conservation, roadside and shoreline zones, generally, even one building or one subdivision lot will require an Act 250 Permit, until the town has incorporated the state standards into its own bylaws.

ALLOWED USES: In each type of zone the Environmental Board will specify the uses that may be allowed and uses that are prohibited; these uses are set forth as in any zoning plan.

CAPITAL INVESTMENT PLANNING: This part of the Plan requires the approval of the State Planning Office for any capital investment by the state, by a regulated public service company, and by a town where state funds are involved. This includes sewer and water, highways and roads, airports, railroads, electric and natural gas utilities, schools, outdoor recreational lands, and industrial development sites.

(End of summary)

In commenting on the foregoing (and these comments are probably applicable to every State Land Use Plan in any of the 50 States) the editors of the Vermont Watchman present the following case against the land use plan:

"Vermont was founded by men who believed in the freehold system of land ownership. Under this system a man could do as he pleased with his land, within broad limits. One limit is the rule that he can not waste and destroy his land. He can not, for example, clearcut his forest in a way that would result in the topsoil washing away. Aside from ecological considerations, there is a very simple reason for this limitation. The town collects property taxes on land. If a landowner fails to pay his assessed share, the town may seize his land as collateral. If he has meanwhile destroyed the land, the town is left with worthless collateral. Thus the town (or county or state) has the right to prevent the destruction of the land.

A second limit on freehold ownership is the rule that a man can not cause harm to his neighbors through a noxious use. He cannot dump his sewage into the brook running through their property. He can be prevented from building a slaughterhouse in the residential area of a town because of the noise, smells, and traffic which infringe upon the rights of his neighbors. It does not matter that all the victims of a noxious use can not be identified. A smokestack pouring soot and fumes over the entire town can be prevented by ordinance, since it is obviously an invasion of the property rights of all the townspeople.

A third limit on freehold ownership is the rule that a man has no absolute right to use tax-supported facilities. Thus a man could not demand to build a drive onto a public road just beyond a blind corner, causing danger to the public....

The Founding Fathers of the United States—and of Vermont recognized the vitally important connection between individual liberty and the ownership of freehold property. In fact, the first Constitution of Vermont, Article I...stated that "all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights amongst which are the enjoying and defending of life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety..."

Article 2 stated that "private property ought to be subservient to public uses when necessity requires it, nevertheless, whenever any person's property is taken for the use of the public, the owner ought to receive an equivalent in money."

Now consider the 1974 Land Use Plan. It goes far beyond any ancient concept of limitations on freehold property. It is designed not merely to control pollution or prevent unsafe conditions. It is designed to replace the idea of freehold property with the idea of "social property," the Constitution notwithstanding. Under the Land Use Plan, in essence, a man may do with his land only what "society"—that is, the government—deems it proper for him to do. Under this theory, he can be prevented from building a nice, non-polluting home on his own land just because some other people—"society"—think it would be nice not to have a house on that land. He can be prevented from painting his barn red because his neighbors—or distant bureaucrats—do not happen to favor red barns. He could—conceivably—be stopped from selling his house to a family with six children, on the grounds that such a sale would increase the school tax burden on the townspeople.

These provisions are not to be found in the present Land Use Plan. But such regulation inevitably follows from the idea of "social property." And that idea is the foundation of the Land Use Plan. The Environmental Board has made it perfectly clear that it wants a Land Use Plan with total power to prevent changes deemed (by it) to be harmful to society—and also considerable power to force changes deemed beneficial to society. If the land use plan is adopted, the idea of freehold property ownership, as limited by common law, will be replaced with the idea of "social property." This change strikes at the heart of our entire frame of government. If one believes, as the founders of Vermont (and the U.S. Republic) did, that liberty is based on the existence of private property, then the destruction of private property rights cannot but lead to the destruction of liberty as well. Some people are not concerned with maintaining individual liberty in a free society; they are more interested in the government telling everybody what is best for him, what he can and can't do.... An all-wise and benevolent government, they believe, will step in to stop people from making mistakes and everybody will be better off. Thus, underlying the whole opposition to the Land Use Plan is a resistance to the idea that government knows what is best for everybody. Most Vermonters still believe that liberty, with all its problems and the burden of individual responsibility, is still preferable to efficiency and order under the control of a small elite. HOW THEY SQUEEZED THE RAISINS

"JUST ANOTHER HOAX"

In this age of perpetrated crises, the story of how the raisins disappeared is not very important when placed alongside the wheat story, the meat story, the case of the disappearing paper products, or the Great Energy Crisis. But the story is so very typical, and the answers given to inquirers are so very similar to the answers given by those concerned with oil and gasoline, that we felt the people who love raisins would want to know, and that the people who need fuel for heating and transportation might like to compare.

It seems that Congressman Bob Sikes, a California Democrat who depends on the voters of San Joaquin Valley if he wants to stay in the Halls of Congress, began to be besieged by constituents wanting to know about the "great raisin crisis." If he is to be judged by his opening remarks, it might be concluded that Rep. Sikes is a typical fence-straddler: he wants to keep those votes but at the same time he has no desire to antagonize the big and powerful California Raisin Advisory Board. So, talking out of both sides of his mouth, he presents what he believes to be the best available evidence for the people on one hand, and the powers-that-be on the other hand. Then, he had all of this inserted in the Congressional Record of February 13, 1974. In these times of "Great Crises" we offer the following as an exercise in discernment:

Many of my colleagues have inquired into the apparent shortage of raisins, the sun-blessed grape from California's San Joaquin Valley. Almost everyone who has contacted me wants to know about the "Great Raisin Crisis." I would like to tell you now that this crisis is a hoax, and the reports which gave this stature are erroneous and irresponsible.

Hopefully, in the season ahead, Mother Nature will be kind to the raisin growers of California and we will all have a bumper crop to enjoy. But if it does freeze when the vines are blooming, or it rains while they are drying this fall, even a bumper crop can be short.

I am submitting for your consideration a news article from the Philadelphia Inquirer of January 13, 1974, and a response to that article from the California Raisin Advisory Board's General Manager John Calder. The material follows:

THE GREAT RAISIN CRISIS IS BARED (By Dan Lynch)

The Great Raisin Crisis is slowly coming to an end.

Oh, you didn't know about the Raisin Crisis? Well, that's probably because nobody told you about it. What with the shortage of oil and paper and things like that, the Raisin Crisis was, until now, cleverly swept under the rug. But it was, and is, a major problem. If you like raisins, that is.

The 1972 California raisin crop—which was sold in stores through much of last year—was short by some 120,000 tons. The raisin growers say the short crop was caused by a frost on March 26, 1972.

But we have only their word for it.

And The Inquirer has learned that, while housewives were bemoaning the shortage of raisins here at home, the California raisin growers were shipping some 80,000 tons of raisins abroad, where they command a higher price than they do in the domestic market. And at the same time a raisin-hungry nation went without, both Big Business and the White House were getting all the raisins they wanted. (More about that later.)

Meantime, the Australians, who grow nearly a quarter of the world's raisins, deny all charges of an embargo and claim their 1972 crop was damaged by heavy rains. At least, that's what they's like us to believe.

We have no evidence to the contrary of course—because the Federal government has no way to monitor raisin production. The government must take the word of the raisin industry—both domestically and abroad—as to how many raisins are on hand in any given year.

"The Congressman will be looking into it," says a shaken F. John White, press secretary to U.S. Rep. William J. Green (D., Pa.). "We haven't heard a thing about the Raisin Crisis. Obviously it has been kept a secret from Congress."

It wasn't kept a secret from Joe Pizza, who runs a 7-11 store in Wyndmoor. All last year—like most small store owners—Pizza had a terrible time getting raisins. "I couldn't get them in for months at a time," he says. "It was tough."

A spokesman for the Post Cereals Division of General Foods, however, concedes that while his company—one of the nation's great raisin users—had to pay a higher price, it got all the raisins it needed. Post refuses to reveal the amount of raisins it got, but it does say that even at the height of the crisis, it was able to put two scoops in every box of Post Raisin Bran.

And sources in the White House report that while Joe Pizza and Mr. and Mrs. John Q. Public were scrambling for raisins, President Nixon was up to his ears in them. In 1973 Mr. Nixon—or someone in the White House—devoured four 30-pound cases of raisins. Figures are not available for raisin use at the San Clemente and Florida White Houses.

Meanwhile, the raisin crisis has abated a bit. And by 1975 it may be over. All through 1973 store shelves were bare of raisins for long periods of time. But last September, the 1973 crop came in. In California, which produces better than half of the world's raisin supply, the crop totalled 210,000 tons—that's about three trillion raisins—some 10,000 tons below the normal yield.

Retailers say that even though the crop was a bit low this year, they should be able to stock raisins at least a few days a week. They can't get all they want, however, because the growers are rationing stores.

Despite—or perhaps because of—the raisin shortage, raisin growers are making money. Three years ago, the grower got $365 a ton. This year, growers are getting $700 a ton. A record crop in 1974 will bring the price down only $50 or $100, according to John Calder, general manager of the California Raisin Advisory Board.

"There are no poor raisin growers this year," says Don Gardner, a raisin buyer for Food Fair Markets. One reason for this is that a lot of grapes—more than ever before—are going to California wine markets.

"Thompson seedless grapes, from which most raisins are made, cost wine makers about one third as much as varietal grapes," says Calder. "And Thompson makes a respectable wine. They don't make a great wine. But they make an OK wine." Calder adds, however, that because of stiffer competition from foreign wines, California wine makers plan to slack off on their purchase of Thompson seedless, which lacks the bouquet American wine drinkers are beginning to look for. When that happens, more Thompson seedless will be available for raisins.

Meanwhile, there is still a raisin shortage. "1974 will also be the year of the raisin crisis," says Food Fair's Gardner. "There was no carryover from last year, as there usually is, and it has become an economic hassle between buyers and sellers... I and everybody else in this world wants raisins. And the packers haven't caught up with the demand. We're always running behind. Eventually we'll catch up, but it may take all of this year's crop. The raisin people haven't handled it properly. Not from a malicious viewpoint."

Dave Urner, Acme Food Market's raisin buyer says, "We've noticed a decided increase in our movement of raisins... We're not having problems right now. But around the holiday season we did, as did everybody else."

Despite all that, the fact is that people in this country are eating fewer raisins. Over the years, the per capita consumption of raisins has shrunk to 1.3 pounds. In Ireland, however, the average person eats 5.3 pounds of raisins every year.

"But we're not worried," says Calder, the raisin advisory board guy. "As long as the population keeps increasing, we'll keep selling raisins."

Maybe. But now you can't get mustard to put on them. But that, however, is another story.

CALIFORNIA RAISIN ADVISORY BOARD
Fresno, California.
January 28, 1974.

Mr. Dan Lynch,
Philadelphia Inquirer,
Philadelphia, Pa.,

Dear Mr. Lynch: I have received copies of "The Great Raisin Crisis Is Bared," which you wrote and which appeared in the Sunday, January 13, 1974 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer. Needless to say, I was more than disappointed, and at first decided against any communication regarding the subject, feeling that anything I might say would be ignored or fail to accomplish any good purpose.

After further thought, however, and after receiving a few indignant phone calls from people in the raisin industry who had also received copies of your article, I have decided that it is mandatory that I at least tell you where you have misrepresented the facts and then trust that your representative in Congress will take note even though it is unlikely that a correction will appear in the Inquirer.

First, it is absolutely false and malicious for anyone to assert that anything having to do with the raisin crisis was "swept under the rug." The raisin crisis, world-wide, was generated by acts of God which are a matter of record and, so far as California is concerned, the exact date, namely March 26, 1972 and the degree of frost, namely 27 degrees fahrenheit, is fact and not open to opinion. In Australia rains, again a matter of record, caused havoc with the crop that was about to be harvested. Thus, as you were originally told, the shortage and its cause are well known and documented.

I feel it borders on slander for you to assert that the frost damage to the California crop is only true based on the raisin growers' word. It is this sort of reporting which has led people, including those in government, to lose faith in the fourth estate.

Your second glaring error is due to your statement that 80,000 tons of raisins were shipped overseas while a shortage of raisins existed at home in the United States. This is simply false! The total tonnage shipped overseas in the disaster year amounted to only 18,922 tons, which is far short of your alleged figure, and any shipments during this disastrous time span were made solely on the basis of availability and commitment. There is no way for us to know where you get your information that "big business and the White House were getting all the raisins they wanted," but since such consumer end-use is not tabulated on an individual basis, it would appear to have sprung from some amorphous figment of imagination.

You state that the Australians denied all charges of embargo and insisted that their crop was damaged by heavy rains. At least this is true, but then you add, "At least this is what they would like us to believe"—again, I can only stand aghast at such implied duplicity and suggest, as already stated, that it is this sort of inferential reporting which gives the press its unsavory name and does nothing to put the economics of the American free enterprise system into its true and proper perspective. More especially is this true since a lot of people will read these unsubstantiated allegations without ever having an opportunity to get at the truth.

You next say that you have no evidence to the contrary for the above errors and then debase your apology by claiming that the "Federal Government has no way to monitor production." Here again, you are not only at fault but have led the reader astray. The facts are that the Federal Government does know about every ton of raisins that is produced and keeps this record as an on-going operation completely free of any outside intervention. Not only is the total tonnage produced known down to the pound, but also its disposition both domestic and foreign.

When you refer to specific buyers, such as the cereal manufacturers, and assert "they got all the raisins (they) needed," you ascribe no reason for it but the implication is that they must be "big business" and thus enjoy favorable status. What you neglect to mention is that industrial and institutional buyers virtually always make their purchases on a contract basis. I would suggest to you that you ask yourself whether or not you meet your rent payments, mortgage payments, or car payments, all of which are contractual arrangements? What would you do if you had a contract to provide goods and services?

Mr. Lynch, there is more that might be said to you but it seems to me that it would be pointless. After reviewing the blatant errors and allegations numerated above, I can only say to you that my general feeling is one of disgust and disrespect. I can only hope that for the good of your own future, the need to face up to the truth and the fact may perhaps come a little closer to your intellectual peregrinations when you next undertake to do a feature so that people will be left with a feeling, not akin to anger and frustration, but one of enlightenment on the truth, which is the only fitting purpose for a man in your profession.

Sincerely,

John Calder,
General Manager.

COMMENTARY:—Thanks to the concern of Rep. Bob Sikes of Raisinland, U.S.A., we were able to reproduce what purports to be two sides of the Great Under-the-Rug Raisin Controversy. And, like the man said, "You pay your money and you take your chances." Either side of the story, when read alone, seems plausible and even believable. But, neither witness tells the whole truth, as we shall demonstrate, after this observation:

THE FUEL CRISIS, THE NEW FEDERALISM, AND THE OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

OMNIA VINCIT OMB

Recently Roy Ash, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, made a statement regarding the alleged gasoline shortage and the long lines of cars whose irritated drivers hoped to obtain a little fuel at service stations across the country. William Simon, Federal Energy Office Czar, felt that the statement was far too optimistic and that it was the duty of Simon, not Ash, to make any such statement. In fact, Simon resorted to the vernacular of the Southland and said he wished Ash would "keep his cotton picking hands" off matters that concerned FEO.

But, it seems that Simon was too simple in his suggestion that he was boss of FEO and that Ash was overstepping his authority. Because OMB created FEO, and there is an Associate Director of OMB who seems to be the immediate boss of William Simon, just as the Director of OMB is the immediate boss over all Associate Directors of OMB. In fact, OMB is an Office of Management, and it manages any and all administrative departments of government, whether they be Federal, State or local. OMB does it through control of budgets, and through that computerized management system known as the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System.

OMB's direct control over FEO is explained in a most revealing article which appears in the February 1974 issue of the quasi-official publication Government Executive, an article which takes on added significance in that it was written by the editor himself, Scot MacDonald. The article begins:

"Should the U.S. elect to ration fuel, it will cost the taxpayer an estimated $1½ billion a year to administer, according to Frank G. Zorb, last month named Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget, for Natural Resources, Energy and Science. 'It's a bureaucratic nightmare,' he told Government Executive. 'It is just a horrible concept, because we're not going to get lower prices. If people think rationing is going to drive prices down, it just is not going to happen. The price of energy in this world has been underpriced, so we're never going to go back to those days (sic).'

"Zarb speaks with authority. Since last July he has been Associate Director of OMB for Management and Operations. When the President decided to create the Federal Energy Office, William Simon, Director of the new Executive Office, called him and said, 'We would feel more comfortable if you were here.'

"The call was made at eight o'clock that Saturday morning. Simon, Zarb and 'three or four others' met, discussed and determined the mission, answered other questions and by noon had an organization chart. That afternoon, Zarb and Simon were on Capitol Hill talking to Congressional leadership. 'Between us, I guess we must have talked to 200 Congressmen and Senators that day and Sunday,' Zarb said. 'We told them what we were going to do and that the announcement would be made on Monday.'

"In the next six weeks, Zarb was on loan to Simon, organizing and planning the office, serving temporarily as Assistant Director for Operations and Compliance, until he was finally relieved by John Weber, formerly associated with McKenzie & Co., a management consultant firm.

"Zarb is a tall, thin, pipe-smoking New Yorker with a master's degree in business administration from Hofstra University, who has served as an officer in three investment banking companies and in the Industrial Relations Department of Cities Service Oil Co. He was first called to Washington in April 1971 as Assistant Secretary for Labor for Administration. He left Government at the end of 1972, returning to the business world. But a couple of months later, both Roy Ash, Director of OMB, and George Shultz contacted him and 'told me I wasn't quite finished' with Government work. But, business projects already underway delayed his return to the Washington scene until July 1973. Since then, he became expert in New Federalism, an outspoken exponent of it, and a driving force behind it.

"...How quickly OMB can move in on a problem was illustrated by the structuring of the Federal Energy Office. It was organized in six working days, staffed originally by borrowing from Zarb's staff. 'Some of my people became Acting Regional Directors till they could replace themselves.' They went to other agencies to find talent—the Labor Department to press into duty a Manpower Administrator to head the Boston Region, to the Internal Revenue Service for the man to head the Chicago office. 'In six working days, we went from an average of 14 per cent Regional Office to an average of 70.' A reporting mechanism was set up and at 7:30 every morning the 10 Regional Directors participated in a conference call with Washington to make specific recommendations.

"Gradually most of the on-loan OMB staffers returned to their regular jobs as replacements were found. Zarb's replacement, Weber, took on the job as Assistant Administrator for Operations and Compliance.

"Simon is committed to establishing a data base on fuel inventories. Zarb said FEO had little trouble in finding out what is going into the refineries and coming out, although the source remains through the centralized American Petroleum Institute. 'From there on out, we have to dig for the information. What's in the secondary terminals? What's in the deep water terminals not owned by the majors? What's in the tertiary terminals? What's in the pipelines? That all has to be pulled together. By product. By state. We need data so we can begin to move fuels around.' This information is being gathered by FEO's Eric Zausner. Verifying the accuracy of the data will become the responsibility of either FEO employees or the IRS.

"The energy presence in the Government is going to be on the scene for a long time. What's going to happen to the Federal Energy Office? Zarb feels that its current configuration will change and become ultimately the Department of Energy and Natural Resources, and that should take about a year. 'We've got to somehow institutionalize energy in this country,' Zarb said. 'In a way that says this is a resource not to be wasted'."

(End of extended quotation)

It should be noted that, in all of the foregoing, the subject under discussion is the Federal Energy Office, but the man being quoted as the ultimate authority on the subject is not William Simon or any one of his assistants in FEO, but Frank G. Zarb who "last month was named Associate Director of the Office of Management and Budget, for Natural Resources, Energy and Science."

The real boss is OMB!

This same fact is brought out in reference to other departments of the Federal Administration in other parts of this same article from which we have been quoting. Here are examples:

"His (Zarb's) role in helping create the Federal Energy Office is indicative of the types of problems OMB is confronted with and, as a result, has acquired the expertise and staff to troubleshoot, with an across-the-board Government approach, slicing through red tape when encountered. For instance, when the Defense Department last year announced plans to close military bases, New England—particularly Massachusetts and Rhode Island—was sizably impacted. 'We phased down perhaps more than was anticipated,' said Zarb, 'and it didn't appear that the Federal family was really coming to grips with the questions that needed to be addressed—because there were so many agencies involved.'

"Zarb went to New England with some of his staff and went to work. 'We used the Regional Council as the base,' he said. 'We brought in Council members who were participants and we organized teams of people who had precise expertise. We matched them up with people on the Governors' staffs and for the next three months worked until they got the things resolved'." (End of quote).

Here is an excellent example of the way in which an OMB "Troubleshooter" works: He draws his immediate staff from the Regional Councils, whose members "have precise expertise." When they have been briefed and daily, long-distance conference calls arranged (all computerized), then the "locals and natives"—some elected and some appointed—are called in and "matched up" in teams in which the rules of the game are laid down by the Regional Council experts, but the teams seem to be captained by "people on the Governors' staffs" or the Mayors' staffs, or by local people, elected or appointed. This is known as "returning the power to the people."

In this article from which we are quoting, we are told that, before OMBman Zarb was called on to create and man a new energy agency office for William Simon, he created two new divisions within OMB: the Policy Evaluation Division and the Procurement Policy Division...

"The Evaluation Division is an effort to measure on a continuing basis the real impact on Society of Government programs. The Procurement Division will have the primary responsibility of implementing the recommendations of the Commission on Government Procurement.”

The first, the Evaluation Division is, in simpler words, a kind of barometer which will forecast any storm of public protest which might be developing because of the impact of some new Government program. Example: this Silent Revolution is to be conducted with as little shouting, protest and/or bloodshed as possible. Hence, there will be no gasoline rationing until the OMB is convinced that “the people” are willing to accept same, or even demand same; and this new OMB barometer, the Evaluation Policy Division, will tell the proper authorities when it is the right time to impose gasoline rationing, or food rationing, when to call in all the old Greenbacks and issue a new series of engraved promises-to-pay which will be called money, etc.

“To head the Evaluation Division,” we are told, “Zarb selected Cliff W. Graves, then Deputy Assistant Secretary of HUD for Community Planning and Management. Much of the work will be done by the individual Executive agencies, but coordinated by OMB ... The Division is ‘going to be generally lean in numbers of people,’ Zarb said, ‘but high in quality.’ He searched for four months before deciding on Graves. ‘He’s the right guy.’

“Had it not been for the energy crisis,” the article explains, “Zarb would have had a man in place directing the Procurement Division. ‘I promised Congress that we would go up in the Spring, tell them what kind of progress we had made and whether we needed additional legislation to make greater progress,’ he said. ‘But to do that, I’ve got to have the best possible guy in the country, who has an even balance of knowledge of the spirit of what the Commission was trying to accomplish, and what the framework of Government procurement is really like.

“‘This unit will be working with DOD, GSA and NASA (Department of Defense, General Services Administration and National Aeronautics and Space Administration), the recommendations will be analyzed to determine options on how they can best be implemented. I want them implemented!’”

We believe that the first evidences of the work of this new “Procurement Division” had to do with Roy Ash’s decision to award all procurement, maintenance and operation work on U.S. military bases to civilian contractors. It is also suggested that some phases of IRS and Social Security administration be turned over to civilian contractors for service and maintenance. The general trend in all phases of federal administration under the New Federalism concept, is as follows: For any particular service or activity, a public corporation is to be created to do the job (as with the Post Office Corporation and others of similar ilk); or the work is to be contracted out to some giant conglomerate or multinational corporation (such as Litton, Inc., which Roy Ash headed before becoming OMB Commissar.) Under the New Federalism concept (which is really Corporative Socialism), public corporations, private corporations, labor unions, professional organizations (such as AMA, ADA, NEA, ABA, 1313 affiliates, etc.) are all combined and bound together like the rods in the ancient Roman Fasces, with the handle of the Axe of Absolute Authority bound among the rods, its Head rising unsheathed above and over all.

The article from which we have been quoting puts that same thought in diplomatically veiled language, when it refers to the necessary cooperation that must exist between the rods and the handle that comprise the body of the Fasces, of which the Axe is the Head. To wit:

“In 1974, OMB will place heavy emphasis on ‘technical assistance.’ Zarb describes technical assistance as ‘a term that’s used to define various degrees of contact with state and local governments in the performance of Federal programs.’ In talking to Mayors and Governors over the past seven months, Zarb has heard that too many agencies provide ad hoc management and financial guidance. ‘We really ought to pull it together,’ he said. ‘I don’t think that we’re going to find that the Federal Government is in a position to provide all that help directly. I don’t think we have all that expertise, or if we did, we wouldn’t have the manpower with which to provide it.’ He feels that technical assistance, properly coordinated, can be obtained from the private sector, the local academic institutions, ‘and perhaps the Federal Government. But we ought to have a clearing house to help upgrade the state of the art of technical assistance, to organize it in a more orderly way from a Federal standpoint.

“‘We feel a real responsibility there, particularly in the light of New Federalism.’

“‘But where will the power be orchestrated? ... In determining what new policies will be made...the purse strings are still held by OMB, and all affected Executive agencies would do well to remember this important point....’ (End of quotation).

And it would do well to remember that "all affected Executive agencies" include the agencies not only of the Federal Government but of State, County, Municipal and Incorporated Communities as well! Because, with Revenue Sharing and other Federal grants, at every level of government "the purse strings are held by OMB."

NEW FEDERALISM: BASIC PRINCIPLES

"Where the Federal Government must stay in a program, it should design its own organization so that we have a maximum amount of decision-making consistent with efficiency in the lowest level possible." This is Frank Zarb's own definition of the New Federalism.

And this coincides with one definition of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System. Simply stated, here is the Master Formula:

1. The long-range planning is done by Master Planners (who do not necessarily hold official titles or positions in the Federal Government). These Master Plans are transmitted to the proper agencies and officials through the White House Executive Offices (Domestic Council, National Security Council, Council of Economic Advisers, Office of Management and Budget, etc.) These Executive Agencies lay down the guidelines and draw up the general "rules of the game" that are to apply and be observed by all who are in a position to carry out the programs at the Regional, State, Sub-regional or local level—programs which must be in conformity with and advance the Master Plans which were drawn up before. "the game" began.

2. The programs which are to be carried out are actually prepared by some agency such as the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, or, in the case of State and local programs, by some affiliate of the 1313 Complex. The programs are presented to State and local officials and recommended for adoption "as is" because they have been prepared in accordance with the guidelines and rules laid down by the Master Planners or their agents. These programs, therefore, are sure to obtain Federal funding via Revenue Sharing or some other Federal handout program.

3. Eager Beaver State and Local Politicians who like to buy votes, hasten to affix their names and supply backing and influence in favor of these allegedly "locally prepared programs" which are assured of Federal aid. But —

4. The "local" program is assured of this Federal aid and assistance only so long as it contributes toward the fulfillment of those long-range Master Plans.

5. The Office of Management and Budget supervises the Management and controls the Budgeting of these so-called local programs.

As Frank Zarb declared: "The purse strings are still held by OMB, and all affected executive agencies would do well to remember this important point."

6. While State and local governments must be reckoned with at the present time, it is the final objective of OMB and related Federal Executive Agencies, to route all programs of a domestic nature through the Ten Regional Councils and the network of Sub-regional Councils which State Governments are eagerly forming within their own States without even knowing—or not caring—that this is a form of self-destruction on the part of the States!

Consistent with all of the above, and yet camouflaged by this false slogan of "returning the power to the people," OMBman Zarb lays down the following basic principles of the New Federalism:

- * Government functions should be provided by those levels (of government) best able and willing to serve the needs of the people.
- * The Federal Government should decentralize to its field establishment (that is, to the Ten Regional Councils and the Sub-regional Councils in each State) those functions which must rest with the Federal Government so that decisions are made as close as possible to the locus of the problem....
- * The Federal Government should promote research, experimentation, and innovation in support of more effecting and responsive government at all levels....
- * The Federal Government should create the proper climate for involvement of the private sector in generating ideas and resources to achieve solutions.
- * It is a proper function of government to assure that all the people have equal access to the basic opportunities that our culture, economy, laws, and system of government offer.

So declares OMBman Frank Zarb. If he is right, then the New Federalism is merely a new name for the Old Socialism.

THE KINGDOM AND THE POWER FINDS IT EXPEDIENT TO EXPLAIN THAT OTHER PRESIDENCY

HOW TO MANAGE THE BIGGEST CONGLOMERATE OF THEM ALL

"Ash, Malek, O'Neill, Zarb & Co.: Not household names but their power is great and growing."

So reads the sub-title of a most remarkable article appearing in The New York Times Sunday Magazine, March 3, 1974; an article written by John Herbers, a White House correspondent for the Times; and an article that deals at length, in depth, and to a large extent truthfully although slantedly, with the position of power that has been assumed by the Office of Management and Budget. This agency, says the Times, is "The Other Presidency," has taken over many of the administrative functions originally left to the President only, and will be there to "run the country" if and when the "First President (Nixon)" ceases to function as Chief Administrator.

(By way of explanation of terms: The Times refers to OMB as "The Other Presidency," while we have referred to the Times as "The Kingdom and the Power," an alias stemming from a book so titled and dealing with the Times.)

It seems that after months of comparatively silent growth in power and authority, it now becomes necessary to introduce OMB to the general public, because the Constitutionally created Office of the Presidency is now in jeopardy, and it is needful for citizens to know that OMB is ready to take over. President Nixon seems to be tying cement blocks onto his own ankles prior to a dive into the Potomac. It was just six weeks ago that Nixon told a group of Republican Congressmen:

"There is a time to be timid. There is a time to be conciliatory. There is a time to fly, and there's a time to fight. And I'm going to fight like hell."

So, he had his time of "fighting like hell," and the threat of impeachment grew greater and greater. Now, it seems that it is time to be conciliatory. In his televised news conference of Wednesday, March 6, the President promised to (1) answer relevant questions, under oath, from the House Judiciary Committee which is considering his impeachment; (2) to give the committee up to 19 presidential tapes and 700 documents which could incriminate him; (3) to make no objection to U.S. District Judge Sirica's turning over to the Judiciary Committee a secret grand jury report that may implicate him in the Watergate coverup. In addition, Nixon has become a liability to Republican candidates running for seats in the House of Representatives, and the Party itself is beginning to admit publicly that dragging a dead horse to Watergate is no way to get a harvest of votes come November.

So, for these and other reasons, it must have seemed a very good idea to lift the veil of secrecy and tell the world that if Nixon departs it will not affect government operations, because OMB is ready to step right in and take total charge, the Congress of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

And what better medium could have been chosen than The Kingdom and the Power, which offers prime space not only in the Times itself, but in all the hundreds of smaller dailies that subscribe to the New York Times News Service?

The Times informs us that OMB Director Roy Ash "views the Federal Government as the biggest conglomerate of them all and much in need of management." So, Ash & Co. have installed that management system which this editor would like to nominate Public Enemy Number One: the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System; although one of its several aliases is used in the Times article; Malek especially likes to refer to the system as "Management by Objective."

The New York Times article is, for the most part, self-explanatory and requires little comment for those who have read our booklet Proofs of a Conspiracy. So, for the record, permit us to reprint the more important parts of this article, reserving any further comment until after Correspondent Herbers has had his say:

OMB—ALONE AMID THE RUINS

Washington—During the past few months the great superstructure of Presidential government that Richard Nixon built has slowly collapsed: a landslide here, a cave-in there, leaving billows of dust to hover over the ruins. Through the haze, however, it is possible to discern some remaining promontories that have become more important to the President and to the Government, whatever its shape and leadership may be in the months ahead.

One is the Office of Management and Budget, a durable and elite Presidential agency, formerly known as the Bureau of the Budget. For many years it has been the regulator of the disparate departments and agencies in the executive branch, largely through its power to control funds. During the collapse, it has played a stronger role than usual in keeping the Government from flying apart or grinding to a halt. In many respects it has become a surrogate President, administering the Nixon policies as its top officials see them.

This has occurred under the direction of two controversial men who assumed their offices a year ago, each under his own cloud of suspicion raised by the Nixon critics. Roy L. Ash, the new director, encountered considerable opposition because he had come from the presidency of Litton Industries, the giant conglomerate engaged in claims of cost overruns from the military. Frederic V. Malek, the new deputy director, was one of the tough young pragmatists whom H.R. Haldeman elevated to authority; he came to OMB from the Committee for the Re-election of the President, where he was deputy director. They have made an odd but apparently effective pair: Mr. Ash, who serves as assistant to the President as well as boss of 660 people in his agency... Mr. Malek, a product of the United States Military Academy and Harvard Business School... has furnished the top levels of the agency with... bright young wizards of the business world who want to try their hand at government...

OMB can wield enormous power through relatively few people because in representing the President it decides to a large extent how much money will be spent for each program. It then oversees how each program is carried out. It reviews all legislation the departments and agencies submit to Congress, with authority to change it. OMB analyzes every bill that is passed and recommends that the President either sign or veto it. Virtually every questionnaire sent to business or other private groups must be cleared by OMB. It establishes the broad array of committees that advise the Government on policy. To carry out these functions OMB is equipped with the staff and computers to make the necessary analyses, and it has access to every study and piece of information gathered by the departments and agencies. In OMB one could learn virtually all there is to know about any branch of the Federal Government, however remote from the center of power. For every program, every expenditure of any size, there is someone in OMB watching....

Where one finds the OMB depends on whom one sees, and when. Ash has one of the prestige offices in the White House, only a little smaller than that of chief of staff Alexander M. Haig, Jr. His top assistants have offices across the way on the second floor of the Executive Office Building. The lesser executives and several hundred troops are housed in the new Executive Office Building, across busy Pennsylvania Avenue on 17th Street....

For many years Richard Nixon and Roy Ash, both of whom fought their way to the top, have admired each other, and even after the events of this year, Ash speaks glowingly of his boss. But this may be understandable because, while the President has been criticized for taking advantage of every available loophole in the tax laws, Ash has been criticized for claiming Washington as his legal residence to avoid testifying in a California lawsuit relating to his past business practices while, at the same time and in another document, claiming California as his residence in order to secure a $200 reduction in his real estate tax....

Ash views the Federal Government as "the biggest conglomerate of them all" and much in need of management. At Litton he developed a system under which a few executives supervised subsidiaries all over the world (Editorial correction please: This system is PPBS, and it was developed not at Litton, but at RAND Corporation, then introduced into the Department of Defense and into certain conglomerates which had contracts with the Department of Defense, Litton being one of these conglomerates. Later, PPBS was introduced into every Federal Department and Agency, and Ash was then brought into the specially created OMB to direct the overall management of PPBS throughout the governmental structure at all levels—Ed.)....

When the President's plans for special revenue sharing—converting Federal grants for specific purposes into consolidated funding with state control—bogged down in Congress, Ash quietly got the President to sign a directive ordering the departments and agencies to implement the concept... by administrative means. His subordinates then served the directive on the Federal establishment across the country....

When (Fred) Malek came to the Government to find new challenges in 1969... he was sent first to HEW as deputy under secretary to apply his management methods (PPBS methods—Ed.) to the jungle of agencies and programs that had ensnared and entrapped every secretary. Robert Finch especially needed help... and Malek soon earned a reputation as a ruthless cutter and shaker. ... He did so well that he was moved to the White House in 1970 as... the chief talent scout for high-level appointments.... Two incidents brought him to public attention: First, after Walter Hickel was fired as Interior Secretary, Malek went over to the department and cleaned out the Hickel lieutenants who were balking at leaving; and second, it was Malek who said in 1971 that the White House was considering CBS correspondent Daniel Schorr for a government position to explain the disclosure that the FBI was investigating Schorr... the job story was a lie, invented (by Malek) to explain an FBI check on a White House enemy, on orders of Haldeman.... It was not until mid-January that Malek was identified as the director of a White House effort in June of 1972 to shape Federal grants and actions to win votes for the President's re-election.

... Malek, in addition to running the management program (PPBS—Ed.), oversaw drafting of the budget, a task he found invigorating. While the process was not open to public view, one can imagine him getting in licks here and there for the Nixon policy. Much of his mission at OMB, however, was accomplished before the sky fell, in recruiting the kind of personnel he and Ash wanted for the agency. It is doubtful that many of them would come now, but since they did, they are, with the President, toughing it out.

The new eminence of the firm of Ash and Malek came about both by design and by chance.... President Nixon in his persistent desire to control the bureaucracy throughout the executive branch, saw in his first term the opportunity to achieve that end by building up the bureau's rather weak management component. With Congressional approval, he reorganized and renamed the agency. And he put layers of political appointees over the career people who had served Democratic and Republican Administrations with equal devotion. Then early last year, after his landslide re-election, he went a step farther. Ash and Malek were moved into OMB and, through a network of Nixon loyalists newly placed in key positions throughout the departments, put into force a plan called "management by objective" (and officially called Planning, Programming, Budgeting System—Ed.)....

Another component of the move for greater but more formalized Presidential control was the establishment of a super-Cabinet that was to assume much of the authority wielded by the Domestic Council, which Ehrlichman had headed but which was reduced greatly as part of the new scheme.

However, after the Watergate disclosures in the spring, the super-Cabinet was abolished (except for Henry A. Kissinger's role in foreign policy and Treasury Secretary George P. Shultz's in economic matters) to placate an aroused Congress that disliked so much concentrated power. Almost unnoticed, the preponderance of the super-Cabinet's authority reverted to OMB, which was about the only White House unit with the professionalism and stability to function through the shocks and scandals. The team of Ash and Malek, happily pursuing "management by objective," knew what to do with their inheritance.

Thus, for example, when a career civil servant who has seen Presidents come and go was asked the other day who was the czar of the wide range of social, urban and transportation programs now that John D. Ehrlichman was no longer in the White House, the answer was simple: "Why, Paul O'Neill, of course," he replied referring to a young associate director of OMB who is virtually unknown outside the bureaucracy. While studiously avoiding publicity—something the non-OMB Presidential aide seldom does—Mr. O'Neill has negotiated agreements with Congress, initiated programs, blocked proposals from the agencies, decided disputes between departments, brought about the impoundment or release of funds and precipitated Presidential vetoes.

O'Neill provides an excellent example of how much clout a key OMB official can have... O'Neill a youngish looking man of 38... was close to Ehrlichman, so much so that he was intimately involved in most of the major domestic controversies of recent years—welfare reform, food stamps, busing, housing. He prefers to work behind the scenes....

It is not unusual for O'Neill to negotiate directly with Congressional leaders in any of a number of areas, bypassing the department or agency that formerly would have been responsible. A few weeks ago, President Nixon announced through his spokesman, Gerald L. Warren, that he was giving in after a long fight with Congress and releasing more than $1-billion in impounded education funds. The key man in this, it appears, was O'Neill, but few knew it. He declined an invitation by Warren to come to the press room and explain it, saying, "I have work to do, and if I had showed up I would have been asked about a lot of other programs." Asked if the President had accepted his recommendation in the matter, O'Neill said, "I never say what I recommend to the President."...

Another area, the overseeing of Federal-state relations and the nurturing of the New Federalism (Regionalism-Ed.), a task that once was handled with considerable fanfare by Spiro Agnew and by a succession of Presidential aides, is now conducted ever so quietly, but enthusiastically, by a division of OMB headed until recently by Frank G. Zarb... During the fall, he traveled the country meeting with local and regional Federal officials to coordinate grant programs, and he headed and organized an Administration-wide effort to persuade the bureaucracy to consolidate grants and leave more authority to the state and local governments (that is, authority for local officials to map out their own local programs, and provide the manpower for carrying them out; provided that such programming was in accord with the long-range planning of OMB "management by objective" policies, in which case, OMB would approve the budget for the "local" program-Ed.)...

What the agency (OMB) has accomplished in the past year demonstrates the true dimensions of the authority and reach of the American Presidency, no matter how crippled the President. Over the years, the enormous powers of the office have by necessity been invested to a large degree in an ever-growing Presidential staff that has taken on a life of its own. In recent months, these powers have been aggressively dispensed by the likes of Roy Ash, Fred Malek, Paul O'Neill and Frank Zarb—hardly household names. Indeed, they have left an impression that even the total political destruction of Richard Nixon would not be likely to diminish the authority that he invested in this largest of all White House offices.

Ash, Malek and others are sensitive to any suggestion that OMB is in any way 'running' the Government. What they are doing, in the broad sense, they say, is trying to provide management and policy oversight and direction that can be institutionalized and passed on to the next President, if he cares to use it. But they say it is too early to tell whether "management by objective" will be a long-range success.

Indeed, 1973 was not the best of years to put their plan to a test. Much of the executive branch has been in limbo because of Watergate, and the crippled White House has not overwhelmed the departments and agencies with initiatives and innovations. What has happened in the regular functions of government has been largely ignored as one scandal after another and the trauma they have generated have preoccupied the nation.

The management effort (PPBS-Ed.) is being handled very delicately, to effect what the President wants without raising the hackles of agencies which in the past (have protested) whenever OMB leaned too hard on their programs. "You've got to be tough but not arrogant," said John Hill, who set up the management division for natural resources. "Otherwise you will have doors shut in your face." Further, implementing the Nixon policies can have deep and troubling difficulties. The Nixon policy is to decentralize the Federal Government, giving more authority to regional offices
(End of quotations from NYT article)

SUMMARY: This article, however alarming, deals only with OMB and its "management by objective" or "planning, programming, budgeting system" only as that system applies to government departments and agencies at Federal, Regional, State and local levels. But it must be understood that this management system is designed for the control of people; their schools, professions, organizations, every segment of society. Total management of Government by one agency is but the first essential step in the total management of people by a single elite group! This is the real objective of OMB's "management by objective", and it is becoming evident that the "first Presidency" is being destroyed, that this "Other Presidency" may take control!

THE CREATION, CARE AND KEEPING OF CRISES

THE ENERGY CRISIS IS DEAD: WHICH CRISIS COMES NEXT?

President Nixon says we may now purchase gasoline on Sundays, that those printed ration cards will not be distributed, that industry and agriculture will be able to operate at full capacity, and that those lines at service stations will grow shorter and shorter and finally disappear altogether. The alleged energy crisis has served its varied purposes; now we may look forward to a new crisis of some sort. The Planners don't seem to be in complete agreement as to the nature of the next crisis which they shall create. That determination seems to hinge somewhat on the decision that is reached by the House Judiciary Committee, and later by the whole House of Representatives regarding the potential impeachment of a President of the United States.

We mentioned the "varied" purposes of the alleged energy crisis. Seldom mentioned by anyone is the Pavlovian purpose: The sight of once proud and independent Americans forming long, slow-moving lines on busy streets and thoroughfares awaiting the reward of a few gallons of gasoline, would be a joyful sight to any hater of the American Way of Life. And the process of making Americans docile and subservient to Bureaucratic commands is undoubtedly pleasing to the commanding bureaucrats. Too, the reactions of pleasure and gratitude which were expressed by so many of what the Planners call "the common herd" were so very similar to the conditioned reflex Pavlov reported to Lenin when his captive canines received their rewards for having learned to read the sequence of bell tones and stop-and-go signs properly.

Another little-noted purpose of the alleged energy crisis had to do with the attempt to use it as a means of cooling down the tempers that kept rising as a result of the preceding crisis that just wouldn't go away: the Watergate crisis. As an example of the use of the energy crisis as a means of "getting the people off Mr. Nixon's back," there was this full-page, paid advertisement that appeared in several metropolitan newspapers, especially on the West Coast, during the month of January. As merely a matter of historical interest and the record of a plan that failed, we reprint portions of this paid advertisement together with the names of those who paid for it, as it appeared in the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner on Sunday, January 13, 1974:

A WARNING ABOUT WEAKENING AMERICA IN THE MIDST OF A GREAT CRISIS

America is in deep trouble. The energy crisis threatens to dry up our economy and throw many out of work. It will be a long, cold winter. Travel will be harder. Products we have taken for granted may become scarce. And more expensive... This is no time for America to falter. No time to flounder. No time to suddenly turn weak. Yet that's what's happening.

Some very vocal Americans, screaming for the scalp of President Nixon, are managing to so handcuff the President that it may soon become impossible for him to deal with his customary strength and resolve and directness with all the threats that confront us.

A majority of people, in and out of Congress, do not believe that President Nixon should be impeached. But those who scream for impeachment scream so loudly that their voices carry—to the Russians, to the Arabs, to our own lawmakers....

Let us please, for the love of our country, let the President up for air. Untie his hands. And let him get on with the vital business of insuring our strong leadership in a world that's fraught with peril....

 (Partial List)

As events have shown, the creation of an energy crisis did not do away with the Watergate crisis, nor did it "let the President up for air." With the principals in the campaign fund collections and payoffs now on trial, and with the House Judiciary Committee still pondering impeachment as of this writing, the energy crisis had little effect other than that of widening the credibility gap.

However, if it is understood that there is a general plot to denigrate elected officials and exalt appointed "czars" and bureaucratic chieftains, and to make citizens subservient and obedient to the dictates that emanate from this "multitude of new offices" and the "swarms of officers" that are replacing elected officials, then it will also be understood that the alleged energy crisis served an important purpose for the leaders of this "managerial revolution," who are installing a new form of federalism which would be better called a bureaucratic dictatorship.

How the energy crisis was used at the State level to promote this New Federalism, was excellently outlined in a paper prepared for delivery before a high school audience by Anne Garni, SCORPA Director for Central California. The paper deals with developments in the State of California, but the same general line of progress will be found to be applicable to any of the other 49 States.

Because this paper summarizes the overall plot in a most understandable manner, we reprint the entire presentation:

We, the people, are no longer the government of the United States. We lost our sovereignty through apathy, and we traded our liberty for so-called free federal money.

We are now ruled by a strong Federal system, which is called the New Federalism, in which power is concentrated in the Executive Office of the President.

Our country was divided into ten Federal Regions by President Nixon on March 27, 1969. On February 19, 1972, by Executive Order 11647, he staffed these regions with Councils representing various federal administrations. California is now a part of Region IX, along with Nevada, Arizona and Hawaii. Headquarters for Region IX is in San Francisco.

Our State legislatures have been weakened, and local government is being replaced by appointive regional organizations which merge local, State and the Federal governments, with controls set by the Federal government.

But, all is still not lost. We still have the framework of a Constitutional Republic, but we are going to have to become more deeply involved if we want to reverse the present corrupt system that has superimposed itself over our representative form of government.

We need a thorough housecleaning in politics from the top down to the local level, and we are going to have to put people in office who can be trusted to represent their constituents and not the lavishly-paid lobbyists who swarm around them. We need men with strong moral principles who cannot be swayed by flattery or gifts. We cannot continue to send the same men back to office who have been transferring our rights, our power, our control, to a criminal oligarchy.

It is becoming very obvious that many of the problems that we have today have been created. If you understand the Hegelian Principle for bringing about change, then you will understand why government sometimes creates problems. This principle of thesis, antithesis and synthesis is as old as politics itself. It is a three-step process. First, the problem is created. Then, the opposition to the problem is created: fear, hysteria, etc. Then, the solution is offered—a solution that would have been unacceptable to the people if they had not first been psychologically conditioned by steps one and two.

For example: We have a gas shortage. Few people believe that we have a shortage but during this crisis many people have lost their jobs, and a lot of small, independent oil companies have been put out of business. The American people have been inconvenienced by the restricted allotments to their gas stations. Everyone seems to be troubled, and people want a solution.

Well, the government just happens to be standing by with the solution: President Nixon established a new bureaucracy which is called The Federal Energy Administration, and he has appointed an all-powerful Energy Czar who naturally knows nothing about this new creation. This Czar will not solve the problem at its source, but will instead strengthen the power of the Federal system through the ten federal regions.

An establishment mouthpiece, Jack Anderson, complained on March 1st that the federal allocation program has failed on a regional basis, because they made no attempt to monitor the flow of gas in and out of the ten regions.

While the Chief Executive at the Federal level is busily changing the structure of our government, our own State Chief Executive, Governor Reagan, is doing precisely the same thing at the State level, in order to strengthen the ten regional system.

The Chairman of the Board of Supervisors in the State received a Memo dated February 25, 1974, from the Office of Emergency Services in Sacramento entitled: "Gasoline Shortage Crisis," which read, "Governor Reagan will entertain formal requests from county governments to proclaim a 'State of Emergency' for that county in order to exercise his emergency powers under the provision of the Emergency Services Act..." "Upon receipt of the formal request from the county, the Governor will proclaim a 'State of Emergency' implementing the plan generally outlined below."

The Emergency Services Act is a sleeper which was signed by Governor Reagan back in 1970, and confers upon the Governor emergency powers. It declares that the policy of this State be coordinated as far as possible with the comparable functions of its political subdivisions of the federal government... to the end that the most effective use may be made of all manpower, resources, and facilities for dealing with any emergency that may occur. It also vests in the Governor the authority to utilize any private property or personnel deemed by him necessary in carrying out the responsibilities as Chief Executive of the State. The Governor may also enter into agreements or compacts with other States and the federal government. It also authorizes the Governor to expend any of the moneys which have been appropriated. The Governor is empowered to make expenditures from any fund legally available in order to deal with actual or threatened conditions of a state of emergency or local emergency.

This is an example of the broad powers that government can take from the people in the guise of solving a crisis, so you can see why these crises are created: You have to have a reason for the "solution"—and the solution is always more government, more controls, and less freedom for the people.

There is a story I'd like to tell about the man who worked in a baby-buggy factory in Germany during the last world war. When his wife became pregnant, he asked if he could purchase a buggy, but his request was denied. So he decided to take home each night a different part from the assembly line. When he had collected all of the parts and put them together he had, not a baby-buggy, but a machine gun.

Many elected officials never realize the part they play in the political assembly line. Recommendations that sound reasonable are made to them, but because of their ignorance of the total picture, they assist in the assembling of machine guns when they actually believe they are assisting in the manufacture of baby-buggies.

Other politicians realize what they are doing, but being opportunists, they are interested only in building their own empires.

Let's hope that before it is too late, a grass-roots rebellion will spring up and will recapture control of the present tyrannical oligarchy. This could come about once the people understand how thoroughly they have been deceived.

For too long the people have ignored the problems as they adjusted to the inconveniences, hoping that it was just a phase that would go away; but it is becoming too obvious that our problems are serious enough to require our attention... If we want to remain free, we will have to give total vigilance, dedication and sacrifice to preserve that freedom.

(End of paper prepared for delivery before high school students in California by Anne Garni, SCORPA Director.)

* * * * *

For reasons we need not detail at this time, the State of California has been used as a kind of field laboratory for the testing of political, educational and religious innovations. The control mechanism known as the Planning, Programing, Budgeting System was developed and tested in California, when PPBS was ready for installation in the public schools as a means of conditioning and cataloging future citizens, California was chosen as a test area. When it seemed important that the Chief Executives of the fifty States have emergency powers similar to those decreed for himself by the Chief Executive of the United States through a series of Executive Orders, California was among the first of the States to have an "Emergency Services Act" which would grant dictatorial powers to the Chief Executive of that State. Etc., etc.

Recently our attention was called to a new California-based plan which will spell the end of County Government if and when the new plan is actuated. The editor of the BCU Bulletin (Berkeley Citizens United, Box 44, Berkeley, California) reported in her March, 1974 issue, the following:

BAY AREA PLANNING AGENCY
- SUPER GOVERNMENT -

The demise of county government is inherent in legislation which has not yet been completed. The San Francisco Sunday Examiner & Chronicle (SFXC), reported on March 10 that the legislation will "combine five regional agencies and take over review of land use, transportation, parks and open space, air pollution, and sewage." The functions of county government would be merged into a super-government.

Democrat John Knox, Assemblyman from Richmond, who has been working for this for eight years, is amending his bill, AB-2040. The amended bill will propose:

"Combining the Association of Bay Area Governments, Metropolitan Transportation Commission, Bay Area Sewer Services Agency, Bay Conservation and Development Commission, and the Bay Area Air Pollution Control District.

"Establish a ruling 'board' of up to 50 people, probably appointed by city councils and county supervisors, at first. Eventually, they will be elected and county governments phased out." (Italics added.)

Other agencies, such as the Coastal Commission and the Water Quality Control Board, would be "absorbed" in the future.

The projected Bay Area Planning Agency (BAPA) will be funded by a "small addition to the property transfer tax..." and will have veto powers over cities and counties whenever their actions may be "inconsistent" with regional planning. In addition to such veto powers, the agency will have "increasing say over federal and state grants for local projects."

The SFXC said that "Some minority groups have objected to regional government on grounds it takes away their new power bases in central urban areas. Knox says a 50 member board would insure minority representation from big-city areas."

(End of quote from BCU Bulletin)

The "phasing out" of county governments doesn't "just happen;" neither does the demise of State Governments (a part of The Plan); nor the creation of World Government (The End of The Plan). Such things are made to happen. Under normal circumstances the citizens of the respective States would never consent to the destruction of their county governments, which are the basic political units around which the whole fabric of representative government is woven. In order to cause the "phasing out" of county governments, crises must be created so that the people will demand solutions.

And the next crisis that is to be created? Well, a few weeks ago Daniel A. Dreyfus, U.S. Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee staff professional, warned the American Society of Civil Engineers that "mankind is on the brink of a global disaster in food and fiber shortages that could overshadow the energy crisis." But the crisis that is being planned next will probably be presented to us as a "water crisis." Because here is the way Dreyfus explained the situation:

"A serious world climatological problem could trigger the food and fiber crisis. It would mean famine in the underdeveloped nations and exceedingly higher prices in developed nations. The next time we get a crop failure in major nations, we're in trouble.

"If we get into that kind of situation, without a national water policy, essentially we will be in a position much as we are now, trying to arrive at an energy policy after the crisis is upon us. Hopefully, a nondisaster of some kind will raise the level of public awareness and concern so steps can be taken before the situation gets out of hand."

"A national water policy" is the new battle cry of the Planners, who create crises to induce the people to demand their prepared solutions.

In summary: There is a problem of water pollution and, unless the people do something about it and work out their own solutions at the local level, Big Government is going to do it for them—and there goes more of the freedom of which we once boasted!

BIG BROTHER'S BIG EYE MAY BE WATCHING YOU

HAS 1984 ALREADY ARRIVED?

"An elderly Albuquerque couple, lounging in the back yard one cool New Mexico evening, heard a roar from above. Then a light appeared, focussing with terrifying intensity on the man and woman. A UFO? Hallucination? Not at all. The source was the Albuquerque police department's 'spy in the sky' plane on a routine patrol. 'It scared the world out of us,' the man said later. 'It reminded us of George Orwell's 1984.' The low-flying craft operates by daylight too. A woman complained that she could no longer sun-bathe on her roof because the plane kept circling overhead.'

So read the opening paragraph in a story leading the "law section" of the current Time Newsmagazine (April 1, 1974). "More than 100 complaints about assorted varieties of snooping have been filed by Albuquerque-area residents," said Time, and a $50,000 publicity effort had been launched:

"Along the freeways, billboards were filled with an eerily staring human eye. Similar eyes glared balefully from a dozen small ads in a single day's newspaper. Television spots showed a grade-school girl playing unconcernedly, then frozen into a prisoner-like pose with a Social Security number on a placard hung from her neck. A 'Mission Control' sequence depicted the launching of a pyramid with a staring eye on top, like that on the reverse of a dollar bill."

The idea for the publicity, said Time, "was first promoted by a group of self-styled 'alternative culture' activists, then endorsed by no less a conservative than Congressman Barry Goldwater, Jr. Designed as a pilot program, the campaign and its response have provided a representative sample of what—and who—is bugging citizens all over the U.S...."

So, at long last, Invasion of Privacy has become a national issue. President Nixon, in his State of the Union Message, seeking some subject which would win popular approval and divert the populace from thoughts of Watergate, launched a personal campaign against privacy invasion on the part of the federal government. The American Civil Liberties Union was founded for the alleged purpose of spending tax-free money in the defense of Communist causes and fellow travelers who had run afoul of the law. But nowadays Communism is legal and Communists are honorable and even welcomed into sensitive positions in government. So the ACLU has been forced to seek new areas of attack in order to offer an excuse for asking for tax-free contributions. And it is the New Mexico Civil Liberties Union which backed the drive against Big Brother's Big Eye in New Mexico; and NMCLU is currently looking for cases it can bring to court against invaders of the peoples' privacy.

Cases on the record from which suits might be filed:—

1. One morning last year, Richard Stark, a resident of Corte Madera, California, opened his bank statement and found more than just cancelled checks. Enclosed with his checks was a memo dated August, 1971, with his name and account number. It said: "This memo is to authorize you to read checks to the FBI before sending statement to customer." The words, "before sending statement to customer," were underlined in red ink. Bank officials admitted that the memo was genuine and had been mailed to Stark by accident.

2. A woman said she had worked all her life and saved money to be sure her daughter would be able to go to college. Then she found that the high school girl had suddenly been transferred from a college preparatory curriculum to vocational courses. The woman appealed to the authorities, but the school refused to give her any information and officials of the federally funded vocational program to which the daughter was assigned, would give no reasonable explanation. Their response amounted to: "This was devised by experts who know what's in the best interests of your daughter."

3. Robert A. Jones, of the staff of the Los Angeles Times, recently submitted the following report:

California is closer to 1984 than the rest of the nation, according to a report on the growth of computer data banks issued Friday (Feb. 21) by the American Civil Liberties Union. The report, published by the ACLU's Project on Privacy and Data Collection, said the privacy of Californians is more threatened because of the pervasive use of electronic data banks at almost every level of state government.

Douglas Lea, director of the project, said California "seems to have a passion for computerized records. The state bureaucrats want to know everything about everybody and in large part they have succeeded."

The report cited several developments:

--Soon California will begin building in Sacramento the nation's first central record center. The Teale Consolidated Data Center will house computer records for 34 state agencies under one roof. Such centralization, critics have charged, contributes to abuse of sensitive information by simplifying access to it. Although the Teale center will be the largest, the state has plans for four other centers.

--California was the first state to classify thousands of children as "predelinquents" and to compile extensive, often permanent, files on them under a grant from the California Council of Criminal Justice.

--Under former welfare director Robert D. Carleson (now U.S. welfare commissioner), California used computers to track down welfare cheaters by matching their welfare grants with other background data. Present state welfare director Richard Peterson, the report said, is trying to sell the idea to the federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for use on a national scale.

--California is the first state to have a county clerk's office continuously bugged. The Los Angeles County Office in Pomona records conversations between employees and visitors because, the report quoted the county legal counsel as saying, employees "have no reasonable expectation of privacy."

--California was also first with the concept of computerizing court records to make past offenses of adults and juveniles more readily available. Soon, the report said, all counties in the state will join their systems.

The report noted, however, other "conflicting patterns" in the state that are rising out of a "greater awareness of personal privacy (by the public) than in any other part of the country." The report noted, for example, that California is the only state to recognize the right to privacy in its state Constitution. And, in one possible "sign of the future," the report lauded San Francisco Police Chief Donald M. Scott for his new directive on computer police records. When checking the records of a motorist, Scott has ordered his officers to believe the motorist, not the computer, if there are conflicting claims over a previous traffic record. (End of article.)

Uncle Sam Ervin, his television series now concluded and thoughts of retirement to the North Carolina streams and valleys of his youth, has one remaining piece of business which he should like to complete before terminating his tenure in the Senate: Get some legislation enacted into law that would make it impossible for the federal administration to outlaw personal privacy.

On March 20, 1974, Senator Ervin told his colleagues:

"We have heard a great deal about Government wiretaps, burglaries in the name of 'national security,' practically unlimited access to personal records, and the like. The Government has also sought to undertake various programs that affect mental processes, such as psychosurgery and behavior modification. At the same time, many Government officials have been paying more attention to the problems of unwarranted intrusions into personal privacy. These events have been national in origin and in scope. But is the problem of privacy only of concern to the National Government and a few experts? Do the people realize the dangers to privacy that confronts them? Are they concerned? ... the people must know about and care about invasions of their privacy. The best results would occur if the people were informed at the State and local levels of government. What we do in Washington is doomed to failure if the people are not aware of or concerned about dangers to the right of privacy."

The Senator then spoke of the New Mexico campaign, praising it, and noting that "The New Mexico campaign was conceived by the Institute of Regional Education, a group of people seeking ways to bring issues of public interest to the attention of ordinary citizens through the various media. They selected privacy as the most timely topic and enlisted the cooperation of the New Mexico Civil Liberties Union."

This Institute of Regional Education prepared a "Statement of Common Sense" that is worth reprinting:

STATEMENT OF COMMON SENSE

We, the citizens of New Mexico, feel that there are growing dangers to life in our modern society. More and more, we are being controlled and directed in our actions and thoughts. Our privacy is being invaded and our constitutional rights as American citizens are being threatened.

It is time for us to use our common sense, and call upon public officials to use the authority we gave them, to face the following questions and provide the citizens of New Mexico with the answers they deserve. Questions in the public interest are vital to our security as human beings and citizens of a democracy. These questions in the public interest must be talked about publicly and debated.

FIRST: Should citizens be protected against computerized record keeping and use of surveillance technology?

SECOND: Should arrest records of cases not resulting in conviction be removed from police files?

THIRD: Should there be a public review to guarantee the protection of people's rights in regard to the State and local police use of the National Crime Information Center (FBI) computer system?

FOURTH: Should strict regulation of credit records be provided to protect the rights of people?

FIFTH: Should your social security number be used as a method of identification for record keeping?

SIXTH: Should a Citizens Review Board be established to investigate and make recommendations about the uses, abuses, protections and general practices of record keeping in the State?

SEVENTH: Should the operation of the New Mexico Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA), as implemented by the Governor's Criminal Justice Planning Council and the Albuquerque Metropolitan Crime Commission, be reviewed for policy and greater community representation?

EIGHTH: Should more emphasis be given to the investigation of organized crime and corruption in New Mexico?

NINTH: Are drug and behavioral modification programs being used in the State's penal and educational institutions? If so, should they be?

TENTH: Is psychosurgery being used in New Mexico? If so, should it be?

SUMMARY: Mass-Media, Surveillance, Control Project.

The New Mexico Civil Liberties Union is sponsoring a campaign to bring an important issue to the attention of the public in the Albuquerque metropolitan area. Through invasions of privacy, we are facing increased threats to our civil liberties. The issues covered are:

- Record Keeping—especially computerized. Surveillance.
- Behavior Modification Programs.
- Legalized Drug Abuse.
- Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.
- Predelinquency Programs.
- Violence Prediction Methods
- Psychosurgery.

Each of these issues is extremely important in its own right. Each can be used to control and direct behavior—each becomes a tool of control. When they are all put together, when they are seen as a group of methods, they are more threatening than any single one of them. Together, they become a technology of behavior control.

A saturation, month-long, mass-media, advertising campaign has been developed to attract attention to the issue. (Then follow details of the month-long campaign, which space prevents reprinting in this letter—Ed.)

* * * * *

A special report issued by the campaigners—against-privacy-invasion contained the following information (we are selecting special excerpts from a very long report):

“In a society dominated by large bureaucratic institutions, the control of information is a vital element of power. The more centralized decision-making becomes, the more it must rely on a huge network of information-gathering activities.

“This information-gathering activity, ranging from credit bureaus to the Social Security Administration, invades every aspect of our daily lives. The existence of massive records and files becomes a subtle restraint on individual freedom; there is always the fear that a statement or action may prove to be unwise or unpopular and come back to haunt you from the files. . . .

“...we have been exposed to numerous revelations of the military spying on American civilians, of CIA and FBI involvement in questionable and illegal surveillance, and of agencies and corporations snooping and prying into private lives—all aided by the fantastically sophisticated and powerful weapons of the computer and modern ‘spy’ equipment.

“Computer records, though certainly the broadest-reaching in their impact, are just one aspect of the network of control emerging from today's new technology. There are electronic surveillance hardware and weapons, behavior modification programs, mood-changing drugs, widespread intelligence operations, methods of violence and delinquency prediction, and even psychosurgery. All the necessary equipment for a police state has been assembled before us. What assurance do we have that it will not be put to use?

"The answer is that we do not have such assurance, and in fact this system already is being put to use in too many instances—sometimes intentionally, sometimes not intentionally. Perhaps just as disturbing is the fact that due to the secretive and complex nature of the apparatus, we American citizens do not even know how widespread and dangerous the existing system is....

"The danger we are facing is that of control: all of us, in different ways, are being increasingly directed. For some, this control is subtle and not too physically painful; for others, it is very direct. For all of us, it is very powerful and more and more limits our freedom, and our range of choices.

"... Almost every time you fill out a questionnaire, an application, or a form, it may be held from one to two years to as long as you live, or sometimes even beyond. These records are kept by the government agency or corporation for which you filled out the form, but they aren't the only ones who see the information. Very often employers, other agencies, landlords, reporters, or police, have legal access to them. And, as we know all too well, sometimes people get information illegally, too.

"Some agencies and corporations have gathered millions, and in some cases, billions of files. The federal government had, by 1967, accumulated over 27 billion names in its files down through the years. The Retail Credit Co. had information on 45 million Americans. As a result, each American citizen is probably the subject of 10 to 20 of these files (or dossiers). So far, they are somewhat decentralized in the hands of federal, state, and local agencies and private businesses. But modern communications and the computer places information easily within reach of anyone who wants to go after it.... Social Security numbers... could be the means of meshing and centralizing all the information on each citizen....

"Records that may have been collected about you: Adoption, airline flight records, arrest, bank accounts, bank loans, birth, car registration, census, church records, consumer credit, conviction record, customs, divorce, draft status record, driver's license and record, drug prescriptions, employment, FBI, fingerprints, food stamps, general health, gun registration, ham radio registration, hotel, motel, hospital, immigration, insurance, job application, library cards, marriage, Medicare, military, mortgage, newspaper morgue files, passport, pet registration, police, pilot registration, political activity, private investigators records, psychiatric, school, security clearance, Social Security, stocks and bonds transactions, subscription mailing lists, telephone, university, utilities, voter registration, and welfare....

"The issues described in this report attempt to document the technology of behavior control. They are invasions of privacy. More and more we are being recorded, punched on a computer card, watched, drugged, studied for violence, operated on, punished or rewarded, photographed, and policed. The tools that threaten our freedom are being developed and increasingly put to use. What do you think about it?" (End of extended quotation.)

* * * * *

"What do you think about it?" is a fitting conclusion to the charges made in the report from which we have been quoting. Please understand that our publishing of parts of an extended report does not signify our endorsement of the organizations making the report, or of all parts of the report itself. Any report prepared by the Civil Liberties Union is suspect because of its very origin. However, the dangers of computerized files and the potential loss of personal identity by becoming merely a number in a data bank, are not overstressed in this report. The Big Eye of Big Brother really is watching us each and every one. But how to deal with the situation is a matter for personal discernment and decision.

This must be added: Parents who feed, clothe, provide education and security for their children, deserve to know all about them and have a right to keep an eye on them. In a welfare state a paternalistic government has the same right. Those who are supported by Government have a right to be watched by Government. So, our question is addressed, this second time, to those who deserve to be free:

"What do you think about it?"

CONTROL OVER YOUR PROPERTY IS THE AIM OF THE PLANNERS

BIG BROTHER TO BECOME YOUR ABSENTEE LANDLORD

On the subject of the elimination of rights to have and hold private property, Karl Marx was far more lucid than Henry Jackson on the right, Hubert Humphrey on the left, or Morris Udall who likes to think of himself as in the mainstream and neither right nor left. But all of them; Marx, Jackson, Humphrey and Udall, have authored plans that would deprive a person of his right to control the use of his own land.

Marx favored outright expropriation of all property belonging to the bourgeoisie, the middle class; though he was much less explicit when speaking of the ruling class that was to evolve via dialectic determinism. Here are pertinent quotations on the subject of property, taken from Marx's Communist Manifesto, which was co-authored by the "capitalist," Friedrich Engels:

The distinguishing feature of communism is not the abolition of property generally, but the abolition of bourgeois private property is the final and most complete expression of the system of producing and appropriating products that is based on class antagonisms, or the exploitation of the many by the few.

In this sense, the theory of Communism may be summed up in the single phrase: Abolition of private property.

The proletariat will use its political supremacy to wrest, by degrees, all capital from the bourgeoisie, to centralize all instruments of production in the hands of the state, i.e., of the proletariat organized as the ruling class; and to increase the total of productive forces as rapidly as possible.

Of course, in the beginning, this cannot be effected except by means of despotic inroads on the rights of property, and on the conditions of bourgeois production; by means of measures, therefore, which appear economically insufficient and untenable, but which, in the course of the movement, outstrip themselves, necessitate further inroads upon the old social order, and are unavoidable as a means of entirely revolutionizing the mode of production.

These measures will of course be different in different countries.

Nevertheless, in the most advanced countries, the following will be generally applicable:

1. Abolition of property in land and application of all rents of land to public purposes.
2. A heavy progressive or graduated income tax.
3. Abolition of all right of inheritance.
4. Confiscation of the property of all emigrants and rebels.
5. Centralization of credit in the hands of the state, by means of a national bank with state capital and an exclusive monopoly.
6. Centralization of the means of communication and transport in the hands of the state.
7. Extension of factories and instruments of production owned by the state; and bringing into cultivation of wastelands, and the improvement of the soil generally in accordance with a common plan.
8. Equal liability for all labor. Establishment of industrial armies, especially for agricultural (labor).
9. Combination of agriculture with manufacturing industries; gradual abolition of the distinction between town and country by a more equitable distribution of the population over the country.
10. Free education for all children in public schools. Abolition of children's factory labor in its present form. Combination of education with industrial production, etc.

In short, the Communists everywhere support every revolutionary movement against the existing social and political order of things.

(End of quote from Communist Manifesto)

Marx laid down these ten commandments of communism while at the same time declaring that they might be summed up in one phrase: The abolition of bourgeois property.

As Communism was developed in Russia under Lenin and Trotsky, this goal was attained by means of outright confiscation of all property and the liquidation or incarceration in slave labor camps of all former property owners. Then, new managers, or commissars, were appointed by the Communist Elite, to increase production, etc. But the system didn't work as well as was expected; it was found that the new appointee-managers had neither the experience nor the expertise of the old owner-managers. Had it not been for lavish American aid in money, food, materials, technicians and agricultural experts, the whole communist experiment would have failed and been replaced by a new system of governance in the 1930s.

So, under the rule of "different measures for different countries," Fabian Socialism was determined for the more advanced countries of Britain and the United States. Instead of outright confiscation of property, which would entail the appointment of new and inexperienced managers and supervisors, it was decided that wherever possible, the title to property should remain with the original owner of the property, but that the control of the property and the determination of the property's use, should be taken over by Government appointees.

Thereby, the best available management and supervision could be maintained while, at the same time, Government control of production and land use could be assured.

"Control without confiscation" became the new slogan; and this is how the plan advanced by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels differs from the plans being advanced by Senators Jackson and Humphrey, Congressman Udall, and "experts" in the executive branch of our federal government.

This Fabian concept of "control without confiscation" was explained by Dr. Frank Alessio, Economic Consultant to the Office of Policy Planning in the Department of Housing and Urban Development, in the following words:

"Land use planning and control is generally understood to mean a system of rules and regulations prescribing uses to which a particular piece, or zone of land can be put. . . . It is not without problems. Aside from the usual—and sometimes insurmountable—problem of formulating and implementing the plan, land use planning is problematical because it interferes with private property rights. In many cases it robs the property owners of their right to develop and profit from land which they have acquired—and have paid taxes on—years ago. Thus an equitable land use plan must include a method for determining and providing just compensation for losses borne by injured property owners." (Quoted from Challenge, the official interdepartmental magazine of HUD.)

Under the concept of "control without confiscation," the proper use of the police power of the state becomes difficult to define, as is explained in the following words of Randall W. Scott of the Urban Land Institute, a non-profit research and education organization:

"Another issue involves the concepts of the powers, duties, and responsibilities of the various units of government and primarily, in the interpretation and scope of the general police power. In relation to housing, this has been especially notable with respect to land use controls and planning regulations, which affect what historically had been the nearly sacrosanct privileges associated with private property.

"Since the first Housing Act of 1934, there has been evolving a thrust toward the development of a national housing policy; that of the mandated responsibility of government to provide adequate housing for all persons.

"Further, the formulation of proper national land use acts, and housing programs, must be backed by workable, effective, administrative mechanisms—including adequate funding of planning, regional agencies, and municipal infrastructure facilities. To this must be added efficient enforcement and dis-incentive methodologies."

"Control without confiscation" has led to the creation of a three-way attack on the "nearly sacrosanct privileges associated with private property." This three-pronged attack has consisted of:

1. The establishing of State and Municipal land use laws and regulations (usually with federal assistance is grants-in-aid, revenue sharing, etc.);
2. The creation of Inter-State Compacts on land use, watershed and river basin rights, etc. (always with the cooperation and the sanction of the Federal Administration);
3. The enacting of Federal Land Use Laws by the United States Congress (which are then administered by the Regional Government Councils of the Ten Federal Regions into which the fifty United States have been divided.)

Much has been written, by this editor and by many others, about land control at the State and local levels, and it is not our intention to dwell on this particular phase of the "control without confiscation" scheme in this particular letter. However, that you may understand how important land control is considered to be in relation to the overall "Silent Revolution" which is being waged by the Planners, permit us to refer to one quotation:

Western City Magazine is the "official municipal magazine of the West," and is published by the League of California Cities, a satellite of ACIR and 1313, whose executive director is one Bud Carpenter. The magazine recently published a history of the league, in which Carpenter was quoted as declaring:

"I would say we are going to see through the next ten years—the balance of the 70's and the early 80's—total revolution as far as the structure of government is concerned at the local level. I think this will involve consolidation of some cities. While functional consolidation is a useful and valuable tool if properly applied, legislation should be permissive and not have inherent in it economic sanctions or penalties which force such functional consolidation. Certain types of services lend themselves to operation over large areas without relation to political boundaries. Definitive studies are necessary to determine actual areas and permit flexible operation. Examples should be utility type services, water, mass transportation, service functions requiring large capital outlays, sewage disposal, flood control, air pollution control and regional park and recreation facilities... The heart of the structural revolution will be control of land use. It seems to me you have to recognize a broader interest than just your own community..." (Italics added for emphasis).

Just as Karl Marx emphasized: "The theory of Communism may be summed up in the single phrase, Abolition of private property;" likewise Change Agent Bud Carpenter declares that "The heart of the structural revolution will be control of land use."

ABOUT INTERSTATE COMPACTS

Although the use of interstate compacts has been a favorite weapon of the 1313 Complex since its very establishment, little has been written about this particular vehicle of structural revolution.

In the Constitution of the United States, Article I, Section 10, there is the provision that "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, . . . enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, . . ."

The thirteen original States were considered to be sovereign powers in every respect. As such, they could make treaties with other States and foreign powers, even declare war against other States and foreign powers. But, "in order to form a more perfect Union" it was found to be necessary that the States surrender certain aspects of sovereignty to the Union of States, among those being the conduct of foreign affairs. Therefore, the Founding Fathers agreed that treaties, alliances, confederations, agreements and compacts could no longer be made by any individual State with any foreign power; and any such compacts between States must be made with the consent of the United States Congress.

So far, so good; until about 1934, when the Brain Trusters of the Roosevelt New Deal Administration began to comprehend the value of using Interstate Compacts as a means for weakening the political power of the individual States, and concentrating that power in the Central Government at Washington, D.C. (or in New York City, if one is reckoning in terms of economic and monetary power). At the risk of oversimplification:

An Interstate Compact is, to all intents and purposes, a Treaty made with the consent of Congress, between two or more States of the Union. And a Treaty, according to the Constitution of the United States, "which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land" (Article VI).

In short: When any State enters into an Interstate Compact with one or more other States of the Union that Compact supersedes the State Constitution and any State Laws and Statutes which are in conflict with the Interstate Compact!

Here was an easy way to destroy States Rights: Merely get the States to approve an Interstate Compact, and the governing body created by that Compact is more powerful than the governments of the States who are parties to the Compact!

Here is an entirely new level of Government, below the Federal but above the States, which can be installed without even violating the terms of the Constitution of the United States!

The historical progression, briefly:

1. At first all Interstate Compacts were made with the approval of Congress.
2. Then, as Congress began to abrogate its Constitutionally ordained responsibilities and cede them to the Executive Branch, Interstate Compacts began to be made with the approval of the President instead of the Congress.

3. Finally, Interstate Compacts began to be made by the President without the approval of the States; as happened with the creation of Ten Interstate Regions with Regional Councils whose powers supersede the powers of the State Governments whenever any conflict exists!

The 1313 Complex and ACIR have used the Interstate Compact clause of the Constitution to great advantage in its creation of Metro and Megalopolitan areas which cross State lines, with the authority of the governing bodies of these areas actually superseding the authority of the State Governments involved.

A parallel and presently spotlighted development has been the creation of that series of Interstate River Basin Compacts, which effectively divides the Continental United States into 22 separated and segregated States, each with a governing council whose authority virtually wipes out the authority of State, County and Municipal government!

It should be noted that, as with Marx, as with Senators Jackson and Humphrey, Congressman Udall, etc., as with these Interstate Compacts; the control of land is the key factor!

This is brought out quite tellingly in the tabloid size publication being distributed by the Tri-State Natural Weather Ass'n, Inc., of Mecca Manor, R.D.1, St. Thomas, Pa. 17252, which deals primarily with the Potomac River Basin (Interstate) Compact. We have this reservation in regard to the following: We do not know the authors of this publication and we have not been able to check, personally, the details mentioned. But the pattern is familiar and though we prefer that names be mentioned when such charges are made, the facts as enumerated are probably correct. With that warning, we quote the following from this publication:

In 1956-7 a small number of government planners... were called to the West Executive Office of the White House, sworn to secrecy, and ordered to carry out plans by a college professor in federal employ. No elected person was present. The plans have been, and are being, carried out, regardless of the Party in office. ...

Beginning in 1958, Congress set up three commissions that recommended new bureaus and councils, and adoption of more than 100 laws by 1970 on pollution, environmental control, planning, water and land acquisition for many purposes. ...

In 1959, Congress authorized the Nationwide Outdoor Recreation Review Commission under Laurance Rockefeller, that submitted its recommendations in 1962.

In 1964, Congress authorized the Federal Public Land Law Review Commission to review more than 3,000 land and resources laws. By the commission's handling of persons who now own these lands and mines—at public hearings—it became obvious that the commission was developing policy guidelines in advance, to govern these resources when all private property would be publicly owned—thus implementing the White House plan. The commission made its recommendations in 1970 in the report "One-Third of the Nation's Land" and proposed a Master Land Plan (which was sent to Congress but failed to pass in 1972)..."

(End of quotation)

This Master Land Plan was used to prepare a Land Use Bill (S. 268) which was presented by Senator Henry Jackson and which passed the Senate by a comfortable majority of votes. However, in the House, a slightly different bill—but one also incorporating the principal features of the Master Land Plan—was offered. It came to be known as the Udall Bill and, surprisingly, was "killed" by a negative vote of 9 to 4 in the House Rules Committee.

This supposedly ended Congressional action on any Land Use Bill in this session of Congress.

However, on February 25, 1974, Senator Hubert Humphrey introduced S. 3050: "A bill to promote the general welfare by establishing a balanced national growth and development policy and establishing an Office of Balanced National Growth and Development and certain programs to carry out such policy."

Backed by Senators Humphrey, Javits, McGovern, Abourezk, Cranston, Hart, Hughes, Kennedy, Mathias, Metcalf, Mondale, Nelson, Pell, Randolph, Ribicoff, Stafford and Williams, this is perhaps the most dangerous bill ever introduced with such powerful support; and it will be the subject of our next Newsletter.

HUBERT HUMPHREY AND SENATE BILL 3050

SOCIALISM BY CONSENT?

Hubert Horatio Humphrey, once Vice President of the United States of America, and ever hopeful of gaining the highest—and presently most disgraced—office in the Land seems to be off and running again. At least, he is seeking out strange ways to get under publicity's spotlight quite early in the year.

A weekly newsmagazine portrays the happy warrior resplendent in ringmaster's regalia and mouthing a microphone. An accompanying squib explains:

"After presiding over the Senate for four years as Vice President, Hubert Humphrey took on a real circus, Ringling Brothers—Barnum & Bailey variety. In red sequined coat and black stovepipe hat ('I won't throw it into the ring, and that's the first time I've ever said that'), Senator Humphrey stepped into the spotlight before a packed audience of all ages at the Washington, D.C. armory. By long-standing tradition, the opening was billed as Congressional Night at the Circus. Seldom at a loss for words, Humphrey kept up an authentic ringmaster's patter for half an hour as North Dakota's Senator Quentin Burdick and Alaska Senator Ted Stevens plus 14 Representatives dressed as clowns paraded around the ring on elephants before the regular show. Perhaps noting the lack of donkeys, Senator Henry Jackson was a no-show. Instead, he went to Circus America, the rival big top now playing the capital."

Completing the allusion to "Bread and Circuses," this same Senator Humphrey had, on February 25th, introduced in the Senate a bill—S. 3050—that would set up Federal Agencies to control and regulate the use of all land, water, resources, industry, substance and wealth of the Land. It is a bill designed to take over the United States by political consent and through economic conquest. Its official title:

"S. 3050. A bill to promote the general welfare by establishing a balanced national growth and development policy and establishing an Office of Balanced National Growth and Development and certain programs to carry out such a policy."

The bill was "read twice and referred to the Committee on Government Operations." In presenting the bill, Sen. Humphrey delivered the following speech, which we publish in full while at the same time disagreeing with nearly all of his conclusions, rejecting all of his proposed solutions, and reserving the right to comment as space permits:

THE BALANCED NATIONAL GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1974

Mr. President, I rise today to introduce one of the most important bills that I have ever introduced in this body. This particular piece of legislation has been in the making since early 1972. I first unveiled its general provisions on May 26, 1972 before the Commonwealth Club in San Francisco, Calif. Later that same year on October 11, 1972, I addressed the annual meeting of the American Institute of Planners in Boston where I again discussed the proposal and invited the professional planning community to join me in my efforts to further its development. And just 1 year ago, on February 26, 1973, my proposal for achieving balanced national growth and development was published as a committee print by the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress. Since that date over 3,000 copies of my proposal, in the form of this special Committee Print, have been circulating throughout the Nation.

Also, during this same period, the Congressional Research Service, at my request, prepared two important reports on national growth and development policy which have been published by the Senate. They were: First, Toward a National Growth and Development Policy; Legislative Actions in 1970 and 1971; and, second; Toward a National Growth Policy; Federal and State Developments in 1972.

A third and similar report will soon be published covering 1973 happenings in this regard.

Interest in the subjects of national growth and development, long-range national policy planning, and institutional systems for establishing national goals and priorities, has been steadily growing. But at the State and local levels these past few years action has been substituted for mere interest in these subjects. Concern about rates of growth and about environmental deterioration has moved from the meeting hall into the courts and ballot boxes.

And, of course, on the national level, Americans have these past few years been hit by a series of worsening crises, including confidence-in-Government, runaway inflation, and fuel to food crises.

We can continue along the path of haphazard growth and frequent environmental, economic and social crises, but following that path surely means national disaster. Or, we can create the machinery and processes that are required to develop policies, incentives and programs for balanced, rational coordinated patterns of national growth. In that way, we can guide and control our future destiny rather than let events or fate dictate it.

Continued unbalanced growth—without goals and guiding policies—will stimulate thousands, even millions, of uncoordinated individual personal and community responses to the aggravated problems of everyday living. And in an increasingly technologically complex and interdependent society, these individual decisions affect the lives of many other people and communities, and indeed the health and welfare of the Nation. For example, the decision of many millions of Americans to purchase an automobile—or two, or three—over the past several decades not only has contributed to increased air pollution, time-losses in traffic, accidents, high road construction and maintenance costs, and today's fuel and energy crisis, but it has also shaped the actual physical structure of our Nation's cities and contributed to a major migration of millions of people to those cities from our Nation's farms and open countryside.

Now, as Americans are forced to experience personally automobile fuel shortages, many of them are learning how dominant their dependency on such a conveyance really is. Some are now wishing they had not moved from the inner-city to the suburb. Others are asking why more has not been done to date to provide for other means of transport such as mass transit. And still others are wondering how such a crisis could have hit a nation so fast and hard when it only imports about 17 percent of its total energy needs. In short, they are now being given an object lesson in the value of long-range planning and the need to anticipate possible changes in the future availability of resources.

I believe that a balanced national growth and development policy framework can and must be developed to maximize the positive impact of public policy on the "quality of life" of all Americans.

The questions that we face, given the expected social and economic contours of our Nation in the year 2000, are awesome when we look at the inadequacies of our current policymaking process.

The United States is in one sense the "oldest" country in the world — we were the "first" nation to enter the 20th century. Our society has lived the longest with

- High technology;
- High mobility;
- High urbanization; and
- High affluence.

Despite this historic advantage, we seem to have done the least among nations in developing the policymaking and planning processes required by our people and institutions to adjust to these new realities.

Most European nations have instituted policies of balanced national growth and development during the last 20 years. These policies, incorporating population distribution goals, land use objectives, economic growth targets, and the like, have met with some success already, despite their relatively recent initiations.

During this same period in our country, anything that even sounded like national policy planning was looked upon with suspicion by a large and vocal segment of our population.

But in recent years, some important progress has been made in making at least a start toward achieving a balanced national growth and development policy. For example, in Title IX of the Agriculture Act of 1970, Congress and the President committed themselves to a national policy of "sound balance between rural and urban America." Congress proclaimed that it "considers this balance so essential to the peace, prosperity and welfare of all our citizens that the highest priority must be given to the revitalization and development of rural areas."

And shortly following the declaration of that new national policy, Congress enacted the Rural Development Act of 1972, which provides the programs for implementing that policy.

A similar commitment to the balanced growth and development of rural and urban America was echoed in Title VII of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1970.

However, while these policy changes and other specific development programs are important, good and necessary for America, they are far from sufficient to help us cope with the long-term balanced growth and development problems which we face. The problems we must address in America include:

- Natural resource availability and use;
- Population growth and distribution;
- Regional distribution of national economic growth;
- Protection of our air, water, and land;
- Fuel and energy shortages;
- Balanced and efficient transportation systems;
- Sound use of land; and
- More equitable distribution of income and opportunity; and many others.

What we do—or fail to do—today clearly commits and fixes future patterns of life in this Nation as well as on this planet Earth. We can no longer afford the luxury of approaching the future of our Nation—and its relationship to the rest of the world—haphazardly.

A few years back, we learned almost overnight that the world we live in had shrunk to such a size that men on one side of the earth could completely destroy men on the opposite side within 30 minutes through new and devastating means of modern warfare. More recently, we have come to realize that even the natural resources of this earth and of our Nation, are indeed finite, and in many cases threatened with total depletion. Although the population of the United States today comprises only 6 per cent of the world's population, our Nation consumes over 40 per cent of the world's resources.

The creation of a desirable human environment requires that people be provided with the opportunity to develop life-styles and surroundings of their own choice, consistent with environmental integrity and the economic management of natural resources. In their intensifying debate, the advocates of "no growth" and "continuous growth" of our economy system are attempting to force Americans today to make a simple choice of accepting one or the other of these two positions. However, I believe they will accept neither. Rather, I believe the American people, as they look anew at what kind of future they are now creating for themselves and future generations, will begin to move more toward the goal of human relationships that is based upon the Greek idea of "balance," of moderation, of "nothing too much."

Growth is seen by many as the opposite of stability, yet both are desired. Novelty is prized, but man is overwhelmed by too much change. Technology is both feared and indispensable. Liberty versus tranquility (sic), defense versus welfare, present versus future, are dichotomous terms that have expressed American goals since the beginning of our Republic.

...Policy planning and development is almost nonexistent in our government today. Anyone who doubts this, let him reflect upon the crises we are faced with today concerning fuels and energy, housing, our cities and rural areas, the environment, land use, transportation; and the list goes on.

...I believe the bill I am introducing today, entitled the "Balanced National Growth and Development Act of 1974" is designed to provide the necessary mechanisms and processes which will make it possible for both the executive and legislative branches of our Federal Government to develop long-range national policies in the future. This bill provides for the establishment of an Office of Balanced National Growth and Development within the Office of the President to:

"Develop specific national policies relating to future population settlement and distribution patterns, economic growth, environmental protection, income distribution, energy and fuels, transportation, education, health care, food and fiber production, employment, housing, recreation and cultural opportunities, communications, land use, welfare, technology assessment and transfer, and monetary and fiscal policy."

This new office also would provide the means to develop these individual national policies in such a way as to reflect the appropriate interrelationships that obviously exist between and among such policies.

This new office would tie together and coordinate the work of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Office of Management and Budget and the Environmental Quality Council. This office would be empowered to bring about more uniform and workable Federal assistance programs, to streamline the Federal delivery system now involving hundreds of categorical programs that so bewilder and confuse many a State and local official. This bill also would establish new uniform planning requirements for Federal grants-in-aid, and transfers to the new Office the comprehensive planning assistance program authorized by section 701 of the Housing Act and administered by HUD.

The bill would create a national system of multi-State regional planning and development commissions, involving both Governors and State legislatures, to help link up and facilitate proper coordination among Federal, State, and local units of governments. This nationwide regional commission structure would be tied directly to the new Office within the Office of the President, rather than to a department.

A federally funded system of national, multi-State, and State citizen councils also would be authorized by this legislation to provide for more direct citizen participation in the development and review of national policy.

In addition, this bill would create a joint Congressional Committee on Balanced Growth and Development. This committee would be supported by a new Congressional Office of Policy and Planning within the Library of Congress, staffed by professionals and experts on national policy matters.

New requirements pertaining to the location impact of Federal facilities, activities, and procurement are specified in the bill. We are the only developed nation in the world that continues to ignore this critical question in our private and public decisionmaking.

This bill creates a new national research institution to monitor, measure, and forecast developments and happenings in all the major sciences—soft and hard—and to report its findings, with possible alternatives that might be pursued.

It also provides for more detailed and continuous analysis of population and demographic trends, within the U.S. Bureau of the Census.

And, finally, it provides for the development of annual reports by the executive branch detailing "where we are," and "whither we are tending" in our pursuit of developing and implementing national policies. That report will be made available to and assessed by Congress and the people of this Nation. It will become a national working document for the entire nation to reflect its concerns and desires concerning national goals, priorities, and policies.

I have asked many individuals and groups throughout the country for comments and recommendations concerning this legislative proposal. In due course, all of these suggestions will be carefully scrutinized, and changes in my proposal will undoubtedly be made. I welcome any and all additional ideas and comments. I also would like to take this opportunity to urge my Senate colleagues to join me in sponsoring this legislation.

In these times of amazing proximity between people and nations, resulting from revolutions in communication and transportation technology;

In this age of unbelievably rapid change in virtually every facet of man's existence, from the way he constructs his office buildings to the way his children perceive "right and wrong";

We need a way for all the people of this Nation to participate in shaping their own future.

Only through an effective process of the kind I am recommending here today can we as a nation anticipate and direct change and consequently minimize what Alvin Toffler has aptly named "future shock."

For more than 2 years my staff and I have been working on this proposal. I consider it to be the single most important piece of legislation of my 25 years of public service. I believe this legislation goes a long way toward providing the institutional arrangement necessary to the development of a continually evolving balanced national growth and development policy in the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of my bill be printed in the (Congressional) Record following the completion of my remarks....

(There being no objection, the bill and other material were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows, and beginning on page S2106 of the Congressional Record for February 25, 1974).

(End of Senator Humphrey's presentation)

* * * * *

We can well believe that it took Senator Humphrey and his staff, and his host of Socialist chieftains, scholars and advisers, at least two years and probably more, to come up with one omnibus bill that would accomplish the absolute and complete socialization of this Nation by political consent of the Congress, to be followed by economic conquest of the Nation and its people by an appointed staff of change agents in a new Office of Balanced Growth and Development!

In our next letter we shall analyze what the Senator calls "the most important piece of legislation in my 25 years of public service" and what we believe to be the most dangerous piece of legislation ever introduced in the United States Senate.

"TO ESTABLISH THE UNITED SOCIALIST STATES OF AMERICA"

THE BALANCED NATIONAL GROWTH AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1974

"This is a bill designed to own, control and regulate your land, water, wealth, resources, industries and substance," declared a critic who had read and studied the entire bill. "Its intent," he continued, "is to reduce you to a number, to buy, sell, and live in economic bondage and slavery. It is a gross and flagrant violation of the Bill of Rights and the republican form of government clearly set forth in the Constitution of the United States of America. This is a 'Central Government Bill,' or Union of Soviet Socialist Republics style of legislation. It is a bill designed to take over America by political consent and economic conquest. It is National and World Regional Government! This bill must never become Law in this Country."

The bill in question was Senate Bill 3050, introduced by Senator Hubert Humphrey on February 25, 1974, read twice and then referred to the Senate Committee on Government Operations for further study and future action. Although introduced as the work of Humphrey and staff, with advice from many friends and associates, the bill also carried the endorsement of a think tank called the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. This WWICS think tank provided a "working group" which apparently wrote the bill for Senator Humphrey, and which included such government officials:

- Russel Train, chairman of the President's Council on Environmental Quality;
 - Alvin Elm, Staff Director of the Council on Environmental Quality;
 - David Beckler of the Office of Science and Technology;
 - Henry Eschwege, Director of the Resources and Economics Division of the Comptroller General's Office;
 - George Jaszi, Director of the Bureau of Economic Analysis, Department of Commerce;
 - John Sawhill of the Office of Management and Budget;
 - Harry Blaney, Member of the Planning and Coordination Staff, Department of State;
- Also assisting Senator Humphrey were Archibald C. Rogers, First Vice President of the American Institute of Architects (AIA also strongly supported the "Land Use Policy and Planning Assistance Act of 1973," which failed to become law); and James E. Thornton, now of the Senate Agriculture Committee Staff who, according to Senator Humphrey, "spent much of his off-hour time working on this proposal and related matters for me."

It seems that Humphrey's bill also bears the endorsement of other liberal Senators, including Javits, McGovern, Abourezk, Hart, Cranston, Hughes, Kennedy, Mathias, Metcalf, Mondale, Nelson, Pell, Randolph, Ribicoff, Stafford and Williams.

We list these individuals together with their titles or positions in government, in order to show that this bill, S. 3050, is not merely a fly-by-night idea being proposed for personal purposes by an ambitious Senator. Rather, it is a plan which has been carefully and painstakingly worked out by Fabian scholars intent upon socializing the country; and it carries the blessing of that bureaucratic hierarchy headed by the Office of Management and Budget, which The New York Times calls "that other Presidency;" the one that has been unmarred and unscarred by Watergate and IRS revelations, and which is really running the Country while the President-in-title is under a cloud of suspicion.

This is an "Omnibus Bill" that, if enacted into law, would indeed bring total "Socialism by Political Consent" to this Nation. S. 3050 would establish a Bureaucratic Dictatorship within the White House Executive Office, one which would be comparable to the Presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the USSR!

In confirmation of this charge, here is the actual wording, as it appears in the bill:

TITLE II, Sec. 201. (a) There is established in the Executive Office of the President an Office of Balanced National Growth and Development (hereinafter referred to as the "Office"). There shall be in the Office a Council on Balanced National Growth and Development (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"). The Council shall be composed of the Attorney General; the Secretaries of Housing and Urban Development, Agriculture, Health, Education, and Welfare, Interior, Commerce, Defense, Labor, Transportation, Treasury; and the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; the Director of the Foundation on the American Future; the Chairman of the National Citizens Council on the American Future; the Chairman of the Domestic Council; the Director of the Office of Management and Budget; the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers; the Chairman of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations; the Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity; the Administrator of the Federal Energy Office; the Administrator of the General Services Administration; the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency; the Chairman of the Environmental Quality Council; the Chairmen of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Atomic Energy Commission; and the Director and Deputy Director of the Office.

(b) The Director and Deputy Director of the Office shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate....

There are two new agencies in this list that do not yet exist and which are to be established if and when this bill becomes law.

One such new agency is the Foundation on the American Future, which is provided for in Title X, Sec. 1001, of S. 3050:

There is established an independent agency of the Federal Government to be known as the Foundation on the American Future (hereinafter in this title referred to as the Foundation)....

Sec. 1003 (a) The purpose of the Foundation shall be to conduct projects, studies, investigations, and forecasts to determine the interactions, social benefits and costs, rates of national change, and present and likely future patterns of important scientific, social, and economic programs and activities; to evaluate the effects of national development policy, or its lack, on these interactions, social benefits and costs, rates of national change, and patterns; and to determine and formulate alternative future national growth patterns, and development of policy recommendations which can bring them into existence.

Sec. 1004 (a) The Foundation shall develop and review and update an agenda and budget to carry out the purposes of the Foundation in consultation with the Office, the Congressional Office, the Citizens Council, the National Science Foundation, the Office of Technology Assessment, and the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations outlining research and forecasts which are being and will be undertaken by the Foundation....

This proposed Foundation would be a 19-member Think Tank, or Council of Elders, or Supreme Soviet, which would actually plan America's future politically, economically, socially, culturally, and demographically!

cally! It would be composed of nine members appointed by the President, two members appointed by the Vice President, two members appointed by the Speaker of the House, and the other members would be the Director of the Office, the Director of the Congressional Office, the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the Chairman of the National Citizens Council, and the Chairman of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. This group would make the plans, which would then be executed by "The Office."

In reference to the above: Listed is a new "Congressional Office." This is actually a joint committee made up of the chairmen or designated members of twelve Senate committees and twelve House committees; and the chief purpose of this "Congressional Office" would be to:

review the implementation of all legislation relating to national policy, planning and development, growth, and national goals and priorities, conduct studies in areas which will promote the purpose of this Act, and request the Foundation on the American Future, the Agency for Population and Demographic Analysis through the Secretary of Commerce, the National Citizens Council on the American Future, and the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations to make such studies as will promote the purposes of this Act;...

Another new group mentioned above is the Citizens Council on the American Future. This is a council actually composed of selected citizens, as contrasted with bureaucrats who make up the other offices, commissions and councils. But the duties of this citizens council are minimal and one gains the impression that this council has been suggested merely to make people feel that the citizens of the Nation have, themselves, a part in all this planning and dictating (although this is not really true; the appointed officials really run the whole show; elected officials have delegated all power to appointed officials according to the terms of this bill.) Actually, the chief duty of this Citizens Council seems to consist of assisting in the setting up of Multi-State, Regional, State and Community Citizens Councils "for the purpose of advising any Regional Planning and Development Commission...with respect to multi-State or State planning and development."

In other words, this National Citizens Council on the American Future is established purely for propaganda purposes, to act as an opinion-molder and to induce citizen-approval of whatever program "the Office" may be carrying out at the National, Regional, Multi-State, State or Community level.

So much for the organization of this Socialist Monster. What it intends to do to our Country and to its citizens, is the information which should be publicized throughout the land.

The following is reprinted from the official text of Senate Bill 3050 as it was read and referred to the Senate Committee on Government Operations. Please read carefully.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

Sec. 103. To promote the general welfare and to improve the quality of life and standard of living for all our Nation's citizens by properly guiding and applying the resources of the Federal Government and of our entire society in strengthening the economic and social health of all areas of the Nation; more adequately protect the physical environment; effect maximum efficiency in the allocation, utilization, and conservation of resources; and achieve a more balanced distribution of urban and rural population, consistent with the commitment made by Congress in title IX of the Agricultural Act of 1970 as amended, and the Rural Development Act of 1972, the Congress declares that the Federal Government, consistent with the responsibilities of State and local governments and the private sector, must implement the responsibility acknowledged in title VII of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1970 for the development of a national growth policy which shall incorporate social, economic, environmental, and other factors in order to accomplish, within the framework of balanced economic growth the following national goals:

- (1) expansion of the Employment Act of 1946 to provide, in addition to the goal of reasonably full employment, the goal of income distribution that will assure an income adequate to provide acceptable levels of nutrition, health, education, housing, and cultural opportunity for all our Nation's population.
- (2) a level of environmental quality, as provided in the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, as amended, which safeguards the health and tranquility of our Nation's residents wherever they choose to live and which prevents and avoids further pollution, and preserves our Nation's and the World's valuable natural resources;
- (3) a distribution of population, through the development of appropriate policies based on the findings and recommendations of the Office of Balanced National Growth and Development in the Office of the President, the Foundation on the American Future, the National Citizens' Council on America's Future, and the Joint Congressional Committee on Balanced Natural Growth and Development, as established in this Act, and requirements of balanced economic growth;
- (4) implementation of the balanced national growth and development policy through a national regional development system of multi-State regional commissions based upon comprehensive State multi-jurisdictional, county, metropolitan, and nonmetropolitan planning and development districts;

- (5) coordinated land-use planning, regulation, and development among governments in a region to avoid duplication of facilities, to facilitate balanced distribution of housing relative to employment locations, and to permit freedom of choice of residential location to citizens of all races, colors, creeds, and income status;
- (6) development of an integrated and balanced national transportation system, utilizing advanced technology and planning, and incorporating rate structures consistent with the goals of balanced economic growth;
- (7) development of a comprehensive and integrated national communications system to facilitate the dissemination of information conducive to an informed public and one which is designed to meet requirements of improved education, health care, the arts and sciences, private enterprise, government, and of the employment of a more balanced national growth pattern in the United States;
- (8) motivation of private enterprise to participate to its fullest possible extent in activities that will further the national growth policies that are developed in pursuance of these goals;
- (9) formulation of a national fuels and energy policy based upon sound conservation and use principles, which will provide adequate supplies of energy, at reasonable prices, in all regions of the country, with minimal environmental impact, while providing consumers with reasonable choices among alternative forms of energy, and the encouragement and promotion of the development of a viable domestic energy industry, consistent with the goals of balanced economic growth;
- (10) formulation of a national food and fiber policy which will insure a fair economic return to agricultural producers which will insure adequate supplies for the American people and for those of the world who depend upon our Nation for agricultural exports and which will lend stability to large sectors of our economy engaged in related or dependent activities and to our international trade relations;
- (11) provision of a decent home in a suitable environment for all citizens, through implementation and updating of the national housing goals adopted in title XVI of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968;
- (12) development of planned communities of optimum size from the viewpoint of costs of public services, spatial relationships between economic functions and population densities to minimize daily transportation needs and energy use and facilitate movement of people and goods, and the application of advanced technology in the planning and development of expansion of existing and new communities to promote the goals of this Act;
- (13) provision of adequate health care facilities and services in all regions of the country and the availability of such facilities and services to people of all income levels at costs within their economic means;

- (14) provision of adequate manpower training and educational programs and institutions at all levels in all regions of the country to allow both young and old people the opportunity to develop their capacities to the fullest degree of their capabilities and willingness;
- (15) provision of adequate recreation and cultural facilities to serve people of all income levels and residents of all regions of the country; and
- (16) utilization of advance technology, systems planning, and computer sciences to provide energy, communications, and generally increased productive capacity to enable a growing population to enjoy a higher quality of life and rising standard of living.

* * * * *

The foregoing should adequately accomplish the total and complete socialization of the Nation and its citizens, if properly planned, programmed, budgeted and systematically effectuated. Therefore, to accomplish the sixteen purposes enumerated in the above quotation from Senate Bill 3050, there is to be established this "Office of Balanced National Growth and Development" and its "Council" which includes the heads of all important executive departments and agencies (including the chairman of the Federal Reserve System, it should be especially noted). This "Office" shall, and again we quote directly from the Bill:

Sec. 202. (a) The Office shall provide for--

- (1) the policy direction and coordination of all Federal and federally assisted programs for planning and land use development, programs designed to improve human resources, programs designed to allocate resources, and programs designed to develop, allocate, or conserve energy resources...the effectuation of such policy direction and coordination, and a system of standard definitions and common sources of data for such activities;...
- (5) the evaluation of effects of present and proposed Federal tax incentives and State and local government tax policies...
- (6) the evaluation of all present and proposed Federal credit programs;...
- (9) the assignment of goals, plans, and programs to departments and agencies generally;
- (10) in coordination with the Office of Management and Budget, the development of three-, five-, and ten-year planned program projections;...
- (14) the establishment of multi-State regional offices of the Office in order to obtain regional and State implementation and input regarding national goals and policies...

(18) the establishment of a national coordinated multi-jurisdictional comprehensive planning process, including but not limited to the following activities...

(B) facilitating the use of common information and data bases for regional, State and local comprehensive and functional planning, and for this purpose the Office shall collect, analyze, and disseminate through the multi-State regional planning and development commissions information, data, and projections concerning economic trends and location patterns; population characteristics, migration; direction and extent of urban and rural growth and change; employment and unemployment; social, educational, housing, health, recreational, cultural and welfare needs, government organization patterns and financial resources available within the States and political subdivisions thereof; and any other subjects deemed essential to the planning process;...

...The Office shall, as soon as practicable, prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to implement its functions under this section and the other provisions of this Act.

(End of direct quotations from S. 3050)

* * * * *

Note especially how the provisions of this Bill fit exactly into the "New Federalism" pattern already installed; how the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, with its computerized data-bank record-keeping, is specified; how the Office of Management and Budget is to assist in preparing three-, five-, and ten-year plans (all of which are unconstitutional); and how this entire dictatorial operation is to be installed through the Ten Federal Regions that already are in existence and functioning. The term "multi-State" as used in S. 3050, refers to present and future "Interstate Compacts," all of which are to be managed and governed via this new "Growth and Development Office."

We have given you the highlights, the most dangerous provisions, of this "Humphrey Bill." In all, S. 3050 is an 83-page document which should die in Committee, and which must never become Law.

We implore you to proclaim the truth regarding this bill throughout the Land while there still is time to speak and act!

SHAKE-UP IN THE VETERANS ADMINISTRATION: THE DIALECTICS OF A CREATED CRISIS

CONFUSION COMPOUNDED?

The reports did not jibe; the newspapers differed in their treatment of the story. The New York Times carried a headline on its front page announcing that "Head of the VA Reported Ousted," and declaring that "the White House, bowing to the vocal demands of Congress and veterans lobbies, had informed Donald E. Johnson, the embattled head of the Veterans Administration, that he had been dismissed." Later on in this same story, however, Gerald L. Warren, the deputy White House press secretary was "asked whether Mr. Johnson had been dismissed, he replied: 'No, definitely not.' Asked if Mr. Johnson had resigned, he said, 'I don't believe so'."

The Associated Press confused the issue further by denying that Johnson had been fired, as reported by the New York Times; and denied that Johnson had resigned, as also reported by the New York Times; and reported that Johnson will resign, quoting the subject as saying: "I expect to submit my formal resignation to the President in the near future." Administrator Johnson had enjoyed "five years of dedicated service" to veterans and was proud of his record of accomplishments during that period, and would leave his post with regrets.

A follow-up story on a televised newscast differed in detail from those published by NYT and AP, in that Administrator Johnson had not been fired, neither had he resigned. Rather, he would remain on the job until the latter part of June, and then he would submit his formal resignation "for the good of the services."

The confusing controversy is of general interest to most Americans and to all taxpayers, because VA programs affect over twenty million veterans, and cost over fifteen billion dollars a year to operate. So, a shake-up of any kind in the VA is of interest to just about every family in the country, by blood relations, or money connections, or both.

However, it is not the intention of this Report to weigh the pros and cons of how the Veterans Administration is being managed, or mismanaged. It is generally agreed, we believe, that any program being managed by any Federal Administration or Federal Corporation would be better managed for less money, if the management were placed in other hands.

The purpose of this Report, however, is to use this VA controversy as a method of demonstrating how Hegelian dialectics are used to make once independent people cry out for the bondages of socialism.

Before this VA controversy broke into the news, we received a report from a correspondent who was much concerned with the fact that the Twentieth Century Fund—a tax-exempt foundation—had decided to conduct an investigation of the Veterans Administration. We inquired further, and the following is a summation of reports which we received from various correspondents, none of whom shall be identified for reasons that need not be stated at this time:

The Fabian Socialists have destroyed the Nation's religious, educational and governmental institutions through what we have termed a Total Managed Global Society.

Their successes in these endeavors have probably exceeded their own expectations, and if their strawman Richard M. Nixon can continue to occupy the headlines with talk of Watergate and impeachment, the Socialists will undoubtedly have the Nation totally socialized in time for Mr. Nelson A. Rockefeller to enter the scene in 1976.

Yet, they seem to fear that there remains one bastion of patriotic strength remaining in the United States, one which they do not have fully under their control: the war veterans service organizations. Although the Fabians have successfully permeated the Veterans Administration by appointing a socialist-oriented dupe who hides behind the fact that he is a past national commander of the American Legion (he and the Veterans Administration have totally succumbed to the suzerainty of Mr. Roy Ash and his Office of Management and Budget), the veterans service organizations are awakening to the threat that the Nation they believed they were defending against external enemies, now is being taken over by the enemy from within.

Recently, Ray Soden, Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, created a Combined Veterans Service Organizations Association to meet the challenge. The Association, composed of the national commanders of 17 independent veterans organizations meet monthly to assess the threat of such influences as the "New Federalism," the new Comprehensive Health Insurance Plan (CHIP), the OMB, invasion of the Veterans Administration, etc.

Although the issues are clouded and confused by what may be deliberate bad reporting on the part of the news media, it appears that the impending ouster of Administrator Johnson of the VA, is a first success on the part of Ray Soden's Association of Veterans Organizations, because the Associated Press did include in its report:

"Ray R. Soden, national commander-in-chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, expressed pleasure at Johnson's departure plans, saying, 'We are hopeful that this decision will spark a new direction in the VA. Johnson's resignation should assist the veterans of this country and will hopefully improve the services across the nation'."

Now, because of opposition to their plans for controlling VA and veterans, the Fabian Socialists called out their reserves and went to work through the Twentieth Century Fund to complete the now threatened take-over of VA and veterans.

So much for the general background which was needed for our study of Hegelian dialectics as applied to today's Quiet Revolution. Now it is needful that we recall some of the facts concerning that Fabian financial fountain known as the Twentieth Century Fund:

"In 1932 a seemingly impromptu but in fact carefully researched program for advancing social revolution by peaceful means was called The New Deal," wrote Rose Martin in Fabian Freeway, adding that "both the name and the program were first unveiled in a book by Stuart Chase entitled A New Deal. Never very widely circulated and soon conveniently buried, it was meant for a select coterie of prospective public servants—and for the eyes of one man in particular, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. For all practical purposes this volume soon replaced the moderate 1932 platform of the Democratic Party, which pledged thrift and a curb on Federal spending.

"Appearing in a critical election year, its publication, like that of other books by Stuart Chase, was financed by the Twentieth Century Fund, an allegedly educational foundation set up for the purposes of 'public service' by Edward A. Filene of Boston."

Current information is sometimes hard to obtain and verify, but Dan Smoot had occasion to refer to the Twentieth Century Fund in his book The Invisible Government, and he noted that of its 20 officers and trustees at that time, 13 were members of the Council on Foreign Relations. Here is the excerpt from Smoot's book:

"Twentieth Century Fund, Inc.; 41 East 70th Street, New York 3, New York, had assets totaling $17,522,441.00 on December 31, 1958. Officers and Trustees: Adolf A. Berle, Jr. (CFR); Francis Biddle (CFR); August Hecksher (CFR); Hans Christian Sonne (CFR); Morris B. Abram; Arthur F. Burns (CFR); Erwin D. Canham (CFR); Evans Clark (CFR); Benjamin V. Cohen (CFR); Wallace K. Harrison (CFR); David E. Lilienthal (CFR); Robert S. Lynd; James G. McDonald (CFR); J. Robert Oppenheimer (CFR); Edmund Orgill; James H. Rowe, Jr.; Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. (CFR); Harman W. Steinkraus; Charles P. Taft; W.W. Waymack."

So much for past events. The Twentieth Century Fund has not changed its spots; it remains a principal financial angel for Fabian programs, it remains dominated in its leadership by members of the CFR, and when there is a subtle task of opinion molding to be accomplished to promote the "quiet revolution," Twentieth Century has the tax-exempt funds to finance same.

So, on or about February 1, 1974 (the press release is not dated), there was issued the following:

"NEWS from the
TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND
41 East 70 Street. New York, N.Y. 10021.
FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

"Veterans programs, which cost taxpayers about $13 billion a year, will be studied and reported on by an independent eleven-member Task Force, the Twentieth Century Fund announced today.

"Robert Finch, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and later Councillor to President Nixon, is serving as chairman. The other members include veterans, former military leaders, administrators and others familiar with veterans programs.

"The study comes at a time when increasing concern is being expressed about the adequacy of benefits for Vietnam veterans. Meanwhile, veterans of World War II are approaching retirement age, so that costs of their benefits are expected to increase dramatically in the next few years.

"The Task Force will review the extensive network of services for veterans in order to recommend reform, which may entail elimination of some services and suggestions for improvement in others. The Task Force also will examine the politics behind the various veterans programs and evaluate them in the context of social programs that serve the population at large.

"In addition to Finch, the Task Force members are: Robert Ball, former Social Security commissioner; Robert E. Deluhery, who served as a platoon leader in Vietnam and is now executive officer of the Illinois Veterans Commission; William Driver, former Administrator of the Veterans Administration; Gloria Emerson, author and former New York Times correspondent in Vietnam; Michael S. March, former senior staff member of the Bureau of the Budget and technical advisor to the Bradley Commission on Veterans' Pensions; William A. Enemark, who retired in 1972 after a military career capped by more than four years as inspector general of the U.S. Army; Nathaniel Jones, general counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Carl M. A. McCarden who served as a military advisor to the U.S. Ambassador in Saigon and is currently commissioner of the Mayor's Office for Veteran Action of New York City; Harry C. McPherson, Jr., former special counsel to President Johnson; and Dr. Alberta Karker, clinical professor of community health at the University of California School of Public Health, Berkeley.

"Michael Taussig, professor of economics at Rutgers University, is rapporteur for the Task Force. He is also preparing a factual background paper of veterans benefits which will accompany the Task Force report."

(End of press release)

Regarding these Task Force members: Robert Finch needs no introduction; Michael S. March is a former senior staff member of OMB and now serves as a "change agent" for PPBS; William Driver is the former VA Administrator who initiated the PPBS program in the Veterans Administration under

Bureau of the Budget Bulletin No. 68-9, in 1967. This entire study is a "stacked deck" for the purpose of applying Hegelian dialectical principals and "wear away veterans service organization's reaction against what they are rapidly recognizing as a Fabian Socialist takeover of the Nation," (direct quotation from a background paper which we received from a correspondent.)

There may be some who do not understand our reference to Hegel. Therefore, this brief biographical sketch:

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1833) was a German philosopher and formulator of an idealistic philosophy that had an enormous influence on Marx, Lenin, Hitler, and the founders of the Fabian Society. His philosophical system is complicated and difficult to explain. "Fundamentally," says the Columbia Encyclopedia, "He (Hegel) believed in an enveloping Absolute, the world soul seen through contemplation of dialectical knowledge. In this dialectic, one concept (thesis) inevitably yokes its opposite (antithesis), and the two interact to form a new concept (synthesis), which in turn becomes a new thesis. Thus the idea of being evokes the idea of not being, and the two necessarily produce the synthesis, becoming... Thus cultures conflict, and the higher is triumphant... Hegelian dialectic appealed strongly to the Socialists and was developed into Marxian dialectical materialism."

Now, let us note how this Hegelian formula is used by Rapporteur Michael K. Taussig of Rutgers and the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Policies Toward Veterans (a Rapporteur is "one who reports," or, in this case, one who prepares the reports that will be signed and forwarded to higher authorities for appropriate action, by the eleven-member Task Force.)

Upon becoming Rapporteur for the group, Taussig prepared an agenda for the first meeting, together with a discussion paper suggesting what should be taken up at subsequent meetings of the Task Force. Under date of February 6, 1974, Taussig wrote, in part:

"... It seems to me that the Task Force must come to some kind of rough consensus about the justification for special policies towards veterans before it can usefully deal with the specifics of the various veterans' programs. And, similarly, an understanding of the political facts of life concerning the legislation and administration of veterans' programs is an obvious prerequisite for useful discussion of alternatives to present veterans' policies...."

"A good topic for the second Task Force meeting would seem to be the readjustment (education, job training and rehabilitation) benefits provided to Vietnam-era veterans. . .

"...the Task Force might then step back in its third meeting to consider veterans' programs in the broader perspective of their relationship to overall social welfare policies in the United States. . .

"For its fourth meeting, I suggest the Task Force invite representatives from the major veterans' organizations and possibly also from other interested groups to state their views on the current state of veterans' policies. . .

"The fifth meeting of the Task Force could then usefully concentrate on specific broad, substantive issues in the various veterans' programs. . .: pensions, compensation, medical services and others.)

"A sixth and final meeting would then be necessary to work out the consensus position of the Task Force on all the issues discussed in previous meetings."

(end of quotation)

And now we come to Rapporteur Taussig's use of the Hegelian formula in order to induce the Task Force members to adopt a preconceived consensus. Taussig does not use the terms suggested by Hegel: Instead of Thesis, he presents One Polar Position; in place of Antithesis, Taussig explains The Other Polar Position; and for Hegel's Synthesis, Taussig refers to Intermediate Positions. All other elements of the formula remain the same; only the names have been changed to protect the innocent who might surreptitiously secure and read a copy of Taussig's Rapport.

Please understand that we are not concerned with the "right or wrong" of the following, nor are we concerned with its degree of importance as a national issue. We quote the following from Taussig's Rapport because it is an excellent example of the use of the Hegelian principal to mold opinions and to convert a preconceived plan into a consensus recommendation. We quote:

A RATIONALE FOR SPECIAL VETERANS' PROGRAMS

I suggest that the first substantive topic for discussion by the Task Force be the rationale for special veterans' programs. To help structure this discussion, I very briefly outline some alternative rationales below. . .

A. ONE POLAR POSITION

An extreme position, one championed by most of the veterans' organizations, is that honorable military service by an individual during wartime (or since 1955, in reality) automatically confers upon him certain special rights above those enjoyed by ordinary citizens. . . this view holds in effect that veterans constitute a special, separate class. Given this premise, it follows that, in principle, government benefits provided to veterans should be clearly distinct and, of course, superior to those provided to non-veterans. . .

B. THE OTHER POLAR POSITION

The opposite polar position on policies towards veterans denies that veterans constitute a special, superior class of citizens and regards all veterans' programs as essentially a raid on the Treasury by a powerful and selfish interest group. Adherents of this view hold that military service during wartime is a duty for every citizen and that society makes no implied commitment to veterans beyond the explicit terms of service. Government cash benefits and services to veterans would, in this view, be confined strictly to social welfare programs available to veterans and nonveterans on an equal basis, with need for such benefits the sole criterion for eligibility. . .

C. INTERMEDIATE POSITION

Between the two polar positions outlined above lie a large number of more or less distinct intermediate views on the rationale for special veterans' programs. The common thread linking all these intermediate views is that military service during wartime does involve unusual and meritorious sacrifice by individuals and that such sacrifice should be recognized and compensated to a reasonable degree. Thus this position denies the validity of both polar positions in that, first, it refuses to acknowledge that veterans are a special, superior class. . . and second, it does not accept the premise that the problems of veterans can and should be treated on a par with the problems of non-veterans. . . (end of quotation)

As we said, this is presented merely as a lesson in the use of Hegelian dialectics. However, the final synthesis probably will be a recommendation to eliminate all veterans' hospitals and integrate them into a chain of Federal hospitals operated for the benefit of all "welfare" cases; a part of the upcoming National Health Care Program. . .

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

----- Part One -----

"THE TREND IS TOWARD SOCIALISM," declared George D. Aiken of Vermont, dean of United States Senators, and ready to retire and bequeath his mantle of moderate conservatism to a younger and more optimistic Green Mountaineer. Upon deciding to leave the Washington scene, Senator Aiken called in reporters and gave them an interview and a written press release, hoping thus not to be misquoted, we presume. He said nothing startling, nothing new, nothing that will add importantly to anyone's fund of general knowledge. But he did state with both brevity and clarity what might be considered to be the consensus of that group once called "the silent majority," the conservatives who mean well but don't quite understand what's been happening to their Nation.

Because his words do seem to summarize such a consensus, his statement is a good starting point for this series of letters. The publication of this interview implies neither agreement nor disagreement with the Senator's opinions; rather, the interview serves as an excellent launching pad for our own flight into political orbit:

Washington—A steady and perhaps accelerating trend to the left in the United States and throughout the world is seen by Sen. George D. Aiken of Vermont, who is retiring this year after the longest service of any Republican in the Senate today. Only Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) served longer than Aiken, now 81, who took his seat Jan. 10, 1941.

"The trend is toward what we used to call socialism," Aiken said in an interview the other day. "Communities are more and more dependent on the states, and the states are more and more dependent on the federal government. Government support for education, hospitals and other social purposes has gone up tenfold, I suppose, in the last 10 years. The number of local, state and federal agencies has increased greatly. In Vermont, two-thirds of all the railroad trackage is publicly owned, either by the Canadian government or the state itself.

"The railroads are operated by a private concern which pays a percentage of income to the state. That is a combination of government ownership and private ownership, and it has worked pretty well so far.

"The cost of programs for feeding people, including the food stamp program, that are chargeable to the Department of Agriculture is about 10 times what it was five years ago.

"Paradoxically, under a supposedly conservative Republican Administration the leftward swing has been most rapid in the last five years. The people and the Congress seem to be for it. People are kicking about paying for these programs, but they are demanding to have them.

"Look what has happened in the case of revenue sharing, which Congress enacted in cooperation with the executive branch. The idea was that revenue sharing would make it possible to cut local taxes, but that is not what has happened. Instead, revenue sharing funds have been used for things that might not have been attainable otherwise, and in most places taxes have not been cut.

"My home town—Putney—got $15,000 in revenue sharing funds in the first quarter of last year. Out of that, $1,000 was voted for caring for indigent dogs—and that brought in dogs from the surrounding towns. Some people want to use funds for indoor skating rinks and indoor swimming pools.

"People want more things now than they ever did before, and they want them without delay. Partly for that reason, the federal government is playing an ever greater part in our lives. In 1965 federal grants to state and local governments were a little over $10 billion. Just 10 years later these grants for 1975 are anticipated to be nearly $52 billion. Yet even with this 500% increase in federal contributions, state and local indebtedness, as well as local taxes, has continued to increase.

"In all the states, or in the overwhelming majority of them, there are land-use laws. Not many years ago that would have been regarded as a decided infringement on private rights. It would have been unbelievable that you couldn't toss waste in a river."

Aiken has been a slightly left-of-center Republican senator, something of a maverick, who is more famous for his practical wisdom than for the bills he has introduced. As the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he has helped carry on the tradition of bipartisanship in foreign policy that flourished under his famous predecessor in that role, the late Sen. Arthur H. Vandenberg (R-Mich.).

In the clash between the hawks and doves during the Vietnam war, Aiken declared himself an owl. When the country was hopelessly mired in Vietnam, he made one of the greatest suggestions ever heard in Congress. He suggested that Congress pass a joint resolution declaring that the United States had won the war and that President Johnson bring the troops home in triumph. Unfortunately for Lyndon Johnson, he did not see the wisdom of it.

"They used to say," the senator recalled in an interview, "that when 35% of the income went into taxes of all kinds, you were a socialist country. Well, I guess we have reached that. It used to be every man for himself, with no restrictions—and no benefits. Devil take the hindmost. That served a purpose in the early days, I suppose. But things have changed. It's a world trend. The things we are doing today would have been called socialism when I first came down here. But there is this paradox—the whole universe is a paradox—that the movement toward socialism has not reduced individual freedom. The individual is almost freer now than he ever was before. Thirty years ago people would not have dared to get together and knock hell out of the government, as they do now. Some people get away with things today that they probably would have been hanged for a generation or two ago. I am thinking of this fellow Daniel Ellsberg. In practically no other country could he have gotten away with what he did here.

"And people are living better now than they ever did before. They never had the educational opportunities, the health benefits, the standard of living, the clothes to wear. If my mother got one new dress a year, she was lucky, and they were gingham dresses, at that. I went barefoot beginning the first of May until it got too cold.

"We should pay more attention to local government," Aiken admonished. "That is where real democracy starts. It don't start from Washington."

(end of interview)

Senator Aiken confuses freedom with license and fails to realize that people "get away with more today" not because there is more liberty now, but rather because there is less respect for the law and a reluctance on the part of officials to enforce the law and on the part of judges (and even juries) to judge righteous judgment. Senator Aiken should know, too, that true happiness can never be counted in terms of material possessions, educational opportunities or health benefits. And, while real democracy may start with local government, an octogenarian citizen of the Green Mountain State should be among the first to realize that true democracy should never go beyond the local government, because when it gets bigger than the town meeting stage, democracy is the worst form of government ever attempted.

Tom Anderson, in his capacity as columnist for The American Way Features, was asked if he thought we should help promote democracy in other countries. His published answer should be forced reading for all politicians in this country. He wrote:

"As someone has said: 'Democracy is the worst of all possible forms of government.' Democracy is mob rule. Perhaps the best form of government is the government a people understand and like. If a people want tribal government, they should have it. People who want to be ruled should be ruled. The great Thomas Jefferson said: 'The best government is the least government.' And some people say: 'The best government is a dictatorship tempered by assassination.'

"The word 'democracy' is derived from the Greek words demos (the people) and kratos (rule). Aristotle defined democracy as "... A state where the freemen and the poor, being in the majority, are invested with the power of the state...every department of government being alike open to all...the people are the majority, and what they vote is law...."

"So, obviously, pure democracy is mob rule. Our forefathers did not bequeath us a democracy, thank Heaven. Benjamin Franklin said: 'We have given you a Republic, if you can keep it.'" (end of quotation)

We noted, at the beginning of this discourse, that Senator Aiken's statement might serve as a consensus of pseudo-conservative thinking about today's society and today's

American government. If this be true, then the composite American citizenry has strayed so far from the original concepts of American government, that we all need a refresher course, before it is too late to reconstruct, and even too late to remember what was lost.

"Revolution by scientific technic is above morality. It makes no distinction between means that are legal and means that are illegal." So commented the ex-New Dealer Gareth Garrett in a monograph entitled "The Revolution Was." His reference was to the second stage of this Quiet Revolution (the first stage occurred during the Woodrow Wilson Administration) and the total disregard of the Constitution and the Laws of the Land when they stood in the way of the revolutionists. Garrett cited the case where President Franklin Delano Roosevelt wanted a new "Authority" established and wrote in a letter to a member of the House Ways and Means Committee: "I hope your committee will not permit doubt as to Constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation."

Ours is the third stage of the Revolution. The first—under Wilson—accomplished the task of securing unlimited finances for a Central Government. The second—under FDR—accomplished the task of securing unlimited political power for that Central Government. The third stage of the Revolution aims to achieve the centralization of all power—economic, political, social, monetary—within the Executive Branch of that Central Government.

Over a century ago Abraham Lincoln, who deduced from objective evidence the blueprint of a political plot that was to culminate in a War Between the States; gave the following classic analogy:

"When we see a lot of framed timbers, different portions of which we know have been gotten out at different times and places, and by different workmen... and when we see those timbers joined together, and see that they exactly make the frame of a house or a mill, all the tenons and mortices exactly fitting, and all the lengths and proportions of the different pieces exactly adapted to their respective places, and not a piece too many or too few... in such a case we find it impossible not to believe that... all understood one another from the beginning, and all worked upon a common plan or draft, drawn up before the first blow was struck."

In applying this analogy to our present plot, it is necessary that we look back, at least briefly, to that time before the very first blow could have been struck.

We are indebted to Nelson A. Pryor, Representative of Berlin, New Hampshire, for recalling to our mind the historical fact that Americans have traditionally viewed government in one of three ways, which are based upon three different theories:

1. The Compact Theory;
2. The Continental Theory; and
3. The International, or World Theory.

The Compact Theory originated with the landing of the Pilgrims at an unexpected place in the New World, and therefore with no patent to honor or obey. The circumstance was most unusual, truly an Act of God:

When the English Pilgrims set sail, their historian and leader William Bradford wrote: "They knew they were pilgrimes, and looked not on those things, but lift up their eyes to the heavens, their dearest countrie, and quieted their spirits."

The Mayflower's destination was Virginia, but when her master hove to on the ninth of November in the year of our Lord 1620, he knew he was hundreds of miles to the north of the intended place of landing.

Before leaving the Old World, the Pilgrims had obtained a patent that gave them power to establish a government, in Virginia. But that patent had no standing outside the limits of Virginia. This left them with no form of government of any kind whatsoever, and some of the Londoners on the ship may have felt as did the Israelites in their new promised land when "there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges 17:6). Or, as Governor Bradford put it, some felt that "they would use their own libertie, for none had power to command them." Feeling that only chaos and disaster could result from the lack of rules for the common good, the Pilgrim leaders determined that no one should leave the ship until some basis of government had been decided upon.

One can imagine the scene as they gathered in the cabin of the Mayflower: William Brewster, spiritual leader of the Plymouth brethren; John Carver, soon to become the first governor of the colony; William Bradford, the chronicler; Miles Standish, the soldier; John Alden, the cooper; all wise and God-fearing men who knew the covenants by which their independent congregations had been governed in England and in their years of exile in Holland. And these covenants they took as their model as they drew up what came to be known as the Mayflower Compact; this likewise becoming the basis of the "Compact Theory" of government which was much in the minds and the hearts of the Founding Fathers when they assembled a century-and-a-half later to establish a more detailed Compact.

There are three basic tenets comprising the Compact Theory as originally enunciated in the Mayflower Compact:

1. The Absolute Sovereignty of God. There is no recognition of innate sovereignty in any man-created institution such as a State, Nation, United Nations, or any other man-made organization.
2. The delegation of that sovereignty to the individual man, who is created in the image of God and made to have dominion over all the earth; so that sovereignty rests in man, not in his institutions.
3. The transfer of a necessary portion of that sovereignty to a body politic for purposes of mutual protection and "a better ordering and preservation and furtherance" of desired objectives.

Note how these three basic tenets are included as we quote portions (in modern English) of the original Mayflower Compact:

"In the name of God, Amen. We, whose names are underwritten...having undertaken, for the glory of God, and advancement of the Christian faith, and honor of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia, do by these presents, solemnly and mutually in the presence of God, and of one another, covenant and combine ourselves together into a civil body politic, for our better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by virtue hereof to enact, constitute, and frame such just and equal laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good of the colony, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience."

First God, then the individual made in God's image, then the Compact made to further the ends of man and his God. This is the Compact Theory, as opposed to and contrasted with the Continental Theory and the International Theory, which we shall discuss in later letters.

As more and more people came to settle in the New World, and as Colonies expanded and become Thirteen in all, this Compact Theory formed the basis from which various and independent constitutions were written and governments formed. Then, when the Internationalist Theory, as proclaimed by George III and his Parliament, began to conflict with the Compact Theory held by the Colonists and revolution became inevitable, the Compact Theory was restated and expounded finally in the Declaration of Independence, especially in the last section of that document which contained the Resolution attributed to Richard Henry Lee and quoted by Thomas Jefferson:

"... these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States; ...and...as Free and Independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude treaties, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which Independent States may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour."

Note the same formula that was established with the Mayflower Compact: With reliance on God, these individuals as representatives of their free and independent Colonies, met to sign a Declaration which was as a compact between the Thirteen Free and Independent States to which sovereignty had been transferred by the individuals, who in turn had received that sovereignty as a delegation, or endowment, from their Creator.

Thus, each of the Thirteen States was a Sovereign Nation unto itself; and because of the war emergency, an alliance was struck. That alliance is known as the Articles of Confederation, and Article II of that document sustains the Compact Theory:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, Jurisdiction and Right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress Assembled."

Within a few years it became apparent that more of that precious sovereignty must be transferred to a Central Government if the States were to maintain their freedom and independence. So, a Constitutional Convention was convened.

And here was staged a great debate: The Compact Theory versus The Continental Theory. Out of that debate came the Constitution of the United States of America, a Document now being ignored because of the third, The International Theory, a tenet of which is called Regional Government.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

. Part Two

GROWTH OF THE COMPACT THEORY

Since it became necessary to refer to words and works spoken or written in the past, it also seemed fitting and appropriate that we quote directly from the better authors. We preface each quotation with the date, and append each with the quotation's source:

December 16, 1773:—

"...the progress of events served to fix attention more and more on Boston; and its patriots could see in expressions from other colonies that they were relied on to act with firmness and efficiency...."

"Business in town was generally suspended. The inhabitants in the morning flocked to 'The Old South Meeting House,' still standing. They were joined by people from the country for twenty miles around. The gathering consisted of nearly seven thousand,—merchants, yeomen, gentlemen,—respectable for their rank, and venerable for their age and character...."

"About six o'clock.... Samuel Adams then said: 'This meeting can do nothing more to save the country.' A war-whoop was now sounded at the door, which was answered from the galleries. The shouting became tremendous...."

"As the party from whom rose the war-whoop passed the church, numbers naturally followed on; and the throng went directly to Griffin's Wharf, now Liverpool, at the foot of Purchase Street off which were moored the three vessels which contained the tea. A resolute band had guarded them day and night. John Hancock was one of the guard this evening. The party in disguise,—probably his friend Joseph Warren was among them,—whooping like Indians, went on board the vessels, and, warning their officers and those of the customhouse to keep out of the way, unladen the hatches, hoisted the chests of tea on deck, cut them open, and hove the tea overboard...."

"The local exultation was extreme. 'You cannot imagine,' Samuel Adams wrote, 'the height of joy that sparkes the eyes and animates the countenances as well as the hearts of all we meet on this occasion.' 'This,' John Adams said, 'is the most magnificent movement of all. There is a dignity, a majesty, a sublimity, in this last effort of the patriots, that I greatly admire.' 'We, John Scollay, one of the selectmen and an actor, wrote, 'do console ourselves that we have acted constitutionally,—namely, did no more than was necessary, under the circumstances, to defeat the design of landing the teas.

"The exultation was scarcely less outside of Massachusetts... The Tea Act had the effect to make this question of taxation a living issue.... The popular leaders now sought to give direction to a great movement or to take advantage of a happy disposition in the public mind and extend the organization of committees of correspondence.... The popular party, in their several municipalities, proceeded independently in forming committees...."

March 31, 1774:—

"In retaliation against the Boston Tea Party, Parliament passed a series of statutes known as the Intolerable Acts. The most oppressive of these was the Boston Port Act, March 31, 1774, which closed the port of Boston to all shipping until reparations had been made to the East India Company.

"...By the spring of 1774, it had become clear that the problems of individual colonies were really the problems of all. United action by the colonies was necessary. One writer to the Boston Evening Post said: 'It is now time for the colonies to have a Grand Congress to complete the system for the American Independent Commonwealth, as it is so evident that no other plan will secure the rights of this people from rapacious and plotting tyrants.' One of the first bodies to propose the calling of a continental congress was a town meeting in Providence, Rhode Island, on May 17, 1774. Virginia was the first colony to make such a proposal." (From "Sources of Our Liberties," American Bar Foundation, 1959).

September 5, 1774:—

"Out of protest meetings held in state houses, courthouses, and stores at country crossroads came a demand for a congress to meet at Philadelphia in the fall of the year, there 'to consult upon the present unhappy State of the Colonies. . . .'

"On September 5, 1774, fifty-five delegates representing all the colonies except Georgia opened the First Continental Congress in Carpenters' Hall. . . . Even more important than the declarations and resolutions was the Continental Association, by which the delegates agreed that their constituents would import no more British goods, deny themselves all luxuries, and encourage their own manufactures until the mother country should redress their grievances. In this way they forged into a national weapon coercive measures that had been so far only local and unorganized, and took a long step on the road to independence." (from "By These Words," Rand McNally, 1954.)

April 19, 1775:—

"In mid-April the British military governor of Massachusetts heard that the colonists had collected a supply of muskets and gunpowder at Concord. On the evening of the eighteenth he ordered a detachment of regulars to march out from Boston and seize the supplies. And that was the night when Paul Revere, anxiously watching the belfry of the Old North Church, saw a single light—'one if by land, and two if by sea'—and leaped on his horse to warn the countryside that the British were marching. The next day, at Lexington and Concord, men and boys. . . died. . . and exacted a toll from His Majesty's redcoats far heavier than they themselves paid." (from "By These Words," Rand McNally, 1954).

May 10, 1775:—

"So the members of the Continental Congress met again—at Philadelphia, as they had planned. . . . In the ears of the delegates rang the words of Patrick Henry, uttered when the news of Lexington reached Virginia:

"... If we wish to be free. . . we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left to us! They tell us, sir, that we are weak, unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger?

Will it be the next week, or next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak if we make proper use of means which the God of Nature hath placed in our power, . . . Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations; and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. . . .

"It is vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun! the next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!" (Excerpted from George Bancroft's "History of the United States," 1898).

June 24, 1775:—

"The (Virginia) Bill of Rights was drafted by George Mason, a well-to-do planter of Fairfax County, Virginia. . . . Mason came from retirement to fill a vacancy in the Virginia Convention caused by George Washington's appointment as commander in chief of the Continental Army. . . . A committee of twenty-eight delegates was appointed to draft the declaration and constitution. It was headed by Archibald Cary, and included Patrick Henry, Edmund Randolph, James Madison, and Mason. Mason assumed the leadership in drafting the documents." (from "Sources of Our Liberties").

VIRGINIA BILL OF RIGHTS

(This is your editor writing; we have ceased from quotations for a time).

In this series of letters, we have referred to three traditional views of government that have been held by Americans: the Compact Theory, the Continental Theory, and the International Theory. And it is the Virginia Bill of Rights which provides us with a clear and complete explanation of what the Compact Theory meant to the Americans of that period in history.

When the thirteen Colonies decided that they must become independent and sovereign States, there came the necessity of writing and adopting State Constitutions. Virginia's document was in three parts: there was the Bill of Rights; then came a preamble to the Constitution, written by Thomas Jefferson and the model which Jefferson expanded and presented to the Continental Congress as his initial draft of the Declaration of Independence; and finally there was the Constitution itself.

The Virginia Bill of Rights exerted a direct influence on similar bills of rights adopted by six other States; while the States that did not preface their new Constitutions with a bill of rights, were careful to have the principles enunciated therein within the body of the fundamental law of the land. Even more important: The Virginia Bill of Rights was the forerunner of the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and the Federal Constitution would never have been ratified if those ten amendments—now known as the Bill of Rights—had not been appended thereto.

Since the Virginia Bill of Rights is such a clear and complete statement of the Compact Theory which guided the majority of the Founders of our Nation, it seems appropriate that the most important provisions of that document be published again in this letter, lest we forget the civic foundations upon which our Republic was built:

CONSTITUTION OF VIRGINIA

June 12, 1776

BILL OF RIGHTS

A declaration of rights made by the representatives of the good people of Virginia, assembled in full and free convention; which rights do pertain to them and their posterity, as the basis and foundation of government.

SECTION I. That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

SEC. 2. That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them.

SEC. 3. That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various models and forms of government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety, and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and that, when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal.

SEC. 4. That no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services; which, not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge to be hereditary.

SEC. 5. That the legislative and executive powers of the State should be separate and distinct from the judiciary; and that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression, by feeling and participating the burdens of the people, they should, at fixed periods, be reduced to a private station, return into that body from which they were originally taken, and the vacancies be supplied by frequent, certain, and regular elections, in which all, or any part of the former members, to be again eligible, or ineligible, as the laws shall direct.

SEC. 6. That elections of members to serve as representatives of the people, in assembly, ought to be free; and that all men, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community, have the right of suffrage and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses, without their own consent, or that of their representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not, in like manner, assembled, for the public good.

SEC. 7. That all power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by any authority, without consent of the representatives of the people, is injurious to their rights, and ought not to be exercised.

SEC. 8. That in all capital or criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of twelve men of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty; nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.

SEC. 9. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment be inflicted.

SEC. 10. That general warrants, whereby an officer or messenger may be commanded to search suspected places without evidence of a fact committed, or to seize any person or persons not named, or whose offence is not particularly described and supported by evidence, are grievous and oppressive, and ought not to be granted.

SEC. 11. That in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is preferable to any other, and ought to be held sacred.

SEC. 12. That the freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.

SEC. 13. That a well-regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free State; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty; and that in all cases the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power.

SEC. 14. That the people have a right to uniform government; and, therefore, that no government separate from, or independent of the government of Virginia, ought to be erected or established within the limits thereof.

SEC. 15. That no free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

SEC. 16. That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity towards each other.

The Virginia Bill of Rights was adopted by the House of Burgesses meeting at Richmond on June 12, 1776. Five days earlier at Philadelphia where the Continental Congress was in session, Richard Henry Lee—of the Virginia delegation—introduced a resolution declaring that the Colonies ought to announce to the world that they were acting as free and independent States. This led to the selection of a committee, headed by Virginian Thomas Jefferson, which would prepare a Declaration of Independence; and that historic document was signed and published on July 4, 1776.

However, more than a year before this—on May 31, 1775, the people of Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, published a set of resolves wherein they declared that: "We conceive that all Laws and Commissions confirmed by, or derived from the Authority of the King or Parliament, are annulled and vacated, and the former civil Constitution of these Colonies for the present wholly suspended." The resolves declared that all legislative and executive powers were vested in the provincial congress of each Colony "under the Direction of the Great Continental Congress."

The Mecklenburg Resolves did not declare complete independence from Great Britain, but they did set the stage for the Declaration of Independence which was to follow.

Next there was needed, in the legal sense, Articles of Confederation. On the same day that a committee was appointed to frame the Declaration of Independence, another committee was appointed to "prepare and digest the form of a confederation to be entered into between these colonies." The Articles of Confederation which resulted was agreed to by Congress on November 15, 1777, was not approved by all the States until March 1, 1781, but Congress used it as a guide before that time.

By the Articles of Confederation the States established a Federal Legislature, but no Executive Department and no Federal Judiciary; all sovereignty was retained by the people and the States. This was the Compact Theory in practice. The Continental Theory, on the other hand, demanded that all sovereignty be surrendered to the Central Government, with an all-powerful Chief Executive and Judiciary.

Conflict was inevitable, and compromise essential. The Constitution with its Bill of Rights was such a compromise, creating a Republic—if we could keep it.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

----- Part Three -----

COMPACT VERSUS CONSTITUTION

Land use and land control legislation was a matter of utmost importance to that first generation of citizens of the United States of America. Those Americans who founded our Nation were land oriented men. The very watchword of the Sons of Liberty (Samuel Adams of Boston Tea Party fame was their leader) was "Liberty and Property." In all local elections only property owners could vote. As one historian has pointed out:

"... colonial suffrage legislation... was designed to confine the vote to desirable elements of the population. It was drafted in the conviction that efficiency, honesty, and harmony in government rested, in the last analysis, upon a salutary degree of homogeneity of interests, opinions, and fundamental loyalties—religious, ethnic, and class. Confining the vote in colony elections to those who were free, white, twenty-one, native-born Protestant males who were the owners of property, especially real property, appeared to be the best guarantee of the stability of the commonwealth. The drafters of colonial suffrage legislation, to whatever extent they attempted to formulate ideas, seem to have thought that undue disparity of interest, opinion and loyalty among electors would weaken and distract government" (Chilton Williamson in American Suffrage from Property to Democracy, 1760-1860, Princeton University Press, 1960. The author favors democracy over property and writes disparagingly of colonial principles; we disagree with his perspective, which is hardly Christian American).

James Madison of Virginia also held the opinion that "the freeholders of the Country would be the safest depositories of Republican liberty." He wrote that "in future times a great majority of the people will not only be without landed, but any other sort of property. These will either combine under the influence of their common situation; in which case the rights of property & the public liberty, will not be secure in their hands; or which is more probable, they will become the tools of opulence & ambition, in which case there will be equal danger on another side." (Quoted from Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, a Government paper edited by Charles C. Tansill. G.P.O., 1927).

Madison feared that when propertyless men were permitted to vote, they would become the tools of "opulence and ambition," so that a new "aristocracy" would rule, using the masses as its tools and keeping the favor of the masses by promising propertyless people goodies from the public storehouse. In this, Madison was a true prophet.

Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania was even more emphatic: "Give the votes to people who have no property, and they will sell them to the rich who will be able to buy them... Children do not vote. Why? Because they want prudence, because they have no will of their own. The ignorant & the dependent can be as little trusted with the public interest." (Also quoted from above-described paper edited by Charles C. Tansill).

However, there was little controversy at the time because nine-tenths of all the free men residing in the thirteen free and independent States were land-owners; and the federal government at that time had no wealth or property in land which it might give away in subsidies, benefits, welfare or relief payments. In short, land belonged to the people or to the States, and the federal government had no "land policy" because, up to that time, it needed no land policy.

But the situation changed—and the change might have been drastic—after the signing of the Treaty of Paris on Sept. 3, 1783. That treaty not only brought an official end to the War for Independence; it also gave to the United States clear title to all the lands extending inland to the Mississippi. In the beginning these lands were claimed as extensions of the thirteen original States. But the States ceded the territory to the general government, the Treaty of Paris relinquished all previous claims which the British Crown held to the land. Thus, the United States became holder and caretaker of a vast empire of incredible diversity and fabulous untapped wealth. Some kind of government had to be established for this vast Northwest Territory.

Here was the great temptation: The United States Government could have followed the example of the countries of Europe when the empires and states of that continent were being formed. The federal government might have declared itself the absolute governor of that great area, might have divided it into so many federal districts, or regions (as our federal government is doing today) and there would never have been any States other than the original thirteen; all the rest might have been retained as a Federal Commonwealth, with all political power centered in the National Capitol and the districts or regions being administered from regional capitols with no State or local governments to interfere or intercede. All political power would be concentrated at the top and extend downward, rather than being concentrated at the county or the township level, and proceeding upward. In other words, ours could have become but a copy of the English form of government, against which we had rebelled. Thankfully, the Compact Theory of government, as opposed to the Continental and International Theories, was still the ideal of a majority of the Founding Fathers; and the Continental Congress rendered its greatest service to posterity when it enacted the Northwest Ordinance on July 13, 1787.

The Northwest Ordinance opened up this vast Northwest Territory to orderly and progressive settlement, encouraged self-government (as opposed to government from the federal capitol) and anticipated the creation of new "free and independent States," with republican forms of government and no slavery. The pattern was simple, and it worked:

1. Congress would create a "territory," appointing a governor and judges who would govern temporarily, until
2. the population had reached 5,000 in the territory. Then the people would have a legislature of two chambers, electing the lower house themselves. Finally,
3. When the territory attained 60,000 people, it would be made into a full-fledged State and a new Star would be added to the field in Old Glory.

Thus did the Continental Congress utilize the Compact Theory for the solution of its "colonial problem," and this pattern was followed generally as the Nation expanded from the original thirteen to the present fifty States.

Also enduringly important: The Northwest Ordinance contained the first Bill of Rights to be enacted by the federal government of the United States. Furthermore—and this is one of the facts which Supreme Courts have continually ignored—the wording of Article III of the Ordinance clearly favored the establishment of Christian schools, in order that Christian civil government might be strengthened. Here is the precise language:

"ARTICLE III. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged...."

"Schools were thus assumed to be the channels of religion and morality as well as of knowledge," commented Rousas J. Rushdoony in his invaluable This Independent Republic (The Craig Press, 1964.) "Education was not statist," Dr. Rushdoony emphasized, "it was local and Christian, and it was the foundation of Christian civil society. The importance of the Northwest Ordinance has not been generally recognized...in that it was not merely the action of the Federation Congress but, after the passing of the First Amendment, the First Federal Congress re-enacted the Northwest Ordinance."

THEN, THE CONSTITUTION

By the Articles of Confederation the States had entered into "a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their Liberties, and their mutual and general welfare." But so few powers were given to the central government that it could not long endure in peace, mainly because there was no way of keeping peace between the States themselves; trade wars began to develop between the Northern States. In January, 1786, the Virginia House of Burgesses proposed a meeting of commissioners from the States "to take into consideration the trade of the United States; to examine the relative situations and trade of the said States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony...."

Such a convention was called, met at Annapolis in September, 1786; but only five States sent representatives: New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Virginia. The convention was a complete failure insofar as bettering trade relations was concerned. Before it dissolved, however, at the instigation of James Madison of Virginia and Alexander Hamilton of New York, the Annapolis Convention passed a resolution proposing:

“...the appointment of Commissioners, to meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May next, to take into consideration the situation of the United States, to devise such further provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union; and to report such an Act for that purpose to the United States in Congress assembled, as when agreed to, by them, and afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State, will effectually provide for the same.”

Copies of this resolution were sent to the States and to the Continental Congress. Congress approved of the plan and in February, 1787, sent its recommendation to the States that they appoint delegates to meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May. Congress stated, however, that the Convention was to meet “for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation” and not for the purpose of writing a new Constitution. In short, the Congress wanted an improved Compact, not a new document based on the Continental Theory that was then being championed by Alexander Hamilton, who wanted a strong central government which could interfere with matters within the States and conduct all affairs foreign and domestic, commercial and financial, industrial and agricultural, with full and final authority, superior to the State in all matters great or small.

On the second Monday in May, 1787, not enough delegates for a quorum had arrived in Philadelphia. By the 25th seven States were represented and the Convention was organized. George Washington's name was placed in nomination to preside over the body, and he was unanimously elected President of the Convention.

But that's where the unanimity ended. By the time all the delegates had arrived (the State of Rhode Island did not name any delegates) there were four separate plans and seemingly irreconcilable differences in those four sets of plans.

First to be introduced was the Virginia Plan, presented by Edmund Randolph. It called for some fifteen different changes in the Articles of Confederation. In direct opposition was the New Jersey Plan, designed to protect the interests of the small States. Then there was the plan presented by Chas.

Pinckney of South Carolina, and the ultra-federalist plan of Alexander Hamilton.

With James Madison championing the Compact Theory, Alexander Hamilton proclaiming the superior merits of the Continental Theory, Benjamin Franklin attempting to be a peacemaker, and George Washington trying to maintain order, the first days must have been hectic indeed. But, on July 24 a Committee of Details was appointed to prepare a draft Constitution, which could serve as the basis for further discussion and amendment. This committee used the Virginia Plan as the basic outline for its draft and Alexander Hamilton, finding himself outvoted and outnumbered, submitted and went along with the majority, later was instrumental in getting States to ratify the Constitution through his most valuable contributions to The Federalist Papers.

Once agreement on all essential points had been reached by the Convention, a Committee of Style and Arrangement was appointed to prepare the final draft of the Constitution. These five men: James Madison of Virginia, Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, William Samuel Johnson of Connecticut, Rufus King of Massachusetts and Alexander Hamilton of New York, were responsible for the actual style and wording of the Constitution, which was presented to the Convention on September 12, 1787; was approved and ordered engrossed on Sept. 15; was published on Sept. 17; but did not become binding upon the States until June 21, 1788, when New Hampshire became the ninth State to ratify. The Constitution was ordered by Congress to be put into operation on September 13, 1788.

The following, for its historical interest in an age when history is being rewritten to suit the planned future, a la Orwell's 1984, is quoted from By These Words, by Paul M. Angle:

“Two days later a clerk read the engrossed copy. When he had finished, the venerable Franklin took the floor and asked his colleague from Pennsylvania, James Wilson, to read a few remarks that he had reduced to writing. The Constitution, Franklin admitted, was far from perfect, but on the whole it was the best frame of government that could be devised under the circumstances. ‘I cannot help expressing a wish,’ he concluded, ‘that every member of the Convention, who may still have objections to it, would with me, on this occasion, doubt a little of his own infallibility, and, to make manifest our unanimity, put his name to this instrument.’”

"There was argument over the form in which the members should subscribe their names, and in the end only thirty-nine of the fifty-five delegates who had attended the convention signed. Of the other sixteen, some were absent, and several ranged themselves in opposition. . . .

"The Constitution would go into effect, so Article VII read, when it should be ratified by nine of the thirteen states. A spirited campaign began immediately. Strong opposition developed. Many resented the undoubted fact that the delegates had exceeded their authority; others believed that the new government went too far in the direction of centralized power. Nevertheless the dangers confronting the country were real and pressing, and there might not be time for perfecting an ideal system. Reasoning thus, the state conventions began to pass ordinances of ratification—Delaware, the first, on December 7, 1787, Pennsylvania five days later, New Jersey on December 18, New Hampshire, the ninth state to ratify, acted on June 21, 1788.

"Technically, the Constitution would now go into effect, yet everybody knew that without New York and Virginia the new government would fail. In the Old Dominion James Madison pleaded for ratification, George Washington came to his support (but Patrick Henry opposed and George Mason insisted that a Bill of Rights had to be added before he would approve the Constitution—Ed.). In New York, Alexander Hamilton, through his contributions to the series of newspaper articles that we know as The Federalist, and by the force of his arguments to the state convention, produced the margin of victory, and the state fell into line with Virginia. A few weeks later the old Congress chose New York City as the seat of the new government, and specified that the first Congress to be elected under the Constitution would convene on March 4, 1789."

One of the first acts of that First Congress was the framing and passage of a Bill of Rights, an action that had been promised to reluctant State delegations if they would ratify the Constitution. The Bill of Rights was adopted, and ratified, as the first Ten Amendments to the Constitution; and it was Patrick Henry of Virginia, who already had earned the sobriquet "father of the Constitution" who also introduced and shepherded the Bill of Rights through Congress. In introducing the amendments, he spoke words that may seem prophetically timely in 1974, with a "President's council" having caused so much havoc in the Nation, with the legislative branch taking upon itself judicial powers as impeachment proceedings are contemplated, and with a general fear of too much power having been concentrated in the Federal Government, to the hurt of the States and the citizens thereof. Patrick Henry told the First Congress, in part:

"There have been objections of various kinds made against the Constitution. Some were levelled against its structure because the President was without a council; because the Senate, which is a legislative body, had judicial powers in trials on impeachments; and because the powers of that body were compounded in other respects, in a manner that did not correspond with a particular theory; because it grants more power than is supposed to be necessary for every good purpose, and controls the ordinary powers of the State Governments. I know some respectable characters who opposed this Government on these grounds; but I believe that the great mass of the people who opposed it, disliked it because it did not contain effectual provisions against the encroachments on particular rights, and those safeguards which they have been long accustomed to have interposed between them and the magistrate who exercises the sovereign power; nor ought we to consider them safe, while a great number of our fellow-citizens think these securities necessary."

It was the addition of these ten amendments which insured that the Constitution was in the tradition of the Compact Theory of government which had begun with the Mayflower Compact. In fact, in ratifying the Constitution, the States of Massachusetts, Virginia and New Hampshire declared they were "entering a Compact." John Jay, first Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Chisholm vs. Georgia (1793) referred to the Constitution as "a Compact between the States."

It has been violations to the Bill of Rights and disregard of the Compact Theory, with its careful division and separation of powers which has brought our Nation to the brink of destruction. It is our belief that the importance of the fundamental principles upon which our frame of government was based, must be rediscovered and understood. That is why this series of letters is being published.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

-----Part Four-----

IMPLIED, IMPLICIT & INHERENT CONSTITUTIONAL INNOVATIONS

When the thirty-nine delegates signed the engrossed Constitution of the United States, they felt they had done the best possible job under the circumstances, they had given the people a Republic, if they could keep it, and they signed the remarkable document with pride, and prayer. But they did not sign on behalf of the people of the United States; they signed as representatives of the free and independent States and then submitted the proposed Constitution to the citizens of those States—not to the citizens of the United States—for ratification. The difference may seem trivial in 1974, but it was a vital difference in 1788.

Time and brainwash has caused us to lose the significance of those first three words in the Preamble to the Constitution: "We, the People." James Madison, at the ratification Convention of Virginia, stated that: "We, the People" mentioned in the Preamble were "not the people as composing one great body," but rather "the people composing thirteen sovereignties." The union was seen as pluralistic, not national. Historian James Bryce, in The American

=====

CORRECTION, PLEASE:— In Part Three of this series, an inexcusable error occurred. We wrote that Patrick Henry is called the "father of the Constitution" and that it was he who introduced the Bill of Rights in the First Congress in 1789. Such a statement is, of course, patently and historically ridiculous, and due to extreme carelessness in editing. It was James Madison whose memory we maligned. Patrick Henry did not support the Constitution at any time; he feared that it gave too much power to the federal government at the expense of State governments, even after the Bill of Rights was added.

Our apologies to the memories of both James Madison and Patrick Henry, and to the intelligence of all readers of this series.

Commonwealth, published in 1894, gave the following example of how pluralism, as opposed to nationalism, was extant at that time:

"A few years ago, the American Protestant Episcopal Church was occupied at its triennial Convention in revising its liturgy. It was thought desirable to introduce among the short sentence prayers a prayer for the whole people; and an eminent New England divine proposed the words 'O Lord, bless our nation.' Accepted one afternoon on the spur of the moment, the sentence was brought up next day for reconsideration, when so many objections were raised by the laity to the word 'nation' as importing too definite a recognition of national unity, that it was dropped, and instead there were adopted the words 'O Lord, bless these United States'."

This pluralistic sense was so commonly recognized that, up to the outbreak of the War Between the States, the standard usage was "The United States are." It was after the Civil War that people began to be taught to say, "The United States is." In the beginning Congress was also a plural noun; even Alexander Hamilton, who favored the Continental Theory of government over the Compact Theory which the Constitution implied, stated that "Congress are," admitting that "We, the People" meant the people of thirteen States, not the people of one Nation. The change began with the changes brought about by the Civil War. As historians Samuel Eliot Morison and Henry Steele Commager admitted in The Growth of the American Republic, after the War the "Union had been preserved, but only in the narrow sense of territorial integrity had the old Union been restored. The original Federal Union had disappeared and in its place arose a strong national state, federal chiefly in administrative machinery."

But, getting back to the foundations of the confederation of republics; The States, individually, accepted the Constitution under the following terms of power:

1. Enumerated powers (those listed in the Constitution);
2. Residual powers (those reserved to the States and to the people thereof); and
3. Concurrent powers (those shared by the States and the federal government.

In summation: Our Founding Fathers—and this includes Alexander Hamilton—agreed that the government they set up was a “Compact Between the States,” that it was based on the people of the individual States and not on the people of the whole union, and that it was the States that created and put into effect the central government. To further protect the people, the States demanded a Bill of Rights, the Preamble of which reads:

“The Convention of a number of the States having at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added; And as extending the ground of public confidence in the government, will best insure the beneficent ends of its institutions, be it resolved, (Amendments I through X then follow).”

Of especial importance in this connection were the Ninth Amendment (copied almost directly from the Articles of Confederation) which reads:

“The enumeration in the Constitution of rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;” and the Tenth Amendment, which reads:

“The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.” Thus, as Rep. Nelson Pryor noted, “By preventing mis-construction of the Constitution, the States could have strict construction.”

The Compact Theory, in short, is for strictly limited government and individual responsibility; a fulfillment of the goals of government as expressed by Jefferson: “Let the national government be entrusted with the defence of the nation, and its foreign and federal relations; the State governments with the civil rights, law, police, and administration of what concerns the State generally; the counties (towns and cities as well) with the local concerns of the counties, and each ward direct the interests within itself.”

It was Alexander Hamilton who disputed this concept of government and introduced the Continental Theory, of a strong central government. In 1781-82 Hamilton wrote a series of seven articles for Loudon’s New York Packet in which he outlined his theory of an ideal government for the thirteen States. Titled the Continentalist Papers, Hamilton insisted that the central government should have absolute and unquestionable power. His Continental Theory borrowed much from Thomas Hobbes and his Leviathan (1651), a political philosophy embodying a superstate wherein the omnipotence of the ruler owes its existence to an original contract among the governed. The political philosophy spelled out in Col. House’s book Philip Dru: Administrator might be considered something of a modernized version of Hamilton’s Continentalist Papers. Even while a delegate from New York at the Constitutional Convention, Hamilton went so far as to suggest that the States should be abolished in favor of a federal regional government system (Richard Hofstadter in his historical work The United States, Prentice-Hall, 1961).

However, when Hamilton saw that his ideas were thoroughly rejected by almost all of the other delegates at the Convention, he voluntarily abandoned his plan and program and assisted Edmund Randolph and James Madison in promoting the Virginia Plan, which became the very backbone of the completed Constitutional structure. Not only at the Convention, but afterward in the Federalist Papers, Hamilton continued to work for the adoption of the Constitution. It is almost a certainty that New York would never have ratified the Constitution had it not been for the efforts of Alexander Hamilton in his home State.

But—when the Constitution went into effect, when George Washington was chosen as the country’s first President, and when Hamilton was named Secretary of the Treasury in that first Cabinet, he immediately began to put his Continentalist Theory into operation.

This pattern has become familiar in United States political life. In our own time, FDR was elected on a conservative platform but when installed in office he surrounded himself with Fabian Socialists—even inviting a few from London to come over and help—and the New Deal was inaugurated. Likewise RMN who posed as a dedicated anti-Communist and a hard-hat conservative, but when elected reversed the field completely, adopted Fabian Socialist programs domestically and embraced Communist countries externally—and the New Federalism (or the Quiet Revolution) was inaugurated. But, it was Alexander Hamilton who was first in the matter of changing images in midstream (first in American politics, that is.)

Hamilton treated the Constitution as though it had been engrossed on rubber instead of parchment. It could be stretched to cover almost anything the federal government wanted to do, reasoned this first Secretary of the Treasury. Certainly, there were enumerated powers, residual powers, and concurrent powers specified and delegated by the Document. But, said Hamilton, there were also inherent powers, implicit powers, and implied powers in the Constitution that were not defined in words but that could be stretched to the point where there would be no effective limits to the power of the general government. Furthermore, those concurrent powers, the dual powers delegated to both the general government and the States, could be taken over by the Federal Government.

In 1787 Hamilton praised the Constitution as the finest possible frame of government; but in 1802 he spoke of the Constitution as "a frail and worthless fabric" and therefore no obstacle when it came to putting his program across (this according to Richard Hofstadter, The United States, page 130).

The Hamilton Program included:

1. A protective tariff (favoritism to certain nations, a course against which President Washington had warned, on no uncertain terms.)
2. The Assumption Act (securing Federal Power over the States by assuming their war debts).
3. Creation of a Bank of the United States (a private bank which would issue money, thus giving entry of the International Bankers into American governmental affairs, and also interfering with and partially nullifying the Constitutional mandate that "The Congress shall have the power... To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.")
4. A number of other precedents that started the Union of States as Continentalist instead of Compactual, as all of the Founding Fathers had intended and as Hamilton had agreed—until he became a Federal Officer (thus establishing perhaps the worst precedent of them all).

Alexander Hamilton did not complete his Continentalist programming; his meteoric political career was cut short by a bullet fired in a duel by his political rival Aaron Burr, in 1804. But, after Hamilton left the scene, his philosophy was carried on from the United States Supreme Court by Chief Justice John Marshall who served in that capacity from 1801 to 1835. It has been said that it was Marshall's doctrines and interpretations which prompted the British historian Thomas Macauley to say: "Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor."

The Constitution devotes comparatively little space to the "judicial Power of the United States," which shall be "vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Section 2 of Article III states: "The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under the Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority."

The extent of the judicial power is further explained in Section 2, but as Hamilton wrote in The Federalist, comparing the relative powers of the three branches of the federal government: "The Executive not only dispenses the honors, but holds the sword of the community. The Legislative not only commands the purse, but prescribes the rules by which the duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. The Judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse... and can take no active resolution whatever. It may truly be said to have neither force nor will, but merely judgment. This simple view of the matter suggests several important consequences—it proves incontestably that the judiciary is beyond comparison the weakest of the three departments of power, that it can never attack with success either of the others, and that all possible care is requisite to enable it to defend itself against their attacks."

Which was certainly true until the celebrated Marbury v. Madison case came along in 1803. Over and beyond the legal technicalities of this case, there was a most important question to be answered: In a government co-partnership where concurrent powers are involved, and a branch of the federal government is accused of having exceeded the powers granted it by the Constitution, who shall judge the case; the States, or the United States Supreme Court? President Jefferson, and most others, insisted that the General Government should not be given the power to judge itself when the States were the injured parties; and that there should be a review and determination by the States themselves. Marshall and others believed it was the duty of the Supreme Court to determine such controversy. And, in Marbury v. Madison, Marshall won out; since that time there has been Judicial Review rather than State Review. Still later, in 1810, in the case of Fletcher v. Peck, the Supreme Court assumed the power to review the acts of the States. Then, in 1819 in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, the States were denied the right to alter Charters within their boundaries. In two other cases decided while

John Marshall was Chief Justice, the Supreme Court asserted its right to pre-empt and re-try cases that had already been settled by State Courts.

Thus did the Compact Theory fare under Chief Justice John Marshall. On the other hand, Presidents at this time were not in sympathy with Marshall. As Representative Nelson Pryor stated in an address before the Massachusetts Americans for Constitutional Action, on Sept. 24, 1973:

"From 1800 to 1860, this Union of States was governed by administrators that, almost to a man, advocated and practiced the ideals of the Compact Theory. There were a few notable exceptions; such as James Madison's temporary loss of footing during the 'Era of Good Feelings.' This period saw subsidies and handouts re-instituted; but was soon ended by the efforts of Compact Theorist and New York Senator, Martin Van Buren. The Continentalist majority on the Marshall Supreme Court was used for the advantage of people who sought special privileges from Washington. Knowing that acts which violated the Compact Theory would not be passed by Congress or approved by the President, the Continentalists seized upon court cases, had those cases carried to the U.S. Supreme Court. Wanting a Continentalist principle accomplished, the Supreme Court would settle the case accordingly, and precedent would maintain the principle thus established (the Warren Court was not original in this respect—Ed.)

"Those were trying days for the States," continued Rep. Pryor, "as they saw the building up of power in Washington. In Congress, The American System (1824) was proposed by Henry Clay; this was based upon the ideas of Alexander Hamilton. In 1830 Daniel Webster denied the validity of the Compact Theory and defined the Nature of our Union as Continentalist. He proclaimed the Union as based on "one" people and not that of the separate peoples of the different States as having made the Compact. He further proclaimed that the people should look to Washington for the safeguarding of their rights, instead of to the States, as had been the underlying theory of previous governments.

"While the War between the States was in progress, the Northern Congress started to push Continentalist policies which the South had been able to stop while they were still in the Union. The long debated trans-continental railroad was voted through in 1862. This granted land and a Federal subsidy of .7 billion dollars to the builders. The Morrill Land Grant Act was passed the same year, to finance government colleges. Vote-buying in the Credit Mobilier scandal was a direct result as Congress did not regulate that which it subsidized (how could it when people as high as the Vice President of the United States were involved?)

"The people of the States, wanting relief from high railroad rates, attempted to get State Regulation of same. In 1867, the Grange was organized to protect the users. Beginning with Illinois in 1870 the Grangers won control of the legislatures of several Midwestern and Southern States. Munn v. Illinois (1877) established that States could regulate business within their own boundaries. But this precedent was overturned by Wabash v. Illinois in 1886. . . .

"Alexander Hamilton's philosophy had thus grown fruit. To accommodate the Grangers who had now transferred their action to the U.S. Congress, the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 was passed. Events show that neither the Supreme Court nor the Congress ever implemented this law to regulate railroads. And later, the mild Continentalism of these men was replaced by others who wanted strict control over all businesses, and the precedents to do it had already been well established.

"The Compact Theory was, by now, set aside. The Continentalist Theory was pretty much in the saddle by the turn of the century. The third theory, Internationalism, which is a mixture of strong Continentalism and eventual One World Government, was now ready to emerge. A government by technocrats would evolve, with the technocrats consolidating the powers of government and transferring that power to themselves in order to create a better world."

We have compressed the history of a whole century into a few, mostly quoted, paragraphs, because we wanted to get to the twentieth century, where the action really begins and where—to a surprising degree—we find the history of the eighteenth century Counter-revolution against a Central Government in London so very similar to the current history of a Counter-revolution against a Central Government in Washington and an emerging World Government still so difficult to define and delineate that we are at an awful disadvantage in combatting it. However, as the twentieth century begins, the outlines of our real enemy also begin to emerge.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

----- Part Five -----

BIRTH OF INTERNATIONALISM

The last decade of the nineteenth century has been called "The Gay Nineties," but the gayety must have been of the kind that is akin to hysteria. For there was a feeling of panic in the air, an uncertainty as to America's future, and a fear of the "Economic Royalists" who were having such an impact on the American economy that the Congress took a hand and passed the Sherman Anti-Trust Act which declared that "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal." Three months later (Oct. 1, 1890), the McKinley Tariff Act raised the tariff on manufactured goods to the highest levels in American history; but it also provided for reciprocity agreements with other Nations. This led to a Democratic landslide in the November elections, Democrat Grover Cleveland winning easily in the Presidential elections two years later (1892). Meanwhile, strikes and violence swept the country: martial law was declared and federal troops called out to end a veritable war at the Coeur d'Alene silver mines in Idaho; a strike at the Carnegie Steel Company at Homestead, Penn., was put down by State militia, but plant manager Henry C. Frick was shot and then stabbed by a Russian anarchist. And the Socialist Labor Party met in convention in New York City on Aug. 28, 1892.

The financial panic began in 1893. On April 15 the issue of gold certificates was suspended by the U.S. Treasury; securities fell suddenly on the New York Stock Exchange on May 5; the Stock Market crashed on June 27. During the year, 600 banks closed, over 15,000 commercial houses failed, 74 railroads went into receivers' hands (J.P. Morgan and his international banker associates being the receivers in most cases).

1894 saw the organization of the National Municipal League (forerunner of and later amalgamated with Rockefeller's 1313, which became the chief promoter of Regional Government). On Aug. 27, 1894 a new tariff law was passed which contained an income tax provision. Called communistic, it was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court before it ever became effective as law.

On Feb. 8, 1895 the United States Treasury made a contract with the International Banking houses of Morgan and Belmont (the latter being a Rothschild subsidiary) for the purchase of $65,000,000 in gold, to be paid for with interest-bearing government bonds.

And here within a five-year period, we have recorded chronologically most of the contrived occurrences which go together to make up a carefully laid plot, a Conspiracy to gain an unlawful end: political confusion abounded, labor relations were at their worst, stick-wielding communism and carrot-dangling socialism along with bomb-throwing anarchism all had been introduced, independent banks were going broke, as were independent business houses, the depression was causing untold sufferings, and the United States Government was in hock to the International Bankers! The time was ripe for the final step in this particular series of contrived events; War!

We are writing, of course, of Conspiracy, of the willful schemings of two or more persons to bring about an unlawful end; in this case, to bring the United States out of its isolated position in the world, and make it a part of an International Concert of Nations, all to be controlled by the Conspirators.

At that time in history, the United States had fulfilled its "Manifest Destiny," the dream of "one nation, under God, stretching from sea to shining sea." True, there was Alaska, obtained by purchase, and Hawaii, adopted territorially. But, essentially, the United States was a Continental power, with no interests other than trade with other nations of the world; free of Old World intrigues, and pledged to keep South America also free of Old World intrigues, under the terms of the then honored Monroe Doctrine. (It was this Monroe Doctrine that would supply the loophole through which the Conspirators would creep in—as we shall see in upcoming paragraphs).

First, in connection with the nature of Conspiracy and its application to this series of newsletters, we should like to borrow from the writings of Wilson Thomas, author of Harvest of Political Wild Oats (Meador Publishing Co., Boston). He wrote:

Conspiracy does not exist unless there is an intent of two or more persons to accomplish something unlawful. Intent is of the essence of it, and intent is intangible and metaphysical. Nobody can penetrate the secrets of another's thought and produce evidence to establish conclusively another's motive for action or inaction. Conspiracy is a conclusion as to the motive for action which... leads to certain individuals or interests and connects them in such a way as to indicate that they planned and brought about the whole sequence in order to accomplish unlawful ends....

If we were to make a careful survey of the whole field of business and professional activity, it would be seen that banking is unique in respect to the natural opportunities afforded for exploitation, acquisition of information of a secret nature inaccessible to the general public, acquisition of undue influences and controls. International banking differs from nationally organized banking principally in the size of its field of operations, which is now world-wide, and in the extraordinary opportunities available to it by reason of diversities of national systems and conflicts of interest among the family of nations.... The international banker... holds his court in the inner sancta of high finance and power politics, where the adoring high priests of the dollar sign make reverent entrance by appointment, in order to bow down to the gods of wealth. The customers he meets are chancellors of the exchequer, ministers of state, ministers of war and the multimillionaires who control the wealth of the world....

The fact of the existence of a conspiracy is coming now to be widely understood. The conspiracy, I am confident, will never be understood, much less defeated by the processes of searching out whipping boys, trying to fasten blame upon individuals, racial, religious or political groups. The reason why it will not be thus solved is that it is organized entirely upon institutional lines and is moved by the impersonal power of money and credit controls.... International banking, I suspect, is today the only real world power. It is a power so all-pervasive that its long fingers of control have probed into and are in intimate touch with every phase of the economy of every country in the world; so highly organized that all the countless threads of fiscal policy and system which comprise the banking and monetary systems of the world have been gathered into the hands of one person, or at most a very small group of persons—men without faces, an absolute oligarchy of absolute economic control. Here is money power unlimited... for the most part unseen, never vocal, never identified with the visible forms of government, which is nevertheless well able to determine political policy the world around, and move officers of state as a skilled player moves the figures on a chessboard. International banking is the hidden control of all economic wealth and, indirectly, of all government.... In its concealed mechanism will ultimately be found an explanation of the perennial failure of the American people to get the sort of government they want, no matter how they vote, no matter who they put in office.

Are the foregoing wild statements? Are the ideas incredibly fantastic? If the reader thinks so, let him turn to the records of English and American history. Let him read and let him realize that almost before the ink was dry on the Constitution of the United States, the power of the international bankers had enabled them to set it aside, to nullify its provisions relative to the coinage and value of money, and establish a monetary system pleasing to them. That happened nearly two centuries ago. International control of money and credit was then in its infancy. (end of quotation)

In the last decade of the nineteenth century there had been such industrial development and the promise of technological miracles yet to be developed, that it was time for the United States to be dragged out of its happy isolation and brought into more intimate relationship with the rest of the world. So reasoned the International Bankers, and so was our original Compact Theory of government forced to give way to the Continental Theory of strong, central government, to pave the way for the eventually superseding International Theory, whose end is World Government!

The last decade of the nineteenth century found imperialist sentiment running high in most great nations of the world. The partitioning of Africa was being concluded, China was being torn to pieces for the benefit of the powers, especially England. And the imperialist nations of Europe began casting avaricious glances toward South America, and coveting the almost untouched riches in natural resources existing in our sister continent.

And suddenly, in the summer of 1895, the people of the United States, England—and probably the people of Venezuela and British Guiana as well—were thunderstruck by the news that the United States was threatening to go to war against the British Empire! People wondered how such a situation could so suddenly develop, involving two supposedly friendly powers. The people, of course, didn't understand the machinations of the Money Barons of the World (they still don't.)

This, we believe, was a case where the governments of Britain and the United States were "used" for conspiratorial purposes by a power "bigger than both of them." There had long been an unsettled boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela. No great seriousness was attached to the dispute until, suddenly, the news was spread that gold had been discovered in this disputed territory. The British then claimed the land and, according to the newspapers of that day, started to move in and take over; while the United States invoked the Monroe Doctrine. President Cleveland, apparently at the instigation of his Secretary of State, Richard Olney, sent a message to Congress stating that "Today the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition." The Presidential Proclamation demanded that a Congressional investigating commission be sent to Venezuela to determine the true boundary line, and the United States must then "resist any encroachments on land assigned to Venezuela."

The boundary dispute proved to be "a tempest in a teapot" and was soon settled to the satisfaction of all parties. However, as a result of the "near warlike condition" that had suddenly developed between Britain and the United States, a special conference was arranged to settle disputes between the two powers. On Jan. 11, 1897, the Olney-Pauncefote Convention was approved by all parties except the United States Senate. So, according to observers at the conference, a secret agreement was arranged, but never sent to Congress. The agreement had little or nothing to do with border disputes in South America. Instead, this was an alliance between Britain and the United States which covered the world, not just the New World. According to Prof. Roland G. Usher in his book Pan-Germanism published in 1915, this was an understanding that in case of war in Europe, the U.S. would promptly declare in favor of England and France, and would do her utmost to assist them. Usher said no papers were signed, but "the alliance, for it was nothing less, was based on infinitely firmer ground than written words and sheets of parchment."

Then, through the Magic of the Money Barons, Spain was to be eliminated as an "Empire Builder" and reduced to simply a State in Europe, and "The lost colonies of North America (the United States) were to be rejoined to Mother England and certain dreams of Sir Cecil Rhodes and Baron Rothschild were to be fulfilled (more about this later). And the threatened war between the United States and England would be replaced by an actual war between the United States and Spain!

That the Spanish-American War was contrived, totally unnecessary, and brought about simply to project the United States onto "the world stage" for ulterior purposes, is now admitted by almost all historians. It was a shameful affair for which this Nation has had its share of suffering (to say nothing of the people of Cuba and the Philippines) and it altered the course of the whole world, politically and economically.

In his excellent The Myth of the New History, David L. Hoggan comes closer to the whole truth about the event, than does any other historian whom we have read on the subject. We quote:

America was in many respects the most fortunate nation in the world in 1895... Although still a debtor nation economically (European holdings in the United States were much greater than American holdings abroad), there was good reason to expect that, under normal conditions, America would become a creditor nation in about fifty years. In the meantime, paying the interest on foreign investments was no problem in view of the proverbial American favorable balance of trade (except that, as we have shown, those international bankers who had sizeable investments in the United States were able to use that power to manipulate the foreign policy of the United States—Ed.) It was in the context of this happy situation that American leaders began to wonder if perhaps they did not need overseas colonies and an entente with England (such leaders as J.P. Morgan, John D. Rockefeller, Sr., the Jays, Whitneys, Aldriches and other Anglophiles among the "60 families who owned America" at the turn of the century—Ed.)

It was against this background (Hoggan continues) that the United States in 1889 decided to go to war against Spain. In any real or meaningful sense, there could be no military glory in such a war. . . . There was no compelling reason for the United States to go to war against Spain in 1898. . . . It has never been proven that the Spaniards sunk the Battleship Maine. . . . it is incredible that the Spanish government planned the explosion. . . . McKinley had plenty of time to call off the dogs of war. The president recommended force against Spain two days after the Spanish Government had surrendered to American demands on the Cuban issue. . . .

William Randolph Hearst purchased the New York Journal (November, 1895), in a deliberate effort to capture the lead in New York City newspaper circulation from Joseph Pulitzer's New York World. Hearst was quick to see the advantage of lurid and sensational reporting about events in Cuba and Pulitzer soon decided to follow Hearst's lead in exploiting this field of sensational journalism (it came to be called yellow journalism—Ed.)

The presence of (Admiral) Dewey at Manila (in the Philippines at the start of the war) was the achievement of Theodore Roosevelt, the Under-Secretary of the Navy, who was to succeed McKinley as President in 1901. During the absence of Secretary of the Navy Long, Theodore Roosevelt had issued the orders which sent Dewey to the Far East long in advance of the outbreak of hostilities. Roosevelt believed that the United States, as a future great naval power, ought to have a naval base in the Far East comparable to the British bastion at Hong Kong. Fortunately, no one suggested attacking the Spaniards at Rio de Oro on the west coast of Africa. . . .

One of the most fateful consequences of the Spanish-American War was the acquisition of an American colony in the eastern hemisphere, which seemed to contradict the original promises on which the Monroe Doctrine was based. Furthermore, the first solid events in Anglo-American collaboration, beginning with Secretary of State John Hay's open door notes in 1900, took place in the Far East. . . .

(End of quotations from David Hoggan's The Myth of the New History. The Craig Press, Nutley, N.J. 1965. $4.50)

"Anglo-American Collaboration," or the entry of the United States into the new world balance of power was the real reason for the Spanish-American War, and for the presence of the U.S. Navy at Manila when hostilities began, and for the presence of the U.S.S. Maine at Havana where it could conveniently be blown up, probably by paid insurgents under the command of General Roloff, a Polish Jew who was a naturalized citizen of the United States.

Of the new Anglo-American Alliance, Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the British Colonies declared: "We now see our cousins across the water entering the lists and sharing in a task which might have proved too heavy for us alone."

A grim and ugly historical footnote: It was later realized that the International Bankers did not need to promote a war with Spain in order to bring the United States into this new balance of power, because the alliance had been concluded before the war began and—as Anglophile Nicholas Murray Butler later complained: "The Spanish-American War was absolutely unnecessary, and if it had not been insisted upon by the belligerent press, aided by numerous influential leaders of opinion, including Theodore Roosevelt, Cuba would have become free without any armed hostilities whatsoever."

Chauncey M. Depew, New York Senator and important and powerful political and financial leader of his day, in My Memories of Eighty Years, published in 1924, records a conversation in which Lord Rothschild offered Puerto Rico and the Philippines to the United States and stated the willingness of the Spanish Government to grant independence to Cuba and to comply with every demand the United States can make. Regretfully, he wrote further, "The proposition unfortunately came too late, and Mr. McKinley could not stop the war. . . ."

At the turn of the century, as America began to become an International Power, the Elite directing the use of that power began to believe that individual State Governments had powers that should be taken from them and concentrated in Washington, D.C. Thus, plans for Regional Government began to be prepared.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

. Part Six

THE GREAT "ISMIC" INVASION

The United States of America was forced into the Internationalist Arena through being manipulated into a war against Spain for Cuban independence. As a result of that unfortunate adventure, the United States obtained possession of Guam and the Philippines, islands in the Far Pacific. Their possession became a clear and positive violation of the Monroe Doctrine which, up to that time, had been regarded as inviolate as the Constitution itself. True, we were only holding onto the Philippines for purely "humanitarian" purposes and in due course they were granted independence. But Guam in the Marianas remains an unincorporated territory of the United States, and the first witness of our own violation of the most important foreign policy proclamation ever made by the United States.

Then, in rapid succession, came the annexation of Hawaii in 1898, intervention in the Boxer Uprising in China in 1900, diplomatic intervention in the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, Teddy Roosevelt's ordering of that round-the-world cruise of the United States Navy in 1908 along with his threat to the world that we would "speak softly but carry a big stick."

These events established the United States as a world power and, more importantly, established us as an imperialist power in the eyes of the other imperialist powers of the world. Consequently, we became embroiled in the intrigues and vicissitudes of the rest of the world. And, we began to be infiltrated and infected, attacked and affected by the various "isms" that were causing upheavals and epidemics in the bodies politic of the nations of the Old World.

It should be noted that there was great unrest in the United States at this time, and thus the country was more receptive to foreign isms than in previous years. In his revealing but biased Tragedy and Hope, historian Carroll Quigley refers to this period as "the period of financial capitalism in which investment bankers moving into commercial banking and insurance on one side and into railroading and heavy industry on the other were able to mobilize enormous wealth and wield enormous economic, political, and social power. Popularly known as 'Society,' or the '400,' they lived a life of dazzling splendor."

"The structure of financial controls created by the tycoons of 'Big Banking' and 'Big Business,' Quigley continues, "was of extraordinary complexity, one business fief being built on another, both being allied with semi-dependent associates, the whole rearing upward into two pinnacles of economic and financial power, of which one, centered in New York, was headed by J.P. Morgan and Company and the other, in Ohio, was headed by the Rockefeller family. When these two cooperated, as they generally did, they could influence the economic life of the country to a large degree and could almost control its political life, at least on the Federal level. . . . The influence of these business leaders was so great that the Morgan and Rockefeller groups acting together, or even Morgan acting alone, could have wrecked the economic system of the country merely by throwing securities on the stock market for sale, and having precipitated a stock-market panic, could then have bought back the securities they had sold at a lower price. Naturally, they were not so foolish as to do this, although Morgan came very close to it in precipitating the 'panic of 1907,' but they did not hesitate to wreck individual corporations at the expense of the holders of common stocks, by driving them to bankruptcy." (A similar situation exists again today, with multinational corporations and conglomerates wielding enormous economic, political, and social power—Ed.)

At the turn of the century, Big Banking and Big Business so ruled the roost, that the importation of Old World "Isms" was easy, and they were welcomed by many.

Into the United States came immigrants and political protagonists promoting peculiar and unusual doctrines. There flourished for a time and in varying degrees of intensity and expansiveness nihilism, anarchism, syndicalism, national socialism, international communism, Fabian socialism, Fascism, Anglo-Saxon Federation, etc., etc.

Before proceeding, a definition of terms is required, and an explanation of the historical dialectic of all these strange isms which are based generally on the theories expounded by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels:

In the beginning there was what now is called Utopian Socialism. That was the kind of socialism advocated by the social reformers such as Robert Owen, John Stuart Mill, and other like-minded social reformers. Various experiments in Utopian Socialism had been carried out in the United States, beginning with the Pilgrim Colony itself; all failed for varying reasons.

Then came the great change, in 1848, when Marx and Engel were commissioned to write out the socialist credo which they called The Communist Manifesto, and which begins with the threat, "A spectre is haunting Europe—the spectre of Communism," and closes with the command, "Workers of the World, unite!" This Manifesto marked the end of the peaceable Utopian Socialist period, and the beginning of the political and militant period of Scientific Socialism. After 1848, the International Socialist Movement was marked by three "Internationals," or meetings, each of which changed the course of the overall movement. The First International held sway from 1864 to 1876, twelve years during which time nihilism and anarchism became so predominant that the movement was disrupted and a Second International was founded in 1889. The nihilists and anarchists were expelled and the whole movement began to lose its militancy. This resulted in a showdown between the Mensheviks and the Bolsheviks, with Trotsky establishing a Bolshevik headquarters in Brooklyn, and with Lenin heading a similar Bolshevik group in Geneva. Kerensky, who died in exile in the United States in 1917, was nominal head of the Menshevik group. Then in 1919, all the dissident elements of the old Second International organized the Third—or Communist—International.

The bickering and infighting among the socialists led to a number of schools, increasingly doctrinaire, increasingly bitter toward each other, but always ready to cooperate with each other when called upon by the faceless men who controlled all the schools of socialism.

Most violent were (and are) the nihilists. They believe that conditions are so bad that everything must be destroyed utterly, governments, religions, institutions, civilizations, buildings; perfection exists only in absolute nothingness. The nihilists are the bomb-throwers, the arsonists, those who kill and destroy in the belief that these are worthy ends in themselves.

The anarchists are a milder version of the nihilists. The anarchist believes that man is not sinful, but innately good; all the world's evil arose because man's innate goodness was corrupted and distorted by coercive power. The remedy is to destroy the state and its government, whatever the form of government may be. Destruction of the state will lead, according to anarchism, to the disappearance of all other forms of coercive power and to the liberation of the innate goodness of man. The anarchists believed that the simplest way to destroy the state was to assassinate the chief of the state; this would act as a spark to ignite a wholesale uprising of oppressed humanity against all forms of coercive power. These views led to the assassination of numerous political leaders, including a king of Italy and a president of the United States in the period 1895 to 1905 (the man who shot President William McKinley, Leon Czolgosz, was an anarchist.

Syndicalism was a later version of anarchism, and was more realistic. It aimed to destroy governments, but this public authority was to be replaced by voluntary associations of individuals in communes, cooperatives, and especially labor unions. According to the syndicalists, the state was to be destroyed, not by the assassination of heads of state, but by a general strike of all workers. The general strike would destroy the state and replace it by a flexible federation of free associations of workers (syndicates). The IWW movement in the United States was syndicalism's supreme effort in this direction; but the cooperative movement still exists as a form of syndicalistic socialism in the United States.

Opposed to the nihilo-anarcho-syndicalists in theory were the radical socialists who did not want to destroy governments as such but, instead, to give them all power over all economic life. Public ownership of all industry, all land, all resources, all means of production and all distribution of goods; this was the socialism that was able to conquer most of Europe and, through the late Norman Thomas and his followers, capture control of the National Democratic Party from 1932 onward. In the United States this form of socialism evolved into the welfare state program espoused by the majority of United States Senators and Representatives who call themselves Republicans and Democrats, but doctrinally are radical socialists.

Yet a different school of socialism evolved out of Bolshevism and came to be called Communism. International Communism has expanded enormously, thanks to efforts on the part of the United States Government to keep it alive. More about this later.

Yet another form of national socialism, called Fascism, developed in Italy under Mussolini. A slight alteration of the same ideology was called Nazism in Germany. Historians are reluctant to point out that much of the New Deal Program under FDR was fascist; and no one in authority in Washington seems willing to confess that Nixon's New Federalism program is a direct steal from the Corporate Socialism that was developed—and which still functions—in Italy (which doesn't really have a government, but is run by State-owned or State-chartered Corporations).

Then, there is Fabian Socialism which, because of its extreme importance in the Contrived Evolution of Regional Government, will be dealt with in great detail in future letters in this series.

We have listed several of the different denominations of socialism. There are yet others, such as the revisionist communism copied from Mao Tse-tung's interpretation of the writings of Karl Marx, the SLA, other militant and radical cults claiming to be followers of the true gospel of revolution according to Marx. Each of these groups, from the Nihilists to the Socialist Labor Party, has had its part in the destruction of the original American System.

But there is one power, almost nameless, which has had more to do with the socializing of America than all of the socialist cults individually or severally, because this one power controls them all and uses them all whenever occasion and circumstance demands!

Perhaps our best way of approaching this subject is to call on one of the opposition's own witnesses. Carrol Quigley, previously quoted, devotes considerable space in his book to a discussion of the Institute of Pacific Relations, a satellite of the Council on Foreign Relations, which was composed of ten national councils in ten countries, with international headquarters in New York City. IPR was thoroughly investigated by the McCarran Committee (Senator McCarran was probably the first American in an official position to try to warn the Nation of the danger of Fabian International Socialism). This investigation of the IPR was of especial importance in that it revealed officially the interrelationship between the Council on Foreign Relations, the tax-exempt Foundations such as Carnegie and Rockefeller, the Communist Party, U.S.A., and the Fabian Socialist apparatus which operated out of the Ivy League Colleges, with financial aid also being supplied by Rockefeller and Morgan interests in Wall Street: Standard Oil, Chase National Bank, National City Bank, International General Electric, International Telephone and Telegraph. Individual contributions came from Frederick Vanderbilt Field, Thomas Lamont and Corliss Lamont, and other communists and communist-fronters.

Quigley admits that IPR developed a party line and that "this IPR line had many points in common both with the Kremlin's party line on the Far East and with the State Department's line in the same area." The State Department was (and is) controlled by the Council on Foreign Relations; so the Kremlin and State Department policy toward the Far East being the same at that time, is hardly a coincidence.

However, after Quigley admits so much, he goes on to explain how Nationalist China "fell or was pushed" (IPR-man Owen Lattimore's phrase), then Quigley makes the statement that this whole affair was a "radical Right fairy tale, which is now an accepted folk myth in many groups in America."

"This plot, if we are to believe the myth," writes Quigley, "worked through such avenues of publicity as The New York Times and the Herald Tribune, the Christian Science Monitor and the Washington Post, the Atlantic Monthly and Harper's Magazine and had at its core the wild-eyed and bushy-haired theoreticians of Socialist Harvard and the London School of Economics. It was determined to bring the United States into World War II on the side of England (Roosevelt's first love) and Soviet Russia (his second love) in order to destroy every finer element of American life and, as part of this consciously planned scheme, invited Japan to attack Pearl Harbor, and destroyed Chiang Kai-shek, all the while undermining America's real strength by excessive spending and unbalanced budgets."

Quigley says this is all a radical Right myth. But he has a reservation and isn't quite sure that he believes what he wrote, because he immediately adds:

"This myth, like all fables, does in fact have a modicum of truth. There does exist, and has existed for a generation, an international Anglophile network which operates, to some extent, in the way the radical Right believes the Communists act. In fact, this network, which we may identify as the Round Table Groups, has no aversion to cooperating with the Communists, or any other groups, and frequently does so. I know of the operation of this network because I have studied it for twenty years and was permitted for two years, in the early 1960's, to examine its papers and secret records. I have no aversion to it or to most of its aims and I have, for much of my life, been close to it and to many of its instruments. I have objected, both in the past and recently, to a few of its policies (notably to its belief that England was an Atlantic rather than a European Power and must be allied, or even federated, with the United States and must remain isolated from Europe), but in general my chief difference of opinion is that it wishes to remain unknown, and I believe its role in history is significant enough to be known."

Our concern in this series of letters is with the American affiliates of this secret network, groups which also have "no aversion to cooperating with the Communists, or any other groups" and frequently do so.

Here is a network of secret and semi-secret organizations which originally sought to reunite the United States (England's lost colonies) with Mother England, with a view toward creating a world government that would be administered by an Anglo-Saxon Federation composed of the United Kingdom, the United States, and the British Commonwealth of Nations (Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, etc.). As the control of this network changed, the aims of the secret cabal also changed, so that the final aims now consist of a World Authority administered on behalf of Big Banking and Big Business. This World Authority is to be divided into Regional Authorities, they into National Authorities, and these in turn are to be divided (or have already been divided) into Administrative Regions; as the United States has been divided into Ten Federal Regions for administrative purposes.

To accomplish the total Regionalization of the World there are two principal groups which originated in England, and which now are active (and in a controlling position) in all of the English-speaking Nations of the world. Similar affiliated groups are in control or in positions of great influence in all other developed Nations of the world.

In the United States this control is exerted over economic and monetary affairs by a network of groups, the best known of which is the New York City based Council on Foreign Relations, which is directly affiliated with similar organizations in all other nations of the world.

The second group which controls political and social affairs is an organization which might be said to be made up of all officers and no soldiers, and began in England as the Fabian Society. This Fabian Society developed a special kind of Socialism that is especially appealing to men who once believed themselves to be freemen.

Between these two, the groups controlled by the Round Table and the individuals controlled by the Fabian Society, there is a camaraderie and an interrelationship so that at times it is difficult to distinguish one from the other. And between the two, there is the determination that we shall have a "World Community," whether we like it or not, and that at the nation-state level we shall have Regional Government, whether we like it or not.

If we are to understand what we have called The Contrived Evolution of Regional Government, then we must first trace the history of these two power groups, the Round Table Groups, and the Fabian Society. We must understand how they originated in England, one at Oxford University, the other by way of the London School of Economics which was founded for the express purpose of teaching the fundamentals of Fabianism.

Do not expect an exhaustive or comprehensive treatment of these groups in this series of letters. Our principal subject is Regional Government and we shall try to deal with Round Tablers and Fabians only as they relate to Regional (and World) Government.

How a gaggle of defeated diplomats grew to the place where they could dictate to whole Governments, and how a drawing room study group developed into a behind-the-scenes power that could draft programs for Regional and World Governments; these are the topics upcoming.

THE CONTRIVED EVOLUTION OF REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

----- Part Seven -----

SOCIALISM OR EMPIRE?

As early as 1905, Col. Ed. F. Browne was convinced that "the present socialistic tendency to build up the executive power can only end in one of two things, i.e., a socialistic tyranny through legislation, or an imperiator." He considered this in 1905, "the most serious question presented to the American people since the abolishment of slavery" and the question "is not receiving due consideration."

So, Col. Browne wrote an important book, the publication of which "was withheld until after the fall elections of 1906 because it was not desired to have it appear to be an argument intended to influence political action during that campaign." In the campaign of 1906, only Congressional seats were involved. Theodore Roosevelt was President at that time, would remain so until 1908, when he would be succeeded by William Howard Taft, another Republican. Col. Browne was of the opinion that it made little difference whether Republicans or Democrats were in power in Washington, because "at the present time there is no 'conservative' party in the United States. Each one of the parties appear to be vieing with the other, in an attempt to get nearer the beliefs of socialism than its opponent."

There seems to be such a striking political parallel between conditions which existed in 1905 and conditions which exist in 1974, that we believe what Col. Browne wrote in 1905 about conditions in 1905, is far superior to anything we might write in 1974 about conditions which existed in 1905. An "on the spot" report is available, a friend has made available to us pertinent parts of Col. Browne's important book, which he titled Socialism or Empire. His explanation of the beginnings of socialism in the United States is noteworthy; therefore, we quote at length from the preface to Col. Browne's book, which was published in 1906, but still remains timely and instructive

There is an undercurrent of political thought today in the United States, which drifts toward socialism, and this unconscious drift leads up to a grant of power to our Executive Department quite necessary under a socialistic government, but which creates a danger to our institutions. Successive grants of power to an executive have always ended in Empire with Republics of the past, and usually the additional power has been given at the instance of the "common people." While the theory of socialism is a beautiful one, human nature must be changed to make it a success. There are two well defined classes of socialists: the educated theorist who claims to have eliminated greed from his nature, and who prates of the equality of man; and the uneducated socialist who thinks it wrong for any man to have more than himself. The Theorist is a fraud, and should be watched by the police, as mild forms of lunacy soon drift to violence. His only danger is in injury to himself and the advice he gives to others.

It is but a step from the theory that it is only right to work entirely for the public good, to the position that the public should receive the benefit of all personal endeavor.

The theoretical socialist talks of the beauties of socialism from the standpoint of the "giver," while his ignorant followers interpret this to mean that the public should have the power to "take." The unfortunate thing about this agitation is the fact that the latter class is gaining the most headway.

This undercurrent of thought is so sweeping that I have been surprised in conversation with Senators, Congressmen and Managing Editors of several of our great dailies, when I have suggested that this agitation was a tendency toward socialism, to hear the expression that "possibly it was coming."
