CONTROL BY "DIET, INJECTIONS AND INJUNCTIONS"?

THE SWINE FLU CONTROVERSY

Please pardon our dubiety, but, as Abraham Lincoln said in his House Divided speech: "We can not absolutely know that all these exact adaptations are the result of preconcert. But when we see a lot of framed timbers, different portions of which we know have been gotten out at different times and places and by different workmen ... and when we see these timbers joined together, and see they exactly make the frame of a house ... we find it impossible not to believe that ... all understood one another from the beginning, and all worked upon a common plan or draft drawn up before the first lick was struck."

This is the age of the credibility gap. And after Watergate, the international bribery scandals, the campaign contribution scandals, the sex scandals involving politicians and the use of public funds for personal sin, the anarchistic bombings of public and private buildings, the demoniacal kidnaping and burying alive of schoolchildren, and other displays of unhuman, inhuman, sub-human or too human conduct; after all these events, a person should surely deserve to be pardoned if he should look askance at the strange and mysterious circumstances surrounding what we shall term "the swine flu spectacular."

First, lest there be any misunderstanding, we assume that the specialists who are on the scene and doing the investigating are correct when they say there is no positive connection between the Philadelphia disaster and the swine flu controversy. At our press time it was conceded that those who died or became ill as a result of having attended the American Legion convention, did not suffer or die from "swine flu." So, there was no positive connection; but there did develop a political connection. The background, briefly:

A physically exhausted soldier at Fort Dix contracted a fever with complications, and died. Dr. Martin Goldfield of the New Jersey health department, isolated a flu virus, and it was named "swine flu." Suddenly, the media announced that an epidemic could be expected in the United States, beginning probably in November. It was suggested that everybody except some children and pregnant women should be inoculated. There was no vaccine for this purpose, but the four big drug producers—Wyeth Laboratories, Parke-Davis, Merck Sharp and Dohme, and Merrell-National—would be happy to launch crash programs and develop sufficient vaccine to shoot every man, woman and child in the United States; provided that they got paid for their efforts. Somebody suggested that $135,000,000 was a good round number to start with.

Now, this is supposition, but there is reason to believe that President Ford would never have been so anxious to urge Congress to appropriate such an amount of your money and mine, had it not been for Dr. Sabin, one of the developers of the polio vaccines. It was he who suggested that the effectiveness of the vaccine might wear off if it were to be given out too soon. So it was decided that the mass immunization program should be carried out in the latter part of August and through September. This would be exactly the time when the political campaigns would hit their zenith. Now, if the swine flu scare could also hit its climax at the same time, think of the political benefits that would accrue to an incumbent President who would have manifested such concern for the well being of the electorate that he had made it possible for all to obtain free flu shots! Free to all but the taxpayers, that is; but few taxpayers realize this.

Now, the need would be to feed the fear, maintain the momentum, and make people thankful for and eager to receive the injection.

And the malady which attacked a patriotic organization convening at the Nation's Bicentenary Capitol seems as though it could have been arranged by Beelzebub himself, who is "Lord of the Flies."

As we said, we are dealing in supposition, and it may come about that the powers that be may yet declare—rightly or wrongly—that the "Legion disease" at Philadelphia was swine flu, after all. There is an unusual and possibly prophetic article which appeared in The American Legion Magazine for July, 1975—just one year before the American Legion Convention in Philadelphia in 1976! The article, written by Harvey Ardman, begins:

“Sometime in 1977, 1978 or 1979, a totally new type of influenza virus is almost certain to appear—as it does about once every ten years—and spread throughout the world. No one will be immune to it. Before the epidemic dies down, perhaps one billion human beings—one out of every four of us—will come down with the flu. Some will hardly notice it. Some will be incapacitated for weeks. Some will die.”

The article goes on to point out that going back at least as far as A.D. 1510, flu has spread throughout the world approximately every ten years. There was the Asian Flu of 1957, the Hong Kong Flu of 1968, and now the predicted Swine Flu of 1977.

But this time, politics has entered into the picture; and so has doubt and the credibility gap that permeates the political atmosphere:

The insurance companies refused to insure the producers and the users of the new vaccine. The whole campaign was about to die before the vaccine was even delivered to the local immunization centers. The Federal government decided it must make a deal with the insurance companies—again at taxpayer expense. But this demanded new legislation and appropriation, and there was doubt as to the possibility of passing any more bills on the subject of swine flu.

Then, as though to the rescue in the nick of time, came the tragedy at Philadelphia. And the President went into action, wrote to the Speaker of the House demanding that the Congress immediately pass a bill letting the government (you and me as taxpayers) take the insurance risks for swine flu inoculations. “There is no excuse now,” said the President, “to let this program be delayed any longer.”

INCIDENT AT VOZROZDENYA

There is one aspect of this Philadelphia tragedy that has not been explored, and it does deserve consideration. We refer to the possibility—however repugnant or remote—that the virus, or fungus, or whatever which took the lives of Legionnaires who visited Philadelphia could have been the deliberate and premeditated work of a human agency!

Exploring this possibility, a correspondent has brought to our attention a book by Hugh C. McDonald: Appointment in Dallas: the Final Solution to the Assassination of JFK. McDonald is a qualified investigator and a recognized authority in that field. On May 3, 1960, he did not fly a U2 over the Soviet Union because he felt there was too much risk at that time. So Francis Gary Powers flew the plane instead and entered the history books, while McDonald continued with the CIA. Born in 1913, McDonald's exploits as policeman, investigator, flier and intelligence agent are legendary in the closed world of international espionage and counter-espionage service. A graduate of the FBI Academy, his books, The Investigation of Sex Crimes, The Classification of Police Photographs, and The Psychology of Police Interrogation are said to be standard texts in most Police Academies.

In the book Appointment in Dallas, McDonald speaks of an incident in 1970, when he met a man who told him about an island that was named Vozrozdanya, but which was not to be found on any standard map. It is one of a number of tiny islands in a rough circle off the northeastern shore of the Aral Sea. Here, McDonald was told, germ warfare was being planned, in case it must sometime be used against the United States. And, now we quote directly from the book, beginning on page 73, as the story is told by McDonald to Geoffrey Bocca, who “ghosted” the book:

“McDonald says that if any reader of this book has suffered, in the last five or six years, from what he thought was London Flu or Hong Kong Flu, and found his friends and colleagues sniffing in the same way, it is quite possible that they were in fact the guinea pigs of Vozrozdanya.

“What McDonald learned back in 1970 is still true today. The Russians transmit the germs in the jet stream, which passes from east (Russia) to west (the United States). The operation is diabolically simple. Small missiles are introduced into the jet stream, carried by it to the U.S. Once there, these missiles are timed to release their nasty cargo over any given section of our country. ...the Soviets (have) now gone far beyond the simple nuisance of a flu bug. They were (are) experimenting with lethal germs.... sheer devilry, designed to incapacitate—and perhaps eventually to kill—large segments of the American population, just in case the need for such an operation ever arose....

“Furthermore, the co-relation between activity on Vozrozdanya and new types of influenza in America is disturbingly exact. We believe that soon you may be getting something considerably stronger than influenza germs. Such in the price of friendship with Mother Russia.” (unquote).

Editorial update: While this letter was being prepared for publication, word was received that “State health officials have virtually ruled out swine flu, or any other type of influenza, as the disease that killed 23 people who attended last month's American Legion convention in Philadelphia." Being sought as the possible source "is a toxin or poisonous substance...likely a gaseous one that was inhaled rather than one carried in food or water."

A toxin carried in the air would make Hugh McDonald's reference to Soviet origin more plausible. In that connection, we are told that a semi-official group of private investigators has been formed to check on the possibility of sabotage at the Legion convention in Philadelphia.

When swine flu was ruled out as the agent, repercussions were felt immediately in the Halls of Congress. House and Senate Committees were rushing to comply with President Ford's demand for "a bill letting the government take the insurance risks for swine flu inoculation." But, when informed that "it wasn't swine flu," the Senators and Representatives held up the bill, decided to "wait and see what happens now."

The insurance companies also reacted. A dispatch from Washington said "The government's top health experts told Congress Thursday that the entire federal program to protect children against polio, measles and mumps is threatened by the same insurance problem blocking the swine flu inoculation program."

The insurance companies feel that the mass of medical malpractice suits that have been filed will be followed by a plague of suits against the drug producers; and the insurance companies are about to stop all such insurance—too risky.

So, HEW wants the Congress to pass a bill which would allow "injured citizens to sue the government" instead of the drug companies!

"Unless the law is passed," said HEW Secretary David Mathews, "the government may not be able to obtain the vaccines it needs to immunize children against other diseases this winter."

Just one comment: This might be a way of getting the Federal government off the backs of parents and State and local authorities; at least in this one area. Why should a Federal agency have the power to enforce mass inoculation programs? Whatever happened to the American "division of powers" system?

SUBSTITUTE FOR ERA?

It is generally conceded that the so-called Equal Rights Amendment is not going to be ratified soon—if ever. So, it would seem that certain back-door approaches that would serve the same purpose, are being made. For example, Reps. Davis and Holland of South Carolina have introduced a bill to bring back the compulsory draft under the Selective Service Act and "make female persons liable for registration, induction, and service." The key phrase: "Any words used in this Act which impart the masculine gender include the feminine gender as well."

Of course, in an election year there's no chance whatever for such a bill reviving selective service—even to accommodate the so-called feminists. However, there is one other bill which must be taken seriously. It is S. 2913, a bill "to Establish the National Center for Women, and for other purposes." Introduced by Sens. Ribicoff and Percy, and co-sponsored by Sens. Case, Leahy, Gravel, Abourezk, Javits and Kennedy; this bill has been read twice, referred to the Committee on Government Operations and could come up for "quick vote and passage" this session of Congress. Following are pertinent quotes from the bill. Comment will follow as space permits:

Sec. 2 (a) The Congress finds that—

(4) the economic and social development of the Nation would be enhanced if the full participation of women were assured in all areas in which the Federal Government has a role;

(5) there is, therefore, a need to reorganize and coordinate existing Federal agencies, commissions, and committees related to women's concerns in order to increase their effectiveness and efficiency; and

(6) there is, also, a need to establish a coordinated mechanism on the Federal level to implement the relevant portions of the World Plan of Action adopted by the United Nations World Conference Women's Year.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a National Center for Women in order to...serve as a clearinghouse to provide information on public programs and legislation of interest to women, and to recommend to the President and to Congress proposals to improve the status of women.

Sec. 3 (a) There is established a National Center for Women as an Independent agency in the executive branch of the Federal Government.

(b) The Center shall be headed by an Administrator who shall be appointed by the President....

(c) There shall be in the Center a Deputy Administrator who shall be appointed by the President....

(d) (1) (A) There shall be in the Center a National Board of Advisers. The Board shall be appointed by the President...

(3) In order to carry out the purposes of this Act, the National Board of Advisers shall-

- (1) maintain effective liaison with State and local public agencies, national and international governmental organizations concerned with the status of women or engaged in the administration of or monitoring of programs affecting women.

Sec. 4. (a) In order to carry out the purposes of this Act, the Center shall-

- (1) review, monitor, coordinate and evaluate all Federal agency programs which have an impact on women;
- (2) establish and maintain a clearinghouse on information of Federal, State and local public agency programs which are of interest to women;
- (3) make available and publish information on research relevant to women conducted by any Federal agency;...
- (4) conduct educational projects and research including holding conferences to improve the condition of women;
- (5) cooperate with Federal, State, and local agencies...in coordinating programs and activities on behalf of women;
- (6) refer complaints on sex discrimination received by the Center to the appropriate Federal agency;...

(b) (1) There are transferred to the Administration and the Administrator shall perform the functions of-

- (A) the National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year;
- (B) the Citizen's Advisory Council on the Status of Women established under Executive Order 11126, approved November 1, 1963, as amended by Executive Order 11221, approved May 6, 1965;
- (C) the interdepartmental Committee on the Status of Women established under Executive Order 11126, approved November 1, 1963, as amended by Executive Order 11221 approved May 6, 1965;
- (D) the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor;
- (E) the Women's Action Program of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare;
- (F) the Women's Rights Program Unit of the Civil Rights Commission; and...

(2) ...the functions of the Secretary of Labor administered through the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor....

Sec. 6. (a) There is established within the Center an Intergovernmental Task Force on the Status of Women. The Task Force shall be composed of-

- (1) an official of the Office of Management and Budget...;
- (8) ...of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare...;
- (9) the Director of the Federal Women's Programs of the Civil Service Commission;
- (10) a member of the Commission on Civil Rights; and
- (11) a member of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission....

(b) The Task Force shall-

- (1) assist the Administrator...

Sec. 12. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act for the fiscal years 1977 through 1981.

Sec. 13. The provisions of this Act shall take effect upon the expiration of the first period of sixty calendar days following the date on which this Act is approved by the President, or on such earlier date as the President shall specify by Executive Order.

The idea of a "National Center for Women" as an official part of the central government with its administrators, board of advisers, and special taskforce members all appointed by the President, is shocking in its possible ramifications. If a National Center for Women, why not a similar Center for children, for senior citizens, for Blacks, and Indians, and aliens—even a National Center for Men!

Notice how this bill would make State and local government employees subservient to the dictates of the Federal Center. States Rights and the concept of the "Balance of Powers" would be wiped out, and all would become slaves of a Central Government under the guise of providing freedom for female employees of public agencies and corporations.

This substitute could become more dangerous than ERA. Ask your Senators and Representative where they stand on S. 2913.

BALLOONING GOVERNMENT AND BLOATED BUREAUCRACY AILMENTS NATIONAL ELECTIONS CANNOT CURE

ENTITLEMENTS IS THE REASON

"The truth of the matter is that the Federal Government has become so huge and so pervasive that it is incomprehensible to the average American," declares U.S. News & World Report in a special article appearing in its current (Aug. 16) issue. To back up the statement, some facts and figures are offered:

* Five million Americans, one in every 43, draw federal paychecks. The Government employs some 2.9 million civilian workers in 11 Cabinet departments, 59 independent agencies, Congress and the federal court system. Another 2.1 million persons are on active duty with the armed services.

* The Government spends an amount equal to almost one quarter of the country's total output of goods and services. In doing so, federal workers wrote about 772 million checks in the last 12 months.

* Washington owns one third of the country's land—760 million acres. It holds title to 405,000 buildings that cost 91 billion dollars. It pays more than 663 million dollars a year in rent for another 54,000 buildings. In all, it occupies 433 million square feet of office space. That is equal to 96 Sears Towers, the 110-floor Chicago building that is the world's tallest.

* The Federal Government provides the cash for one fourth of the total spending of State and local governments. Grants this year will amount to 60 billion dollars.

* There are 4,504 different types of federal forms—down from 5,148 last year. The "official records" they generate each year would fill 11 Washington Monuments. To handle the paper work, the U.S. Government employs 211,000 secretaries, typists and clerks.

* Federal workers administer 1,026 different aid programs and get advice from 1,240 advisory boards. They deal with the public at more than 34,000 offices all over the U.S.

After citing the above, U.S. & W.R. concludes that despite the startling size of those numbers, "they only partly measure the sweep of the Government and its impact. For the federal bureaucracy, in one form or another, touches almost everything in American life—from such elemental things as air, water and food to complex operations such as the securities markets."

What makes the federal government so big? Mainly, the federal government has grown so great because of what bureaucrats and politicians call "A revolution of entitlements."

Throughout history, the gravest threat to individual freedom and the pursuit of happiness has always been the concentration of power over the people by some special or elitist group, exercised through the church, the state, in the name of Big Business or Big Labor, Big Brother or what have you. The genius of the American System lay in its ability to strike a balance between the powers that might deprive the individual of those unalienable rights of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." And America grew great, not because of what Government did for the people, but because of what Government permitted the people to do for themselves!

Conversely, the American Government grew great because it began doing for the people what the people should have been doing for themselves!

This is what is meant by "Entitlements." In the beginning there was no such thing as "entitlements" and the Constitution makes no mention of any such political doctrine. This is excellently illustrated by a veto message written by President Grover Cleveland back in 1887. The contrast between then and now is obvious. We quote:

"I return without my approval House Bill No. 10203, entitled 'An Act to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken counties of Texas, and making an appropriation (of $10,000) therefore.'

"It is represented that a long-continued and extensive drought has existed in certain portions of the State of Texas, resulting in a failure of crops and consequent distress and destitution.

"Though there has been some difference in statements concerning the extent of the people's needs in the localities thus affected, there seems to be no doubt that there has existed a condition calling for relief; and I am willing to believe that, notwithstanding the aid already furnished, a donation of seed grain to the farmers located in this region, to enable them to put in new crops, would serve to avert a continuance or return of an unfortunate blight.

"I can find no warrant for such an appropriation in the Constitution, and I do not believe that the power and duty of the General Government ought to be extended to the relief of individual suffering which is in no manner properly related to the public service or benefit. A prevalent tendency to disregard the limited mission of this power and duty should, I think, be steadfastly resisted, to the end that the lesson should be constantly enforced that though the people support the government, the government should not support the people.

"The friendliness and charity of our countrymen can always be relied upon to relieve their fellow-citizens in misfortune. This has repeatedly and quite lately been demonstrated. Federal Aid in such cases encourages the expectation of paternal care on the part of the Government and weakens the sturdiness of our national character, while it prevents the indulgence among our people of that kindly sentiment and conduct which strengthens the bonds of a common brotherhood.

Grover Cleveland, February 16, 1887."

Grover Cleveland was probably the very last President of the United States to insist on, and abide by, the principle that "when a man in office lays out a dollar extravagantly he acts immorally by the people." He believed in absolute noninterference in the social and economic lives of the citizenry. And, although the Constitution backed him up in this principle, the people did not. The opinion molders of that day were beginning to implant in the minds of the people the unconstitutional "concept of entitlements." As he lay dying in 1908, Grover Cleveland is said to have uttered these last words: "I have tried so hard to do right."

In contrast to Cleveland and the Constitution, note the following, which we quote from the special report appearing in the U.S. News & World Report of August 16:

RISING ENTITLEMENTS

Dumped into the lap of Uncle Sam have been just about all the problems and gripes people in American society have. Some voters believe they are entitled to get from the Government clean air, pure food and water, decent jobs and assured pensions, good housing and adequate space to play, an end to poverty and injustice, less noise and better public transportation, better health care and lower medical bills, less crime and less police harassment—to name just a few.

Responding to public pressure for such programs, Congress has passed a series of open-ended laws entitling millions of persons to claims on the U.S. Treasury. Some examples: welfare, medicaid and medicare, the food-stamp program.

The Economic Unit of this magazine estimates that some 45 million "entitlement" checks are received monthly, either directly or indirectly, from the Federal Government. This includes the Social Security system, which differs from many of the others in that future recipients and their employers contribute to the fund from which the checks ultimately are drawn.

That is by no means the entire cost of the entitlement revolution. The demand for clean air and water, for instance, translates into a new federal unit, the Environmental Protection Agency, with 10,975 workers, that will commit more than 3 billion dollars—mostly in grants—next fiscal year.

People want more culture, so the Government has the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities, with 2,298 full and part-time employees. The public wants uncluttered land for play and resources, so the Government keeps its vast land holdings and provides more than 14,500 forestry workers to help take care of them. . . .

As more and more federal agencies have been propelled into more and more new and Constitutionally-unauthorized fields, the Congress and the Courts have widened their scope as well. An example is given by Rep. Skip Bafalis (R-Fla.), who furnishes us with the following summary:

"More than twenty-one thousand bills, joint resolutions and concurrent resolutions—that is how many proposed new laws have been introduced since the 94th Congress convened 19 months ago. Some of those 21,516 have become law—fortunately, only a small handful. Another small handful have been defeated or passed only to die from a presidential veto. And if the American people have anything to be thankful for, it is the simple truth that most of those 21,516 bills, resolutions, concurrent resolutions and joint resolutions will never become law.

"There are bills to grant unconditional amnesty to draft-dodgers, deserters and other Vietnam War evaders, and bills to take handguns away from honest men and women, proposals to give convicts a broader base of civil rights. In fact, a listing of the 21,000-plus bills already introduced just by subject will run to 49 pages of small print.

"Fortunately, there just isn't enough time left for most of these proposals to go far enough to do any damage. But, as we've complained before, just the introduction of these proposals costs money. By statute, the Government Printing Office is required to print at least 3,000 copies of every bill introduced. And, depending on the length of the bill, the cost of printing alone can run over the $20,000 mark. It almost certainly did in the Senate's version of the tax reform bill. That monster weighed in at better than 1,000 pages.

"The cost of printing, the difficulty of keeping track of 21,000 bills and the changes made or proposed in each—not to mention the potential for damage—are all reasons why I and a number of other congressmen would like to see a moratorium on the introduction of new legislation."

NEW BROOM TO WASHINGTON?

The special USN&WR article from which we have quoted concludes with the following two paragraphs:

"One President after another since World War II has come to office promising to streamline the federal bureaucracy and has left office, almost invariably, with even more people working for the Government and even more money being poured out of Washington.

"Against this background, many question whether any President will be able to get control of the federal bureaucracy. Today's tide of opinion, however, suggests that when the 1976 election campaign is over, millions will be expecting the next President to succeed where those who came before him failed."

Responding to that expectation, even before his Republican opponent had been named, Candidate Carter said he intends to "take a new broom to Washington and do everything possible to sweep the house of government clean." He sealed his pledge by repeating to assembled members of the National Bar Association, the honor code of the U.S. Naval Academy, of which he is a graduate:

"We will not lie, cheat or steal, nor tolerate among us those who do." He said that code should apply to public officials as well as to cadets.

One of his promises: to reduce the size of Big Government. But even his most ardent supporters doubt his ability, or even his desire to do so. Example:

Fortune Magazine, the public organ of Big Business and High Finance, seems to take it for granted that Jimmy Carter is going to be the next President of the United States, in an eight-page article entitled "...And Now to Carterize the White House," and featuring pictures of those most likely to go to Washington with him, Fortune notes that the "horrible, bloated federal bureaucracy has become a main theme" with Carter, and "To correct that mess, he promises to cut the number of federal agencies from 1,900 to 200. But he may find this promise the wrong one to have chosen for the cornerstone of his presidency." Fortune then explains why:

"Cutting federal agencies is a beguiling but deceptive symbol for cutting the size and cost of government—something Carter has never actually promised to do. Actually, more than 1,250 of the 1,900 agencies Carter points to are federal advisory committees whose combined budgets amounted to some $52 million in 1975 out of total federal spending of $325 billion. Abolishing all these advisory committees would have no significant impact on federal employment or the budget, 98 percent of which is accounted for by only twenty agencies."

So, you see, Carter doesn't lie, but he does beguile and deceive, if we are to believe Fortune. He did the same thing in Atlanta as Governor of Georgia: he cut down on the number of executive agencies, but not on those that spent the most money and owed loyalties to certain special interest groups (those groups that often are spoken of as being connected with "The Invisible Government.")

To put it another way: Carter is going to cut 1,900 "agencies" down to 200, or so he promises. However, he is not going to touch those "11 Cabinet departments and 59 independent agencies" mentioned by U.S. News & World Report as being the agencies and departments that spend the big money, and that are controlled not by the President but by those special interest groups that make up The Invisible Government! And Carter, if he becomes President, is not going to close down those Ten Regional Capitals with their hundreds of sub-regional offices and their thousands of federal agents who control "almost everything in American life—from such elemental things as air, water and food to complex operations such as the securities markets."

That Jimmy Carter has no intention of actually "sweeping the house of government clean" becomes obvious when we look at Fortune's list of those most likely to go to Washington with Carter, to occupy the most important administrative positions in his new government.

For example, there is Felix Rohalyn, "a Lazard Freres partner who heads New York City's disaster squad," and who is named as Carter's probable choice as Secretary of the Treasury. Lazard Freres is, of course, one of the great International Banking Houses and its New York, London and Paris branches are said to manage or advise investments totaling $3,000,000,000; this according to Fortune. And according to Poor's Register (1964-68), Lazard Freres partners held directorships in Jones & Laughlin, National Fire insurance, Olivetti-Underwood, Owens-Illinois, Manufacturers Life Insurance, Chemical Bank-New York Trust, Harcourt Brace, Harper and Row, Libby-Owens-Ford Glass, Warner Lambert Pharmaceutical, Sun Insurance, RCA, Engelhard Industries, etc.

Harold Brown, president of Caltech, is now a Carter adviser and is slated to become Secretary of Defense; Brown is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Michael Blumenthal is the chief executive officer of Bendix International, is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, and is said to be Carter's choice for Secretary of Commerce.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, the Polish emigre who serves as executive director of Rockefeller's Trilateral Commission, is most likely to become Carter's choice for Secretary of State. As Fortune notes:

"Carter's view of the world has been mostly shaped by this Polish emigre, as well as by Brzezinski's Columbia colleague, Richard Gardner, and Henry Owen of Brookings. As executive director of the Trilateral Commission Brzezinski has for several years been feeding Carter (and other commission members) a stream of the writings and advice that spring endlessly from his brilliant and self-assured intellect."

Others who are mentioned as likely to go to Washington as members of the Carter team include:

Lawrence Klein, President of the American Economic Association and a chief adviser to Carter, is slated to become the new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

Alice Rivlin, presently director of the new Congressional Budget Office, is a "likely choice for the director of the Office of Management and Budget."

Andrew Brimmer of Harvard, a leading black economist and former member of the Federal Reserve Board, "is a likely candidate for another of the spots on the CEA."

Then there are the old party faithfuls who are currently serving with Carter or will be asked to serve with him in Washington: Ted Sorenson, Frank Mankiewicz, Milton Gwirtzman, Joseph Califano, Clark Clifford, Lester Thurow, Martin Feldstein. In all, Carter is talking about taking as many as 2,500 new people to Washington, to carry out the old maxim, to the victor belongs the spoils, insofar as civil service regulations and entrenched bureaucratic tradition permits.

If these people named in Fortune are the "new brooms" that James Earl Carter would take to Washington to "sweep the house of government clean," and to "re-establish confidence in the American system," then we're really heading for trouble. Those who would be swept out of government would be any remaining old-line conservatives and believers in the original Representative Republican system and in private enterprise. The last time such a shipment of "new brooms" arrived in Washington was in 1932 when FDR swept out the old American order and brought in the New Deal, which was the beginning of our national sorrows.

However, we neglected to mention that the copy of Fortune from which we have been quoting is the August, 1976 issue, not the November, 1976 issue. And there is always the possibility that farmer Carter and Juan Cameron of Fortune have been counting the chickens before they have hatched. Indeed, before some of them have been laid, since a Republican opponent had not yet been selected when this article (and this Report) was written.

But this much seems certain: No President is going to halt the growth of government or reduce the size of the bloated bureaucracy because this is the responsibility and the duty of the elected representatives of the people, the Congressman and the Senators you send to Washington. The President can never do it, but the Congressmen can reduce the size of government if they'll only do the job for which they were elected.

Furthermore, if we really want a return to Constitutional Government, we must act upon the principle enunciated by Cleveland: Though the people support the government, the government should not support the people.

BUT, WHAT ABOUT THE CONGRESS?

THE 94th THE WORST IN HISTORY?

Now that the two major national political parties have held their conventions and selected their standard bearers for the great event which occurs on the first Tuesday in November, it's time to turn our attention away from national political parties toward State political parties. We tend to forget that a national political party has only one legitimate function: to nominate candidates for the offices of President and Vice President. All other political offices in the land are filled by nominees of State political parties, or by independent candidates.

In the final analysis, the only national election we have in this country is for a President and Vice President, and it is held once every four years. But there are State elections at least once every two years, when United States Congressmen are elected and when one third of the U.S. Senators are elected, also in State elections.

We are inclined to place the emphasis on the wrong event, because these biennial State elections should be far more important to the voter than any quadrennial national election, even when the two events happen to coincide, as in 1976. That's because all Congressmen are elected at the State level; and the Congress is—or should be—far more important and far more powerful than Presidents or their appointees, which include the federal judges and members of the Supreme Court.

"With voter attention riveted on the upcoming presidential election," says a letter to the editor, "it is easy to forget that presidents enact no laws, they vote no appropriations and, what is more important, they repeal no laws. These are functions of the Congress, and we now have the worst Congress with which this nation has ever been cursed."

Although Representatives and Senators are the products of State elections, national pressure groups and special interests are brought to bear on State elections. And it is the opinion of our letter writer that:

"A majority of this Congress could reasonably be called a subsidiary of the AFL-CIO. They are elected by and for labor with the help of votes they can buy with the taxpayers' money from the welfare army. They have also won the black vote solid, with promises....The laborer votes for union control, the welfare recipient votes for more welfare. And who votes for the future freedom and prosperity of the nation? Just a handful of people who pay the bills. Yet both these prized possessions—freedom and prosperity—are threatened. They are threatened by hundreds, maybe thousands, of laws that cost billions and do good only for a few fat bureaucrats on big salaries....

"Unless the march toward even bigger government is checked, it will end in a bankruptcy in which the government will take over every farm, factory and business, including the unions." (unquote).

Our letter writer may have overlooked the fact that there are people—many thousands upon thousands of people—who want this Nation to "end in a bankruptcy in which the government will take over every farm, factory and business, including the labor unions." These people are often called Socialists.

This habit of placing fault on the President or the Supreme Court, or both, for most of our national ills, is a common practice among conservatives, including the editor of this Newsletter. But, if we read the Constitution carefully, and avoid modern interpretations and interpolations, we will find that if either the Executive or the Judicial Branches fail to perform the duties assigned them or overstep the limits of their authority and power, then it becomes the responsibility and the duty of the Congress to step in and take whatever action may be necessary—up to and including impeachment of officials—in order to restore the proper and Constitutionally-prescribed balance of powers between the three branches of the federal government. Likewise, if the Congress should fail to perform its assigned duties or overstep the limits of its authority and duties, then it is the responsibility and the duty of the citizenry to step in and take whatever action may be deemed necessary; or, in the words of the Declaration of Independence: "it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Now, to complete the circle, let it be said that if the citizenry should fail to perform the duties, obligations and responsibilities toward their government that are expected of them, then they are bound to be ruled by tyrants, and all freedom and prosperity will disappear—and such a citizenry can expect such a fate.

By way of illustration, let us take a current example: On June 15, 1976, there appeared in The Federal Register, Executive Order No. 11921, signed by President Ford. It is a 40-page document which will have the full power of federal law whenever a state of emergency may be declared by the President. EO 11921 is a compilation of several previous executive orders, the most important of which is EO 11490 which was signed by President Nixon on October 28, 1969, and which sets up a Bureaucratic Dictatorship whenever the President of the United States declares that a National Emergency exists and that the provisions of EO 11490 (now EP 11921) are in effect. As Gen. P.A. del Valle noted in his Alert No. 135: "Under a declared national emergency, the American people would be abject slaves. Federal troops and National Police have the authority to force their way into private homes, seize weapons, surplus food and water or anything else they want. Resisters can be killed, arrested or relocated, which means forced labor, or dragged off to concentration camps and government mental health complexes where they would soon die from forced experiments or become zombies...."

"... There are already thousands of trained terrorists bombing, raping, murdering and burning (the so-called legionnaires disease is a possible example—Ed.) And these people are certainly being paid by somebody whose interest is to create an emergency."

Gen. del Valle suggests that the following action be taken:

a. Bring to the attention of your congressional representatives the fact that Article I, Section I of the U.S. Constitution gives the Congress sole power of legislation. Executive Orders, therefore, when they become law, are in violation of the U.S. Constitution and in usurpation of the constitutional powers of the Congress.

b. Also remind the congressmen that there is no power granted them in the U.S. Constitution to divest themselves of their powers and duties and transfer them to the Executive or anyone else.

c. Tell them that, to permit this violation of their constitutional powers is, for them as a body, suicide.

d. Pray to our Lord to help us defend our country against the enemies of Christianity, guiding us and encouraging us. (unquote).

L. Lee Layton, Jr., who is a citizen of the State of Delaware, adds the following suggested action which can be taken at the State level:

"The 10th Amendment specifically limits the powers of the Federal Government to those delegated by the Constitution. Executive Orders, infringing on the legislative function, can be rejected by either Congress or State Legislatures.... The new General Assembly could be called the day after election day and a Joint Resolution passed, rejecting EP 11921. Assuming the Governor would call a special session, still, nothing helpful could happen unless a majority of patriots were elected to each House of the General Assembly.

"Consequently, more important than the offices of President or Governor, is the election of a patriotic and competent General Assembly. In every voting precinct in Delaware, the work of patriots is cut out for them."

What Mr. Layton says of Delaware is, of course, applicable to all States, and to the United States Congress as well, since Representatives and Senators are responsible to State constituencies.

But, let's go back for just a moment and see how these Executive Orders actually become law. In the beginning, a Congress agreed that it might become necessary for a President to declare a state of national emergency. So, an "open-ended" law was passed, granting the President the power to declare a national emergency under certain conditions, but leaving it up to the Executive Department to prescribe the specifics, make the rules and regulations and assign the penalties for non-conformance, etc.

So, acting on a general law, the President or his agent writes out an Executive Order containing all the specific details, has the EO published in The Federal Register, and if Congress does not reject the Executive Order within a specified time (usually 60 days) the Order becomes Law!

So, you see, in the case of Executive Orders affecting the lives and liberties of citizens, Congress was at fault in the first place by passing an "open-ended" law and permitting the Executive Department to fill in the details!

The same thing can be said of, for example, that especially onerous set of rules and regulations that is forcing small businesses into bankruptcy or absorption by a giant conglomerate. We refer to the Occupational Safety Hazard Administration (OSHA). An irate correspondent writes:

"This act is based on the premise that the builders and owners of factories don't care two hoots how often or how badly the workmen in the factory are injured. Therefore, it is the duty of Congress to send thousands of bureaucratic inspectors to check out every factory and see that there is no way a workman can possibly hurt himself therein. It is, of course, a terrific harrassment to industry and it runs the cost of everything manufactured to exorbitant cost.

"The fact is that industry has long been aware of the cost of injuries in factories. Most plants are carefully engineered for safety and most employ safety engineers who know a lot more about it than the arrogant and dictatorial bureaucrats that rule them. All workmen are fully protected by workmens' compensation. It costs about $250 million a year in tax money for this, but it costs billions in inflation. Labor ordered the law, so what could Congress do?"

Well, in the first place, Congress should have written a law that was complete in itself. Instead, Congress passed the Occupational Safety Hazard Act which created a new bureaucratic agency. Then Congress granted the necessary appropriations and then let the new agency write its own Administrative Laws by which it governs itself and all who come within its purview, making its own rules and meting out its own fines and punishments—and the Congress no longer has anything to say about what goes on between OSHA and its enslaved subjects!

Let us cite yet another example, which we might title: "How Regional Governance Came to the United States." All readers are, of course, familiar with the fact that this Nation has been divided into Ten Federal Regions, that each of these Regions has its own Capital City, where a Regional Council composed of appointed officials governs the Region in accordance with rules and regulations established by a Domestic Council in Washington, D.C. Each of these Ten Federal Regions is subdivided into sub-regions with subsidiary regional councils that govern at area and local levels, sometimes with total disregard of State and County lines, sometimes in cooperation with subservient State Governments. The ultimate aim, if and when the new "Constitution for the New States of America" replaces our present United States Constitution, is to do away with the fifty States and their Counties and Parishes, replacing them with Federal Regions and sub-regions, all administered by a Central Authority in Washington, D.C.

This Regional Governance System was introduced and established in the United States through a series of Executive Orders, signed by a President of the United States. Therefore we are inclined to place the entire blame for Regional Government on the Executive Department of the Central Government. In so doing, we overlook the fact that the establishment of Regional Governance would have been impossible if the Congress had not first authorized the program!!

In substantiation of this statement, we will quote from an official "Statement by the President on Restructuring of Government Service Systems," which was signed by President Nixon and issued from the White House on March 27, 1969:

"The Reorganization Act which the Congress has passed and which I am signing today gives the President important tools in his effort to make the machinery of government work more efficiently. As a part of that same effort, I am announcing today certain structural changes which I am making in the systems through which the government provides important social and economic services....

"...That work is not finished when a law is passed, nor is it accomplished when an agency in Washington is assigned to administer new legislation. These are only preliminary steps; in the end the real work is done by men who implement the law in the field....

"I. The first concern is to rationalize the way our delivery systems are organized. I have therefore issued a directive which streamlines the field operations of five agencies by establishing—for the first time—common regional boundaries and regional office locations. . . . I am asking all other federal agencies to take note of these instructions, and I am requesting that any changes in their field organization structures be made consistent with our ultimate goal: uniform boundaries and field office locations for all social or economic programs requiring interagency or intergovernmental coordination. . . .

"Further systematic restructuring is on the way . . ." (unquote).

And this was how it all began. President Nixon said that "it was possible for me to take these particular actions without the authority extended under the Reorganization Act." But had he done so, his action would have been so revolutionary that the Courts, or the Congress, might have intervened and prevented the establishment of the Regional Governance System. So, he waited until he had a general law without specific requirements or detailed instructions—an "open-ended law," if you will; and using this Reorganization Act as the authority, he then established step-by-step Regional Governance.

The Executive Department did it, but it required the written or tacit approval of the United States Congress before it could be accomplished!

Furthermore, the States could have put a stop to the establishment of a system that is going to destroy them. But there was the lure of the so-called Revenue Sharing, the special grants and subsidies and bribes for doing things in accordance with a Central Plan. So, State Legislatures permitted or aided in the establishment of federally-controlled regions and sub-regions.

We repeat: The Executive Department did the work, but the Federal and State Congresses either permitted, or aided and abetted the establishment of the Regional Governance System.

That's why we insist that it makes little difference whether Carter and Mondale, or Ford and Dole are elected next November 2. It is the Legislative Branch of Government, at both State and Federal level, which will either permit or prevent the acts of the Executive Department and its entrenched oligarcgic Bureaucracy.

But our situation as once free and independent citizens is hopeless if we continue to permit our laws to be made by "the worst Congress in history."

So, as L. Lee Layton, Jr. said in a slightly different context: "More important than the offices of President or Governor, is the election of a patriotic and competent General Assembly (or Legislature, at both State and Federal level) . . . the work of patriots is cut out for them."

There is one mitigating circumstance: The election of Senators and Congressmen is not a task of national scope; this is a State and local task; and one of critical importance.

John R. Rarick writes that F. Edward Hebert of the 1st Congressional District of Louisiana is retiring and "I have agreed to be a candidate for the U.S. House of Representatives in the November 2nd election running as an independent. . . ."

Then he says what we have been trying to emphasize in this letter: "Our only chance is Congress. After all, it is Congress that controls the government because Congress alone has control of the purse strings. We can win if enough independent, conservative, pro-American men are sent to Congress this Fall."

A similar message comes from John Grady who is running for the U.S. Senate from the State of Florida, who writes: "Time is running out. We must produce effective political action now! With God's help, and the willingness of each of us to dedicate himself to the preservation of our noble Republic, we can still pass on to our children the legacy of freedom that was given us by our forefathers."

The real weakness of the United States is the lassitude, lethargy and lukewarmness of the majority of its citizens. we need to remember the results of such a condition: "So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." (Rev. 3:16). This has its political as well as its spiritual application.

IS A NATIONAL EMERGENCY BEING PLANNED?

THE MONEY BARONS PLOT

While Americans are being entertained by the words and maneuverings of politicians who are seeking what are allegedly the highest offices in the land, some peculiar things are occurring behind the scenes, and trained observers are beginning to wonder if a national emergency—even another limited war—is being planned. The purpose: to bail out the monopoly capitalists and cartelists who have extended their resources dangerously in developing the USSR and her satellites, Red China and her colonies, and the underdeveloped areas of the so-called Third World.

We keep recalling that the anonymous author of The Iron Mountain Report (the report, not the book of that name) concluded that wars would always be necessary in order to sustain national economy and prevent overpopulation of the world. And we also have been reminded by a Republican partisan that whenever the time has come for another war, a Democrat is sent to the White House. He points out that in this century, every Democratic Administration has meant another war: Woodrow Wilson wanted to "make the world safe for democracy" by way of World War I. The next Democratic President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, created the "New Deal" and had to save the nation's economy by way of World War II. Then came Harry Truman and his "Fair Deal" which led us into the United Nations War in Korea. Next came John Kennedy's "New Frontier" and limited involvement in Vietnam; this to be followed by Lyndon Johnson's "Great Society" and a full scale war in Southeast Asia.

And now there is the definite possibility that another Democratic Administration is about to take over, and that history might repeat once more.

Let it not be thought that we are condemning Democrats or praising Republicans; like the late John L. Lewis, we say, "a plague on both your houses." It's just that The Planners, whenever war seems necessary for their economic and financial survival, have used the Republicans to set the stage, and the Democrats to do the acting.

A part of the "stage setting" involved the reinforcing and the bringing up-to-date of a series of previous Executive Orders that had to do with the imposition of a federal dictatorship whenever any President of the United States is inveigled into declaring a national emergency. Hence this latest EO 11921 which was signed by President Ford and published in the Federal Register on June 15, 1976. So, the stage is set, but the actors have yet to take their assigned positions on the stage; or so this reporter believes.

The so-called Legionnaires Disease may have served as a preview of the terror that could cause millions of Americans to give up freedom in favor of supposed protection under a dictatorship. Certainly the Swine Flu scare with its program of mass inoculation does produce fear, and leads to dependence upon the Central Government for survival. A wholesale belief in extreme danger can cause a whole body politic to ask for a declaration of a state of national emergency and to accept with gratitude whatever form of slavery that may accompany such dictatorship. This is especially true if the "extreme danger" involves war and an attack on one's homeland.

But why should a national emergency be required? Here is a part of the answer:

The Paris-based International Herald Tribune on June 28, published an article that was censored in the American press. It said that seven banks dominate Wall Street. In the order of their importance: Morgan Guarantee and Trust, Citibank, Banker's Trust Co., Chase Manhattan Bank, Mellon National Bank of Pittsburgh, United States Trust Co. and Manufacturers Hanover. Quoted in the article is Professor Roy Schotland of Georgetown University, who believes that "domination by Morgan and the other leading banks threatens the soundness of stock market prices, the safety of investors portfolios—especially pension fund portfolios in which public interest is acute."

This might not mean much to the average middle-class American, if it were not for the fact that these are the banks that are "developing" industry in the USSR and the so-called Third World—and this effort leaves them shaky.

A private research report declares that "the Rockefeller-led CFR banks have loaned so much money to the Soviet Union that they are almost at their legal lending limits. Federal law forbids American banks from loaning more than 10 per cent of reserves and capital that can be assigned to any one borrower or entire country. Last year Soviet hard currency indebtedness to Western banks rose to $32 billion, up dramatically from $22.5 billion in 1974.

On January 11, 1976 there appeared in the English language edition of a European paper (but not in the U.S. press) an article headlined: "Chase Manhattan, Citibank Appear on U.S. Problem List." The article informed its readers that "Two of the three largest banks in the United States have been placed on a list of problem banks by the U.S. controller of the currency. New York's First National Bank (Citibank) and Chase Manhattan Bank, with combined assets of $100 billion, were placed on the problem list after bank examinations disclosed 'inadequate' capital at both banks and sharp increases in assets of questionable value compared with previous examinations...."

In a companion article which we are told also was never published in the U.S. David Rockefeller, chairman of Chase, the world's third largest bank, "declined to confirm or deny that Chase was classified as a problem bank and he would not discuss the examiners' findings, saying their reports are 'privileged.' 'If you have the information, you're not entitled to it,' Mr. Rockefeller said."

This information does not mean that Chase or Citibank are going to close their doors, declare a moratorium or become bankrupt. But it does mean that they and the five other banks "that dominate Wall Street" are going to take steps to maintain their positions in the financial world, even if the declaration of a national emergency or a limited war is necessary!

There is yet another important reason why the money managers may find it necessary to take extreme measures:

International Bankers created, and they are determined to maintain in all national, regional and world governments, a Central Banking System. In the United States that Central Banking System is known as the Federal Reserve, and those same banks that dominate Wall Street also dominate the Federal Reserve Banks!

And—the directors of the Federal Reserve Banks are being criticized from both the political right and the political left.

The House Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing is currently investigating the Federal Reserve and the staff of that committee has produced a report which is quite critical of the Fed. The report is titled: "Federal Reserve Directors: A Study of Corporate and Banking Influence." The report has not been officially adopted and we are sure that parts of it do not reflect the views of all committee members. But Committee Chairman Reuss concludes his introduction to the report with this statement:

"Until we have basic reforms, the Federal Reserve System will be handicapped in carrying out its public responsibilities as an economic stabilization and bank regulatory agency. The System's mandate is too essential to the nation's welfare to leave so much of the machinery under the control of narrow private interests. Concentration of economic and financial power in the United States has gone too far. We should celebrate our Bicentennial by reversing the trend away from Thomas Jefferson."

And this spotlights the difference: Liberals like Reuss (and Senators Humphrey and Javits who have introduced a bill on the subject) want to reform the Fed, but true Constitutionalists want to do away with the system and return the power "to coin money (and) regulate the value thereof" to the United States Congress.

The Federal Reserve System is composed of

- 1) a seven-member Board of Governors in Washington who are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Members serve staggered terms of 14 years. Arthur Burns is current chairman.
- 2) Twelve Regional Banks and 25 sub-regional branch banks. Each regional bank has nine directors: three Class A directors who are elected by and represent the stock-holding banks; three Class B directors who are elected by these same stock-holding banks, but who supposedly represent their region in industry, commerce, agriculture, but not as bankers; and three Class C directors who are appointed by the Board of Governors. Note that two-thirds of these regional directors are elected by stock-holding member banks.

3) The Federal Open Market Committee consists of the seven members of the Board of Governors and the twelve presidents or vice presidents of the regional banks, of whom only five of the latter may vote at one time. This Committee establishes the Fed's open market policy for the buying and selling of securities and for operations in foreign currency.

4) The Federal Advisory Council is composed of one member from each of the 12 regional banks, meets in Washington four times a year, and advises the Board of Governors on what its policies should be.

5) The Member Banks (about 5700 at this writing) who own all the stock in the Federal Reserve Corporation, and are entitled to 6% per annum dividends but cannot vote.

This House Committee Staff Report which we have mentioned previously (we agree with its facts and figures but not with its recommendations) points out that the 108 directors of the 12 regional banks form a financial elite that has become monolithic; the big bankers on the boards "are also directors of big corporations, oil companies, tool making concerns, insurance firms, mortgage and financial organizations, and large industrial concerns." The Report cites an example, and we quote:

"A Class C--'public interest' director--on the Cleveland Federal Reserve District Bank, Robert E. Kirby, is chairman and chief executive officer of the Westinghouse Electric Corporation, which has interlocks with such financial corporations as Pittsburgh National Bank, Citibank, Citicorp, the New York Stock Exchange, Bank of America, Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company, Hanover International Banking Corporation, Kuhn Loeb and Company, and CIT Financial Corporation. Is Mr. Kirby's assignment as a 'public' representative affected by the fact that he regularly sits down with and reports to a board honeycombed with directors who govern some of the bigger financial corporations? And do these financial institutions use this relationship with Mr. Kirby to influence Federal Reserve Policies at the Cleveland Bank?

"These 'secondary' interlocks are vividly demonstrated by the make-up of the board of directors of the New York Federal Reserve Bank. At least seven of the nine directors ... are chief executive officers or chairmen of boards of companies interlocked with virtually every facet of Corporate America and the financial community."

Following are the interlocks depicted by the House Staff of these seven New York Fed Directors:

Shown in the preceding is the financial and corporate power of only eight Federal Reserve Directors. Expand that to include all 108 of the directors of the twelve regional Federal Reserve Banks, and you will have some idea of the make-up of the "Invisible Government" which rules America. You will also understand why, if it seems important to the survival of the cabal, it is not beyond their ability to create a National Emergency and thus impose dictatorship, or bring about a limited war.

In this connection, Executive Order 11921 makes horrible sense. So does the fact of Mount Weather, a gigantic underground bomb shelter for a super-secret standby government, located about 46 miles west of Washington, D.C. And Mount Pony, at nearby Culpepper, Virginia, a 400 foot long shelter that is said to hold billions in cash, bank records, a computer-operated communications system, and accommodations for 400 Federal Reserve insiders. Other Federal Reserve shelters are also said to be located in a limestone mine in Western Pennsylvania, and in a salt mine at Hutchinson, Kansas. We doubt these facilities will ever be used. While total control is the goal and millions of Americans would trade their freedom for security, the would-be controllers are showing signs of desperation and other millions are beginning to ask the right questions. And the beginning of answers lies in what Gary North once wrote in a different context: "General Motors is not a house of prayer."

THE GREAT AMERICAN MONEY SWINDLE

BIGGEST CON GAME

On November 2, 1976, one President, one Vice President, 34 Senators and 435 Members of the House of Representatives will be elected and/or re-elected to Federal offices and will receive salaries ranging from $44,625 to $200,000 a year, and staff salaries, travel expenses and other allowances amounting to almost half a million dollars per year per congressman; and nobody seems to know just how much it costs us to keep Presidents and Vice Presidents in office.

Between now and November 2, all 471 of these successful candidates will have been campaigning and politicking, orating and promising impossible things. But few indeed will have answered honestly and unequivocally the one question which is asked most often of prospective office-holders. It's a double-barrelled question:

How can we reduce unemployment without increasing inflation; or how can we halt the inflationary spiral without increasing unemployment?

When asked that question—which must be answered and the answer acted upon if we are to survive as a free people—most politicians will equivocate, evade and side-step, but few will ever admit that their fancy salaries and allowances, and their legislative extravagances are the root cause of inflation and of unemployment as well!

U.S. News & World Report asks the question: "Can today's high level of unemployment be cranked down drastically in the next four years without touching off new spurts of inflation?" But the newsweekly does not give the answer, other than to insist that the controversial Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Bill, which has the backing of the National Democrats, the AFL-CIO and Jimmy Carter, is not the answer.

Paul Samuelson, Newsweek's columnist-on-matters-economic, agrees that "The specter that haunts any person of conscience today is the persistence of high rates of unemployment." He goes on to say that "The reason why a Ford, or even a populist like Carter, doesn't call for a spending program big enough to bring unemployment down... is fear that such monetary activism will re-activate inflation." That, of course, is no answer, it's just part of the question.

The conservative columnist and ex-diplomat Henry J. Taylor came closer to a real answer when he recalled that FDR took the gold out of the dollar and that "To this day we are still suffering the inflationary consequences." Then he added: "Today, governments do not go broke. They merely print more and more paper money. This is precisely what we are doing in the United States. ...Our dollar is in trouble because our politicians put it there. The federal budget is plagued by an immense list of subsidies and outmoded federal programs about which our politicians do nothing. We citizens are trapped in the backwash of unlimited government overspending, endless deficits, pork-barrel politics, etc. Like all governments everywhere, Washington merely issues paper money and sells government IOUs (bonds) to cover the deficits. No wonder some suggest that the paper money be used only to pay our politicians' salaries.... Generation after generation has learned—the hard way—that gold weighs more and lasts longer than the pledges of politicians."

Hon. Larry McDonald is one of the few men in Congress who dares to call it treason when it is treason, caused an important article to be published in the Congressional Record of August 25, 1976. Because it answers questions that most politicians will avoid and evade between now and Nov. 2, we reprint Rep. McDonald's remarks and major portions of the article which he introduces. Quotation is from the Congressional Record of Aug. 25, 1976, pages E 4643-45.

We live in a procollectivist, progovernment age. The Government can get away with virtually anything if allegedly done in the collective interest of the 'public,' with scarcely any media or public voice raised in criticism. Yet the same action by an individual or private company is attacked viciously and denounced as immoral. For example, if a private company, whose products the public is free to ignore, gives money to officials of a foreign government, the company is denounced for bribing foreign officials.... However, when the U.S. Government, whose citizens are forced to support its programs through taxes, gives billions of dollars every year to officials of foreign governments specifically for the purpose of influencing decisions of their government, this is "foreign aid," motivated by the highest of ethical motives.

This helps explain the enormous silence regarding possibly the biggest swindle of them all: Inflation. Inflation is a fraud of such huge proportions that its very magnitude serves as a part of the defrauder's protection....

The following article entitled "The Biggest Con," which appeared in the June 1976 issue of Argosy magazine gives a good account of the enormity of the Government swindle. Possibly some crusader for morality in Government will want to pursue this.

THE BIGGEST CON

by Irwin A. Schiff

Money has ceased to exist in the American economy. Mr. Average American literally has no money in the bank, none in the stock market, none in his wallet or pocketbook. United States politicians, contrary to the Constitution and the U.S. criminal code, have conned all citizens out of their money savings.

To appreciate the scope of the Big Swindle, it is necessary to understand what "money" is and what it isn't. Money, like the wheel, was one of mankind's most important inventions. Before the development of money, all exchanges were on a barter basis—the trading of one good directly for another. Fortunately, society discovered that there was usually one commodity which would be accepted in exchange for all goods and services, and this commodity became money. In most societies, the commodities were gold and silver.

When a medieval merchant arrived in a city for, say, a trade fair, he obviously did not wish to carry his gold around or leave it at an inn where he was staying. Consequently he sought the local goldsmith who, for a modest fee, would store it for him. When a merchant placed his gold with the goldsmith, he received a receipt as evidence of his claim to his stored gold. When merchants conducted business they could transfer the paper receipts instead of transferring the gold itself. So these warehouse receipts for gold became "paper money"—more accurately, a "money substitute."

It is people's inability to differentiate between money and money substitutes that allows them to be continually swindled by the government. Historically, this is a game that governments never tire of playing and citizens never catch on.

A nation's legitimate paper money supply (currency) is nothing more than warehouse receipts for gold and silver stored in the national treasury, on exactly the same basis as those warehouse receipts first issued by goldsmiths in the Middle Ages. Initially, the U.S. issued an honest paper currency called a gold certificate. It stated: "This certifies that there have been deposited in the Treasury of the United States of America X dollars in gold payable to the bearer on demand." Gold certificates circulated in the United States until 1934, when the New Deal took away the citizen's right to own gold.

The government also issued silver certificates, which were discontinued in 1963. Given that type of paper currency, those who ran the U.S. government were discouraged from printing unlimited quantities of paper currency since they had to redeem it with gold or silver.

In its campaign of currency debasement, the U.S. government gradually switched from honest paper currency to the dishonest and fraudulent kind it now circulates. Federal Reserve notes, the only type of paper currency in circulation today, when first authorized in 1913, stated that they could be redeemed in "gold" at the U.S. Treasury or "in gold or lawful money at any Federal Reserve Bank."

When the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 made it illegal for Americans to own gold, the gold clause was removed from Federal Reserve notes. In 1963 the redemption clause on Federal Reserve notes was totally destroyed. Now it says only: "This note is legal tender for all debts, public and private." In other words, the Fed is under no obligation to redeem its paper IOUs. The situation is analogous to a debtor who's under no obligation to honor his debts. Since all Federal Reserve notes are now unredeemable, they are in effect IOU-nothings of the Feds.

Only gold and silver can Constitutionally be regarded as money, while all forms of paper money and less than full-bodied coins serve only as substitutes for money—and as such are correctly referred to as currency or tokens. However, since the U.S. government no longer requires that real money be exchanged for money substitutes, Americans not only do not have any money, they also do not have any currency—a money substitute for which no money will be substituted can hardly be termed a money substitute.

The U.S. government and most of the nation's economists and financial "experts" have convinced the public that inflation is an illusive economic force that manages to propel prices continually upward despite efforts to contain them.

There is nothing mysterious about inflation; the government could stamp it out tomorrow if it really wanted to. After all, inflation is conceived by government, nurtured by government, perpetuated by government. Inflation is government's silent partner. Inflation permits government to bestow increased "benefits" on taxpayers without the apparent need for increased taxes. Inflation permits the government to retire huge debts without being inconvenienced for honest repayment. Inflation creates an illusion of prosperity. Inflation effectively increases tax rates and tax levels without the need for increasing taxing authority. With the graduated income tax, inflation forces people into higher tax brackets. . . .

Whenever there's inflation, government is spending more than it collects in taxes and/or is increasing the supply of money and credit in relation to the production of goods and services. As the quantity of money and credit is inflated, prices must rise. So, price increases are not inflationary, they are merely the effects of inflation caused by government. To find out who causes inflation, find out who controls a nation's currency supply. Since in the United States, as in other countries, the government controls the currency, it is the government that does the inflating by permitting the currency supply to grow. . . .

Not too long ago I bought a candy bar for fifteen cents that had for many years sold for a nickel. "Well," I noted, picking the candy bar from the case, "its price has only increased 200 percent." However, when I removed the oversized wrapper, I discovered the candy was actually a third its nickel-priced size. Its price, therefore, had soared not 200 percent, but 600 percent. . . .

Inflation now benefits the debtor since inflation allows him to pay off his debts with cheaper money. Since the Federal government is the biggest debtor in the nation, it pursues a monetary policy which will benefit the debtor class, since even a one percent increase in inflation permits the government to wipe out $50 billion of its debt. Strange as it seems, the debtors are not at the middle or lower income levels; they are the upper income classes. It is the lower and the middle classes that put their savings in the bank. It is the upper economic classes that borrow these savings from the bank to acquire businesses, larger homes and increase their control over industry and natural resources. So, unlike Robin Hood who stole from the rich to give to the poor, the government steals from the middle and lower classes to give to the rich.

The U.S. public debt, larger than the combined debt of all other nations in the world, has now reached astronomical proportions and is far greater than Americans realize. The president's 1976 budget reports the national debt as $538.5 billion as of June 30, 1975, when, in reality, the national debt is over $5 trillion or ten times greater than reported. The public does not realize the full extent of the national debt because the government conceals the extent of the indebtedness by citing only its "funded" or "bonded" debts, failing to report its "unfunded" and contingent liabilities. Unfunded government liabilities can be understood by considering the situation of a soldier discharged from the service with a government pension of $300 a month. The government's obligation to pay $300 a month is as great as if the government redeemed a $300 government bond each month. However, in the case of a veteran's payment, no government bonds are issued: the government's liability therefore, is "unfunded" in contrast to bond redemptions which are reported as part of the national debt. The national debt, as officially reported, is only the tip of the iceberg of what the government has committed the U.S. taxpayer to pay.

The concept of the U.S. "national debt," like so many other terms coined by the U.S. government, is a form of Newspeak, the language described in George Orwell's book, 1984—a process by which government distorts the meaning of words so as to confuse and to tighten its grip on society. The U.S. government employs Newspeak when it refers to its practice of "borrowing money" to finance government deficits. Total government debts soared from approximately $20 billion in 1930 to nearly $5 trillion in 1975, an increase of 25,000 percent in just forty-two years. Since the government evidently does not pay back what it borrows, it does not borrow. How can one go on year after year spending more than one earns? Since the U.S. government does not borrow or exist on charity, it must be stealing.

Is the surreptitious taking away of an individual's purchasing power through the use of a government printing press any less effective than when it is done with a gun and a mask? Is counterfeiting less of a crime when practiced by the government than when it is carried out by private individuals? I think not.

Let's consider another multibillion dollar fraud, Social Security. Government officials over the years have told the American public that Social Security is an "insurance program" employing sound principles of funding and financing. The public is constantly reminded of the Social Security "trust fund." What constitutes this trust fund? Cash in a multitude of banks? Corporation stocks and bonds? Not at all. The U.S. Treasury reported that, as of June 30, 1973, the Federal Old Age Survivors Insurance Trust Fund, the Federal Disability Insurance Trust Fund, and the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund collectively owned about $48 billion worth of government bonds, held in the "insurance trust funds" in order to help defray Social Security liabilities. Those government bonds are worthless in the hands of the government. A bond is not an asset when held by the maker of the bond. For example, suppose you gave someone an IOU (you, of course, recognize that a bond is nothing more than a formal IOU). That individual could treat your IOU as his asset. You, of course, could not write yourself an IOU and treat it as your asset. But this is what the government does when it passes off its bonds as "assets" of government "trust funds." Insurance companies do not indiscriminately spend their premium income on projects and then leave their own IOUs (bonds) in the company till. If they did, they would be shut down and their officers carted off to jail.

All monies collected in the past through Social Security taxes have already been spent. This money was spent not only to meet past Social Security obligations, but to fight World War II, and the Korean and Vietnamese wars. It was used to bribe farmers not to grow food, finance Congressional junkets, support the UN, and pay for landing on the moon. The bonds held by the Social Security trust funds are reminders of Social Security collections that have been spent on other projects.

Since the Social Security System does not operate on a legitimate reserve principle, as does insurance, then by what funding principle does it operate? The principle of the chain letter! Wage-earners entering the bottom of the chain send their contributions, along with others moving up the chain, to those workers who have made it to the top (those becoming eligible for benefits). Is it conceivable that such an endless chain can really continue generation after generation? Look at what is happening. When Social Security was adopted, the maximum proposed tax was to be 3 percent withheld and 3 percent paid on a maximum salary of $3,000, giving a total proposed maximum tax of $180.

In 1975, the maximum tax reached $1,650. In only thirty-five years, therefore, the maximum tax has soared over 800 percent. At this rate of increase, those who are now twenty-five could find the maximum tax at age sixty to be $13,000. . . .

In order for Americans to proceed with a program to correct the nation's economic and social ills, it is essential to realize that the United States government is the problem. U.S. Government, Inc., is just another big American business like General Motors or Exxon, only much larger and less efficient. It differs from most businesses in that it (1) is nonprofit, (2) is largely unregulated by either law or competition, (3) is a monopoly, and (4) can compel us to buy its services, regardless of how unnecessary, overpriced and destructive they might be. U.S. Government, Inc., cannot be expected to relinquish its power and influence voluntarily, so responsible and patriotic citizens must organize and force it to cut back. . . . CANDIDATES DON'T DISCUSS THE SILENT REVOLUTION

"WITHIN THE FORM, BUT "WITHOUT OUR CONSENT

"Until the citizens of this nation realize what regional planning will mean to them, personally, and become aware that they are electing men and women who permit such action to continue, all the protests and legal action are simply an exercise in futility.... This is revolution - the 'new American Revolution - within the form of our legal government, but without the consent of the people."

So concludes a current article on The New American Revolution, by K.M.Heaton. It is an accurate summation of a condition that is literally destroying our Constitutional form of government. The situation is made even more serious by the fact that Regional Governance isn't even considered an important political issue; and most of today's candidates for political office won't talk about the issue. Or, if they do consent to talk about Regional Governance, it soon becomes apparent that they don't really know what they are talking about. Or, if they do seem knowledgeable on the subject, then they defend the concept by saying it's time for a change, etc.

Therefore, it seems appropriate that somebody set down the "ABCs" of Regional Governance in such a way that candidates for public office may read, perhaps understand, and then either accept or reject - publicly and for the record - The Concept of Regional Governance. This we shall try to do in this letter, the inspiration for which comes from a private citizen, Eunice R. Reuter, of Marion, Indiana. Mrs. Reuter addressed an Indiana Regional Government Legislative Study Committee, and sent us a copy of her excellent presentation. Much of what follows in this letter is borrowed from Mrs. Reuter's manuscript.

First, it is necessary to know that we are dealing with a subject that has many names and titles. To mention a few: Metro Government, Home Rule, Unigov, Intergovernmental Arrangements, The New Federalism, Master Planning, Comprehensive Planning, The Silent Revolution, etc.

Next, we need a definition, and we may as well use one that is supplied by the Regionalists themselves. In the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) publication, "Multistate Regionalism," we find the following:

"Starting as a geographic concept, it (Regionalism) gradually was regarded as having economic and social qualities... regionalism has attitudinal, economic, geographic, and social dimensions which have caused it to be used for political, administrative, and planning ends... regional planning is a management tool for preparing programs and objectives of public policies that have a regional dimension."

"Regional dimension" does not refer to city limits, county lines, State borders, or even National boundaries. This is made clear in a book published in 1962 by Nelson Aldrich Rockefeller, then Governor of New York, currently U.S. Vice President-by-appointment. Titled "The Future of Federalism," his book relates regionalism to federalism as it can be applied to the development of a world government. He suggests a World Federation of Nations patterned after our own federal system, but with a regional arrangement for attaining and maintaining the world federation. He wrote:

I have long felt that the road toward unity of free nations lay through regional confederations... I suggest to you that the federal experience within this nation is directly pertinent to all these great challenges before the world community... just as the operation of our own national economy and social life is interdependent with a federal system of government... so just as dramatically do the economic and social workings of a free economy in the world require movement toward a federal idea, bringing order to the chaos of nation-states. I was wholeheartedly committed to the battle at the San Francisco Conference in 1945 for the inclusion of Article 52 in the United Nations Charter to permit regional arrangements within the U.N. framework. And I certainly do not now abandon my belief in the value and importance of regional arrangements among free nations. (End of quote).

So, combining ACIR's definition and Nelson Rockefeller's explanation, we come to the understanding that Regional Governance is a system of control and management that is designed to affect every area of human existence—attitudinal, economic, geographic, and social—on a world-wide scale.

The next thing we must understand is that this Concept of Regionalism is unconstitutional and totally alien to the American system of government. The United States Constitution and the Constitutions of the fifty Sovereign States set forth explicitly a system of governing through legitimately approved and designated units of government for Nation, State, County, Township, city, town, judicial circuit, school district, etc. In no instance is government by region ever mentioned. To use the Regionalists' own words: ACIR's book, "Multistate Regionalism" admits:

"The federal system does not have a regional quality per se."

and again:

"the region does not have a formal place in the political system."

And yet, unconstitutionally, Regionalism has planned and programmed a new set of governing units for us in the form of state planning agencies, substate regional areas, UMJOs (umbrella multi-jurisdictional organizations), COGs (councils of governments), Economic Development Districts, River Basin Areas, Coastal Zones and Sewage Districts, Health Systems Zones, Conservancy Districts, etc., to name just a few of the regional arrangements which are usurping the power and controlling the purse in our Nation and States.

The first direct application of Regionalism in the United States was well ahead of its time and had international overtones, in that it concerned the establishment of a Central Banking System (so we would be like the nations of Europe.) With the installation of the Federal Reserve System, the Nation was divided into twelve regions, with a federal reserve bank to control the flow of currency in each region.

It is interesting to note that while the Federal Reserve is a semi-autonomous, independent agency, it has nevertheless modernized itself in one respect: It has adopted the control system that is being used by all departments and agencies of the Federal Government. To maintain absolute control "at the top" over all regional agencies, the government adopted a system originally called the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System (PPBS). However, the name proved to be too cumbersome for easy use and an alias was sought; so that now the system is generally known as "Management By Objectives (MBO)". In this connection, a paper on the subject of "The Study of Financial Institutions and the Nation's Economy" by Thomas Mayer of the University of California, was submitted to the House Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing. One sentence in this paper reads:

"Since Federal Reserve Banks are adopting a 'management by objectives' system this means that a committee of directors has to undertake an elaborate evaluation of the president's performance." (Reference is to the president of the Federal Reserve Bank, not of the President of the United States.)

This should serve to dispel the rumor that "PPBS" is dead; it merely changed its name, while still serving as the control mechanism for all regional arrangements.

Then in 1945 came Nelson Rockefeller's scheme for the regional arrangement of nations, as embodied in Chapter 8, Article 52 of the United Nations Charter, whereby "regional arrangements" between nations are encouraged "provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations." Such "regional arrangements" are NATO, SEATO, OAS, OAU, CENTO, COMECON, the Warsaw Pact, the European Economic Community, OECD, the League of Arab States, etc.

Within the United States, domestically, the word "regional" or its synonym "intergovernmental" was first used officially in relation to our government in 1953. It was in this year that the "Knestnbaum Commission" was appointed and commissioned to continue the work of the old "Hoover Commission on Organization of The Executive Branch of The Government. Whether by plan or by chance, within two years of this Nation's entry into the United Nations, we had taken the first major official step in the re-organization of the Executive Branch with the passage of the Reorganization Act of 1949 and the creation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The Knestnbaum Commission did not stop with reorganizational plans for the federal executive department; it went on to extend its reorganization into all areas of government, including state, local and intergovernmental (regional) relations. Among its other actions, the Knestnbaum Commission recommended the establishment of a permanent body for the purpose of continuing governmental reorganization and change. This permanent commission was given the name "Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations." (ACIR). It is composed of 26 appointed members from both the public and private sectors of the nation. These appointees take upon themselves the authority to investigate any problems or issues which they deem frictional areas in government. They then recommend policy that will reform and reorganize our constitutional system according to an intergovernmental-regional-solution. At the same time, this solution will be found to conform to the general policy for intergovernmental arrangements of the member nations of the UN.

ACIR is assisted in its policy formulations by a number of nation-wide organizations, among which are the National Governors Conference, the Council of State Governments, the National League of Cities, the Conference of Mayors, the National Association of Counties, the International City Management Association, the Office of Management and Budget, and the other members of the original "1313."

ACIR tells us that Regional Planning is important because "it reflects the attitudes and techniques that will be used for the organization of governmental power." And Regional Planning is a management tool for "preparing programs and objectives of public policy that have a regional dimension." To be sure of that "regional dimension," the United States was restructured into ten Federal Regions; then the States were subdivided into regions, the number of such sub-regions depending upon the size and population of the State.

We should bear in mind that this restructuring of nations into regions was not limited to the United States. All of the so-called Western Nations have been "regionalized," as have Soviet Russia, Communist China, and the nations of Eastern Europe. Since the formation of the United Nations, the concept of regionalism has been introduced into all member nations and has been installed in many nations by special agencies of the United Nations.

Here is a kind of paradox that should be explained: While the United Nations Organization is, in itself, comparatively powerless and little more than a debating society, the Specialized Agencies of the UN are powerful and important. The General Assembly of the UN is controlled by the "Third World" and the mini-nations and is generally ignored and regarded as a very expensive toy by USA, USSR, UK, and the industrial nations of Western Europe. The Security Council is anything but "secure" and it is probably being replaced by Rockefeller's Tri-lateral Commission. The International Court of Justice renders decisions that are disregarded by alleged offending nations. The Trusteeship and the Economic and Social Councils of the UN now are little more than offices where international bureaucrats get lavish salaries for doing practically nothing. But those Specialized Agencies are "something else." IMF, UNESCO, WHO, FAO, GATT, and the UN's Regional Economic Commissions, are respected and maintained and financed by the United States especially and treated as though they were cabinet-rank departments of a functioning World Government. And they lend themselves to the development of Regional Arrangements between Nations.

In other words, the UN parent organization is little more than a very expensive forensic society, but its offspring are powers to be reckoned with, because out of them come Genocide Conventions, Covenants of Human Rights, International Treaties, and Regional Arrangements.

We include this explanation because The Concept of Regionalism is not a domestic issue, but a world-wide program leading toward the creation of a World Government along the lines laid down by the Rockefellers, whose CFR built the United Nations, whose money housed it in New York City, and whose agents arranged that the citizens of the United States should pay for its upkeep.

These same Rockefellers, by the way, provided the home and facilities for the original Terrible 1313, which aids and abets ACIR.

Total Regionalization of the United States cannot be completed so long as there are fifty independent and sovereign States in the Union, each guaranteed a republican form of government by the U.S. Constitution. And the methods that have been utilized to reshape or do away with the States are varied and somewhat successful. The Council of State Governments launched a campaign to rewrite State Constitutions so they would all be uniform, increase the power of the Governor while decreasing the power of the Legislative Branches, and making them administrative agencies of the Central Federal Executive Department. According to a booklet, "Modernizing State Constitutions, 1966-1976," issued by the Council of State Governments: "State constitutions are instruments of power." And the booklet tells how the States should "modernize" their instruments of power. As a result, Illinois, North Carolina, Virginia and Montana have scrapped their old State Constitutions and have adopted new ones, while other States are revising their original constitutions by way of amendments.

Incidentally, in 1970 ACIR accepted for study and possible approval that proposed new constitution for a "United Republics of America" which had been prepared by Rexford Guy Tugwell and associates at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions at Santa Barbara, California. ACIR was not in agreement, so Tugwell revised and now has presented a draft Constitution for the New States of America. Whether this new version meets ACIR's approval we have not learned.

In the development of Regionalism in the United States Public Law 90-577, the "Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968" is important. It is responsible for the many agreements which implement federal policy at state and local levels. The preamble to PL 90-577 says the law's purpose is:

"To achieve the fullest cooperation and coordination of activities among the levels of government in order to improve the operation of our federal system in an increasingly complex society... to establish coordinated intergovernmental policy and administration of development assistance programs, to provide for the acquisition, use, and disposition of land within urban areas by Federal agencies in conformity with local government programs, to provide for periodic review of Federal grants-in-aid, and for other purposes."

In effect, this places agencies of the Federal government in charge of all state and local programming, especially where land is involved. This is made clearer by Section 109 of this law, which contains a definition of "comprehensive planning." It includes, and this is important:

- (A) Preparation, as a guide for governmental policies and action, of general plans with respect to
 - (1) the pattern and intensity of land use,
 - (2) the provision of public facilities (including transportation facilities) and other governmental services, and
 - (3) the effective development and utilization of human and natural resources.
- (B) long-range physical and fiscal plans for such action.
- (C) programming of capital improvements and other major expenditures, based on a determination of relative urgency, together with definitive financing plans for such expenditures in the earlier years of the program,
- (D) coordination of all related plans and activities of the State and local governments and agencies concerned; and
- (E) preparation of regulatory and administration measures in support of the foregoing.

Other provisions of PL 90-577 are equally ominous; and armed with such a blank check ACIR and the federal regulatory agencies went to work in their ten Regional Capitals, armed with other federal laws, the revenue sharing program, and guidelines prepared in conformity with the "Management By Objectives" System. And if this is not enough to complete the New American Revolution "within the form of our legal government, but without the consent of the people," then there is Executive Order 11921 which the Chief Executive can invoke to complete the job.

We repeat: Until the citizens realize what regional planning will mean to them, personally, and become aware that they are electing men and women who permit such activity to continue, all the protests and legal action are simply an exercise in futility.

RED TIDE AGAINST THE WHITES IN BLACK AFRICA

PAX KISSINGERAE IS THE REASON

Gerald Ford was busy politicking for the Presidency and "keeping an eye on a spend-thrift Congress," so he told his Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, to go to Africa and arrange for the transfer of all political power to the Blacks, and without the wholesale shedding of blood, if this were possible.

First, Kissinger flew to London where he conferred with the British Prime Minister and his Foreign Secretary. Then he went to Zurich where he briefed South African Prime Minister John Vorster; Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith declined to meet with Kissinger. Nevertheless, Kissinger announced a program specially designed for white Rhodesians, one that could be called an act of charity by anyone not familiar with the Conspiracy to create a New World Order. Actually, it amounted to the offer of a bribe to any white Rhodesian willing to commit treason against his homeland.

Kissinger proposed that if the white citizens of Rhodesia would desert their country—instead of remaining to fight against invading Red-trained guerrillas and terrorists—then they would be reimbursed for their property losses. Under the Kissinger plan, any of the 278,000 white citizens of Rhodesia who would "switch rather than fight" would be compensated for their property losses in Rhodesia, transported to another country, and there resettled and redomiciled; all this at the expense of the United States Government (which means the American taxpayers).

As one of Kissinger's senior policy advisers put it, according to columnist Paul Scott:

"We are telling the whites in Rhodesia that we'll make good your losses if you elect to leave or lose property in a black takeover of the country. This is the best deal available under the present circumstances. The alternative is the loss of everything, including your life."

The reason for such an offer of bribery: Kissinger's aides explained that Rhodesia could never be conquered by the blacks so long as the Rhodesian whites remained loyal to the present government. Therefore, such bribery would help erode support and there would be less bloodshed. (Of course, Kissinger doesn't call this bribery, he calls it foreign assistance).

According to the Scott report from which we have quoted: "Kissinger expressed the belief that Soviet and Cuban backed guerrilla warfare against the Smith regime would continue to grow and that a United Nations emergency military force would be needed before the end of the year 'to control the violence and arrange for the evacuation of whites from Rhodesia.' Once black rule was established in Rhodesia, the U.S. would be willing to underwrite an aid program that would run into the hundreds of millions over the next five to ten years."

In addition to the above, Kissinger has promised special aid to the black-ruled semi-states that are attacking Rhodesia, and medical aid is to be given the guerrillas and terrorists who are to establish black rule in Rhodesia.

This seems to be the deal: the Soviet Union will supply the arms, Cuba will provide the training and combat leadership, and the United States will pay the bills. Overall, Kissinger expects this program against Rhodesia to cost the United States about $30 million in 1976, $100 million in 1977, and $250 million by 1980. Asked in the U.S. Congress would support such large expenditures in southern Africa, Kissinger is said to have told a British official:

"There will be a lot of grumbling, but the Congress really has no other alternative if its members want to avoid involvement in another war. . . . These programs are all the price of keeping peace in the world."

"But the price is not high enough to buy us," is the consensus of black leaders who are supposed to supply the manpower for the takeover of Rhodesia. They want military aid as well as financial aid from the United States. In his current shuttle diplomacy act so reminiscent of his previous maneuverings in the Middle East, Kissinger is having trouble convincing the five big black leaders that he is doing things "for their own good." As members of the so-called Third World, they are accustomed to playing the Big White Power (United States) against the Big Red Power (Soviet Union) and/or the Big Yellow Power (Communist China), and wheeling and dealing with the three to obtain the best bargain possible for themselves. Neto of Angola, Khama of Botswana, Kaunda of Zambia, Nyerere of Tanzania and Machel of Mozambique are the Big Five Black leaders with whom Kissinger must deal. They all understand an auction-type offer, where the Big Powers try to outbid each other for the privilege of taking over the natural resources and "developing" their mini-state. But when these Big Powers seem to be working together instead of competing against each other (as actually happened in Angola) then the Big Black leaders begin to smell a conspiracy that may leave them holding an empty bag.

Besides, with their own people itching to revolt and start civil wars, the Big Black Dictators seem more concerned with keeping the peace in their own countries than with disturbing the peace in Rhodesia.

It must be understood that the American news media have managed to implant a totally erroneous view of the situation in southern Africa in the minds of the American public. Not since the media convinced the people that the late Mao Tse-tung was an agrarian reformer and that Fidel Castro was not a Communist, have the media been able to so hoodwink the mythical "average American citizen." The truth of the matter is: there is no serious racial unrest in Rhodesia; all the trouble has to do with foreign invaders, monopoly capitalists at the top and Red-led guerrillas and terrorists on the ground. Also: there is no racial tension of serious consequence in South Africa. The much-publicized riots and killings are brought about by blacks fighting blacks, and the police—blacks and whites together—trying to keep the peace.

The Christian Beacon of Sept. 2, 1976, is correct when it reports that the strife in South Africa is not Black versus White: "Contrary to all propaganda continually being fed the American people by the liberal press and liberal churches, the current clashes in South Africa have been between blacks.... Meanwhile, Secretary Kissinger, according to The New York Times, August 25, was trying to get South Africa's backing for his efforts to end the white minority rule of Ian D. Smith in Rhodesia,' a cause that is also promoted by the Communists. The Communists have helped to provide a doorway to 'freedom' which only leads the blacks of Africa into a new slavery."

Further confirmation comes in a letter from Mrs. Mary Jane Woram, a native of New Jersey who married a Rhodesian citizen and moved with him to Salisbury eight years ago. She is past president of the Salisbury Women's Club and chairman of a letter writing campaign appealing for support of the Rhodesian government. She writes, in part:

"We've had such bad press we felt a need to straighten people out on what's happening here in Rhodesia, to let them know it's not a black-white race war as it's played in the papers and that there's more at stake. The terrorist activity is straightforward Communist aggression. We want to urge Americans to come here to see for themselves and help prevent a tragedy, a bloodbath, a takeover by the Communists."

Then, unusual in that it appeared in a few metropolitan newspapers one of which was The Cleveland Plain Dealer of Sept. 14, there was an article by Robert N. Cleaves who spent seven years in southern Africa and still travels as a businessman to Rhodesia, Botswana, and Southwest Africa. He wrote:

"Recently I served as a front line observer with the First Rhodesian African Rifles, an all-black combat unit of the country's defense force that was repelling incursions by black terrorists from Mozambique. What I discovered is that, contrary to conventional wisdom in America and Western Europe, most black Rhodesians—at least those I encountered—are willing to fight to maintain their white-controlled government....

"Black Rhodesia consists of two major tribes, the Metabele and the Shona. Their history is one of constant intertribal warfare. It has only been since the introduction of a white buffer government that those tribes have managed to coexist peacefully. The majority of black Rhodesians fear that replacing Smith's white-controlled government would bring a return to tribal warfare and the establishment of an oppressive, elite, black minority regime (as has happened in most of "liberated" Africa—Ed.).

"As captured terrorists have told me, the turmoil in Rhodesia stems not from racism but from ideological conflict. Two of them I encountered at the front related that they had previously sought jobs at home, without success. That was when they yielded to Communist recruiters who offered them not only guns, uniforms and the promise of a university education, but also the white man's cars, farms and businesses....I asked them what would happen if the Rhodesian government were turned over to the black majority. They said terrorism would continue until a black government took over that was 100% Communist. Had they heard of the World Council of Churches? 'Yes,' they said, 'these are people who help support our revolutionary movements'." (End of quotation).

Not only is the World Council of Churches helping these revolutionary movements; the National Council of Churches is equally guilty. For example, on September 9, 1976, a Senate Office Building was utilized as a site for a conference with black African terrorists, and one of the sponsors was the NCC-affiliated United Methodist Church. Hon. Larry McDonald reported, on September 10, 1976:

"Yesterday, the Fund for the New Priorities in America, and the Women's Division of the United Methodist Church sponsored a congressional conference on Southern Africa in the Russell Senate Office Building. The invited panel of speakers participating included representatives of the Soviet and Communist Chinese-backed terrorist groups in Southern Africa who style themselves 'national liberation movements'....

"These terrorist conference participants clearly could not have been in this country without State Department waivers. The rhetoric at the meeting was shockingly vindictive, racist, and extreme. The Rhodesian terrorists were united in their opposition to Western nations subsidizing the evacuation of Rhodesian whites and called for a 'quick-kill' policy."

Participants at this conference included:

O. T. Emvula, South West African Peoples Organization (SWAPO), pro-Soviet.
Thami Mhlambiso, African National Congress (ANC) of South Africa, pro-Soviet.
Oliver Tambo, ANC, pro-Soviet.
David Sibeko, Pan African Congress of Azania (South Africa), pro-Red Chinese.
Eddison Zvobgo, Zimbabwe National Union (ZANU), pro-Red Chinese.
Elton Razemba, ZANU, pro-Red Chinese.
Tapson Mawere, ZANU, pro-Red Chinese.
Calistus Ndlovu, Zimbabwe African Peoples Union (ZAPU) pro-Soviet.

Basker Vashee, representing the Transnational Institute (TNI), the Netherlands branch of the Institute for Policy Studies (IPS), Washington's leftist think-tank that always takes a pro-Soviet and pro-Cuban line.

There is also the Patrice Lumumba Coalition, which operates from Room 826 of the National Council of Churches, 475 Riverside Drive, New York City. This NCC-supported PLC promotes revolutionary violence in South Africa as well as Rhodesia. In a mailgram dated August 23, 1976, PLC stated: "Since armed struggle is the only solution to injustices in Southern Africa, the U.S. government should give massive military aid to the liberation movements, i.e., ZILA, ZANU, SWAPO, PAC, and ANC."

On August 25, 1976, the PLC cosponsored an educational forum in Washington, D.C., at which the main speakers were Rev. Muhammad Kenyatta of Philadelphia and Representative John Conyers of Michigan. PLC stated: "Our strategic importance to the African revolution results from two factors. The first is that we are the largest visible aggregation of Black people outside of the African continent. The second is that we are a potential Achilles heel or Trojan horse that will either cripple the USA efforts to subvert African liberation or provide a political cover for that subversion."

PLANNED THAT WAY

The South African drama has developed as though it had been directed by a masterhand from the very beginning. In his 1976 New Year's message, South African Prime Minister John Vorster warned: "If Africa and the free world allow one African country, and a country of such strategic importance (as Angola) to be hounded into the Communist fold at the point of the bayonet or be ruthlessly liquidated, Africa will pay the price of enslavement far worse than that of the 18th and 19th centuries.... The choice before Africa and the non-communist world is plain—submit and pay the price, or resist."

And South Africa did resist, but was double-crossed and had to retire. Kissinger told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on January 29, 1976, that "the efforts of the Soviet Union and Cuba to take unilateral advantage of a turbulent local situation where they have never had any historic interest is a willful, direct assault upon recent constructive trends in U.S.-Soviet relations and our efforts to improve relations with Cuba."

And that was the extent of Kissinger's attempts to save Angola.

As Gary Allen points out: "Ever since his appointment as National Security Adviser to the President, Henry Kissinger has maintained that the Soviets placed 'a low priority on Africa.'... So while our attention was focused on the Middle East and the apparent Soviet setbacks in Egypt, the Communists have been preparing the groundwork for a Communist coup from the Sahara to South Africa. While all this goes on, it is Super K's policy to treat any friends the U.S. has left in the area as enemies, while insisting that our avowed enemies be treated as enemies.... No one in government - no one - challenges Kissinger's 'Grand Design' and gets away with it" (as former Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger and former Ambassador to the UN Daniel Moynihan were to learn to their sorrow. Both were friends of Kissinger, both were "on his team," both were fired when they opposed Kissinger's South African policy - Ed.)

The above quotation is excerpted from Gary Allen's sixth, and latest, book, "Kissinger: The Secret Side of the Secretary of State." The author documents the incredible difference between Kissinger's words and his record. Invaluable as a reference work to students of "The Conspiracy." Published in hardcover by Devin-Adair, 168 pages, $6.95. In his epilogue to the book, titled "The impact of Kissinger," Allen writes:

"Let's look at what has happened during the eight years Kissinger has held the reins of power in Washington. We know that this protege of the Rockefeller family was carefully trained and coached.... Moreover, it is beyond dispute that the chief goal of the Rockefeller family is the creation of what they call a 'New World Order.'... The master planners running the show know that Americans are not going to surrender their sovereignty - unless they feel there is simply no other alternative. In order to create the psychological atmosphere within America for acceptance of the New World Order, the Shadow (or Invisible) Government has had to build the Soviet Union into a credible threat. Achieving this has taken bluff and bluster, and literally billions of dollars in aid and trade. But it has finally been accomplished.... At least this is what Henry Kissinger and his masters in the Shadow Government hope has happened. If America has lost the will to resist, then our collapse - and the triumph of Kissinger's New World Order - are inevitable...."

It would appear that Kissinger's final act as Secretary of State will be the surrender of South Africa to the Communists. The loss of the Panama Canal is also a part of the game plan. When these goals have been achieved, the Soviet can be proclaimed as "Master of the Seas," and we will be told that we must "make a deal" with the Communists if we wish to survive....

Getting rid of Kissinger is important, but it is not the answer. Well programmed replacements are waiting in the wings. Jimmy Carter, the peanut agribusinessman who talks and smiles like a robot, has been trained by the best teacher in the Rockefeller school: Zbigniew Brzezinski. If Carter becomes President of the United States, "Zbig" will undoubtedly become Kissinger's successor. And the world-staged drama will continue, only the actors will have been changed.

There is an ominous precedent: Whenever a nation has been threatened with a Communist takeover, a "coalition government" is first suggested. Notable in this respect was General George Marshall's "peace mission" to China when he asked Chiang Kai-shek to make a deal with Mao Tse-tung, or else a violent takeover would be necessary. Kissinger is on such a "peace mission" as this letter is being written. "Make a deal with the enemy, or else the takeover will be with violence." So said Kaunda of Zambia to Kissinger on Sept. 16, 1976: "Your mission has got to succeed. If you fail we shall fight to the last man. The alternative is too ghastly to contemplate."

And the ultimate crisis, as the master planners reckon, comes when those words are said to Americans: "Make a deal with the enemy. The alternative is too ghastly to contemplate."

Gary Allen closes his book with the words: "The road to true peace with freedom does not lie with disarmament and detente, but in strength and resolve.... It is not too late to switch paths... But we must start now. And the order to change directions must come from you."

"HABITAT" AND THE NEW WORLD ORDER

UNO AS A SPRINGBOARD

"Is the UN on its last legs?" asks U.S. News & World Report as the representatives from 145 Nations and Mini-States assemble in New York City for the 31st annual meeting of the United Nations General Assembly. The newsmagazine then answers its own question on behalf of the chief nations in the world organization:

France has few illusions about the UN but feels the organization has a role to play. Italy thinks the UN has some value as a global sounding board. Japan believes that "something is better than nothing." Canada is of the opinion that the UN is a forum where everyone can speak his piece. West Germany is convinced that the UN is of little use in solving real problems. The Soviet Union thinks it is a great propaganda vehicle and the fact that the United States winds up on the losing side of almost every UN argument is a welcome bonus to the leaders in the Kremlin. And the United States believes, in the words of an official of the U.S. Government that "there are disadvantages in being in the UN. Many assembly debates are hard to take. But advantages outweigh the disadvantages."

The newsweekly did not say this, but the chief advantage of the United Nations to the internationalists, one worlders and monopoly capitalists is the fact that the organization, however impotent and troublesome it may be in other respects, can be used as a springboard, or launching pad, for new ideas and programs that will hasten the completion and establishment of this New World Order—an action which they hope to accomplish within this century.

In this connection, we have a timetable that was provided by Senator Jacob Javits of New York. According to him, the New World Order is due for installation on the 200th anniversary of the ratification of the United States Constitution in 1989! In a letter to Gordon Ginn, Executive Director of the National Justice Foundation, in which he defends his action in signing the controversial

Declaration of INTERdependence, Senator Javits wrote, in part:

"The purpose of this Declaration is to serve as the basis of a 13-year plan of action aimed at uniting national and world leaders creating a more peaceful and prosperous world community. This period coincides with the time between the Declaration of Independence in 1776 and the ratification of the Constitution in 1789.

"With our modern world economy, escalating international arms race, threats to our natural environment, concerns about raw materials, and widespread abuses of human rights, we are presented with problems that require an international as well as national response. Great as our nation's human and material resources are, even their preservation and development will take place in a world framework....

(signed) Jacob K. Javits, U.S.S."

So, along with this Philadelphia World Council programming over a 13-year period, and serving the same purpose, are a series of special sessions and conferences called in the name of the United Nations. Important examples:

There was the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment. Using its many decisions as a springboard for domestic programs, the Western Nations—especially the United States—began to adapt themselves to a World Environmental Plan, as laid down by the "experts" attending the UN Conference. Then came the UN World Population Conference; which became a factor in the promotion of "the pill" and in the new abortion laws in the United States. After that came the United Nations World Food Conference, backed up by the World Bank's Robert Strange McNamara who recommended the setting up of a World Food Bank in Nairobi, a plan that later received the blessing of Henry Kissinger, only to be turned down by the so-called Third World.

Then came a Second General Conference of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, the World Conference of the International Women's Year, and finally the most important of all: "The Declaration and Programme of Action" adopted by the sixth special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and the "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States" that established the basis of the "New International Economic Order."

These UN Conferences, Special Sessions and Charters were vehicles without power within themselves but, as we indicated previously, they served as launching pads for international and domestic programs that had the power of governments, foundations, and internationalist organizations behind them. The UN's "New International Economic Order" provides a typical example:

The Institute for World Order, 1140 Avenue of the Americas, New York City, has a special program for the schools of America which teaches the teachers how to teach about the New World Order. In fact, its very name is "Ways and Means of Teaching about World Order." Its service for April 1976 was all about the New International Economic Order."

Here are a few excerpts from the instruction sheet, written by Anita L. Wenden:

New International Economic Order (NIEO) is a concept emerging from the Sixth and Seventh Special Sessions of the United Nations. Special sessions are extraordinary meetings...called to discuss urgent and important world problems....In his keynote speech before the beginning of the general debate of the Seventh Special Session, the Assembly President, Mr. Bouteflika (Foreign Minister of Algeria), reminded the delegates that they were expected to provide "unequivocal" answers to the following questions: "What kind of a world do we want to build? What kind of future are we to prepare for coming generations?" These are the core questions of world order inquiry.

In other words, the task set both to the participants in the session and to those of us who may become involved educationally in the implementation of this NIEO is the transformation of our present world into a preferred world whose value goals are peace, social justice and the equitable advancement of the economic welfare of all humanity. (end of quotation.)

Perhaps the most important and far reaching example of how the decisions and recommendations of a United Nations Conference can be used to change the lives and habits of citizens at the community level, is provided by Habitat, which is the name given a program that came out of a "United Nations Conference on Human Settlements," the word "settlements" meaning communities, or the places where people live.

In a recent article, Nelson Pryor of the Center for Federal Policy Review, 1509 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. said:

"Beginning this September and running at least two or three years, will be community programs fostering support for internationalism....In November the Sierra Club, Office of International Environment Affairs, will be putting on internationalist programs for Memphis, Miami, St. Louis, New Orleans, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, New York City, Madison, and Boston.

"Mr. Vic Paulenka, of Center for Community Organization and Area Development, Sioux Falls, S.D., indicates an aggressive internationalist promotion for his three State area. In Vermont, Joan Nickelson indicates conferences for September in Brattleboro and Montpelier. In Seattle, the Northwest Regional Foundation has $200,000 to promote an internationalist program. And in San Francisco, an organization called TICHE will be hosting a four day conference in October on the Institutions and Management process underlying internationalism."

These groups named by Mr. Pryor, and many others of the same one world persuasion, have three things in common:

- (1) Their international fountainhead and the source of their inspiration is "Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements";
- (2) They coordinate through the "Habitat National Center," 1111 18th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. This office is funded solely through, and is an agency of, the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD);
- (3) The community and area groups are at least partially financed through individual grants of "public money" made available by the Education and Manpower Planning Office of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

So here we have a program promoting The New World Order that was set up by a UN Conference, is managed nationally by HUD, and financed by EPA!

Enrico Penalosa of the United Nations was named Secretary General of Habitat, and one of his first important actions was to make arrangements for a Conference on Human Settlements, which was held at Vancouver from May 31 to June 11, 1976. He spoke of his plans at a meeting held at York University on November 14, 1975. There he announced the four purposes of Habitat:

"First, all urban land, and particularly that part of urban land which is not yet developed, must be viewed as a public trust, and its use must embody principles of social need, environmental safeguards and the requirements of future generations. Second, land speculation is the most serious impediment to optimal development of urban areas and is particularly injurious to the most deprived strata of society. Third, control of land use is a pre-requisite of effective urban planning, and governments should differentiate between land ownership and land use. And fourth, public acquisition of private land holdings is a fundamental right of the community....

"None of them (these four principles) to my knowledge, is fully embodied in the laws and practices of any country of the world outside of the centrally planned economies" (that is, the Communist countries—Ed.)

Speaking of Communist countries, one of the very first meetings of Habitat was held in May, 1975 at Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia. At that time Secretary General Penalosa told the conferees that he wanted "a global educational awakening, public awareness of the challenge ahead, assuaging fears of excessive governmental interference, and stimulating political interest at the national and international levels."

A Preparatory Committee for Habitat met at UN headquarters in New York City from January 12 to 23, 1976, where plans for the upcoming big Conference at Vancouver were formulated.

We are told that this Conference on Human Settlements cost Canada $15 million, attracted 12,000 people from 130 nations. The agenda for the 11-day meeting was drawn up from the "Agenda for International Action" of the "New International Economic Order" which came out of that Seventh Special Session of the United Nations, which we mentioned earlier.

Of particular importance to U.S. citizens is the fact that the chief U.S. delegate to this Habitat Conference was Carla Hills, U.S.

Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. She addressed the Conference on June 1, 1976, and here is a part of what she told this internationalist gathering:

Mr. President, Mr. Secretary General, distinguished delegates, Ladies and Gentlemen: The President of the United States has sent me here committed to a constructive and cooperative role in these discussions—and to help bring about that enduring spirit of peaceful, global habitat to which this international assemblage is dedicated. President Ford gave me this message, before I left Washington to deliver to you here in person:

"Your Conference will focus world attention on a challenge which confronts us all—how to enhance human dignity in the villages, towns and cities where people live. It is an imposing task. It will take all the imagination, determination and perseverance that people and their governments can summon. ... There is no task more compelling than the improvement of man's condition. The recommendations you make could have a profound and lasting influence on all of us. The United States will cooperate with you in seeking to chart paths that offer the promise of better and fuller lives for all people and habitats truly worthy of man." Signed, Gerald R. Ford....

No nation's growth and development can be insulated from the global economy—nor from the necessity of positive international cooperation of the kind we are engaged in right here. For sound national planning benefits the entire world community; and cooperative international effort augments the effectiveness of national programs. We cannot shirk our obligations—as world citizens—to the needs of the many poor people and poor nations among us....

At the 7th Special Session of the United Nations, last September, our nations agreed on an agenda of mutual international action. Since that time we have moved forward with historic international negotiations on trade and finance. We have accomplished much. We still have much to do.

To conclude with the words of Secretary Kissinger: "Materially, as well as morally, our destinies are intertwined. There remain enormous things for us to do. We say (once more) to the new nations of the world: We have heard your voices. We embrace your hopes. We will join your efforts. We are committed to our common success."

Thank you.

And thus were the United States and all her citizens—and all her resources—pledged to the carrying out of those four principles of World Habitat. Read them carefully, and note how they can destroy all private property rights in land:

1. All urban land must be viewed as a public trust;
2. Land speculation (that is, the buying and selling of land by private citizens or by groups of private citizens) is the most serious impediment to optimal development of urban areas, and therefore must be discouraged;
3. Control of land use is a pre-requisite of effective urban planning, and governments should differentiate between land ownership and land use; and,
4. Public acquisition of private land holdings is a fundamental right of the community.

And how does Habitat plan to carry out the worldwide program (except in Communist dominated countries) that is embodied in these four principles? We can gain some indication of the plans by quoting from the "Report of Habitat: United Nations Conference on Human Settlements." This is the report that was published after the meeting of Habitat in Vancouver last June. We quote excerpts from that report as space permits:

...being agreed on the necessity of finding common principles that will guide Governments and the world community in solving the problems of human settlements, the Conference proclaims the following general principles and guidelines for action.

1. The improvement of the quality of life of human beings is the first and most important objective of every human settlement policy. These policies must facilitate the rapid and continuous improvement in the quality of life of all people, beginning with the satisfaction of the basic needs of food, shelter, clean water, employment, health, education, training, social security without any discrimination as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, ideology, national or social origin or other cause, in a frame of freedom, dignity and social justice.
2. In striving to achieve this objective, priority must be given to the needs of the most disadvantaged people....

4... It is the duty of all people and Governments to join the struggle against any form of colonialism, foreign aggression and occupation, domination, apartheid and all forms of racism and racial discrimination...

10. Land is one of the fundamental elements in human settlements. Every State has the right to take the necessary steps to maintain under public control the use, possession, disposal and reservation of land. Every State has the right to plan and regulate use of land, which is one of its most important resources, in such a way that the growth of population centres both urban and rural are based on a comprehensive land use plan. Such measures must assure the attainment of basic goals of social and economic reform for every country, in conformity with its national and land tenure system and legislation....

14... It is essential to implement urgently the New International Economic Order, based on the Declaration and Programme of Action approved by the General Assembly in its sixth special session, and on the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States....

24. Guided by the foregoing principles, the international community must exercise its responsibility to support national efforts to meet the human settlements challenge facing them. Since resources of Governments are inadequate to meet all needs, the international community should provide the necessary financial and technical assistance, evolve appropriate institutional arrangements and seek new effective ways to promote them. In the meantime, assistance to developing countries must at least reach the percentage targets set in the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade.

The Sons of Liberty staged the Boston Tea Party in 1773. Their watchword: "Liberty and Property." The two go together, without one the other is lost. In UN's International Habitat and HUD's National Habitat, we see this same ages-old attempt to make property and person possessions of the State. That attempt was defeated two hundred years ago. Can we defeat it again?

NEGOTIATING "THE PLANETARY BARGAIN"

GLOBALTHINK INDOCTRINATION

While Americans are being entertained or embarrassed by "the new morality" that is being practiced by the two major candidates for the presidency of the United States, the active agents of The New World Conspiracy are calmly completing their conquest of continents. One presidential aspirant defends his use of vulgarisms in an interview appearing in a pornographic publication, while the appointed incumbent shrugs off golf parties provided by CFR VIPs, which usually denotes conflict of interests. And while we are being entertained we are also being enchained, to use Patrick Henry's apt expression.

A hint as to the strategy currently being employed by the agents of the Conspiracy was provided in a report released recently by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, headed by Senator John Sparkman. The report is entitled "United Nations," and it deals primarily with the future of U.S. participation in that organization. Among the documents in the report is one from Harlan Cleveland, long time member of the Council on Foreign Relations, one time U.S. Ambassador to NATO, former Assistant Secretary of State, Rhodes Scholar, etc., etc., and now director of the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, Program in International Affairs, a leftist think-tank located in Princeton, New Jersey. Cleveland is a staunch supporter of the UN, but he is an even stauncher supporter of "The New World Order." He explains how the two go together, and gives us a new name for the Conspiracy. We quote:

"I hope that in the hearing, and whatever report is made by the Committee, you will make a distinction between the future of the United Nations and the future of world order. There is a long agenda of creative effort just ahead, a complex agenda of international action which some of us have been calling The Planetary Bargain. We the people of the world community will need to create a food reserve, to assure energy supply, to depress fertility rates, to stabilize commodity markets, to protect the global environment, to manage the ocean and its deep seabed, to control the modification of weather at human command, to rewrite the rules of trade and investment, to reform the monetary system, to mediate disputes, to reduce the costs of military stalemate, to manage conflict in a world of proliferating weapons, to keep the peace when it is threatened and restore the peace when it is broken. Taking it all together, this agenda amounts to a third try at world order—the League of Nations having died, and the United Nations being unable in its present condition to cope." (Emphasis added).

Frank A. Capell's The Confidential Intelligence Report for October, 1976, points out that:

"Mr. Cleveland also submitted articles he had written on behalf of the Aspen Program in International Affairs, in which he stated that the projects of his organization fall into 'four categories—all with a wide-angle focus on the humanistic management of interdependence, three looking outward to the building of international arrangements and institutions (and) one looking inward at the American capacity to cope with interdependence.' He said that his group had conducted a four-week workshop with the Kettering and the Rockefeller Foundations: that acting on a suggestion of the Department of State, the Aspen Institute has organized a National Commission on Coping with Interdependence under the chairmanship of Robert O. Anderson, to assess the capacity and willingness of Americans to change their thinking, their workways and life styles for international reasons. He pointed out that 'an ambitious work program' has been undertaken to spell out changes in the American ways that will probably be 'required,' to examine, with the active cooperation of the national public opinion analysts, what recent and current polls can tell us about the readiness of Americans for the projected kinds of change; and to check how far six categories of American institutions (business, corporations, labor unions, non-profit enterprises, communications media, educational systems and government agencies) are adjusting (or resisting adjustment) to new perceptions of international interdependence" (quoted from Confidential Intelligence Report, Box 3, Zarephath, N.J. 08890. Monthly, $10 per year, sent via first class mail).

And all of the foregoing is what is encompassed in what Harlan Cleveland's crowd calls The Planetary Bargain—certainly a bargain for the Monopoly Capitalists, but devastatingly costly to the tax-paying and once free and independent citizens of the United States.

The current conquest of Southern Africa is an example of how the Planetary Bargaining works. We should begin with the understanding that in order to "condition Americans to cope with interdependence," it was necessary to create an external enemy so powerful—or seemingly so powerful—that interdependence (the New World Order) is essential to survival. The Soviet Union was the external enemy so created for such a purpose.

Thus, we are told that we are not destroying the sovereign nations of Southern Africa; we are saving them from Communism!

Let's note how that was accomplished, and we'll start with Angola, a former Portuguese colony. When Premier Salazar became ill in 1968 and died in 1970, he was succeeded by Marcello Caetano, and the signal was given. Our State and Defense Departments were negotiating with Lisbon for the use of the Portuguese Azores as a military base. As the negotiations became extended, David Rockefeller's Chase Manhattan Bank offered to help Caetano, and pledged to bring in a flood of American investment dollars for the industrialization of Portugal. According to reliable European sources, Rockefeller also promised to get Portugal into the European Common Market. And what was Caetano to do in return? Give Portuguese Africa independence within two years. And the reason? Portuguese Africa, especially Angola, was rich in oil, diamonds, iron ore, and uranium. Premier Caetano knew this, wanted to preserve these riches for Portugal if at all possible; and he refused Rockefeller's offer of help. Result: Caetano was deposed, the "war for independence" began in earnest, and in a matter of months Angola was on the way to becoming an official Soviet satellite. In January, 1976, Secretary of State Kissinger told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "the effort of the Soviet Union and Cuba to take unilateral advantage of a turbulent local situation where they had never had any historic interests is a willful, direct assault upon recent constructive trends in U.S.-Soviet relations and in our efforts to improve relations with Cuba." And Kissinger did something about it: in February he gave Gulf Oil Company permission to pay the Soviet-backed regime in Angola $100 million in oil royalties and another $500 a year in royalties to Cabinda, an Angolan province.

Then came Western Sahara's turn, an area of Africa said to be rich in phosphate and a former colony of Spain. It seems that when Franco lay dying, Kissinger negotiated a new deal with Spain: an additional $1 billion for the lease of Spanish air and sea bases—if Spain would immediately give up control of the area, known as Saharawi. According to Robert Bartell of Liberty Lobby: "The rest followed like clockwork.... King Hassan II of Morocco, acting as a catspaw for Wall Street interests, moved into the military void." Then, says Bartell, the "Wall Street consortium, headed by the Rockefeller family interests and their associates, including especially Armand Hammer, head of Occidental Oil Co., moved in by acquiring an unspecified equity in the Moroccan State Phosphate Co.... A phosphate cartel, similar to the oil cartel, spring up, boosting four-fold the price of phosphates, an essential fertilizer in short world-wide supply."

Then came Rhodesia's turn to be "liberated" by the cartelists. In this case, the prime natural resource to be liberated is chrome, an essential in the manufacture of steel. And here again David Rockefeller enters the picture. Rhodesian Property & Finance, in the most recent issue to reach the United States, carried the following item, which is photographically reproduced:

Secret visit?

ACCORDING to a reliable source, an unidentified Swiss aircraft owned by Lourho arrived at Salisbury Airport towards the end of the first week of August, bringing Mr. R. W. Rowland (chief executive of Lourho) and Mr David Rockefeller for a brief stay.

The report could not be confirmed. Even if it is erroneous, however, it sums up the present situation, because both men have their representatives in this country.

"Lonrho" is an international mining firm. It operates in Rhodesia, but is controlled by non-Rhodesians, including the Rockefeller interests. We are told that a number of scandals and frauds by the company and its officers have been exposed in the Southern African press.

Thus are we "saving Southern Africa from the Communists," at a cost of millions of dollars to American taxpayers if Kissinger's plans are realized. And we are saving Rhodesia for whom? For the black Africans, or for the non-African cartelists? If for the blacks, then the following statement from a Durban, South Africa doctor is revealing:

"If we bring in to our privately built hospital a Zulu who has been badly hurt in an automobile accident, we have to give him a Zulu nurse. If we have a Zhosea nurse, she will let him bleed to death—or worse. And vice versa. The two tribes, until the South African government put a stop to it, engaged in tribal fights to the death, some of which lasted from sunrise to sunset on announced dates. Tribal divisions in Africa are deep and thorny. As the national media is discovering, belatedly, it is not, and never has been, a case of black versus white in South Africa. As one columnist has said: 'If, by a wave of the wand, racial equality were imposed... it would result in chaos and tragedy.'"

As for the white citizens, the following appeal which was published in the Natal Mercury, is revealing:

"If the Western and civilized world is so anti-communist and as fearful of Soviet imperialism as their respective governments would have us believe, some anomalies require explaining. Why are they funding an international conspiracy of sanctions and terrorism to destroy the only two peaceful countries in Africa?

"The American Department of State has declared its 'relentless opposition' to pro-Western and white governments in Southern Africa. Why? How can the UN and the West claim they are only interested in 'self-determination, the dignity of man, and majority rule?' What human rights, dignity, democracy, peace or justice exist in those countries Kissinger so ardently woos and approves and seeks detente with? Where are the free press and free elections in Czechoslovakia, Cambodia, Cuba, Russia, Angola, Uganda or any of Black Africa? And, in fact, where in Africa does genuine majority rule exist? Of the 49 countries on the continent; 15 are under direct military control and 19 are one-party regimes. The average citizen of Tanzania, Angola, Uganda, Mozambique, et al, has about as much say in the structure of his country's economy and the shape of his society as does the average citizen of Prague, Budapest or Moscow.

"Yet the Governments of the U.S. and Britain (and others) are handing over millions of their long-suffering taxpayers' money to self-proclaimed Marxist States such as these where the West and the White man are constantly and vociferously vilified and hated, and only applauded (albeit with ridicule and derision) for their cash handouts, which they then use to implement their communist ideologies and amass weapons of destruction while their populations endure privation and starvation, mass murder, imprisonment, and abject misery.

"If the West is so anti-communist why are they, in fact, so doggedly furthering and nurturing Soviet ambitions and imperialism by merciless sanctions and vicious propaganda against Rhodesia and South Africa, while so wholeheartedly underwriting and endorsing the Marxist States?

"How dare the rest of the world, with its daily diet of bombings, hijackings, demonstrations against law and order, drug abuses and all the rest of the filth which abounds, have the temerity to interfere, ostracize, bully and harry Rhodesia and South Africa? By what specious reasoning and outrageous authority do the U.S. and British governments presume to talk of assisting in 'negotiating a settlement in Rhodesia?'"

'Settlement' is a euphemism for pressure on Rhodesia to hand over their country and all the fruits of their endeavors to Marxist thugs, and anarchy." (Naomi Ross in The Natal Mercury, as reprinted in the U.S. by The Spotlight, 300 Independence Ave., S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003).

So, you see, the people of Africa must also learn to "cope with interdependence," even if it kills them (which it has been doing by the thousands among tribesmen and is about to begin doing among the White citizens of Southern Africa).

Here in the United States, in order to teach us to cope with The Planetary Bargain that Harlan Cleveland and his One World associates are making in our behalf, a vast new teaching program is underway, so that all Americans may "change their thinking, their workways and life styles for international reasons"—or else. Sponsored by NEA and fashioned by The Institute For World Order (IWO), the scheme calls for converting all college and high school teachers to the "Globalthink" philosophy, so they may, in turn, indoctrinate and brainwash America's college and high school students. "We want to reach the grass roots," proclaims an IWO leaflet.

Established in 1962 as the World Law Fund, the name was changed last year to The Institute For World Order, and it was headed for five years by C. Douglas Dillon (real name said to be Lapowski). Dillon has long been a close ally of David Rockefeller, was Undersecretary of State from 1958 to 1961, Secretary of the Treasury from 1961 to 1965. He is chairman of the United States & Foreign Securities Corporation, chairman of the executive committee of Dillon Reed & Co., president of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, chairman of the Brookings Institute, chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation, a director of the Council on Foreign Relations, and chairman of The World Order Models Project. This last named is the branch of the Institute For World Order which prepares the indoctrination courses used to teach the teachers how to teach the students how to "cope with interdependence."

In an interview published in the January 1975 issue of Transition, the official publication of OWI, Dillon indicated his belief that the American public can be induced to surrender, through the federal government, its sovereignty to global authorities, by treaty in most cases. "But, if necessary," said Dillon, "we have a very flexible form of government and it's conceivable that it could involve constitutional change. We have the mechanism for that" (and the new constitution for the Newstates of America—Ed.) However, Dillon admitted that "it will take a while before people in this country as a whole will be ready for any substantial giving up of sovereignty to handle global problems." He also admitted:

"The people who are directly involved in government are involved so heavily in day to day matters of great import to the public that they literally don't have the time to think in longer-range terms. That is the reason I feel it's so important that we educate the intellectual elites so that thinking of this nature can come from a board group of people. Once that happens there will be public pressure for action. You can have some members of Congress who are more interested in this sort of thing begin to talk about it. It can catch on. As soon as that happens, then as a reaction, the people in the executive branch of our government will immediately begin to take it very seriously."

Meanwhile, the people must be "conditioned to cope" with World Government; and for this purpose, a vast educational system has been constructed. The courses are called "Building World Society," "World Affairs," "World Cultures," "World Politics," etc. and they are currently being taught in many schools and colleges—about 1,000 last year; many more this year, of course.

Finally, Harlan Cleveland's "Agenda for The Planetary Bargain" provides us with a list of the projects and programs that we should oppose and strive to defeat. The items he lists:

1. Create a World Food Bank.
2. Provide for International Control of all sources and supplies.
3. Internationalize commodity markets.
4. Establish International Control over the wealth of the oceans and deep seabeds.
5. Provide for International Control of the "weather at human command."
6. Rewrite the rules of trade and investment.
7. Create a World Currency.
8. Create a World Police to "keep the peace when it is threatened and restore the peace when it is broken.
9. Provide special programs to teach the benefits of The New World Order to each of six "categories of American institutions," namely: business, corporations, labor unions, non-profit enterprises, communications media, educational systems and government agencies.

And if Harlan Cleveland is correct in his statement to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the U.S. State Department is behind the efforts of the Aspen Institute's Program for International Affairs, and Douglas Dillon's Institute For World Order, both of which are trying to brainwash us into accepting World Government.

So, we'd better be on the attack; and our first target should be the Congress of the United States, with November 2 the target date.

AND WHO WILL SLAY THE DRAGON OF BIG GOVERNMENT?

PROMISES, PROMISES

"Big Government is the newest nasty word. Everybody professes to be against it," said Marilyn Manion in a supplement to the Manion Forum Newsletter of Sept. 26, 1976.

"Whether the candidate be Democrat, Republican, or Other, he pledges to cut down on federal control and federal spending," she continued, adding that, "This is not surprising. Politicians spend a great deal of time and money to find out what voters are thinking, so that they can tailor their speeches and TV spots and tell the people what the people want to hear.

"Americans are, yes, tired of 'big government.' They are sick unto death of high taxes, weary of inflation. Even as they indulge in their 'Bicentennial driving binge,' they are angry about the high cost of gasoline—and worried that the pumps may turn dry before long. And most everybody agrees that the government spends too much money.

"Thus, we have the spectacle of major and minor candidates all trying to outdo each other with promises to balance the federal budget, to cut off welfare payments to able-bodied individuals who turn down job offers, to put the brakes on inflation. Would that we could believe everything we hear! Then, no matter who won in November, we could look forward to fiscal sanity in Washington for the first time in many years.

"Unfortunately, the reverse is probably true. No matter who wins, we shall continue to have deficit spending on unprecedented levels. This is so because, for one thing, Congress, not the President, makes the laws and spends the money. Second, platforms are notorious for being forgotten after election day, if not before. This is definitely a possibility with the Republican platform, which more accurately reflects the philosophy of Ronald Reagan than that of Gerald Ford.)The classic example, of course, is the platform upon which Franklin Delano Roosevelt ran in 1932. Read it and weep.)

sive spending programs, the projects they want eliminated are those which do not enrich their own pocketbooks. Thus, a non-working yet able-bodied welfare recipient is hardly likely to vote to eliminate his income. A bureaucrat won't pull the lever that terminates his job. The mayor of a troubled city will be sure to vote for whoever has promised to give the most federal funds to troubled cities."... (end of quote).

An example of why big government will continue regardless of who is elected in November, is supplied by Congressman John M. Ashbrook of Ohio (one of the few whom we pray will be returning to Washington with the next, 95th Congress.) Rep. Ashbrook in the House of Representatives on September 28, 1976, said and we quote:

Mr. Speaker, a recent New York Times article stated that there are over 1,000 people in the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, HEW, writing regulations and taking a special course in English to make their regulations more understandable. Most of us probably think that is about 999 too many.

Not too long ago OSHA published proposed regulations on walking surfaces and ladders. Those regulations covered more than 120 pages of the Federal Register. More than 70 pages of the 120 deal specifically with ladders. But let us not be too hard on OSHA. They did put forth a proposal for roofers to build a fence around the roof before they started working on the roof. I suppose there was no danger of the workers falling off the roof while they were building the fence, or maybe OSHA wanted them to build another fence on the roof to protect them while they built the first fence. OSHA finally did withdraw this proposal but there was still the cost of printing it and the cost of the salaries of those who dreamed it up.

Recently, an article appeared that a high school principal was concerned about having a homecoming queen for the high school because it might violate federal regulations barring sex discrimination. Also, we should not forget the recent attempt of HEW to prohibit mother-daughter and father-son banquets in public schools on the same grounds. There has been the same issue raised about all-male or all-female choirs. (Because of this same HEW ruling, boys and girls in local high schools now share the same toilet facilities—Ed.)

These regulations are based on what is known as Title IX of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. I opposed it, because I saw it giving the regulators in Washington, D.C., much too much power and latitude. Most of the regulators seem to be of the opinion that they are the only ones who know how we should lead our lives.

All the various regulations are printed in the Federal Register. To date this year there are already more than 50,000 pages of the Federal Register. There has been an annual increase of about 25 percent in the number of pages.

I have been serving on a conference committee on education. Today there are about 125 federal programs in HEW dealing with education. Some want to add still another dozen. If one looks at the chart of the Office of Education in HEW, it looks like a maze. And it is. It is a maze of programs and agencies that are costing the taxpayers huge amounts of money...

* * * * *

Rep. Ashbrook mentions only OSHA and HEW; but there are dozens of other agencies and departments he might have mentioned that fall into the same category: agencies that help to create big government and big spending. Also, he might have mentioned that OSHA is a "management by objective" bureaucracy that seems to have one prime objective: the elimination of free enterprise by making it so difficult and expensive for small businesses and industries, and independent corporations to operate at a profit that they will either close their shops or sell their businesses and plants to the monopoly-seeking multinational corporations.

As for the Office of Education in HEW, the objective is even plainer: centralized control over all education throughout the nation. And the method employed has been simple: The people have permitted their schools to become dependent upon federal handouts. School districts must obey the guidelines established by HEW, or federal aid is cut off, the school district becomes impoverished and the local schools must be closed. He who pays the piper has a right to name the tune; so says the U.S. Supreme Court in more legalistic terms.

Another example of why Big Government and Big Spending are here to stay regardless of who sits in the White House, is provided by that form of legalized blackmail known as Revenue Sharing. Everyone knows that before Government can give, it must first take. So, every federal spending program takes away, ultimately, money from your own pocket, directly through taxes or indirectly through inflation. Yet human nature is such that people will promise to vote for whoever promises them the most from the federal trough. And by application of this same "sharing" principle mayors and councilmen, county and regional officials, governors and state administrators are "kept in line."

Shortly before adjourning, the 94th Congress put together a Revenue Sharing Melon that calls for the distribution of $26 billion to States, regions and cities between Jan. 1, 1977 and Sept. 30, 1980; an average of nearly $7 billion a year. In 1977, for example, New York City has been promised a little over $200 million, which is reckoned at $37.95 per resident of the city. Revenue Sharing funds are not equal: the per capita fund for Vermont is $40.70, while the per capita allotment for Floridians is $24.43. But these funds can be denied States, Regions, Counties, Cities, Communities, if federal guidelines are not obeyed. And the "control mechanism" has to do with "discrimination." The law bans bias based on race, national origin, sex, age, religion, or a handicap. Moreover, this new law expands the ways in which local officials may be brought to account under the antidiscrimination rules. For example, citizens are empowered to bring suits charging discrimination. If a State or local government is found to be in violation of the antidiscrimination rules, that State or locality will be adjudged guilty unless it can prove itself innocent. If it fails to do so, the State or locality could lose all its general revenue sharing funds. Thus can the Central Government force obedience by lesser governments, since most States and local governments have allowed themselves to be maneuvered into positions where they would probably be forced to declare themselves bankrupt if all Federal funds were cut off.

Which is, of course, so very preposterous when we come to realize that the Federal Government is and has been in a state of bankruptcy for many years, and is in a far worse financial condition than any State, either domestic or foreign. The only thing that keeps the Federal Government running, monetarily, is the fact that those Federal Reserve trading stamps can be used as money only because they are accepted in the payment of taxes and legal debts, and therefore the Fed can over-issue those trading stamps. Thus: inflation plus taxes!

How did this ridiculous situation come upon us? Barrons, the financial weekly, had a commendable answer to that question in a recent issue. We quote:

"This country abandoned the gold standard in 1933; some 42 years of inflation have followed. No sequence of events could underscore more plainly how indispensable that standard was for the maintenance of a sound currency. Yet this dramatic example of cause and effect has been almost universally forgotten. It is one of the strange ironies of our time that with the historic record before them, U.S. politicians and most economists have decided that the gold standard can safely be dropped in history's dust bin.

"Inflation set in immediately after the U.S. went off the gold standard in March of 1933. (it was further stimulated, of course, by devaluation the following January of the new irredeemable dollar to 59.06% of its former gold weight.) By 1934, the average of wholesale prices had increased 14% over 1933; by 1937, 31%. The inflationary trend (which, of course, at first was welcome) persisted for decades, all through the years of the International Monetary Fund and the so-called gold-exchange-standard, until August of 1971. When even that poor excuse for a true gold standard was scrapped, the inflationary spiral began to pick up speed. Barely four years later, wholesale prices have risen by more than 55%. The net result is that consumer prices today stand 344% higher than in 1933. Compared with 1933, the American dollar commands a purchasing power of less than 23 cents.

"This outcome, it is true, has been an indirect rather than direct consequence of the abandonment of the traditional gold standard. The purchasing power of the dollar would not have dropped so low if bank credit throughout those years had not been recklessly expanded and paper money recklessly issued. But once banks (or governments) are relieved of the need to maintain constant convertibility of their notes on demand into gold, they will always yield to the temptation to issue more notes." (From an article appearing in Barrons).

Barrons speaks of inflation occurring because banks (or governments) yield to the temptation to issue more notes, that is, fiat currency. Perhaps it would be more nearly correct to say that central banks, or governments, follow a plan which calls for inflation-controlled inflation, they call it.

Not since FDR has any President talked of ending inflation, because the Keynesian school of economics to which they must subscribe, prescribes controlled inflation as being good medicine for the economy. The only proscription: runaway inflation must be banned; inflation must be controlled, else everybody may suffer, not just the middle class. To explain:

Inflation comes in two stages. First, there is monetary inflation. This comes about, principally, because the Federal Reserve System creates credit by fiat (money out of nothing) to supply the government with loans. The government cannot pay its bills with the money received through taxation, so it must borrow and borrow in order to spend and spend. This then brings on the second stage of inflation, price inflation. As Gary North points out in his book, An Introduction to Christian Economics:

"Since 1914, the world has seen so many wars, and so many increases in domestic spending projects, that the governments of the world have been afraid to pay for the increases through the imposition of direct taxes. They borrow from the central banks' fiat credit departments. The State does not get something for nothing, however; when the State increases its expenditures, prices tend to rise. This is price inflation, and it is a direct result of the earlier monetary inflation. People on fixed incomes are forced to reduce purchases. Small businesses either go into debt or are swallowed up by the large corporations that operate in terms of total indebtedness. Inflation is therefore the result of a centralization of power (the monopoly of credit creation), and it usually leads to economic centralization throughout the economy in question....

"Once a government decides to inflate a currency, it has embarked on a tragic road. People get accustomed to rising prices. They plan ahead in terms of those increases. Businesses seem to be making money; profits seem to be increasing. People start buying now, paying later; entrepreneurs start ordering more capital equipment. They expect a continuing rise in orders for their goods, so they tool up for future increases in production. But the expected profits do not materialize, because costs start rising, too. Capital equipment costs more; labor demands higher wages; strikes occur, if union demands are not met. In order for the 'stimulating' effects of the inflationary boom to keep going, the government must resort to ever-larger doses of inflation. If it stops, businesses start showing losses; they fire workers, or refuse to hire new ones. What results is a depression. 'Booms,' in other words, turn into 'busts' as soon as the inflation stops." (Quoted from An Introduction to Christian Economics, by Gary North, The Craig Press, Nutlet, New Jersey.)

Presently in the United States, the Central Government is trying to control inflation in order to prevent a depression (recession is the milder term for the same economic illness). But there is little or nothing that any U.S. President—now or in the future—can do about the situation; because there is ever the suspicion that somebody bigger than any President planned it that way; in order to destroy the Middle Class and create a classless socialist society—a Corporate Socialist World Order.

In this connection, the following item is of extreme importance:

ORIGINS OF CORPORATE SOCIALISM

Old John D. Rockefeller and his 19th century fellow-capitalists were convinced of one absolute truth: that no great monetary wealth could be accumulated under the impartial rules of a competitive laissez-faire society. The only sure road to the acquisition of massive wealth was monopoly: drive out your competitors, reduce competition, eliminate laissez-faire, and above all get state protection for your industry through compliant politicians and government regulation. This last avenue yields a legal monopoly, and a legal monopoly always leads to wealth.

This robber baron schema is also, under different labels, the socialist plan. The difference between a corporate state monopoly and a socialist state monopoly is essentially only the identity of the group controlling the power structure. The essence of socialism is monopoly control by the state using hired planners and academic sponges. On the other hand, Rockefeller, Morgan, and their corporate friends aimed to acquire and control their monopoly and to maximize its profits through influence in the state political apparatus; this, while it still needs hired planners and academic sponges, is a discreet and far more subtle process than outright state ownership under socialism. Success for the Rockefeller gambit has depended particularly upon focusing public attention upon largely irrelevant and superficial historical creations, such as the myth of a struggle between capitalists and communists, and careful cultivation of political forces for big business. We call this phenomenon of corporate legal monopoly—market control acquired by using political influence—by the name of corporate socialism." (Quoted from Wall Street and FDR, by Anthony Sutton; pp. 72-3. Arlington House, New Rochelle, N.Y. $7.95.)

Corporate Socialism will be the New Economic Order for the Nation—and for the World—bringing with it new and complementing political, social and religious orders, unless Christian Reconstruction begins to replace the Satanic Destruction of our free enterprise system of economics, our republican form of government, our Bible-based, Constitution-prescribed legal foundations, and our Christ-oriented social system which proclaims life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as Divinely-endowed rights.

Presidential aspirants' blunders and promises mean nothing in this respect. But the future words and actions of Federal and State Legislators can mean much. For they can reverse this trend toward Corporate Socialism; they can begin a program of Christian Reconstruction, if we, whom they represent, begin by truly pledging our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to the task that lies before us.

Many will say that it is too late. But the greatest condemnation that can be visited upon mortal man in this world, is for him to be forced to admit: "I saw the evil coming, and I didn't even try to prevent it."

THE ENVELOPING ATMOSPHERE OF FEAR AND DISTRUST

AN AGE OF FALLEN IDOLS

The American Bicentenary, which had been heralded as a time for praise and glory, and a rededication to The American Way of Life, has, instead, become a time for fear and distrust, for fading hope and faltering faith in the future of our Country, its institutions, and its ability to continue to exist as a free and independent Nation.

This prevailing atmosphere of fear and distrust probably began to make itself felt on a nationwide scale during the questionable involvement in Vietnam and the unquestionably disgraceful resolution of that involvement. The feeling of distrust became more pronounced with the Watergate exposures, which are being brought back to national memory by the charges of John Dean against Gerald Ford; that Ford cooperated with then President Nixon in blocking Watergate investigations. Dean, incidentally, is making quite a name for himself as an informer. He survived the Watergate era by squealing on his associates in the White House; he then made money by telling it all in lectures on as many college campuses as would receive him, and by turning to "investigative journalism" for such publications as the porno-yellow sheet, "Rolling Stone." Dean was able to set off the spark that resulted in the resignation of Earl Butz as Secretary of Agriculture. Now his reportorial hatchet has been drawn in an attempt to obtain the political scalp of Gerald Ford, who is in the midst of the most important political campaign of his life. This is not to intimate or suggest that Dean's charges are untrue; but if they are true it seems strange indeed that Dean would remain silent for a matter of years and then proclaim the accusations at a time when they would do the accused the most possible harm.

Nor are we defending Ford; we refer to the controversy as another item which breeds distrust.

Then along comes the Carter record, with sufficient alleged dirt to make Ford seem saintly by comparison. There are Carter's connections with the drug traffic which have never been denied. There is his scatological true confession in Playboy Magazine. There is the rumor of a blood relationship with the Kennedy Klan. Jimmy's mother worked for the Kennedy family in the early 1920s, and Papa Joe "looked with lust." And there are the constant charges that Carter's is a life of lies and deceit. It is not ours to affirm or deny. We merely wish to point out that all of these things contribute toward an atmosphere of distrust among the people of the United States.

As for the accompanying spirit of fear; here we may mention the name of Dr. Henry Kissinger as the chief instigator. Through this policy of detente, the various SALT agreements and the Helsinki Summit, we have been reduced to a position of military inferiority to the Soviet Union. There are reports of the presence of Soviet missiles, hydrogen bombs and nuclear-powered submarines presently in American territorial waters. There is the report that Kissinger's recent maneuvers in Southern Africa; the turnover of Angola to the Soviets, the sell-out of Rhodesia, and his actions against the Republic of South Africa all are designed to force the United States into political partnership with the USSR, or else the USSR will simply take us over, by political means or economic blockade if possible; by military action if necessary!

There is a story that appeared in certain Canadian dailies, but was censored in the United States. The story (we have a clipping of the article) is headlined: "Henry Kissinger Using Gold 'Club' on South Africa?" At the time of publication, gold had firmed at the price of $113.65 as a result of IMF gold sales. The article then adds:

"However, there is another reason for the firmer trend in gold prices. Henry Kissinger has started on a new act of shuttle diplomacy between whites and blacks in an effort to ward off what could be a bloodbath on the African continent. It is generally agreed that Mr. Kissinger has to have an ace in the hole in negotiating with the ruling government of South Africa. That ace is the price of gold which is so important to South Africa's economy. By now we have seen that the U.S., unilaterally, or via the IMF, can do pretty much as it likes with the price of gold. South Africans know this.

"Speculation goes that Mr. Kissinger may be prepared to allow a higher price for the metal if the African rulers give in to a more liberal form of government within their country." (Unquote).

There is a geopolitical significance to what is going on in Southern Africa which has not been mentioned by the controlled media: Mozambique is a Communist controlled state as is Angola. Between them lies Rhodesia. If and when the Soviet can gain control of Rhodesia, it will have built a bridge across Southern Africa. This will totally isolate the Republic of South Africa, and probably cause that Nation's surrender without a struggle. With the Soviet control of the Cape Verde Islands, Guinea, Ghana, Zaire, Tanzania, and Somali, the Soviets will also be able to cut off American oil supplies. As one competent observer states:

"One Possible Scenario: After southern Africa is controlled, the Soviets will cut off American oil supplies and bring economic ruin to the U.S.! And after a year or so of existing without automobiles, and without heating oil, and after a year with uninhibited terrorist activity across the U.S., their next step may be to threaten atomic war. And with the depressed and weakened will existing due to the controlled media, an 'accord' may be reached; whereby UN representatives (actually Soviet KGB agents) will replace the U.S. government as we know it. If the U.S. does not submit war will ensue. The reason: the Soviets have prepared (in Civil Defense), whereas the U.S., due to subversion, has refused to prepare one whit, and has virtually no civil defense capability!"

The preceding is suppositional, a hypothetical scenario. However, it is known that the USSR—in addition to expanding its land, sea and air forces—has also made an enormous investment in Civil Defense. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade has ways of getting information from behind the Iron Curtain, information that is seldom seen in the controlled media. In his September newsletter he reports:

"In the year of Salt-I, Soviet Civil Defense

was elevated to the status of a separate service of the Allied Forces with the same standing as the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Its new chief, Colonel-General Altunin, was simultaneously made a deputy defense minister—the first time the man responsible for civil defense has held this rank. He presides over a formidable apparatus. The Soviet Civil Defense Service includes over 600,000 personnel, who are in turn responsible for supervising compulsory training programs that involve, on a half-time basis, most of the industrial work force.

"Since 1966 over two-thirds of all new industrial plants that have been built (through the courtesy of the Rockefellers, Eatons, Hammers et al—Ed.) have been built outside the major urban areas.

"Russian society is now equipped to go underground at short notice. Some 84 underground command centers are said to have been completed around Moscow alone, including four huge bunkers for the Politbureau and two for the KGB.

"Enormous stores of food are being stored underground. Outside the city of Kharkov, for example, a huge underground silo with a capacity of 300,000 tons has been constructed. America has been contributing directly to this war chest through the grain sold to the Soviets." (Unquote).

In our letter of September 17 we stated that the chief goal of the "Master Planners" is the creation of a New World Order. They know that Americans are not going to surrender their sovereignty unless they feel sure there is simply no other alternative. In order to create the psychological atmosphere within America for acceptance of the New World Order, the Invisible Government has had to build the Soviet Union into a credible threat. Achieving this has taken bluff and bluster, and billions of dollars in aid and trade.

We suspect that this building of a huge civil defense establishment in the Soviet Union is also for psychological purposes: to keep the Russian people under control by promoting the need for defending Mother Russia against "imperialist aggressors." However, the Soviet Union is a threat to us; and we are pointed out as a threat to the Russians. So, in this respect, the aim of the Master Planners has been achieved. And this accounts in great measure for the atmosphere of fear and distrust which seems to envelope America.

Another aspect of this same fear syndrome involves unexplained and continuing acts of terrorism which plague our Nation. Bombings

BIG LABOR'S CONTRIBUTIONS TO U.S. SENATE CANDIDATES

Senator Barry Goldwater decided to do some homework. Concerned with the fact that Big Labor Bosses were determined to maintain control over the upcoming 95th Congress, he decided to find out just how much money organized labor had donated to candidates running for Senate seats in the November elections. He learned that 14 candidates—all registered as Democrats—have received financial help from Big Labor this year. Following is a list of the candidates, the States in which they are running, and the amount each has received from organized labor this year:

Tunney, California	$124,113
Williams, New Jersey	120,575
Humphrey, Minnesota	114,196
Hartke, Indiana	106,975
Sarbanes, Maryland	78,595
Green, Pennsylvania	71,075
Moss, Utah	65,175
Kennedy, Massachusetts	57,450
Zumwalt, Virginia	54,060
Montoya, New Mexico	47,900
McGee, Wyoming	41,793
Bentsen, Texas	35,975
Melcher, Montana	19,450
DeConcini, Arizona	19,100

Senator Goldwater is also concerned about the growth of public sector unions. He had the following statement published in the Congressional Record on Sept. 30, 1976:

"Mr. President, with the growth of public sector unions in this country, there arises the very real possibility that in the not-too-distant future the United States could be shut down by a nationwide strike of public employees. It has happened in other countries where organized labor has become the dominant political force and it could happen here.

"Now, our current laws prohibit strikes, or any other delaying action, by Federal employees. Yet, I note that the American Federation of Government Employees, in its convention last week, gave their national officers the power to call strikes or job action as they see fit. The delegates at the convention also authorized the union to organize members of the Armed Forces, a that terrorize whole communities, kidnappings, sabotaged airplanes, organized terrorist groups that are paid to kill and destroy. And perhaps the most fear-inspiring of all has been a series of incidents occurring in the State of Pennsylvania. There was the so-called Legionnaires' Disease that struck in Philadelphia, the strange case of over a hundred employees in an industrial plant being simultaneously overcome by what appears to have been some form of poison gas, and the swine flu shot deaths which were first reported in Pittsburgh.

The scary thing about the Legionnaires' Disease is the fact that no official answer was ever given as to the cause of the deaths. But top experts believe that a lethal poison was used, and that it was a case of mass murder.

It will be recalled that back in 1969 President Nixon called a halt to the development of chemical and biological weapons. In his statement of November 25, 1969 he said, in part:

"Biological weapons have massive, un-truly disastrous proposition.

"It is obvious that walkouts and slowdowns are being utilized more and more by the public sector unions as a tool to obtain their objectives. The public sector unions are feeling their oats, so to speak, because of their new-found political muscle... As the U.S. News and World Report of December 4, 1975, stated: 'More than a million federal government employees are now covered by labor agreements. Half of the State and local government workers now belong to unions, too. Almost a fourth of the total union membership in the U.S. is made up of public employees.'

"Public worker unions have already achieved part of their goals. The Democrat platform calls for federal legislation to allow all public employees the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. Public employee unions interpret this as giving them the right to strike. The unions also got the Democrats to endorse revision of the Hatch Act so that the nearly 3 million Federal workers can engage in partisan political activity. Unless the American people wake up to the dangers of these proposals, we may find ourselves in the same position as New York City, where everyone now works for the union...."

predictable, and potentially uncontrollable consequences. They may produce a global epidemic and impair the health of future generations. I have therefore decided that: --The United States shall renounce the use of lethal biological agents and weapons and all other methods of biological warfare.

--The United States will confine its biological research to defensive measures, such as immunization and safety measures."

But, here again, as though it were part of an overall plan, as soon as the United States banned the use of chemical and biological weapons, the Soviet Union began developing them. We have a report which says that:

"They have built up large stocks of nerve gas, hydrogen cyanide, cyanogen chloride and old-stype mustard gas, as well as biological agents that would produce plague, cholera, anthrax and tularemia. The concentrates are stored in 40 depots in Russia and Eastern Europe."

Another report speaks of Russian experiments in the use of the wind currents to deliver such lethal agents to specified target areas. Perhaps to Philadelphia as an test....

More probably, however, is the allegation that the act was committed by terrorists on the spot in Philadelphia. An article appearing in the National Enquirer of Oct. 12, states that: "The bizarre 'Legionnaires' Disease' which killed 29 people wasn't a disease at all -- but a lethal poison administered by a ruthless assassin. That's the chilling opinion of a world-renowned biochemist, Dr. Edward Schantz, who says the symptoms of the 'disease' are incredibly similar to those caused by ricin, a deadly toxin extracted from the castor bean.

"It's my opinion that saboteurs used ricin against the legionnaires in some aerosol or other airborne form," declared Dr. Schantz."

The article quotes other authorities who agree with Dr. Schantz, and who also agree that "Government scientists' incredible blunders hid the real cause of the Legionnaires' disease; which wasn't a disease at all, but a lethal poison administered by ruthless assassins.

The mishandling of such an investigation by government officials is bound to add to the atmosphere of fear and distrust.

But the swine flu shot affair tops them all. Many scientists and doctors warned against the program of mass inoculations of an untested vaccine for an unknown disease. Dr. Anthony J. Morris, an FDA research scientist condemned the swine flu vaccine publicity, refused to retract and was fired. Insurance companies refused to indemnify manufacturers against possible lawsuits resulting from the use of the vaccine. The insurance companies were obviously aware of the hazards involved, but the Congress decided to assume the liability by approving the appropriation of $6.2 million of tax money.

Finally, charging "a deliberate coverup of the hazards of the swine flu immunization program," the National Health Federation filed suit on September 22 to stop the government from spending any more money on the program. NHF President Charles I. Crecelius said in the suit: "Nothing in the President's (Ford's) message explained, directly or by implication, that administration of vaccines on such a scale is doubtful of merit, and of necessity is fraught with hazards to the health and life of many recipients."

Dr. Crecelius has certainly been proved correct in his charge. As we went to press, 42 deaths had been reported among those taking the shots.

However, the recipients were warned. The "consent form" which they signed before taking the swine flu shot states:

"The possibility of severe or potentially fatal reactions exists."

One wonders: Is this swine flu shot routine another test of mass behavioral patterns, designed to determine what percentage of the people have been "conditioned" for control by the Master Planners? Is it a horrible way of "liquidating" those no longer able to serve the State, and a danger to the precariously financed Social Security System. Or are we just being governed by fools and incompetents?

There's one good thing about fear and distrust: If enough people come to realize what their rulers are doing to them, then perhaps they'll do something about their rulers.

THE STRUGGLE TO RESUSCITATE THE UNITED NATIONS

PHILADELPHIA WORLD AFFAIRS COUNCIL TO THE RESCUE

Thirty years ago the story would have been headlined on the front page of the newspaper, and written by the star political reporter. But on October 15, 1976, the story appeared in the society section, was written by Ruth Seltzer of the Philadelphia Inquirer social news staff. The article began:

"Next Thursday, Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim of the United Nations will be the principal speaker at a dinner sponsored by the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia. The dinner, to be held in the ballroom of the Bellevue Stratford, will be attended by the executive heads of the UN's specialized agencies and related organizations.

"It will be an event of historic significance—a get-together to honor the Bicentennial of the United States and the World Affairs Council's Bicentennial-era program, 'A Declaration of INTERdependence.'

"Secretary-General Waldheim's speech will be a major one. He says it will be the most important address he has given in this Bicentennial year. It's likely, he will call for a new partnership between north and south countries.

"Thursday's dinner meeting will be unique. It will be the first time in the history of the United Nations that the chiefs of the U.N.'s specialized agencies have met as a group anywhere else but at, U.N. headquarters in New York City and Geneva. The convocation will be concerned with the strengthening of international institutions. Before the dinner, U.N. leaders will gather at historic Congress Hall at Sixth and Chestnut Streets for a Bicentennial meeting and discussion.

"Frederick Heldring will preside at the Congress Hall meeting. He is general chairman of 'A Declaration of INTERdependence.'... At the meeting in Congress Hall, the U.N. leaders will hear Harlan Cleveland, director of the Aspen Institute's program in international affairs. Cleveland, a former U.S. ambassador to NATO, is the author of a new book, 'The Third Try at World Order.' The book will make its debut that night. It has been published by the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia."... (unquote).

The fact that Kurt Waldheim would ignore UN headquarters in New York City and Geneva, and take the heads of the specialized agencies with him, to Philadelphia and the Congress Hall where the Declaration of INTERdependence was first proclaimed, is significant. It forecasts a change in strategy on the part of the promoters of the U.N. Now the builders of the New World Order will concentrate on giving more authority to the existing specialized agencies, and creating more specialized agencies, rather than surrendering sovereignty to the UN itself. The first phase of this strategy began with the appointment of Nelson Rockefeller as Vice President and the temporary appointment of Daniel P. Moynihan as Ambassador to the UN. The statement of this new strategy was made by Gbigniew Brzezinski, who now is chief foreign policy adviser to Jimmy Carter. "Zbig," as he is called by intimates, is a Polish emigre, a Harvard graduate, Director of Columbia University's Research Institute on International Change, a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, Director of Rockefeller's Trilateral Commission, and the author of many books and articles dealing with foreign policy and the New World Order. One of Brzezinski's articles appeared in the March 3, 1975 issue of the New York Magazine. Titled: "Unmanifest Destiny: Where Do We Go From Here?" the article said, in part:

"...we should become more involved in getting (the) world engaged in shaping a global community. This means our speaking at the United Nations with greater moral authority. This means upgrading the level of our representation at the United Nations, not lowering it (hence Moynihan, who spoke with "moral authority" followed by Scranton who supposedly "upgraded the level"—Ed.).

"We should participate actively in the discussion of reforms, especially in the new

GUS HALL AND THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

The Communist Conspiracy might be likened to a gigantic iceberg. All the terrorism and violence lies hidden beneath the surface, and it is neither seen nor felt until the time of contact. Yet above the surface, plainly visible and even calling attention to itself, is that small part of the Conspiracy which calls itself a political party. That visible peak in the United States bears the name, Communist Party, U.S.A. Nominal head of the party is Gus Hall, who is an announced and legally registered candidate for the office of President of the United States. He has no hope of winning, but the fact that he is running is of great propaganda value to the hidden seven-eighths of the overall Conspiracy.

Gus Hall submitted a policy statement to the United Steel Worker's Convention, which was published in the Communist World Magazine last September 4. Hall's platform is so very similar to some of the more important planks in the platform adopted at the National Democratic Party Convention, that Hall's policy statement bears mention. He stated:

"What does our country need today? It needs a massive reconstruction program to repair the damage Big Business and its political flunkys have done. We need a giant program for housing, schools, hospitals, day care centers and decent mass rapid transportation.

"Yes, the country desperately needs a program to end unemployment and poverty.

"We need a program to outlaw racism and punish every racist act with criminal penalties.

"We need a legal 30-hour week at no reduction in weekly pay.

"We need the repeal of all anti-labor laws and practices and strengthened guarantees of the right for all workers to organize and strike and picket.

"Where will we get the money for such programs? The money for such programs can be gotten by

* Cutting the swollen military budget by 80%;

* Plugging the millionaire's loopholes in the tax system, making the super-rich and the big corporations pay their share while exempting all families earning $25,000 or less from all taxes;

* By cutting into the huge profits of the monopolies."

One wonders what would happen to Hall if he were running for office in Communist Russia on a campaign calling for outlawing racism, a 30-hour work week, and the right of all workers to strike and picket?

It is interesting to note that one of the instigators and strongest supporters of the campaign for "equal rights" for women in the United States is Gus Hall, Chairman of the C.P.U.S.A. In the February 1970 issue of Political Affairs, the journal of Marxist thought and analysis, there was an article by Gus Hall, entitled "Class Approach to Women's Liberation." Here are excerpts:

"Women are a most crucial force in the overall mass upsurge in the country... there is an upsurge of struggle for the liberation of women. This is a many-sided movement, based on many issues. There are, for example, movements around specific shop economic issues, struggles for child-care centers, against the high cost of living and around welfare issues. There are also growing movements around the general problems arising from the special oppression and inequality women encounter....

"Any attempt to deal with the struggles for the liberation of women as a thing in itself, separated from the overall struggle is self-defeating—it becomes a classless dead-end... For us Communists, this is the very cornerstone of the entire struggle, because it rests on the relationship between the fight for the liberation of women and the class struggle, the tie-in between the forces of women's liberation and the working class.

"There is a great, new interest in the role of women as fighters for social progress because they are a decisive new force in today's mass rebellions. They are the most consistent contingent of the struggle against U.S. imperialist aggression... The historic process that has elevated women to the position of greater molders of history than in the past will escalate further and make a new qualitative leap as life moves to the stage of socialism and communism. Because economic world order. We should take the lead in reapportioning voting rights for the new influential members of the global community in the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. We should even consider creating machinery for global planning and arrangements for long-term transfer of resources, for we have a great deal of expertise in these fields.

of this there is a new qualitative significance to the struggle for women's liberation. ... As the struggle of women has escalated so has the issue of equal rights legislation.

"... We Communists also have a unique responsibility in this struggle. It is we who must give the trade union movement, the black liberation movement, the youth and peace movements, and in a general way the male section of the population, a Marxist understanding and appreciation of the struggle for women's liberation. This understanding is an essential ingredient of victory over capitalism." (unquote).

Here, then, is documentary evidence showing that those who are promoting the Equal Rights Amendment have Gus Hall and the Communist Party as their staunch allies in the struggle. The "liberated" condition of women in communist-dominated countries is the final goal toward which E.R.A. supporters are struggling—perhaps unknowingly.

Perhaps this information will let them know, as Mrs. Gizella Copeland of Sam Jose, California already knows as a result of her personal experience. Writing in the Sept. 1976 issue of Family Circle Magazine, Mrs. Copeland said:

"I escaped to America 20 years ago from a country where women had totally equal rights. This may sound great, but in effect it meant women had no rights at all.

"This so-called 'equality' completely destroyed the family unit. All women were forced to work outside the home. Children were raised by government day care centers. The privilege of being a homemaker was denied.

"It may seem that this will never happen here, but even without ERA, the trend is toward this. The ERA will take away many of our rights and privileges. Our freedom is at stake. I came to this country to be free, not to be forced into the shackles of mandatory 'equality' to men."

"... Thus the United States will have to take the lead in shaping a more optimistic global community. But it can do so only if it undertakes certain domestic changes and and rearrangements as well. First, we must develop an effective executive instrument for world planning... The logical place to locate such an instrument for integrating our global policy would be the vice-presidency" (hence Nelson Rockefeller as Vice President; although Henry Kissinger actually did the work as Nelson's alter ego—Ed.)

The preceding was the first phase of the new strategy for creating the New World Order as it involved the UN, from the time of the resignation of Richard Nixon on August 9, 1974 until the "changing of the guard" as a result of the national elections on November 2, 1976.

The second phase of the new strategy was to stress "INTERdependence" and the surrender of sovereignty on a piecemeal basis to the specialized international agencies, rather than the surrender of total sovereignty to one specific world authority such as the United Nations.

This is why Kurt Waldheim took the heads of the specialized agencies with him to the Philadelphia World Council meeting, rather than holding such a meeting at United Nations headquarters in New York City. For, from now on we can expect the UN, as such, to be played down, even censured and denounced, while the specialized agencies will be promoted, given greater power and authority, and will become cabinet level administrative departments of a New World Order (if the Planners have their way).

Harlan Cleveland has, it seems, been accorded the honor of writing out the rules for this second phase of the new strategy. They are summed up in the title of his new book, "The Third Try at World Order," which was published by the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia. We have not seen the book, but Cleveland's thesis is that the first try at world order (the code name for world government) was the League of Nations. It was a failure. The second try was the United Nations and it, too, has failed. The third try is based on "INTERdependence" and the "voluntary" delegation of authority in the global realm to various and sundry specialized agencies, such as the IMF, the World Bank, a proposed World Food Bank, a World Economic Authority, a World Resources Agency, etc., etc.

Although Brzezinski may replace Kissinger next January 4th, the same game plan will remain in effect, and Kissinger made this plain when he addressed the UN General Assembly on September 30, 1976. Here are key excerpts from that speech which demonstrate the future growth and development of specialized international and multinational agencies, to which national sovereignty is intended to be surrendered:

* * * * *

The world has shrunk, but the nations of the world have not come closer together. Paradoxically, nationalism has been on the rise at the precise time when the most serious issues we all face can only be resolved through recognition of our interdependence.

...An IMF Trust Fund financed by gold sales has been established for the benefit of the low-income countries. Replenishments for the World Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and the Asian Development Bank will provide additional resources for development. Worldwide food aid has been expanded.... We have brought the International Fund for Agricultural Development close to operation....

We are extending an invitation to the World Conference on Science and Technology for Development, now scheduled for 1979, to meet in this country.... The Ministerial Meeting of the Conference on International Economic Cooperation in Paris should be given new impetus....

Another issue of vast global consequence is the Law of the Sea.... Consider what is at stake: Mankind is attempting to devise an international regime for nearly three-quarters of the earth's surface. Some 150 nations are participating, reflecting all the globe's diverse national perspectives, ideologies, and practical concerns. A broad sweep of vital issues is involved: economic development, military security, freedom of navigation, crucial and dwindling living resources, the ocean's fragile ecology, marine scientific research, and vast potential mineral wealth. The world community is aspiring to shape major new international legal principles: the extension of the long-established territorial sea; the creation of a completely new concept of an economic zone extending two hundred miles; and the designation of the deep seabed as the "common heritage of mankind."...

Let us therefore put aside delaying tactics and pressures and take the path of cooperation... to build a peaceful, cooperative, and prosperous international community....

The international community has a unique role to play. The application of the standards of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights should be entrusted to fair and capable international bodies....

Global forces of change now shape our future. Order will come in one of two ways: through its imposition by the strong and the ruthless or by the wise and farsighted use of international institutions through which we enlarge the sphere of common interests and enhance the sense of community....

* * * * *

This New World Order, then, is to be made up of a series of specialized international agencies, each supreme in its own field of operation, but all paying allegiance to the rulers of a New Economic Order made up of International Bankers, Multinational Cartelists, and Monopoly Capitalists. In the words of J.C. Phillips, editor of the Borger, Texas News-Herald:

The presidential candidate who occupies the White House, only to become a puppet of the victorious conspiracy that controls most of what used to be the free world certainly will be a man to be pitied. He will be a man without a country....

On November 2, the American people will have the opportunity to elect better men to serve as our representatives in the U.S. Congress. Unless we can elect a Congress composed of dedicated American patriots who give their undivided loyalty to our native land and who have the determination and the ability to restore Christian influence in our foreign and domestic affairs, then, indeed, we will have forfeited our opportunity to put an end to the present all-out effort to completely change our form of government putting us under some New World Order completely out of reach of the people who will then be controlled by a totalitarian worldwide dictatorship. It is time that we withdraw completely from the United Nations, and disavow any of Nelson Rockefeller's, or others', schemes to establish a New World Order at the expense of deceived American citizens who, as Christians, want to live at peace, completely free of alien control or influence.

THE BETRAYAL OF SOUTH AFRICA

RETROSPECT

In 1898 in a war planned for the purpose of getting the United States involved in the affairs of nations beyond our shores and across the oceans, we became the rather unwilling possessor of the Philippine Islands. President McKinley agonized for a time, then resolved to accept the islands as an American charge and to "educate the Filipinos, and uplift and civilize and Christianize them." In 1934 an Act of Congress pledged full independence by the year 1946 and empowered the Philippine legislature to draw up a constitution and elect a president of the commonwealth. Despite the occupation of the islands by the Japanese during World War II, and the slow recapture of the Philippines by American forces under the command of General Douglas MacArthur, the pledge was kept. Complete independence was conferred on the Philippines on July 4, 1946. The then young United Nations applauded the act, not a single member nation of the UN failed to accord diplomatic recognition to the new sovereign Republic.

But what a difference thirty years later when a very similar act occurred! On October 25, 1976, the Republic of South Africa conferred independence upon the State of Transkei. Instead of congratulating South Africa the United Nations condemned her. Instead of granting full recognition to the new Nation of Transkei, 134 governments said they would prohibit "trade and any dealings" with the new black republic.

In all other respects, the birth of the Philippines and the Transkei are surprisingly similar; just as the settlement, growth and development of the Republics of the United States and South Africa are surprisingly similar. The early American settlers had to deal with Red men, the Afrikaners had to deal with Black men. We pushed the Red men into reservations; the Afrikaners let the eight different tribes settle in their own territories. Both the United States and South Africa were originally British colonies; the Americans won their independence in the Revolutionary War; the South Africans declared their independence in 1934, became a Republic in 1961 and withdrew from the British Commonwealth of Nations.

When the South Africans gained their sovereignty in 1934, they did with their eight black nations exactly what we had done with the Filipinos; they decided to "educate them, uplift and civilize and Christianize them" and prepare them for self-government."

In the Philippines, there were scores of different tribes with different customs and different languages. We did not try to integrate them, either among themselves or with the white rules and residents. In short, we practiced apartheid with the Filipinos, though that word had not yet come into the world's political lexicon. Anyone who thinks that system didn't work out should have been with us in the Philippines during the Japanese occupation of the islands. Their loyalty to the United States and their service beyond the simple call of duty was wonderful to behold, and experience. In fact, had it not been for their finding ways to get food and medicine to us while we were in prison camp, we wouldn't be writing this letter today. We are told that the loyalty of black troops to their white officers in both Rhodesia and South Africa is similar. Very simply put: Integration builds slaves; Apartheid by any other name builds men!

But, in 1946 the United States was praised and the Philippines honored; while in 1976 South Africa was condemned and Transkei cold-shouldered even by her black nation neighbors. What a difference thirty years has made.

It's all supposedly because of the South African insistence upon that racial policy called apartheid. But is it really? Can any moderately well informed person really think that the South African confrontation has to do with human beings, and not with mineral wealth, natural resources and geopolitical considerations?

This is doubly true in the case of the crime against the sovereign Republic of Rhodesia.

That brave Nation, whose history has been so very similar to the history of the United States from the time of the Revolutionary War to the War of 1812, stands in the way of progress toward World Government and monopoly control of the world's natural resources!

The following article appeared in English language papers in Europe but was censored by those who control the U.S. news media, and did not appear in papers published in the United States. We have added the accent in the first and final paragraphs:

SOUTH AFRICA IS TO MAINTAIN PRESSURE ON SMITH

By David B. Ottaway

Dar Es Salaam, Sept. 23 (WP)—Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere said here today that Secretary of State Henry Kissinger had assured him South Africa would put additional pressure on the white minority government in Rhodesia if it failed tomorrow to accept clearly the principle of black majority rule. In an interview at his Massani Bay seafront home outside the capital, the Tanzanian President said Mr. Kissinger had talked the "language of power" in his meeting with Prime Ministers John Vorster and Ian Smith, and that both white leaders were now under U.S. pressure.

Mr. Nyerere specifically confirmed a report in the Tanzanian Daily News today that quoted him as saying he had been assured by Mr. Kissinger that if Mr. Smith did not agree to majority rule immediately, then South Africa would put a "final squeeze" on Mr. Smith...

Succeeding events have shown that Prime Minister Vorster of South Africa was forced to do Kissinger's bidding and force Prime Minister Smith of Rhodesia to "knuckle under" to Kissinger's demands. Pressure on South Africa was brought about through the IMF gold auctions, and South Africa was forced to obey and then come begging to Rockefeller for assistance. The story is told between the lines in the following article which was published in Paris, but censored in the United States:

Washington, Sept 24 (WP)—Citibank confirmed yesterday it is negotiating a $300-million-plus loan to South Africa along with several other American banks. The firm's executive vice-president George Vojta made the statement in testimony before the Senate foreign relations Africa subcommittee which is holding a series of hearings on the conduct of American business in South Africa.

Rumors surfaced last month in London that the South African government, turned down by the Shah of Iran in its bid to borrow up to $500 million, had appealed to U.S. banks. South Africa's current debt to foreign banks is $5.5 billion, or 16 per cent of its gross national product. This year the government must service a public debt of $977 million.

Timothy Smith, representing church groups opposed to U.S. economic support of South Africa because of its apartheid policies, urged Congress to enact legislation prohibiting such loans, or at least requiring disclosure of loans exceeding $100,000.

Thus did the Monopoly Capitalists, acting through their international agent, Henry Kissinger, force the South African government into line, so that it would force the Rhodesian government into line. Ian Smith went to Geneva to arrange for the surrender of his government because any alternative seemed even worse. However, control of the black nations involved in the dispute is another matter. Their life style is so different from that of Anglo-Saxons, Nordics and other Europeans that their demagogic rulers cannot be controlled by promises of a future that is either better or worse. They are today's children and what they want they want now, not next year. Consequently, they listened to Henry Kissinger's promises, but went to Geneva with an entirely new set of demands that, in effect, amount to "we want majority rule in Rhodesia now, not two years from now." The wily Kissinger, sensing the impending storm he had sown last September, declined an invitation to go to Geneva and complete the destruction of orderly government in Rhodesia. Saying it would appear unseemly for him to leave this country on the eve of a national election, he left the bickering black leaders in the hands of Ivor Richard of Britain, who was to chair the conference in the name of the United Nations. And, as the conference began, Richard had a handful. According to The New York Times as of October 26:

"Efforts to unite Rhodesia's faction-ridden black nationalists were under way here today as Ivor Richard of Britain continued his quest for flexibility in the opposed positions of the white and black delegations to the conference on a transition to black rule."

If and when Richard gets the Rhodesian factions agreed upon procedure, then some person in authority must get the leaders of Angola, Zambia, Mozambique, Botswana, Malawi, Cuba, Red China and Soviet Russia to stop sending terrorists on raids across the border to massacre both black and white Rhodesians and despoil the farms and the factories in the once peaceful and productive land.

We hear so much from the people who are paid to preach hatred of the white citizens of Rhodesia, that it seems good to hear now and then, a voice raised in praise of them. Or, at least, to hear words justifying their determination to save their native land from destruction if at all possible. We have recently received a report from Ian G. Anderson, editor of Rhodesia & World Report. Here is a part of what he wrote:

It has become the official policy of successive British Governments, whether allegedly right-wing or frankly left-wing, that peace can only be assured in Rhodesia by handing over power to what is glibly referred to as "African majority rule." This policy is based solely on the counting of heads with no regard to their contents; there being about 6 million blacks to about 275,000 whites. No credit, of course, is given for the fact that the blacks have increased from an estimated 300-400,000 in 1890 to nearly 6 million now, because the white man put an end to inter-tribal war, brought law and order to a primitive and savage country, and through his expertise and energy brought prosperity, health, education, and material and social progress to the indigenous population at an expense of effort and treasure out of all proportion to the meagre contribution made by the black population. "Genocide" and "oppression" are the terms commonly used to describe these benefits which have accrued to the black man from the white man's efforts.

...(it does not) appear to be the wish of the black people themselves that they should be handed over to so-called African majority rule. African society in both urban and rural areas revolves around the Chiefs. They continue to receive the allegiance due to hereditary leaders and live among their people in the areas allocated to each tribal group, as well as making frequent visits to the urban African townships. It is because of this that the Chiefs have rightfully been given their place in the Rhodesian Cabinet, in the Senate and in the lower House of Assembly. The black political parties are essentially the product of urban semi-sophisticates, university students and graduates, and the so-called emergent black intelligentsia, who hope to sit in the seats of power and milk the country for their own profit in the event of the surrender of good government to anarchy.

The clamour of thousands of vociferous supporters at ANC (African National Council) gatherings is lost in the silence of the millions of quiet, simple Africans who daily go about their ordinary tasks in peace, and who look to the white man for their welfare. They look to the white man for economic advancement, health, education and protection. They look to him for fairness and more than a fair share of the profits of their joint enterprises.

Above all, they look to him not to let them

PANAMA CANAL TALKS BLOCKED BY COURT

Ancon, C.Z. (AP)—U.S. District Court Judge Guthrie F. Crowe issued an order Wednesday temporarily restraining the U.S. government from further negotiations with Panama for a new Panama Canal treaty. Crowe's order was issued in response to a petition filed by William R. Drummond, chairman of the Canal Zone Central Labor Union.

The petition charged that the negotiations threaten to infringe, without due process of law, on the property or liberty of some 40,000 Americans residing in the Canal Zone, or otherwise involved in the operation of the canal. The petition said this violates the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. It claimed that authorization by the U.S. Congress is required for the treaty negotiations to continue.

Crowe's restraining order was addressed to President Ford, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, and Ambassador Ellsworth L. Bunker, the senior American representative in the negotiations. They were named as defendants in Drummond's petition. The local U.S. marshal's office said it had set in motion the legal machinery required to serve summons on Ford, Kissinger and Bunker....

down, It is not the white Rhodesian or South African who is letting them down, but those of Europe and America who, by failing to lift a finger in our and their defence, are condemning black and white to the endless servitude of international communism.

The burden of responsibility assumed 85 years ago by white Rhodesians cannot be wantonly or irresponsibly abdicated. The once prosperous countries of Angola and Mozambique have been reduced to ruin; famine and terror stalk these lands; business is at a standstill and white men with their skills and humane care have emigrated by the hundred thousand, whilst African so-called nationalist movements fight each other—and the civilian populations—for the corpses of their once-prosperous lands...

The acceleration of this horror has one clearly defined cause: the removal of white control, the lifting of that civilized moderation which has always been necessary to curb the latent savagery of Africa. Here we touch the core of the matter. This is not really a war at all; for war, by definition, must have a military objective, and there is none discernible here. The objective is terroristic, the victims are more black than white; and the destruction of homes, farms and other amenities affects the blacks as much, if not more, than the whites...

There is not one country of Africa which can legitimately claim that it is in any way better off under black rule than it was under white rule....

...the so-called "race war" is nothing but communist-inspired aggression against my country and its inhabitants. There is overwhelming evidence (which I need not detail here) that the terrorist organisations operating against Rhodesia, are organised, trained, armed, led and financed by communist money. Arms captured from terrorists used to be predominantly of Red Chinese origin; recently they have been replaced by those of Soviet Russia and her Eastern European satellites.

Rhodesia and South Africa are treasure houses of natural resources. We have in abundance what our enemies want and intend to take by force. For instance, Rhodesia mines 38 minerals of which 13 are classified as of strategic importance. Our enemies cloak their cupidity with a hypocritical concern for the "oppressed" black man whom they intend to "liberate" from freedom into slavery....

This little country has not only survived ten years of sanctions; it has prospered—for the benefit of all its peoples of whatever colour or creed. Indeed, the economic and social progress of the indigenous population has probably been greater than anywhere else in Africa. In spite of the continuous and considerable strain of terrorist attacks and a flood of hostile propaganda winged on the air from neighboring countries, race relations remain excellent, as is attested by almost every foreign visitor to Rhodesia. In particular the loyalty of the Chiefs to the Government has been and remains unshaken. Contrary to all the expectations of the vultures gathered for the feast, Rhodesia remains alive and kicking.

(Then came Kissinger, armed with the money power of the Monopoly Capitalists, who finance the communists who in turn finance the terrorists. Rhodesia's one true friend was South Africa. But Kissinger put pressure on Prime Minister Vorster, and Vorster put pressure on Prime Minister Smith. So, what the communist-supported terrorists could not do, the CFR-supported Kissinger has been able to do. Yet, there remains what Editor and Patriot Anderson calls "A Cloud of Witnesses." You'll understand as, after this editorial interruption, Mr. Anderson continues his report).

From Thermopylae (480 B.C.) to Malta (A.D. 1565), from Horatio at the bridge to little Belgium in 1914, it has often fallen to a small community of people to give a moral lead to its larger and more powerful neighbours. In each case the war was not ended by the small country's stand; in each case the value of its sacrifice was measured by subsequent events; in each case valuable space was gained for other parties to rally to the cause and to complete the task so boldly initiated by their faith.

As St. Paul wrote: "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith."

THE WAKE FOR THE REPUBLIC WAS HORRIFYING

NOT WITH A MOAN, BUT A CHEER

"The great question before the American people was – and still is – whether we are going Socialist, and eventually Communist, or are to return to the American system of private enterprise, private property and individual initiative." So wrote the late Merwin K. Hart in his Economic Council letter of November 15, 1948, just after the election of Harry Truman to the Presidency of the United States.

Twenty-eight years later, after the election of James Earl Carter, Jr. there is no longer any such question; we have the answer. The Great Democratic Majority has decided for all of us that we shall "go Socialist." We shall get it, but not all of us deserve it; for there is that remnant of citizens which will continue to strive—perhaps hopelessly but necessarily because they "can do no other"—for a return of the American system of private enterprise, private property and individual initiative."

While the Great Majority which allegedly dictates policies and programs for the nation cheers and holds up the two finger victory sign with one hand and the clenched fist with the other, let us note what they are shouting victory about. Let us look at the Democratic Platform which Jimmy Carter has promised to carry out during his tenure in the White House. This is but a summary of the principal promises, not a complete listing. Parenthesized comments are added for clarification:

- * Increase Federal spending in all areas except defense (which means higher taxes and more inflation).
- * National economic planning by the Federal government (through passage of the controversial Humphrey-Hawkins Bill).
- * Mandatory national health insurance.
- * Federally-financed guaranteed annual income.
- * Federalization of all welfare programs (no local control).
- * Federally-financed Congressional elections (less control by the people at State and local levels).

- * Intensify Federal regulation of all industry (death to private enterprise).
- * Nationwide Federal building standards.
- * Divestiture of oil companies (creating more bureaucratic controls).
- * Continued Federal regulation of oil and gas prices (leading to more scarcity).
- * Discourage development of nuclear power (giving USSR superiority in this field).
- * Eliminate tax-shelter farming (for the small independent farmer, but providing loopholes for Agribusinessmen such as Jimmy Carter, the peanut tycoon).
- * Repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act (which would invalidate the right to work laws in 20 States).
- * Mandatory school busing.
- * Gun control and a ban on handguns (this contravenes the 2nd Amendment).
- * Ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment (which is designed to destroy the home and make the State the guardian of the children, as in the USSR).
- * Support for abortion.
- * Full pardon for Vietnam-era draft-dodgers.
- * Relinquish sovereignty over the Panama Canal.
- * Foreign Policy to be dictated by Rockefeller controlled Trilateral Commission.

The foregoing list includes practically every element of Corporate State Socialism. There is really nothing new about the list, but the conditions are now different. Previously, with a Democrat-controlled Congress and a Republican Administration, they operated as something of a check on each other. Thus socialized medicine, guaranteed annual wage and full-scale national economic planning were not made into law during the 94th Congress. But, beginning next Jan. 4th, there will be a Democrat-controlled Congress and a Democratic Administration. This will mean smooth sailing for any and all socialistic legislation, since a two-to-one majority in the House and the Senate means total control.

This is the reason that the Invisible Government was determined that Jimmy Carter should become President of the United States in 1977. Getting Carter into the White House took some doing, and some chicanery, and downright vote stealing. In key areas, such as certain communities in Florida where an overwhelmingly conservative vote might be expected a new kind of punchboard type voting machine was introduced, one in which votes might be changed merely by resetting of the vote-recording computer. It is said that such manipulation of the punchboard type voting machine is so fool-proof that even experts can't detect the switch. Since Florida was a key State in the election, one other "legal" gimmick was employed. Write-in votes for minor party candidates were permitted; but, the seventeen names of the electors had to be written into a two-inch square, an almost impossible feat for the average voter. So, Carter carried Florida, but by a slim margin. Ballot box chicanery was charged in New York, but the charge was later dropped, and Carter won in New York State by a narrow margin.

This is not intended as a defense for Jerry Ford and the Republican Party; under either major party candidate, the march toward total Corporate State Socialism and the New World Order would have continued. But the march will become a quick-step under Carter—and the Invisible Government has adopted a deadline. This New World Order is to be completely installed in the 1980s, and the program will progress at a faster pace with Jimmy Carter as the ostensible Parade Marshal.

That Jimmy Carter was chosen before the actual Nov. 2 election was held, became obvious to anyone reading the October 1976 issue of Foreign Affairs. This is the official publication of the Council on Foreign Relations; and the CFR has a "1980's Project" which has to do with reshaping the world in the 1980s (1984 is still a sentimentally favored date). Now, Richard H. Ullman is Professor of International Affairs at Princeton University; Ullman is also Director of the 1980s Project of the Council on Foreign Relations.

The leading article in the October 1976 issue of CFR's Foreign Affairs is titled "Trilateralism: 'Partnership' for What?" And the author of the article is this same Richard H. Ullman.

In this article, which was obviously written weeks before the election of Nov. 2, Ullman does not discuss the Trilateral Commission as such, but he discusses instead the program of the Trilateral Commission. A footnote on page 1 of the article explains the difference in these words:

"It should be noted that this article is about 'trilateralism' as one way of organizing a portion of the international community for the conduct of foreign policy; it is not about the Trilateral Commission as such, nor about particular statements as policy issues made under its auspices."

When David Rockefeller formed the Trilateral Commission four years ago he named Jimmy Carter as one of its charter members, with Zbigniew Brzezinski as its Director.

In his article in Foreign Affairs, the Director of the "1980s Project of the Council on Foreign Relations" explains that "The Trilateral Commission is an organization of influential citizens" from the countries of North America, Western Europe, and Japan. Then he states:

"Trilateralism has been explicitly embraced by the Democratic candidate for the presidency as a central theme of his foreign policy."

Now notice, as we quote pertinent parts of this article, how the author takes it for granted and signals the fact that Jimmy Carter has been chosen before the election as the next President of the United States:

"Where trilateralism began as a formula—and a forum—for coordinating economic policy among the advanced market economies, it has come to mean something much more far-reaching—a partnership between North America, Western Europe, and Japan," to quote Governor Carter."

"... The ultimate result—to quote Zbigniew Brzezinski, the former Director of the Trilateral Commission—would be 'a community of the developed nations.' The path to that community... runs through intensive regular and ever more formal political consultation, and 'common political planning with regard to problems or areas of mutual interest' in order to achieve 'a shared political perspective among the governmental bodies of the three (trilateral) units.' Governor Carter used almost the same language in addressing the Foreign Policy Association last June."...

"... Governor Carter called upon the trilateral states to form a 'creative partnership (to) take the lead in establishing and promoting basic global standards of human rights.'..."

"In his address to the Foreign Policy Association, Governor Carter spoke of the need for the Western societies to learn from one another in such prosaic spheres as health care, urban planning, mass transportation, and measures to counteract unemployment, rootlessness and alienations. In the short run, such sharing of ideas and techniques may be the most valuable—because they are the most concrete—achievements of trilateralism. In the long run, it may be the effective protection of rights and liberties. The ‘partnership’ about which he also spoke is already an accomplished fact—provided one is prepared to use the rhetoric of trilateralism to connote a complex set of particular relationships that link together the several societies of North America, Western Europe, and Japan in a variety of different ways for a variety of different purposes. Only the triangle, in all its elegant simplicity, is absent. It is unlikely ever to appear.”

That last sentence requires explaining. The author (and Carter, and Brzezinski) makes it very clear that Trilateralism has to do with INTERdependence, not with “World Unity,” which seems to be Carter’s slogan. Trilateralism, like Interdependence, is not a final goal, but a means to the end, which is the New World Order. CFR official Ullman hints at this in his article when he writes:

“Trilateralism is not an end in itself, but an approach and a process—one way of organizing a part of international society to cope with some international problems.”

And again: “...over the next decade, as the shared characteristics which set the trilateral states off from the other members of the community of nation-states become less distinct...the ranks of the industrialized countries will include not merely the democratic, market-economy nations on the one hand and the Soviet Union and its East European allies on the other. By the period 1985-90, countries like Mexico, Brazil, India, Iran and Saudi Arabia will probably have joined the ‘advanced nation club’ for a number of the functions of that club—the governance of trade relations, the organization of international monetary affairs, the regulation of foreign direct investment, etc. At the same time, they are not likely to be representative democracies. Whether or not the next decade will also see the emergence of more sharply demarcated regional economic blocs and regional spheres of influence (another dilution of trilateralism, incidentally), the much greater involvement of these non-trilateral states in the international economic system will erode the qualitative difference, measured both by the intensity and the scope of economic interactions, which is one of the strongest glues of trilateralism.” (unquote; emphasis added).

Translation: Trilateralism is simply a kind of Regionalism—economic regionalism. The industrial nations of North America, Western Europe and Japan are the industrial giants upon which the rest of the world must depend, so long as industrial and economic interaction exists between the Trilateral West (North America, Western Europe, and Japan) and the Triangular Constellation of U.S.A., U.S.S.R., and P.R.C. (Kissinger created the latter, now it is Brzezinski’s turn to complete the former). Because of the industrial and economic strength of these two “Regional Triangles,” the rest of the world will be forced into conformity and The New World Order will have been established through “the glue of trilateralism.”

So, with Brzezinski acting as Carter’s chief adviser on foreign affairs, Kissinger’s political detente will become Brzezinski’s economic interaction, and political world government will evolve out of economic necessity. At least, so say the Council on Foreign Relations’ Richard Ullman, the Trilateral Commission’s Jimmy Carter, and Zbigniew Brzezinski, who is an agent of the CFR, the Trilateral Commission, and the Rockefellers.

ABOUT PARADE MARSHALS

Earlier in this letter we mentioned that the Invisible Government had chosen Jimmy Carter to act as Parade Marshal in this quickstep march toward the New World Order. In reality, there is little new about an Elite that chooses political leaders to act as “fronts” while the government is actually being run by people behind the scenes. This is true of most governments at all times in history. Regardless of the form of government in a country, the people of that country seldom know who is really running their government. Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield, commented on this fact in regard to Europe in the 19th century (and he should know). In searching our files for evidence of a similar statement in regard to America in this, the 20th century, we were reminded that shortly after returning to the United States from an extended stay in the Far East, we were introduced to Human Events, a publication still being issued weekly. At that time, a weekly news analysis was written by the editors, Felix Morley and Frank Hanighen. In one of their analyses in early 1949, they commented on a "palace guard, operating from behind the scenes as a board of directors, now a recognized though undesirable institution" in our own government. Furthermore, "it heads a department of sub-rosa activity whose personnel in the different countries throughout the world seem to be held together by unseen threads and who seem to be the spiritual head of a new ruling class throughout the world."

At that time—1949—little was known by other than the Elite, of the Council on Foreign Relations, the London based Round Table Groups; the Bilderbergers had not yet been formed. However, the existence of an Invisible Government was known by students of the Conspiracy. For example, Edna Lonigen wrote an article which was published in the March 30, 1949 issue of Human Events in which she spoke of a "palace guard" that controls Truman as it controlled Roosevelt, and that its only policy is maintenance of its own power."

"Harry Hopkins and other shining lights of the Roosevelt elite are gone," she wrote, "but they were not important as individuals. The elite is a new class trained in handling the high voltage wires of absolute power. When one topples, another is ready to take his place...."

"The goal of the new elite is the same in every country. They devise one program of 'welfare' after another and, however their 'planned economies' may seem to differ, they all centralize power.

"The role of the Leader, while important in the beginning, is easily exaggerated. The Leader is the symbol to which the people's emotions are attached, the charismatic 'savior' whom Max Weber foresaw so clearly a generation ago. The elite strip the people of their possessions while the Leader holds them enthralled. So completely is the leader's function that of a symbol that he can continue to head the government long after he is physically broken, as Roosevelt proved.

"The governing elite must be conspiratorial, because it is doing the exact opposite of what the Leader says. Every governmental utterance must be designed to delude. The elite must be secretive, because it must constantly change its tactics to keep the people deceived, and to confuse its adversaries. The elite must be dynamic, to seize quickly all the new means of power, before people realize what is happening.

"When it assumes power, the leadership party's program is pacific and takes the form of the domestic Welfare State.... (then) we see the effort to build the World Welfare State, scattering its largesse and spreading its tentacles over the world...."

"But whatever the stage of the development, government by the elite is a return to Absolutism.... The issue is control (of the world's natural and human resources)."

We have reprinted the foregoing, originally published in 1949, because, although the characters are different, the situation is the same. A "Charismatic Leader" has been chosen by the Elite, and with the help of the controlled news media, "a pig in a poke" has been sold to the Nation. The general public knows little or nothing about Jimmy Carter save his smile and his convincing evasiveness. Nothing has been told the general public of his deplorable record as Governor of Georgia. The media has said nothing of his affiliation with people engaged in the drug traffic. Few know of his selection by and connections with the Rockefellers. Few know anything of his staff members; the Communist background of economic adviser Lawrence Klein, of the strange history of his closest friend Dr. Peter Bourne, of Bourne's activist wife Mary King who is Jimmy's chief adviser on women's affairs.

Here is a man with a mind conditioned by Rockefeller, a Kennedy-type profile, and a desire to complete the work started by F. D. Roosevelt, who has been chosen to lead us into total Corporate State Socialism, which is the next giant step toward total control of the world's natural and human resources. Most surely a crisis is developing, and if liberals are in places of power when it comes, there is a chance that the people will seek the Truth, demand a return to Constitutional government, and even turn to God—Who will heal their land if and when His conditions are met. This is our greatest, indeed our only hope.

THE SCHEMES TO COLLECTIVIZE THE CITIES

URBAN AGENDA

This may serve as a political barometer: More than 100 city mayors met in Chicago under the auspices of the United States Conference of Mayors. They sent a telegram to President-elect Carter begging for more money to run their cities and "easy access to the new White House."

"Whether this be a Vice President as an urban ombudsman or a domestic council in the White House with real urban clout is not the issue," said the message to Carter. "The issue is that in order to make the Federal bureaucracy responsive, mayors must have access to the White House if the Federal-state-local system is to be made workable."

Mayor Kenneth Gibson of Newark, new Jersey chaired the emergency meeting. He called for increased Federal aid "to create jobs and assist in such areas as housing, transportation and health." But The New York Times was dubious, said editorially:

"It was somewhat disconcerting that Mr. Carter sent as his representative to the mayors' meeting Howard J. Samuels, the former Off-Track Betting chief who once proposed bankruptcy as a solution to New York City's problems. If Mr. Samuels is to be an adviser to the next President on urban affairs, we hope he has thought better of what the (New York City) Citizens Budget Commission describes as a 'no-solution alternative'."

Candidate Carter had previously told a Conference of Mayors in Milwaukee that, if he won the election, he would "come forward with new national initiatives to help bring about an end to the crises that plague America's cities... IF the mayors did their best to do their jobs!"

In other words, Carter was ready to help if the mayors "did it his way." Hence, The New York Times hinted editorially that the man who was elected as a Democrat may rule as a Demagogue. The paper that bends all the news to fit also agreed with the more than 100 mayors assembled in Chicago, that local government has been so conditioned that it cannot survive without help from the Central, Federal Government.

In a general sense, this "conditioning for collectivism" began with the Federal plan for forced racial integration. Reverse segregation started almost immediately thereafter. The middle-class whites began to move out of the cities and into suburban areas; and they were the citizens who paid the bulk of the local taxes and kept the retail stores in business so they also could pay taxes and thereby keep the city governments solvent.

At about this same time, that mad scheme called Urban Renewal began to add to the miseries of the core cities. This scheme made millionaires out of a few land speculators. But it also made welfare recipients out of millions of displaced persons who previously had been able to make their own way, pay their bills, and even pay their taxes. It saddled the city governments with empty and decaying and untaxable housing developments, and with newstyle settlements that bred much in the way of crime but little in the way of taxes to keep the city solvent.

Now, when this coercive racial integration caused the middle-class, tax-paying citizenry to move to the suburbs, it followed that the tax-paying retail merchants were forced to move their stores to where the customers were. Shopping centers, malls and marts began to spring up in the outskirts of cities and in suburban areas; and the downtown shopping areas began to suffer from blight and ostracism.

One result: The local governments could no longer raise enough money in taxes, or float sufficient in bonds, to support the still essential services such as police, fire departments, garbage and trash collection, street and sewer repair, etc.

The Federal government had already become a Welfare government so far as people were concerned. So, out went the appeals for the Central government to become a Welfare government so far as cities were concerned!

And one of the first responses was the Model Cities Plan.

Eight years ago, columnist Paul Scott was one of the first to warn that the Model Cities Plan was really a Social Engineering Plan. An article appearing in the Sept. 11, 1969 issue of Human Events stated:

"If government social planners get their way, the multi-billion-dollar Model Cities program will be used to finance much more revolutionary objectives than the rebuilding of American cities. Several programs contained in pilot projects...provide for the use of federal funds to change values and attitudes of residents of entire communities. The 'social engineering' will be attempted through controversial projects ranging from 'sensitivity training' programs for community leaders, teachers, social workers and the police to federally financed art, theater, educational and health programs.... One of the most interesting innovations in most of the Model Cities programs now under consideration by HUD is the provision to permit 18-year-olds to vote and serve on neighborhood councils.

"These councils, which are stirring up considerable controversy are locally elected groups designed to increase citizens' participation in programs and decisions in Model Cities projects...."

Two other very important developments were to contribute toward the surrender of local governments to the Federal bureaucracy. First, government employee and public service labor unions were formed, causing strikes and disruptions of service among teachers, garbage collectors, bus and street-car operators, police and fire departments. Demands for increased wages and workers' benefits by these unions crippled many cities, drove many to near bankruptcy.

Secondly, under the guise of The New Federalism (Regional Governance) appointed administrators began to replace elected officials. Through regional and sub-regional councils using as their weapons Revenue Sharing, Federal Guidelines, and that control mechanism originally called Planning-Programming-Budgeting System, the Federal Bureaucracy was able to take full control of all planning and development programs requiring federal aid of any kind.

Also helping to complete the takeover of local governments were outside groups such as the Committee for Economic Development (CED), the National Municipal League, the other organizations affiliated with 1313, the League of Women Voters, etc.

The Research and Policy Committee of CED published a "statement on national policy" in March, 1976, entitled "Improving Productivity in State and Local Government." The statement noted that "a number of research and reform groups over the years have compiled an impressive record of inducing improvement in government operations." It named a few of the more important groups, then added:

"In addition, emerging forces include a variety of citizen organizations that focus on local issues, nationally oriented groups such as John Gardner's Common Cause and Ralph Nader's Public Citizen that focus on improving government processes (both groups have more recently supported establishment of associated organizations at the state and local levels)... Universities and research centers can contribute much to public policy and productivity analysis..."

An example of this help for local problems from outside sources is provided by a recent experiment carried out in Belmont, California. An outside group, the Chicago-based Institute for Cultural Affairs came to town to promote what they called "An Old Fashioned Town Meeting." The publicity read:

"The spirit of Sam Adams and the revolutionary Boston town meetings will be celebrated in Belmont Oct. 30 when the citizens are invited to gather for a day-long Town Meeting '76. The purpose of the meeting... is to bring the citizens together for a fundamental re-appraisal of the goals and ideals of the city...."

"'Belmont is a test case and if the citizens can be brought together for a day-long meeting in a bedroom community like this, it will surely work elsewhere,' said (Joe Frassetto of the Belmont Jaycees)... The College of Notre Dame and its student body were enthusiastic about the project from the beginning, and have agreed to host the conference (which is) sponsored by the Chicago-based Institute for Cultural Affairs."

Sounds like good, clean fun and a project similar to the old New England Town Meeting, and worthy of support, doesn't it? But, a group of local citizens became suspicious and what they learned caused them to oppose the project, defeat it, and issue a warning to other cities. Here is a news release issued by the Belmont Citizens for Constitutional Government which explains the scheme:

October 30, 1976

Belmont's much heralded 'Town Meeting '76' had all the earmarks of that earlier American "Revolution" in just one way...it did create an uproar!... But... it hit a snag!

After Mrs. Rose Ozwirk had attended a couple of the preliminary meetings, she became quite suspicious of the whole thing. And when she read the slick copy "leadership training manual" that came out of the "Institute of Cultural Affairs," a Chicago-based "World Service Organization" in charge of the event, she did a double-take. The I.C.A. Corporation was claiming to have "scientifically developed" a program to set "new economic, social and political goals" for our nation for the next 200 years, which would be the result of compiling and merging not only the results of the Belmont Town Meeting '76 program...but those of 5,000 such functions planned by the Institute nationally. She decided it was time to get to the bottom of it all!

Her suspicions were further confirmed when a "trainer" from Chicago appeared on the scene to conduct intensive "brainstorming" sessions as training for the highly structured "group dynamics workshops" which were obviously designed to pressure the participants into endorsing new concepts of government. She was appalled at the manual instructions to would-be "workshop leaders" who were actually being told that in leading a "brainstorm" they must first ask the questions clearly and simply and to be sure that they had answered the question themselves so that they would be clear on "the kind of answer they were seeking."

All of this sounded more like "teaching to a test" than conducting the kind of town-meeting the citizens were being sold. Upon further investigation of the organization, it was discovered that they had been in existence for some 15 years but under the name of "Ecumenical Institute of Chicago"... which was quite well-known for its radical concepts of a One-World Socialistic and Humanistic nature, and whose promotion of these concepts in the economic, social and political arenas are international as well as national in scope.

Belmont Citizens for Constitutional Government has been formed in order to counteract this activity in the community and to alert others who are targeted for such involvement. This ad hoc organization is not accusing any of the individuals or religious institutions that may have been innocently involved in Belmont's "Town Meeting" without knowing all of these factors. Indeed, their genuine shock at the "exposure" of most of these circumstances was strong indication that they were not aware. But it doesn't alter the fact that some people do know just exactly what was intended... not just for Belmont but for 5,000 other cities as well.

We do not underestimate the seriousness of these charges, and we believe that a national investigation to determine the extent of the infiltration into our local and state governments should be started without fail. We will be approaching our Congressman immediately after the election for assistance in this matter.....

This Institute of Cultural Affairs, formerly known as the Ecumenical Institute of Chicago, identifies itself as a "World Service Organization" with its main office listed as 4750 North Sheridan Road, Chicago, Illinois, 60640. It claims to have 101 different offices in as many different cities, 47 of them in the United States. However, we cannot find this organization listed in any official directory available to us; and we feel it is safe to assume that this ICA is a "front" for some larger and even more important international socialist and/or communist apparatus (again assuming that there is a difference.)

However, this movement which is dedicated to the destruction of autonomous local government is not confined to unofficial groups such as ICA. Federal judges are also aiding in the plot. The following is a pertinent and current example, and we quote from an article appearing in the October 1976 issue of The Citizen, which is the official journal of the Citizens Councils of America (254 East Griffith Street, Jackson, Mississippi 39202).

Having already lost control of their public schools and private businesses as a result of federal court edicts, American citizens now are being told by a United States District Judge that they may no longer decide by a majority vote the kind of government they may have in their home cities.

In a landmark decision which could bring about the destruction of similar forms of government in more than 200 cities across the nation, U.S. District Judge Ben C. Dawkins, Jr. ruled that the commission-council form of government which has served the city of Shreveport, Louisiana for the past 66 years is unconstitutional.

Judge Dawkins' ruling was issued despite the fact that citizens of Shreveport only six years ago voted 2½-to-1 to keep their commission-council government, thus defeating liberal elements which had proposed a cunningly contrived plan to divide the city geographically, racially and factionally....

The ruling also plays into the hands of newly active self-appointed government experts who, pursuing the aims of a national organization bent on establishing uniform "model cities" charters for all municipalities, are conducting campaigns currently in both Shreveport and Jackson.

In Shreveport, the League of Women Voters is spearheading the drive and is being encouraged by officials of the Chamber of Commerce, which was repudiated by the citizenry six years ago when it entered into an ill-fated alliance with the Central Trades and Labor Council in an effort to change the government. In Jackson, the movement was (also) initiated by the League of Women Voters and a suddenly formed group known as the Chimneyville Society, which announced that pledges totalling $5,000 had materialized out of thin air to help institute a new form of government.... The group began work with its $5,000 in pledges from anonymous sources before it had even chosen a name for itself. Within a week after revealing its existence it was allotted a three-quarter front-page layout in the Jackson Daily News to announce the formation of a 66-member steering committee....

All of these attempts by unofficial research groups, official councils, federal courts, or whatever, have one thing in common: The goal is a uniform governance system of all cities, towns and communities, with universal rules and regulations for all urban areas—and with appointed administrators replacing elected officials in all decision-making positions.

This form of collectivism is called Regional Governance. It is a control system that can be (and is being) installed in any country, regardless of the type of government which may be currently existent in that country. Hence, Regionalism has been installed in Communist Russia, in the Socialist countries of Western Europe, and in the United States. In this country, in addition to changing the form of city and community governments,

"Regionalism seeks to dissolve county governments, transfer state powers to a 'Regional Capitol,' administer the affairs of U.S. citizens through a network of federal regions and state sub-divisions from a central authority in Washington, D.C., seize control of property and production facilities, and reduce Americans to the status of economic serfs on the land which once was theirs." (Arch Roberts).

These revolutionaries who pose as humanitarians use the Hegelian principle to bring about change; Thesis, Antithesis, Synthesis. First, create the problem. Second, create opposition to the problem. Third, offer a solution to the problem which would have been impossible to impose without the proper psychological conditioning of the people achieved by the first and second stages.

If you need examples, consider the fuel shortage, the crisis in the public educational system, shortage of housing, of food, inflation and recession—these are but a few of the problems that have been created by the revolutionaries, in order to apply the Hegelian principle and bring about change.

Make no mistake about this: War has been declared against the American people by revolutionaries posing as humanitarians. At issue is whether we shall be able to live under the protection and freedom of a Constitutional Republic, or under a collectivist economic dictatorship. If God be willing, the choice is still ours to make. But the battle is in the city and at our very doorstep and the daylight is far spent....

INTERREGNUM – THE PAUSE THAT SELDOM REFRESHES

GOODBY, NELSON'S KISSINGER; HELLO, DAVID'S BRZEZINSKI.

"Interregnum," like "detente," is a word we borrowed from the French, and then changed its meaning to fit its new environment. Interregnum was originally defined as the time during which a throne was vacant and a new king had not yet been crowned. But here in the United States the word is used to denote the time during which a new President has been elected but has not yet moved into the White House; also the time when lame ducks are winding up their political affairs and new members of the flock are preparing for the upcoming flight into the public sector. Ordinarily, this is a time when little of great moment occurs on the national scene, a political hiatus. As one columnist noted, events that usually would be bypassed by the press, or hidden on inside pages, suddenly become front-page stories. Frank Starr of the Chicago Tribune, on the morning of Nov. 17, complained:

"We don't have an election any more to fill up the morning papers. The transition hasn't really begun. The new administration's crusades are months away. The Middle East is relatively quiet.... The campaigning is over and there's nothing to take it's place... It should be delightful.... But this town (and maybe most of the news business) abhors a vacuum...."

So, because the media hungered for news, a murderer named Gilmore became a public hero of sorts, the fate of a church of 683 souls in a town in south Georgia became a political propaganda piece, the Legionnaires' disease was trotted out for updating but with nothing really new added to the "who" and "what" and "why" of the story.

But there were important stories that, under normal circumstances, would never have front-paged. For example, at a time when the powers that be are about to complete the job of socializing the United States, an anti-socialist speech by William Saxbe is given prominent space in the nation's press. The Associated Press reported, and many metropolitan dailies published the following, on November 17th:

"New Delhi—Outgoing U.S. Ambassador William Saxbe indirectly attacked the Indian government's economic policies Tuesday in a speech that belittled countries trying to achieve socialism. 'Those who advocate state socialism can't point to a place in the world where it has worked,' Saxbe told the Indo-American Chamber of Commerce. 'Individual enterprise has to be maintained and encouraged, and if there is a place where state socialism has worked to some extent, it is because some form of individual incentive was permitted.'

"Saxbe, who leaves for home Saturday, said that he was distressed by the lack of understanding he has found in India about free enterprise during his 21 months as ambassador. 'The thing that shocks me about living in India is how little free enterprise is appreciated,' he said. 'I feel we somehow are not getting the story of America across.'

"However, the 60-year-old former Attorney General and Republican senator from Ohio said he did not favor the United States' trying to impose the free enterprise system on other countries. 'My message to America is not to shove this ideal down peoples' throats but to show it as a beacon to others,' he said. Saxbe said he felt the American beacon was strong, judging by the large number of persons who come to the American Embassy each day seeking immigrant visas while no Indians are known to be seeking emigration to the Soviet Union....

"The U.S. Embassy announced Monday that Saxbe had resigned as ambassador and would return to his native Ohio to re-establish a law practice." (unquote).

There is nothing very unusual about the preceding story. What is unusual is the fact that it received such prominent display in the metropolitan press. We presume that, because of the "interregnum," there was a shortage of news.

Equally unusual was the appearance of a story which was published in the Lancaster, Pennsylvania, Sunday News on September 26, 1976. To see even a part of the truth about the Concept of Regional Governance published in a commercial newspaper, is unusual indeed. The story follows:

REGIONAL COUNCILS DECLARED ATTEMPT TO 'SOCIALIZE' U.S.

Grass roots concern over a burgeoning federal shadow-government, an interstate regional concept that is usurping states' rights and dictating how local governments shall set priorities and spend federal money, attracted nearly 75 persons to Lancaster this weekend from eight counties of Pennsylvania and five states. A California county supervisor told the convention Saturday that the regional concept could be traced back to a plan developed nearly 40 years ago by a National Resources Committee chaired by then-Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes. The Californian, William V.D. Johnson, called it "a blueprint to socialize America." He said that resistance to the regional concept is well-organized and growing in strength in California. He declared that "survival of the United States as a sovereign nation under the constitution is at stake."

Johnson came to Lancaster specifically for the first annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Committee to Save Our Local Governments, which opened Saturday and will close today at the Continental Inn. Other officials and leaders of the growing local-government movement came from Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Vermont, Florida and Missouri (and New York, New Jersey, Maryland and Washington, D.C.—Ed.).

Pennsylvania State Rep. Samuel W. Morris, D-Pottstown, vice-chairman of the State House Committee on Local Government, was a speaker. Said Morris afterward: "There's no doubt but that the regional network's control over the federal purse-strings represents a real challenge to States sovereignty." He said the Pennsylvania General Assembly's action earlier this year—which is now being tested in court by the Shapp administration—in seizing legislative control over most federal funds coming into the State could be construed as an "opening gun" in State efforts to buck the trend that was unleashed by President Nixon in 1969 when he ordered, by executive fiat, that the 50 States be realigned into 10 regional units for planning and federal subsidy allocations.

"The end result has been that States and local municipalities have had their traditional powers and rights usurped by out-of-state bureaucrats," said Edward Balajeski of Bucks County, chairman of the State committee and its organizer five years ago. The committee has 2,000 supporters.

Under attack is the growing power being assumed by 10 Federal Regional Councils, composed of appointed federal officials from the federal departments of Agriculture, Interior, Labor, Transportation, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, Office of Economic Opportunity, Environmental Protection Agency and the Office of Management and Budget.

The committee's spokesmen contend that the councils are designed to gradually replace city, county and state government.

Land use control will soon become a major battlefield, Balajeski predicted.

Pennsylvania is under the aegis of a Philadelphia Regional Council, which directs activities in a five-state area also including Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and District of Columbia...

As we stated previously, it is unusual for articles such as Ambassador Saxbe's attack on socialism, and Commissioner Johnson's attack on Federal Regionalism, to appear in the commercial press. But this is the period of interregnum, and the Establishment Censors may have let down their guard.

However, there is nothing unusual about the news release which says that Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger has pledged to "support American foreign policy under President-elect Jimmy Carter." Kissinger was to go to Plains, Georgia "to answer fully his (Carter's) questions and to cooperate to the fullest extent to bring about a smooth transition." Kissinger's remarks came during a speech and a question-and-answer session with delegates attending the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Assembly being held at Williamsburg, Virginia.

It was, of course, important that all NATO members know that the interregnum will bring about no change in U.S. foreign policy—only a change in the personnel directing that policy. It is equally important that all American citizens know this, also.

Under Kissinger's directing we were headed for a New World Order; under Brzezinski's control we will be heading toward that same New World Order, but at a faster pace. And there should be no doubt in anyone's mind about the fact that the same old Rockefeller Cabal will continue to direct United States foreign policy, now with Zbigniew Brzezinski acting as visible agent of the invisible power.

This does not mean that Brzezinski will immediately replace Kissinger as Secretary of State. There are a number of liberals and one-worlders being considered for this post by Carter. Cyrus Vance, George Ball, Paul Warnke, Richard Gardner, any one of these could be chosen by the President-elect. But whoever has the title and the office, it will be "Zbig" who will direct all U.S. foreign policy. It should be remembered that Henry Kissinger was foreign policy Czar under Nixon for almost four years before he received the title of Secretary of State. As National Policy Adviser to Carter, Brzezinski will control all foreign affairs, regardless of who may hold the cabinet post.

Leslie H. Gelb in The New York Times Magazine for May 23, 1976 described Zbigniew Brzezinski in these words:

"A 48-year-old Polish immigrant, blond hair tightly combed to form a V in front, he is quick, brilliant, and articulate. He also comes closest to the Kissinger mode of seeking power. Kissinger made his contacts early with the Rockefeller Brothers Fund. Brzezinski systematically broadened his network a few years ago by starting up the Trilateral Commission, an organization dedicated to fostering closer relations among Western Europe, Japan, and North America. Henry had Nelson Rockefeller for a patron.

Zbig has David Rockefeller through David's presidency of the Commission. Together, Zbig and David selected people from the core of the Community (Gelb's pseudonym for the Ruling Elite—Ed.) to be on the Commission. Jimmy Carter, then simply ex-governor of Georgia, with some far-out ideas of winning his party's nomination for President, was one of the outsiders chosen."

Mr. Gelb goes on to state that Brzezinski "was the first guy in the Community to pay attention to Carter, to take him seriously. He spent time with Carter, talked to him, sent him books and articles, educated him."

Brzezinski's "education" is toward what he calls, not simply a new world order, but an "emerging technetronic-age ideal of rational humanism on a global scale."

As he defines this Marxist utopia which he has evolved in his mind and attempted to explain in books, monographs, articles in Foreign Affairs and Trilateral Commission Reports—and which he has sold to David Rockefeller and taught to Jimmy Carter—he bases his emerging world community on the idea that the world is entering a "fourth and culminating stage" of history.

Confused? So were we. But Henry Paolucci, a professor of government and politics at St. John's University in New York, made Zbig's "rational humanism" a little more understandable in an article which appeared in National Review, October 1, 1976. Paolucci wrote:

"According to his (Brzezinski's) avowedly Marxist-humanist-technetronic philosophy of history... the Western peoples, since their identifiable beginnings in the feudal era, have advanced through three great stages and are now entering a fourth and culminating stage.

"The first was that of religion, linking a heavenly 'universalism provided by the acceptance of the idea that man's destiny is essentially in God's hands' with a terrestrial 'narrowness derived from massive ignorance, illiteracy, and a vision confined to the immediate environment.' The second stage was that of nationalism, which, within clearly defined territorial limits, matched Christian equality before God with national equality before the law, and thus 'marked another giant step in the progressive redefinition of man's nature and place in our world.' In the wake of Western nationalism has come Marxism, which, says Brzezinski, 'represents a further vital and creative stage in the maturing of man's universal vision.' But progress by no means stops there. Beyond religion, nationalism, and Marxism, we now have, he tells us, his emerging technetronic age of ideal rational humanism on a global scale.

"Rational humanism, as Brzezinski represents it is to be the result of evolutionary transformations in the U.S. and the USSR. America, he explains, has already passed through two revolutions and is in the midst of a third—suspended, as the title of his book expresses it, Between Two Ages. The first revolution (1776-1789) brought national independence; the second, harder to date, transformed an 'essentially rural, partially aristocratic, and even slave-owning society into an urban-industrial nation...whose public ethos is dominated largely by widespread acceptance of social welfare, effected through governmental intervention.' And the current, third revolution? According to Brzezinski it will link our treasured ideal of personal liberty with equality on a global scale." (unquote).

So here we might conclude that Zbigniew Brzezinski is but the twentieth century's Karl Marx. Marx took Hegel's theory of historical dialectics and developed from it the theory of dialectical materialism, which is the philosophy undergirding Communism. Brzezinski, in turn, has taken the Marxian theory of dialectical materialism and developed a philosophy of dialectical idealism—which he calls rational humanism, and which philosophy is to undergird the New World Order that Brzezinski is completing on behalf of the members of the Trilateral Commission, the Council on Foreign Relations, and similar Elitist organizations.

Note the Hegelian progression:

Hegel taught that in history an established culture (thesis) would be challenged by an opposing culture (antithesis), then the two would interact to create a new culture (synthesis). This synthesis would then become an established thesis, to be challenged by an emerging antithesis—and the progression would continue ad infinitum until the perfect absolute (utopia, or heaven on earth) had been attained.

Marx took Hegel's historical dialectic and projected the idea that the interaction (or revolution) of labor against industrialism would produce the Dictatorship of the Proletariat, which would evolve into Socialism, which in turn would evolve into its highest form: Communism, or the Perfect Absolute.

Marx's dialectic was materialistic. But Zbig Brzezinski's dialectic is idealistic. He projects the theory that Christianity was an elemental, almost primitive culture; that it was superseded by Nationalism. So, if we read Brzezinski rightly, we now are faced with this Hegelian supposition:

Thesis: Western Nationalism.

Antithesis: Communist Internationalism.

Synthesis: Rational Humanism on a global scale.

In his book Between Two Ages, Brzezinski transfers this from the ideological to the political and economical arenas in these words (p. 274):

"Tension is unavoidable as man strives to assimilate the new into the framework of the old.... Today, the old framework of international politics—with their spheres of influence, military alliances between nation-states, the fiction of sovereignty, doctrinal conflicts arising from nineteenth century crises—is clearly no longer compatible with reality."

Furthermore: "Some states possess overwhelming power.... others are overshadowed by multi-million-dollar corporations, major banks and financial interests, transnational organizations of religious or ideological character, and the emerging international institutions." Consequently:

"A new pattern of international politics is emerging. The world is ceasing to be an arena in which relatively self-sustained, 'sovereign,' and homogeneous nations interact, collaborate, clash or make war. Transnational ties are gaining in importance, while the claims of nationalism, though still intense, are nevertheless becoming diluted. This change, naturally, has gone furthest in the most advanced countries, but no country is now immune to it. The consequence is a new era — an era of the global political process (which is but a pseudonym for world government—Ed.)"

Professor Paolucci writes that Brzezinski prefers "an end-run around national sovereignty, eroding it piece by piece, to the old frontal attacks," and that "a cumulative blurring of the distinctions between public and private institutions is, of course, the self-appointed task of the Rockefeller-Brzezinski Trilateral Commission. And it is not difficult to see what is to be expected of Jimmy Carter.... Brzezinski believes he knows how to handle men of that breed.

So, if we first stage Christians want to preserve our second stage Nationalism from the ravages of third stage Marxism and the synthesis of fourth stage Rational Humanism, on a global scale; this interregnum period is no time for sleeping!

THE REAL RULERS BEGIN TO SHOW THEIR STRENGTH

THE REAL CARTER EMERGING

As he smiled his way down the campaign trail, James Earl Carter was all things to all people, that he might gain the election. But, having won, and with less than two months remaining before he is inaugurated, the President-elect has begun to retract his promises, renounce his pledges, rescind his previously announced policies and do what the people who bought the office for him tell him to do. Examples:

Carter denounced the fiscal policies that had been pursued by Federal Reserve Chief Arthur Burns. He was going to change things and make it possible for an incoming President to name a new Fedhead. But, on his very first visit to Washington, he conferred with Burns, won the latter's approval of new fiscal policies that were totally different from those espoused by the campaigning Carter. Instead of criticizing Burns, he now seeks Burns' approval!

Carter the Campaigner was very outspoken concerning Kissinger, calling him the "lone ranger" and assuring all voters that he'd have nothing to do with Kissinger when he gained the Oval Office. Now, however, we are told by Sen. Ribicoff that Carter wants Kissinger to remain as U.S. Troubleshooter to the Middle East.

Campaigner Carter was going to wipe out unemployment and cut taxes. But, when he went to Washington and talked to Congressmen on Nov. 23, according to the Washington Post: "President-elect Jimmy Carter Tuesday outlined economic goals of a 6 per cent growth rate and a 1.5 per cent unemployment reduction in 1977 and said it was a mistake to assume that he had decided to seek a tax cut." Furthermore, the Candidate who was going to "get this country moving again" by getting Congress busy rubber-stamping his reorganization program: "...At a series of closed-door meetings on Capitol Hill the Georgian made a positive impression on leaders of both parties as he repeatedly pledged to consult with Congress on appointments and to cooperate on both foreign and domestic policy."

Perhaps the strongest indication of the fact that Jimmy Carter is "not really his own boss" came with the announcement first published by the Los Angeles Times, that: "Carter plans to appoint Thomas Bertram (Bert) Lance, 45, an Atlanta banker and fiscal conservative, to the cabinet-level post of director of the Office of Management and Budget....Lance, a longtime Carter friend and political ally, will play a key role in the new president's economic programs and his plans for government reorganization. He probably will also continue to serve as a political adviser to Carter. The appointment of Lance, whose record shows he believes strongly in a balanced budget and is wary of huge government spending programs, should be reassuring to the nation's business community."

Later, Carter's headquarters announced that Banker Lance might be named Secretary of the Treasury instead of director of OMB.

But, more significantly and still later, it was disclosed that the Carter Peanut Agribusiness owes Lance's bank an estimated four-and-a-half million dollars!

The significance: Millions of dollars are spent by candidates in order to win an election. Before the new Campaign Reform Act went into effect, we are told that two Lehman Brothers partners, Robert Altman and Peter J. Solomon, raised over a million dollars to help finance Carter's campaign. Others who helped in big financial ways included Lewis L. Gluckman, also of the Lehman Brothers International Banking House; John L. Loeb, Sr., of Loeb, Rhodes & Co.; John Bowles 4th of the CFR-connected firm of Kidder, Peabody & Co.; Armand Hammer of Occidental Oil and Soviet-related interests; the Bronfman family of Seagram Co., one of whom is currently involved in a very controversial kidnapping case; Cyrus Eaton, the pro-Soviet industrialist; Henry Luce III of Time, Inc.; R.J. Reynolds of Reynolds Metals; E.M. Estes of General Motors; John J. Riccardo of Chrysler Corp.; Max Palevsky of Xerox; and other bankers, industrialists, mediamen, etc. These all supplied the big money that helped elect Jimmy Carter.

Now, as one correspondent asked: "Who would be so foolish as to contribute even a

OVER 100 CONGRESSMEN FACE CHARGES

The National Justice Foundation of America, an organization which supports and defends the sovereignty of the United States and our form of government as a Constitutional Republic, announced this week its plans to continue with the "impeachment" of over 100 Congressmen who endorsed an internationalist political statement called "A Declaration of INTER-dependence."

According to John Rakus, Justice Attorney and President of the N.J.F., the endorsement of "INTER-dependence" by a Congressman is a violation of his oath of office. "We've studied this carefully and I've received a number of legal and constitutional opinions; they all point in the same direction...political impeachment, to remind all Congressmen that they owe allegiance to and loyalty to this country and not some foreign ideology or international organization.

The Declaration of INTERdependence is a political statement that mocks our own Declaration of Independence; it was sponsored by the World Affairs Council and was drafted by Henry Commager, a notorious leftist educator. The statement suggests that we should subjugate the national sovereignty of the United States and create a "new world order" under the United Nations apparatus. We will then be expected to surrender and re-distribute our American resources and energy to foreign nations and third world governments. The statement says in part "...to establish a new world order...it is essential that mankind free itself from narrow notions of national prejudice...(meaning our constitutionally created republic).

This re-surfacing trend in internationalist ideology is not exactly new in America because for undetermined reasons the last three presidents of the United States (Johnson-Nixon-Ford) all delivered "State of the World" addresses to the Congress instead of the constitutionally required "State of the Union" message.

Also, Senator Mike Gravel (D-Alaska) has recently endorsed and proposed a "world income tax" (including Americans) the revenue of which would be distributed to an international lending agency (World Bank), an international granting organization (United Nations) and developing countries of the "third world."

Rakus agreed that the N.J.F. impeachment proceedings were breaking new ground into yet untested areas of constitutional law. For although our Constitution expressly provides for impeachment of executive and judicial officials, it generally leaves disciplinary action against individual Congressmen to Congress.

"Here," states Rakus, "we make it abundantly clear, Congressmen and politicians can and do get out of line and do engage in Ultra-Constitutional activities...we intend to call them to task for it." To impeach means "...to accuse, to charge a public official with a crime or malfeasance in office." It is a proceeding brought thousand dollars to a presidential candidate unless he hoped to realize some return from that expenditure?

Remembering all these things, it seems significant that a banker—one to whom Carter is deeply indebted—would be the first appointee's name to be smuggled out to the press.

In this same connection a recent column by Nicholas von Hoffman is quite revealing. Von Hoffman is a columnist and a CBS radio Spectrum-speaker who specializes in sensationalism and sarcasm. A maverick liberal, he may slant his opinions and interpretations of the news without mercy, but is extremely careful to present the facts against officials in government and conducted before a "quasi-political" court. Such proceedings are initiated by a written accusation called "Articles of Impeachment." We are in the process of drafting a Bill of Particulars on this matter right now."

The primary accusation which the N.J.F. is bringing against the errant Congressmen is that they are violating their Constitutional oath of office. "Obviously," said Rakus, "when one-world politicians endorse a statement that reads in part '...narrow notions of national sovereignty must not be permitted to curtail the obligation of (inter-dependence),' they are breaking their oath of loyalty to this country which compels them to 'support and defend the Constitution of the United States'."

The N.J.F. stresses that our basic Constitutional freedom and national sovereignty are not only being betrayed but that such a betrayal is tantamount to treasonous conduct. The supplanting of our Constitutional freedoms and due process of law with a "world court" under the United Nations, would nullify American citizens' rights and open the door to control by internationalist dictators and despots.

"Some Congressmen may be under the 'impression' that they possess plenary authority to bind us to internationalism, but such power was never delegated to them by the Constitution and any attempt to officiously assume such authority is Ultra Vires and beyond the scope of their office. For this reason we are taking action now before it becomes too late. We have plenty of scandals concerning the personal conduct of Washington Congressmen lately, but we will not tolerate any modern Benedict Arnolds joining the parade," said Rakus.

The National Justice Foundation of America came into being because it has become necessary to put a limit on the power which the federal government has over the lives of the American citizens. And in a free society, the citizens of a state have a moral duty to insist that government abide by the will of the people; for government is the servant and not the master of its people.

honestly before beginning any distortion or opinion molding. Following are excerpts from Nicholas von Hoffman's column which was published in the Chicago Tribune of Nov. 13, 1976:

MANIPULATORS OF DEMOCRACY

by Nicholas von Hoffman

For those who can't be satisfied with the thought that Jimmy Carter is the accidental product of his own ambition, there is the idea held by the smallest minority that he was taken up, polished, and pushed by the bipartisan ruling elite who feared that Ford was made of such poor quality putty he'd crumble in their hands.

Carter and Walter Mondale are both members of the Trilateral Commission, an unofficial body composed of the rich and the powerful from Japan, Western Europe, and the United States. A glance at a list of some of the people in the American delegation suggests that, no matter how divided our society may or may not be at the bottom, it's united at the top. From the world of business there are men like David Rockefeller; Hedley Donovan, editor-in-chief of Time Inc.; I.W. Abel of the United Steelworkers; J. Paul Austin of Coca-Cola. In addition to the board chairmen of such corporations as Exxon and Sears, there are the representatives of your big clout Washington law combines like Wilmer, Cutler and Pickering.

Last year the Trilateral Commission put out a publication entitled "The Crisis of Democracy: Report on the Governability of Democracies..." (New York University Press). One of the chapters in the book was written by Harvard professor Samuel P. Huntington. Carter seems to have paid close attention to the writing of Huntington, who says things like: "...candidates have to campaign primarily as individuals and sell themselves to the voters in terms of their own personality and talent, rather than joining with other candidates of their party in a collaborative partisan effort.... The 'outsider' in politics or the candidate who could make himself or herself appear to be an outsider had the inside road to political office."

A person hobnobbing with the members of this group isn't a lonely, unconnected agriculturalist from a small town in Georgia.

The Huntington essay is as good a description as you'll get of how the ruling circles view the way the country is run: "To the extent that the United States was governed by anyone during the decades after World War II, it was governed by the President acting with the support and cooperation of key individuals and groups in the Executive Office, the federal bureaucracy, Congress and the more important businesses, banks, law firms, foundations and media which constituted the private establishments."

But, according to Huntington, the last years have seen the workings of this power club disrupted by what he calls the "democratic distemper." He means that there is too much democracy, that it engenders too much pressure for too many things the power clubs can't provide, and the result is an eating away of social discipline, respect for authority and the willingness and obedience to sacrifice, which this kind of political outlook considers necessary. Thus Huntington writes: "Al Smith once remarked that 'the only cure for the evils of democracy is more democracy.' Our analysis suggests that applying that cure in the present time could well be adding fuel to the flames."

Not the Russians, not the New Lefties, nor the John Birch Society but the entire population itself is the most serious threat to governing the country in the eyes of the upper echelon people whom Huntington does not speak for but whose thinking he represents in greater or lesser degree.... Huntington recommends policies calculated to encourage apathy and nonparticipation....

As for Carter and Mondale, there was never any reason to think they do not share this general view of the corporate state nor any hope they will change their minds. Whether they were picked by the Trilateral Commission or not, they are bounded by the furthest vision of the commission's membership.

(end of excerpts from column

That "furthest vision of the commission's membership" to which Carter and Mondale are bound, is expanded in later reports from the Trilateral Commission. A report titled The Problem of International Consultations gives some very broad hints as to what we may expect when Carter assumes command. This report states that "interdependence is challenged by nationalism." Also, "a state of world-government interdependence is to be brought about through a process of international consultation." The report attacks the U.S. Constitution and the U.S. Congress as being "obstacles to be overcome." The report speaks of "the problems imposed by this unique constitutional system," which are a hindrance to the creation of the New World Order. It seems that "the domestic decision-making process can be an obstacle to effective (international) consultation, and "America's constitutional system is a case in point, particularly the independent power of Congress, whose members tend to approach issues from predominantly national points of view." (unquote).

This report also reveals that David Rockefeller has set up a Trilateral Political Committee from a select group within the Trilateral Commission in order to make vital domestic and international decisions for the United States and the other Nations within the Trilateral bloc. This ruling group would be roughly equivalent to the Soviet Politbureau!

Youth Action News (P.O.Box 312, Alexandria, VA 22313; an excellent source for information concerning the activities of the Rockefeller interests), mentions yet another Trilateral report titled The Reform of International Institutions. This report says, "the overriding goal is to make the world safe for interdependence," and this involves making the world safe for multinational enterprises. The report says it is good and proper for the management of multinationals to "represent their own corporate interests rather than the interests of their home countries."

This is the shape of the New World Order according to the Trilateral Commission: Control Governments, then merge them to make the world safe for interdependence. Carter and Mondale are products of this Trilateral Commission, Need more be said?

LEST WE FORGET, This is what United States citizens once believed and what the Declaration of Independence, the United States Constitution and its Bill of Rights affirm, supposed laws and regulations to the contrary notwithstanding:

Every person has the right to defend—even by force—his person, his liberty and his property. Furthermore, a group of people has a right to organize and support a common force to protect life, liberty and property. This common force is called Government.

This force called Government has but one legitimate function: the protection of life, liberty and property. For people to be free, Government can only protect, not provide.

Our Constitution, stripped of its limiting and contradicting amendments, and its alleged "implied powers," is a remarkable contract which provides a workable system for protecting group and individual rights without excessive interference in essential individual freedom.

The Constitution affirms that it gets its authority from "We the People," and that we delegate that authority to elected representatives and other officers who are bound by the Constitution and who must take an oath to uphold and defend it.

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people," and "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution...are reserved...to the people." It should, therefore, be clear that no majority, no Congress, no appointed official can lawfully deprive any law-abiding person of life, property, freedom of speech, freedom of responsible dissent, religious freedom, etc.

Also, no majority, no Congress, no appointed official may lawfully force an individual to pay taxes for foreign aid, urban renewal, subsidized rents, social security, guaranteed annual wage, government charity (welfare), government (public) schools, or any other social action program financed by taxation.

In other words, Americans once believed that: When not in conflict with the Constitution, a citizen's unalienable right to life, liberty and property takes precedence over Acts of Congress, Presidential Orders, Supreme Court decisions, and Bureaucratic rules and regulations. Our founding fathers must have hoped and prayed that this would still be true, and that we would see to it that this truth be honored, and enforced.

THE CONCOCTED CRISIS OVER AN AMERICAN CANAL

COMMUNIST CONQUEST OF CONTINENTS

Just before the recent Presidential election campaign began, there was a great hullabaloo concerning the urgent need for a new treaty that would cede sovereign rights over the Panama Canal to the Communist-dominated government of General Omar Torrijos. Then suddenly, as the election campaign got under way, the issue was tabled. Neither Ford nor Carter wanted to talk about it. But when pressed by newsmen, Carter did say that he would never give up "complete" or "practical" U.S. control of the canal. At the same time, however, his foreign policy advisers were saying privately that Carter's position was "more flexible" than his rhetoric suggested.

Why did such a hot issue suddenly cool off and begin to receive the silent treatment? The answer to that question lies more with Castro and Brezhnev than with Carter and Ford. For, it was Castro of Cuba who told Torrijos of Panama to "cool it" and make no demands on the United States regarding the "liberation" of the Canal Zone until after the U.S. election was over. This order was given Torrijos on January 10, 1976, at a lavish reception given the Panamanian dictator by the Cuban dictator in Havana. At that time the plot concocted by the Politbureau was revealed to Torrijos:

The "liberation" of two continents was involved. African "liberation" had to be completed (Angola, Rhodesia, Southwest Africa, and finally the Republic of South Africa). And, concurrently, the "liberation" of the continent of South America was involved; the "liberation" of Central America and the Caribbean being the first step in this latter conquest.

According to Replica, an anti-communist magazine published in Guadalajara, Mexico, Torrijos was informed by Castro that the taking over of the Panama Canal and the U.S. Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay, were but a part of the overall plan for the subjugation of Middle America. This included Mexico, the Bahamas, Guyana, Trinidad, Tobago, and all the other newly created Mini-States, as well as Puerto Rico, and all other islands and territories still claimed by the United States, the Netherlands, United Kingdom, and France.

There was still much work to be done in Mexico and Jamaica before any real crisis should be precipitated in Panama, was the word given by Castro to Torrijos. And if the American people became too much disturbed about the Panama Canal they might also become alarmed about the much bigger plan, might inject that concern into the coming presidential election, and make the execution of the Master Plan much more difficult. Therefore, the Panama Canal crisis must be delayed until after the election.

The planned crisis has exploded in Mexico, with outgoing President Echeverria's land revolt in full swing, and the twice-devalued peso causing economic chaos. The crisis is about to come to a head in Jamaica.

And now is the time to resurrect the fight for control of the Panama Canal by a Communist dictator.

The signal was given from Geneva, where the 13th Socialist International was in session, being chaired by Willy Brandt of West Germany, and with Israeli Premier Yitzhak Rabin doing most of the talking. According to a Nov. 29th UPI dispatch from Geneva: "World socialist leaders Sunday urged President-elect Jimmy Carter to review U.S. policies in Latin America and recognize Panama's claims to the Canal Zone."...

Since the National Democratic Party platform is totally socialistic, and since all of candidate Carter's campaign promises were concerned with socializing the United States there is little reason to hope that his policy toward Latin America and the Panama Canal will be any different. Therefore, it seems high time that the people of the United States were told the truth about the Panama Canal.

A real authority on this subject ought to be a person familiar with naval and maritime history, not a court historian working out of Harvard or Columbia University, on a government subsidy or foundation grant. Such a person is Vice Admiral Albert E. Jarrell, USN (Ret.) In addition to a distinguished war record, Admiral Jarrell has served in nine countries, including Panama, as Naval Commander or Attache, was Naval Adviser to the late President Syngman Rhee of South Korea. He first visited Panama in 1922, two years after the formal opening of the canal, and, says the Admiral, "My wife and I have resided in Panama as well as the Canal Zone. During a stretch of about 20 years, I had the opportunity to spend some time in Panama every year or two. I have only pleasant memories of those times."

Last October 22, Admiral Jarrell delivered an address before the 22nd Annual Meeting of the Pacific Coast Council on Latin American Affairs, held at Arizona State University. In that address, Admiral Jarrell gave the history of the Panama Canal, "past, present, and future." We have a copy of that important address and, with the Admiral's permission, the remainder of this Report is composed of excerpts from that speech, with occasional slight alterations in the text to conserve space but not to "edit" content :

THE PANAMA CANAL - PAST PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A Senate resolution in 1835, followed by a House resolution in 1839, urged the President to negotiate with other nations for the construction of an isthmian canal. In 1846 the United States concluded a treaty with New Granada (Colombia) which guaranteed the United States "the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any mode of communications that now exist or that may hereafter be constructed." The discovery of gold in California (1848), western migration, and the country's growing economy gave impetus to the idea of a canal....

Private American interests in 1850 began the construction of a trans-isthmian railroad, which was completed in 1855 (and) ... U.S. interest in a canal subsided....

In 1878 a French company headed by Ferdinand de Lessups, builder of the Suez Canal, procured from Colombia a concession to build an isthmian canal.... In 1887, at the peak of French operations, an American private group began a rival project in Nicaragua. That enterprise was incorporated by Congress in 1889 as The Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. That same year the French company failed, after losing 20,000 workers to tropical diseases in a labor force that averaged only 10,000 per year. The major cause of failure, however, was graft: of $260 million spent, only $40 million was spent for work on the canal. In 1892 the American company in Nicaragua went broke.

The U.S.S. Oregon's 90-day race from the Pacific to the Atlantic, around Cape Horn, during the Spanish-American War, together with the annexation of Spain's former Pacific possessions, convinced President McKinley that the construction of a canal was indispensable.... The Spooner Act was passed

June 2, 1902; It authorized the President to acquire the assets of the New Panama Canal Company (it had been organized to sell the assets of the defunct French company) for $40 million, and also to acquire from Colombia a strip of land at least six miles wide, and any additional territory and rights which he considered necessary for construction of the canal.

A treaty was drafted with Colombia (the Hay-Herran Treaty) but it was never ratified by the Colombian Congress. Meanwhile the country was beset by civil war. Prominent Panamanians plotted a course of action in case the treaty should be rejected.... When Panamanians declared their independence on Nov. 3, 1903, the railroad was closed to the movement of Colombian troops, and U.S. naval forces were present to prevent more Colombian troops from landing. The only casualty of the coup was a Chinese onlooker. The United States recognized the Republic of Panama on November 6. A treaty was signed in Washington on November 18, 1903 by Secretary Hay for the United States and Philippe Bunau-Varilla for Panama. The new treaty increased the width of the strip to ten miles. The most significant change was made, however, in Article III, which reads as follows:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which such lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority."

Article III is the subject of most of the controversy today. Many who favor a new treaty argue that the phrase "if it were the sovereign" indicates that the United States was not granted sovereignty; that if sovereignty were intended, it would have been clearly spelled out. The phrase certainly could have been more specific. However, the phrase "to the entire exclusion of the exercise of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority," is explicit. It leaves no doubt that Panama did, indeed, relinquish its sovereignty; and if not to the United States, then to whom? This is a point that proponents of a new treaty do not discuss.

The canal was opened to navigation in August 1914. A slide in October of that year, however, delayed the formal opening to regular traffic to July 1920. Total cost was $366,650,000. The original purchase price of the Canal Zone was $10 million in gold. In addition, in accordance with Article VI of the treaty, the United States purchased all of the privately owned land within the Zone from the individual owners. Bunau-Varilla persuaded Secretary Hay to include in the treaty an agreement for the United States to pay an annuity of $250,000 in gold. This payment has no relationship to U.S. sovereignty. The Panama Railroad had formerly made this annual franchise payment to Columbia. The United States assumed the annuity, payable to Panama starting nine years after the signing of the treaty, when it was estimated that the canal would be completed and the United States would commence operating both the canal and the railroad. The annuity was increased to $430,000 in 1936 to compensate for President Franklin D. Roosevelt's devaluation of the gold dollar. In a new treaty in 1939 the gold obligation was eliminated. In 1955 the annuity again was increased, to $1,930,000; this increase of $1.5 million was not made an obligation of the Panama Canal Company, but is paid out of the State Department's appropriation.

A study by a U.S. House of Representatives Committee estimates that income generated by the canal amounts to about one-sixth of Panama's national income, the principal item being wages paid to Panamanians employed in the Canal Zone but who live in Panama. Income from tourists transiting the canal also is an important factor in Panama's economy. This income is greatest, of course, when amicable relations exist, and decreases when unfriendly demonstrations are made....

With the rise of International Communism since World War II, and especially since the seizure of power in Cuba by Fidel Castro in January 1959, our relations with Panama have taken a bad turn....

When it appeared that our State Department was about to accede to a request that the Panamanian flag be flown in the Canal Zone a House Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs requested that the Secretary of State delay his decision until a study could be made. After eight meetings the Subcommittee prepared a resolution which stated that "any variation in the traditional interpretation of the treaties of 1903, 1936, and 1955, with special reference to matters concerning territorial sovereignty, shall be made only pursuant to treaty." On February 2, 1960 the House supported the resolution by a vote of 381 to 12. Nevertheless, that same year President Eisenhower ordered the Governor of the Canal Zone to fly the Panamanian flag. Later, President Kennedy in conversations with Panama's President Roberto Chiari, made the assertion three times that the United States did not claim sovereignty over the Canal Zone. He then authorized the Panamanian flag to be flown at several additional sites. After Kennedy's assassination, Castro-inspired students led a mob into the Canal Zone in January 1964 and hoisted their flag as a symbol of Panamanian sovereignty. President Johnson denounced this act and stated, "The United States cannot allow the security of the Panama Canal to be threatened."

Johnson later reversed his position and committed himself to the discredited idea of a sea-level canal. In a joint statement with President Marco Robles he announced that the United States would support a new treaty which would "effectively recognize Panama's sovereignty." Johnson, by executive fiat, undertook to abdicate our treaties with Panama and Colombia, overrule the decision of the Supreme Court which had affirmed United States sovereignty in the Canal Zone, and disregard the authority of Congress. Johnson then initiated negotiations with Panama which would give the United States the authority to construct a sea-level canal through Panama outside the Zone and, upon its completion, surrender the present canal to Panama.

Johnson's scheme to dispose of territory purchased by the United States without regard to constitutional limitations, despite Congressional warnings, contrary to Supreme Court rulings, and without taking the subject to the people, probably was the most brazen abuse of presidential authority in our country's history. Nevertheless, Johnson's successors, and the State Department, have persisted in following Johnson's ideas concerning abandonment of United States sovereignty....

The executive branch of our government has supplied Panama with the only negotiating position that could be conceived. Executive denial of United States sovereignty, with assertion of Panamanian sovereignty follows the pattern of defeatism that developed soon after the end of World War II. This suicidal policy has been given support by a large segment of our news media.

No chief executive has made a clear statement to the American people concerning the planned giveaway of the Canal Zone. Why did Eisenhower let Christian Herter persuade him to permit Panamanians to raise their flag in our territory, thus casting doubt on our sovereignty? Why did Lyndon Johnson submit to Ellsworth Bunker's advice and promise Panama a new treaty? Why did Nixon unnecessarily invite Panama to resume treaty negotiations in 1969, when negotiations had been dead for nearly three years? Why do our presidents ignore the feelings of our veterans' organizations and the American people?...

The Pentagon has been effectively barred from expressing its point of view. When Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger expressed his doubts about a give-up of the Canal Zone, he was fired. President Ford sent General George Brown, Chairman of the joint Chiefs of Staff, and General William Clements to Panama to put the Pentagon stamp of approval on the surrender of the Canal. They spent one day in Panama, and returned to the United States with a statement that the armed forces no longer saw any danger in negotiating the proposed treaty. Clements, a protege of Kissinger, was rewarded by appointment to Ellsworth Bunker's negotiating team (and Brown was reappointed to his post despite his remarks—and retractions—regarding Zionist control of Congress, Big Banking, and the news media—Ed.)

If Panama had a record of stable government Americans might show a little more sympathy toward a revised treaty. In its 73-year history, Panama has had 59 chiefs of state. The current head, Brigadier General Omar Torrijos Herrera, illegally seized power from the duly elected president in 1968. He promoted himself to his present rank. Torrijos has made it his policy to be a thorn in our side.

In January 1976 Torrijos, with a retinue of 200 Panamanians, made a public showing of his unity with Fidel Castro by a state visit to Havana. Senator Jacob Javits coached Torrijos before his departure. On his return to Panama outrages against Americans occurred. Also, Torrijos deported ten prominent Panamanian businessmen when they openly assailed his economic policies. There is still much opposition, however, in spite of the strongman tactics.

Torrijos obviously went to Havana to make sure of Castro's backing. He got even more than he expected. About 3,000 Cuban troops and agents were sent to Panama (possibly to see to it that Torrijos followed orders and kept cool until the word was given for the creation of a real crisis regarding the Canal Zone. The Panama Canal is but part of the overall plan—Ed.)

Castro always has exported Communism, as best he could, to Latin-America. Let us assume that Torrijos gets the Canal Zone. Of course he then would be obligated to support Castro's plans for taking over our naval base on Guatanamo Bay. And what about Puerto Rico? We know that Russia, through Castro, is supporting Puerto Rican independence, although more than 80% of the Puerto Ricans don't want it.

Russia, Castro, and Torrijos have visions of turning the Caribbean Sea into a Red Lake!

Our defeatist policy has been generally supported by the liberal news media...as an example, in the Wall Street Journal for April 29, 1976 is an article by Robert Keatley.... He wrote that "only about 16% of U.S. import and export tonnage goes through the canal." This statement is misleading. The Congressional Record for March 4, 1975, where Keatley probably got his figures, reads: "Only 16.8% of U.S. trade goes through the Canal. But a different picture emerges when statistics reveal that a constant average, down through the years, of about 70% of all cargo through the Canal is bound either from or to a U.S. port." Keatley also wrote: "The canal is declining in importance because many new commercial and military ships can't fit through its locks, and because trade patterns are changing." There is no reason to assume that the Canal will not be improved, to suit future needs. Studies have been made to enlarge the present Canal; to construct a new series of locks, alongside the present ones; and to build a new canal. The advent of the super-tanker resulted from blockage of the Suez Canal, and the cost of traveling the added distance was compensated partly by hauling tremendous loads. But most commercial ships can transit the Canal. And to the United States the importance of the Canal is indeed great, with 70% of all its cargo either originating in or terminating in a U.S. port. About 97% of the U.S. Navy's ships can transit the Canal; the large carriers cannot. The Navy plans to build only two new carriers by fiscal 1981. Russia has the largest submarine force in history;... All of our anti-submarine forces, and all of our submarines can transit the Canal. So can all of our amphibious forces, including the U.S.S. Tarawa, our newest and largest amphibious ship, which can deploy and land a fully equipped Marine assault force, by helicopter or landing craft.

The future of the Panama Canal depends upon the course of action to be taken by the executive branch of our government.... There is enough opposition to Torrijos, by Panamanians, to suggest that his Marxist dictatorship may be in danger. However, even if he were overthrown and a pro-American took over, the administration in Washington probably would not change its giveaway policy. The problem was created by Washington and Washington has kept it alive. The most vexing problem that faces the American people is their own government.

AS OPINION MOLDERS RECAST THE CARTER IMAGE

DOING THE CARTER TURNAROUND

"Carter the president-elect is seeking to be a good deal more cautious—and perhaps a good deal more conservative—than Carter the outspoken candidate." This is the new image that is being projected by the communications media. The old image seemed to be creating a crisis sooner than planned. Wall Street was jittery. Big Steel raised its prices at a bad time because it feared price controls come January 20th. Unemployment got worse; so did inflation. Production continued to lag, prices for consumer goods kept going up.

To complicate matters, the monetary world was wobbling. Australia devalued its currency, New Zealand promptly followed suit. Mexico's double-dose devaluation of the peso was creating shock waves in this hemisphere and there was talk of a possible devaluation of the Canadian dollar. Meanwhile Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer Denis Healey was begging the International Monetary Fund for a $4 billion loan to save the British pound. At last report the IMF was demanding that the British Government cut up to $3.2 billion in public spending if it hoped to qualify for such a loan. However bad the economic and monetary crises in the United Kingdom may be, when an international agency starts dictating policy to an industrial nation—and gets away with it—then things are even worse than they appear on the surface. Complicating the prospects of a brighter tomorrow is the fear of a big jump in the price of crude oil in the near future.

As some anonymous pundit remarked some centuries ago, there are fundamentally three kinds of people in the world: those who make things happen, those who watch things happen, and those who say, "What happened?" It seems that those who watch things happen are beginning to doubt that Jimmy Carter the candidate is a man who can make good things happen as quickly and as painlessly as he promised. So, the powers behind the presidency decided that a new image of their leader was needed to keep the masses content.

Here is the way one mediaman handled the image-changing. James McCartney of the Knight-Ridder chain's Washington bureau wrote from Plains, Georgia:

"Reporters here have begun to talk about developing a new dance step called the 'Jimmy Carter turnaround.' It would be designed to recognize the fact that president-elect Carter has turned around or otherwise changed his position on several significant issues in the five weeks since the election.

"In recent days Carter made a 180-degree turn on the question of whether he would ask Congress for standby authority to impose wage and price controls. That switch however, is just one of several. Carter also has:

- * Changed his attitude toward the proposed $23 billion B1 bomber program.
- * Notably modified his campaign promises for a dramatic attack on unemployment.
- * Changed his position on Yugoslavia.

"These changes clearly suggest that Carter the president-elect is seeking to be a good deal more cautious—and perhaps a good deal more conservative—than Carter the outspoken candidate." (unquote).

This "turnaround" began to become visible to the public when Carter went to the Eastern Establishment's stable of standbys, to select Cyrus Vance as his Secretary of State. The media seemed so anxious to let readers know that this was a "surrender" to the Invisible Government, that mention was made of his directorships in the Rockefeller and Carnegie Foundations. Then, much was made of the December 1st visit to Plains of 16 "economic advisers" who were mostly members of the Council on Foreign Relations or the Trilateral Commission, or both. Also prominently featured was the story that Carter, on his December 9th trip to Washington, would confer with "military leaders, budget experts and businessmen before returning to Georgia." And once again, those conferees could be identified as members of the CFR, the Trilateral Commission, the Business Round Table, and similar Elitist clubs and lodges.

U.S. News & World Report, in covering the Dec. 1st meeting, wrote: "The team, other than (OMB Director-designate Bert) Lance, that will help Carter to cope with economic problems is expected to include some of these experts who attended the meeting in Plains: Charles L. Schultz, budget chief under Lyndon Johnson and now a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution; Robert V. Roosa, a former Under Secretary of State for monetary affairs and a partner in the investment banking firm of Brown Brothers Harriman & Company; W. Michael Blumenthal, Chairman of the Bendix Corporation; and Irving S. Shapiro, chairman of Du Pont."

So, in the general public's eye, the peanut farmer who was going to have nothing to do with the Washington Crowd or the Eastern Establishment, has certainly done a turn-around. The new image justifies his membership on the American section of the Trilateral Commission, and qualifies him for entry into that most exclusive club known by its initials as the CFR.

However, regardless of what the media may say or suggest: Zbigniew Brzezinski will remain as Carter's chief foreign policy adviser, and Lawrence R. Klein will remain as his principal economic adviser, although he probably will stay in the background and he may not receive an appointment worthy of his importance to Carter and the Clique. Associated Press released a short report on Klein, which was published on October 19, 1976.

"Jimmy Carter's chief economic adviser, Dr. Lawrence Klein," said the dispatch, "gets by with an average five hours of sleep a night, takes noon meals on the run and operates like a dynamo. The 56-year-old Klein—recognized as one of the world's leading economists and a pioneer in the use of computers to study the economy, is almost impossible to reach at his office in the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School.... When asked to join the Carter camp... the decision to head the Democratic candidate's team of economic advisers came after Klein met with Carter last November in New York.

"It was recently disclosed that Klein had a past association with the American Communist party.... Carter has since reaffirmed his support of Klein.... His (Klein's) economic philosophy stresses stimulation of the economy through increased government spending. He would have the government spend an additional $15 billion a year to spur growth but also feels the same objective could be met by lowering taxes."

A better picture of Klein's "philosophy" is provided by Gary North, author of An Introduction to Christian Economics, None Dare Call it Witchcraft and other books, and publisher of Remnant Review, a newsletter whose perspective is that of the free market and orthodox Christianity. Published on the first and third Wednesdays of each month, $50 per year. P.O. Box 1580, Springfield, VA 22151. As an introduction to his letter of Dec. 1, 1976, North wrote that Klein is one of Carter's prime architects of domestic economic policy, and:

"The fact that Klein is also an ex-Communist also is a bit disturbing. Not that ex-Communists are all bad. National Review's pages are filled with essays by ex-Communists. But Klein's case is somewhat different. He joined in the mid-1940's, and he left about two years later, in the summer of 1947. When asked by the House Committee on Un-American Activities about his reasons for leaving, he responded: 'Well, at the time I found the meetings thoroughly uninteresting and dull; it was a waste of time; they did nothing. I was interested in socialism, and I thought the Communist Party was a vehicle towards socialism and decided that it really wasn't. I decided that they didn't deal honestly and fairly with me, and I didn't like them. I decided that the Communist Party of the United States was made up of very mediocre people, and I didn't particularly want to associate with them.' Not only was Klein a snob, but he was a socialist snob. He then explained: '...I decided that even though socialism was a desirable goal, there are other goals in life, and it wasn't worthwhile to pay the high price of having bloodshed and violence.' So he took his marbles and went home—to develop macroeconomics and econometrics, the chief theoretical tools used by good, peaceful socialist planners. And now he is close to the seat of Federal power. (His testimony appears in the Investigation of Communist Activities in the State of Michigan, Part I (Detroit—Education), hearings held on April 30, 1954, p. 5000.)"

LANCE AT THE READY

With the advice and consent of the Eastern Establishment, the hand-picked and well-programmed peanut planter from Plains has Brzezinski to handle foreign affairs with Vance as the "front," has Klein to mastermind domestic economic policy with some as yet unnamed CFR-based economist to serve as sinecure. But Bert Lance, the Senate consenting, will personally manage the fourth branch of the Federal Government—the Executive Bureaucracy.

Most of the publicity concerning Bert Vance is built around the fact that he is a very successful banker, having started at the age of 20 as a teller and today—25 years later at the age of 45—he heads the National Bank of Georgia with 27 branches and deposits of some $315 million. His bank has about $4.7 million in loans outstanding to the Carter peanut operation in Plains. When he ran unsuccessfully for Governor of Georgia in 1974, he listed net assets of himself and his wife at $3.1 million. Quite a successful "country banker," as he likes to be

But Lance is not going to Washington as a money manager; his primary job will be to manage the bureaucratic departments and agencies of the Federal Government. It just happens that the only way a government agency can be controlled effectively is to be able to control the amount of money that agency receives. He who controls the purse strings, governs the agency. And Lance, as Director of the Office of Management and Budget, will be the Big Boss of the Bureaucrats.

But more importantly, he'll be the Dictator holding absolute control over the entire Regional Governance System which was installed by President Nixon. When the Nation was divided into ten Federal Regions and the Bureau of the Budget was revamped and become the Office of Management and Budget, it was planned that the Director of OMB should be Dictator over the ten Regional Councils. But the man selected for the job—Roy Ash, formerly of Litton Industries—was about to become involved in a conflict-of-interest squabble. Litton was defaulting on some important shipbuilding contracts with the U.S. Navy and Ash was involved. So he never became the Regional Governance Dictator he was planned to be. Before the plans were carried out, Ash resigned. And by that time it seemed expedient to reduce the power of OMB and create a Domestic Council which would manage Regional Governance at the Washington level.

Now, however, Washington Whispers that the Domestic Council is to be liquidated by Carter, and that the job of running the ten Federal Regions will be handed back to the Office of Management and Budget, whose Director will be Bert Lance.

Note that Lance will supervise the spending of all federal agencies; and, according to U.S. News & World Report: "Another Lance project: reorganizing the federal bureaucracy to make it more efficient, a goal ranking high on Carter's list of priorities."

It is through this reorganization of agencies and expansion of the authority of the ten Regional Councils, that this Nation could become a Dictatorship!

Zeroing in on just one phase of this danger, the possible creation of a Police State via LEAA, let us explore:

Anne Garni, a very active and dedicated patriot residing in Santa Cruz, California, spoke at a public hearing on December 1, 1976, when the activities of LEAA were being discussed. She condensed so much vital information in so few words, that we are taking the liberty to publish her speech:

A few years ago I heard a very respected speaker make the statement that it would be impossible to impose a dictatorship in this country because of the separation and the balance of powers, both horizontally and vertically. He asked: "Can you imagine what effect President Nixon would have by announcing to the American people that he has declared himself a dictator?"

I was more than just a little surprised to hear the speaker make that statement even though I had heard the same thought expressed many times in the words: "It can't happen here." But that's what they said in Germany, too, before Hitler came to power. Let's compare the steps that were taken in Germany to some of the actions that have taken place in our own country.

The German people were living in fear for themselves and their country. The temper of the time was expressed in such typical statements as the following: "The streets of our country are in turmoil. The Universities are filled with students rebelling and rioting. Communists are seeking to destroy our country. Russia is threatening us with her might. And the Republic is in danger. Yes, danger from within and danger from without. We need law and order! Without law and order our nation cannot survive."

And the solution? On March 24, 1933 a law was passed in Germany which allowed the government to deviate from the Constitution, and gave authority to the Chancellor to pass laws by publishing them in the official gazette. The Office of the President was later combined with the Office of the Chancellor, consolidating absolute power in the Head of State, and — Adolph Hitler became the Dictator of Germany.

Let's take a look at some of the highlights that have occurred in America that have consolidated and centralized the power that was once dispersed among the people:

In 1913, during the term of President Woodrow Wilson, a central bank was established through the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, giving a few men the power to regulate our economy and to create inflations and depressions at will. In the same year, the individual income tax was passed, which allowed the appointed Internal Revenue agents direct access to the private papers and the wallets of the American people. And at the same time, the Rockefeller and Carnegie tax-exempt foundations were created so that the fortunes of these wealthy families would not be affected by the tax. The third significant change made in 1913 was the passage of the Seventeenth Amendment, which weakened the power of the individual States by creating, in fact, a second House of Representatives to replace State Legislative Representation.

Let's move on now to President Franklin D. Roosevelt's reign, during which time the Reorganization Act of 1939 was passed, establishing a large number of federal agencies under the control of the Executive Branch of the Federal Government. An effort was made at the time to abolish the States and to replace them with nine Federal Regions to be administered by the Executive Branch, but too many barriers existed at that time to carry off such a scheme.

But now we move on to 1969 and to the Presidency of Richard Nixon, who did, in fact, divide out country into ten Federal Regions. Reorganization Plan I and II of 1970 were passed by Executive Order 11541, and in 1972, by Executive Order 11647, President Nixon appointed ten Federal Regional Councils, each of which included representatives from various Federal grant-making agencies, including the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration.

Let's zero in on the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA), which was established by the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968. LEAA is under the authority of the Attorney General....

LEAA is obviously not what it says it is: a crime control agency. LEAA was established for one purpose, and that was to implement a Federal Criminal Justice System that will tie together under an appointed administrator, every branch of the criminal justice system, including law enforcement, the courts, the prosecution and corrections. This means that all of the elected officials, including the sheriff, will no longer represent the voters, but will be responsible for carrying out the dictates of the LEAA Administrator.

LEAA is financing programs to standardize the training of all police, whether they be in the military, the intelligence field or the civilian law enforcement offices of the cities, counties and states. The purpose of standardizing police training is to control law enforcement under the Federal LEAA Administrator.

The ultimate dictatorship is direct control of the human mind, and LEAA has been financing programs dealing with behavior modification.

The LEAA's National Criminal Justice Reference Service funds the United Nations Clearinghouse which has arranged exchange agreements with the Institute of Criminology of the U.S.S.R. and with the French Ministry of Justice. Negotiations are being conducted with INTERPOL, the Social Science Division of UNESCO and the Legal Affairs Division of the Council of Europe, and offers to collaborate have come from Costa Rica, Brazil and Japan.

The financed activities of the LEAA are leading us into a national and international police state. As long as our country continues to receive funds from LEAA, we will only hasten the day when we will be totally enslaved. If there is any doubt about what LEAA has in store for us, the LEAA Administrator, Richard Velde, spelled it out very clearly when he spoke before those attending the International Symposium on Criminal Justice Information and Statistics Systems:

"We know that there will be a national system which links all sizable law enforcement, court, and corrections agencies. We know that the system will not stop at national borders. In this day of rapid communications, a truly international system is essential. We know that within regional systems every police officer will have to be accessible at all times. Every court and corrections official will have to be able to come on line as well."

Let's get back to strengthening local government and keeping our control over our police through the election process, and through local financing. The Supreme Court ruled in 1942 that, "It is hardly lack of due process for the Government to regulate that which it subsidizes."

Remember that every dictator in history bribed his slaves with their own money.

Let's break away from LEAA.

A speaker at a convention in Miami Beach on Dec. 7, is quoted as saying that this country is going socialist, and Jimmy Carter sees himself as a modern Moses leading us into the Promised Land. We might add that if we refuse to be led, then the powers behind Jimmy intend to drive us into this promised land called Corporate Socialism. That if what LEAA and the entire concept of Regional Governance is all about.

We who contend for a return to national sanity must know that the Sword of the Spirit is the mightiest weapon ever given man. However, "They which are the children of the flesh are not the children of God." And only the children of God can wield this Weapon.

THE CRISIS OF SOCIALISM – A LESSON UNLEARNED

THE MORE THINGS CHANGE, THE MORE THINGS REMAIN THE SAME

The New York Times gave the event front page coverage: "The British Government today (Dec. 15) announced a new series of belt-tightening and money-making measures to try to rehabilitate its economy. The moves were in part directed by the International Monetary Fund, from which Britain has applied for a $3.9-billion loan, the maximum amount the country is allowed."

In addition to the IMF loan, both the United States and West Germany granted short-term credits to the British Government. But the pound continued to drop and inflation continued to increase.

The main difference between the present state of the British economy and that of the United States is the difference in time. The British Government began to practice the Fabian economic policies espoused by Lord Maynard Keynes shortly after World War I, and also began to convert the British Empire into a Welfare State. Our government, on the other hand, didn't start using fiat money to buy the country out of a depression and spend it into prosperity until the Reign of Roosevelt, which began in 1933. At that time, the 48 United States began to become One Welfare State, following the lead of the United Kingdom and the countries of Western Europe.

So, all things being equal (and equality is the slogan of the era), what is happening now to Great Britain will be happening to the United States in just a few short years—perhaps during the Carter Administration.

And here is another difference: Today, when a socialist government goes broke, it can appeal to the United States for help. Russia has been getting help from us for the past forty-odd years. So have almost all of the rest of the Nations of the world. But, when the real crisis comes to be realized and experienced by the people of the United States what Nation or international organization will there be to help the United States regain its economic feet? Where could the United States turn for help?

And there is this fact of national life: Once a country has launched itself into a sea of deficit financing and has become a Welfare State there is no turning back short of acting on the formula laid down in our Declaration of independence: "...institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Complicating the present situation is the undoubted fact that the great majority of the citizens of these United States have begun to lose confidence in their own federal government and, to a lesser extent, in their State and local governments. Whether people be conservative or liberal, law-abiding or outlaw, self-supporting or a welfare case, Christian or atheist, they have begun to doubt the integrity and the honesty of their own governments, or at least of the people who are identified with their governments.

Those persons who fear to leave their homes at night lest they be mugged, raped or murdered, have obviously lost confidence in the ability of government to protect them. And the muggers, rapists and murderers have just as obviously lost the fear of being caught and appropriately punished for their crimes. Parents who see their children graduated from high school and yet unable to read or write properly, and who fear that their own children may have become dope addicts or their daughters made pregnant because of conditions and associations at a public school; these parents certainly must have lost confidence in the ability of Government to provide a decent education for their children.

We could go on and on, citing reasons for the wholesale loss of confidence—or fear—of government, and so can you, the reader. But let's note some recent, specific cases:

There's the swine flu fiasco. On the rather slim pretext for such massive and expensive procedure. The President of the United States was persuaded that all of the people of the United States should be inoculated with an improperly tested vaccine for a disease of doubtful severity and even doubtful existence. The venture was so hazardous that insurance companies refused to have any part of the program. So the United States Congress ignored the warning of qualified experts and voted on behalf of the people of the United States to use their money to finance the program, and insure it as well. The rest of the story is history: Sudden deaths stopped or slowed down the program for a while. Then assurances that it was safe, and necessary, got the wholesale inoculations going again. An estimated 15 million people—out of an expected 200 million people—had been “shot” when suddenly the government’s crusade was stopped by government order because it was discovered that some of the people who took the shots are being struck down with some rare form of paralysis called the Guillaume-Barre disease. No doubt, many of those 15 million human guinea pigs who succumbed to the propaganda drive and received shots, will be wondering what they’ll call the strange and unusual reaction that may come upon them at some future date.

And if there is anything that could shake a person’s confidence in the ability of the government to cope, it is this continuing drama of the murderer who has been able to cause both State and Federal Judicial systems to vacillate and declare an on-again, off-again, sentence of death by firing squad, while the murderer plays at thwarting them all by taking overdoses of sleeping pills that get to him, no one seems to know how. A killer named Gary Gilmore has made governments look silly and made law-abiding citizens wonder if justice has departed from the land.

And then there is the case of a convicted revolutionary named Patricia Hearst. She is supposed to be in prison serving a sentence and awaiting trial on yet another charge. Instead, she is living at home and, while appealing one case and awaiting trial on another count, she is permitted to tell her story on Walter Cronkite’s prime time nationwide CBS news program. No wonder people distrust American justice and say there is one set of laws for the rich, another for the poor.

Then, there are the scandals that have shaken the peoples’ confidence in their Representatives. And, something that must cause the gulliberals to wonder about their allegedly born-again leader, is the fact that the man they voted for is not the man that is going to occupy the White House. An entirely different Jimmy Carter is emerging. Let us take, as an example, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill.

After Jimmy Carter’s nomination but before his election, Dean Clarence Manion said in one of his Manion Forum Footnotes:

“Humphrey-Hawkins is the so-called full employment bill which in one form or another has been running back and forth between the House and Senate for the past two years. It has the enthusiastic backing of George Meany and his big labor lobby and the endorsement of both Carter and Mondale.

“Humphrey-Hawkins is running under an assumed name. The full employment that it talks about calls for a full-time, government-created job for everybody at the prevailing wage to be paid by the taxpayers. The resulting mammoth Humphrey-Hawkins bureaucracy will eclipse anything heretofore created in Washington....”

Columnist Tom Braden linked the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill with similar efforts at creating full employment back in the Roosevelt New Deal days. He wrote:

“Pardon me, while I muse a little further on that campaign of 1932 in which Franklin D. Roosevelt promised ‘a program of public works to provide employment for all surplus labor at all times.’ I went to the record books the other day, to find out whether Roosevelt had fulfilled that promise....

“Roosevelt did not do away with unemployment. In 1933 when he took over the White House about 25 per cent of Americans were unemployed. Six years later, there was still 15 per cent unemployed, and in 1941, on the eve of World War II, there were still 10 per cent unemployed. In fact, Roosevelt didn’t get the unemployment rate down to below 5 per cent until 1942, when the only public works program was the defeat of Germany and Japan.

“What interests me about all this is that the Roosevelt myth has such a strong hold on our people. We still talk about curing unemployment through vast programs of public works, and we still talk about the ‘right’ to a job—just as though Roosevelt had not tried and been only partially successful.

“For example, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill is now a part of the Democratic program. It would, if passed, enact the ‘right’ to a job into law. And nearly all politicians play up to the myth. The ‘right’ to a job is a must line in many a candidate’s stump speech. In fact, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill never did pass the Congress, principally because Charles Schultze, who was once Lyndon Johnson’s budget officer and is now at the Brookings Institute, delivered a devastating critique of the plan, which convinced many Democrats that it was safer to talk about full employment than to try to enact it into law. Schultze’s testimony was devastating in part because he is a Democrat and has fought long and hard for policies which will bring unemployment down. But almost unanimously, economists agree with him that full employment can’t be reached without bringing about the kind of inflation which could wipe out everybody’s savings and possibly create its own depression....

“And the Roosevelt myth—the notion that once upon a time a president came along who put everybody to work—is a nice myth suitable for arousing pride and political combativeness. But it's simply not true."

Jimmy Carter has also shown that his promise of full employment is a myth suitable for campaign rhetoric, "safer to talk about ... than to try to enact it into legislation."

And here's an illustration of the reason why people are losing confidence in government and wondering which Carter to believe:

1. Carter is pledged to the enactment of the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill.
2. Charles Schultze is one of the strongest and loudest opponents of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill.
3. Jimmy Carter named Charles Schultze to head the Council of Economic Advisers.

It seems that we can paraphrase an old proverb: "Inconsistency, thy name is Jimmy Carter." Or, looking behind the scenes, we might say simply that Carter is not his own man, that what Carter says will have little to do with what Carter does—the people who pull the strings and program the mouthpiece will direct both words and action.

Example of how Carter can be used: He said he'd install a national (socialized) health care program. That made all the liberals happy and they voted for him. But now he says that for economic and fiscal reasons the national health care program must be delayed. That is supposed to calm down the conservatives and put them off guard. Meanwhile, through the Regional Governance System, national health service is coming in through the back door. The Silver Hill Foundation of New Canaan, Connecticut operates a non-profit psychiatric treatment and rehabilitation center whose medical director, R.L. Stubblefield, is an appointed official of the "Region I Committee for the establishment of a Health Systems Agency." We quote from the foundation's newsletter of November, 1976:

"Public Law 93-641, the Health Services Planning Act, one of the most significant health care legislative acts in recent years, is beginning to move from its legal structure (law, regulations, guidelines), into the implementation stage. This law, which focuses on community-based planning... along with cost control mechanisms, professional standards review (PSRO) and manpower allocations... are the fundamental components of a national health service... these laws are intended to shape and regulate the health care industry, as one of the public utilities, such as electric power, telephone, etc.... Silver Hill will be shaped and influenced by the regional, state and national planning efforts. However... it is mandatory that those involved in the administration of health care institutions also participate in the organization and the operation of the emerging management structure." (Italics added).

Under Public Law 93-641, such Regional Health System Agencies are created, are funded with tax money. They approve hospital rates, rules on creation of new hospitals, decide what equipment a hospital can buy, control doctors through PSRO, and have the power of the federal government behind them. It's Corporate Socialism via Regionalism.

THE "NEW SOLIDARITY" AND THE U.S. LABOR PARTY

"Divide and conquer" long has been one of the chief injunctions of leaders of revolutionary movements. Christians are warned of this: In John I we are told that we should try the spirits whether they are of God; in I Peter we read that the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour; and in his second epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul adds that Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light, and his ministers also are transformed into ministers of righteousness.

If we apply these spiritual warnings to the mundane spheres of politics and economics, we are reminded that there are a number of books, the works of men, which lay down rules whereby a man, or a group of men, may gain mastery over the whole world. In all of these writings there is the statement that absolute control over all forms of communication must be attained; that control of the opposition is essential; that antagonistic leaders must be controlled, as well as those leaders who favor them. Both friend and foe must be "controlled," as Machiavelli and others of similar ilk have indicated. Thus, by controlling all leaders and all communications media, divisions can be caused and conflicts created within the ranks of the opposition; in this way, victory is made easier for the forces of evil and tyranny.

We mention these things because, during the past few weeks we have been asked for information concerning the National Caucus of Labor Committees, the U.S. Labor Party, a newspaper called New Solidarity, and a leader called Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr.

LaRouche came into some national prominence during the recent presidential election when, as the candidate for the U.S. Labor Party, he sued and won half an hour of prime time from NBC on the eve of the presidential election. It takes big money, and considerable influence to make such a coup at such a time. And, as the Revelator would say, people wondered...

Also, for some time now, the U.S. Labor Party has been publishing a newspaper, issued twice a week and about to become a daily, according to publisher LaRouche. This, too, takes much money, especially so since the issues we have seen carry no commercial advertising, and the eight-page, full newspaper size publication sells for only 25¢ a copy, is well printed on good quality newsprint, and is loaded with pictures and illustrations.

New Solidarity's editorial policy is solidly anti-Carter, anti-Kissinger, anti-Brzezinski, anti-Rockefeller, anti-Rothschild, anti-U.S. Communist Party, and anti almost everything that any so-called rightwing extremist would be against. But — and here's the rub:

While New Solidarity speaks out in no uncertain terms against American Communists and the U.S. Communist Party (calling it fascist), the paper is openly pro-Soviet! It claims that the United States is the war monger, that the U.S.S.R. is trying to bring about world peace and is being thwarted by the United States. In fact, when LaRouche spoke on NBC on election eve, he stated flatly that if Jimmy Carter were elected, the United States and Soviet Russia would be engaged in a full scale nuclear war against each other within six months! His newspaper echoed this line.

During October, 1976 New Solidarity ran a series of fairly accurate articles exposing the part played by the Rothschilds in the American Civil War and in the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln. However, the full-page article of October 29 ended with this rather cryptic statement:

"Lincoln's political failure, ultimately, was to cling onto the well-worn political ideal of 'unity,' even though he never had a unified party or unified nation. Denying reality on this crucial question allowed feudal-mercantilist policies of the Rothschilds to survive side by side with real capitalist development. Although the victory of the capitalist revolution had been secured, the monetarist parasite was never destroyed."

Permit us to interpret. New Solidarity says Lincoln failed politically because, instead of adopting the revolutionists' program of "divide and conquer," he kept pleading for "unity." His ideal was to preserve the Union, when he should have been seeking to destroy the South and penalize Southerners. Instead, he forgave, and sought for unity between North and South. For this, as well as for his resistance to "monetarist parasitism," he was assassinated and those who took control of the federal government did punish the South, as Lincoln had refused to do. Furthermore, the victory of the North was really a victory for capitalism, only this and nothing more. In fact, it wasn't a total victory because Rothschild's feudal-mercantilism was allowed to continue alongside the West's capitalism.

So reckons the maverick Marxist LaRouche. In one paragraph he manages to denigrate

Lincoln, condemn both capitalism and Rothschild's monetarism, and thus tacitly praise the "unity of socialism" as allegedly practiced by the rulers of the Soviet Union.

Lyndon LaRouche, in addition to heading the U.S. Labor Party, and publishing New Solidarity, also is leader of the National Caucus of Labor Committees (NCLC). This is one of the organizations that emerged from the disintegration of Students for a Democratic Society. The U.S. Labor Party is, in turn, a political front established by the NCLC.

The NCLC is international in scope. In addition to the United States, it has established labor parties in Canada, Mexico, West Germany, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark, and Italy. While none of these parties are large in terms of membership, NCLC is obviously well financed. And there's the real mystery: where does such an organization that is clearly created to "divide and help conquer" the world for socialism obtain so much money? There is an intramural feud between the Rothschild and the Rockefeller interests, and there has been the suggestion that this is a front financed by the Rothschilds to hurt the Rockefellers. There also is the intimation that NCLC is a Rockefeller satellite intended to "control the opposition" to the New World Order plan, and to make people think more kindly of Soviet Russia, since the ultimate plan is to "unite" the United States, the Soviet Union and the Peoples Republic of China with Western Europe and Japan.

The U.S. Communist Party, which claims to be an enemy of NCLC, says that the NCLC is financed by the CIA. Take your choice; we do not know who finances NCLC and propagandist Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr. We hope to find out, and we'll relay the information if we do. But this we can say without equivocation: Facts can be twisted and used for nefarious purposes, and LaRouche is a master at this evil art.

In conclusion: New Solidarity is but one of many new efforts to "divide and conquer," or to achieve its corollary, "confuse and conquer." Now, perhaps as never before in this century, real discernment is required to separate the Truth from the seeming truth. To assist our readers in this is our constant aim.

THE TRIPLE THREAT TO AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

CORPORATE SOCIALISM AT HOME AND INTERDEPENDENCE ABROAD

As the United States of America enter their third century of existence as sovereign and independent Republics, their citizens face threats from three federal power bases: the administrative, the judicial, and the legislative departments of the central government. The administrative threat was described by Gen. Pedro del Valle recently, in his Alert No. 140, from which we quote:

"Jimmy Carter is the creation of his political maker, David Rockefeller's Trilateral Commission. On 8 May 1976 the Washington Post reported that Carter was personally recruited into the Trilateral Commission by the organization's founder, David Rockefeller, in 1973.

"A new official Trilateral Commission report entitled 'The Problem of International Consultations'...provides absolute proof of the Carter-Rockefeller-Trilateral plot to smash the independent authority of the U.S. Congress and aid in the destruction of U.S. sovereignty. In its introduction this report states that Trilateral World Government's 'interdependence is challenged by nationalism.' It also reveals that a state of world government interdependence is to be brought about through a process of international consultation.

"This report specifies that it is the Trilateral Commission's intention to institute a policy of international consultation over all U.S. domestic legislation. The will of the U.S. Congress and the American people is to be overridden by the new Trilateral Commission's Political Committee, which will have the veto power over all U.S. legislation! This international committee will have the power to raise U.S. taxes! This power, under the Constitution, is given solely to the U.S. Congress. The report directly attacks the U.S. Constitution and the U.S. Congress as being 'obstacles to be overcome.' The report makes it clear that David Rockefeller and his C.F.R. members of the Trilateral Commission plan an extensive campaign of corruption and subversion to take control of the U.S. Congress. Already a number of disloyal 'one-world' congressmen have been recruited into the membership of the Trilateral Commission." (unquote) judicial coercion, the unconstitutional activities of judges have become so blatant that the controlled press has found it expedient to comment on this situation now and then. Example: an article written by Philip Hager of The Los Angeles Times which was reprinted in a large number of other metropolitan newspapers. Among the latter was The Miami Herald, from which we quote:

"In Alabama, a federal judge orders the city of Mobile to abolish its 64-year-old commission form of government and replace it with one under which blacks are more likely to be elected to public office. In New Jersey, the state supreme court closes the state's 2,500 public schools until the legislature enacts a school finance system the court says will provide better education. And in Massachusetts, a Boston judge holds unconstitutional the state's law prohibiting the possession of cocaine—issuing a 23-page opinion citing 'the weight of scientific evidence' to declare the drug less harmful than tobacco or alcohol.

"Throughout the country, the phenomenon of 'judicial activism' continues to grow as judges, more and more, exercise the power traditionally reserved for legislatures, administrators, and the voters themselves. Judges are deciding whether teachers may paddle unruly students; how prisons and mental institutions will be run; when, if ever, states may regulate abortions, whether supersonic transports may land on U.S. soil.

"...This expansion of judicial power is resulting in new opposition from an increasingly wider array of critics—scholars, officials, attorneys, and plain citizens—who see the courts as overriding the democratic process. The resulting debate has crystallized in Mobile. In October, U.S. District Judge Virgil Pittman held unconstitutional the city's at-large system of electing its city commissioners. Pittman ordered a new system...to ensure better representation of blacks....

"The judge has disenfranchised me and every other voter in the city,' says Eugene F. McKenzie, a Mobile furniture store operator who is seeking Pittman's impeachment. 'This is a constitutional issue that affects every local government in the U.S. If any court can come in and dictate a new form of government, we're in trouble—all of us'."

The remainder of this article consists of the usual brainwash: if the lawmakers won't do anything about it, and if the law administrators won't take action, then "the courts cannot remain aloof when fundamental liberties are at stake."

It seems that judges, who are supposed to interpret the law, now have become social arbiters and "Big Daddies" to the whole of the human population.

However, despite administrative tyranny and judicial overlordship, it is legislative mismanagement and disloyalty to Constitution and constituency that presents the greatest danger to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Because, the Congress could prevent administrative and judicial encroachment if it were doing its own job properly. Instead, it is aiding and abetting totalitarian dictatorship and at the same time committing suicide.

The authors of the Constitution clearly intended that Congress should always be the dominant branch of government. They feared both executive and judicial tyranny. Therefore Congress was given special powers. Among these was the right to impeach and try executive and judicial officers of the federal government for "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."

But the Congress has permitted the growth of "Administrative Law" and the development of "Judicial Legislation," and has contributed toward its own destruction by delegating many of its Constitutionally mandated powers to the other two branches of government; especially to the Executive branch which has thereby created a fourth branch of government known as the Bureaucracy, and a new form of governance known as Regionalism.

This new "liberalist in history" 95th Congress has many irons in the fire, legislation that was defeated or delayed in the old 94th but which are likely to be passed by this new 95th Congress, and are sure to be approved and signed into law by the new 30th President of the United States.

There is, for example, the New World Order and the promotion of Interdependence. In 1976, 144 members of Congress signed the infamous "Declaration of Interdependence." Due to pressure, especially by the National Justice Foundation with its impeachment proceedings against the signers, some recanted and said they didn't know what they had done. However, these 144 really did know what they had done because they were the same who had backed the Federal Union plan for creating a Regional World Government composed of the members of the Atlantic Union, or NATO.

In this connection, it is important to know that Clarence Streit of Federal Union, Inc. has high hopes of using the 95th Congress to bring about the surrender of U.S. sovereignty to this Regional World Government. On Dec. 10, 1976, Streit sent a "Turn of the Year Report & Appeal" to all Federal Unionists and friends. He wrote, in part:

"Backers of Atlantic Union win all—yes, all—the top house posts in next Congress. FU Board Member Wright (TX)—a chief sponsor—is elected majority leader. Both new Speaker O'Neill (MA) and Democratic Caucus Chairman Adams (WA) are among its co-sponsors.

"Jim Wright has been not only on our Board since 1970, but a believer in Federal Union of the Free ever since he was 18 when, as a student, he read Union Now. So did Brock Adams.... when he entered Congress (1966) ... he learned of and began co-sponsoring the resolution for a convention to explore the federal way to unite Atlantica. Its chief sponsors: two more student converts, Paul Findley (R-IL) and Donald Fraser (D-MN). Much heartened by the news here reported, they plan to re-introduce it next month. It will then be referred to the International Relations Committee whose new chairman-to-be is Rep. Zablocki (D-WI), an emeritus FU Board Member." (italics added).

In its literature, FU likes to quote Nelson Rockefeller, who said: "Our generation is called on for a pioneering act of political creativity and economic construction, on an intercontinental scale. The practical first step would be to form a federal political structure for the North Atlantic area."

Another FU favorite is Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, who helped arrange the sell-out and defeat in Southeast Asia, and who is at this writing in Panama arranging for step-by-step giveaway of the Panama Canal. (President-elect Carter is quoted in Time, January 3, 1977, as saying: "The Panama Canal treaty ought to be resolved quite rapidly. That's almost uniquely our responsibility.") Bunker's statement regarding Regional World Government via Federal Union:

"There is a new reality in international relations. It is interdependence. We must find the balance: between our enduring sense of nationhood and international cooperation. It seems to me that the Atlantic Convention Resolution is a sound and well-thought-out first step toward seizing this opportunity."

So much for foreign relations. Now, let's consider some domestic dangers:—

nia (who was re-elected) sponsored House Resolution 28, calling for a Constitutional Convention to adopt a new Constitution that would create The New States of America. This was backed by such notables as Nelson Rockefeller and Secretary of Commerce Elliot Richardson, and the entire liberal wing of the National Democratic Party. The same group of internationalists also had a new Constitution of the World they wanted ratified as soon as possible. Its preamble:

"The people of EARTH, having agreed: that man's spiritual excellence and physical welfare is the common goal of mankind and—that universal peace is the pre-requisite of that goal; and that peace and justice stand together; and, knowing that war and iniquity spring from the competitive anarchy of nation states, it is agreed—that the age of nations must come to an end, and the 'era of humanity' must begin.

TIONS have decided: to order their separate sovereignties into a one world government—of justice—to which they surrender their arms, and establish this constitution as the fundamental law and covenant of the Federal Republic of the World. The founding convention of the World Government shall be called to order by the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York City."

As for this Constitution of the World, it takes all of the nations to approve it and put it into operation; and contrary to the preachments of our own national leaders, most of the other world leaders are extremely nationalistic in their outlook, and such a world government as envisioned in this new world constitution would have to be brought about by conquest rather than consent. But as for that new Constitution for the New States of America, Rep. Pettis is ready to re-introduce his House Resolution calling for a Constitutional Convention—and this is a real and present danger!

THE INITIATIVE COMMITTEE FOR NATIONAL ECONOMIC PLANNING, INC

This first bimonthly newsletter will attempt to bring Initiative Committee members and friends up to date on past and present activities. Future newsletters will keep you informed about the current debate on national planning and Committee programs on behalf of planning.

GOAL: The purpose of The Initiative Committee is to promote the establishment of national economic and social planning through public education, research and analysis of legislative proposals.

COMMITTEE MEMBERS — NATIONAL DEBATE BEGUN

The initial drive for supporters began just a year ago. In a very short time, the Committee contributed to the launching of a national debate. Committee members issued a statement of principles, The Case for Planning, which was sent to 20,000 political leaders and elected officials throughout the country; in February 1975 they held a press conference at which they announced their position on planning; they assisted in drafting the Balanced Growth and Economic Planning Bill, S-1795, introduced by Senators Humphrey and Javits. May 21, 1975, spoke at hearings in Washington, D.C. held by the Joint Economic Committee, June 10, 11; and gained the support of over 500 leading citizens from 48 states.

The Committee began with a steering committee of 12 members chaired by Professor Wassily Leontief, New York University, Nobel Laureate, and Leonard Woodcock, President of the UAW. The Committee reorganized in August and now has a 28-member Board of Directors and an Advisory Council of 69 members. The first Board of Directors' meeting was held September 8, 1975, and was attended by the members of the Founding Committee. The Board decided to support legislative efforts for planning but not to endorse the specific language of any given bill. The present officers and members of the Board of Directors are:

Wassily Leontief, President, Co-chairman
Leonard Woodcock, Co-chairman
Robert V. Roosa, Vice President
Myron E. Sharpe, Coordinator, Secretary
Robert Lekachman, Treasurer

L. Sherman Adams
W. Michael Blumenthal
John R. Bunting
Anne P. Carter
Sol C. Chaikin
Abram Chayes
Tony T. Dechant
John Kenneth Galbraith

Robert L. Heilbroner
Vernon E. Jordan, Jr.
Coretta Scott King
Stanley Marcus
Arnold Miller
Robert R. Nathan
Esther Peterson
Gerard Piel

Stanley Ruttenberg
Stephen I. Schlossberg
John William Ward
Glenn E. Watts

Then there is the full employment ploy. Carter is already renegeing on most of his campaign promises. His populist campaign rhetoric against the "political and economic elite" has been replaced by a program dictated by that same "elite." This is so true that Sen. McGovern says no real changes are to be expected and that most of Carter's designated Cabinet members are people that might have been chosen by Nixon or Ford. However, at least one plank of the platform on which Carter was elected remains: full employment is the first priority, and that means the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Bill is still a "must." Also, Carter's appointment of German refugee Mike Blumenthal for Secretary of the Treasury indicates that the Humphrey-Javits "Balanced Growth and Economic Planning Act" also holds top priority. This is the bill that would create a new super-government agency, the Economic Planning Board, which would come up with a set of Soviet-style economic plans, and a "consistent set of economic techniques" to force everyone to comply. In short, this bill would bring about automatic de facto Corporate Socialism.

When Humphrey and Javits first introduced their Balanced Growth and Economic Planning Act of 1975, its principal sponsor was The Initiative Committee for National Economic Planning. At that time this Committee was a sort of three-man proposition: Wassily Leontief of Harvard, Leonard Woodcock of United Auto Workers Union and the Council on Foreign Relations, and Robert Roosa of the CFR, and one of Jimmy Carter's economic advisers.

Now, however, this Initiative Committee for National Economic Planning, Inc., has become a powerful lobbying group, and it intends to push its program for corporate Socialism through this 95th Congress, with the fullest assurance that, if passed, it will be signed into law.

There is double assurance of this since the Secretary of the Treasury-designate, W. Michael Blumenthal, is a member of this Initiative Committee for National Economic Planning. Proof of this is contained in the first newsletter issued by this group, the first page of which is reproduced on the preceding page of this Report.

This Initiative Committee is headed by an immigrant from Soviet Russia. Wassily Leontief said, according to Human Events of January 1, 1977: "Many emigres of my generation left Russia very bitter. I was not bitter. I did not come out bitter. In fact, I have gone back several times to advise them on their economy."

And now he is advising us on our economy, through this Initiative Committee of which our future Secretary of the Treasury is a member! Says the Committee: "The means of influencing economic decisions are already familiar to us. Some, such as tax incentives and disincentives, and traditional monetary and fiscal policies, influence individual actions indirectly. Others, such as selective credit controls, guidance of basic capital flows, limits to the use of air, water and land, and mandatory resource allocations, affect individual actions directly."

The Blumenthal group notes that all of the measures listed above have been employed in times of war, particularly World War II. But they have been used only in "a haphazard fashion, with no view to their overall effect." However, when the Humphrey-Javits bill is passed by Congress and signed by Carter, then these controls will be imposed on a permanent basis. These include control of money, credit, natural resources, food, water, land, air, etc.!

This should explain why Carter is backtracking on his campaign pledges regarding a tax cut, reductions in defense spending, welfare reform, national health insurance, and other social reforms. He is waiting for his economic advisers to outline the various five-year and twenty-five year plans that are to be mandated. And one of his chief monetary and economic advisers will be, of course, W. Michael Blumenthal of Bendix Corp., the Council on Foreign Relations and the Initiative Committee for National Economic Planning.

As we enter into a New Year, let us resolve that we have a moral obligation to insist that our government representatives abide by the terms and limitations of the Constitution of the United States, and that we must assert the moral imperative that government is the servant, not the master, of the people.

A few weeks ago a subscriber wrote: 'Dear Mr. Bell, the concluding remark in your Dec. 3, 1976 Report was: 'The most vexing problem that faces the American people is their own government.' I will add that: 'The real enemy of the people of the United States is the Federal Government of the United States!'"

How true that will be on January 20, 1977.

Don Bell Reports

Year Twenty-Three Number Fifty-Two December 24, 1976

THE THREE LIVES OF DON BELL

EXPLANATION

As a reporter we have always believed that the answer to the question "What is Truth?" is vastly more important than "Who is Don Bell?" Consequently, in our reporting, commenting and analyzing we have always tried to avoid using anything more personal than the editorial "we."

However, there are those new and prospective subscribers who almost inevitably ask the question "Who is Don Bell?" There are also many who, showing our letters to someone else, or quoting from them, are asked the same question. If they are unable to answer factually, credibility is questioned and facts are discounted. Too, there is the elemental fact that subscribers have a right to know something of the qualifications and the professional background of anyone they are supporting and trusting in any patriotic work of the nature of "Don Bell Reports."

Therefore, due to numerous and continuing requests, and to the insistence of the one who is "bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" and who answers all of our personal mail, this autobiographical sketch of Don Bell is presented in lieu of a regular weekly "Don Bell Reports."

In many instances we have had to rely on memory, records having been lost when the Japanese fire-bombed our former home in Manila. Later, upon leaving Japan to cover the Bikini atom bomb tests, all possessions were lost in transit. This, then, is the story of a journalist, not a life history, as we remember it.

FIRST: THE PREPARATION

As a very young man with a very large aim in life, we decided that the quickest way to become a foreign correspondent was to get into a foreign country and start corresponding; with the right people, of course. Furthermore, the easiest way for a penniless youth to get into a foreign country in the winter of 1926 was to join the U.S. Marines, requesting overseas duty. This latter seemed easy because there was trouble in both Nicaragua and China, and Marines were sure to be sent to both places. Fresh out of boot camp, we were one of the large force sent to China under General Smedley Butler, "to protect the interests of Standard Oil and Texaco," as the General said a few years later. The situation was critical for a while because Chiang Kai-shek had kicked the Communists (Russians, Americans, and Chinese) off his staff and his nationalist forces were battling to unite all the provinces into one great republic. Our job was to prevent that battling from seeping into the international settlements of Shanghai and Tientsin. In this we were fairly successful, and after things had settled down and the occupation had become routine, the Chaplain wanted someone to publish a magazine. So Walla Walla (meaning much talk) came into being as the official organ of the Fourth United States Marine Expeditionary Force, headquartered in Shanghai, China. We were selected as its editor, and our journalistic career began where it had left off in high school. (Oh, yes, we had also decided in the winter of 1926 that on-the-spot self-education was better for a budding foreign correspondent than an on-the-campus college education. Hence the Marine correspondence school instead of a University).

Having served our country for six years, we were discharged in Shanghai to become an executive with the Shanghai Evening Post & Mercury, American-owned, English-language daily which was later "liberated" by the invading Japanese. Our "executive" duties consisted of managing the printing plant, acting as features editor, writing a daily column, doing string reporting for the United Press, other chores that gave us a well-rounded education in fourth estate affairs, and later when the company acquired a radio station, we became its news editor and commentator.

This all ended in 1937 when Japan invaded China, driving Chiang Kai-shek's government back to Chungking, and forcing us to flee China and accept a post with an American-owned, NBC-affiliated radio station. There we became a full-fledged foreign correspondent with NBC, and also became a prisoner-of-war when the Japanese occupied Manila in January, 1942.

Shortly after our broadcast of the "Little Pearl Harbor" bombing of Nichols Field, we were commandeered by the Philippine Government and by General MacArthur's headquarters to help maintain morale by continuing to broadcast hourly until the radio transmitters were destroyed to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. When our radio voice was thereby silenced, Col. Hap Harries of G2 (intelligence) would drive in, pick us up, take us to Corregidor, where we would join General MacArthur's staff. But Hap Harries never made it. A bomb got him before he got to me, according to his widow, Mary Harries, who wrote the Saturday Evening Post War Anecdote which is reproduced from the original and which appears on the opposite page.

As for us, a Filipino friend slipped into the prison camp to tell us about the beautiful memorial broadcast he had heard over KGEI, a short-wave radio station broadcasting from San Francisco. It seems that Don Bell was captured, tortured because he wouldn't give information to the enemy, paraded through the streets and then executed; the first war correspondent to die in World War II.

SECOND: THE OCCUPATION

But an error had been made. Someone else had been mistaken for Don Bell—we never learned who—and had died in our stead. The incident probably saved us, because the Kempei Tai (Japanese military police) quit looking for us, and we spent a miserable three years, one month and one day in Santo Tomas, Japanese Prisoner of War Camp Number One, Manila, the Philippines.

At Christmas, 1954, we published a letter which we titled "The Last Christmas." It dealt with the last Christmas spent at Santo Tomas. We reprint a part of that letter:

Colonel Hayashi knew it was to be our last Christmas. He had received precise and complete instructions regarding the time, place and method of our mass execution. He may have felt that since time was running out for us, he could be indulgent. He approved our plans and gave permission for a Christian observance of the birth of our Lord and Saviour....

We had an electric organ. We built a stage to accommodate an 80-voice chorus. A Spanish priest smuggled in enough instruments to outfit a 30-piece orchestra. All inmates contributed as they could....

We planned our program carefully: Previously we had discovered a splendid male quartet through talent searches to provide occasional entertainment which had made endurable the long evenings of prison boredom. We had almost lost the quartet to the torture chamber because of a previous performance that the Japanese called insulting to them (it was meant to be). And the first tenor died of starvation during final rehearsals for our Last Christmas on Earth. A quick shift in plans and the remaining three—a French Catholic, a Russian Orthodox, and a Baptist preacher—performed gloriously as the Three Kings of Orient. The voices were weak with the enduring pain of enduring hunger. But we had microphones. And their costumes were of sackcloth. But we still had imagination — —

The finale of the evening performance was an abbreviated version of Handel's Messiah, closing with the immortal Hallelujah Chorus.

Came time for the finale:

Some of our prisoner audience had benches or chairs; others sat on the ground. None had the strength to stand throughout the performance. I'm sure many in the audience had gone into that coma-like substitute for sleep which invests a body infested with the ravaging beri-beri, to numb the pain of the sting of death.

But — as the first glorious tones of that inspired chorus were heard, something began to happen. The people began rising. Four thousand prisoners of twelve nationalities and fourteen religions began to rise as one. They stood erect, looking straight ahead; not at the stage or the people on it, but beyond the stage. They were looking beyond the pain and suffering brought them by three years of prison life; seeing a vision of the life that should have been on the birthday of the King of Kings and Prince of Peace. We were of fourteen religions, yes. But the bias and the bigotry, dogma and diversion was gone. We were as one, unified in the only kind of one-world that a just God can ever condone or bless — one in spirit with our Father, observing with praise and thankfulness the birth of His Son — —

The miracle of the moments endured after the music had ended, finally to be punctured by the harsh-pitched screechings of the Japanese guards, ordering us back to the rooms of confinement.

That's when reality struck us: from heaven to hell in the time it takes to hear and comprehend one shrill voice of command. It had been a most wonderful experience — but for what purpose? We were being ordered back to the little wooden bunks, hungry, tired, without hope of an earthly tomorrow. (Looking back on years of remembering, it seems that was the worst night of all — —) Then, just before dawn the bombers came. We couldn't see them clearly in the first light-flakings of a tropical dawn, but we had learned to distinguish the big, beautiful, silvered B-17s by their sound. And we wondered which of the enemy camps would be obliterated this Christmas morning.

But we heard no sounds of exploding bombs as the planes droned away. We learned why a few minutes later.

The Japanese had tried to pick them all up and destroy them; but there were too many of them. Our American airmen had bombed the island with Christmas Cards!

I had one of the cards, one of my most treasured possessions. It was lost with other "memories" when I was shot down and reported killed (the second time) off the China coast three months later. But I can remember the cover: the delicately drawn scene of the Nativity. And inside (as best I can remember after all the years) were these words:

"The Commanding Officer, Officers and Men of the Army of Liberation extend the Sentiments of the Season and the promise of the realization of your fondest hopes in the coming New Year."

That promise was kept. For General of the Army Douglas Arthur MacArthur walked into Santo Tomas Prison Camp just forty-three days later, to greet those of us still alive."

We were so emaciated we felt sure he wouldn't recognize us as we walked forward to speak to him, so we said, "General, I am Don Bell." And he said, "Hello, Lazarus, I am happy to see you have returned from the dead."

Returning to work was a different matter. NBC, thinking us dead, had written us off. But Mutual Broadcasting System offered us an immediate place as their correspondent with MacArthur's headquarters, in spite of my physical condition at that time. I accepted and after some hair-raising experiences in Luzon, Borneo and a few other islands, we talked the Commanding Officer of the Navy's air fleet, to let us go as thirteenth man on a patrol bomber mission along the China coast.

And so it happened that

On March 22, 1945, the PB4Y2 in which we were flying, disguised as a radar technician, ran into real trouble.

Japan was dependent on oil supplies that had to be shipped by tankers via the South China Sea. Our job was to prevent any tankers or Japanese merchant ships from getting to Japan. Spotting a nest of ships off the coast near Amoy, we went down to identify them, were hit by unexpected anti-aircraft fire off Quemoy, and we kept right on

Right Past the Japs' Ears

A P O S T W A R A N E C D O T E

AS I listened to Don Bell, one of the radio commentators who described the Bikini atom-bomb tests, it reminded me of the hoax he played on the Japs toward the end of our three long years in the Japanese prison camp at Santo Tomás, Manila.

The Japs let us have a public-address system in the prison, to broadcast occasional scraps of vague, highly censored news they fed us from the outside world and to notify us about daily work assignments. In broadcasting the so-called news, Bell was a great morale builder; knowing how starved we were for information about the war, he often took chances on slipping through important facts by resort to clever double-talk.

The time came when persistent rumors were being whispered through the prison that MacArthur had landed on Leyte—a dramatic moment for the 4000 starving prisoners who had been waiting so long for the Americans to come yet dulled by the memory of many rumors which had proved false.

Our starvation ration of five ounces of food a day had just been reduced again because the Japs insisted they could get no rice for us. Each evening Bell was allowed to broadcast that rice had again failed to arrive that day, so that the few families who had a little saved up could budget out a bit of it for their children and grimly go on hoarding the rest.

Finally, as the starving continued and the Leyte rumors persisted, Bell stepped to his microphone one evening and, following the routine work-detail broadcast, began the announcement I'll never forget. "And now I have some grand news for you," he said. "Today the rice ration arrived."

No doubt the Japanese thought that the roar of applause which rolled through the camp when he had finished what he had to say signified our delight at the arrival of the food. Well, that did please us. But what really made us cut loose was the wonderful news he finessed through in his closing remark. "This has come a little late," he said. "It has been a long time. But . . . better Leyte than never!"

diving, right into the China Sea. So, the ship was lost, the crew was listed as missing in action, presumed dead, and, technically, Don Bell was a member of the crew. Thus ended his second life—according to the record, that is.

THIRD: THE DEDICATION

Actually, seven of us survived the crash and through a series of miracles we got ashore and started walking toward Chungking, some 800 to 1,000 miles away as an airplane would fly. However, a mysterious Chinese gentleman we only knew as Mr. Lu, guided us to an escape base deep in the mountains, from which we were airlifted to Chungking.

Because of wartime regulations, we could not return to General MacArthur's command, because we had escaped through enemy territory and had to go to the United States, via Europe, for reassignment.

And here began a series of shocks. We had been out of the United States for nineteen years. We left when Calvin Coolidge was President and the country could still be called a Republic; we returned shortly after the death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the country had become a Democracy. The Nation we had loved, and served, was so changed that we hardly recognized it. When we applied for a new passport, we were arrested as a draft dodger. When we made a guest appearance on CBS's Report to the Nation, we couldn't get paid because we had no social security number. When we were sent to San Francisco to cover the organizational meetings of the United Nations we found Alger Hiss directing traffic and the Council on Foreign Relations running the show in collaboration with V.M. Molotov and the Soviet delegation.

We were shocked, but we held our peace at the time. There was a war to finish and then, having settled permanently in the United States, we would study, and speak out against the forces that were destroying our country.

We rejoined MacArthur's command, went with him to Japan, left to cover the Bikini atom bomb tests in 1946, then back home to the United States at long last, for radio network assignments in New York City and Washington, D.C. But we couldn't speak out against the nation's enemies when they owned the microphones. So we began a period of independent broadcasting, settled for a while in Tulsa, Oklahoma, where we began to publish this newsletter, which is about to begin its 24th year of uninterrupted weekly appearances.

In February, 1954, we moved to the Palm Beach area where we joined the late Upton Close and George Deatherage in publishing both Closer-Up and Don Bell Reports. With the death of Upton Close, and then George Deatherage, we faced an impossible problem in continuing the publications; except that—and now we quote from a letter we wrote and published on August 30, 1974:

"Almost immediately after our arrival in Florida, Upton introduced us to a 'patriotic lady' who was interested in our work. We had never set eyes on each other before. But upon being introduced, this 'patriotic lady' excused herself, began rummaging through a pile of old magazines and scrap books, and suddenly held up a copy of Life Magazine of April 13, 1942. In it was the illustrated story of the fall of Manila to the Japanese, and there was an action photo of Don Bell before a microphone interviewing Gen. MacArthur. Under the picture was the caption: 'Murdered by Japs, according to Manila reports, was radio commentator Don Bell, long anti-Japanese. Supposedly he had been tortured with fire and bayonet.'

She was attracted to the man in the picture, 'just knew' that the story of his death was untrue, and held onto the illustration in the hope of matching it up with the original sometime in the future. And, as predestined, and as you've already guessed, this 'patriotic lady' seen became Mrs. Don (Ginny) Bell. And she was willing to become perfect partner (in the publishing business) as well as wife and helpmeet. So... a 'family corporation' was established. We made it a family affair and decided to continue the publication of both Closer-Up and Don Bell Reports." (unquote).

Temporary but serious illness forced us to retire Closer-Up so more time and effort could be concentrated on Don Bell Reports.

Throughout the years the publishing of Don Bell Reports has been a work of dedication, a "calling" for which we believe we have been prepared by years of sometimes bitter experience. It has become a "family affair," and so long as Don and Ginny can remain free agents (and "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty"), and so long as we remain in reasonably good health, we shall continue to publish this newsletter, God willing. He has blessed this work through the years, kept us as truthful and factual as mere mortal may be as a reporter of human events.

In this season of joyful tidings, we pray that the Lord will continue to bless all of our friends, supporters and readers, and that we may be of assistance in interpreting the signs of these troublous times.

WILSON TO ROOSEVELT TO CARTER - THE CONTINUING CONSPIRACY -

THE PERSONALITIES

Something seemed to be missing. While we were pondering on the convening of a new Congress and the preparations for the inauguration of a new President, there was one thing that had not yet been added. Each time a National Democrat has moved into the White House, a special title is used to describe the nature of the new administration. Woodrow Wilson coined the term The New Freedom. Franklin Delano Roosevelt chose to call his reign The New Deal. Harry S. Truman adopted the sobriquet The Fair Deal. John Kennedy tried to lead the Nation into The New Frontier. Lyndon Baines Johnson borrowed the name from the Fabians and called his administration The Great Society Program.

As we pondered on these titles we wondered what kind of a name David Rockefeller's Trilateral Commission would adopt on behalf of their new administration. And we have no reservations in calling it the Trilateral Commission's Administration; because:-

President-elect James Carter, Vice President-elect Walter Mondale, Secretary of the Treasury-designate Michael Blumenthal, Secretary of State-designate Cyrus Vance, Secretary of Defense-designate Harold Brown, and National Security Adviser-designate Zbigniew Brzezinski all are members of the Trilateral Commission. It seems important to add that all of the above, with the single exception of James Carter, are also members of the Council on Foreign Relations, as are Director of Central Intelligence-designate Theodore Sorensen, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers-designate Charles Schultze, Secretary of HEW-designate Joseph Califano, and Secretary of HUD-designate Patricia Roberts Harris.

While pondering on these names and their interlocking connections, we were reminded of an important article which was brought to our attention recently. Entitled "The Hidden Master of the New Deal," by Frederick Collins, originally published in Liberty Magazine, November 12, 1938, and republished in the Summer 1972 Liberty edition. The article begins:

"When Franklin Roosevelt feels especially good about the way things are going, he says, smiling:

'We planned it that way.'

"An awkward hush usually follows, for the hearer—whether lawmaker, news gatherer, or fireside dialer—knows that he is in the presence of an unsolved mystery.

"We? Is the pronoun used in the editorial or Lindberghian sense? Or is there a silent partner lurking somewhere in the political woodwork? And, if so, who is this Hidden Man of the New Deal?"

The author of this article then goes on to show that a book named "Philip Dru: Administrator," published in 1912, "was—or could have been—the New Deal Bible." The author then goes on to point out that the book was written by Colonel E.M. House, the man who masterminded Wilson's election and later came to be called—by Wilson—"my alter ego."

After his break with Wilson, it was said that House retired from political life. But the facts paint a different story. Frederick Collins wrote (in 1938):

"When he (House) was professor emeritus in Schoolmaster (Woodrow) Wilson's Washington academy of political science, Franklin Roosevelt was a modest but promising freshman. In the war years Wilson's adviser (House) and the young Assistant Secretary of the Navy (FDR) saw much of each other. In New York, the Colonel's daughter had married into the Auchincloss family, whose forebears, like the President's, were early Dutch settlers. The Auchinclosses lived on East Seventieth Street, the Roosevelts on East Sixty-Fifth Street, both near Park Avenue. The friendship between the two men and, after Mr. Roosevelt's departure for Albany, the friendship between Colonel House and the President's mother continued.

"After the first Roosevelt nomination at Chicago, the candidate went promptly to visit the Colonel in Massachusetts. The two men were photographed squinting happily into a summer sun. Word spread that the astute Mr. House, not the gum-chewing Mr. Farley, was to be the real manager of the Roosevelt campaign. The friendly relations between the two former Wilsonians continued to receive frequent public mention up to and for some weeks after the new President's inauguration. Then—apparently—this ever-vanishing elder statesman passed out of the Rooseveltian scene.

“The same thing, you may remember, happened in the case of Bernard M. Baruch, who had occupied the chair of finance and economics on the Wilson faculty, and who was confidently expected to become Mr. Roosevelt's Secretary of the Treasury or, later, head of the National Recovery Administration. Instead, Barney Baruch, to all appearances, also dropped off the political earth.

But when Barney's man Friday, Hugh Johnson, moved into the NRA job, we who thought we were in the know told each other that good old Barney preferred to pull his wires from behind the scenes.

“When, however, Felix Frankfurter and not Edward House emerged as President Roosevelt's most highly publicized adviser on affairs of state, we didn't stop to think that good old House might not be doing likewise. Which wasn't very smart of us.” (unquote)

It is this continuity of personalities which we wish to stress: Col. House was President Wilson's political potentate, Bernard Baruch was his economic planning dictator. With the end of World War I there was a “return to normalcy,” Wilson's New Freedom Era which was supposed to make the world safe for democracy only made it safe for Communism, and both House and Baruch seemingly ended their public careers and returned to their private pursuits. However, when plans were completed and conditions were ripe for the birth of the New Deal, both men were on the spot ready to resume their commands. However, this time they preferred to pull the wires from behind the scenes.

As we all know, this second attempt at creating a new world order also ended in a World War; to be followed by cold war, containment, limited wars, detente, etc.

And now comes a third attempt (which also could end in a third world war, one more devastating than all other wars combined.)

This time House and Baruch are gone from the scene. But they made provision for other men to take their places. And, once again, their hierarchical replacements will pull the wires from behind the scenes while prepared puppets will seem to occupy the seats of power and do the public talking and acting, and take whatever risks there may be.

These public figures who will talk and act on behalf of those who will pull the strings from behind the scenes, have been given a new name: They are to be called The Community.

There is a valid reason for the new name. Back in 1960 when this reporter and Mary Davison combined to expose the activities of the Council on Foreign Relations, when Dan Smoot followed suit in 1962 with his book The Invisible Government, then others added their voices, and a private club that had been able to operate as a secret cabal began to get so much publicity that even such papers as The New York Times and The Washington Post started to publish occasional articles about the CFR.

When the CFR lost its “cover,” the Bilderberg Group acted as its surrogate for a time. But when its leader, Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, was exposed as a bribe-taker committing acts of dubious legality, this powerful internationalist club also was exposed to the light of publicity. Meanwhile, David Rockefeller, who headed CFR and financed the Bilderbergers, had one of his henchmen, Zbigniew Brzezinski, create a new Elitish Club, the Trilateral Commission. We believe C.B. Baker of “Youth Action News” deserves the credit for first exposing this internationalist consortium, other patriotic publications quickly following suit. Now the Trilateral Commission is a poor disguise for Elitists, and James Earl Carter is exposing his real bosses by having named at least five of its members to Cabinet level posts in his upcoming administration.

Since CFR, Bilderberg and TLC all have been too much in the news, the Elitists apparently decided to fall back on the strategy used by Col. House and Barney Baruch. They would divide themselves into two sections: 1) those who would stay behind the scenes and pull the wires, and 2) those who would take open and public positions, receive all the publicity and the fame or infamy, talking and acting on behalf of those behind the scenes pulling the wires—acting as a cover to conceal the identity of the “wire pullers.”

This is The Community, the new name given those members of CFR, TLC, Bilderberg, et al, who will work openly and publicly, developing The New World Order while at the same time concealing the identity of the Super-Elitists.

An article in The New York Times of Dec. 26, 1976, reveals the plan. We quote parts of that article:

FOREIGN POLICY COMMUNITY AN ELITE WORLD UNTO ITSELF

By Leslie H. Gelb

Cyrus Vance... Zbigniew Brzezinski... W. Michael Blumenthal... Harold Brown... all are part of a small floating group that comes close to monopolizing the top foreign and national security posts in any administration. Known as the foreign policy community it does not operate as a club of the like-minded or a conspiracy or a governing board. It acts more like an aristocracy of professionals. Its members sometimes actually make the decisions, usually define what is to be debated and invariably manage the resulting policies.

The elite of the community comprises some 300 professors, lawyers, businessmen, congressional aides, foundation executives, thinktank experts and even some journalists.

...It is difficult to compare the power of the community with that of the Establishment. . . . The men of the Establishment were insiders, who knew the right persons to telephone, meeting quietly, avoiding publicity. Most members of the community operate far more openly... unlike the Rockefellers, they cannot pick up the phone and speak to the President. They talk to the president indirectly, through the articles they write in journals such as Foreign Affairs (a CFR publication—Ed.) and Foreign Policy or in the op-ed pages of newspapers, or in testimony to congressional committees, through attending conferences with high government officials at the Brookings Institution in Washington or the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. . . .

University men, experts and professors used to be merely assistants to the men of the Establishment. But with the advent of McGeorge Bundy in the Kennedy administration, Walt W. Rostow in the Johnson administration, and finally Henry Kissinger in the Nixon administration, the professors have moved to the center of power. . . . (unquote)

Now it can be seen that Nelson Rockefeller—like House and Baruch before him—has retired from the “public” scene; he’ll join the rest of the family in pulling wires from behind the scenes, while members of The Community occupy the stage.

THE CONTINUING CONSPIRACY

Up to this point we have been talking about the conspirators, naming some of them and discussing their methods and their organizations. Now let’s talk about The Conspiracy itself. The conspirators have tried to keep it a secret, insisting that there is no such thing as a World Conspiracy. But one of their group—who would now be identified as a member of The Community—was proud of the fact that there was a Conspiracy, and he believed that it was wrong to keep the fact a secret. We refer to Professor Carroll Quigley, author of Tragedy and Hope, a book that the conspirators have tried mightily to exterminate. Quigley wrote:

“I know of the operations of this network because I have studied it for 20 years and was permitted for two years to examine its papers and secret records. I have no aversions to it or most of its aims and have, for most of my life, been close to it and many of its instruments. I have objected, both in the past and recently to a few of its policies . . . but in general my chief difference of opinion is that it wishes to remain unknown, and I believe its role in history is significant to be known. . . .”

This is a worldwide conspiracy, aiming at world control of the world’s resources, both natural and human. But, since our space is limited, we shall try to confine our letter to an outline of the American phase of the Continuing Conspiracy:—

In the second decade of this century, when it was determined by the Conspirators that a World War was necessary, Edward Mandell House chose (or was chosen) to take a part in the reshaping of the post-war world. He therefore secured President Wilson’s permission to form a Community of Experts to work out plans for the New World Order, then go to Paris for the peace conference at the end of the war and put that plan into operation. That plan included creation of the League of Nations, the Communization of Russia, and the creation of a “Homeland for the Jews” in Palestine.

House’s group was given the name of The Inquiry, and in Paris it worked closely with the British Round Table and the Royal Institute of International Affairs. However, due to a break between House and Wilson, and the refusal of the United States Senate to approve American membership in the League of Nations, The Inquiry failed in its purpose, and House and his associates therefore created a new organization. A CFR report explains:

“The origins of the Council on Foreign Relations lay in the disappointment of the founders at the conduct of the Versailles Treaty negotiations (in which most of the founders had been participants). . . . Having founded the American Institute of International Affairs shortly after their return to this country, they merged that institution in 1921 with a preexisting discussion organization in New York City to form the Council on Foreign Relations, Inc.”

The CFR began to be really important after 1927 when the Rockefellers began financing and controlling it (and its membership).

Now, note the sequence:

Before we entered World War I, The Inquiry was formed to help create a New World Order. Before we entered World War II, the Council on Foreign Relations, in cooperation with the U.S. State Department formed “groups of experts to proceed with research under four general heads—Security and Armaments Problems, Economic and Financial Problems, Political Problems, and Territorial Problems. In this way, the Council's long experience in assembling and conducting such groups could be put to use and the (State) Department would be provided with a cross-section of expert private opinion to supplement official opinion." (Quotation is from the CFR booklet "A Record of Twenty-Five Years," published Jan. 1, 1947).

These four study groups later became officially connected with the State Department. Then later, after the United States had entered World War II, the CFR began its "War and Peace Studies, which were aimed at concentrating public discussion on the issues of rebuilding the international order."

Furthermore, just as House's The Inquiry had attended the Versailles Peace Conference at the end of World War I, so did members of the Council on Foreign Relations attend, and dominate the American delegation, at the organizational meetings of the United Nations in San Francisco in 1945.

Department of State Publication 2349, Conference Series 71, June 26, 1945, lists the names of some 200 delegates, aides and assistants who attended the UN Conference. 43 of the top delegates were members of the CFR, men such as Secretary of State Edward Stettinius, Acting UN Secretary General Alger Hiss, Leo Pasvolsky who engineered the U.S. Senate's acceptance of the UN Charter, John Foster Dulles, Nelson A. Rockefeller, Adlai Stevenson, Philip Jessup, etc.

NOW, THE THIRD TRY

The Conspirators were not totally successful when The Inquiry tried: the League of Nations did not produce their desired New World Order. Nor were the Conspirators completely successful when they tried before, during, and after World War II to set up their One World Government.

So now they are trying again. Creation of the Trilateral Commission, then The Community, and the election of their programmed puppet James Earl Carter; these are all parts of the third attempt to establish their centrally controlled, Interdependent World Community. But the concluding link may be the establishment of a new "world study group" similar to House's The Inquiry of World War I, and the CFR's War and Peace Studies of World War II.

The announcement was made official by The New York Times, the Internationalists' "journal of record." In the Dec. 26, 1976 issue of The Times, there is an article by Peter Grose. It may be coincidental, but Mr. Grose is a member of the CFR, and also is qualified for membership in that section of the club now called The Community. In an article headlined, "Foreign Affairs Global Study Set," Grose reports that: "For the second time in the 55-year history of the influential Council on Foreign Relations, it is launching a comprehensive public study of global policy issues in an attempt to focus academic and official thinking on the problems world societies will face in the 1980's."

"Some 80 authors from 12 countries," Grose writes, "have been invited to prepare working papers, which have been discussed and revised in a series of study groups over the past year. Organized into over 30 booklength studies on specific issues, the results are to be published by McGraw-Hill and distributed worldwide. The so-called 1980's Project will include major studies on such issues as how to monitor government performance in defending human rights, opportunities for cooperation in international disaster relief, and a wide range of global monetary, trading and security relationships.

"...After World War II the council organized a research project of equivalent scope, called the War and Peace Studies, which aimed at concentrating public discussion on the issues of rebuilding the international order. Officers of the council (on foreign relations) concluded that world governments faced a similar fundamental transition period in which new issues and new policy dilemmas are demanding attention beyond the usual political-military concerns of the past three decades.

"The 1980's Project is directed by Richard H. Ullman, professor of international affairs at the Woodrow Wilson School of Princeton University. Funding of $1.3 million has been provided by the Ford Foundation, the German Marshall Fund of the United States, the Lilly Endowment, the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation." (unquote)

Here is a Conspiratorial Project designed to lay down policies that are to be adopted and followed by the "interdependent" nations of the world, and to condition the minds of men to accept and obey the rules prescribed by a group of Super-Elitists who are making their third try of the century to own or control all the resources of the world, both natural and Human. The first rule of battle is to know the enemy; the second is to know his goal. Here lies our hope of helping in the fight for freedom. For we must know, and accept, the Truth if we would remain free.

BLACKOUTS, BRAINWASHING AND MIND CONDITIONING

PSYCHOLOGICAL WARFARE BROUGHT UP-TO-DATE

"In the conditioning of human minds, it is not bells or buzzers or mild electric shocks which are used, but words; fear-laden or guilt-laden words which acquire the power of triggering certain standard responses. And most of the people who become the casualties of this diabolical form of warfare have not the faintest idea that the triggered responses are not their own, but have been planted in their minds."

So writes Robert Benson in an article titled: "Psychological Warfare Designed to Obscure the Driving Force in the Communist Conspiracy." His reference to the driving force behind Communism has nothing to do with bombs or bullets, or even with the Communists themselves. It has to do with what he terms "International Finance Capitalism" which controls Communism with one hand, and Western "Democracy" with the other.

An example of this mind conditioning is the election of a virtually unknown peanut farmer from Georgia, supposedly a populist and a man of the people, to the office of the Presidency of the United States. Claiming to be a "born-again Christian," and all things to all men that he might gain the votes of all, he deceived more people than any politician since Franklin Roosevelt. For Carter did not reveal that he was selected by these "International Finance Capitalists," trained and conditioned by their agents, and extolled by their Media. Nor did he ever reveal the fact that he was a member of the Trilateral Commission, or that when elected he would renounce the promises which he made, and would do the bidding of the Eastern Establishment, not of the beguiled believers who voted for him.

The saddest fact, however, is not that he won the election, but that so many were so easily deceived by him. They really thought he was different, a savior of the nation if not of the world.

This, of course, is one result of the psychological warfare that has been waged against the citizens of the United States since the beginning of the century, indeed even before the beginning of the nineteenth century, if the whole truth be told. Control of the Communications Media, of political parties, of schools and universities and church organizations, and control of the money supply; these have made control of the people both possible and profitable.

The title to this letter speaks of Blackouts, Historical Blackouts. Let us give you an example which has just been fully exposed and documented:

THE WALL STREET TRILOGY

Charles Austin Beard (1784-1948) was one of a very large number of well known and highly praised teachers and court historians who did so much to popularize socialism and downgrade the free enterprise system in the first decades of the century. He wrote two books, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (1913) and Economic Origins of Jeffersonian Democracy (1915), in which he claimed that the Founding Fathers were inspired by desire for personal profit, not by love of country, when they wrote the Constitution. That kind of propaganda was dear to members of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society and the controlled publishers of the day, and they paid dearly for the privilege of handling all the books Beard and his wife Mary, and others of that persuasion, were able to write. It was this type of intellectual that made it so very easy for FDR to begin to introduce Corporate Socialism (Fascism) into the U.S. governmental system, under the name "New Deal." The Communications Media (with a very few exceptions) praised FDR for renouncing his conservative campaign promises and trying to change the world in his "First 100 Days" in 1933 (a trick which Jimmy Carter is copying, but in a more subtle manner, since it is Carter's Populism (not Conservatism) which he is renouncing in favor of Corporate Socialism; and there are few who recognize the basic differences that separate these political philosophies.)

However, Beard—like Garet Garrett, John T. Flynn, and a few other prominent writers—soon became disenchanted with FDR. In Beard's case, it was Roosevelt's conduct of foreign policy, especially his maneuvering the country into World War II, which caused the former to break with FDR. So Beard wrote another book, President Roosevelt and the Coming of the War, 1941, in which he was very critical of the Roosevelt administration. However, he had great difficulty in finding a publisher who would even read the manuscript of this revisionist work. Only one publisher, a personal friend, would risk its publication. Beard explained the reason for the change of interest in his writings, in a statement published after Roosevelt's death, in the Saturday Evening Post of Oct. 4, 1947:

"The Rockefeller Foundation and the Council on Foreign Relations intend to prevent, if they can, a repetition of what they call in the vernacular 'the debunking journalistic campaign following World War I.' Translated into precise English, this means that the Foundation and the Council do not want journalists or any other persons to examine too closely and criticize too freely the official statements relative to 'our basic aims and activities' during World War II. In short, they hope that, among other things, the policies and measures of Franklin D. Roosevelt will escape in the coming years the evaluation and exposition that befell the policies and measures of Woodrow Wilson and the Entente Allies after World War I."

The Foundations and the Council on Foreign Relations were successful to a degree in preventing—or bookburning—any publication of the true "aims and activities" of those Elitists who propelled this Nation into World War II. Revisionist historians were able to publish some of the truth. Perpetual War for Perpetual Peace (Caxton, 1953) told the story of how the Pearl Harbor Disaster had been "arranged." Operation Keelhaul (Devin Adair, 1973) related the most disgraceful event of the war; the forced repatriation of millions of Russians at the orders of President (then General) Dwight D. Eisenhower. Other revisionist history that has been published in book, pamphlet or newsletter form has taught us that:

our willingness as individual citizens to surrender political power to an elite has cost the world approximately two hundred million persons killed from 1820 to 1975. Add to that untold misery the concentration camps, the political prisoners, the suppression and oppression of those who try to bring the truth to light.

That quotation is from Antony C. Sutton's third book in a series dealing with the role of the American Corporate Socialists, otherwise known as the Wall Street financial elite or the Eastern Liberal Establishment, in three significant twentieth-century historical events: the 1917 Lenin-Trotsky Revolution in Russia, the election of Franklin Delano Roosevelt in the United States, and the 1933 seizure of power by Adolf Hitler in Germany. The books are appropriately named: Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution (Arlington House, 1974), Wall Street and FDR (Arlington House, 1975), and Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler (January 17, 1977. '76 Press, P.O.Box 2686, Seal Beach, California 90740. 220 pages hardbound, $8.95.)

Fully documented revisionist history is hard to obtain because, in addition to the efforts of Foundations and such organizations as the CFR to prevent the publication of such material, it has been extremely difficult for any person other than a "court historian" to gain access to what are supposedly public documents. Current and pertinent examples of this are provided by the inability of impartial journalists and others to gain access to the record of events leading up to and resulting in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, or revolutionist Martin Luther King, or the attempted assassination of Governor George Wallace. In fact, to go back to a previous century, the facts surrounding the assassination of Abraham Lincoln have never been acknowledged officially by the federal government.

Additionally, if and when any reputable journalist obtains facts the elitists do not wish published, and then manages to get them published anyway, the ridiculing and smearing and persecuting of that journalist is then followed by the "disappearance" of such published material.

There have been exceptions, of course. Such publishers as Regnery, Caxton, Devin Adair and a few other independent publishers, have tried to pierce the blackout throughout the years, with considerable success. And many revisionist historians followed the example of Samuel Adams and formed Committees of Correspondence, published newsletters, set up their own publishing houses, etc.

Recently, however, revisionist historians have found it less difficult to find publishers and in some cases have found it easier to gain access to public records.

Antony Sutton is such an example. He was a Research Fellow at the prestigious Hoover Institution for War, Revolution and Peace. There he obtained much of the documentation which has made him one of the leading revisionist historians of our time. Here, in his own words, is a condensation of his findings:

* * * * *

Looking at the broad array of facts presented in the three volumes of the Wall Street series, we find persistent recurrence of the same names: Owen Young, Gerard Swope, Hjalmar Schacht, Bernard Baruch, etc.; the same international banks: J.P. Morgan, Guarantee Trust, Chase Bank; and the same location in New York; usually 120 Broadway.

This group of international bankers backed the Bolshevik Revolution and subsequently profited from the establishment of a Soviet Russia. This group backed Roosevelt and profited from New Deal socialism. This group also backed Hitler and certainly profited from German armament in the 1920s. When Big Business should have been running its business operations at Ford Motor, Standard of New Jersey, and so on, we find it actively and deeply involved in political upheavals, war, and revolutions in three major countries.

The version of history presented here is that the financial elite knowingly and with premeditation assisted the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 in concert with German bankers. After profiting handsomely from the German hyper-inflationary distress of 1923, and planning to place the German reparations burden on the backs of American investors, Wall Street found it had brought about the 1929 financial crisis.

Two men were then backed as leaders for major Western countries: Franklin D. Roosevelt in the United States and Adolf Hitler in Germany. The Roosevelt New Deal and Hitler's Four Year Plan had great similarities. The Roosevelt and Hitler plans were plans for fascist takeovers of their respective countries. While Roosevelt's NRA failed, due to then-operating constitutional constraints, Hitler's plan succeeded....

The total result of this manipulation of society by the Establishment elite has been four major wars in sixty years, a crippling national debt, abandonment of the Constitution, suppression of freedom and opportunity, and creation of a vast credibility gulf between the man in the street and Washington, D.C....

Since World War II we have seen the Korean War and the Vietnamese War—meaningless, meandering no-win wars costly in dollars and lives, with no major purpose but to generate multibillion dollar armaments contracts. Certainly these wars were not fought to restrain communism, because for fifty years the Establishment has been nurturing and subsidizing the Soviet Union which supplied armaments to the other sides in both wars—Korea and Vietnam. So our revisionist history will show that the United States directly or indirectly armed both sides in at least Korea and Vietnam.

These sensational charges that Prof. Sutton makes are neither unfounded nor unproven. There is solid evidence to back up every charge. Carroll Quigley, author of the often cited Tragedy and Hope, agrees that

“...the power of financial capitalism had another far reaching aim, nothing less than to create a world system of financial control in private hands able to dominate the political system of each country and the economy of the world as a whole.”

Professor Sutton refers to a changing mood of which this reporter has been painfully aware in years past: that up to about the mid-1960s, anyone daring to publish anything about our being ruled by a conspiratorial elite, or any other kind of elite, was called “a nut.” And nuts are created for cracking or crushing. In the last ten years, however, there has been a change in the atmosphere. Some people are beginning to wonder who never wondered before, and they are beginning to ask questions, and listen for answers. The Watergate affair may have been “the straw that broke the camel's back” in this respect. When people-at-large begin to realize that the man sitting in the White House is not the image they voted for last November, more questions may be asked. And some of the questions are bound to sound something like this:

“How could we, a once free and liberty loving people, have been so deceived and hoodwinked that we were willing to accept, even ask for, economic slavery? How could we have permitted our Representative Republic to become a Corporate Socialist State within a Totalitarian World Government?” And, the final question: “What can we do now?”

Back in 1951 Douglas Reed, a journalist who was ahead of his time and therefore dismissed by the controlled intelligentsia as “a nut,” provided the beginning of the answer in his book Far and Wide: “The Money Power and the Revolutionary Power have been set up and given sham but symbolic shapes ('Capitalism' or 'Communism') and sharply defined citadels ('America' or 'Russia'). Suitably to alarm the mass mind, the picture offered is that of bleak and hopeless enmity and confrontation. Such is the spectacle staged publicly for the masses ... But what if similar men with a common aim secretly rule in both camps and propose to achieve their ambition through the clash between these masses? I believe that any diligent student of our times will discover that this is the case.”

If this is not the case, then how has it been possible for the Soviet Union's now mighty industrial machine to have been installed by Western Big Business and International Finance Capitalism? How else can we explain this transfer of Western technology, and the financing of the transfer, to Communist Russia?

To provide an even greater historical perspective to the concept of a financial elite controlling all sides of the political spectrum, we might add that long before Douglas Reed, or Carroll Quigley, or Antony Sutton, there was the German philosopher, Oswald Spengler, who wrote in his famous The Decline of the West: “There is no proletarian movement, not even a Communist one, which does not operate in the interest of money, in the direction indicated by money, and for the time permitted by money, all this without the idealists in its ranks having the faintest suspicion of the fact."

But we still have the question: How was it possible for so few to deceive so many for so long? And that brings us back to where we began this letter: Historical Blackouts, Brainwashing and Mind Conditioning.

In our century, the necessary deception began with the setting up of two competing ideologies: Western Capitalism and Eastern Socialism. And at this point we require a clarification of terms and definitions:

Capitalism is the name that is used to describe our Western Economic System. But the unabridged dictionary also gives a second definition: The concentration of capital; the power or influence of capital, as when in the hands of a few." This latter definition fits those we have referred to as Monopoly Capitalists, or the International Financial Elite. So, if we are to understand how we, as a people, have been brainwashed, we must know the difference: There is Monopoly Capitalism, and there is the economic system called capitalism; the former promotes totalitarianism, the latter promotes free enterprise. For the sake of clarity, we shall call one Finance Capitalism, and the other, Free Enterprise Capitalism.

Socialism is the generic term for a whole host of economic systems in which some central authority is in control of natural and human resources, and the production and distribution of goods and services. There is no conflict between Finance Capitalism and Socialism; the conflict is between Free Enterprise Capitalism and Socialism. Soviet Russia has a socialist economy, but it also has monopoly capitalism as its monetary system. Corporate Socialism differs from the Soviet system in that under Corporate Socialism, corporations and labor unions operate the economic system under the authority of a Central Government; whereas in the Soviet system, the Central Government runs the economy through bureaucrats, called Commissars.

So much for definitions. Let's bet back to the manner of the Great Deception:

Robert Benson, whom we quoted at the start of this letter, uses the drawing of a robot-like figure with a head and two hands, the hands holding between them, vice-like, a figure of the world. He has labeled the parts of his drawing:

A. The Head, International Finance Capitalism, the central motivating power of a conspiracy to rule the world.

B. The Western Hand. Control of mass media, of political parties, organizations that enable Big Business to act as an Invisible Government, control of universities, etc.

C. The Eastern Hand. The Soviet Union, the more than 30 captive nations and overt Communist parties all over the world. And

IN THE MIDDLE. The World, baffled by the pressure from both left and right, and discouraged by the torrents of managed news that makes it impossible to form a clear picture of what is really happening, and why.

The plan was simple:

1. Create two opposing forces (Western Capitalism and Eastern Communism);
2. Maintain control over both (Finance Capitalism);
3. Slowly, through the years, merge the two into a world government under the pretext of "one world or none."

The difficult part would be to keep the people of the world from knowing that the Financial Elite was controlling and directing both Western Capitalism and Eastern Communism. Unfortunately, the Elite has been surprisingly successful in this. Until quite recently, that is. Now the blackout curtain is being pierced and revisionists are finding ways and means of getting historical truths to the people.

But will the people believe. There is great attraction in getting something for nothing. That is the Establishment's bait: something for nothing, even though the something is taken from someone else, as taxes or plunder, then awarded elsewhere in exchange for political support.

So, even though the facts of the Conspiracy are shouted from the housetops, will this defeat the Conspiracy and return Freedom to the land? Prof. Sutton gives us this answer:

"When will it all stop? It will not stop until we act upon one simple axiom: that the power system continues only so long as individuals want it to continue, and it will continue only so long as individuals try to get something for nothing."...

Here is the dilemma: The Power Elite is profiting from the coming of Corporate Socialism; the masses are getting their something-for-nothing to keep them content; only the middle class, backbone of the Nation, is being exterminated. And, if the middle class goes, so goes freedom, and the taxpayers who make that something-for-nothing handout possible. Then comes total slavery.

Meanwhile, like the prophets of old, we must tell the people, even if they won't listen.

TRILATERALISTS TAKE OVER THE WHITE HOUSE

OMINOUS NEW ERA BEGINS

"If you like conspiracy theories about secret plots to take over the world, you are going to love the administration of Jimmy Carter," says The Washington Post, which jokingly adds that "right-wingers are going bananas over it. So are left-wingers. It looks to them like the apocalyptic piece of evidence that fits every wacky puzzle, the missing link in every weird scenario. Sound the alarm: the Trilateralists are taking over the government!"

Thus does propaganda producer William Greider of The Washington Post Staff try to minimize the importance of the fact that the Trilateralists really are taking over the government, as he is forced to concede in his article which rated a two column headline on the front page of the Post of January 16. This method of minimizing the importance of a story and mollifying the masses, is now becoming familiar and commonplace. It is a tacit tribute to the independent and patriotic publications that have warned their readers of the dangers of the Trilateral Commission. Like the CFR and the Bilderbergers, the TLC has been accorded so much notoriety that the controlled press has found it necessary to admit that there is such a secret organization of Elitists, and that the new President and at least 13 of his aides and assistants are members of this TLC, which has only 65 American members all told!

Following are excerpts from The Washington Post article of Sunday, January 16, 1977:

...here is the unsettling thing about the Trilateral Commission. The President-elect is a member. So is Vice-President-elect Walter Mondale. So are the new Secretaries of State, Defense and Treasury... So is Zbigniew Brzezinski... also a bunch of others who will make foreign policy news in the next four years. At last count, 13 Trilateralists had gone into top positions in the administration, not to mention six others who are established as policy advisers, some of whom may also get jobs. This is extraordinary when you consider that the Trilateral Commission only has about 65 American members.

For the conspiracy chartists, it all fits. Militant groups like the U.S. Labor Party have been predicting for months that Carter was handpicked by the Trilateral gnomes to deliver Rockefeller-dominated world fascist government, not to mention nuclear holocaust. On the far right, the John Birch Society substitutes communist for fascist, but comes up with a similar script, involving the same villains....

At the very least, Carter's heavy reliance on the Trilateral membership list demonstrates what has long been true—that U.S. foreign policy is shaped by a very exclusive circle of people. This is not going to change under Carter, campaign rhetoric to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Trilateralists were picked originally by David Rockefeller, aided by Brzezinski and Rockefeller's foreign-policy assistant, George Franklin, longtime executive director of the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR). The organization has interlocking features which inspire the conspiracy theorizers—an overlap with the CFR and the Bilderberg Society, that Atlantic organization of movers and shakers which was tarnished somewhat when its founder, Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands, was exposed as a bagman for Corporate arms bribery.

The American membership...mixes global thinkers (Harvard, MIT, Caltech, Brookings Institution and others) with multinational business executives (Exxon, Chase Manhattan Bank, Coca-Cola, Texas Instruments, Sears Roebuck, et al). There is a sprinkling from labor (AFL-CIO, United Auto Workers, the Steelworkers) and the civic sector (the League of Women Voters). The Business sector with the best representation, by far, is banking, followed closely by the news media (CBS, Time magazine, columnist Carl Rowan, The Chicago Sun-Times, plus directors from The New York Times and the Los Angeles Times). The media presence has an obvious importance: a consensus is a consensus in this realm only if the public knows about it....

The notion that David Rockefeller is personally picking up the tab for all this is wrong, too. Rockefeller has made a "token" donation personally, according to the commission, but most of the money comes from tax-exempt foundations, Ford, the Rockefeller Brothers, the Lilly Endowment, the German Marshall Fund, plus smaller gifts from corporations, Time, Wells-Fargo, and Texas Instruments, among others....

The selection of the politicians (who were invited to become members of the TLC) is the stunning feature—Rockefeller and his aides were either very lucky or extraordinarily prescient about the direction of American politics. Perhaps a little of both. They guessed right that Carter and Mondale were comers. They guessed wrong about Rep. Wilbur Mills and Sen. Robert Taft, Jr. of Ohio. In the case of Bill Brock of Tennessee, they lost a senator but gained a GOP national chairman....

David, the youngest Rockefeller brother, must be deriving a little sibling gratification from his creation. The four brothers have always carefully delineated their individual areas of public concern, but David's Trilateral Commission simultaneously preempts John III's long-held interest in Asia and Nelson's franchise in politics. David, also a Republican, enjoys a new level of national prominence, just as his brother, the Vice President, must leave the stage....

In Carter's case, the Trilateral experience must have meant much more. He was a not very famous governor of Georgia, interested in foreign trade and national politics, when Brzezinski, Franklin, and Rockefeller went looking for a Southern governor to serve. They were impressed by his seriousness.... He phones personally to commission headquarters in New York to keep up with the latest studies....

If one samples the Trilateral papers, two themes are repeatedly expressed or implied, both provocative in the context of American but apparently acceptable as beyond argument in the Trilateral viewpoint. One is that American foreign policy, on the whole, has been a great success over the last 25 years. "A time of relative peace and prosperity without parallel," as one report called it. Foreign-policy critics outside the establishment might argue that this period was, more acceptably, "a time of relative war."

The other controversial premise is that multinational corporations, except for rare lapses by a handful of them, are a blessing to mankind and possibly the bridge to world peace. Many of the proposals do suggest new international agreements to regulate the taxes, antitrust violations, and capital investments by these global giants....

...one Trilateral report did prove to be highly controversial with the commission members—a study called "The Crisis of Democracy," co-authored by Samuel P. Huntington of Harvard, an old friend and co-author of Brzezinski, a leading academic apologist for the war in Vietnam....

Huntington's essay is rich in disturbing themes, especially if one assumes that the Trilateralists share his views. He suggests, for instance, that a President must organize a "governing coalition" from key establishment leaders, not from voters. "Once he is elected President, the President's electoral coalition has, in a sense, served its purpose," the professor wrote....

The conspiracy watchers have read this book and see it as an ominous blueprint, confirming their worst suspicions....

...there is this to add: Samuel P. Huntington, it is rumored, may join Brzezinski's national security staff in the White House, which would add another strand to the webs they (the anti-Trilateralists) are weaving.

(end of excerpted quotes from an article in The Washington Post)

A few comments concerning the preceding: In his attempts to minimize the importance of the Trilateral Commission, staffwriter William Greider utilizes four of the standard "trigger words" that have been designed to set off conditioned responses in the minds of his readers. The words are right-wing, left-wing, fascist, and communist. To be doubly sure of triggering the conditioned response, Greider juxtaposes the Marxist U.S. Labor Party with the "far right John Birch Society." Greider says the U.S. Labor Party predicts a world fascist government under President Carter, while "On the far right, the John Birch Society substitutes communist for fascist, but comes up with a similar script, involving the same villains."

It has served the Conspirators well to tell Americans that Communism and Fascism are directly opposite social, political and economic systems. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Both are forms of socialism, both are forms of totalitarianism, and both are forms of monopoly capitalism. Under Communism, the government controls everything and everybody directly; under Fascism (Corporate Socialism), the government controls everything and everybody indirectly, through corporations and labor unions.

Under Communism, a Soviet system is used whereby commissars control through regional commissions. Under Fascism—or Corporate Socialism—a Bureaucratic system is used whereby appointed administrators control through regional councils.

It also has served the Conspirators well to pretend to be against Communism while actually collaborating with and supporting the Communists, and to denounce Fascism while at the same time setting up a Fascist system in these United States to replace their Representative Republican form of Government. To condemn an enemy publicly while aiding him privately, and this at the federal level, is surely nothing short of reason as that crime is defined in the U.S. Constitution!

In his article in The Post Greider refers to The Crisis of Democracy, a book published by the New York University Press which "bears the imprimatur of a report to the (Trilateral) Commission," and which can be ordered directly from the Trilateral Commission, 345 East 45th Street, New York, N.Y. 10017, for $3.50.

In this TLC publication, author Huntington of Harvard says that a President of the United States, once he is elected, must then organize a "governing coalition" from key establishment leaders, not from voters. And this is precisely what Jimmy Carter did! Aside from a few cronies from Georgia to whom he must pay political debts, Carter did organize a governing coalition composed of key members of the Trilateral Commission, the Council on Foreign Relations, or both. Does this justify our charge that the Trilateralists have taken over the White House? And that our new President with the boyish name is following the directives laid down by "key establishment leaders"?

A FOURTH AMENDMENT VICTORY

However, all is not lost so long as there are persons in official positions in the United States Government who still believe—and act upon the belief—that the Constitution is the law of the land.

It may have been a small victory, just one battle won in a continuing war. But good news is certainly needed by the last-ditch fighters for freedom. And this is good news. Recently a three-judge federal court ruled that any federal law or regulation that "offends the Fourth Amendment" is "unconstitutional and void." Here is a decision that, if upheld by the Supreme Court, can be of inestimable importance to all who have been harassed by "swarms of officers" sent out from "a multitude of new offices" in the Ten Regional Capitals, to conduct "unreasonable searches and seizures" without warrants "particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." (Quoted phrases are from the Declaration of Independence and the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States).

Professional conservative James Kilpatrick did justice to the event in his syndicated column of January 11, 1977. He wrote:

"In the continuing war between a free people and the omnipotent state, the free people seldom win major battles. But they do win a few—and they won a big one the other day in Pocatello, Idaho. Brothers and sisters, let us rejoice.

"With the decision of a three-judge federal court in the case of Barlow's, Inc., a key provision of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) is reduced to so much rubble. Coming on top of similar decisions in other judicial circuits, the Idaho decision means that no businessman needs to submit any longer to the nitpicking, maddening, helter-skelter harassments of the OSHA inspectors. Subject only to the laws of assault, battery and mayhem, an employer can throw the inspectors out.

"The issue in Barlow's was a straightforward question of constitutional law. The case arose last September, when an OSHA inspector, Daniel T. Sanger, presented himself at the door of the plumbing, heating and air conditioning company. He demanded entry under a provision of the 1970 OSHA act authorizing inspectors to 'enter without delay and at reasonable times any factory, plant, establishment, construction site, or other area, workplace, or environment where work is performed by an employee or an employer.' F.G. Bill Barlow, president of the company, might have saved thousands of dollars in legal fees if he had let Inspector Sanger in.... But Barlow feels strongly on these things. He stood squarely on his Fourth Amendment rights: no warrant, no admission.

"The disputants went promptly into court. On December 30, a three-judge panel upheld Barlow's position in an emphatic decree.... the panel held OSHA's entry provision flatly incompatible with the Fourth Amendment....

"And it was some order: Section 8(a) is 'unconstitutional and void in that it directly offends against...the Fourth Amendment.' The Secretary of Labor and the OSHA people 'are hereby forever and permanently restrained and enjoined from acting or attempting to act pursuant to or in furtherance of Section 8(a) ... and from conducting or attempting to conduct any general searches or inspections of the non-public portions of the premises of the plaintiff....'

"Hallelujah! But let me add this: No rational critic of OSHA can oppose the general purpose—to promote safe working conditions in American industry. The purpose is fine. But, on the record, OSHA's costly programs have accomplished little. The inspectors function as police, prosecutors, juries and judges. To this arrogant outfit, such constitutional protections as due process, jury trial, and Fourth Amendment rights are meaningless.... in crippling this outfit, the Western judges have performed a splendid service." (end of quote).

Columnist Kilpatrick's reporting is commendable, but his comments are questionable (and we omitted the most questionable of them). Here is where conservatives may differ from constitutionalists: It is not the duty of the federal government to "promote safe working conditions in American industry." This is the duty of local governments or, if they fail, of State governments. But for federal agencies to protect the plumbers in a local plant in Pocatello, Idaho, is about as unconstitutional an act as the Founding Fathers could have conceived. We agree with Rep. William M. Ketchum (R-CA), who on January 11, 1977, introduced a bill not to reform or amend, but to repeal the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970. (H.R. 1679, introduced and referred to the House Committee on Education and Health). In connection with this movement to stop OSHA Rep. George Hansen (R-Idaho) has accepted the founding chairmanship of an organization called "STOP OSHA." Representatives Ketchum and Hansen deserve all the support they can be given, for reasons that go far beyond OSHA itself.

In setting up a Corporate Socialist Government, which requires a Monopoly Capitalist economic system, it is necessary that big corporations, operating as a part of the government structure, have monopoly privileges in their particular spheres of operation. This means that the smaller, independent corporations and other middle class businesses and services be eliminated. And this is where such federal agencies as OSHA fit into the picture. Privileged Big Business has little to fear from these harassing spies that creep across the land from their Ten Regional Headquarters. But the independent businessman, like the independent doctor, lawyer, or other goods or service dispenser, finds it almost impossible to stay in business when the "feds" start their nitpicking, harassment and persecution. So, they must sell out to a conglomerate or "join the club" if one is a member of a profession.

Now, here is the maddening fact about these "feds." They cannot be fired, they cannot be replaced, their agencies cannot be liquidated. The Executive Department of our federal government has been so developed that no President, however patriotic, sincere and determined he might be, can do much about that so-called Fourth Department of government which is the Bureaucracy. He can do little or nothing but go along with it. Hence, whoever controls the Bureaucracy controls the whole Government, unless the Congress or the Judges step in and do their Constitutionally-assigned duties of checking and balancing.

A survey in a recent issue of U.S. News & World Report (Jan. 10) had to do with these "dug-in bureaucrats." Using U.S. Civil Service statistics, the report showed that of the 2.2 million civilians who work for the U.S. Government, only 2,200—less than one out of a thousand—can be fired or replaced; and most of these are bureau chiefs and their private secretaries.

Just below those who can be appointed by a President (the governing coalition of Trilateralists and CFR members, in Carter's case) are the supermanagers "who make the system work."

"These managers can speed or delay action ... can sidetrack or promote bills... can make a shambles of any Government reorganization plans that threaten their corners of the federal world."

The article quotes a few previous Presidents: "As President Harry Truman put it when Dwight Eisenhower was shedding his general's stars to move into the White House: 'Poor Ike. It won't be a bit like the Army. He'll sit there and say, "Do this"—and nothing will happen. He'll find it very frustrating.'

"John P. Roche... recalls seeing Lyndon Johnson in a rage because some bureaucrat had sabotaged one of the President's pet projects. Roche suggested that the worker be fired. Shouted Johnson: 'Fire him? I can't even find him!'"

But the Trilateralist braintrusters say that Carter's chances of "reorganizing the Government" are better than those of former Chief Executives because "Today's bureaucrat is not a liberal or a conservative. He has become completely pragmatic. He appreciates a good manager. He'll go along... as long as he thinks he's getting a fair deal on his job."

So, the Trilateralists have provided a good manager and, just as commissars get a fair deal under the Soviet system, bureaucrats will get a fair deal under the Corporate Socialist system. It's the taxpayer who won't get the fair deal.

Which brings us back to the need for repeal of OSHA and all similar agency-creating Acts of Congress. Faced with "a multitude of new offices" that send "swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance," we have but one choice short of actual violent opposition: They can't be fired, or replaced; but Congress can repeal their authority and refuse to pay them. And that might defeat even the Trilateralists. As Rep. Larry McDonald said, "If Congress had never got into the illegal activity of regulating the affairs of the people, it would never have needed regulatory agencies... getting rid of them all would bring more blessings to the national economy than a shower of rain to spring crops."

THE UNVEILING OF "THE NEW SPIRIT"

THE BROAD HIGHWAY TO THE NEW WORLD ORDER

When Jimmy Carter was elected the 39th President of the United States, the big-wigs of the National Democratic Party coined a new slogan, as is the custom of all National Parties in this 20th century. Thus, chosen to be inscribed in the history books of the future alongside Wilson's "New Freedom," Roosevelt's "New Deal," Kennedy's "New Frontier," and Johnson's "Great Society," was Carter's "The New Mood."

However, as might have been expected, the President-elect was not turned on by the sound of the slogan they had selected for him. The pitch seemed perfect for its purpose, but something was lacking in the lyric. So, to better befit the Carter image, the "mood" became the "spirit." And the slogan now reads: "The New Spirit." This slogan became the theme of his inaugural address. He repeated the theme at least five times, and the entire address was composed of variations on the theme:

"This inauguration marks a new beginning, a new dedication within our Government, and a new spirit among us all. A President may sense and proclaim that new spirit, but only a people can provide it...."

"Let us create together a new national spirit of unity and trust...."

"The world itself is now dominated by a new spirit.... Tapping this new spirit, there can be no nobler nor more ambitious task for America to undertake on this day of a new beginning than to help shape a just and peaceful world that is truly humane...."

And just what is the nature of this new spirit to which Jimmy Carter would have us all bear witness? Consider the hidden depth of this esoteric explanation which was given by Kissinger's deputy secretary of state, Lawrence S. Eagleburger, as quoted from the published-in-Paris International Herald Tribune:

"He (Carter) believes in a better world through design, because he looks upon design as the way to eternal grace. He is convinced that if you live in a well-designed environment, all your troubles will disappear. He advocates lots of light, and air, and sunshine. He advocates mass transit—for everyone else (he drives his own car). He advocates mass housing—for everyone else (he lives in his own house).

"But the important thing... is not that he differed with so many of Kissinger's policies but agreed with so many of them. Carter (said) in June: 'For those who have long viewed architecture as the road to peace, prosperity and world order... the time has come for a new architectural effort, with a growing cooperation among the industrial democracies its cornerstone, and with peace and justice its constant goal.'"

(There is a Bible-based legend concerning another architecturally-minded leader of men who sought to create a New World Order in ages past. His name was Nimrod and his city was Babel on the plains of Shinar. His fate should be a warning to others of like mind and spirit).

Carter began to instill his new national spirit by pardoning all Vietnam War era draft evaders. And he was denounced from both right and left. New Hampshire Governor Meldrim Thomson ordered flags to be flown at half staff for a week. American Legion and VFW commanders called the action an insult to "the sacrifices made by those who served in Vietnam, their families, and the prisoners of war and those missing in action."

Carter's next big step in promoting a new national spirit was an economic recovery program that involved a modest tax cut for individuals and a job-creating plan; and it caused a reaction similar to that of the pardoning pronouncement: he was criticized from both the left and the right. As one reported noted: "A battle is shaping up between Carter and his advisers on the one side, and labor and congressional liberals on the other, over both the size and shape of the economic recovery program."

Carter, at least on the surface, seems to be faring better in tapping this new spirit that he says is dominating the world. This, of course, is the new spirit that is being manifested through the Trilateral Commission. Trilateralist Mondale is reassuring the governments of those "industrial democracies" who are the "cornerstone" of the New World Order. When Mondale has returned to Washington, then Trilateralist Cyrus Vance will go forth preaching "peace and justice" through the banning of nuclear bomb testings and eventual elimination of all nuclear weapons (in their day leaders tried to do the same thing with Greek Fire, the cross bow, gunpowder, and other things that might destroy all human life; inevitably they all learned that a strong defense was the best solution that humans could devise).

An alarming development in this connection is revealed by the columnists Evans and Novak in their column of January 27, 1977:

"Suddenly at a closed-door meeting on the evening of Jan. 12, Jimmy Carter dropped a blockbuster on this nation's top national security officials. He wanted immediate studies looking toward reduction of the U.S. strategic nuclear arsenal down to only 200 to 250 intercontinental missiles (ICBMs). Stunned speechless, Gen. George Brown, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, stared at the man about to be his commander-in-chief. But Dr. Harold Brown, soon to become defense secretary, managed an answer. Dr. Brown's reply:

"To consider such an immense reduction of America's strategic arsenal would be a fundamental risk involving the most complex, transcendent questions of political and military strategy (even though the Soviet missiles would be simultaneously reduced)....

"The Carter blockbuster, many national security experts believe, would presage the end of democratic Western Europe. It was dropped in the midst of one of the most tightly guarded military briefings Carter received just before the inauguration.... Those present from the new administration included Vice President Walter Mondale, Deputy Defense Secretary Charles Duncan, National Security Council director Zbigniew Brzezinski, and Deputy NSC director David Aaron....

"Most worrisome in this trial-and-error period of national security policy development is the absence of any perceived dissenter on the Carter team. Proof of that troublesome fact is the way even George Brown, so often brash and outspoken, bowed to the new President without a single word of caution." (unquote).

The preceding is like the visible tip of an iceberg, an indication that something deep and mysterious, perhaps catastrophic, lies beneath the surface, unseen and unsuspected by all but the inner circle of elitist planners. And it all has to do with the shaping of this New World Order that the Trilateralists are busily developing.

The now somewhat discredited Bilderberger Group chose a different location for each of its meetings, usually in a different country whenever possible. For example, the next meeting of the Bilderbergers is scheduled to be held in Torquay, England, in April, with George Ball probably replacing Prince Bernhard as its chairman. However, little really important business is expected to be transacted, since the Trilateral Commission has largely replaced the Bilderberg Group.

In contrast to the ever moving Bilderbergers, the TLC likes to hold its really important meetings in Japan. It was at a meeting at Kyoto, Japan that the program adopted by Jimmy Carter was formalized. Incidentally, Carter missed the latest TLC meeting in Japan. He was busy writing his inauguration address at the time. The meeting was not mentioned by the U.S. media, insofar as we could determine. But a Canadian publication carried the following item on Dec. 20, 1976:

"B.C. Hydro chairman Robert Bonner will leave for Japan Jan. 7 for a five-day session of the Trilateral Commission.... The Trilateral Commission, of which Bonner is an executive member, was founded in 1973 as an idea-exchange and watchdog over the concerns of North America, Western Europe and Japan. Bonner is the only Canadian on the executive committee. Commission members include U.S. president-elect Jimmy Carter and his vice-president, Walter Mondale."

What devilry was hatched at this latest TLC meeting, we can only surmise. But at the earlier meeting in Kyoto, Japan, we have it on good authority but from a source we will not identify (to protect the observer), that in making plans for the establishment of The New World Order, certain domestic changes within the United States were discussed. Mentioned specifically were:

- 1) A "return to responsibility" on the part of the media;
- 2) ban on the use of firearms by private citizens;
- 3) state nurseries for children born out of wedlock and for children of working mothers;
- 4) anti-discrimination law for homosexuals;
- 5) for the time being no wage and price controls; and
- 6) a strengthening of the federal executive along with a weakening of the legislative branch. This latter was to be accomplished through the calling of a Constitutional Convention during Carter's tenure in office, and the adoption of "The Emerging Constitution" which was published in Rexford Guy Tugwell's book of that name (Harper & Row, 1974, $20 per copy). This is the 40th draft of a model constitution which took ten years to write, involved the work of more than 100 people, the work being lavishly funded by tax-exempt foundations, and written at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions.

This "Constitution for the New States of America" which met with the approval of the Trilateral Commission, is so named because it does away with the 50 States of the Union, and sets up "Newstates, each comprising no less than 5 percent of the whole population." This would mean, in effect, that the Newstates and the Federal Regions into which the United States are already divided, would become one and the same. Thus, the "New Federalism" concept of Regional Governance would be established, with no "republican" States to interfere with federal control, and no Counties or Parishes to accommodate. All laws would be federal laws, federally administered so as to control the affairs of all citizens through a network of Newstates (or federal regions) and Newstate subdivisions, from a central authority in Washington.

It should be noted that Regionalism is not a new concept. As early as November 25, 1914 Col. Edward M. House began working on the plan for a Regional Government which would unite the United States, the countries of South and Central America, Mexico, and Canada if London would permit. It was to be called the Pan-American Union.

According to House's biographer, Charles Seymour: "...even unfulfilled the plan occupies a position of historical significance. It was designed not merely to bring American states more closely together, but also to serve as a model to the European nations when they had ended the war. Both in its specific language and in its general intent, the Pan-American Pact is the immediate prototype of the League of Nations. By the summer of 1916 Colonel House could see its failure with greater equanimity because his eyes already caught the vision of the United States entering and vivifying a larger concert than that of purely American states. The development of our relations with Europe, forced by the war, brought upon the horizon the need of a world organization into which the Americas might conceivably be drawn."

House was twice defeated, in that the Pan-American Regional Government was never established, and the United States was not drawn into the world organization which was the League of Nations.

However, the idea of Regional spheres of influence was again given substance at Yalta, February 4-12, 1945. There J. Stalin and V. Molotov met with President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Stettinius, Alger Hiss, and Winston Churchill, and they then agreed to reshape the Old World into spheres of influence which, hopefully, would later become full-fledged Regional Governments.

Thus were made the plans for creation of The Atlantic Alliance (NATO), the Warsaw Pact Nations, and the European Community. What has not been pointed out is that the infamous Sonnenfeldt Doctrine of 1975 was merely a legalization of what had been practiced for 30 years since Yalta!

Stettinius and Hiss were "Rockefeller men," while Roosevelt was a dying man. So, at Yalta, over Churchill's opposition, U.S. interests were given the right to exploit the Arabian Peninsula's immense oil reserves. This area was, geographically, within the Russian sphere. So, in exchange, the Soviet Union was given a big slice of Europe, this slice to include half of Germany.

When Secretary of State Henry Kissinger was developing his "Triangular Constellation," which would divide the world into three great Regions, controlled respectively by Soviet Russia, Red China and the Newstates of America, his assistant, Helmut Sonnenfeldt, was sent to brief American diplomats in Europe. His message to them: Only with Europe split down the middle through Germany could those nation states likely to endanger the New Order be controlled and World Government be assured.

Kissinger's Triangular Constellation concept later was expanded, necessarily to appease other industrial nations. So a fourth regional sphere of influence was added (Western Europe), and a fifth (Japan). This led to David Rockefeller's creation of the Trilateral Commission, and to Brzezinski replacing Kissinger. However, the concept of Regional Governance remains, as the best way of assuring the creation and maintenance of The New World Order. Among the incipient forms of these developing Regional Governments are NATO, EEC, OAS, OAU, SATO, Warsaw Pact, Arab League, etc.

The close cooperation of the Soviet Union and the United States can be seen if we disregard the TLC, the Bilderbergers, and other international organizations that sponsor cooperation between the U.S. and the Western and Eastern industrial nations, and note instead another set of organizations that sponsor cooperation between the so-called Communist and Capitalist Nations of the World. Two of these are important because, like the CFR, TLC, and Bilderbergers, they are financed by the Rockefeller and other tax-exempt foundations. We refer to the Dartmouth Conference, and the Institute for World Order. Let's concentrate on the latter.

Honorary chairman of the Institute for World Order is C. Douglas Dillon, member of the Council on Foreign Relations, Bilderberger, former Secretary of the Treasury, etc. IWO, among its other activities, sponsors a World Order Models Project. American members of this Project include:

George W. Ball; CFR, Bilderbergers, TLC, one of Jimmy Carter's foreign policy advisers, senior partner Lehman Brothers. Robert S. McNamara, CFR, Bilderberger, former Secretary of Defense, head of World Bank, etc.

Also Arthur J. Goldberg, Theodore M. Hesburgh, Bill Moyers, Edwin Reischauer, Robert V. Roosa, etc.

IWO holds regular seminars to instruct world leaders in the best methods of creating this New World Order, and one of the regular attendants has been Cyrus Vance, now U.S. Secretary of State.

IWO's World Order Models Project lists seven sponsoring institutions, one of which is the Novosti Press Agency of Moscow. Founded in 1961, this is a propaganda outlet which specializes in the infiltration of KGB agents into the United States and other Western Nations. From European sources we have obtained the following information:

Novosti Press Agency's "news items" are selected with the object of "serving the furtherance of world peace and friendship between nations." Approximately 193 bulletins in 56 languages are currently published monthly. Novosti's "news" is used by 51 publications and by an average of 11 large Western daily and weekly papers, published mostly under such headings as "Opinions of Others," or "International Press Mirror" and such like. Having spread systematically throughout the media (including automobile magazines) Novosti is in a position to promote Communism, which the USSR considers a prerequisite for world peace.

An example of Novosti's penetration of the West's press system is its collaboration in the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica where, under the heading of "USSR" all references to "purges" and annexation of various countries is missing. All articles about the USSR were written by Russian authors. (We are told that upon protest, the Encyclopedia Britannica is preparing a re-edited volume to replace the one in which the USSR was featured).

70% of Novosti's directors and journalists are said to be agents and officers of the KGB. The former master spy Kim Philby was appointed a director at the head office in Moscow. Between 1966 and 1971 dozens of Novosti journalists were expelled from Western European, Latin American and African countries for espionage (but not from the United States!)

Current head of Novosti is said to be Lev Tolkunov, a member of the Soviet Central Committee and from 1965 to 1976 Director General of IZVESTIA. Prior to that he was a high functionary in the Department of Psychological Activities of the Cominform (the Communist information bureau set up to coordinate the activities of the Communist parties of the Soviet Union, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, France, Italy, and formerly Yugoslavia. The Cominform was allegedly dissolved in April 1956. The Novosti Press Agency carries on much of the work originally assigned to the Cominform).

But the point we wish to stress is this: Novosti is a promoter of the World Order Models Project, a pet project of the Institute for World Order, which is funded by the Rockefeller Foundation and the Warburg Family (in the name of the late James P. Warburg). And IWO's aims were stated very clearly by Harry B. Hollins, chairman of the IWO executive committee, in an article titled "Is There Hope For Mankind?" which appeared in the January 1975 issue of the "IWO Planning Review." Hollins stated:

"The existing nation-state system is highly dangerous.... It follows that a new global system must be brought into being - a system based not on maximizing the special interests of nation-states, but on maximizing four interrelated global values: Peace, Economic Well-Being, Social Justice, and Ecological Stability."

The program for attaining this Utopian New World Order includes genocide against the Whites in Rhodesia and South Africa, establishment of a global food agency, UN control of all seabeds, establishment of a world tax system, worldwide registration of all individuals with identification numbers for each individual (similar to our Social Security numbers), a money-less credit and debit system for individuals, similar to the Special Drawing Rights among nations, etc.

In short, the aim is a system of controls - control of the individual, control of adversary institutions (such as the Church), control of nation-states, control of the world's resources. The object of all this being the enrichment and power of a small elitist group which uses established governments, institutions and officials to attain its ends; while those same governments, institutions and officials vie for the privilege of serving the elitist group while at the same time destroying themselves!

For all who understand: let us be thankful that "man shall not live by bread alone."

THE POISONED BAIT IN THE E.R.A. TRAP

RATIFY A NEW CONSTITUTION, OR MERELY AMEND THE OLD?

Before an army moves into open conflict against an entrenched enemy, the general staff will have determined a specific plan of action. However, if Plan A doesn't seem to be producing the desired results, a change in tactics is ordered and Plan B is initiated. Or, if that fails, Plan C, or Plan D may be ordered and put into operation.

Conspirators who hope to win the world are no less astute. As CFR and Trilateralist strategist Richard N. Gardner pointed out some three years ago in an article in the CFR's publication Foreign Affairs, titled "The Hard Road to World Order":

"Just as world federalism and (UN) charter review now seem bankrupt of possibilities, so does the old-fashioned idea of 'world peace through world law' by means of a greatly strengthened International Court of Justice.... The hope for the foreseeable future lies, not in building up a few ambitious central institutions of universal membership and general jurisdiction as was envisaged at the end of the last war, but rather in the much more decentralized, disorderly and pragmatic process of inventing or adopting institutions of limited jurisdiction and selected membership to deal with specific problems on a case-by-case basis, as the necessity for cooperation is perceived by the relevant nations.... In short, the 'house of world order' will have to be built from the bottom up rather than from the top down." (Italics added).

This change in strategy led to the creation of the Trilateral Commission, and to its concept of "consultations" between nations on a "case-by-case basis" as the new plan for creating the New World Order and new world law.

Just as alternate plans had to be adopted at the world—or international—level, alternate plans also had to be prepared at the domestic—or national—level. To make our domestic law and social order conformable to the proposed new world law and social order, the Conspirators' Plan A called for a new Constitution—A Constitution for the New-States of America, which would be ratified at a Constitutional Convention called for that purpose.

However, inducing the people to scrap a revered document which has served them well when honored and obeyed, and take in its place an untried product prepared by a Corporate Socialist Elite, is a difficult task. The people might rebel, and the use of force might be required. However, the use of force is the very last, the ultimate step which the Elitists would want to take. As President Jimmy indicated in his first "fireside chat," he doesn't want to enslave the people by edict or Executive Order; he wants the people to ask him to lead them into slavery, voluntarily and because security seems better than liberty.

So, there will be no Constitutional Convention and no new Constitution for the New-States unless it can be made to appear that the people are demanding a new constitution. This means that there must be an alternate plan for installing this new form of government which will be conformable to the new World Government.

And what better alternate plan than to keep the present U.S. Constitution and amend it until it becomes a Corporate Socialist Document? The people are becoming accustomed to new Amendments. There have been eleven amendments ratified this century, seven since the inauguration of the New Deal; and several are presently being proposed or are about to be ratified. After all, didn't our first President, George Washington, advise that:

"If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed."

President Washington might have been referring to some future incident such as the illegal ratification of the 14th Amendment, when he spoke of change by usurpation. For this amendment has been used by the Elitist and their paid terrorist gangs to destroy the social order upon which this Nation was based. Or he might have had reference to the future, and possibly illegal, ratification of the proposed 27th, or Equal Rights Amendment.

While E.R.A. is hailed as an amendment that would "make women equal," actually it would centralize all power over everyone in the Federal Government and bring on an absolute, totalitarian government! It would complete what the illegal 14th Amendment began, and with the 27th Amendment made the law of the land there would be no need for any new Constitution!

Stated more simply and in the terms used at the beginning of this letter, to make our domestic government conformable to the proposed New World Order:

Plan A calls for the ratification of the Constitution for the Newstates of America.

Plan B calls for the ratification of the 27th, Equal Rights Amendment (E.R.A.).

Plan C calls for the President's declaration of a State of National Emergency and the invoking of Executive Order 11921, which would supersede the Constitution and all laws of the land pursuant thereto, and give total dictatorial powers to the President and his Elitist-controlled staff.

As a correspondent (a woman) writes: "The proposed 27th Amendment is just an old-fashioned power grab, all dollied up with a fresh coat of ERA paint, using 'concern for women's rights' as the gimmick to set up a dictatorship." Keep reading, and we'll show you how right she is.

The proposed 27th Amendment reads:

Section 1. "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex."

Section 2. "The Congress shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article."

Section 3. "This Amendment shall take effect two (2) years after the date of ratification."

That's the full wording of the proposed 27th Amendment. But it is not the full wording of the Amendment as it was first proposed. Section two has been changed. Until 1970, Section two read:

"Congress and the States shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article." (Italics added for emphasis.)

By eliminating the phrase "and the States" Section 2 of the proposed 27th Amendment becomes identical to Section 5 of the 14th, the anti-slavery amendment which was illegally (or perhaps we should say un-Constitutionally) ratified. Now, the Federal Courts have already ruled that these words in the 14th Amendment constitute an outright grant of all power from the States to the Federal Government to pass and enforce all laws referring to civil rights—and whatever laws any State might pass in regard to civil rights are automatically null and void if those laws are contrary to federal legislation or to federal court decrees!

Because the 14th Amendment says "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article," the federal courts have assumed jurisdiction to declare that there should be no school-prescribed prayers in public schools, that the courts shall set local school district limits, that the courts shall determine how students are to be bused away from schools in order to bring about court-ordered integration, that abortion should be legalized despite State laws. All this and more because the 14th Amendment is—however illegally—a part of the Constitution, and because it says "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

We repeat: The proposed 27th Amendment contains this same exact phrase, which we have called "The Poisoned Bait in the ERA Trap." The 14th has been called The Civil Rights Amendment because its poison has been confined, more or less, to this field. But the proposed 27th is a "peoples" amendment because, if you legislate for women, you are also legislating for men, for all people. Now, if the federal government is to legislate for all people in all fields where a difference in sex is involved; in marriage, divorce, employment, property rights, schools, hospitals, correctional institutions, parental authority, etc., etc., what power will remain to the State Governments? They might as well do away with legislatures and courts and become mere regional administrative departments of the all-powerful Federal Government!

So, you see, this proposed 27th Amendment is just a power-grab, an alternate plan for setting up a dictatorship and making our domestic government conformable to the proposed New World Order.

There are those who will say that we have overstressed the dangers of the proposed 27th because of the 10th Amendment, which reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

This means that the Federal government cannot take power from the States or the people. But it does not prevent the States from giving power to the Federal government. And in the case of an Amendment that is ratified by the States, power is not being taken by the Federal government, it is being given the Federal government by the States!

The apparent status of the proposed 27th Amendment as of February 4, 1977: If three more States ratify, the ERA becomes a part of the Constitution and therefore the law of the land. If this happens, it could be called an illegal ratification, for either of two reasons:

1) President Carter's wife Rosalynn, who wants to be a second Eleanor Roosevelt, may have acted illegally by telephoning and putting pressure on at least four Indiana State legislators to switch and vote for the proposed 27th Amendment. So that, recently, the State of Indiana approved by just one vote, the proposed 27th. This leaves three States to go, and with possibly illegal pressure from the Carters, Florida might go. The other States are expected to remain firmly against ratification.

2) Two States—Nebraska and Tennessee—have rescinded their original vote, which should leave five States to go. Also, some 16 other States are said to be trying to rescind their votes for ERA. And we are told that this is why the Carters started putting political pressure on State legislators: to get ERA passed before any more States can vote to rescind. Unfortunately for freedom lovers, such rescission means nothing in the eyes of the Supreme Court, which has taken the stand that—in simple language—once a State has granted certain powers to the Federal government, the State cannot be an Indian giver and take back the power. This means that once a State has voted for the proposed Amendment, that's that, the deed is done. But, a State may vote against ERA time after time, and the vote can still be changed.

Why have some 18 State legislatures either rescinded or tried to rescind their votes for ERA? Here are some of the things they discovered after more careful investigation:

When ERA was debated in the U.S. Senate, before it was passed and sent to the States for ratification "by three-fourths of the several States," at least nine important amendments to ERA were offered, and were rejected. Here are those amendments:

1065 would have exempted women from compulsory military service. It was defeated 73 to 18.

1066 would have exempted women from combat service in the military. It was defeated 71 to 18.

1067 would have maintained the existing legal protections and exemptions for women. It was defeated 75 to 11.

1068 would have maintained existing legal protections and exemptions for wives, mothers and widows. Defeated 77 to 14.

1069 would have maintained responsibility of fathers to support their children. It was defeated 72 to 17.

1070 would have maintained existing laws securing privacy for males and females. Defeated 79 to 11.

1071 would have maintained existing laws making sexual offenses punishable crimes. Defeated 71 to 17.

A72 would have recognized legally the "functional and psychological differences between sexes." Defeated 82 to 9.

1044 was essentially a combination of the previous eight amendments. Defeated 82 to 9.

From the above, it must be obvious that ERA intends that the women of this country shall be exactly like their sisters in the Soviet Union and in Israel, to have "equal rights" with the men. Women will have to work side by side with men, digging ditches, fighting no-win wars, turning their children over to the State so they'll be able to enjoy the equal right to work in mines and mills. In a paper by Evelyn Pitschke, Attorney at Law in Indianapolis, which was published by the National Defense Committee of the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, the following summary is given:

"Even if the ERA would solve all of the many problems which sincere but uninformed proponents of the ERA mistakenly believe it would solve; even if it had all the virtues claimed for it, it is also cursed with Section 2 which is designed to change our American form of government. The two parts of the Amendment are inseparable—it must be accepted by the States in exactly the same form in which it was passed on to the States by Congress—there is no taking of the good and eliminating the bad—it is all or nothing at all. It is for this reason that educated and informed State legislatures are turning 'thumbs down' on the ERA. It is for this reason that I ask you to turn 'thumbs down' on the ERA."

THE MAN WHO PRETENDS TO BE PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD

WORLD GOVERNMENT OR WORLD EMPIRE?

According to tradition, when a man is sworn in as President of the United States, his first obligation and duty should be to the people who elected him to be their leader. But, as soon as Jimmy Carter took office, he began to act as though his first duty was to the people of the world, to the people he was not elected to represent. He seemed to assume that he had been given a mandate to act as caretaker of the world. Before Walter Mondale had even moved his family into the palace assigned to the Vice President of the United States, he was sent off on a mission to visit the heads of state of all the nations having representation in the Trilateral Commission. Apparent reasons for the quickie grand tour: to assure the industrial nations of Western Europe and Japan that the Rockefeller Cabal still directed the trade and traffic, that business as usual could be expected to continue even if Italy "went communist," and that Trilateralist Carter would visit them in person in the spring when NATO next convened.

Having dispatched Mondale on his appointed rounds, Carter next waited anxiously for Senate confirmation of fellow-Georgian and Martin Luther Kingman Anthony Young, as U.S. Ambassador to the UN. Then, Carter sent Young off immediately to Africa, to reassure the revolutionaries and terrorists that the United States would back them up with everything but the U.S. Marines, and that to show good will, Carter would get the Byrd Act revoked so that America's only source of chromium would be the second-grade stuff that Soviet Russia was anxious to sell.

Having bid bon voyage to fellow-traveler Young, Carter then told Cyrus Vance to get his new State Department offices in order so he'd be able to make a trip posthaste to the Middle East where he is to have a try at picking up where former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger left off in the latter's attempts to bring peace to Araby and prosperity to Israeli.

Next, Sol Linowitz would join Ellsworth Bunker (the man who arranged our surrender to the Communists in Vietnam) and together they would restore trade, aid and diplomatic relations with Cuba, complete the giveaway of the Panama Canal to a Communist Dictator, and otherwise assist in the Communization of Central and South America.

Next, Special Ambassador Elliot Richardson—a hangover from the Ford Administration—would be sent to Cyprus to reassure the Turks and the Greeks. Then, next month Vance will be off to Moscow to set the stage for Disarmament Chief-designate Paul Warnke who, if confirmed by the Senate, will arrange for some unilateral disarming of the United States in order to make it very certain that Soviet Russia can claim military superiority over the United States and back up the claim if called upon to do so.

Finally, Carter wants to visit Red China personally and reassure the rulers of that slave state, let them know that we shall not interfere with their take-over of the rest of East Asia, so long as they keep hands off Japan, which is a part of Rockefeller's Trilateral Regional Arrangement, and must not be considered as a part of Asia. Just what fate is in store for Australia and New Zealand if Carter's restructuring of the world succeeds, is not clear at this point in time. As for Canada, Trudeau is to visit Carter and they'll get together on details.

In short, Carter is to remake the world politically, because the Elitists are busy reshaping it economically and monetarily, and the three must agree if the New World Order is to be established and maintained. This means that Carter's message to the rest of the world is one of good cheer, but to the United States it brings tidings of austerity, belt-tightening and a reduced standard of living; this being based on an alleged energy shortage.

However, this austerity and belt-tightening is not to be visited upon those officials that Carter needs to assure the success of his programs. U.S. Congressmen, all Federal Judges, and all top-rung Bureaucrats are to receive whopping pay raises. Department under secretaries—the people who make all programs succeed or fail, and whose jobs are protected through the Civil Service system—will have their salaries raised from $44,600 to $57,500 per year. Federal Dis-strict Judges, with lifetime jobs, are to have their pay elevated from $42,000 to $54,500. Circuit Court Judges will be upped from $44,600 to $57,500. Speaker of the House Tip O'Neal currently makes only $65,600 a year, so he'll have his base pay raised to $75,000. The average run-of-the-mill lawmaker gets $44,500 a year; his salary will be upped to $57,500. However, figuring the cost-of-living increases which take place in October each year, Congressmen should be making over $60,000 a year by the next election.

We repeat: Senators, Representatives, Federal Judges, and top-level Bureaucrats are the people Carter needs to carry out his programs. And they all are to receive pay increases. Although Jerry Ford proposed the pay hikes while yet President, he conferred with President-elect Jimmy Carter who approved the idea.

There is, however, the probability that Carter is moving too fast and too brashly, this in the foreign field especially. The U.S. News & World Report, which is more level-headed than its newsmagazine competitors, pointed out, and we quote:

"Carter is buying future trouble by sounding off on tricky foreign issues. Contradictory, off-hand statements by top Administration officials are giving major U.S. allies a bad case of the nerves. American experts fear the inconsistency shows lack of savvy in international affairs. Most troublesome—

- * Carter's statement that a strategic-arms treaty should not be blocked by disputes over limiting U.S. cruise missiles and Soviet Backfire bombers. But Secretary of State Vance is taking another tack: He prefers no treaty at all to one without constraints on the new generation of weapons.
- * U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young's widely publicized opinion that America should recognize—perhaps give financial aid to—North Vietnam. Vance quickly shot that down, but Young followed it with the view that—
- * Cuban troops sent by Castro on Kremlin orders had brought stability to Angola. State Department insisted that outside troops don't bring peace.
- * Carter's declaration for an instant and complete end to all nuclear testing. That is shaking up the Europeans. They see constantly improving U.S. nuclear devices as the major shield against a Russian invasion. Also, Carter's words show little understanding of the three-cornered balancing act of the U.S., Russia, China. (Kissinger's Trilateral Constellation—Ed.) Last thing China wants is a nuclear weak United States." (unquote).

Adding to Carter's woes in the foreign field, according to U.S. News & World Report of February 14, is his naming of "soft-boiled men to key jobs dealing with national security." There was Ted Sorensen who withdrew his name because of Senate opposition. The Senate probably will confirm Paul Warnke but "opponents will look with supercritical eyes at anything Warnke offers in negotiations with the Soviets. Critics will promote sharp debates."

However, the man who is going to cause the greatest embarrassment to Carter is Andrew Young. The President praised Young as the "best public servant I have ever known." This in spite of the fact that at the Senate confirmation hearings a 1970 ABC-TV interview with Young was replayed, with Young commenting on the Black Panther party in these words:

"Western technology and Western militarism so interfered with the right or the possibility of, say, democracy in Latin America, or real freedom in Africa and Asia, that it may take the destruction—and this of course is panther ideology—that it may take the destruction of Western civilization to allow the rest of the world to really emerge as a free and brotherly society...."

Asked to comment, Young did not deny that he had made this statement, nor did he say that he felt any differently today. However, the Senate confirmed Young, who checked in at UN Headquarters, and then flew to Africa on a fact-finding mission for the man who regarded him so highly as a public servant.

And how is he behaving as a public servant? The following editorial comment by Budd Boyer of the Fort Lauderdale, Florida Sun-Sentinel provides a rather mild, but also an illuminating answer to that question.

Newly appointed U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Andrew Young has wasted little time in beginning to stomp on the world scene for programs he cherished and supported as a congressman from Georgia's 5th District. Although there was negligible opposition in the Senate, Mr. Young's departure from his congressional reputation as a "man of sweet reason" could well be causing some futile after-thoughts on the part of a number of his confirmation supporters.

One of his first official actions was to announce his intention to bring pressure on the Congress, with the support of the Carter Administration, to increase American payments for aid to developing countries. The United States already contributes 20 per cent of the present fund.

After presenting his credentials at the UN, Mr. Young left almost immediately on a trip to Africa for meetings with black nationalist leaders in several nations. Once there, he very quickly erased any doubts as to the fact that he is prepared to take the U.S. off center and into the nationalist camp in dealing with South Africa and Rhodesia. Arriving in Zanzibar, the ambassador rode beneath arches bearing slogans such as "Our mother is the Afro-Shirazy party, our father is the revolution." Speaking shortly after arrival, he said he did not "really care what whites (in Africa) think" of his support for black nationalist movements. In another comment, Mr. Young said he could "almost guarantee" repeal of the Byrd Amendment under which the U.S. buys Rhodesian chrome...."

President Carter said in his "fireside chat" that he is committed to majority rule for blacks in Africa. He sent Mr. Young on this fact-finding mission to gather information with which to bolster this commitment. It is of more than passing interest to note the places where the "facts" are being found... Zanzibar, now a part of Tanzania, ousted Americans in 1964, and in a bloodbath slaughtered all Arabs there. The government has taken over or controls all banks, and church schools.

Nigeria is another "interesting" spot for facts. It has a large army, trained and equipped by the Soviet Union. In 1966, less than three years after becoming a republic, rival factions engaged in some of the bloodiest conflicts ever witnessed on the African continent. Raging into 1970, the wars saw more than a million people die, mostly Biafrans who simply wanted to determine their own tribal destinies. The country is under a military dictatorship, with the most recent coup of a number undertaken since 1966 taking place less than a year ago....

What facts Mr. Young will bring back remains to be seen. When he returned from a recent trip to South Africa, he made the sarcastic observation that he "felt very much at home there." He said it was just like traveling in Mississippi, Alabama or Georgia "when I was a child."

Sounding more like an agent than a diplomat, Mr. Young gives every indication that he will step up the momentum of American involvement in Africa, and the direction is clear. (Unquote).

It may seem strange that a President of the United States would state publicly that this agent Andrew Young is the best public servant that he has ever known. But, then, it isn't so strange when one recalls how that same President will use his daughter as a political football, even "justifying" crime by employing an admitted and convicted murderess who hasn't yet served her full sentence or been pardoned, to act as a nursemaid to that same daughter.

It is noteworthy that while U.S. Ambassador Young was busily gathering "facts," black terrorists decided to stage an "enlistment drive," possibly to impress the black U.S. Ambassador, who might in this way be reminded of his "traveling in Mississippi, Alabama or Georgia when I was a child." So, they kidnapped 400 African children from a mission school, took them across the border into terrorist sanctuary, where witch doctors and terrorist disciplinarians talked the majority of the children into becoming terrorist recruits. By the time the parents arrived to take their children home, most of the young recruits were afraid to go home, possibly because of what might happen to their families if they refused to join the terrorist band.

"Terrorists are recruited by kidnapping and disciplined by torture," says C.W. Porter, a young American who travelled throughout Southern Africa and then came home to write about his experiences in a booklet, "The Truth About Rhodesia" (obtainable from the author: C.W. Porter, 272 Grace Drive, South Pasadena, CA 91030, 36 pages, $1.00). Speaking of the power of witch doctors and evil spirits, Porter writes:

"If he (an African) is told he will wake up next week with a paralyzed arm, he will wake up next week with a paralyzed arm. If he is told he will die next week, he will lie down next week and die, if he is sufficiently frightened. A policeman told me that his grandfather had succeeded in murdering a troublesome African on his farm simply by convincing the man that he would die as predicted in a vision. The man obligingly proceeded to do just that...."

"The average uneducated African," says Porter, "has six or eight children...he is not interested in politics. He wants the whites to stay because he wants a job, which he knows can only be supplied directly or indirectly by the whites. He wants to buy a bicycle, a new shirt, and a new pair of shoes. He does not want to be murdered en masse by members of another tribe. He does not want to be paralyzed by having a sharpened bicycle spoke jabbed in his spine. An African wrote to me in England and said,

'As you know, Mozambique is in the hands of Africans and the future for us Rhodesians is very uncertain'."

It seems that those who really care for the Africans want the whites to stay.

And yet, by some perverted logic, when three priests and four nuns are brutally murdered by terrorists for no apparent reason, the Rhodesian government is blamed for the atrocity. And, as a follow-up to the horror, "the Roman Catholic bishops of southern Africa called for sweeping changes to avert more bloodshed." A statement issued by the bishops "urged a sharing of power between South Africa's 4.5 million whites and its 18 million blacks, condemned alleged police brutality, and vowed to promote black leadership within the church."

It would appear that the Catholic bishops of South Africa have allied themselves with the hierarchy of the World Council of Churches, and with the British and American governments in believing, with Andrew Young, and the Black Panthers, that "it may take the destruction of Western civilization to allow the rest of the world to really emerge as a free and brotherly society."

Let's face a few facts: Since the creation of this movement to get the people of Asia and Africa to emerge as a free and brotherly society, the people of those continents have suffered more than they ever suffered when they were looked upon as "the white man's burden." Let's take a quick look at the new map of Africa:

UGANDA. This was Britain's model colony. But when the British officials left and turned the country over to the Africans, whole tribes were exterminated. Up to a quarter of a million people are known to have been slaughtered. Idi Amin had himself named president for life in 1976, seized all foreign-owned property, completed the expulsion of the 45,000 Indians and Pakistanis who were the chief remaining business and professional men. Amin's latest escapade: he wanted to come to the United States and show Jimmy Carter how to run the country.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC. Formerly a French colony, now a dependency of Red China. President for life claims to be a witch doctor. When prisons became overcrowded with political prisoners, the condition was relieved by having all the inmates murdered.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA. Formerly a Spanish colony. Also ruled by a president-for-life, Masie Nguema Biyoga. Slavery was re-instituted and 22,000 Africans are said to be engaged in forced labor on the government's cocoa plantations. The entire literate population is in exile.

NIGERIA. At least two million Africans killed in civil wars and military coups.

RWANDA. 100,000 Watusi exterminated by Hutu tribesmen. The tall Hamitic Watusi became extinct.

Need we continue? The picture only gets worse. Only in the Republics of Rhodesia and South Africa is there any real freedom. And the whole world is being incited to demand and approve of the destruction of these two remaining outposts of hope for "a free and brotherly society in Africa."

Why? They tell us it is for "humanistic" reasons. But is it humanistic to promote mass murders and a return to savagery?

Is it not more logical to assume that the real reason for destroying Rhodesia and South Africa—and Western civilization if the need arises—comes from a desire on the part of Elite Cartelists to realign the world economically? There is vast wealth in gold, diamonds, chromium, copper, uranium, oil; you name it and it's somewhere in Africa. There is also almost unlimited slave labor to reap the riches.

But an economic realignment is necessary; and such an economic realignment of the world also calls for a political realignment of the world. And the Elitists who control the Trilateral Commission, the Bilderberg Group, the Council on Foreign Relations, and similar organizations of Old World origin—yes, and the Communist Parties of the World—these Elitists have chosen Jimmy Carter to act as their agent in realigning the world politically!

That is why his first official act was to send Mondale to the Trilateral Nations, then Young to Africa, Vance to the Middle East, Linowitz to Latin America, Richardson to the Mediterranean, etc.

And this is also why Carter prepares a reorganization plan for the Federal government of the United States, and forbids the United States Congress the right to oversee the program. No wonder Congressman Jack Brooks, Chairman of the House Reorganization Committee, said that "President Carter will stand the Constitution on its head if he reorganizes the Federal government without the advice and consent of Congress."

WHO IS MESSING UP THE WEATHER?

A REAL COLD WAR WEAPON?

Last month was the coldest January in at least 177 years, says the National Weather Service. Furthermore, if February temperatures live up to expectations and March also continues below normal, "this winter would be the coldest since the founding of the Republic," the service said.

In addition to the bitter cold, there is the crop-killing drought. An AP report from Olympia, Washington illustrates the seriousness of the situation:

"In the midst of the Northwest's worst drought in years, Idaho has warned Washington not to try The Great Rain Robbery.

"Oregon and Washington governors fear 76,000 farm jobs will be lost, along with $1.6 billion worth of crops, because drought has left reservoirs and rivers almost dry. Some Washington officials are asking the state to try a $125,000 cloudseeding project over the almost snowless Cascade Mountains. But inland states like Idaho and Montana get much of their moisture from the same clouds off the Pacific Ocean that drop snow and rain on Washington and Oregon. Idaho Attorney General Wayne Kidwell has warned that his state will go to court to prevent rain rustling... what would be good for Washington's potential drought could be even more detrimental to Idaho's pending crisis...."

Of the 48 contiguous States, 41 are victims of the cold, the other seven are parched. Results: misery, death to many, hundreds of industries shut down, hundreds of thousands of people added to the governments' unemployment compensation and food stamp lists, higher food prices, galloping inflation, an energy crisis, and more...

There are those who will consider it an Act of God. Others will blame it on ecological crimes committed by destroyers of forests and wetlands, builders of highrises and concrete deserts where gardens and grass once grew. But there is something unusual about this particular weather situation. We are told by those who ought to know that this year's weather was caused by a strange and unnatural shift in the world's upper air streams; that this phenomenon brought on both the bitter cold and the crop-killing drought. We are told that the streams of air that usually blow across the continent from the Pacific Ocean, bringing needed moisture and moderate winter weather, didn't blow as usual this winter. Instead, the winds came roaring down from the Arctic, across Canada, freezing the East both North and South, and parching the Northwest. And there are allegations that this was no Act of God, no carelessness of man, but a deliberately planned program of weather changing on the part of a group of men who want to use the weather as a weapon with which to win the world!

Fantastic? Perhaps. But permit us to quote from several articles that have appeared in several generally respected publications. First, from the Dow Jones & Co.'s The National Observer for the week ending Feb. 19, 1977:

WHAT ARE THE RUSSIANS UP TO?

...Since July the Soviet Union has been conducting mysterious, high-frequency radio experiments that have disrupted some international communications. The Russians admit they're testing something, but they won't say just what. And if anyone in the United States knows what's going on, he isn't broadcasting it to inquiring reporters. But speculation abounds, in government and without, in this country and abroad. And at times the theories sound more like science fiction than science. Depending on who's speculating, the Soviets are believed to be:

- * Working on an over-the-horizon radar...
- * Developing a Buck Rogers style weapon..
- * Experimenting with weather modification.
- * Trying to perfect a wireless system of transmitting electricity....

Russian scientists have tried innovative weather-modification techniques in the past, including using rockets and heavy artillery to fire lead-iodide crystals into storm clouds to reduce hail. Thus the question, are the Russians attempting to change the weather by changing the electrical activity of storm clouds or the ionosphere?

"The idea of changing the conductivity of the atmosphere as a weather-modification experiment isn't ridiculous,' says Walter Orr Roberts of the Aspen Institute in Colorado. a solar astronomer, Roberts has studied the relationship between the sun's 'solar wind' of charged particles and the earth's weather. ... a few theorists argue that changes in the earth's ionosphere—a region of charged particles that begins about 20 miles above the earth—influence the formation of storms. Powerful radio signals can heat the ionosphere and change its electrical activity to some degree...." (end of quotes)

Adding considerable credence to the foregoing is an article by Stephen M. Aug of the Washington Star. The article also appeared in the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner of Feb. 1, 1977. It is from this latter publication that we shall quote.

Under the banner headline, "Russ Power Breakthrough?" the article suggests that Russian scientists may have picked up where the Yugoslav inventor Nikola Tesla left off due to his death in 1943, in his experiments in transmitting electricity without the use of wires. This technique could easily be adapted for weather control on a worldwide basis, according to other scientists, especially Tesla's former assistant, Arthur H. Matthews, who now lives in Quebec.

OOPS! -- --

In last week's Report (2/11/77) we erred; twice. On page one we referred to Andrew Young being sent to Africa and we mistakenly called him "Anthony" Young. Our sincere apologies to all the real Anthonies in the world.

Also, we wrote that Elliot Richardson was being sent to Cyprus. However, for political reasons, Elliot was scratched and Clark Clifford was sent instead.

Finally, and disturbing to a number of our subscribers, was an error that appeared in our Report #3 (1/21/77). We said that the book The Crisis of Democracy could be purchased from The Trilateral Commission. But letters sent to the address we gave were returned, rubberstamped, "not deliverable as addressed, return to sender."

That happened because we copied without double-checking, and the wrong street address was given. TLC headquarters on 46th, not 45th Street; and the correct address is: The Trilateral Commission, 345 46th Street, New York, N.Y. 10017.

-- -- SORRY!

Here are selected excerpts from this important article by Stephen M. Aug:

RUSS POWER BREAKTHROUGH?

Have the Russians learned how to transmit electric power without the use of wires? ... a number of Canadians...are speculating that the Russians may have accomplished that feat. (They contend that the Russians may be experimenting with a long-disused process developed by Nikola Tesla, the Yugoslav inventor who died in 1943. In what he considered his most important discovery, Tesla in 1900 proved that the earth could be used as a conductor and would be as responsive as a tuning fork to electrical vibrations of a certain pitch. His experiments succeeded in lighting 200 electric lamps from a distance of 25 miles without wires. ...Tesla gave a number of possible uses for his equipment, including power transmission, geological exploration, national defense and weather modification. But much of Tesla's work was never completed, and his ideas remain in his notebooks which are on file in the Tesla Museum in Belgrade.

Fueling the Canadians' speculation is the report that a Soviet scientist—so far unidentified—spent several months in Quebec occasionally interviewing Tesla's last known living assistant, Arthur H. Matthews....

Questions concerning the possibilities of the Russian experiments were brought to the Canadian Department of Communications last winter...U.S. scientists working with the Canadian group seem to give credence to the view of what the Russians may have achieved. One of them is Andrija Puharich of Ossining, N.Y., a one-time physician who gave up medical practice some years ago and has devoted the past 25 years to a study of Tesla's work and electronic experimentation....He termed "a most important lead" word of the Russian scientist's visits to Matthews. "Very few people have ever heard of Mr. Matthews," Puharich said. "You really have to be a super-esoteric in the field to know of his existence. So the fact that a Russian sought him out I felt of great interest."

Puharich would not rule out the possibility that the Russians may be using Tesla's theories for weather modification. "I think they have a lot of reasons to do it," Puharich said, pointing out that the Russians would like to push their cold Arctic air mass elsewhere — perhaps toward America — and increase their own agricultural growing season.

According to persons knowledgeable about

Tesla's theories, weather modification would be accomplished by regulating the movement of electrically charged particles in the upper atmosphere resulting in changes in the jet stream (thus causing winter winds to blow across the United States from the Arctic instead of the Pacific—Ed.)”

(end of quotes)

The foregoing would suggest that the Russians have discovered—and are using—a new weapon against the United States, a weapon that has paralyzed much of the Nation's industrial potential, destroyed billions of dollars worth of crops, and reduced energy resources to the poverty level.

However, before blaming all this on the Soviet scientists (who probably would have required the assistance of specialists from the Trilateralist Nations in order to accomplish such a technological success), let us consider some other evidence. There is always the possibility that some other group is doing the dirty work and blaming it on the most likely suspect, the Communists.

A very interesting column by Lowell Ponte appeared in the January 21, 1974 issue of the Oakland Tribune. Interest is added because the article was published three years ago, and then a blackout descended and the subject matter became shrouded in silence, at least within the circles of the controlled communications media. Here are excerpts:

READJUST CLIMATE TO SAVE FUEL OIL

...Until now we have thought only in terms of turning down our thermostats and praying for a mild winter. But our science and technology might offer a different solution: we may be able to readjust the climate itself. . . . Apparently we are able to stop rain in some places. Last year (1973) Honduras and El Salvador, two Central American nations, complained loud and long in the United Nations that U.S. weather modification operations off the Florida coast (cloud seeding in attempts to prevent or deflect hurricanes—Ed.) had robbed them of vital rain water. Apparently we are able to manipulate weather for military purposes. Last July the Senate overwhelmingly passed a resolution by Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., demanding an end to weather warfare work by the Pentagon. . . . When Pell, as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asked for information on the extent of weather war research, his request was denied on grounds of "national security."

And apparently our government thinks in bigger weather modification terms than the public knows. As this column documented last April (1973-Ed.) the joint U.S.-Soviet study of the Bering Sea off Alaska begun last February has been undertaken to evaluate whether a 56-mile Soviet-American dam will be built across the Bering Strait between our two countries. Such a dam, experts in both nations believe, would make weather in both nations warmer and crop growing seasons longer in the Soviet Union and the United States. . . .

But this scheme . . . raises serious questions inasmuch as the world weather system is self-stabilizing; to make weather warmer one place will likely make it colder someplace else; to make it rain more in one place likely will cause drought someplace else. Such weather manipulation opens the door to a thicket of international legal and moral questions — including a nation's "right" to accustomed weather (drought last year caused panic in Japan and North Africa), and what sorts of weather modification are acts of war?

That by blocking arctic currents off our West Coast . . . could change weather seems certain. The guess is that it might make Portland, Ore., as warm as Southern California, and turn the desert around Los Angeles into a rain forest. (On the other hand, blocking the Pacific jet stream and allowing only the arctic currents to blow, might make Portland a desert and bring the Arctic to Ohio and snow to Southern Florida—Ed.)

If columnist Lowell Ponte had his facts straight when he wrote the foregoing, then it would seem unfair to blame this winter weather on the Russians. If weather manipulation is the cause, then it may have been a joint-effort, a U.S.-Soviet experiment that froze some of the world and brought drought to other parts of the world.

There is much evidence to back up the charge that human attempts at weather manipulation have already caused great damage and distress. For example, the Tristate Natural Weather Association, Inc. has been studying the effects of cloud seeding over the past 25 years, and it has evidence to indicate that:

- (1) Seeding during wet periods creates terrible downwind floods;
- (2) Seeding during dry cycles creates deserts; and
- (3) Seeding creates havoc with all normal weather phenomena.

(For more information on cloud seeding contact Tristate Natural Weather Association, Inc., Route 1, St. Thomas, PA 17252).

WEATHER MANIPULATION AND THE ENERGY CRISIS

From the evidence we have presented in this Report, it might be possible to reach any one of several conclusions. It might be assumed that —

- 1) Weather manipulation is being used as a weapon of war by the Soviet, to weaken the United States and her potential for defense.
- 2) Weather manipulation is a joint effort on the part of the United States and the Soviet Union but, as has been the case with other joint efforts conducted "in the spirit of detente," the Soviet has taken advantage of our official "gullibility" (or treason on the part of some officials), and is getting the better of the deal (witness the normal weather in Russia's industrial districts, and the freeze-up in our industrial States).
- 3) Weather manipulation is being conducted by agencies of our own Federal government with the best of intentions, but the program has backfired, bringing unintended damage, suffering and expense. Or —
- 4) Weather manipulation has been used by an elitist group, deliberately to "create" an energy crisis, to propagandize the people into demanding the Federal take-over of all energy sources, production, distribution and use. This would bring about, through public demand, centralized dictatorial control over the sale, purchase and use of gasoline, fuel oils, other petroleum products, coal, natural gas, electricity, etc.

Those readers who may have come to the last, conclusion number four, will look with suspicion on the action announced Feb. 10 by Senator Charles Percy of Illinois, on behalf of President Jimmy Carter, Consumer Tyrant Ralph Nader, ex-President Gerald Ford, Hubert Humphrey, David and Lawrence Rockefeller, and assorted CFR, Bilderberg and Trilateral Commission members.

In the U.S. Senate on Feb. 10, 1977, Sen. Percy, on behalf of Sen. Humphrey and himself, issued a statement regarding the formation of the Alliance to Save Energy, and supporting statements by President Carter and Ralph Nader. Percy said: "Record cold temperatures this winter should awaken us to the need to make saving energy the nation's top domestic priority.... One of our chief tasks is to convince every American—homeowners, apartment-dwellers, motorists, business leaders, labor union officials, government officials—that it is actually far less expensive in the long run to invest to save energy than it is to purchase energy."

This Alliance to Save Energy (ASE) is supposed to be a private, non-governmental organization. But, Vice President Walter Mondale is one of two honorary chairmen; Senators Percy and Humphrey are co-chairmen; Energy Tsar James Schlesinger is honorary adviser to the board of directors; there is an advisory board with Henry Kissinger as its chairman, House Speaker Tip O'Neill and Minority Leader John Rhodes are honorary vice-chairmen, and on this advisory board are HUD Secretary Patricia Harris, Commerce Secretary Juanita Kreps, Labor Secretary Ray Marshall, Transportation Secretary Brock Adams; and —

"The Advisory Board... will also include 10 regional chairpersons, coinciding with the 10 Federal regions, who will oversee the programs of the 50 State Chairpersons."

To those who are familiar with the concept of Regional Governance the preceding direct quote from a joint statement by Sens. Percy and Humphrey, should give the whole show away without further comment.

Also on the Advisory Board of ASE are 27 additional U.S. Senators, several ambassadors, Frank Zarb of FEA, and other federal government officials. Yet this is called a private, non-partisan alliance, and President Carter welcomed it as such, adding that "there is a new, inexpensive and accessible energy resource: conservation energy. Conservation energy is the energy derived by replacement of wasteful habits and technology with more efficient ones" (a direct quote).

Also on the ASE Advisory Board are the two Rockefeller brothers, John Gardner of Common Cause, Philip Klutznick, Sol Linowitz, George Meany, Leonard Woodcock, Peter Peterson of Lehman Brothers, and others of similar suasion.

In this age of credibility gaps, charges that the energy crises of this decade are phony, that the central theme of the so-called "Insiders" is to bring about the New World Order by 1980 at the latest; is it any wonder that there is great doubt and uncertainty in the minds of those who can discern the times? Is it surprising that people suspect this coldest winter in 177 years that visited 41 States, and the concurrent driest season in all recorded history that came upon seven other States, to be not Acts of God, but Acts of Man posing as God?

WHEN CONSPIRACY BECOMES RESPECTABLE CONSPIRATORS RULE THE NATION OPENLY

CLANDESTINE OPERATIONS BECOME OVERT ACTIONS

"Trilateralists at Top—New Foreign-Policy Elite." So reads the heading of a full-page article in the U.S. News & World Report of February 21, 1977. And thereby hangs a tale of unusual change in the strategy of those who are promoting the New World Order. For years they worked secretly and in secret, shunned publicity, and seemed to maintain the attitude that the public-at-large was too dumb to understand and appreciate the New World Order that they were building; therefore, silence was the best policy.

There was, for example, The Council on Foreign Relations, which was incorporated in 1921, began to have real power and influence in shaping U.S. foreign policy as early as the 1930s, took control of the U.S. State Department in 1942. Members of the CFR, in cooperation with Soviet diplomats, created the United Nations, as well as its companion agencies, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. CFR agents, acting as appointed officials of the U.S. Government, waged a cold war against the Communists, then pursued a policy of containment, finally fashioned a policy of detente. Meanwhile, CFR members or agents guided the United States through two disastrous no-win wars, in Korea and Southeast Asia.

All of these activities, which weakened the power of and respect for the United States while strengthening the power and influence of the Communist bloc and enlarging the areas dominated by the Communists, were directed or greatly influenced by members of the CFR.

And yet, despite its power, for nearly forty years, the CFR remained virtually unknown to the general public!

Likewise the Bilderberg Group. Organized in 1954, this clandestine cabal has held meetings at least once every year since then. But participants are pledged to secrecy, lists of those attending are closely guarded. Reporters are barred but top media executives are invited. These Bilderbergers are leaders from countries of the so-called "Atlantic Community," they are all inter-nationalists and unusual things seem to happen at the international level after each meeting.

Yet, this powerful cabal was virtually unknown to the general public until a few months ago when Prince Bernhard, its host, got into trouble by taking bribes, and the story of his connection with the Bilderberg Group hit the front pages of newspapers around the world.

How unusual, then, that the latest of these Rockefeller dominated groups should get so much publicity. The Trilateral Commission was organized in 1973, but unlike its sister conspiracies, the CFR and the Bilderberg Group, the TLC has received wide publicity almost from the start of its intrigues and machinations.

It is as though the conspirators have become so powerful and so well entrenched in the visible government that secrecy is no longer necessary. The fact that Jimmy Carter was a Trilateralist was published by the controlled media before election day, as was the news that he was being educated in foreign affairs by Brzezinski, Gardner, and a stable of experts from Brookings Institute. After the election, such "papers of record" as The New York Times and The Washington Post reported that Trilateralists were being appointed to top positions in the Carter Administration. And now, to present the Trilateral Commission as an organization that is worthy of all respect and public trust, the one newsweekly that is looked upon as being, if not conservative at least objective, U.S. News & World Report tells its readers that the Trilateralists "have taken charge of foreign-policy making in the Carter Administration, and already the immense power they wield is sparking some controversy.... Altogether, 16 high posts in the Administration are held by men and women associated with that organization." But we are told not to worry about this because—and here comes the whitewash:

"The powerful role of Trilateralists in Washington has important implications for U.S. diplomacy, but not for the reasons cited by those who see conspiracies at work. American foreign policy will be influenced most significantly by the fact that Trilateralists share a common approach on these issues: 1. Unity of the Western Alliance has paramount importance, far more so than U.S. relations with Russia and China.

2. Co-operation with the 'third world' is crucial—and must replace the kind of confrontation that characterized much of the Kissinger period.

3. Economic expansion in the U.S. and a materially faster rate of economic growth in Japan and West Germany are regarded as essential to stimulate recovery worldwide."

If these three issues were the sum total of the Trilateralists' aims, then those of us who "see conspiracies at work" could relax and quit worrying about the future of our country—which is precisely what the Trilateralists want us to do. But U.S.N.&W.R.'s summation falls far short of the truth when we realize that the Trilateralists are also interested in, and have written or are busy writing, reports on subjects whose very titles betray their intent. Here are the titles of reports that have been or are about to be issued by the Trilateral Commission:

1. Towards a Renovated World Monetary System.
2. The Crisis of International Cooperation.
3. A Turning Point in North-South Economic Relations.
4. Directions for World Trade in the Nineteen-Seventies.
5. Energy: The Imperative for a Trilateral Approach.
6. Energy: A Strategy for International Action.
7. OPEC, the Trilateral World, and the Developing Countries: New Arrangements for Cooperation, 1976-1980.
8. The Crisis of Democracy.
9. A New Regime for the Oceans.
10. Commodities issues.
11. International Institutions.
12. Trilateral Consultative Procedures.
13. Constructive Global Involvement of the Communist Countries.
14. The Renovated International System.

Of these reports, number 8, "The Crisis of Democracy" has aroused the greatest storm of protest. Prof. Walter Dean Burnham of MIT summarized the central theme of the book-length report when he wrote that its authors "have opted for an image of the political state which makes a clear choice in favor of elites and their claims to authority. The end which they appear to have in view is the creation of a 'hard' state centered in authoritative decisions made by executive elites, working in tandem with technocrats inside and outside the official bureaucracy, and with effective insulation from the demands of an unruly and ungrateful public."

Here, in rather stilted but not uncertain terms, is a clear call for the creation of a Dictatorship of the Elite, to replace our present representative republican form. This is the purpose behind the Trilateral Commission's selection and promotion of Jimmy Carter for the Presidency of the United States. While building the New World Order abroad, the establishment of an all-powerful Executive Department, operated by Elites, is the program for America!

This is far different from the placid picture painted by U.S. News & World Report, and by most other articles appearing in the controlled, commercial press. These articles tell us some of the truth, but never the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Of a different nature was an important and revealing article which appeared in the February 7, 1977 issue of The Christian Science Monitor. While this article says nothing of the political aims of the Trilateralists, it says much of their economic goals. Here are important excerpts from that article:

NEW WORLD ECONOMIC SYSTEM DAWNS

From the ashes of Bretton Woods, Carter's proposed summit could give the Trilateral Commission a sendoff for its vision of a prosperous, stable planet.

By Jeremiah Novak

In July, 1944, brilliant British economist John Maynard Keynes and a younger American colleague, equally brilliant, strolled over the grounds of the resort hotel at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, explaining to reporters the basics of an about-to-be born international economic system. Ironically, neither Keynes, who died three years later, nor colleague Harry Dexter White, who committed suicide in 1948 after being charged with treason, lived to see the fruits of their labor—a new and revolutionary economic system known as Bretton Woods.

For the system they had begun to piece together in 1942 was to result, over the 27 years of its existence, in a truly altered international economic picture: a world without empires, a world of free trade at non-discriminatory terms, and an era of material prosperity far greater than any the world had ever known.

But Bretton Woods died in 1971, and until now nothing has taken its place.

Today a new crop of economists, working in an organization known as the Trilateral Commission, is on the verge of creating a new international economic system, one designed by men as brilliant as Keynes and White. Their names are not as well known, but these modern thinkers are as important to our age as Keynes and White were to theirs. Moreover, these economists, like their World War II counterparts, are working closely with high government officials, in this case President Jimmy Carter and Vice-President Walter Mondale. And what is now being discussed at the highest levels of government, in both the United States and abroad, is the creation of a new world economic system....

In the dark days of World War II... men such as Eddie Bernstein, Will Clayton, John Maynard Keynes and Harry Dexter White created ... at Bretton Woods the framework of three major world economic institutions: the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank, and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)....

But the Bretton Woods system... collapsed in 1971.... In 1973, a group of businessmen, under the leadership of David Rockefeller, set out to restore the principles of free trade and stable exchange rates.... They formed an organization called the Trilateral Commission....

In essence, the commission has devised a plan to totally renovate GATT, the IMF, and the World Bank. The plan would create a world economic system far different from that of Bretton Woods. The commission has published 13 pamphlets detailing the proposed system: a new IMF, a new General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, a new General Agreement on Investment, and a new role for the World Bank. Moreover, the commission's scholars call for the creation of new institutions that would regulate resources in the sea, at the poles, and in space. And they call for a new Trilateral Committee that would coordinate the economic policies of Europe, Japan and the U.S. —to ensure that the industrial nations work together in the new system.

At the heart of the proposal is the restoration of free, nondiscriminatory access to resources and markets. Thus, a renovated General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade would outlaw export controls, such as the OPEC embargo on oil shipments in 1973.

To support free trade, the commission calls for a new IMF, which would function like the Federal Reserve System, but on a larger scale. The new IMF would be able to "create" money or restrict the "creation" of money, just as the Federal Reserve now does in the U.S.

To do this, a new currency called "Bancor" would be established. Like the Special Drawing Rights of the IMF, this currency would replace gold and the dollar as the world monetary unit. All currencies would be fixed in terms of Bancor, so that at some future date even travelers checks and all export-import transactions would be calculated in terms of Bancor. The new IMF would also be a "banker of last resort," capable of helping national central banks and multinational banks in times of distress. Like the Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) in the U.S., the new IMF could step in to help out banks in trouble in any part of the world.

According to an economist at Harvard, "The new IMF is the centerpiece of the system. It would change the system completely and may lead to a whole new era in finance."

...The President has recently called the leaders of Europe and Japan to a major "economic summit."... It will be equal to Bretton Woods... and a new economic order could be born.

(end of excerpts from article in The Christian Science Monitor)

* * * * *

There is neither the time nor the space to point out the specific dangers and inconsistencies of this New World Economic System which the Trilateralists intend to install. But we must note that the picture painted by The Christian Science Monitor article is distorted and biased. The author, Jeremiah Novak, speaks of the brilliant John Maynard Keynes and the equally brilliant Harry Dexter White, who were chiefly responsible for the creation of that terrible threesome, the IMF, the World Bank, and GATT. Novak, according to The Monitor, was a multinationalist executive with A.H. Robins Company (pharmaceuticals, dog food, perfume, etc.) before deciding to write books and articles about the "new economic order." Since this New World Order will be a boon to multinationalists (including peanut exporters) and to international bankers, but a calamity to most other people, it is quite possible that Novak is a publicity agent for the Elite that intends to rule the world openly.

In any case, Novak fails to point out that the brilliant young Harry Dexter White who committed suicide when indicted for treason was identified as a Communist agent who was working for the Soviet and against the United States at the time he helped map out the Bretton Woods plot. Author Novak also fails to tell his readers that "the venerable, brilliant British economist John Maynard Keynes" was a graduate of the Fabian Socialist Society. Author Novak does intimate that Bretton Woods was largely responsible for the dismemberment of the British Empire, but he fails to mention that it was also responsible for the development of the huge U.S. national debt, the devaluation of the U.S. dollar and the creation of the economic mess in which the world finds itself today.

And now, at least partly because of the horrible results of international monetary and economic management through the IMF, the World Bank and GATT, a "new crop of economists," counterparts of Keynes and White, "working in an organization known as the Trilateral Commission, is on the verge of creating a new international economic system." And this new system will be run openly by the Elitists, "working in tandem with technocrats inside and outside the official bureaucracy, and with effective insulation from the demands of an unruly and ungrateful public."

On the home front President Carter pretends to be all things to all people: fireside chats, open mike confabs with citizens as filtered by Cronkite, CBS and Ma Bell; appeals to his administrators and staff members to quit living in sin and get married; nothing stronger than wine to be served in the White House; etc.

But in the areas of actual government, we see an entirely different Carter. We see a man who is a Trilateralist first, a national leader secondly.

In our Report #6 (2/11/77) we wrote about "The Man Who Pretends to be President of the World." We cited his sending envoys to all parts of the world and said that his job was to "remake the world politically" while the Elitists were reshaping it economically and monetarily." At the time of the publishing of that letter, we did not know that on the very day of his inauguration, Carter sent a message to more than 100 nations of the world, via satellite and USIA, telling them how he would help "shape a new world order."

Here is the report of Carter's message to the world, as handled by Associated Press:

"President Carter, in an unusual message on the day of his inauguration, told more than 100 nations that the United States 'will not seek to dominate or dictate to others.' Carter's five-minute message to the world, taped after his arrival in Washington on Wednesday night, was distributed Thursday via satellite by the U.S. Information Agency and the Voice of America.

"The USIA said no previous president issued a statement to the world audience so soon after his inauguration.

"Carter, addressing 'citizens of the world who did not participate in our elections but who will nevertheless be affected by my decisions,' pledged that the United States will help 'shape a world order that is more responsive to human aspirations.'

"He said the United States is concluding one chapter of its history, presumably including the Vietnam war, and 'has acquired a more mature perspective on the problems of the world.' The United States will 'cooperate with others in combating these enemies of mankind'—poverty, hunger, disease and political repression, the new President said. He said the U.S. commitment to freedom and liberty is steadfast and told his international listeners that he seeks their experience, wisdom and participation in tackling world problems." (unquote)

As we said, here is the action of a man who pretends to be President of the World. And we have referred to the overall effort to create a New World Order—of which Carter is a part—as a Conspiracy. But when a Conspiracy has become an open and publicized program of the United States Government, is it yet a Conspiracy? David Rockefeller and Zbig Brzezinski hand-picked the American members of the Trilateral Commission, and now 16 of them are government officials. Of the 46 senior fellows at the Brookings Institution—a Rockefeller financed brain bank—at least 10 are government officials. Of Carter's top echelon of administrators, those not of TLC or Brookings, are members of the Council on Foreign Relations or the Committee for Economic Development. Hence our heading for this Report: "When Conspiracy Becomes Respectable Conspirators Rule the Nation Openly." For this is precisely what is happening. While Jimmy Carter pretends to placate the people both at home and abroad, the Elitists are installing their New World Order. While Carter reshapes the world politically, his co-conspirators reshape the world economically and financially.

Treason against a government is a serious thing; but treason against a Nation and against God are far worse crimes.

AGRARIAN LAND REFORM IN THE UNITED STATES

ANOTHER PART OF THE REGIONALIST PROGRAM

Mainland China had its Mao, the Island of Cuba has its Castro, and the United States have their counterparts in agrarian reformers who want to do away with independently-owned and family-operated farms. However, through experiences gained in totalitarian control in other countries, these U.S.-based agrarian reformers believe they have found a better way. Unlike the commune-ized farmlands managed by Commissars, and unlike the collectivized kibbutzim of Israel, the American scheme is to create Agribusiness Corporations. As in Red China and Soviet Russia, all private farming-for-profit would be banned, except for the black-market operations that would spring up inevitably and would be tolerated because their control would be next to impossible. However, in the United States, government control of all farming would be less direct than in Russia and China. That is, all farmland would be owned and managed by gigantic agribusiness corporations. These corporations, in turn, would be chartered by the Federal Government and they would operate the farmlands in accordance with guidelines laid down by a "Federal Regulator."

This is the "better way" of Corporate Socialism, as differentiated from the Soviet Socialism of Russia, the Communal Socialism of China and the State Socialism of Israel. All of these are, of course, a part of the overall Concept of Regionalism which is applicable to any and all forms of government.

When people speak of Regionalism, they usually have in mind a form of governance that centralizes political authority at ever higher levels, by removing authority from local elected officials and vesting it in appointees who are responsible to a superior central authority. The general plan is as follows:

1. Towns and cities are merged into counties (usually called Metros).
2. Individual counties are merged with other counties to form larger, sub-regional or "planning districts."
3. States are merged with other States to form Federal Regions (of which there are ten into which the fifty States have been merged respectively).

4. These federal regions are to be merged into world regions. Then -
5. These world regions are to be consolidated into a World Government.

It is interesting to note that the world was divided into potential regions on a map drawn up and distributed in 1952 by the London-based "World Association of Parliamentarians." The regional lines that divide the United States on this 1952 map are surprisingly similar to the federal regional boundaries established by executive order in 1972.

Such is the Concept of Regionalism: The transfer of political authority from elected to appointed officials, and the concentration of power in a World Authority.

But also concentrated into this Concept of Regionalism is the control of land, of production and distribution; especially of food. In this connection, we are reminded of a Washington News Intelligence Syndicate report that was published at the time of the World Food Conference held in Rome last year, Henry Kissinger representing the U.S. Government at that conference:

"It is Kissinger's belief, according to his aides, that by controlling food one can control people, and by controlling energy, especially oil, one can control nations and their financial systems. By placing food and oil policy under world control along with the monetary system, Kissinger is convinced that a world government ...can become a reality before 1980."

The foregoing would lend greater credence to the article carried in our Report of last week (2/25/77) concerning plans for the creation of a new international monetary system, to President Carter's insistence on the establishment of a Cabinet-level Department of Energy, and to plans for gaining control of all farmlands in the United States, which is the subject of this current Report.

There appeared in The Spotlight, March 7, 1977, an important article headed: "Regionalism Means Federal Control of All of the Land." Dated Grand Junction, Colorado, the article asked, "Is this area of western Colorado being used as a test-tube by regional planners?" The article notes that "The consequences of regionalism in Colorado were spelled out by the former lieutenant governor, John Vanderhoof, in 1971. Speaking at a meeting of the Colorado Cattlemen's Association, the Colorado Springs Gazette-Telegram reported that he said, 'By 1980 the individual citizen will have very little to say about the use of his own property. That citizen, whether he be a rancher, a farmer, or urbanite, will be required to submit his application for the use of his property to a local computer. That local computer will be tied to a master computer in Denver, Col. The master computer will then make the decision as to whether that farmer, rancher, or businessman in the city can use the property as desired.'"

Now, compare this prediction made in 1971 by a State official with the following article which appeared in the Lafayette, Indiana Journal and Courier, Feb. 11, 1977. And please note that, in Regional Government semantics cooperation is mandatory, not voluntary; integration means "to form into one body;" and problem solving replaces law and order, and reason.

COMPUTER AIDS EXTENSION WORK

By Howard Diesslin, Director
Cooperative Extension Service

As agriculture moves into the nation's third century, the Indiana Cooperative Extension Service will be serving Hoosier citizens with the help of a highly sophisticated statewide computer communications system.

Known as FACTS, for Fast Agricultural Communications Terminal System, the system will improve and expand the services of the extension service and will strengthen the ability of the research and extension specialists to help solve problems for Indiana's citizens.

The system is now being developed with a three-year $1.16 million grant from the W.K. Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, Mich. The agricultural experiment station in all departments and the cooperative extension service staffs, both on campus and in the counties are involved in the pioneering effort. The major approach will be to assemble the information that contributes to the answer of a specific problem. The information will then be available on call through a computer terminal in each county extension office, which will be linked to a central facility on the Purdue campus....

...It will become the prototype model for the research-extension system of other States....the major contribution will be to stimulate cooperation and integration so that many voices of knowledge can speak as one to the user. Properly used, this approach can also help identify areas where we are lacking in information.

This represents the first attempt on a broad scale to catalog key problems and questions from citizens and to integrate and deliver the answers in a non-traditional way. The county agent historically has served as the 'agent of change' of rural America... Too rapid changes in production technology and market demands have increased pressure to manage resources better. To transmit today's increasingly intricate information requires a change in communications technology. This project aims to accomplish this change. (End of quotation).

In order to assemble the information which would go into this computer's data bank, we are told that a series of surveys have been conducted. A correspondent whom we shall not identify writes: "One (survey) was done last October... covers county-city law enforcement, released bible study time for 3rd and 4th graders, mass transit, and would you live in another place if you had the same income? The other (second) one is the actual survey and it is something else. It is more of a psycho-analysis of the one who answers the questions. It is so long anyone would be exhausted and confused before finishing. It overworks luck, power, attitudes, problems, changes, how often you meet with other people, who the influential people are, help for me and others, what organizations you belong to. It has a lot on the United Fund and if you would be willing to volunteer if you were paid for it. It asks all about the area you live in and if you had a chance to choose where to live in the whole country where would you live? Then it goes into your childhood, your parents, your income and occupation. Finally it asks you to name 5 people who are influential, 5 who are good at volunteer work, 5 who really care about the community.

"A nice spy system. And what a nice file system it could create on everyone....It will be a perfect setup to phase out the family farm....The universities and insurance companies are also pushing estate planning for farmers now; and the advice is to form a corporation." (unquote).

Restraining a compulsion to comment, we should like to call your attention to an article which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of Jan. 14, 1977, which deals with an attempt at the massive take-over of the nation's farmlands via the corporate route:

ASKS PROBES OF PLAN TO POOL FARM-INVESTMENT MILLIONS

By Richard Orr
rural affairs editor

Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.) has called for congressional hearings and a United States Department of Agriculture study of a plan to create a pooled investment fund in agricultural land that might involve up to $50 million and 100,000 acres in 22 states. The plan, proposed recently by Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago and Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., is believed to be the first of its kind. Under the plan, the fund would purchase farms of various sizes and crop diversifications and lease them to operators to produce income from lease payments, crop earnings, and appreciation of land values. Continental would serve as trustee and investment adviser. Merrill Lynch would act as distributor, selling shares to trustees of corporate pension and profit-sharing funds that aren't now customers of the bank.

Findley, contending the plan may have both advantages and disadvantages, has asked Secretary of Agriculture John Knebel to order a study of the effects of such trusts on rural America.... In a letter to Knebel, Findley said: ...

"...On the negative side, the fund carries several ominous possibilities. It could be the beginning of the end of family ownership in agriculture, with absentee ownership through large investment funds or corporations emerging as the wave of the future. If this develops, it could have revolutionary impact on rural America. (End of quotes)

A follow-up article on this same subject appeared on Feb. 11, 1977 in the previously quoted Lafayette, Indiana Journal and Courier. Headlined "Land Plan Called Family-Farm Threat," this was an AP report out of Washington, which said the Continental-Merrill, Lynch plan had been given the name "Ag-Land Trust," and more Congressmen had begun to demand an investigation. The AP report quoted A. Barry Carr, a specialist in the Food and Agriculture Section of the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress. Carr had written a paper called "The Future of Agriculture," in which he said "there are reasons to expect the eventual takeover of agriculture by large corporate farms. It is in the nature of the technological revolution in agriculture that farms of the future will be bigger and more costly."

Carr also drew upon the writings of one Don Paarlberg, who was director of economics in the Agriculture Department during the Nixon and Ford administrations. Both Carr and Paarlberg agreed that giant corporations such as Ag-Land Trust would probably take over all farmlands in America, and that the "land would then be leased out or worked by other farmers under sharecropper arrangements."

Paarlberg wrote: "The family farmer... will slowly and reluctantly give up his historic role of supplying all the factors of production: land, capital, and management. The nearest thing to the family farmer will be a farmer who lives on the land with his family, rents his farm, borrows his money and hires his labor."

"Carr's paper," said AP, "was much more comprehensive than just land ownership. It included possible courses over the next century which might be taken by world population, agricultural technology, food products, and climate."

Agrarian land reform for the United States is what this plan is being called. In a sense it is a return to feudalism; but with this important difference; The feudal order, however primitive, was essentially a Christian order, while this twentieth century counterpart is humanistic, materialistic, socialistic—but in no sense Biblical or Christian.

Furthermore, the type of corporate ownership of land envisioned in this new concept has little to do with the legal unit that today is called a corporation. In the traditional free enterprise economic system, a corporation is "a group of people having a legal charter that empowers them to transact business as a single body." It is an artificially created individual, a legal person that can sue or be sued.

But if and when the New Order is completed and the Constitution of the Newstates of America has been installed as "the Law of the Land," then corporations will cease to be "legal persons" as we know them today. Instead, they will become integral parts of the bureaucratic structure of the Corporate State. Corporations will be chartered by the federal government, told what and how much they may do by the Planning Branch of the Government, and controlled and supervised by a National Regulator. Under this system of Corporate Socialism, the fifty States of the Union are to become but Ten States, corresponding to the Ten Federal Regions into which the Nation has already been divided. All resources (including land) and all production and distribution (including farms and food) will be under the control of corporations. These corporations, in turn, would be representatives of the government (similar to the soviets which make up the totalitarian government of Russia).

This "Proposed Constitutional Model for the Newstates of America" was prepared by Rexford Guy Tugwell and associates at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. It provides, among other things, for the creation of the Newstates, the control of elections, and other details involved with setting up The New Order. There is provision for a President, a Senate and House of Representatives, and a judicial Branch. There are also a Planning Branch and a Regulatory Branch. All is very different, very socialistic, very authoritarian.

Following are quotations from this proposed new constitution, selected because they pertain particularly to the future role of corporations:

Article IV. The Planning Branch.

...There shall be a Planning Branch to formulate and administer plans.... There shall be a National Planning Board.... The Chairman shall present to the Board six and twelve year development plans.... The twelve-year plan shall be a general estimate of probable progress, both governmental and private.... There shall be submissions (to the Planning Branch) from private individuals or from organized associations affected with a public interest (such as Ag-land Corporations—Ed.), as defined by the Board. They shall report intentions to expand or retract, estimates of production and demand, probable uses of resources, numbers expected to be employed, and other essential information.... Undertakings in violation of official designation shall be at the risk of the venturer, and there shall be no recourse.

Article VII. The Regulatory Branch.

There shall be a Regulatory Branch, and there shall be a National Regulator.... The Regulator shall charter all corporations or enterprises except... those whose activities are confined to one Newstate.... Chartered enterprises in similar industries or occupations may organize joint Authorities.... Authorities shall have governing committees of five; two being appointed by the Regulator to represent the public.... The Regulator with his Board shall fix standards and procedures for mergers of enterprises or the acquisition of some by others.... The charters of enterprises may be revoked and Authorities may be dissolved by the Regulator.... The Regulator shall make rules for and shall supervise marketplaces for goods and services.... Responsible also to the Regulator, there shall be an Operations Commission appointed by the Regulator... for the supervision of enterprises owned in whole or in part by government.... (end of quotes from Newstates Constitution)

The preceding quotations were, admittedly, taken out of context. But this does not alter the fact that the final plan of the Elitists who intend to rule the world, call for:

1. A National Regulator will control the use and allocation of all farmlands in the Nation (and everything else that is called a "resource.")
2. A National Authority will act as overall supervisor of the use and allocation of farmlands.
3. Corporations will control the use and the allocation of all farmlands within their chartered dominion.
4. Sharecroppers and lease-holders will till another's soil, and produce grain for the "peoples' storehouses."

This, then, is the proposed program for Agrarian Land Reform for the Newstates of America. It is part of an overall pattern. Individual farmers and independent businessmen—industrialists, manufacturers, merchants, producers, providers of essential services—these form the backbone of this Nation. But so long as they work individually and independently, they are obstructions on the road to the New World Order, and they must be removed, one way or another.

So there is OSHA, EPA, land Control, Land Confiscation through Regional Governance, Water Control, Energy Control, and the hosts of Regulatory Agencies of the federal government, all of which are said to promote the good of society, but which also destroy the unalienable rights of men.

It has been said that when Washington controls your small yard or your broad pasture, it controls your very soul. Land control is that important; in the final analysis it comes down to a choice between God or Government. The Holy Bible is land-oriented and so should be Bible believers. So, the question asked by Joshua remains critical: "choose you this day whom ye will serve."

"MORAL POLICEMAN TO THE WORLD?"

HIS BENEVOLENT MAJESTY, OUR IMPERIAL PRESIDENT.

The title of this Report is borrowed from page 17 of the March 14, 1977 issue of U.S. News & World Report. The Newsweekly's article beginning on that page forms an important, although coincidental, supplement to our own Report of February 11, 1977 which was titled, "The Man Who Pretends to be President of the World." We—along with USN&WR—stress the importance of this general subject, because Jimmy Carter is making of the United States Presidency an Imperial Presidency; a most dangerous act if this Nation is to continue as a Land of the Free.

Paradoxically, while telling the rest of the world how to live under the guise of promoting "human rights," here at home Carter tolerates, even encourages, crime and criminals: pardoning deserters and draft-dodgers, employing a convicted murderess in the White House as nursemaid to his own daughter (the latter having become a political football), engaging in confidential conversation with a man charged with kidnaping a police officer, etc. No wonder black terrorists dare to lay siege to buildings in the Nation's Capital, murdering hostages and demanding reparations and revenge.

The USN&WR article deals with the global aspects of Carter's imperialistic inclinations, pointing out that "The President is extending his 'Carter Doctrine' on human rights beyond Russia. That could signal difficult, even dangerous days ahead."

"President Carter's crusade for human rights," says the article, "is plunging the U.S. into a new international role—one that involves responsibilities and risks that have yet to be fully weighed. To nations abroad, the Carter concept comes close to projecting the U.S. as the moral policeman to the World. Carter has enunciated a doctrine that commits the U.S. to champion the cause of human rights wherever they are violated. This is bound to have a profound effect on America's relations with allies no less than adversaries. It also means that the U.S. will be obliged to shoulder new burdens abroad."

After citing several instances of the effect of this "Carter Doctrine" (instances with which your reporter is not in total agreement), this important point is made:

"A charge of 'selective morality' already is being leveled against the (Carter) Administration. Countries that are of little strategic importance are being penalized for human-rights violations while others, where the U.S. has important security interests, are being spared.... Aid has been cut off to three countries where the U.S. has no important security interests—Argentina, Uruguay and Ethiopia. But Secretary of State Vance has announced that a fourth country where America has important strategic stakes—South Korea—will not be penalized, despite great concern about the human-rights situation in that country. This has led to accusations of 'selective morality' in the Administration's foreign policy....

"A well-informed European diplomat sums up...: 'If Carter intends to apply his criteria of morality universally, then the U.S. will have few if any friends or allies left in the 'third world.' If the criteria is to be applied discriminately, American foreign policy will be in an even worse shambles.'

For all his liberal leanings on domestic matters, Senator John Sparkman of Alabama, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, seemed more level-headed than most of his colleagues. He said: "It is usually unwise—and even more usually ineffective—to attempt to reform the domestic practices of either allies or adversaries. That is surely one of the major lessons of the Vietnam War.... We cannot... disregard... the way governments treat their own people, but the primary concern must remain the security of the United States, its allies and its friends."

Perhaps we should point out that Senator Sparkman and USN&WR both are criticizing President Carter's "human rights crusade" from the standpoint of what they believe to be what is best for America. But it is our belief that Mr. Carter judges all foreign policy issues from the standpoint of what is good for the Trilateralist Commission. If this were not true, we doubt that Mr. Carter would today be President of the United States. As Hans J. Morganthau observed in The New Republic, Jan. 22, 1977, page 51:

“The concentrations of private power which have actually governed America since the Civil War have withstood all attempts to control, let alone dissolve them. They have survived all such attempts from Populism to the Great Society. They have adjusted legal forms and procedures to political pressures and have coopted their one-time opponents, such as the labor unions. Democratic and Republican administrations have followed each other, and so have activist and passive, reformist and conservative Presidents, but the concentrations of private power have preserved their hold upon the levers of political decision. So it is but consistent for an incoming administration to staff the command posts of foreign and military policy with the same personnel that served its immediate predecessors....”

It might be added that the “concentrations of private power” which govern America have always had their private stables of specially trained civil servants from which to draw the visible leaders who would fill those command posts of authority. There were the Rhodes Scholars, graduates from the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, Col. House’s The Inquiry, Felix Frankfurter’s Hot Dogs, selected university faculty members, foundation grant recipients, members of CFR, IPR, FPA, CED, TLC, Bilderbergers, etc., etc....

In this same general context of power, crusades for human rights, have always been part of the gimmickry of American political propaganda and persuasion. It just seems new and fresh because Jimmy Carter gives it more emphasis. As the USN&WR special report suggests (but doesn’t quite say), we have been victimized by a 60-year crusade for human rights. Of course, different Presidents have used the gimmick for different purposes and therefore said it in different words. Examples:

Woodrow Wilson, after being re-elected because “he kept us out of war,” found it expedient to ask Congress to declare war. So, addressing Congress on April 2, 1917, he said: “The world must be made safe for democracy....”

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, also re-elected at least partially because he had kept the Nation out of war, paved the way for the Crime of Pearl Harbor by declaring to the Congress on January 6, 1941: “...We look forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms.... Freedom of speech and expression... freedom of every person to worship God in his own way... freedom from want... freedom from fear....”

Harry Truman, doing a new thing from which this Nation has never recovered, when asking Congress to support the Marshall Plan on March 12, 1947, said: “The free peoples of the world look to us for support in maintaining their freedoms. If we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of this nation.”

Dwight David Eisenhower, addressing the American Bar Association, August 24, 1955, sounded this militant call to freedom: “We shall always hold that there can be no true peace which involves acceptance of a status quo in which we find injustice in many nations, repressions of human beings on a gigantic scale, and with constructive effort paralyzed by fear.... The domination of captive countries cannot longer be justified by any claim that this is needed for purposes of security.”

John F. Kennedy, in his inaugural address on Jan. 20, 1961, said: “Let every nation know, whether it wish us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend or oppose any foe in order to assure the survival and success of liberty.”

Jimmy Carter, completing the chorus, said in his inaugural address: “The world itself is now dominated by a new spirit. Peoples more numerous and more politically aware are craving and now demanding their place in the sun—not just for the benefit of their own physical condition, but for basic human rights. The passion for freedom is on the rise. Tapping this new spirit, there can be no nobler nor more ambitious task for America to undertake... than to help shape a just and peaceful world that is truly humane.”

Now note the historical progression during those sixty years of Presidential crusading for freedom and human rights. Wilson’s war made the world safe for Communism. FDR made Communism a friend, then an ally, and finally the world’s second greatest power. Harry Truman made Mainland China a Communist power to be reckoned with, first in Korea. Dwight Eisenhower helped to solidify the Communist stranglehold in Eastern Europe. Jack Kennedy, via Vietnam, added to the power and prestige of Communist China, through Cuba gave Communist Russia a foothold in the Americas. What Kennedy did not live to complete was taken care of by Lyndon Johnson and Henry Kissinger.

And now comes Jimmy Carter, the man who conducts himself as though he were the President of the world, the man who is endued with a new spirit that cries out for him to give all people their "place in the sun," even murderers and kidnapers.

Here at home, the human rights crusade will be interpreted by kidnapers, murderers and malcontents as a new way to gain publicity for their pet causes or attention for themselves (their place in the sun); they will be able to demand a personal call from the President. Abroad, Carter's human rights crusade is being interpreted as a subtle change in emphasis: The U.S. has been military policeman to the world; now it will become moral policeman to the world; a role more difficult, more thankless, and more dangerous.

However, in the final analysis, this "Carter Crusade" must be labeled for what it really is: a political gimmick, as it was with his predecessors, Wilson, Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy.

Carter's real policies will be dictated by the "brains" of the Trilateral Commission. And some hints as to the foreign policy issues he will promote can be gathered from the last formal TLC meeting, which was held January 10/12, 1977 in Tokyo. Carter had been elected, was awaiting the inauguration and could not attend. Neither could Mondale, Vance, Brown, Blumenthal, Brzezinski and other ranking Trilateralists who were about to be sworn in as officers of the Visible Federal Government of the United States. However, David Rockefeller was on hand in Tokyo to handle issues and make decisions. And, as Jimmy Carter's personal representative went Richard Cooper, Yale University professor who was to become Carter's Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs.

The Trilateral Commission meetings were reported in the English language editions of the Tokyo Asahi Evening News (The Asahi Shimbun is the Japanese equivalent of The New York Times). Following are excerpts from articles appearing in Asahi Evening News editions of Jan. 4, 10, and 11:

* * * * *

Following the appointment of able official Cyrus Vance as the new Secretary of State, Zbigniew Brzezinski, who is called "Carter's Kissinger," has been named a national security advisor; so the main actors in (American) foreign policy has been decided. Brzezinski is a pro-Japanese man who wrote a book about Japan titled "The Fragile Blossom." It reflects a consciousness that Japan is a super-power as far as national energy and economic power are concerned, but it has a weakness because of lack of self-sufficiency.... Brzezinski is also one of the founders of the Trilateral Commission, and he points out that the cooperative relationship among the U.S., Japan and Western Europe is important. Policy toward the Soviet Union probably will become more cautious than in the past, while contacts with the "fragile blossom" probably will become closer.... In a sense, the Carter administration is a "U.S.-Japan-Europe group." ...

(Jan. 10) ... About 100 political, academic and business leaders of Japan, the United States and Europe were continuing their extensive discussions in Tokyo Monday on the current political situation in advanced countries, restructuring of international systems, multinational coordination of economic policies and other matters of common concern. On the second day of the three-day seventh general meeting of the Trilateral Commission... talks were being centered on the question of cooperation with Communist nations.... On Tuesday they will discuss international policy adjustments to get over economic recession and inflation....

(Jan. 11) ... Participants in the seventh general meeting of the Trilateral Commission in Tokyo agreed Monday that exports of nuclear fuel reprocessing plants should be suspended for a few years, during which the world will conduct an over all review of how to promote peaceful use of nuclear energy. Extensive discussions were carried out on two themes, "restructuring of international systems" and "constructive cooperation with Communist countries." ... The agreement reached in the second-day session will be conveyed in the form of "recommendations" to the governments in the three regions.... Concerning the monetary issue, many participants agreed that the existing international monetary system can be maintained through cooperation among strong economic powers, such as Japan, the United States and West Germany. It was also proposed that advanced nations make efforts to reorganize their domestic economic structures and provide developing nations with stable markets to facilitate their economic developments:

To solve such global economic questions, participants advanced the conception of "piecemeal functionalism," instead of "centralism," as a more realistic approach. They explained that it is increasingly difficult to manage the whole of deepening interdependence between nations in various fields of international society and each problem should be tackled separately and flexibly on a case-by-case basis.

As for cooperation with Communist countries, participants confirmed the difference in approaches toward the Soviet Union and China, but agreed that the Western nations can cooperate with the Communist bloc in the areas of commerce, monetary policy, nuclear non-proliferation and food demand and supply, and that the feasibility of cooperation should be explored in earthquake prediction, ocean and energy problems. Cooperation is least promising in the fields of development aid, space development and weather control, they also confirmed.

Concerning the food problem in particular, the majority of the participants reached an agreement that the international food reserve system should be established to secure stable supplies to the Soviet bloc nations suffering from a chronic shortage of food.

(end of quotes from Asahi Evening News)

We are being told that the TLC is an unofficial group of private citizens who meet to discuss world problems, but that they have no authority and can only recommend policies to be carried out by the governments of the United States, Japan, and the countries of Western Europe. However, when the policy-making officers of these governments are also policy-making members of the Trilateral Commission, we can only conclude that any Trilateral Commission recommendation is official government policy—unless the U.S. Congress or the comparable parliamentary bodies of the other nations rebel and revoke.

Incidentally, nearly one full day of this three-day seventh meeting of these “unofficial” people was devoted to the subject of cooperation with the Communist bloc. Now, cooperation is another word for interdependence in the TLC lexicon, and the overall idea is the formation of Regional Areas of control and influence: The Western Nations and Japan is one such Region, the Soviet Communist bloc is another, the Red China Communist bloc yet another, and the unaligned underdeveloped nations form a Region that has gained the title “Third World.” Now, “cooperation” with these Regions, or Blocs of Nations, means trade, monetary control, and development of resources.

So, directly in conformity with the TLC policy, President Carter announced the annulment of all travel restrictions of American citizens to the Communist Bloc nations of Cuba, North Korea, Cambodia, Vietnam, and other previously restricted areas. The next step will be, of course, resumption of diplomatic relations and assorted trade agreements.

Here at home, TLC policy seems to be one of “reorganizing domestic economic structures.” That can be translated: “Complete the establishment of the Corporate Socialist System which is to replace the Free Enterprise System, while retaining Capitalism.”

Now, the Corporative System consists of Corporations which are a part of the Government, and Labor Syndicates (or unions) that are also a part of the Government. And in the development of this system, Jimmy Carter has already pledged that he will work to abolish all State right-to-work laws, so that anyone working for a living will be forced to belong to and take orders from a labor union. A component part of this “labor syndicate” syndrome has to do with the new common situs picketing measure, one effect of which would be to give the top labor brass a major means of dictating policy at the local level; thus concentrating power over labor at the top (that is, in Washington).

An even more dangerous measure in this concentration of power has to do with the drive to unionize all members of the armed forces. The American Federation of Government Employees (AFGE) has authorized military memberships, and an organizing drive is to begin soon. It may seem unthinkable to most Americans that the defense of the country could be left in the hands of bosses who could bargain collectively over the conditions under which a war could be fought, or to strike and refuse to defend the country because some agency like OSHA might say it would be too dangerous an undertaking. Military service is inherently authoritarian and cannot be made democratic—although Carter took a giant step in that dangerous direction when he issued his dangerous amnesty decree. And, insofar as the Trilateral Commission is concerned, Japan has no military establishment, and military unionization is already far advanced in Western Europe, with Sweden leading the way. So, if INTERdependence demands the unionization of our armed forces, the only way we can fight it is by a Declaration of Independence. After all, to stand or fall by that precious Document and the resultant Constitution of the United States remains our only civil recourse. So, why stand we waiting?

TERRORISM - THE UNCONTROLLABLE WEAPON

A CONSPIRACY THAT WENT AWRY? OR WAS IT PLANNED THIS WAY?

"Out of a dramatic 40-hour siege of terror in Washington came a lesson that struck into the heart of the White House itself. That lesson was this: How vulnerable a big American city can be to the actions of a determined few. Not only were terrorists able to strike without warning, but they had brought—only 12 of them—complete, if temporary, disruption and near panic to the center of the capital."

Thus did one newsweekly summarize a series of events that began on March 9 when without warning, twelve men armed with long knives, pistols and sawed-off shotguns seized and held 134 hostages in three buildings only blocks from the White House. One man was killed, at least a dozen wounded, and the ringleader was booked and released on his own recognizance.

This 40-hour reign of terror began just one week after a Federal Task Force on Disorders and Terrorism had issued a report warning that acts of terrorism "are likely to increase in the next few years." Commenting on the coincidence of the report and ensuing acts of terrorism, The New York Times of Sunday, March 13, noted that "violence as a political weapon is as old as Government itself," a statement that is apt to remind one of the original Assassins who flourished as murderers for hire in the twelfth century. Their leader Hassan Sahab, "The Old Man of the Mountain" was, like the leader of the twelve who terrorized Washington for forty hours, a converted Muslim. Hassan controlled his followers by keeping them "high" on hashish and by promising them an eternity to be spent in paradise if they should be killed while committing political assassinations for Hassan's customers.

Lest there be any misunderstanding, hashish is the Arabian name for marijuana (Spanish). The Living Encyclopedic Dictionary, copyright 1975, reads: "HEMP. A tall annual herb, cannabis sativa, native in Asia and cultivated in most temperate regions; the female plant, from which hashish and marijuana are produced; the tough fiber of the male plant, from which coarse fabrics and rope are made;..."

This hashish, which made murderers out of men in the twelfth century, is now said to be no more dangerous to the user than alcohol, tobacco, or even caffeine. It is said to be so harmless that President Jimmy Carter thinks anyone should be permitted to grow his own supply of marijuana in his own back yard.

However, getting back to this article in The New York Times, we are told that "the molecular nature of terrorist groups—the splitting and compounding of factions—and the frequency with which they change their objectives often make it difficult for law enforcement agencies to keep track of them. A complete list of groups responsible for recent bombings and other terrorist activities is thus difficult. But they include:

"The Armed Forces of National Liberation (FALN). It claimed responsibility for the New York City explosions last month....

"The Armed Revolutionary Commandos for Independence (CRIA)... The New World Liberation Front, said to be an offspring of the Symbionese Liberation Army----The Weather Underground.... The Pragmatists and several other Miami-based Cuban refugee-groups....

"For all this, however, the groups that most concern the authorities are those they do not even know about yet." So concludes The Times.

While reserving comment until later in this Report, we should like to call attention to an article written by the labor columnist, Victor Riesel, which appeared in many newspapers on March 16, 1977:

POLICE PURGES AID TERRORISTS

There are intelligence dossiers filled with corroborated evidence that "radioactive diffusion" mechanisms have been used by terrorists. There have been a number, not a large number, but several attempted extortions utilizing nuclear threat, according to one informed San Francisco police official. FBI agents methodically tracking "Boston bombers" uncovered 800 sticks of dynamite in two steel drums buried near Boxford, north of the bean and cod city. There are grim records disclosing a yearly average of 2,000 bombings and attempted bombings since 1971. Military personnel have been kidnapped, industrial plants have been threatened. Communication centers have been blasted. Electric power plants have been ripped open. Explosive specialist Weather underground organization dynamiters still operate in shadowland.... There are scores of violence-prone sects so weird and inflexible in their rituals, they sound like gene-spliced strangers in a world of science fiction.

AG-LAND FARM SCHEME DELAYED

"The Time Has Not Yet Come"

Officers of the Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago and Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith have announced a delay in their plan to purchase farmland in 22 States and then parcel it out to sharecroppers. Called by one reporter "an idea whose time has not yet come," the real reason for the delay seems to have been difficulties experienced in trying to obtain a tax exempt status for a money making scheme from the IRS. The Chicago Tribune of March 12, 1977, reported:

"Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. Friday dropped a request with the Internal Revenue Service for tax exempt status for an agricultural land trust fund.... The proposal, called Ag-Land Trust, would have involved purchasing about 100,000 acres of land in the Midwest, South and West to be leased to farmers....

(Rep. Richard) Nolan (D-Minn.) said he will still seek legislation to prevent establishing such a fund. At the same time, however, Rep. Paul Simon (D-Carbondale) and Rep. James Leach (R-Ia.) introduced their bill to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. Act to prohibit any bank insured by FDIC from buying farmland with money from a trust fund.

"The proposal was considered... a 'major threat to the nation's farmers,' by the 2.6 million-member American Farm Bureau Federation. The group feared the pattern of farmland ownership would switch from local ownership by individuals to absentee ownership by financial institutions and corporations...." (end of quote).

For more details concerning this scheme, please refer to DBR #9, March 4, 1977, entitled "Agrarian Land Reform in the United States."

Yet for several years now, the nation's police departments have wiped out their own active intelligence units in a score of major cities in which these lurid cultures operate in storefront temples or instant ecclesiastical loft-located centers of worship.... The usual "centers" and "commissions" and civil liberties groups, strangely well-funded, have persecuted and prosecuted diligent police officials until the intelligence units were shut down, despite ongoing surveillances and investigations of terrorists threatening the public. One victim is the Washington Metropolitan Police department. Until a few years ago, it had informants in the Hanafi Muslim sect.... But the "public pressure," the so-called citizens' crusade for privacy, the alarm raised against police infiltration of self-proclaimed religious cults and ethnic or racial groups dedicated to violence, forced the Metropolitan police to wipe out most of their intelligence unit, destroy its files and "pull out" their informants. Yes, even in the Hanafi operation. I refer you to Georgia Congressman Larry MacDonald for further information.

I'll vouch for the fact that the New York City and Chicago police departments also expunged their files — actually destroyed their usefulness on pressure from vote-conscious politicians and courts.

And now, leading all the rest to enforced retreat from similar intelligence operations as a result of former Atty. Gen. Edward Levi's academic philosophy, is the FBI, Director Kelly was forced to slash the bureau's "investigations of domestic security threats" from 21,414 cases in 1973 to 623 during the final weeks of 1976....

Then, when some sect or tiny revolutionary band blows up New York's LaGuardia Airport, killing and maiming scores of travelers, there is an uproar. Why didn't the police know? When the Croatian hijackers reportedly plant bombs and seize aircraft, there are demands to know why the authorities permitted this. When a Nazi psycho called Fred Cowan goes gun crazy, and kills five men, wounds five others—fellow workers and cops—in New Rochelle, N.Y., the liberals demand police protection. But first many of them demeaned the FBI and other agencies.... Now there is word that a secret Army mock operation succeeded in penetrating the White House back in 1969—and could have killed the President. Or poisoned reservoirs of major cities. It will be too late if some terrorist band—and it doesn't take much of an off-the-wall crowd—continues to escalate the terrorism.... The community which permits the town crier to deny it protection against terrorists soon will be a community in tears. Why are we waiting for Lefty? (end of quotes).

In his book Living With Terrorism (Arlington House) Richard Clutterbuck concluded that "Terrorism is almost sure to increase. It will increase primarily because, in the short term, it seems to pay; political blackmail gets results; convicted terrorists are released, huge ransoms are paid, and publicity on a scale unimaginable before the television age, is acquired free. It will increase secondarily, because industrial society becomes more vulnerable every day. Fifty years ago, a power stoppage would have been little more than a nuisance. Today it can cause immediate unemployment and the loss of millions of pounds worth of the community's production and reserves and of the goods which it exports to earn its living. It can deprive the community of food, warmth, water and drainage and quickly reduce it to chaos and disease. In cold weather people will die. Public transport is just as vulnerable.... Also, violence is news, so 'armed propaganda'—the staging of incidents which will attract the attention of the media—gives free and vivid publicity to the terrorists, and brings their actions and ideas to the attention of an audience so vast that, even if the overwhelming majority reject them, the tiny proportion in whom they may strike a chord of sympathy amounts to a lot of people all over the world...."

It is obvious to anyone who reads a newspaper that terrorism and crimes of violence are increasing. It is also obvious that the local police departments are being denied the ability to do much about it, and are at the same time criticized for doing nothing about it. And, at the same time, millions of dollars are being poured into a federal agency known as LEAA, supposedly for the purpose of providing peace and security, by creating a National Police Force. Also, coincident with the increase in crime and terrorism, the weakening and maligning of local police departments, and the expansion of federal police control, gun control legislation is being promoted as a way to end crimes of violence by making it difficult for law-abiding citizens to defend themselves against terrorists, murderers, rapists, muggers, arsonists, and other kinds of outlaws. Does this suggest the use by the Elitists who really run the government, of the old Hegelian formula? It would read like this:

1. Create an emergency (terrorism, etc.).
2. Develop a plan for dealing with the emergency (a national police force plus the confiscation of all arms from citizens).

3. Create a public demand for the carrying out of the pre-arranged plan.

Now and then a little news of how this Hegelian formula is being applied, creeps into some segments of the national press. For example, a few months ago, this item was published in the National Inquirer:

"More than $200,000 in federal crime-fighting money has been channeled into three branches of a Communist-front organization—whose goals include the destruction of law enforcement. In fact, the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) money even paid bills for the front organization, and helped keep it alive, according to shocking testimony before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee.

"'A U.S. agency is funding a Communist-front organization which is harassing the police department in Chicago?' asked an incredulous J.G. Sourwine, the subcommittee's former chief counsel. 'Yes, sir,' replied Eugene Dorneker, a Chicago police investigator, who also disclosed links between the organization and the state group that approved the funding. Dorneker identified the organization as the so-called Alliance to End Repression, which he said worked to blow the cover of Chicago police undercover agents and their operations. The Alliance was identified as a Communist-front group in Senate Internal Security Subcommittee hearings in July 1975, and numerous members have been identified individually as Communists.

A Push By Carter

(C) Washington Star

WASHINGTON — President Jimmy Carter has sent letters to every member of the Florida legislature, promoting the Equal Rights Amendment in the only state where it still has a chance of approval this year.

His letters arrived in Tallahassee Tuesday as another state Missouri, was turning down the proposed constitutional amendment — the fourth defeat of the year.

The amendment, to guarantee legal equality of the sexes, has been approved by 35 legislatures but would need approval of three more. This is considered to be the crucial year for ERA because the proposal dies if not ratified by March 1979. Most legislatures will not meet next year.

"The Alliance, Dorneker explained, developed three spinoff groups: the Citizens Alert Project, the Cook County Special Bail Project and the Illinois Prisons and Jails Project. Among other things, Citizens Alert has launched a Federal Court suit to prevent police from maintaining surveillance on individuals and groups, and demanding destruction of current intelligence files.... The three groups received a total of $201,241 in federal funds.... The money was part of a bloc grant to Illinois by the LEAA.... 'It would be my opinion that without federal funds supporting the project, the Alliance would not have been financially able to survive'."

Then, there is the charge of Los Angeles Police Chief Edward Davis, that the American legal profession is doing a splendid job—for the criminal, but not for the law-abiding public. Davis, who is president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, is critical of lawyers who try to set criminals free while awaiting trial, of bar associations that advocate liberalism, such as legalizing prostitution, of judges who fail to send killers, robbers and burglars to jail, and of "lawyers who are bending the law away from what the people of America want it to be."

Above all of these charges and countercharges, there is the suspicion that when a terrorist activity occurs—such as the recent forty hour reign of terror in Washington—our own government officials may have encouraged or even planned the incident, and given legal shelter to the terrorists; in order to bring about a new system of police control!

Last year, the LEAA Administrator, Richard Velde, speaking to those attending an International Symposium on Criminal Justice and Statistics Systems, spelled it out very clearly. He said:

"We know that there will be a national system which links all sizeable law enforcement, court, and corrections agencies.

"We know that this system will not stop at the national borders. In this day of rapid communications, a truly international system is essential.

"We know that within regional systems every police officer will have to be accessible at all times. Every court and corrections official will have to be able to come on line as well."

Here is an LEAA Administrator admitting that something more than a National Police Force is intended; that an International Police Force is the aim. One in which all courts and all corrections officials will be forced to obey the dictates of a centralized World Police Agency!

If the current program of LEAA is indicative of what's in store for the future, then the armed services will be combined with the police agencies, creating one Security Force for a Regionalized World Police State.

Now, let us suppose that these terrorist activities—which are occurring all over the world—are financed and managed by a centralized agency, Communist or otherwise. And let us assume that these terrorist activities are conducted for the purpose of creating the impression that their control is impossible by any existing law enforcement agency; and that therefore, a new world police power is essential if law and order is to be maintained.

Then, suddenly, we are brought abruptly to the knowledge that acts of terrorism can be planned, financed, carried out, but they can not be controlled except by the use of force; as was so dramatically illustrated by the Israeli invasion of Uganda and the liberation of hijacked hostages. While the action was roundly applauded by most nations, it also could have been a staged performance to convince the world of the necessity of international police-type action which may violate national boundaries, scoff at national sovereignties, and plant the idea that a world security force is needed—one that is not hampered by national boundaries and state lines.

The preceding is mainly hypothetical. But here at home, the idea of "Martial Rule" is being developed. We are told that "Martial Rule" comes into existence upon a determination by the senior military commander that civil government must be replaced because it is no longer functioning." The senior military commander is, of course, the President of the United States, who in addition to being chief executive officer, is also Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States.

So, uncontrollable terrorist activities could lead to Martial Rule. We thought you ought to know.

THE TROUBLE WITH GOVERNING THE DEPENDENCIES

THE PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD CONFUSES THE COLONIES

"Rarely have U.S. relations with so many countries around the world been thrown into so much confusion in so short a time," said Joseph Fromm, deputy editor of U.S. News & World Report. Fromm reckons that Jimmy Carter's emphasis on forcing other nations to accept and abide by his definition of human rights is the principal reason for the sudden hostility. Of the 82 nations that are receiving security assistance from the United States, 54 are "guilty of human-rights violations" and Carter has threatened to cut off aid to those countries that don't do as he directs. Calling it a casualty list, Fromm includes:

- * West Germany, in a major controversy over economic and nuclear matters.
- * Russia, is baffled by the stream of seemingly contradictory pronouncements on human rights and arms control.
- * Brazil and other Latin American countries infuriated over what they see as a "new, moralistic brand of Yankee imperialism in the guise of a campaign for human rights."
- * Israeli and Arab leaders alike are bewildered by his off-the-cuff and contradictory press-conference statements about American plans for a Mideast settlement.

"What accounts for this disarray in U.S. foreign policy?" asks analyst Fromm. Part of the answer, he says: Carter springs dramatic proposals at press conferences before he has consulted allies or other countries concerned—or, in some cases, even his own advisers. A classic example:

"...his surprise announcement at a March 9 press conference of an American plan for a Mideast peace settlement, one that would require Israel to withdraw from virtually all of the territory occupied in the 1967 war, but would allow Jewish forces to man outposts beyond their political frontiers. The announcement caused dismay among Israeli and Arab leaders, all of whom reacted by rejecting Carter's proposal. A week later, at a Clinton, Mass., town meeting, the President caused further consternation in Israel with a call for a Palestinian 'homeland'."

Commenting on the same subject, William J. Eaton of the Miami Herald's Washington bureau, hints that Carter is, himself, confused because he is echoing the words and ideas of his chief adviser, Zbig Brzezinski—and that is bound to be confusing. Eaton's irony is revealing. We quote:

"The real meaning of U.S. foreign policy used to be outlined for reporters by an anonymous senior American official who spoke with a German accent and flew on Henry Kissinger's airplane. Now there is another nameless voice who is performing a similar duty for President Carter. But the new official speaks in such a mixture of academic and diplomatic jargon that it is as hard to get his meaning as it is, say, to spell or pronounce Zbigniew Brzezinski, the White House adviser.

"After the new official's first briefing, some reporters needed what he would term a little more 'exegesis.' Exegesis is a four-syllable word for close examination and detailed elaboration. That's what it took to grasp every nuance of the official's background briefing on Carter's recent speech to the United Nations. Under White House rules, the official cannot be identified or quoted directly. It is possible, however, to provide this authoritative version of what he said:

- Q. Why did Carter pick the United Nations to deliver his opening foreign policy address?
- A. This symbolic setting was important in underlining the premise that certain basic aspirations to which our foreign policy ought to be responsive are of a universal type.
- Q. What does Carter want to accomplish in the Middle East?
- A. A more flexible framework for negotiations is desirable so that hitherto intractable issues can be approached with a higher degree of flexibility. This is because there is a gradual process of increasingly reciprocal recognition by the parties to the conflict as to what the main issues really are.
- Q. What did Carter mean when he said in Clinton, Mass., that he favored a homeland for the Palestinians?
- A. That was a speech in Massachusetts. I am here to brief on a speech in New York. But I just happen to have a copy of the President's remarks. His statement should not be subjected to exegesis since its real importance was the broad thrust, perspective, vision, and broad framework. The word 'homeland' does not have a precise political connotation.

- Q. (Laughter) Now what does the administration expect from the European Security Conference.
- A. We want the conference to be a cooperative success in that it advances the process of East-West cooperation.
- Q. How about the establishment of a U.N. high commissioner for human rights?
- A. That would definitely legitimate the process of making human rights a legitimate concern.
- Q. Come on, Mr. Nameless, what is the point of Carter's speech anyhow?
- A. It is an explicit affirmation of the President's recognition of the essential intractability and complexity of international affairs.

"No wonder he wants to remain anonymous."
(unquote)

Much more sense is made by Rep. Robert H. Michel, Illinois Republican, who later was to distinguish himself by helping to lead the fight against the common situs picketing bill which resulted in its defeat by a vote of 217-205, a real shocker to both Carter and organized labor. They thought its passage was certain.

Congressman Michel, on March 9, asked and was given permission to address the House of Representatives for one minute. This is what he said (Congressional Record, March 9, 1977, page H1879):

THE CARTER ADMINISTRATION'S DO-IT-YOURSELF DIPLOMACY

Mr. Speaker, in the short time he has been in office President Carter has made a unique, if not bizarre, contribution to international affairs by his administration's do-it-yourself diplomacy. American Ambassador to the United Nations, Andrew Young, said 2 days ago that U.S. troops might be sent to Rhodesia as a peacekeeping force. The White House denied that any such plans were being made. Now, this morning we read that Brady Tyson, deputy leader of the U.S. delegation to the U.N. Human Rights Commission has "apologized" for alleged American intervention in Chilean affairs. The White House said such an apology had never been cleared with the President.

Mr. Speaker, what is going on in this administration? So far as foreign relations is concerned, no one can say. This do-it-yourself diplomacy is confusing other nations and confusing the American people as well. I do not think it is an exaggeration to state that not within the memory of anyone in this Congress has there been such a disgraceful lack of coordination and internal discipline among high-level foreign policymakers than we have seen in this administration. This is the kind of blundering that can lead to war, Mr. Speaker, and President Carter better shape up his appointees and do it quickly.

He might begin by calling in Ambassador Young and asking him just what he meant when he told the Washington Post that black American soldiers will not obey orders if the President felt it was in the national interest to side with South Africa.

Much of Carter's difficulty in "managing the dependencies" (countries that are said to be dependent upon the United States for aid and security) stems from his sense of loyalty to this one man, Andrew Young. Among other things, Carter feels that Young was responsible for delivering the black vote last November, so Young seems able to get most anything that Carter can deliver to him as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. In addition to his regular staff in New York City, Young has been given an additional staff in Washington. Heading his Washington staff is Dr. Anne Forrester Holloway, a 35-year-old black. Under her are a congressional lobbyist, a full-time foreign service officer adviser, and a secretary. Carter has asked Congress for an additional $250,000 to finance this new bureaucracy.

Also, according to syndicated columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novak, Carter gave Young "carte blanche to choose the Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations." He chose Charles William Maynes, 38, most recently secretary of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace (a most interesting appointment since it was the Carnegie Endowment that, some years ago, produced a plan for the military takeover of South Africa and Rhodesia). Young also is to sit with the National Security Council (Brzezinski's bailiwick), and with the President's Cabinet. As Evans and Novak conclude, Young "will be closer to multi-lateral diplomacy in the UN than Vance can be on the seventh floor at State: and his advice will be crucial in Carter foreign policy."

Meanwhile, Carter's off-the-cuff diplomacy has produced yet another problem. In his press conference of March 24, Carter said that there are 14 nations with which we have no formal diplomatic relations, and that he'd like to restore friendly relations with those nations, starting with Cuba and Vietnam. He did not say that of those 14 nations, 6 are in the Americas, and 4 of them have severed diplomatic relations with the United States because of Carter's crusade for human rights in the "dependencies" (in the Roman Empire they were called provinces; but they paid tribute to Rome, while we pay tribute to those over which we extend our aegis).

It seems that Carter—speaking for the minority groups represented by Brzezinski and Young—is making friends of our enemies and enemies of our friends.

But some of the difficulty faced by Carter is brought about by a restructuring of the Elite which put him where he is. In a most unusual move, Newsweek broke the silence and spoke up on a formerly unspeakable subject: the Council on Foreign Relations. In an issue (March 28) which featured "The Outspoken Andrew Young" posed with a pencil at his post in the UN, on the cover, Newsweek gave the popular version of how the CFR has been made second best to the newer Rockefeller creation, the Trilateral Commission. The article follows and, space permitting, editorial comment will follow the article.

MANDARINS IN TROUBLE

Since the end of World War II, U.S. foreign policy has been dominated largely by the circle of influential men who belong to New York's Council on Foreign Relations. From Franklin D. Roosevelt to Jimmy Carter every President has recruited council luminaries—its membership roll is a sort of Who's Who of the Eastern Establishment elite—for high level diplomatic trouble-shooting missions or for top jobs in his Administration. But the council is not universally admired. Some outsiders view it as a kind of shadow government; others dismiss it as a private club where aging foreign-policy mandarins pontificate over tea and cookies. Both views are exaggerated, but of late even some of the council's elders have grown alarmed by a sense of their organization's waning influence. The result has been a genteel furor within the book-lined confines of the council's four-story headquarters on Park Avenue.

Hushed Tones: Like all council affairs, the squabble has been kept carefully out of the public domain. It began last month when Bayless Manning, 53, a former Stanford Law School dean, quietly submitted his resignation as council president after nearly six years in the job. In hushed tones—voices are never raised at the council—the word spread that Manning had been eased out of office, principally by David Rockefeller, the council's chairman. By these accounts, Manning was deemed by council elders to have been a lackluster fund raiser and to have presided over what some view as the council's decline into little more than a cozy club for dilettantes—a comedown from its traditional role as the source of seminal thinking on U.S. foreign policy.

Both Rockefeller and Manning deny this version. A spokesman for Rockefeller said that Manning "left on his own accord" and that the council "hated to lose him." Manning, who has no definite plans when he leaves the council on Jan. 1, was reached in Sun Valley. He was even more explicit. "It's absolute, total (expletive)," he snapped. "It's more than 100 per cent wrong. It's 4,000 per cent wrong. I'll swear to it on fourteen Bibles and three Korans."

But among many members and staffers at the council, the consensus was that Manning had been pushed out of his job—albeit in the always gentlemanly fashion that is a hallmark of council behavior. "It was done after an informal discussion by some members of the board," one council insider said. "There was no blood spilled, but it was done."

Wherever the truth may lie, the Manning affair is not the first to ruffle the prim and dignified atmosphere of the council. In 1971, on the eve of the council's 50th anniversary, the appointment of William P. Bundy as editor of the council's prestigious quarterly, Foreign Affairs, touched off a heated public controversy. Many younger council members vehemently opposed Bundy because of the key policymaking role he had played under Lyndon Johnson during the war in Vietnam. The controversy left permanent scars.

The heyday of the council was the 1940s through the early 1960s, and many of its most illustrious figures are linked with the cold-war era—and the discredited war in Indochina. The roster includes such pre-eminent leaders of the Establishment as John J. McCloy, the Wall Street banker who served as High Commissioner in postwar Germany, as well as the late John Foster Dulles, President Eisenhower's Secretary of State, and his brother, Allen Dulles, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

"Supply Depot": Council members are still found in high places in Washington. Four key members are now officials of the Carter Administration: Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, national-security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal and arms negotiator Paul Warnke. But when it comes to providing fresh talent and innovative concepts on such pressing global problems as food, energy, and population control, it is the Trilateral Commission—a newer and younger organization with members drawn from North America, Japan and Europe—that is considered the real “supply depot” for the Carter Administration. “We don’t have the cutting edge we once had. We’re not really in the center of things,” one council member laments.

Some members of the foreign-policy Establishment believe that the council’s present difficulties stem from its own efforts to change with the times, and that Manning is being made a scapegoat. Manning has endeavored to broaden the council’s membership from a geographic, age, racial and sexual standpoint—the organization now has 60 women and 22 blacks on its rolls—but some say he has diluted the council by bringing in people whose expertise and prestige in foreign affairs are limited.

“The council,” says member and author Ronald Steel, “is now a place for businessmen who want to feel they’re on top of foreign affairs. It has become an organization in search of an identity.”

—Angus Deming with Tony Fuller
(end of article)

The foregoing Newsweek article, while it seems to be a frank and no-holds-barred expose of the Council on Foreign Relations, it is also the signal for a new departure and a step forward in the plot for establishing The New World Order. Much of the article is true, but to anyone who has studied the reports and published articles, and observed the words and actions of members of the CFR and the TLC, it is obvious that this is the truth but not the whole truth and nothing but the truth. In the first place, Bayless Manning is not “being made a scapegoat.” He is merely following orders, orders that probably were given him first-hand by David Rockefeller, who is top man in both the CFR and the TLC.

There seem to be four purposes involved in this CFR–TLC publicity. First, the CFR had ceased to be a secret power cell. Too much was being told about it. To top things off, Carroll Quigley—innocently and perhaps unconsciously—revealed the background of the CFR and the reason for its existence. So, it was decided to “publicize” the CFR, make it seem like “an organization in search of an identity.” Foreign Affairs, the organization’s quarterly publication, was the subject of a subscription drive. Women were invited to join the club. Then blacks were sought and selected for membership.

Secondly, there was something of a power struggle within the CFR which bothered the Rockefellers, and involved the Rothschilds. After World War II, the Rothschilds retreated somewhat from their industrial and corporate enterprises and went back to banking and goldsmithing. But, about ten years ago, the Rothschilds began to expand their interests and compete in the multinationalist fields that the Rockefellers had found so very profitable. The Rothschild interests became especially powerful in the communications field (Watergate was one of the results). To make the story short: CFR became something of a battlefield in the intramural war between the two Big Rs. So, it seemed advantageous for David to create a new organization that would be Rockefeller-controlled in all ways. Hence the Trilateral Commission. However, this didn’t work, because Rothschild agents are deeply imbedded in the TLC also, especially among European and Canadian members.

Thirdly, the CFR had developed into an “American” organization, and it was time to denigrate nationalism and promote interdependence and Regionalism. A Trilateral organization involving nations from Europe and Asia as well as North America, seemed the answer.

Finally, by giving the CFR the appearance of an “open” club, it would be possible for the Elite Insiders to use the CFR as a sort of cover and camouflage, behind which they could continue to make plans to rule the world. The evidence of this:

The most ambitious program the CFR has undertaken since its creation of the United Nations, is the “1980s Project.” This is, in the words of Bayless Manning, an effort “to analyze the characteristics of the kind of international system that would be suited to deal with the foreseeable world problems and conditions of the upcoming decade; to identify the changes in policies, institutions, and attitudes that such an international system would imply; and to suggest ways of bringing about those changes.”

In other words: CFR will make the plans, TLC will carry them out.

ABOUT WOLVES THAT WALK LIKE MEN

THE CARTER CURSE

Washington insiders refer to it openly as the "Carter Curse"—the strange series of coincidences that come upon foreign heads of state who visit President Carter in Washington. Canada's Pierre Trudeau went home and ran head-on into personal problems involving his wife; they have agreed to a separation. Britain's James Callaghan went back to Downing Street to run into political trouble. He narrowly survived a vote of confidence by teaming up with the Labour Party—but as we went to press another political squabble was developing and Callaghan was still in hot water. Then Israel's Yitzhak Rabin was wined (literally) and dined at the White House, then returned home to face charges that he and his wife were sending their savings out of the country to be banked in "safer" American banks. Then Japan's Fukuda flew back to Tokyo and into a mess of trouble not of his making. Being an industrial power, Japan must have atomic power to keep its factories running, feels it has a right to reprocess its own nuclear fuel. But Carter says he's wary of nuclear proliferation, insists that Japan must use fuel provided by the United States. The Asahi calls it a time-bomb that, says the newspaper, may "damage friendly relations."

The "Carter Curse" also seemed to be extending itself to other countries that were in the process, or about to be in the process, of making "special deals" with the Carter Administration. The Netherlands government collapsed, a caretaker regime took over until new elections could be held. The French Cabinet resigned en masse. A new Cabinet was formed, but there is much uneasiness because the French Communist party has more power than ever before. Then there was the fall of the Gandhis in India—which will mean the end of stability in government for some time in that large, hungry country.

And all of those special envoys that Carter sent to various spots in the world; none of them accomplished much of anything, except to make matters worse in the case of Andrew Young's visit to Southern Africa. This latest junket, "Cy" Vance's trek to the Kremlin, was a disappointment. Our Secretary of State couldn't even reassure Russia's Prime Minister as to the fate of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment. Brezhnev is said to be quite interested in ERA; possibly because its passage would make American women equal to Russian women in the "right" to sweep streets, dig ditches et al.

Meanwhile, here at home, what had been hailed as a honeymoon between a Democrat President and a Democrat Congress began to assume the appearance of a trial marriage that was about to break up. However, both Carter and Congress were working from opposite sides of the spectrum towards a common goal: Total Regionalism.

In the first place, Congress did grant Carter the right to reorganize the bureaucracy, on his own terms. Said UPI: "The House, sweeping aside questions about constitutionality, voted overwhelmingly yesterday (March 20) to give President Carter the authority he requested to reorganize the federal bureaucracy.... Carter's reorganization formula provides that each plan will go into effect within 60 days unless either the House or Senate passes a resolution of disapproval...." This sixty-day period is the same as that provided in the case of most Executive Orders. Congress can revoke most any Executive Order if it is done within 60 days. But here's the rub: Congress never seems to disapprove in time. So, Executive Orders become "laws of the land" because Congress does nothing to prevent it. The same treatment—or lack thereof—can be expected to occur when Carter starts the total Regionalization of all remaining agencies of the Federal Government.

As for the Congress, just to help with the Regional Plot, on March 3 Senators Magnuson and Mathias introduced S 892, "A bill to establish a national policy on areawide planning and its coordination, to encourage the use of organizations composed of local elected officials to perform federally assisted or required areawide planning, to require use of planning districts established by States in Federal planning programs, to require certain Federal land use actions to be consistent with State, areawide and local planning, to authorize the Office of Management and Budget to prescribe rules and regulations relating thereto, and for other purposes."

A House version of this bill, called "The Intergovernmental Coordination Act of 1977" was introduced by Rep. Ashley of Ohio. The bills were originally developed by the National Association of Regional Councils (NARC), and are backed by The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR), the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National League of Cities, and other satellites of the original Rockefeller-backed 1313 network in Chicago. In essence, here is a plan to provide blanket Congressional approval for any and all Regional programs prepared by appointed bureaucrats and then funded by the Federal Office of Management and Budget. OMB is also in charge of the Carter Reorganization Program which has been approved, sight unseen, by Congress. Carter's human rights crusade, his reorganization program, his energy program, his programs to redistribute the land and the wealth; all these mean dangerous times ahead for all of us. And the fact that there is turmoil and uncertainty in other world capitals (save Moscow and Peking) doubles the danger. Much of this is highlighted in a special report which follows.

BEWARE OF WOLVES

We have a pet theory: Whenever an organization is formed for a specific purpose, some person or group of persons will come along and try to subvert or sabotage that organization. Jesus referred to them as "false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves." And there was one in His own band of twelve disciples.

That the same thing could happen at the level of civil government is not surprising: one of the founding fathers spoke of "a Republic—if we could keep it." Throughout history men have been reminded of the need for eternal vigilance. So it comes as no surprise when we receive a letter stating that the National Rifle Association is in the process of being subverted and may be taken over by the subverters at NRA's next convention on May 21st, in Cincinnati, unless members are warned and prepared. NRA has been the acknowledged leader in the fight to preserve the Second Amendment, the right to keep and bear arms. This, of course, is the reason for the attempt at subversion.

Briefly, the Oram International Corporation is an "ecologist-liberal" think-tank and fund raising group which prepared a plan for subverting NRA. Heading this group is Robert Anderson, Chief Executive Officer of Richfield Oil (ARCO), member of CFR, Chairman of the powerful Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, etc.

In an attempt to save NRA, which means aiding in the preservation of the right to keep and bear arms, a member of NRA's Board of Directors, Gene B. Crum, addressed the annual meeting of the Kansas State Rifle Association, at Salina, Kansas, on March 5, 1977. Following is the text of that speech, considerably condensed but not altered in context:

The prime question which I am asked now, particularly since Jimmy Carter mounted the Presidency, is this: "What is the situation on the Federal level? Are we going to be allowed to keep our guns?" The swiftest and most simple answer I can give you right now is this: I do not know, and I do not think so, in that order....

At this point, we had better consider the wolves: they will be with us for the next decade and longer, and may prove to dominate our national life more than we would ever prefer.

It is easy to point out to you that the Carter administration is staffed by a great many young people, people who are very strongly committed ideologically, and whose ideology in many cases is very foreign to the ideals held by the bulk of the nation. Flushed by their participation in a hard-fought political victory, in which they have gained—albeit narrowly—complete control over a great nation, many of these young people are, as we put it in Indiana, "hot to trot" on forcing through the many changes which they wish to see. Some may or may not be so flushed with power that they are willing to try to cram through changes hotly resented by the American people.

Here, then, is a pack of wolves, and it is very hard indeed to predict what it will do. A great deal of this pack's initial policy will be based on the President's leadership and blessing, because it is from this source that the pack draws its power. However, after some time in Washington, each member of this pack will develop his or her own constituency of sorts, which in due course usually develops into a certain independence in the areas given over to personal administration. Nearly every President has suffered from this, and there is no reason to suppose that President Carter will be an exception....

There are, however, wolves of much greater stature than any who scheme in Washington, D.C.. Because our gun ownership rights—and any decision to hamper or end them—are based on bedrock political considerations (I hope I do not surprise anyone here when I remind them that the Second Amendment—the “Right to Keep and Bear Arms”—was not written merely so we can hunt rabbits or shoot paper targets), it is only fitting that we view the gun issue from the standpoint of other equally bedrock political considerations. Some of these “wolves” are:

The Kansas Wolf... That wolf is the food issue. At the present time, Kansas and the surrounding States are perhaps the prime food-producing regions of the world. As you know, more basic food is produced in this region, using less human energy, than practically any place in the world. I hardly need remind you that this region, as are many others, is in deep trouble (weather—Ed.), and may more or less suddenly be almost unusable in the context we’ve enjoyed since World War II. Should this disaster occur—and we are now receiving considerable warning that it might—the impact will reverberate throughout most of the more highly developed nations. The political impact will be major. The resulting social turmoil will be staggering, and there no longer is any question that the political leadership of most nations, including our own, is not able to cope with the burdens and challenges now occurring. A food riot is a dangerous and frightening thing to any political authority, whether in Poland or Pittsburgh, because a disturbance of this kind skirts very close to the ragged edge of popular insurrection—and such insurrections sometimes succeed. Add other factors, and the political “mix” can become deadly. In such situations, and in the pervasive period during which the “brew” occurs, it is a very great temptation for incompetent leadership to grasp at any straw which holds forth the glimmer of “stability” for their continued hold on the reins of power. Aware that these reins lead through our noses, and that as an armed people we hold the ultimate check in our system of checks and balances, this leadership yearns for any means possible to hopefully eliminate this threat. As is so often the case with incompetents and those who are ignorant, the inclination is to patch ignorance with sloppy thought based on symbols, and to strike at the symbols rather than the real problems. One such symbol is the gun. As turmoil brews, whether in the United States or elsewhere, these heads will grow increasingly uneasy, and can be expected to react spastically—and sometimes with success—in ways which will increasingly make matters worse. Beware of the Kansas Wolf, gentlemen; his kind is increasingly prowling this planet. Where one of his kind succeeds, the reaction of mankind is such as to foster success for others of his pack. With such success, the danger grows immeasurably for the loss of your liberty. The political planners of both East and West are less sensitive to our desire to live free than they have been for many generations, and as 20th Century economic schemes are being forced literally to bite the dust—Kansas dust, Ukraine dust, Saharain dust and others—you will see how little we are regarded, save for the degree we can be induced to comply on economic terms.

The Winter Wolf... Beware of other wolves. This winter, we found another at our door: The Winter Wolf, the archtypal spectre of energy resources stretched too thin. I will not belabor you with this matter since you’ve already suffered through several months of intensive national discussion, but much the same comparison established with the food issue applies to the energy problem. It is very clear that our nation is so highly developed that a major energy shortage lasting any degree of time will exert such change as to have major impact.... If we face sufficient crisis... the pressure from present leaders for a substantial collectivization of our society will be very great.... Under collectivist systems, no matter how initially mild, the price paid by the participants is the surrender of individual liberty. Do I need to remind you as to what is the greatest exercise of individual liberty in a political structure? You know: the free possession of arms by the bulk of the citizenry. Upon that, even the liberty of free speech is based. Beware of the Winter Wolf, gentlemen; he has bared his fangs this year, and we have yet to feel the full political impact of this. Strong sound leadership from our pro-gun movement can sooth nervous politicians and planners but it remains to be seen whether such leadership is forthcoming.

The Spiritual Wolf... When we talk of leadership, whether of our movement or of the society at large, we cannot ignore another wolf which is uncommonly dangerous, for which I have no other name than The Spiritual Wolf. We, as gun owners, have suffered badly at the fangs of this demon, and all signs suggest worse as time goes on. Those who, for various reasons, find it convenient to delude themselves and others with lies concerning the supposed “capability” of a firearm to “cause” crime and tragedy, are applying the rankest sort of humanism, presupposing that Man is inherently good and is somehow corrupted by things around him, such as “war,” “drugs,” “poverty” — and “guns.”

There never has been any study which has demonstrated how this casualty works. Nor will there ever be any such study successfully completed: it flies in the face of every lesson taught in the Scriptures and passed down—however diluted—in the higher heritage of our Christian civilization. An inanimate object has no inherent capacity to “cause” a person to misuse it. The Scriptures teach us that the reason we kill, and war, and rob, and do other unspeakable things is that Man harbors Evil in his heart, and consciously decides, each day, in some way, to follow that Evil rather than Good. In the absence of one type of instrumentality the decision is carried out in another manner. Humanists argue that having a gun available “makes killing easy.” Such a sad lie: killing is made easy not by technology, but by the passage through the vale of decision. Once the decision to kill, or to rob, or to commit adultery is made, the rest is swift and easy, regardless of how the intent is carried out. Strong forces see to that, just as they bless a lie.

Today, as it has always been, Man yearns for someone to release him from the nagging awareness that he is responsible for his own actions, that he is going to answer for his every action, unless he accepts Christ as the governor of his heart and thereby gains the mercy of God....

The point I am making is this: our society is now in a life-or-death struggle with humanism, and because so many churches have abandoned their Christian mission, because so many leaders now openly sneer at “old fashioned morality,” the society is losing. We are losing in tangible ways.

In the late 1950s, humanists decided that they had the cure for crime. Aside from anti-gun laws and the relaxation of laws dealing with a considerable variety of unspeakable offenses “which have no victim,” humanists felt that they could deal with the criminal element directly. Their scheme was developed loosely under the term rehabilitation, and consisted in a considerable variety of approaches, ranging from talking to hardened criminals...and convincing them that their jailing wasn't really their fault—they were there because any number of factors in their upbringing weren't enlightening and favorable; thereby they got a rough deal out of life — and society was at fault.

Before the humanists entered the prisons to try out their mission, the crime rate in the U.S. had dropped to its lowest ebb since very early in the century. There were plenty of criminals in the prisons, but fewer in the streets. People rarely were distressed to get up in the morning to discover they'd forgotten to lock the door the night before. In some parts, folks took quiet pride in not ever locking their doors at all. This soon changed.

Within a few years, the prisons were nearly half empty and the streets began to fill with violence. Worse, those who were released to be “rehabilitated” outside by starry-eyed social workers were so successful that they soon attracted young followers, who found the criminal lifestyle attractive, successful, and remarkably free of danger from government intervention. Before the “rehabilitation” experiments were attempted, those responsible had to gain the support of government officials. Many of these, already suffering from spiritual bankruptcy, anxious to remain in power through whatever political gimmicks possible, were active supporters of the programs which have brought violent death to our streets, rape to our kitchens, and heavier locks than were ever thought needed to our doors. Few of those responsible for releasing this army of criminals upon us have ever apologized. Indeed, they point the finger of accusation at us—the honest gun owners—in their mad effort to shift the blame. Their very philosophy will not permit anything else: humanism is the wellspring of most of the ill-conceived legislation, social programs and enforcement policies now burdening us—and you will find that the situation is going to grow worse, unless there is a God-sent miracle. There are too few prepared now to tell our leaders that there is Another, Better Way; and there are too many in powerful positions who are committed to shutting out any effort to spread the Word. We, as gun owners, are going to feel the bite of this wolf much more—particularly since humanism is now, apparently, the guiding philosophy of most of the nation's leadership. The only thing we can do to fight this is to be informed and resolute, to stand up tall for what is Right, and at other times to pointedly spend much time alone, on our knees. If we can do this, and develop our movement's leadership, there may be a chance.... And, remember always, Gentlemen:

Beware of Wolves.

FEDERAL REORGANIZATION REVISITED

TO FIT THE NEW WORLD PATTERN

"All dictators inflating bureaucracy do it with the cry: 'Down with bureaucracy!'" So wrote Jacques Ellul in his book, The Political Illusion. "This was one of Hitler's major lines, a subject of his most biting sarcasms against the bourgeois democracies. Then Stalin (at least ten times between 1947 and 1953), Khrushchev, and Nasser attacked bureaucracy, making it the scapegoat for all that was wrong. After them, as any good dictator must, Fidel Castro took up the same facile explanation in August, 1963: 'The government's branches are full of people who do nothing...When these people find that their salary is secure, they no longer feel any urge to serve the public...'

"But all these leaders wisely returned to the road of bureaucratic organization because they had to. A state that wants to do everything and change everything can do so only with the help of an enormous bureaucracy."*

Ever since the organization of the Hoover Commission in 1947, the Congress and the President have been trying to reduce and streamline the Federal Bureaucracy. Instead however, there have been thirty years of proliferation and expansion of federal services, operations and agencies. Yet all Presidents from Truman to Carter have promised to reduce the size and cost of the Bureaucracy, and have ended up enlarging both. The secret, of course, lies in Ellul's last sentence: A state that wants to do everything and change everything can only do so with the help of an enormous bureaucracy.

So, Presidents promise to cut waste, save money, increase efficiency. But the promise has never been kept and can never be kept by any Chief Executive who wants to do everything and change everything. Example: Carter the campaigner promised to cut the executive department's 2,000 agencies down to 200. But Carter the President admits that this is impossible, and his chief change-agent, OMB Director Bert Lance, says: "I don't think we should play the numbers game."

Beginning with the Kennedy administration and extending through the administrations of Johnson, Nixon and Ford, the real aim of reorganizational efforts was not to reduce the size or cost of the Bureaucracy, but to change everything. However, in the changes that were made, Congressional approval was always assumed or implied. When Nixon issued his first executive order dividing the Nation into Federal Regions, he was careful to state: "The Reorganization Act which the Congress has passed and which I am signing today (3/27/68) gives the President important tools in his effort to make the machinery of government work more effectively. As a part of that same effort, I am announcing today certain structural changes which I am making in the systems through which the government provides important social and economic services."

Thus did the seed of Regional Governance first get planted within the executive department of the federal government. But Nixon was careful to state that he had Congressional approval behind all the executive orders which he issued to "change things."

There is this difference with Carter: he asked—and received—a blank check. He has been authorized by the Congress to do what he will without seeking Congressional approval. The importance of this radical departure from Constitutional limitations was brought out by Representatives opposing the unconstitutional grant of power. The arguments against H.R. 5045 were valid, but futile. Examples:

Rep. Jack Brooks (D-Texas): "The issue presented by this legislation is not the reorganization of the executive branch. I doubt there is a single Member here who thinks the Government is now so perfectly organized, so smoothly running, that we can just sit back and admire it... The questions we have to consider here today are how much authority the President should have, and what role the Congress should play in the reorganization process. Determination of the organizational structure of the executive branch is a legislative function. Make no mistake about that. Throughout most of our history the reorganization of the Government has been accomplished through legislation. It was not until the 1930's that we began to delegate the authority to the President...."

Rep Robert Walker (R-Pa.): "The legislation we consider today is...unconstitutional. ... Why this House would consider taking an unconstitutional route to a desirable end is beyond my understanding. Article I, Section 1 of the Constitution clearly places all legislative power within the jurisdiction of the Congress. Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution clearly states that bills are to be passed by Congress and sent to the President for his approval or disapproval. In other words, under the Constitution, the President is empowered to propose legislation to Congress. But for a proposal to become law, it must be specifically approved by both the House and the Senate. This legislation (fails to) satisfy these constitutional mandates and the result is an unnecessary and unwise abdication of legislative prerogatives and responsibility..."

After an hour of argument on the floor of the House, the Reorganization Act of 1977 was passed, 107 to 22, and was signed into law by President Jimmy Carter eight days later, on April 6, 1977. It seems worthy of notice that President Nixon's reorganization program created the Office of Management and Budget to oversee the activities of the Ten Federal Regions, and that under President Carter's reorganization program the Director of OMB will coordinate the reorganization—which will see the "regionalization" of every domestic area of federal government along with completion of plans to merge the nation into a Regional Area of world government!

The domestic phase of this new program is highlighted by the "regionalization" of that national policing agency known as the Internal Revenue Service. Now that Carter's Reorganization Program is assured, IRS is to develop and install a new, "marvelously efficient system" of computerized data retrieval. To be called the Tax Administration System (TAS), it is claimed that it will be able to produce five years of any taxpayer's records in a matter of seconds. The new system would function through a series of interconnected computers and data banks located in the Ten Federal Regional Capitals. When the plan was explained to the Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Al Ullman—a liberal Democrat from Oregon—even he raised doubts and had reservations. He suspected that TAS could (and probably would) become "a system of harassment, surveillance, and political manipulation," and that individual privacy could not be sufficiently protected. Some 48,000 IRS employees would have access to the data; the system probably would be interconnected with other governmental and military retrieval systems; a control apparatus superior to any ever seen in any totalitarian state could be developed.

This is but one possibility as Carter's OMB begins to complete the Regional Governance System in the Fifty States that will have become the Ten Federal Regions.

THE WORLD CONCEPT

An article concerning the Trilateral Commission appearing in the February/March issue of Candour, the British Views-Letter, accented the "regionalist" aims of this Rockefeller-dominated group. After naming the Trilateralists who are officers of the U.S. federal government, the article then notes, correctly, that "With the single exception of Carter, this lot are also members of the Council on Foreign Relations, the American equivalent of our Chatham House conspirators. They share yet another common bond which has just come to light. Again except Carter, their mugs are all to be found in the leather-bound photograph album of visitors to the Institute of United States Studies in Moscow—the Russian think tank for experts in American affairs. Now, what would such 'insiders' be flashing their smiles there for, unless this so-called think tank is a medium through which Soviet policy-makers are briefed on the latest directives from the international policy-elite?

"There would appear to be, then, a Trilateralist monopoly of the White House, despite efforts by the media to minimize the importance of the Commission. So it is not difficult to foresee the broad directions in which U.S. foreign policy will lead—and, for that matter, Western policy, since where the U.S. leads other nations must follow! Since it was started up by the Rockefellers, the Trilateral Commission has obsessed itself with the notion of shaping a new economic world order based on the eradication of nationally-independent policy-making. Trilateralist Brzezinski has gone on record as declaring the nation-state to be 'no longer compatible with reality... international banks and multinational corporations are acting and planning in terms that are far in advance of the political concepts of the nation-state.' Presumably, what would be regarded as compatible with 'reality' is the replacement of individual nations by regional arrangements like the E.E.C., or at least some system of world inter-dependence, based perhaps on the further development of export-led economies, which would render exceptionally difficult any kind of national revolt. Either way, it would make the adoption and implementation of policies laid down by the CFR/Bilderberger/Trilateralist power-elite that much easier to force on countries. You know, world government, whatever the means or name, stinks just the same." (unquote)

In the above, we were struck by the words "The replacement of individual nations by regional arrangements . . . which would render exceptionally difficult any kind of national revolt."

The words stand out because of what is happening in Canada, one of the Western Trilateralist-included nations. The following from The New York Times of March 27, seems self-explanatory.

CANADIAN PROPOSES A DIVISION OF NATION INTO 5 'REGIONS'

By Robert Trumbell

Victoria, British Columbia—In an endeavor to resolve the Canadian unity crisis, posed by separatist movements in Quebec and other provinces, including this one, Premier William R. Bennett of British Columbia wants Ottawa to replace the 'rigid federal system' as Mr. Bennett called it, with a more flexible union of five regional groupings. The Bennett plan under which regional bodies working with the 10 provincial governments, would control local tax spending and exercise other powers now vested in Ottawa, enlarges on a vaguer concept that has received some support across the nation.

A need for some kind of constitutional change to satisfy the aspirations of Quebec, whose recent election of a separatist government is considered the gravest threat to the integrity of the 110-year-old Canadian Confederation in recent times, has been acknowledged by Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, among others. . . . Mr. Bennett feels that the federal framework devised more than a century ago, when British Columbia was still a separate territory, is unsuited to the huge and diverse, yet mostly underpopulated, modern-day Canada. The Bennett formula envisages an "Atlantic region" embracing Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and a "Prairie region" comprising Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Ontario and Quebec would be separate regions, as would British Columbia, which Mr. Bennett called the "Pacific region."

"Most surveys indicate now that people want the type of decentralization, with more regional opportunity, that we have been advocating," Mr. Bennett stated. He added: "You can't opt for the status quo, because it isn't working."

The preceding article was accompanied by a map, depicting the "Proposed Canadian Regional System," with Canada divided into the five Regions (Pacific, Prairie, Ontario, Quebec, and Atlantic), even as the United States has been divided into ten federal regions.

There is this difference: a "kind of national revolt" is threatening in Canada, so the plan for doing away with Provinces (States) and replacing them with Federal Regions, is proposed openly and publicly. The idea of doing away with the States entirely is not yet openly advocated by the Elite—not yet. In this development of the New World Order, Canada is ahead of us politically, even as Great Britain is ahead of us economically. But, with Carter acting as the direct representative of the Trilateralists, we're catching up fast.

All of the European Nations that are represented (still unofficially, of course) by the Trilateral Commission have been Regionalized. We weren't sure just how far the Concept of Regionalism had been developed in the USSR. The Soviet Union is composed of 15 Republics that contain Slavs, Turkic, Finno-Ugric, and other Oriental and Indo-European people speaking over 200 different languages and dialects. To re-divide these 255,000,000 people into eleven regions, abolishing national, tribal and ethnic differences would be quite a task, even for a totalitarian dictatorship. However, the Supreme Soviet seems to be succeeding. An article by Peter Osnos of the Washington Post has to do with the difficulty of living in the cold winter in Siberia, where the average January temperature is 46 below zero. The article contains this one sentence: "On a hunting trip along the coast of the Laptev Sea late last fall, Areean Kuzmin, a vigorous 93-year-old scientist who is vice chairman of the regional government, was stranded for several days." So, it appears that the task of regionalizing the Soviet Union has not been stranded.

There is little that we can do about the progress of regionalism at the international level, or in other nations. The Trilateralists seem to be in charge and unbeatable—for a while at least. However, here in the United States, opposition to Regionalism is mounting and, under the national leadership of such organizations as the Committee to Restore the Constitution (P.O.Box. 986, Fort Collins, Colorado 80522), progress is being made. One example: In Illinois, legislation has been introduced in the State Assembly, calling for a full-dress examination of regional government. State Representatives who introduced the legislation are concerned with what they view as "the explosive growth of Federal legislation, administrative regulations and executive orders which, when analyzed, have in fact removed the control of government from the people and their elected representatives to a Federal level of appointed officials."

That popular support for this investigation is growing in Indiana, is evidenced by the following editorial which appeared in the February 23rd issue of the Indianapolis Star:

THE REGIONAL 'THING'

Regionalism is somewhat like those 'things' that emerge from intergalactic spacecraft in science fiction movies. No one is certain What is happening. Meanwhile, the 'things' take over.

Today every State and every part of the Union has been invaded by the 'thing.' The Nation has been divided into 10 regions. Indiana is in Region 5 with headquarters in Chicago. Like other States, Indiana is divided into subdivisions.

The whole apparatus is manned by non-elected officials. They pooh-pooh the idea that there is anything sinister about it. They say their task is merely to co-ordinate Federal with State and local programs. But since Federal funding of State and local programs involves State and local compliance with all kinds of Federal demands, the power of the regional super-government is far-reaching. Only a tiny amount of this power has been used—with some staggering effects.

Offices such as the State Welfare Department are forced to expand under a fund-cutoff threat. Schools, colleges, universities, businesses, police agencies, city councils, State legislatures all find themselves dancing to the tune of far-off bureaucrats elected by no one, responsible to no one but themselves, apparently beyond the reach of President and people alike.

The complexity of this is hard to watch and hard to judge. What good or harm will come from keeping crime records secret and destroying them, from forcing policies on schools, universities and businesses, from basing all kinds of policies on theories far removed from local realities—under pressure of cutting off funds that really originated in the State and local community?

The vast machinery of regionalism has been used to push land use programs and environmental programs capable of crippling a city's economy. The bureaucrats pull back when local populations and officials flare up. Then persistently they begin again.

Regionalism began with U.S. Public Law 90-577, dated Oct. 16, 1968, which critics say destroyed the constitutional principle of separation of powers by yielding to the Executive powers of great scope involving land use, planning and transportation. It was supplemented by Executive Order No. 11490 on Oct. 30, 1969, providing for implementation by presidential order, in event of emergency, of executive orders of previous administrations, by Proclamation No. 4074 and by Executive Order No. 11647.

Analysts of these edicts say they have opened the way for dissolution of State and local government and their replacement by centralized rule from Washington through the 10 regions.

In the present session of the Indiana General Assembly, S.B. 102 and H.B. 1417 would void Federally imposed regional government in Indiana. They would provide for criminal prosecution and permit civil action against any person trying to uphold or enforce an act of Federal regional control in Indiana.

This is bold legislation which might be capable of bringing on a direct confrontation on the regionalism controversy, which has been going on for many years and has frequently eluded efforts to grasp the essentials. Enactment of this legislation might bring us closer to an understanding of just how dangerous the regionalism 'thing' is to self-rule and freedom.

The Indianapolis Star
Wednesday, 23 February, 1977

The dangers of Regionalism will be brought home (literally) to citizens if Jimmy Carter "regionalizes" the Federal Energy Agency and federal snoopers start checking homes for their insulation, the use of power and fuel, the efficiency of appliances, whether your car is a gas-guzzler, etc. "Energy" is the current crisis and if James Schlesinger gets a Cabinet-level department, a new layer of federal snooping will have been added. In such cases, prevention is important because there is no cure short of revolution.

THE ART AND SCIENCE OF CREATING CRISES

THE ENERGY FANTASY

President Jimmy Carter, who has tried to imitate President Franklin Roosevelt, and complete the work of political, economic and social reorganization begun by his predecessor, is suffering by comparison. Roosevelt's "First Hundred Days" were phenomenal. He maintained complete control of Congress and easily persuaded the lawmakers to create a series of New Deal "alphabet agencies" to combat a created crisis. FDR's First Hundred Days saw the closing of all banks, the establishment of the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), the Federal Emergency Relief Administration (FERA), the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA), the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), the Farm Security Administration (FSA), and the National Recovery Administration (NRA). In the following few months, FDR labored and Congress brought forth the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Social Security Administration, etc., etc. FDR told the people in his fireside chats that the Federal Government had the final responsibility for their welfare. "The only sure bulwark of continuing liberty," he argued, "is a government strong enough to protect the interests of the people." And he made the great majority believe him, he had the full support of the Congress, and he was a good and faithful servant of Wall Street and the International Bankers who backed his moves from 120 Broadway to the Governor's Mansion at Albany, to the White House in Washington, D.C. Only the Supreme Court failed to cooperate fully with FDR; he therefore vowed to thoroughly "liberalize" the Court—and the Constitution which the Court upheld—and he and those who followed him on the Chief Executive's chair finally succeeded in doing just that.

But Jimmy Carter's first hundred days have not been phenomenal. He, too, was going to please all the people, maintain control over Congress, and still be a good and faithful servant of the Trilateral Commission, whose leaders had selected him, trained him, and predestinated him to become the leader of the people of many continents and the islands that lay between them.

But Congress is rebelling, Carter is backing off on many of his proposed plans, admits that his upcoming energy program will cause him a great loss in public popularity. Even the commentators and columnists are beginning to show a loss of faith and trust in the man who wanted to be like FDR. An example of this is to be read in the news analysis of James McCartney of the Knight-Ridder newspaper chain's Washington bureau, which appeared in the April 14 issues. McCartney wrote:

"The Presidency of Jimmy Carter, who rode into the White House as an advocate of love, has now entered an era of political confrontation. White House political operatives say it is going to get worse. Confrontation, they say, may well become the hallmark of the Carter Presidency.

"Carter already is in scraps with organized labor over the minimum wage, with Congress over dams, with liberal Democrats over his economic program and with the airlines over deregulation of fares. He is headed for new and bigger battles with the auto and oil industries over his forthcoming energy program ... And the White House is well aware that many consumers are going to holler next week when they discover that under the Carter energy package they would have to pay more for transportation and more to heat their homes.

"The contentious Carter is also visible in foreign affairs. He is currently scrapping with the Russians over fishing rights in the Atlantic as well as strategic arms and human rights. 'There are going to be a series of confrontations,' said one well-posted White House aide. 'We know that what we've seen so far is only the beginning,' said another official, 'if Carter fulfills what he believes to be his commitments to the public from the campaign, he's not going to be popular with a lot of very powerful people.'

"Carter intends to paint himself as the champion of the average man, and his opponents, across the board, as representatives of special interests.... The Carter strategy, aides say, is still based heavily on a carefully planned image-making program in which Carter is seeking to present himself as a 'populist.' It started with his walk up Pennsylvania Avenue in his Inaugural parade. It has continued with a 'fireside chat,' the wearing of a sweater, a presidential phone-in, attendance at a town-meeting in New England, and cutting back on White House limousines and other symbols of the 'imperial' presidency.

"Carter considers such activities highly successful. Aides say he intends to repeat the cycle, in various forms, in an effort to maintain public support....

"Carter's toughest problem is that his promised programs contain contradictions, according to one aide. He wants to fight inflation, and has promised an anti-inflation package. But his upcoming energy program, officials concede, will be inflationary because it would cause higher prices for fuel.

"Carter may be expected to use every tool of public relations available to him to convince the public that his approach is best, even if at times contradictory." (unquote).

There are a few confrontations that were left out of the foregoing. For instance, that "special interest group" made up of veterans, reservists and current members of the armed forces are not a little vexed by Carter's blanket amnesty to AWOLs and deserters in time of war. Another rather large and respectable "special interest" group that resented the pressure tactics used by the Carters—man and wife—and Mondale and the White House staffers in an attempt to coerce State Legislators into approving the proposed Equal Rights Amendment—the fact that these efforts backfired is indicative. Also, for Carter to back down on promises affecting all taxpayers in their pocketbooks is not a recommended way to prolong friendships with the franchised: we refer to the withdrawal of the so-called $50 rebate.

Then, for Carter to back up Secretary of State in his SALT-stand against Russia, and then let Brzezinski go behind Vance's back and propose a better deal with the Kremlin, this smacks of a re-run of the way a former National Security Adviser named Kissinger upstaged a former Secretary of State named William Rogers.

Finally, there is this "human rights" crusade which is as phony as was the swine flu scare last year. As we write this report, Carter is telling OAS delegates from the States of Central and South America that we will help them in every way possible so long as they promote democracy (whatever that means to Carter and the Trilateral Commission), and so long as they aim toward the better observance of human rights. At the same time, Carter is opening doors for the resumption of trade, aid and travel with Castro's Cuba. We don't always agree with Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, but he certainly made sense when he wrote of The Cuban Gulag in his newsletter of April 15, 1977, saying in part:

"'If you can't lick 'em, join 'em.' This is the policy that lurks behind the mask of devotion to Human Rights which conceals the present program of progressive surrender to communism. Out of one side of his mouth the President tells of his devotion to Human Rights. Out of the other he assures those who deny human rights to their people that he will do nothing about it. 'There is no linkage,' he emphasized. This only applies to enemies, as action is definitely taken against friendly countries where human rights are slighted.

"Cuba is riding high. The Cuban military forces form the mercenary army of the Soviet Union, which provides the guns and weapons the Cuban forces use, and the money to pay the troops. It is reported that the Soviet Union is subsidizing Cuba to the extent of $3 million per day. The Soviet Union can give this money because of the credits granted them by the capitalist world, to buy the goods produced by the capitalist system, and which now exceeds $40 billion. The Cuban forces, paid servants of the Soviet, conquer Angola and impose a minority Communist Government on the Angola people. Angola then serves as a sanctuary for communist-influenced and led rebels to invade Zaire. Thus the malignant process proceeds.

"This is a strange time to be adding to Cuba's capacity to extend world communism by military force. The Cuban record in the field of human rights is appalling...."

As the White House aide said, Carter's promised programs contain contradictions; and those contradictions create crises or add to already existing crises. Is this a deliberate part of the plan? The still-developing energy crisis may give us a clue:

The Jack Anderson and Les Whitten column of April 4, as it appeared in The Chicago Daily News, reports that "A startling secret document circulating inside the Carter administration warns tersely that 'social upheaval and revolution' may destroy the United States by the year 2000 unless the nation takes drastic steps to solve the energy crisis." The alleged secret document points out that "Americans must make up their minds that they will have to change their way of life and pay enormously higher taxes to develop new energy sources. Billions must be poured immediately into the mining, transportation and conversion of coal.”

Now, whether there is an actual shortage of fuels and the equipment needed for the production of energy is a moot question. There is much contradictory evidence to prove either side of the argument. But there is no doubt about the fact that there is an energy crisis! It may be phony, it may be real, it may be a part of the plot to extend the power of the government into new facets of the lives of individuals; but there is an energy crisis, regardless of whether there is or is not a shortage of energy.

Now, here is the contradiction:

This letter is being written before Jimmy Carter gives his fireside chat on energy and later tells Congress about his plans concerning the energy crisis. But we do know this: Carter's plan is to concentrate every possible effort on the mining, transportation and conversion of coal, just as Jack Anderson and Les Whitten reported.

And this makes the Carter Energy Plan self-destructing.

First, there is the mining problem. Most of the coal that Carter is talking about is in the West, in Wyoming and Montana primarily. Experts in this area of knowledge estimate that there are about 234 billion tons of coal that is mineable, given today's technology. However, most of this coal must be surface mined or stripped. So, its mining depends on a long-debated strip-mining bill which has not yet been passed by Congress. The industry is worried about this bill. It presupposes that the land can be stripped for coal and then replaced so that there is no permanent or long-lasting damage to the soil. But ecologists don't believe it, and the industry is edgy about giving it a try. There's a provision in the bill which reads that strip mining won't "materially damage" alluvial valleys (streambeds). And those alluvial valleys are where the coal is.

Also, this land where the coal lies just happens to belong to Uncle Sam. We are told that Uncle Sam owns outright or controls the mineral rights on 80% of the land where coal is to be found—some 69 million acres in all. This is under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Land Management. Mining companies bid for leases, which allegedly are handed out to the highest bidder. But there is a Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 which covers the exploitation of all lands in the BLM domain. The bill requires that land-use plans must be prepared by the Secretary of the Interior whenever any of this land is put up for coal-mine leasing. This means that environmentalists can challenge every lease—and the legal red tape could hold up the strip-mining for years, or perhaps for decades.

So, there goes Jimmy Carter's Energy Plan, all bound up in red tape. Which may be a blessing, because if coal were used as the principal energy source in America, experts warn that in a few years the country would be as smoky as Pittsburgh in 1945.

Now where does that leave Jimmy Carter? He claims to be a staunch environmentalist, yet he insists that coal is the Nation's best energy alternative for the coming years. Do we have here the deliberate creation of a crisis within a crisis? This is what is bound to happen when programs contain contradictions, as do Jimmy Carter's programs—admittedly. And when such contradictions are praised, one wonders.

THE DEEPENING CRISIS

We began this report with reference to the First Hundred Days of FDR, as compared with the same days of Jimmy Carter. But we were reminded that we were not the first. A mysterious character named Benjamin V. Cohen seems to have beaten us to the punch in a speech he made over a month ago in Washington, D.C. Cohen is a charter member of the Council on Foreign Relations, was one of FDR's Brain Trusters, served as a legal adviser to the American Embassy in London, is a prominent ADAer, etc., etc. He is the subject of a column written by Eliot Janeway which appeared in the March 22 issue of the Chicago Tribune. We quote from that column:

“Ben Cohen is the personification of the elder statesman. For more than a generation he has been recognized as the ‘shadow’ member of the United States Supreme Court. As a young man, he helped draft the Balfour Declaration which served as Israel's Magna Charta. In his prime, he drafted the United Nations Charter. In between, he wrote pattern-making New Deal legislation that set the pace for Franklin Roosevelt's electrifying First Hundred Days.

“Washington has learned to listen when on the rare occasions Ben Cohen speaks. He did so March 11 at the dinner commemorating the 44th anniversary of Roosevelt's first year in office. Cohen's address that night stands as a notable historical document. It struck a balance between Roosevelt's accomplishments and his wrong turns; and it focused on the central problem President Carter inherited from his predecessor....

“Cohen concluded his revocation of the crisis of 1933 with the forward-looking warning: ‘We are now in a time of national crisis—indeed in a time of international crisis, possibly deeper than the public has yet realized.'...'' (unquote).

We who were alive at the time will remember that the crisis Roosevelt faced ended with the entry of the United States into World War II. How the crisis which Carter faces will end no one can know. But there are certain preparations for possible police control of a national—or international—crisis which should not be overlooked.

For the past months there has been a concerted effort to destroy the effectiveness of existing police agencies, for the possible and potential replacement of such local police agencies with a national police force operated through LEAA on a Regional basis and incorporating National Guard units as a part of such Regional Police Authorities.

This plot began to hatch in California, and the following which is excerpted from the Santa Cruz, California Morning Star of Nov. 10, 1976, is ominous:

Plans currently exist which would enable the military to assume the function of governing America. "Martial rule," according to the training manual of the California Specialized Training Institute," is purely and simply rule by the military." It comes into existence "when civil government can no longer maintain law and order," requires no proclamation in order to be invoked, and exists "so long as it is necessary to restore conditions to where civil government can again function." Martial law cannot be invoked by an elected official, or by a civilian officer of any stature. Rather it occurs "upon a determination by the highest military commander in the jurisdiction that civil government has ceased to exist and must be replaced with force necessary to restore its existence."...

Individuals are currently learning and practicing the skills that would be required in such a contingency. Such training is known by a variety of acronyms. Among these are Special Weapons and Tactics—or SWAT....

Now note the following which appeared in the San Gabriel Valley (California) Tribune of March 28, 1977:

"Washington (AP)—Sometime within the next year, some Americans may be startled to see Russian tanks rolling across U.S. countryside. The tanks will be accompanied by soldiers wearing Russian-style uniforms, carrying Soviet AK47 assault rifles and riding in Russian armored personnel cars.

"No matter what it looks like it won't really be a Russian invasion. It will be part of a training exercise involving the U.S., not the Soviet, Army. The 'Russians' will be part of one of the U.S. Army's special new units, organized to provide more realistic training for fighting what the military likes to call 'the potential adversary.'...'' (unquote)

To add fillip to this unusual "War Games" syndrome, there is the statement of Rep. Robert C. McEwen of New York, entered in the Congressional Record of March 31, page E 1956, in which he proudly announces that a company of the New York National Guard has been selected to go to England for joint training exercises with British territorial forces from May 28 to June 12.

"This marks the first time," said McEwen, "an Army National Guard infantry company from New York has been sent outside the Continental United States for training."

Putting these and similar reports together, one angry citizen wrote to her Senators and her U.S. Congressman, saying in part:

"The enclosed stories about the 'war games' to be played across the American countryside this summer by the Army is frightening. I want a full explanation of this activity. 'Mock' Military Government 'takeover' in war games of various cities and even States is not new and dates back to at least 1951 when Culver City, California Mayor J. Ray Klots was forcibly ejected from his City Hall during summer 'practice' maneuvers.

"Knowing full well that the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration is spawning a National Military Police Force and even an International one, I would like to quote Richard Velde, LEAA Administrator, recently resigned, when he spoke before an International Symposium on Criminal Justice and Statistics Systems: 'We know that there will be a national system which links all sizeable law enforcement, court, and corrections agencies. We know that this system will not stop at the national borders. In this day of rapid communications, a truly international system is essential. We know that within regional systems every police officer will have to be accessible at all times. Every court and corrections official will have to be able to come on the line as well.'"

Roosevelt's created crisis ended in war. Is this a preview of the progress of Carter's created crisis?

THE POWER TO REGULATE TO DESTRUCTION

SUPREME COURT RESCINDS THE SEVENTH AMENDMENT

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of common law.

—Amendment VII to the Constitution of the United States of America.

Over the years, and especially since the era of the New Deal Alphabet Agencies, the "Feds" have been getting away with some very unconstitutional shenanigans. The M.O. (modus operandi) never seems to vary:

1. A "crisis" is said to exist.
2. Congress enacts a law to control the crisis or regulate the activity which created the alleged crisis.
3. An agency is created, and empowered to make whatever rules it deems necessary to carry out the congressional purpose.
4. The agency assumes that the rules it makes are as binding as actual law, and its agents act upon that assumption.
5. When a victim protests about illegal searches and seizure of his property, or about the fines or orders imposed, the agency against which he is protesting gives him a hearing.

This is like giving a man a trial before a "judge" who not only helped write the law, but has been hired to help enforce it by the same agency that accused the man of violating it. Hundreds of federal regulatory agencies write millions of rules and enforce them as just indicated.

Such procedure is patently unconstitutional. The Bill of Rights makes it abundantly clear that no officer or agent of the United States Government—be he elected or appointed—may act simultaneously as lawmaker, policeman, prosecutor, judge and jury in any given case. There is a specific division of powers which makes it unlawful for Congress to administer, for the Administration to judge, or for the judiciary to legislate. However, all these unlawful actions are taking place, because the Constitution is being ignored or deliberately perverted.

In cases involving unlawful acts of federal agencies such actions have been challenged —and often successfully—by citing the Seventh Amendment and demanding a trial by jury. This takes the case out of the hands of the federal agency and places it in the hands of a federal judge and a jury of one's peers, where a fair trial is possible.

But this "loophole that permits justice" has long been a sore spot with the "Feds" and it seems that the Supreme Court now has ruled that in cases involving federal regulatory cases, a trial by jury is no longer necessary; never mind what the Seventh Amendment may say to the contrary notwithstanding.

Thanks to an alert subscriber, we have a copy of the following Reuters Commodity News Service wire which reads:

"Reuter, March 23, 1977 — The (Supreme Court) Justices ruled eight to nothing that the right to trial by jury is not absolute. 'The point is that the 7th amendment was never intended to establish the jury as the exclusive mechanism for fact-finding in civil cases,' Justice Byron White said. Congress may, in creating new public rights and remedies by statutes commit their enforcement 'to a tribunal other than a court of law—such as an administrative agency,' Justice White said. The court's ruling today, which will have an impact far beyond the circumstances of this case, places the right to a jury trial in a new light. The court has now held that the 7th amendment spoke to 'the existing legal order as it found it, and there is little or no basis for concluding that the amendment should now be interpreted to provide an impenetrable barrier to administrative fact-finding under otherwise valid federal regulatory statutes'."

Regarding this ruling, the *August Review of April 8, 1977 wrote, and we quote:

When we heard this we called the Supreme Court in Washington and they agreed to send us the decision in question, Case Nos. 75-746 and 75-747 combined. The booklet we received contained 18 pages of reference, supporting cases, arguments (pro and con) and conclusions; trying to read it would give anybody a headache.

* The International August Review is published bi-weekly by The August Corporation, P.O.Box 4218, Scottsdale, Arizona 85258. $52 per year.

The decision stemmed from two cases involving OSHA (Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, established under the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970) and their right to arbitrarily impose fines on safety violators, and to enforce the judgments....

...The Justices concluded on page 18: "Congress found the common law and other existing remedies for work injuries resulting from unsafe working conditions to be inadequate to protect the Nation's working men and women. It created a new cause of action, and remedies therefore, unknown to the common law, and placed their enforcement in a tribunal supplying speedy and expert resolutions of the issues involved. The Seventh Amendment is no bar to the creation of new rights or to their enforcement outside the regular courts of law." (Emphasis added).

Needless to say, we were aghast when we read this—it has virtually destroyed our judicial system as we know it today. And get this: it did not appear in any publication, to our knowledge, until one week after its release, and even then, it was in publications such as Daily News Digest. We alerted groups around the country and they could hardly believe it was not an "April fools" joke.

Our conclusions as to the real reasons this decision was handed down, are 1) to alleviate an already over-crowded court system, 2) to insulate the government and its enforcement of its own regulations, from the court system, and 3) to allow existing federal agencies to act "speed(ily) and expert(ly)" in collecting their judgments from the public. The decision affects only cases where the government is involved.

Point 3 is of most interest to us. Without even starting on the question of whether or not various agencies are Constitutional in the first place, we must note that they now have sweeping control over us. For instance, did anyone really believe and seriously think the government would allow the "tax rebellion" to go on forever? There are probably two million Americans who refuse to pay income tax for very constitutional reasons. Those cases were seldom brought to court, and the question of the constitutionality of income tax was meticulously avoided, because the government could not win.

...The implications are just as great in cases involving the Securities and Exchange Commission, OSHA, the Justice Department, the Treasury, the Federal Trade Commission, Housing and Urban Development, Health, Education and Welfare, E.P.A., etc. Could the handwriting be any clearer?

(end of quotes from August Review)

Not included in the above listing was the about-to-be-created Department of Energy, which will have broad search and seizure powers involving inspection of homes for insulation, defective or wasteful appliances, gas-guzzling cars, etc. And HEW, under the management of Joseph A. Califano, becomes especially dangerous when "the chains of the Constitution" are removed. Currently, Califano is writing to State Governors, industrial executives and union leaders seeking support for a campaign to vaccinate all children in the United States. Pointing out that the schools are the easiest means for assuring that "youngsters are adequately protected against preventable communicable diseases." This seems to be a part of the United Nations drive to "vaccinate every child" in the world by 1992. The World Health Organization (WHO) will concentrate on children in the developing countries, and the health ministries of the developed Nations will be expected to cooperate by launching national "immunotherapy" drives. We remarked that HEW Secretary Califano is currently writing letters to stir up "regional and local support for his program. We have a copy of his letter (not written to us), dated March 28, 1977. He points out, among other things, that "President Carter has stressed his desire to make the Federal government more responsive to the concerns of the public.... I fully intend to make the President's commitment into a reality at HEW... As soon as possible, I intend to propose specific reforms to permit more effective public participation in HEW's activities...."

Califano included the summary of a Report of the Task Force on Citizen Participation which informs the reader that "The Secretary (Califano) is asking the ten Regional Directors and all Washington HEW staff to "assist in encouraging dialogue on the Task Force's Report."

Among the objectives proposed is that: "Regional offices seek to involve all segments of the population in the Department's activities.... The Ten Regional Directors should hold timely town meetings and hearings, contact their local and state media, communicate and meet with citizens and citizen organizations.... Representative regional teams should be organized and housed in Washington to attend HEW planning meetings and discussions to advise on the public perspective expressed in the Regions."

One of the plans underway at HEW is "the pursuit of psychosurgery." In case you do not recognize the term, "psychosurgery" is the name of the new technique that has replaced lobotomy. The San Francisco Sunday Examiner & Chronicle of April 10, 1977 reported that "A congressionally mandated national commission has urged the federal government to conduct and support research on psychosurgery, the controversial surgical destruction of brain tissue for the purpose of altering behavior. In days of cruder techniques, psychosurgery was called lobotomy.

"In its final draft of recommendations to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the 11-member commission also proposes guidelines for psychosurgery on institutionalized mental patients, prisoners and children. Minimizing concerns raised in recent years about the safety, morality and efficacy of psychosurgery, the commission says the technique "has potential merit and... the risks are not excessive, despite the fact that the results of specific procedures have not been completely validated'."

The article confirms that "some 50,000 lobotomies were performed in the 1940s and 1950s—many of them simply with a sterilized ice pick—the practice fell into disrepute."

Now, however, the technique has been improved and the number of lobotomies being performed (under the name psychosurgery) is again increasing—up to 500 or so a year in the United States."

Accompanying the article from which we have quoted, was a special report headlined "Techniques All Destroy Brain Tissue." The report notes that "approximately 200 active psychosurgeons" are working in the United States today—those doing brain surgery to alter behavior as opposed to removing painful tumors, for instance. And they say the techniques have become highly refined:

"The various procedures in use today go by such names as cingulotomy, orbital undercutting, multitarget limbic lesions, and prefrontal ultrasonic lesions, among others. But whatever the name, the results are much the same: All the procedures cut or otherwise destroy selected brain fibers that are believed by some to be connected to centers of anxiety, depression, hostility or other mental disorders. The earliest method involved simply drilling a hole in the skull, usually just over the eyebrow, and inserting a sharp instrument into the brain to cut the tissue. Other techniques developed by Dr. Frank Ervin and others in Boston, often called the 'capital of psychosurgery,' involve implanting dozens of tiny electrodes in brain tissue after exposing and drilling through the skull. Electricity can then be used to burn the target tissue. Lasers have been used in the same way...."

Now let us hypothecate: This Supreme Court decision denying the right of trial by jury in cases involving federal agencies, makes it possible for any federal bureaucrat or any federally-funded change-agent to come into your home, haul you up before a special tribunal which can make a judgment, impose a fine or a jail sentence, and you have no recourse! So, if HEW is given the power to authorize and prescribe psychosurgery for anyone running afoul of its rules and regulations and judged a trouble-maker requiring behavior modification, then all patriots and defenders of the Constitution will be in dire danger!

Just in case someone thinks he has a right to defend himself against such brutal treatment, the behavior modifiers have thought of that, too. Gun confiscation is a part of the plan to prevent patriots from rebelling. We are told on the best possible authority that the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA) has established a timetable. In its study, A National Strategy to Reduce Crime (page 140) there appears the following information:

PROHIBITION ON HANDGUNS

The Commission believes that the violence, fear and suffering and loss caused by the use of handguns must be stopped by firm and decisive action. The Commission therefore recommends that, no later than January 1, 1983, each State should take the following action:

The private possession of handguns should be prohibited for all persons other than law enforcement and military personnel.

Manufacture and sale of handguns should be terminated.

Existing handguns should be acquired by the States.

Handguns held by private citizens as collector's items should be modified and rendered inoperative.

In an effort to prohibit possession of handguns the Commission encourages States to examine and implement all recommendations proposed in this chapter. The recommendations are intended to be an operative package.

Some States, however, may want to implement the recommendations in stages. They are urged to do so in the order in which they are presented in this chapter. Further, some States may already have taken steps proposed in the recommendations. In keeping with these local variances, the Commission urges each State to work out a combination of steps suited best to complete control of handguns.

Toward this end, it is the recommendation of the Commission that States study their present laws regulating handguns and take measures to insure that existing laws are enforced fully and are adhered to scrupulously by their citizens.

Next the Commission recommends that the penalties attached to committing a crime with the use of a handgun be increased. Further, to safeguard the lives of police officers, States should enact stop-and-frisk laws to authorize search of persons and automobiles when the officer has a reasonable suspicion to believe that he is in danger due to a suspect's possession of and access to a weapon.

As an additional step, the Commission recommends that States prohibit the manufacture, importation, or sale of all handguns other than those for use by law enforcement or military personnel. States should also establish agencies authorized to purchase handguns from private individuals for a just price, and further authorized to modify rare and valuable guns that owners wish to retain as collector's items. Finally, States should prohibit the private possession of all handguns other than those which have been designated as collector's items and rendered inoperative. (End of quotation).

The foregoing plan for the confiscation of all handguns from law-abiding citizens is labeled "recommendations." But upon reading them it becomes obvious that they are "guidelines" that the State governments are expected to follow. If any State rebels and refuses to follow the "rules of procedure" then federal funds are shut off, "revenue sharing" ceases. Furthermore, if the State continues to refuse to cooperate with the federal agency, then the State is simply ignored and the federal plan is carried out through the Federal Regional Network that can disregard State boundaries and State authorities whenever this becomes necessary.

Should any individual refuse to cooperate with any such rules of procedure laid down by LEAA, or any other federal agency, then he can be hauled before a "special tribunal" where all rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution are ignored or denied the victim.

"Another step on the road toward nationalization" was the phrase used by Senator Ted Stevens of Alaska when he spoke out in opposition to President Carter's Energy Emergency program. The phrase also aptly describes the actions we have reported in this letter: the Supreme Court's rescission of the Seventh Amendment and therefore the "legalization" of a new system of justice in the United States, the Regionalization of HEW's plans to control absolutely the health, education and welfare of every individual in the United States with the threat of psychosurgery for those who refuse to cooperate, and the confiscation of handguns so armed opposition to tyranny—as occurred in 1776—can be prevented.

Step by step, we have come so close to nationalization (another word for totalitarian dictatorship) that the media publishes openly things that were held secret just a few years ago. For example, ten years ago the news media "wouldn't dare" to print any item having to do with the Bilderbergers. Yet, on the television newscast on the night of April 21, there was mention of the fact that Henry Kissinger was in England to attend the 25th meeting of Bilderbergers at Torquay in southwest England. The morning papers were permitted to confirm that "Kissinger and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt are among 106 influential Western personalities who will discuss economic and political issues at the 25th closed-door Bilderberg Conference." Such public announcement was verboten a decade ago.

Similarly, it is openly announced that, in selling the Carter Energy Plan to a reluctant citizenry "even the public schools will be used for 'resocialization' of people on energy." Mark Siegal, Carter's deputy assistant for policy analysis, told the Washington Press Club: "We want to use the schools as agents for political reform. If our goal is to change America by the year 2000 or 2010, I don't think we can overlook our children." How many more steps before we arrive at the state of totalitarian dictatorship?

CONFERENCES, NEGOTIATIONS, AND DISCUSSIONS TOWARD CREATION OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

THE PLOT BEHIND THE PLOTS

While the people of the United States are spooked by a contrived energy crisis, and the people of the rest of the world are bemused by an insincere human rights crusade, the principal program of the Elitist Conspirators is being carried out with little hindrance or fanfare. That principal program is, in the words of Zbigniew Brzezinski, "the creation of a renovated international system...to shape a system which embraces the entire global community." Or, in more traditional words: To create a New World Order.

That the energy crisis was created in accordance with the Hegelian principle for bringing about a change, seems obvious to students of Hegel (Karl Marx was his most devoted disciple). Milton Friedman, Nobel-prize-winning economist declared, "There is no physical shortage of fuel and energy—only an artificial shortage created by bad government policies" (bad or planned that way?) "There was the big scare in the 1920s," said Friedman, "when it was said reserves of oil would last only 20 years... Since that time, consumption has increased dramatically, and so have reserves." (From U.S. News & World Report, March 7, 1977, pages 20-22).

The London Economist of April 23, 1977, agrees: "President Carter's energy plan is weaker than it looks, and certain to be made weaker in congress.... To put the televised piety in proportion:

- * World energy supplies are not 'running out' in any long-run sense of that phrase.
- * There is a lot of oil and gas in the ground which is thus far unpumped or unfound, but politicians and tax-gatherers have muddled into a period of high prices while making it unprofitable to pump and find them.
- * Even when these depletable reserves run out, as they eventually will, man is clever enough to unlock other forms of energy now locked into matter: in the earth, the sea, the light of the sun." (unquote)

The Economist is of the opinion that ours is not an energy problem per se, but that it is more of a political problem, one that was motivated by Government, and one that Government is trying to solve for political purposes. Stanton Evans, on CBS radio, said much the same thing: "The most decisive fact is that the energy problems besetting us have been created through official bungling and will be solved, if ever, by phasing government out of the energy business."

We agree with Evan's solution; but "official bungling?" We wonder. Could it not have been "planned that way?" If any power elite wished to gain absolute control over the lives and fortunes of a citizenry, is there a better way than through Jimmy Carter's proposed energy program? Think of the possibilities for control:

Federal spies could enter any home without prior warning and without search warrant, inspect garages, attics, closets, pantries, check on food and fuel supplies, on guns and other allegedly contraband articles. Energy change-agents could become a kind of Gestapo—this with the people's permission, since it would be done in the name of conservation and "patriotism" (that's Jimmy Carter's use of the word, not ours).

We are reminded that a similar energy crisis was announced some 38 years ago by the man Carter hopes to emulate: Franklin D. Roosevelt. Much the same language was used by FDR in promoting that energy problem. On February 19, 1939, a message was sent to the Congress, saying, in part:

"...Our resources of coal, oil, gas and water power provide the energy to turn the wheels of industry, to service our homes and to aid in national defense.... Our energy resources are not inexhaustible. Yet we are permitting waste in their use and production. In some instances, to achieve apparent economies today, future generations will be forced to carry the burden of unnecessarily high costs and to substitute inferior fuels for particular purposes. National policies concerning these vital resources must recognize the availability of all of them; the location of each with respect to its markets; the costs of transporting them; the technological developments which will increase the efficiency of their production and use; the use of the lower grade coals, and the relationships between the increased use of energy and the general economic development of the country....

"This report sets forth a useful frame of reference for legislative programs affecting these resources and illustrates another approach to the systematic husbandry of our natural resources. Specific recommendations are advanced for solution of the most pressing problems.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt."

So much for the domestic opportunities afforded a Power Elite by an energy crisis.

Whether planned or brought about by federal bungling, the crisis is upon us, and Government is the problem, not the solution.

We referred to the rest of the world being "bemused by an insincere human rights crusade." We meant that our friends and allies are being condemned for what Carter calls human rights violations, while adversaries are overlooked and their crimes ignored. Most of the States of South and Central America are offended, but Cuba is coddled and a negotiator with the rank of ambassador is sent to arrange for trade and friendly relations with that Communist Gulag Island. On the excuse of human rights violations, U.S. armed forces are to be removed from Clark Field and Subic Bay in the Philippines. The same reason is being used to explain the withdrawal of U.S. troops from South Korea. Ethiopia beat us to the punch and ordered all U.S. Government facilities except the Embassy at Abbis Ababa vacated within four days. As a kind of coup de grace, the Ethiopian government then turned to Moscow and thus becomes another Soviet satellite in a part of the world where a small spark might ignite far more than a brush-fire war. Summing up the situation world-wide, U.S. News & World Report (5/2/77) commented:

"Critics... say he (Carter) doesn't realize or doesn't care how unsettling his new approaches can be to the varying aims of U.S. allies.... New Zealand's Prime Minister Muldoon laments that this leads to 'consternation and confusion,' even among friends. From our bureaus abroad, these assessments of Carter's first days:

Moscow. Disillusionment. Where there was approval and good will, now there is only mistrust....

Bonn. New strains. West Germans fear Carter's human-rights campaign set off strong currents that... hamper Bonn's efforts to improve relations with Moscow and East Germany. Likewise, Carter's policies on nuclear nonproliferation are viewed as unrealistic in an energy-short world.

Paris. Lack of enthusiasm. French feel Carter plays to his U.S. audience, but tunes out the rest of the world.

London. End to a 'peanut farmer' image....

Rome. Admiration for boldness....

Geneva. Carter's ideas draw praise—and skepticism....

Tokyo. Uncertainty.

Latin America. Off-the-record epithets. Carter is seen as amateurish, contradictory, immature. One comment: Too much noise, no substance." (unquote).

We repeat: "While the people of the United States are spooked by a contrived energy crisis, and the people of the rest of the world are bemused by an insincere human rights crusade, the principal program of the Elitist Conspirators is being carried out with little hindrance or fanfare...."

Zbigniew Brzezinski, while serving in the triple capacity of agent for David Rockefeller, director of the Trilateral Commission, and tutor to Jimmy Carter, explained how this Power Elite would go about the task of creating and installing the New World Order. In an address delivered at the Kyoto, Japan meeting of the Trilateral Commission on May 31, 1975, he said:

"Our own work (Brzezinski's) in this Commission, it is increasingly clear, is that of developing sustained trilateral thought on the nature and character of the needed renovated international system.... I would hope that... we would fashion new or additional procedures for more effective consultations. ... I would hope to see the emergence of new political caucuses. ... a renovated international system will now require a process of creation — a process in which prolonged negotiations will have to be engaged and developed. It will require a process which recognizes the need for global adjustment in wealth... Today, the challenge which we ought to welcome is to shape a system which embraces the entire global community, and our trilateral regions can find a special opportunity in moving towards that end."

(unquote—emphasis added)

Consultations, political caucuses, negotiations, discussions; these are the key words in the Power Elite's plan to shape the New World Order. In that connection, note the plethora of political powwows that have occurred between heads of state, ambassadors and special representatives since Carter won the Presidential election: Mondale to the Trilateralist Nations, Young to Africa, Vance to the Middle East, Linowitz and Bunker to Latin America, Clifford to Cyprus, Vance to Moscow, etc., etc.

Meanwhile, Blair House in Washington has resembled a palace for transients as heads of state have come and gone, while paying obeisance or whatever they pay in return for pecuniary and/or political favors from the "man who pretends to be president of the world."

This, however, is not a one-sided affair, involving only United States officials in unilateral consultations, caucuses, negotiations and discussions. This is a Trilateralist procedure. Britain's Owen to Africa where the United States and other Trilateralist Nations are to cooperate in the destruction of Rhodesia, is an excellent example of how the consultations et al are proceeding just as Brzezinski outlined the procedure to be followed at Kyoto two years ago.

To control and direct such consultations, caucuses, negotiations and discussions, it is necessary that such Elitist groups as the Trilateralist Commission, the Bilderberg Conference, Council on Foreign Relations, etc., have strategy meetings from time to time. There was an important TLC meeting last January; and a Bilderberg Conference has just been concluded. The latter was so well described in a special article appearing in the April 22 issue of the Los Angeles Times, that we are reprinting that article—for the record—in its entirety:

ELITE TO EXCHANGE IDEAS AT FORUM OF THE MIGHTY

By Don Cook
Times Staff Writer

PARIS—In the faded Edwardian splendor of the Imperial Hotel at Torquay, a very English seaside resort on the south coast of Devon, the power elite of the Atlantic world will spend the weekend at an Olympian international gathering—the Bilderberg Conference. Henry Kissinger will be there, out of office. But West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, British Chancellor of the Exchequer Denis Healey and North Atlantic Treaty Organization Secretary General Joseph Luns, all still in power, will be there too.

There will be a Rockefeller (David), a Rothschild (Baron Edmond) and an Agnelli (Giovanni), representing the Fiat empire. There will be politicians, foundation heads, industrialists, bankers, economists, ambassadors, foreign ministers, think-tank experts and professors galore, plus a few journalists who will remain as secretive about the three-day proceedings as all the rest.

This will be the 25th Bilderberg Conference since the first gathering in a similarly dowdy setting at the Bilderberg Hotel in Oosterbeek, Holland, in 1954. Since those days, the Bilderberg Conference has obtained a class by itself—a symphony orchestra where other conferences are jazz bands. The first ingredient which makes the Bilderberg so special is obviously the level of its participants—their political and economic power, their intellectual and practical influence. Then there is the exclusivity, with fewer than 100 participants until this year's meeting at Torquay, where 120 are expected. And finally there is the mystique of privacy and secrecy. Not even a list of those attending is released to the press.

But the topic of this 25th Bilderberg discussion has been announced: "North American and Western European attitudes towards the future of the mixed economies of the Western democracies, and the Third World's demand for restructuring the world order, and political implications of those attitudes." That ought to be enough to keep 120 great minds at work from this morning through Sunday afternoon.

But the real meat of the Bilderberg gatherings is not the agenda or the formal discussions but the lunches and dinners, the drinks in the bar, the walks along the seacoast and the cozy chats in comfortable chairs with no prying eyes or ears, no recorded minutes or memorandums, no commitment and no holds barred except, presumably, the restraints of politeness and good behavior.

It was a Pole who conceived the idea—Dr. Joseph Retinger, now dead. Back in the cold war days of 1952 or 1953, Retinger, a fervid crusader for a United Europe, approached U.S. diplomat W. Ball, then in private business after a spell of government, about organizing a gathering of opinion-formers and men of influence and power to help define Atlantic objectives for the future. The two men approached Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands and asked him if he would chair the meetings, supervise the organization, issue the invitations and generally structure the protocol. Bernhard has the combination of ability, sophistication, wide international friendships and the cachet of royalty that put a stamp of success on the Bilderberg meetings from the first.

Organizing committees were set up in Europe and the United States. These organizers in turn selected the participants and worked out the discussion topics for each meeting and assigned the preparation of main discussion papers. Thus from the outset, Bilderberg was very much a process of "the elite sifting the elite." It remains so today.

Participants came from Western Europe and North America only. Although the Torquay meeting will be discussing problems of "mixed economies in Western democracies," (a polite way of referring to the portents of eurocommunism) and Third World demands" (which means Africa, the Arabs, Asia and Latin America), there will be no blacks or browns or yellows in the color scheme at Torquay and certainly no reds either.

The conference operates on a low budget with a small secretariat office in The Hague and everybody paying his own way, except for the occasional valued but impoverished intellectual. Its basic operating expenses are readily covered by contributions from either the wealthy individuals who participate, or by their companies. To name a few of the latter: Fiat, Ford, Unilever, Courtaulds, Imperial Chemicals, Kleinwort Benson, Alcan, Lehman Brothers, Dunlop Rubber, Exxon, August-Thyssen Hutte, Tube Investments, Shell and General Electric. With friends like these, money is no problem.

During the 1950s under Prince Bernhard, the Bilderberg Conference frequently convened twice a year, but then slowed down to meetings only once a year, usually in March or April, in out-of-the-way but exclusive spots like Garnish-Partenkirchen in Germany, Barbizon in France, St. Simon's Island off the Carolina Coast, Burgenstock in Switzerland, St. Castin in Canada, Villa d'Este in Italy, Cambridge in England, Saltsjbaden in Sweden. Comfort, convenient isolation and privacy are the first requirements of a Bilderberg setting.

In 1976, the Lockheed scandals hit Prince Bernhard and many others in the world and the Bilderberg Conference for that year was quietly shelved. The meetings had taken on such a personal stamp of Bernhard's chairmanship that there was a question whether or how they should continue. It was the turn of the British to host a meeting if one were to be held, and the "ideal solution" was found in the aristocratic figure of Sir Alec Douglas-Home—former British prime minister, foreign secretary and leader of the Conservative Party. He agreed to take the chair for one year only, and Bilderberg was off and running again.

The American steering committee is headed by William P. Bundy, editor of Foreign Affairs Quarterly. His European opposite is Prof. Ernst van der Beugel of Holland.

Everybody sits alphabetically in the conference room; and after each speaker has presented and enlarged on his paper, the responses from the floor are limited to five minutes each. That, in a technical sense, is all that happens at a Bilderberg meeting. The proceedings then are summarized and printed and distributed to all the participants with the careful notation on the cover, "Not for publication or quotation." They also are completely void of names. Neither the names of the authors of the basic papers are given, nor the names of those who speak during the discussions. The record simply notes that a German said or an Italian commented or an American observed or a Frenchman pointed out. In fact, the record of the 1975 Bilderberg meeting at the resort town of Cesme in Turkey on the subject of the economic, social and political impact of inflation in the world, which was supplied to this correspondent, contains little that is surprising or much above the level of interesting discussion.

Still they come, and clearly will continue to flock to Bilderberg if the steering committee is considerate enough to add them to the invited list. You do not apply to attend Bilderberg, nor do you have an automatic right to attend once you have participated. You are selected, ostensibly because you will add to the quality of the discussion on the topics chosen.

But who knows what Helmut Schmidt and Denis Healey will talk about when they walk beside the seaside at Torquay—or what a Rockefeller says to a Rothschild? Maybe they only crack jokes, but the mystique of Bilderberg is irresistible.

While surprisingly informative for an article about the Bilderbergers which appears in a metropolitan daily dependent on advertising for its existence, staff writer Don Cook does leave the reader with at least one false impression. This has to do with the character, position and financial status of those who are invited to attend Bilderberg conferences.

While the Rockefellers, Rothschilds and Agnellis are always there, they are not invited to attend—they run the show. Those who are invited to attend are dependent upon the Rockefellers, Rothschilds and Agnellis. They are journalists, heads of tax-financed foundations, institutes, universities, think tanks, international organizations, and politicians who are dependent upon the money-masters of the world for their jobs and their public positions. Those who are invited to attend Bilderberg Conferences are there to report to the Rockefellers, Rothschilds and Agnellis (and others of similar status in the Elitist Cabal). Those invited are there to offer suggestions, to proffer plans and "to take orders from the bosses on how to proceed with the establishment of the New World Order. As Bilderberg invitee Henry Kissinger once said in an unguarded moment these men are economically dependent, are "bound by order" and can "no longer have regard to national frontiers and must therefore of necessity open up all societies to the world that surrounds them."

Of course, the same is true of those who were invited to become members of the Trilateral Commission (as was Jimmy Carter), of the Council on Foreign Relations, and of similar exclusive internationalist clubs in which membership is by invitation only. They are "bound by order" and, in effect, they engage in the "conferences, negotiations, caucuses and discussions" on behalf of those on whom they are dependent for their power, position and financial status.

For example: British Chancellor of the Exchequer Denis Healey is presently important in the plan to create and install a new international monetary system. So, Denis Healey attended the Bilderberg Conference at Torquay where he conferred with Rockefeller, Rothschild and Agnelli. Then he flew immediately to Washington, D.C. to act as a principal director of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund, where the plans for the new World Monetary System are being formulated.

Other important meetings to be watched: Carter in Europe, and Vance and Gromyko in Geneva on May 18. Ominous happenings are planned. What we can learn, we shall report.

THE PRESIDENT'S ATTEMPT TO RESHAPE THE WORLD

CARRYING CARTER TO NEWCASTLE

There are many who, remembering the words of the first President of the United States, are filled with fear and indignation when any succeeding President deserts his post as the leader of this Nation and journeys to some foreign shore to assume the mantle as leader of the world. Because, it has ever been this business of quitting our own and entangling ourselves in harmful and unnecessary foreign alliances that has brought about loss of liberty for ourselves and denial of the opportunity for the pursuit of freedom for others of the world.

Jimmy Carter, in his assumption of authority as leader of the free world at 10 Downing Street in London, sets no precedent by such action. It began when Americans, swayed by the "spirit of millennialism," started to speak of America's "Manifest Destiny," when Teddy Roosevelt charged up San Juan Hill, and when as a result our Nation became politically involved with the "manifest destiny" of states and peoples outside our New World Hemisphere—notably with the Philippines and the Filipinos. Another giant step toward that alleged Manifest Destiny fulfillment came when that same Roosevelt carried his "big stick" (the United States Navy) around the world to show the rest of that world that we had come of age and we were to be reckoned with in world affairs. Then he capped it off by "settling" the War of 1905 between Russia and Japan.

But the big "manifestation of our destiny" came when President Woodrow Wilson went to Versailles in 1919 to dictate the terms of the treaty that was to end World War I. And the disaster which developed as a result of that event should act as a warning to Jimmy Carter, who is in London as this Report is being written, and who is there acting—as did Wilson in 1919—as leader of the free world. The parallel should be a warning to us all.

In 1919 there existed a "shadow government of the world" that headquartered in London and operated through the Round Table Groups. These were located in all English-speaking nations and in all parts of the British Empire. They were financed chiefly by the Rothschild interests and their activities were directed by Lord Milne and other officers of the Rhodes Foundation. Their principal goal was the creation of a world government operated by and for the English-speaking people of the world. These Round Table Groups had an American counterpart which was financed by the Morgan interests (with which the Rockefeller and Delano-Roosevelt financial interests were closely associated.) The group was directed by an English-educated, Texas-reared honorary Colonel named Edward Mandell House. It was House who personally selected Woodrow Wilson, then master-minded the latter's election to the Presidency of the United States. House also had a chosen group of associates which he called The Inquiry, which was to become the forerunner of The Council on Foreign Relations.

In 1977 there also exists a "shadow government of the world" which headquarters in the United States and has groups and affiliated organizations in the principal nations of the world. In the so-called Western World the chief activist organization is the Trilateral Commission, with members from the industrial nations of Western Europe, Japan, Canada and the United States. U.S. members were chosen from The Council on Foreign Relations, those who have attended Bilderberg Conferences, members of various World Affairs Councils, the Institute for World Order, the big tax-supported foundations such as Rockefeller, Ford, Carnegie, think-tank experts, international bankers, international lawyers, members of the so-called intelligentsia and other world citizens.

In 1911 it was Col. House who personally selected and groomed Woodrow Wilson for the Presidency of the United States. But, in 1973 it was the American section of the Trilateral Commission that selected, groomed and indoctrinated, and supervised the election of Jimmy Carter to the Presidency of the United States. While it seems true that Director Zbig Brzezinski made the recommendation and Chairman David Rockefeller extended the invitation—which Carter was obviously eager to accept—it seems that just about every member of the U.S. section had something to do with the grooming and indoctrination of the peanut farmer from Georgia.

Also, when Woodrow Wilson selected his staff, it was the one man, Mandell House,

Resolution Adopted by the Continental Congress, National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution
April 20, 1977

THE DECAY OF OUR REPUBLIC

Whereas The Trilateral Commission, made up of powerful international bankers, leaders of multinational corporations, many government officials, members of the World Affairs Council, and many members of the Council on Foreign Relations has been organized to bring about the total acceptance of global equality; and

Whereas The Trilateral Commission intends to achieve this new world order—most recently renamed, the Global Community—requiring a worldwide economy, a universal monetary system and equal use and global distribution of all the world's resources; and

Whereas a member of the Trilateral Commission wrote that the burden of advancing the era of global politics must fall most heavily on the American people since the United States is a society which protects the liberty of the individual, but the Soviet Union, having lost its liberty, is ready for the global community; and

Whereas the Global Community requires unilateral disarmament by the United States of America, which already is being accomplished through the Disarmament Agency, Detente and our acceptance of positions dictated by the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT) talks—thereby eroding our position as a free and independent nation; and

Whereas recent pronouncements of the Trilateral Commission concerning its so-called "Bi-centennial Era" indicate that 1989 is the target date to bring about a national "dialogue as to the irrelevancy" of our Constitution of the United States of America, necessitating the writing of a new constitution for the Global Community to be named "The World Rule of Law";

Resolved That the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, alert its members to the accelerating decay of our American Republic and impress government officials with the fact that the American people will never allow the Constitution of the United States to be replaced; and who became his chief adviser in all matters of moment. Wilson referred to House as his alter ego — until that fateful split occurred at Versailles and the sovereignty of the Nation was preserved as a result.

Resolved That the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, urge its members never to surrender our ideal of personal liberty in exchange for equality on a global scale.

On the other hand, when Jimmy Carter selected his staff, the shadow government had come to believe in safety in numbers. So, it was not just Brzezinski who was selected as an alter ego; but a whole slew of Trilateralists was selected to stand guard over the activities of their man Carter. According to the latest count we have, and possibly incomplete, Trilateral Commission members in Carter's administration include: Vice President Walter Mondale.

Secretary of State Cyrus Vance.

National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Secretary of Defense Harold Brown.

Secretary of the Treasury Michael Blumenthal.

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Anthony Young.

Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs Richard Cooper.

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for International Affairs C. Fred Bergsten.

Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance Lucy Benson.

Director of Arms Control and Disarmament Agency Paul Warnke.

* Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs Richard Holbrooke.

Assistant Secretary of State Richard Gardner.

Assistant Secretary of State Anthony Lake.
Special Ambassador to the Organization of American States Sol Linowitz.

And we recently heard that Casper Weinberger, Secretary of HEW under Nixon, has been enrolled as a member of the Trilateral Commission, is a potential replacement for Joseph Anthony Califano, Jr. who, as the chief architect of LBJ's Great Society program, has been publicly criticized for his employment of a personal bodyguard at a salary of $43,923 a year and a private chef at $12,863 a year. This makes him deviate from the Carter Austerity Program, and the Trilateral Commission may be concerned about the publicity value of such a man being in charge of the spending of more than $140 billion a year. (However, it is reported that Brzezinski still uses his luxurious gas-guzzling limousine when he goes to work; so perhaps the rumors of Califano's replacement are without substance).

But to return to our comparison:

When Woodrow Wilson was President, he had but one shadow government control agent to reckon with. But Jimmy Carter has at least sixteen TLV agents on his staff. This plus David Rockefeller of Chase, CFR, Bilderberg etc., A.W. Clausen of the Bank of America, Leonard Woodcock of UAW and, since TLC is an international brotherhood Carter is also fraternally responsible to such TLC executives as Edmond de Rothschild of Compagnie Financiere Holding, Giovanni Agnelli of the Fiat Empire, John Loudon of Royal Dutch Petroleum, Yusuke Kashiwagi of the Bank of Tokyo, and other assorted bankers and multinational industrialists who are financing this New World Order.

In 1919, when Woodrow Wilson went to Versailles, he went as a novice in international affairs to face three veterans, iron men who knew what they wanted to gain as a result of a war, men who were not about to give in to an idealist who prattled about making the world safe for democracy, actually believing the phrase that was only meant to be a propaganda weapon. They could honor Wilson as a President but disregard him as a diplomat because Col. House and his gang, The Inquiry were really running the show and House represented the shadow government directly.

There was Lloyd George of England, who had just won reelection on his pledge to "Make Germany Pay." The "Tiger" of the parley was Georges Clemenceau of France, also intent on reparations. Italy's Vittorio Orlando demanded control over most of the then defunct Austro-Hungarian Empire. And behind all this "nationalist" bickering was the shadow government's plan to turn Czarist Russia over to the Bolsheviks, and create a "homeland for Jews" in Palestine.

In the peace treaty that evolved, there were 440 separate articles, most of them so drawn as to assure future wars (the making and financing of wars was still "big business" for the international bankers and the munitions makers). The 440th article of the peace treaty called for the establishment of an embryo world government via the League of Nations. But the United States Senate balked, refused to approve the treaty, and the League of Nations could not endure without support from the U.S.

But this is the warning that Carter should heed: In 1919 Wilson disregarded the plans of the shadow government and went to Paris to "do his own thing." This caused a split between Wilson and House, and after that Wilson just "faded away" and soon disappeared from the world scene. In retrospect it might be recalled that when FDR discovered that the elite had no intention of actually making him "President of the World," and that he was being "used" by forces over which he had no control, and allegedly told Secretary of Defense James Forrestal about it, FDR died suddenly and mysteriously. And Forrestal "jumped or was pushed" from the 20th floor of Bethesda Hospital. Later, when DDE defied the Elite Cabal there was an ileitis attack. Under circumstances that will never be explained fully and officially, JFK disappeared from the scene, his brother likewise. LBJ feared to run again. Nixon thought himself big enough and with a sufficient mandate from the people to defy the hidden rulers and "do it his way." He became the first U.S.

The following is from the Toronto (Ontaria, Canada) Sun, Tuesday, April 26, 1977.

ANTI-LAW FORCES ARE WINNING

There is growing unease among police intelligence units both here and in the U.S. over the virtual emasculation of those services which combat organized crime and subversion since the post-Watergate era. Here in Canada our wire-tap laws do not allow for any surveillance of organized crime and those limited wire taps still allowed are under steady attack by the Canadian Civil Liberties Union and the other bleeding hearts. In the U.S. the American Civil Liberties Union has stated that: "The ACLU has made the dissolution of the nation's vast surveillance network top priority." The Communist backed National Lawyer's Guild stated in their July 1975 official publication: "The Guild must make room for those who believe in revolution and armed struggle" and as a preliminary to this has brought 75 different legal suits against various government agencies to attempt to force them to destroy their intelligence files.

Clearly the anti-law and order forces are winning:

- * In New York City over 1 million names of individuals and organizations have been purged from official intelligence records.
- * In Baltimore the police have destroyed all their intelligence files on activist groups.
- * In Texas the authorities have destroyed all their files on subversives and subversive organizations.
- * In Los Angeles the police destroyed almost 2 million entry items in their files.
- * In Michigan the entire anti-subversive file has been destroyed.
- * In Memphis the intelligence unit of the police has just been disbanded and all records burned.

Here in Ontario we are even more defenceless against organized crime and subversive activity... The frightening aspect of this situation is that sometime in the future we are going to pay dearly for neglecting this vital aspect of police work.

President to "impeach himself."

So, Jimmy Carter has been, voluntarily and happily, thrown among the wolves of the European Common Market. And what will happen as a result will be crucial to the world as well as to the United States.

Ironically, after Carter's official welcome in London, he was carried to Newcastle where he was able to observe disgruntled, "nationalized" coal miners contrasted with happy workers at the American-owned Corning Glass Works. Then he was whisked to the ancestral home of the family of George Washington, the man who warned against just such entanglements as Carter was to enmesh himself and the country he was representing.

But, there is this crucial situation: Those who are creating this New World Order find it necessary to maintain the "Western Alliance" at all costs. The real problems are economic and financial, but they must be made to appear solvable in a political context. Hence, before leaving Washington, Carter said this Seven Nation Summit was aimed at solving unemployment and curbing the "rampant robbing of people by inflation." But England is bankrupt because of welfare state socialism, Italy is about to "go Communist" because Corporate State Socialism hasn't worked. The United States is hovering on disaster because it has been promoting both Welfare State Socialism and Corporate State Socialism at one and the same time, while concurrently trying to prevent the spread of Soviet-style Socialism. If this all sounds confusing, it isn't really; there are several different brands of the same product, and the only question is: which brand will the American people buy without picketing or boycotting—or setting up a new "general store," as they did in 1776.

Meanwhile, those two former enemies of the "free world," Germany and Japan, have abjured every brand of socialism and, in every way possible have stuck to the old "free enterprise" system of doing business. Admittedly, this has been difficult because they have had to rebuild their economy in the face of great opposition from those who are determined to install the New World Order. But West Germany had a tradition which involved initiative, industriousness, picking themselves up and starting all over again. And Japan had been given a new start by Douglas Arthur MacArthur, who had given them a new Constitution and a new free-enterprise-based economic system.

So, the real "political" issues at this summit involve free trade and competition. For example, Japan fears her near monopoly on electronic consumer products will be destroyed; West Germany has been able to challenge the previous U.S. monopoly on nuclear power plants and Carter is trying to prevent their competition in Brazil, the Middle East, and elsewhere. Similarly, the U.S.-based multinational corporations have had a near monopoly on the sale of weapons and airplanes. France and England are challenging this, even as West Germany and Italy are challenging the Big Three auto multinationalists—General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

Then behind all of this is the intramural competition between the two giants: the Rothschild interests and the Rockefeller interests.

So, when the foregoing factors are added up, things do become quite confusing; some because they were planned that way, some because plans went astray and new plans had to be made.

However, in this summit confrontation (we are writing before the event), the Trilateralist agent who is supposed to keep Carter "on the beam" is C. Fred Bergsten, former Brookings Institution think-tanker, now the assistant secretary of the treasury for international affairs. Bergsten, speaking for the U.S. Government and the TLC before the Chicago CFR two weeks ago, said, and we quote the Chicago Tribune of April 23:

"The basic philosophy of the administration is that 'domestic' and 'international' economic issues are inextricably linked. Bergsten said the administration, more than any previous government, sees the world economy as a whole, and the U.S. economy as one part of this whole."

This current Seven Nation Summit is but one more step toward that World Government that will be required for the Trilateralist Global Community. However, we are reminded that one Nebuchadnezzar had the same dream that the Trilateralists now have. But he had yet another dream, one which had to be interpreted by the Prophet Daniel, who said:

"This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand of the word of the holy ones; to the intent that the living may know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."

AMERICA'S MANIFEST DESTINY - THE TRILATERALIST VERSION

FOREWORD

"No nation on earth should be allowed to interfere with America's manifest destiny to overspread the continent allotted by Providence for the free development of our yearly multiplying millions." So wrote John L. O'Sullivan, editor of the Democratic Review in the summer of 1845. He was writing to justify the annexation of Texas. Later in the year he used the same argument to justify occupation of the Oregon Territory. The Democratic slogan "Manifest Destiny" soon caught the fancy of the great majority of Americans, and was used as a rallying cry by those who believed the United States had a sacred duty to expand her territory to provide room for those "huddled masses yearning to breathe free" who were said to be causing over-population problems, and to furnish "new fields of conquest for her natural dynamism and allegedly superior political system." In the 1850s the slogan "Manifest Destiny" was taken over by the Republicans and was used to justify the purchase of Alaska in 1867, the annexation of Hawaii in 1898, and U.S. entry into the Spanish-American War and retention of the Philippines after that war.

METAMORPHOSIS

In the 19th century Manifest Destiny meant growth and expansion of the U.S. But in the last quarter of this century, Nationalism is replaced by Internationalism, Independence by Interdependence, U.S. Citizenship by World Citizenship. So, the Manifest Destiny of America "at this point in time" is to supervise the creation of the World Community. And, according to the Trilateral Commissioners who are fashioning the foreign policy of nations, it is the duty of the United States, Canada, Japan and the industrial nations of Western Europe, to finance the building of this World Community, and to provide police protection for its builders.

Is there any other rational explanation that can be offered for the sudden plethora of summit meetings, treaty discussions, conferences, negotiations, official visits to foreign capitals by Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Secretaries of State and Foreign Ministers, Defense Ministers and even Presidents' wives?

In this new version of "Manifest Destiny," Jimmy Carter has been selected to act as the visible leader of the people of the world while the World Community is being built and fortified. Therefore, it was very important that he make a good showing upon his first entry upon the world stage at London. While all observers admitted that nothing of real importance that might alter the course of nations occurred, the main objective was accomplished: heads of state got a chance to meet and greet the great leader, and he was duly honored, praised and glorified.

True, Carter almost "blew it" when he was accorded the special honor of a Sunday morning visit through historic Westminster Abbey. Upon reaching the Poet's Corner, where the world's truly great poets are honored, Carter asked the archdeacon why there was no memorial stone for his favorite poet, the notorious sot and amoral Welsh poet Dylan Thomas. To think of such a person being honored alongside such great literary lights as Shakespeare, Chaucer, Thackeray, Wordsworth, Milton and the two Brownings, must have made the archdeacon shudder. In the face of such desecration, however, the archdeacon "kept his cool," remarked that "prophets are not always honored in their own country and in their own time." But Carter persisted, saying that Thomas had died in 1953 or 1954, and that "I will pray for his soul" if he could be memorialized. The archdeacon said that a "sovereign body of four" would make the decision when they met on the following Tuesday. Carter promised to pray for them, too. But when they met on Tuesday, the name of Dylan Thomas was never mentioned.

Nevertheless, his faux pas—and others like his campaign speech for James Callaghan—was overlooked, and the European press insisted that Carter was the star of the show and one German official (certainly not Helmut Schmidt) was quoted as saying: "I think you'll find that he's a very popular man here (because of a renewed American interest in the affairs of Europe.) After all, we need a strong U.S. president, as much as the Americans do. Maybe more." This, of course, was a Trilateralist talking.

In spite of his alleged popularity on the world stage, it seems significant that the first official report on the trip to Europe was made, not by Carter, but by Zbigniew Brzezinski. We couldn't find the complete statement in any American daily, but the Voice of America reported that Brzezinski "had a highly optimistic assessment of Carter's first overseas mission. He said that the economic summit talks involving the leading non-communist industrial nations produced an important step in the continuing process of shaping the means of genuine economic global cooperation. But what he (Brzezinski) said could prove to be a more important consequence, is what he called 'the beginning of restoration of confidence in the West.' Brzezinski said that after some fifteen years of cultural and economic crises, he found what he termed a contagion of confidence at the summit, confidence that would be essential to the vitality of a democratic society. And the United States, he said, for the first time since the early 1960s, spoke with and was perceived as possessing a great deal of political and moral authority." (unquote).

Which, of course, is exactly how it must be if the Trilateralist version of America's "Manifest Destiny" is to be realized: the U.S. must lead, and the other "leading non-communist industrial nations" must help pay the bill and help provide police protection while the World Community is being built.

This police protection, of course, is to be provided by that Regional Alliance known as NATO. And we are told that:

"Leaders of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Wednesday (May 11) wound up the 'Carter Summit' by enthusiastically adopting all of the U.S. President's suggestions for strengthening NATO in the 1980s. A communique issued at the end of the 15-nation meeting...called for long-term political and military planning to deal with the growing power of Soviet-bloc armed forces."

Regarding this "growing power of the Soviet bloc armed forces," the situation does present a very real and potentially fatal danger. Not because the Soviet has been able to outdo us in any way, but because it was planned that way! During and after World War II, and up to and including here and now, the Soviet has been given or been permitted to steal the blueprints of our finest weaponry including nuclear bombs and the ability to detonate them at any given time and place, from any stationary or moving launching base. The Soviet has been given or "sold" our technological knowhow, has been supplied factories and machine tools, computers and space-flight knowhow. All this has been done, admittedly, to make the Soviet Union "equal" to the United States in force of arms. Even as this Report is being written, U.S. Disarmament Chieftain Paul Warnke is in Geneva conferring with his Soviet counterpart on how to limit and "equalize" the strategic arms possessed by each power. Also, Vice President Mondale is preparing for a trip to Belgrade where he will continue the "equalization" talks that were begun at Helsinki.

But there is one point at which the Planners have been balked, at least for a little while. The wire services report: "Counteracting Senate committee action, the House Thursday (May 12) reaffirmed its opposition to U.S. trade with Cuba or Vietnam...the vote was 252-158...."

"The House adopted an amendment by Rep. John M. Ashbrook (R., Ohio) specifically reaffirming the bans," the report said. "There is within the Senate a very determined effort to remove prohibitions against trade and aid to Cuba," Ashbrook said. "We should not sit back in the House and let the senior senator from South Dakota (McGovern) be spokesman on foreign policy."

During the Senate hearings it was brought out that Cuba hardly qualifies for aid under the Carter "human rights" rules. Senator Jesse Helms (R., N.C.) made public the State Department estimate that between 10,000 and 15,000 political prisoners are still confined in Cuban jails, some 2,000 of them in maximum security prisons. But the extent of Cuba's interference in Africa, on behalf of the Soviet Union, was not brought out fully in either the Senate or House hearings. And the controlled press has been most reluctant in this respect. From European sources we have learned that Cuba's military involvement in Africa goes far beyond Angola. There are Cuban troops in at least six other African states. But the governments of these states are not anxious for the world to know about the presence of Cuban troops within their borders; and the media has cooperated in keeping silent.

We are told that there are still some 12,000 Cuban troops in Angola, 3,000 fewer than at this time last year when Castro said he was ordering the removal of all his troops from that country. Cubans are directly involved in continuing battles against the Unita guerrillas, and against other guerrilla bands in Northern Angola that are still trying to free the state from communist control. The Cubans are responsible for training the communist guerrilla bands that are raiding communities in South West Africa (Namibia). Cuban troops are also said to be fighting in Zaire's Shaba province, and the invaders of Zaire were almost surely trained by Cubans and supplied by the USSR.

The first Cuban soldiers sent to Africa went to Guinea to support the rebels fighting against Portuguese rule in Guinea-Bissau. Cubans are still in that area, training local troops. There are also Cuban troops in ex-Spanish Equatorial Guinea. Farther southeast, there are an estimated 500 Cubans training soldiers in Mozambique, as well as the black guerrillas who raid Rhodesia from the Mozambique sanctuary. Cubans are also training Rhodesian guerrillas in Tanzania.

As soon as American officials left Ethiopia Soviet advisers and Cuban technicians rushed in; and communist takeover of the Horn of Africa is presently in progress, with Russia providing the supplies and Cuba supplying the advisers and technicians.

However, the Russians and the Cubans form just a part of the threat to the yet free nations of Southern Africa. In accordance with the time-honored plan of creating a crisis in order to bring about a change, it would appear that the Communists are there to create the crises, while the Trilateralist Bankers and Multinationalists are standing by, ready to come to the rescue of Rhodesia and South Africa, by taking over the natural and human resources of the two countries. Faced with a dilemma, the latter is the "better alternative" since the Elitists will take over without destroying industries and agricultural areas, and without causing extensive bloodbaths. On the other hand, the Communist trained guerrillas would come in like vandals and would utterly destroy everyone and demolish everything.

So, faced with such a dilemma, Ian Smith and John Vorster are forced to cooperate with the American and British Governments, who are holding meetings to arrange for new constitutions and new governments. The situation is so serious that Ambassador Andy Young is being permitted to visit and make speeches in Johannesburg. Young had committed another of his faux pas; he had called the government of South Africa an "illegitimate government." He was promptly refused admittance into the country by that "illegitimate" government. However, the ban had to be lifted when it was discovered that Young's invitation to visit and to speak had been tendered by Harry Oppenheimer. Oppenheimer is South Africa's counterpart to America's David Rockefeller, and to Europe's Edmond de Rothschild.

Here is another example of how the United States Government is being used to lead the nations of the world into the New World Community, with the assistance of other governments of the industrial nations. The "leadership" act calls for constant conferencing and negotiating. President Carter said in his press conference of May 12 that while in London and Geneva he met and talked to the heads of state of some "15 or 16 countries." Secretary of State Cyrus Vance stayed behind to confer with Israeli's foreign minister; then he flew to Spain for an overnight conference; next day on to Tehran where he conferred with officials of the Iranian government. Meanwhile Paul Warnke was on his way to Geneva for arms talks. Vice President Walter Mondale was preparing for his visit to Belgrade where the Helsinki agreement would be revised. Mrs. Carter was boning up on her Spanish in preparation for a visit to six Latin American countries, returning on June 6th to take off for Hawaii and other selected States, to discuss mental health problems. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown also was preparing for a trip to Europe to discuss defense problems with NATO nations. Andy Young was touring the various ministate capitals of Africa. President Carter was hoping to get away this fall for another visit to Europe, where he would be the guest of Giscard d'Estaing.

We're sure we missed a few in the preceding list of upcoming conferences, etc. as the United States government fulfills its Trilateralist assignment in leading the way into this developing World Community.

There is, incidentally, one more item that is causing some consternation in the Carter camp: the giveaway of the Panama Canal to the Communists is not going as smoothly as was hoped, despite all the support that is being given the plan by the media. Rep. Daniel Flood (D., PA), who leads the fight in the House to retain ownership of the Canal, told his colleagues on May 5, 1977: "A massive propaganda campaign in support of a new Panama Canal treaty or treaties that would surrender U.S. sovereign control over the Canal Zone territory has been underway for many months, much of it financed by the State Department. This campaign has included hiring highly paid press relations specialists and collecting hundreds of thousands of dollars for propaganda purposes, with the result that many biased articles have appeared in magazines and other news media, as well as editorials in major newspapers. These writings generally reflect the rhetorical verbiage of the State Department and avoid the presentation of crucial facts that are essential for clear understanding... The construction of the Panama Canal and its subsequent maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection have been one of the greatest works of man, of which all Americans can be proud. We bought the Canal Zone three times: First, from Panama following its secession from Colombia; second, from individual property owners; and last, from Colombia. It cost more than all other territorial acquisitions of the United States combined and the entire enterprise, including defense, represents an investment of the U.S. taxpayers' money of more than $7,000,000,000. It has given Panama the highest per capita income in all of Central America." (unquote).

Rep. Flood said he had written a letter to The Philadelphia Inquirer, which had published an editorial filled with fallacies. Of course, Flood's letter was not published. Here are some of the facts stated in Rep. Flood's letter:

"Soviet power is well established in Cuba. The de facto Panama Government is closely allied with the Havana-Moscow Axis. Communist agents are in Panama, in important capacities and the Caribbean-Gulf of Mexico basins seem well on their way to becoming Red Lakes.... Latin American opposition to the projected giveaway is stronger than ever. Latin American businessmen and other leaders, including many Panamanians, realize what the consequences of surrender of the Canal Zone to Panama would be, and have been making their views known....

"The crucial sovereignty issue concerning the Canal is not between the United States and Panama, which latter country is only the 'tip of the iceberg,' but a global struggle between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. ... Attempts to brainwash the American people and the Congress, based upon the invalid urgings of a privately financed so-called 'blue ribbon commission' associated with the Council on Foreign Relations of New York are utterly futile, for too many capable leaders, in and out of the Congress, including State Legislatures, know the facts and cannot be misled by self-serving propaganda, however plausible....

"A country of endemic revolution and endless political intrigue, Panama is so primitive technologically that it has neither the resources nor the competence to maintain, operate, sanitize and protect the Canal and, if given such responsibilities, it would undoubtedly have to call upon others to assume the burden. The surrender of U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone to Panama ... would undoubtedly invite a communist takeover of that country and lead to its transformation into a second communist colony in the Western Hemisphere....

"It is now timely to urge a constructive, definite and historically based policy derived from experience. The program to implement such policy, which is strongly supported in the Congress as well as by many patriotic, civic, commercial and other responsible organizations, is simple:

"1. Reaffirmation by the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives of U.S. sovereign rights, power and authority over both the U.S. Canal Zone and Panama Canal, with termination of the current treaty negotiations.

"2. Major modernization of the existing Canal as provided in the Terminal Lake-Third Locks solution under existing treaty provisions; and

"3. Authorization for the election by U.S. citizens residing in the Canal Zone of a non-voting Delegate in the Congress, as have Guam, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia.

"The prompt approval by the Congress of pending legislative measures for this program will assure the continued efficient management of the Canal, resolve the present Isthmian situation, restore the impaired morale of Panama Canal employees, and be in the best interests of all the nations that use the Canal, especially Panama, which country would receive enormous benefits....

Daniel J. Flood, M.C.

U.S. Representative from Pennsylvania."

Retention of the Panama Canal by the U.S. is important for another reason that is illustrated by Southern Africa: Communism is the pincer that forces White Rhodesians to accept the terms laid down by the Elitists, or to suffer terrorism, devastation and perhaps death. If the Panama Canal were held by the Communists and if the Caribbean became a Red Lake, then the same kind of pressure could be applied on all the Americas, including the United States.

Keeping that Communist pincer out of the Americas, and keeping Castro isolated, are very important if we are to maintain what is left of physical freedom.

WAR, OR RUMOURS OF WAR, OR BOTH?

PLANNED IT THAT WAY?

"There are two kinds of disasters," wrote the political commentator T.W. Hughes, in a pamphlet published in 1956. He identified them as accidental and "planned." He said: "Accidental disasters usually result from drinking too much or driving too fast or from just plain carelessness. But the disasters that destroy nations are 'planned that way.' Thus fell the great empires of the past: Egypt, Babylon, Greece, and Rome. In the past fifty-eight years seven other great empires have met disaster—Spain and France, Germany and Austria, Italy, Russia, and England." Each of these seven empires disintegrated, said the author, because of a conspiracy planned in England in 1895. His reference was, of course, to the conspiracy planned by the international bankers and industrial cartelists, who sought to rule the world.

What was true in 1956, when the foregoing was written, is also true today. The personages have changed because of the toll taken by time and a new generation of conspirators are on the scene. The means of attaining their goal have been altered because of new discoveries and improved technologies, increased knowledge and accelerated methods of transportation and communication. But the end remains the same, and any means toward that end is said to be justified and acceptable—even to the use of nuclear war!

Furthermore, although the conspirators' means and plans, programs and tactics have changed, one act has remained constant: Whenever the conspiracy begins to falter and seems to be facing failure, a war occurs and like the Beast of Revelation whose deadly wound was healed and all the world wondered after the beast, the conspiracy is revived, and strengthened. Twice in this century, world wars were fought. Since 1950, "limited" wars have been utilized: Korea, the Congo, the Middle-East, India-Pakistan, Southeast Asia, etc.

This brings up a leading question: Do the conspirators now feel that new strategies must be adopted, and that another limited war may be necessary in order to revive and strengthen the conspiracy? Or that the threat of war must be used to scare people into submission to the chains and deprivations inherent to life in the new World Community?

First, let us note the signs of the times in this respect:

1. Several months ago it was reported that the Soviet Navy had been able to plant submerged nuclear missiles in the territorial waters of the United States, missiles that could have caused horrible destruction and surrender of what was left of the U.S. The story continues: public protest caused the U.S. Navy to search out and remove the missiles. However, the Soviet Navy planted 48 more missiles; again they were removed.

2. It has been reported that the Soviet now has the world's largest and strongest navy; including over 350 submarines, many of them nuclear-powered. This Soviet superiority is said to extend to nuclear weapons, air and ground forces and conventional weapons.

3. An article appearing in the Miami Herald of May 25, 1977, quotes two trade publications—Aviation Week and Space Technology—both of which report that the Soviet Union verges on creating a "direct energy beam weapon capable of neutralizing the entire United States ballistic missile force." U.S. defense officials deny this, but admit that "the Russians are devoting great effort toward charged particle beam technology.... Charged particle beams are streams of highly concentrated, high-velocity atomic or subatomic particles which, when they hit their targets, impart their enormous energy, causing the target to heat rapidly and burn or melt." The Soviet also is credited by some scientists with having developed a laser weapon which can "shoot down" any U.S. missile before it hits its target, as well as being able to destroy space satellites.

4. Much publicity has been given to the plan of the United States Army to conduct Soviet Type training exercises in which the "adversary forces" will be dressed in Soviet uniforms, carry Soviet AK47 assault rifles, ride in Russian armored personnel carriers, and be escorted by Russian T62 tanks.

It is explained that the U.S. Army got this equipment from the Israeli government. The Russian tanks, personnel carriers, rifles, artillery and small arms were captured by Israeli forces in the Sinai and Golan Heights battles more than three years ago.

5. Much publicity has been given to the underground city-like shelters that have been built to protect Washington officials and Federal Reserve assets and personnel, in case of nuclear attack on the Nation's capitol.

6. On February 10, 1977, President Jimmy Carter was photographed as he entered the "Doomsday Jet." This Boeing 747 carries the official title, National Emergency Airborne Command Post, is loaded with electronic and communications equipment, and is to house the Chief Executive in case of enemy attack, and in case he cannot reach the underground command post as Fort Ritchie, Maryland.

7. Newsweek's Periscope of May 30, 1977, carried the item: "Gen. Alexander Haig, the American commander of NATO, has started his planners thinking along new lines. Because NATO was set up in 1949 as a 'defensive' alliance for Western Europe, it has stuck strictly to reactive plans. But Haig now wants blueprints, for example, for counterattacking a Soviet blitz, rather than concentrating solely on defending against invasion. Planners throughout the fifteen-nation alliance have also begun talking of extending the alliance's sights beyond Europe's boundaries to plan for events in the Middle East or Africa that could affect oil and other supplies vital to NATO."

Haig's new orders stem from the fact that as of today, in case of attack it would take 24 hours to get permission to fire NATO's front line guns. The Washington Post of Jan. 29, 1977, reported, "The Corps Commander in Germany... would have to send his request through four layers of command (Central Army Group, Allied Forces Central Europe, Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, and the NATO Military Committee) before it reached the President of the United States, who could then grant permission" to retaliate with nuclear weapons. This would take 24 hours, and by that time there might be no NATO nuclear weapons to fire.

8. The New York Times of January 4, 1977, reported: "Pentagon military analysts... say that the Russians appear, on the basis of their military writings, to be prepared for a short war of maximum intensity in which nuclear weapons would be used from the outset."

9. In a case reminiscent of Truman's firing of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Gen. John K. Singlaub, fired from a high post in South Korea by President Carter for saying the withdrawal of U.S. ground forces from that country would lead to war, repeated his statement before the House Armed Services Committee. He added that every high-ranking U.S. and South Korean military officer he knew held the same view privately that he had stated publicly, at the cost of his job.

10. A somewhat mysterious Club of Ten, which headquarters in London, purchased five full columns in the six-columned New York Times of May 11, 1977, to point out to its readers that: "Some 60 per cent of all oil reserves in the free world are located in the Persian Gulf;" that "in 1976 the US imported more than 40 per cent of the oil it uses;" that "about 90 per cent of the European NATO nations' total oil consumption pass within a few miles of Capetown;" that "the Cape sea route remains the most unguarded strategic region in the world;" that "the Soviet Navy... could control most of the shipping movements in this entire area from bases... in Angola and Mozambique;" and that "Moscow's great strategic plan is aimed at nothing less than control of all Southern Africa right to the Cape," and "even now the Soviets and their proxy soldiers are engaged in take-over bids for Namibia, Rhodesia, and South Africa itself under the guise of 'majority rule'." Then two questions are asked: "1. Is the United States going to allow her oil lifeline, and that of Western Europe, to remain in peril until Russia decides the moment is right to strike? 2. Is this not clearly a situation which qualifies for intervention, as envisaged by President Carter in his White House TV interview on Monday, May 2 (BBC... plus German and French TV), when he said that he would act 'only if our nation's security is being threatened'? ... Demand action this day... 1985 will be too late."

11. The copyrighted Youth Action News of May, 1977, states bluntly that the "C.F.R. gangsters are conspiring with the Soviets to stage a 'limited' and carefully arranged no-win nuclear war... to aid in the establishment of the C.F.R. dictatorship."

Please let us explain: We have cited eleven items or instances which seem to be the signs presaging a future war. We do not vouch for the authenticity or truthfulness of these reports. It is our personal belief that the Soviet "adversary" has no intention of devastating the United States. If and when she is conquered, the enemy will want to see her plants producing goods, her fields yielding foods, and her citizens living and willing to submit to slavery—or else...

However, while we believe there is little chance of a war being waged against the United States with conventional or nuclear weapons, there is a psychological war being waged here and now! That psychological war includes or will include every available means short of actual all-out war, in order to create a state of fear among the people of the United States and the "Trilateral" world—thus causing the people to demand the carrying out of the plan for the creation of a "Global Community." We believe that the Powers that control both the U.S. Federal Government and the U.S.S.R. Presidium have found it expedient to change, not their goal, but their means of attaining that goal. So, a chaotic situation must be created which will cause the people to cry out for the "peace and security" promised through the establishment of this "Global Community."

Here is the historical progression as we see it; and we shall begin with a statement from Dr. Howard Kershner, presently chairman of the board of the Christian Freedom Foundation in Applied Christianity:

Dr. Norman Dodd was the Director of Research for the so-called Reece Committee, which was investigating the subject of tax-exempt foundations, which were making large grants to left-wing agitation groups. In the course of the investigation, Dr. Dodd visited Rowan Gaither, then President of the Ford Foundation. Concerning that visit, Dr. Howard Kirshner wrote: "I had long known what was said at that conference, but some years ago I asked Mr. Dodd to write me a letter setting forth the significant statements as nearly as he could remember them. From a letter which Mr. Dodd wrote to me dated September 29, 1962, I quote the following paragraph of an astonishing statement made to Mr. Dodd by Mr. Gaither:

"Most of us here were, at one time or another, active either in the O.S.S., the State Department, or the European Economic Administration. During those times, and without exception, we operated under directives issued by the White House, the substance of which was to the effect that we should make every effort to so alter life in the United States as to make possible a comfortable merger with the Soviet Union. We are continuing to be guided by just such directives."

"To this statement Mr. Dodd replied: 'Mr. Gaither, in the light of what you have just told me, the grants of the Ford Foundation are understandable.' Mr. Dodd then stated that he thought the Ford Foundation was under obligation to inform the American public of the directives under which he was operating. To this Mr. Gaither replied:

"This we would not think of doing'."

Of similar nature and complementary to the directives mentioned by Rowan Gaither, is the recently declassified Top Secret Document entitled National Security Report No. 68, signed by President Truman on April 12, 1950, but shown "only to the minimum number of officials of the Executive Branch who need to know." According to Gen. Pedro del Valle, the document states, in effect, that the national policy of the United States should be: "Be nice to the Soviet Union and do nothing to prevent its expansion."

We have not seen this document, but Dr. George S. Benson of Harding College and The National Program Letter ordered a copy from Washington, spent several weeks trying to digest the documents, then reported to his many readers. (To obtain copies of this report, write to National Education Program, Harding College, Searcy, Ark. 72843, and ask for the National Program Letter for May, 1977. 10 copies for $2.)

Upon reading Dr. Benson's report, it becomes apparent that this National Security Report No. 68 which was kept secret for a quarter of a century, is the basis for that notorious "Policy of Containment" which was written by "Mr. X" (George Kennan) of the Council on Foreign Relations, and which became our official national policy toward the Soviet Union during that long period of Communist expansion which saw countries "fall like dominoes." A direct quote from this National Security Report No. 68 that was kept secret for a quarter of a century, confirms our statement:

"In 'containment' it is desirable to exert pressure in a fashion which will avoid so far as possible directly challenging Soviet prestige, to keep open the possibility for the U.S.S.R. to retreat before pressure with a minimum loss of face and to secure political advantage from the failure of the Kremlin to yield or to take advantage of the openings we leave it."

Another direct quote: "...there is no 'easy' solution and the only sure victory lies in the frustration of the Kremlin design by the steady development of the moral and material strength of the free world and its projection into the Soviet world in such a way as to bring about an internal change in the Soviet system."

In his report regarding this Top Secret Document, Dr. Benson comments: "Certain facts lead me to wonder if there isn't in current national policy another 'Secret Document' very different. 1) The fact that this one remained under cover for 25 years shows it can happen. 2) Current National Policy, as declared by certain prominent individuals, is quite opposite to important aspects of this one. 3) This implies a national policy which has not been announced."

It seems reasonable to assume that there is some new "Top Secret Document" since the plans have been changed and new means have been adopted for achieving that final goal: World Government, by whatever name. In the 1950s the plan called for the gradual merging of the United States and the Soviet Union. The rest of the countries of the world—great and small, developed and undeveloped, have and have-not—were also to be merged with the United States and Soviet Russia, by means of a restructured United Nations, or some similar World Administration. "World Federation" was the name of the game in the 1950s.

But the plans began to change; the UN was being discredited; the rise of Japan and the rift between Russia and Red China altered the programming. Other factors entered in to make new planning necessary.

The first bold step on the new road to World Community was witnessed when Kissinger opened the doors to the forbidden city of Old Cathay and the theory of the Trilateral Constellation (Russia, China, USA) was born. Then, in 1973, the Trilateral Constellation began to give way to the Trilateral Commission. The former was based on potential political and military power, the latter is based on economic and financial power.

This change in plans was outlined in an article appearing in the CFR's Foreign Affairs Quarterly for April, 1974. The article was by Richard N. Gardner, strategist for the Council on Foreign Relations, charter member of the Trilateral Commission, and currently U.S. Ambassador to Italy, by appointment of Jimmy Carter. In an article entitled "The Hard Road to World Order," Gardner wrote:

"...world federalism and (U.N.) charter review now seem bankrupt of possibilities... it comes down essentially to this: The hope for the foreseeable future lies, not in building up a few ambitious central institutions of universal membership and general jurisdiction as was envisaged at the end of the last war, but rather in a much more decentralized, disorderly and pragmatic process of inventing or adapting institutions of limited jurisdiction and selected membership to deal with specific problems on a case-by-case basis, as the necessity for cooperation is perceived by the relevant nations....In short, the 'house of world order' will have to be built from the bottom up rather than from the top down."

This is the "new plan:" to build the World Administration from the bottom up, piece by piece, through unilateral, bilateral, trilateral and multilateral conferences, conventions, treaties, etc. That's why the Trilateral Commission was created: to build the Global Community from the "bottom up."

Listen to Trilateralist Jimmy Carter: "The time has come for a new architectural effort, with creative initiative by our own nation, with growing cooperation among the industrial democracies as its cornerstone, and with peace and justice as its constant goals."

Listen to Trilateralist Zbigniew Brzezinski: "...pretty much everything the President has done in the field of foreign affairs since January is the product of a deliberate planning exercise....Almost every action we have taken—I would even say every action we have taken—was part of a plan for the first 90 days of the Administration....It is our view that we are now at a stage in history in which the United States again has to undertake a creative process of building a new world system." (U.S. News & World Report, May 30, 1977).

Listen to Nelson Rockefeller: "Our generation is called on for a pioneering act of political creativity and economic construction, on an intercontinental scale."

Listen to Ellsworth Bunker, the man who helped "liberate" Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, and who is now helping to "liberate" the Panama Canal: "There is a new reality in international relations. It is interdependence...."

So: new means to the same end which has never changed. That end: monopolize financial, economic, industrial, political and police power. The new means to that end: construct it piece-by-piece from below rather than impose it from the top. But, as British patriot Kevan Bleach remarked: "Whatever the architects' and builders' change of plan...its organization will still be of such colossal dimensions that it cannot fail to subdue all the nations of the world." But while they're still building there's still hope. Builders do not always finish building their towers....

RETURN TO BRINKMANSHIP

INTRODUCTORY

A Korean "armistice" was arranged in July of 1953. This released the Red Chinese from further deployment of troops and armaments in Northeastern Asia, giving Mao Tse-tung an opportunity to cooperate more fully with Ho Chi-minh in their efforts to extend Communist control over all of Southeast Asia. Just eight months later—in March of 1954—the French strong point at Dien Bien Phu was under siege and its outer defenses were crumbling. Hoping for active American aid, the French chief of staff, General Ely, flew to Washington to confer with Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. It seems that Dulles was willing, but not without at least the vocal support of Britain. He proposed "a united action policy" which he described in these terms: "If Britain would join the U.S. and France would agree to stand firm... the three Western states could combine with friendly Asian nations to oppose Communist forces on the ground just as the UN stepped in against the North Korean aggression in 1950... and if the Chinese Communists intervene openly, their staging bases in south China (will) be destroyed by US air power." President Eisenhower agreed, but his calls to Churchill and Eden found the British government unwilling to go along with the plan. As an alternative course Dulles then established the Regional Organization known as SEATO (South East Asia Treaty Organization composed of the United States, Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Thailand and the Philippines.) SEATO also proved ineffective. But for some time, the United States tottered "on the brink of war" and from that time onward Dulles' policies and actions toward Communism were known as "Brinkmanship," that is, bringing the United States to "the brink of war" without actually falling over the edge into military conflict.

Ten years later, however, in August of 1954, a concocted event in the Bay of Tonkin did lead to active participation of the United States in the Vietnamese War, and to "the first war the United States ever lost" (the Korean conflict was—and remains—a stalemate).

Jimmy Carter and Zbigniew Brzezinski seem to be adopting the policy of brinkmanship first pursued by Eisenhower and Dulles; they are leading the United States to "the brink of war." This time, however, the adversary is not Communist China, but Soviet Russia.

CARTER'S NEW WORLD ORDER

This heading is borrowed from U.S. News & World Report of June 6, 1977. The magazine staffers obtained an exclusive interview with Jimmy Carter, concluding that "The President Talks Tough" in regard to Korea, Africa, the Mideast, the Panama Canal, and the Soviet Union. Hence our conclusion: he is engaging in brinkmanship. And, in 1977 this can be far more dangerous than it was in 1954.

The USN&WR editors affirm that Carter's chief aim is to build "a new world order" and that he has chosen "Human Rights" as his theme song. However, they say that his foreign policy is already running into potentially serious complications on at least four fronts: 1) The Mideast, because of the election of Israeli's hard-line Likud Party, which is opposed to giving back any of the land which has been taken by force from the Palestinians; 2) Korea, because of military and congressional opposition to Carter's withdrawal order; 3) The nuclear proliferation policy which contributes to the alleged energy shortage and which is considered unfair by both France and West Germany; and 4) Carter's insistence upon normalizing relations with Castro's Cuba, whose "human rights" makes a mockery of Carter's supposed and often-stated "commitment to moral values."

In something of a "separate opinion," the newsmagazine's chief editor takes issue—for the wrong reasons—with Carter's attitude toward South Africa. Wrote editor Stone, and we are quoting only the parts of his editorial which we can approve:

"In the course of our interview with President Carter in the Oval Office this past week, we asked him whether Andrew Young spoke for him on African policy. His reply was a 'Yes' that was delivered a bit tartly and tinged with a hint of impatience with the question. The President turned aside any suggestion that the U.S. may be moving too hastily. In fact, he emphasized, 'I think the progress has been too slow.'

'With all due respect to the President, we must disagree when it comes to the matter of South Africa... If we Americans presume to tell the Afrikaners what to do, we should ask ourselves exactly what it is we are demanding; we should recognize the consequences; we should form some idea of how it can be done; and for our own sake we should acknowledge, at least in our minds, why we are putting our spoon into this indigestible stew....'

In our opinion, Editor Stone's suggestions about our South African policy should be applied to every one of Carter's foreign policy forays. And it should be noted, too, that when we speak of "Carter's foreign policy" we are oversimplifying. After all, Jimmy Carter is but a puppet president, he is the programmed product of the Trilateral Commission which created him, and we must recognize that Jimmy Carter is little more than the Charlie McCarthy to David Rockefeller's Edgar Bergen.

So, let us ask ourselves: what are the Trilateralists' aims; what are they demanding of us; how are they carrying out their program; and what are the consequences to us if they succeed?

Now, let's analyze: If Carter is to carry out the socializing welfare programs he has promised in the next four years—guaranteed annual wage, nationalized medical care, social security that is really secure, etc.—he must have an additional 30 to 40 billion dollars every year. This in spite of the fact that Carter has promised to balance the federal budget by 1981; and this he really intends to do because that is the one thing that could cause him to be re-elected, if federal elections are still in vogue in 1980.

Now, there once was a time when this balancing act might have been accomplished simply by asking the Federal Reserve to sign the necessary papers that would turn on the presses, and oodles of greenback money substitute would be fed like trading stamps into the economy. However, there is a monetary disease called inflation. Also, there is an international market where even a substitute dollar must have some semblance of value, else the whole world's monetary structure would crumble; and the International Bankers aren't ready for that.

L.T. Patterson's Strategy Letter for May offers this explanation: "As of November, 1971, when Nixon took the gold window in hand and slammed it shut, and since currencies have been untied and freely floating, the Trilateralists really don't have the freedom to expand their spending and their economies that you might suppose... Here's the story — 48 hours after the inauguration, V.P. Mondale was sent around the world... he carried a message from the Carter Administration (particularly to Japan and Germany) to expand their spending and their economies... and to debase their currencies. Had Germany and Japan agreed to this, the energy program might never have been introduced... since this would have allowed a dramatic expansion of U.S. federal deficits, along with countries whose currencies are the primary threat to the Dollar... Fortunately for all of us, the Germans and the Japanese adamantly rebuffed Mondale and refused to go along with a worldwide currency debasement. If Germany and Japan refuse to inflate and depreciate their currency the Trilateralists are thwarted in their efforts to expand federal deficits. Reason: It is now no longer possible to expand federal deficits in quantum jumps of tens of billions of dollars per year without causing a dramatic run on the dollar... and possibly bringing on a worldwide crisis of one type or another, causing a run on gold (and) thwarting their planning for the takeover of the American private sector economy...."

(unquote; accent as in original)

Defeated in this attempt to gain gigantic sources of new revenue, the Trilateralists sought a new way—and that new way is called an energy crisis!

As Ronald Reagan had the courage to say, there is no shortage of energy, there is a surplus of government. However, there is an energy crisis, because the Trilateralists need billions of dollars to "balance the budget" and complete the corporate socialist state they are building, and this new tax plan would do the job!

So, when Mondale failed in his first mission, an otherwise discredited CIA came out with a "new shocking" report regarding world reserves; and then came the television "puppet show" to frighten and shame the Nation into yielding control of its free enterprise economy into the hands of an Energy Tsar. As L.T. Patterson commented: "It was a shrewdly designed television extravaganza to snare decent, trusting American citizens... who have been caught up by the obvious moral appeal of greater frugality—and less extravagance in automobiles and lifestyles... The stated goals of driving smaller cars, and driving less, will trap the 'solid middle class' into grudging support of the program, and with the cooperation of the financial press, public sentiment may be sufficient to allow Congress to pass most of the (energy) program... Goal is total control. It is, in fact, Socialism as now practiced in England, and which has brought that country to its knees. The result of the energy program will be intrusion of the federal government into every facet of our lives and the total control of every facet of the energy industry, thereby creating a Fascist State!"

There is a catch to this plan, however: just as in the plot to depreciate money, the cooperation of other Nations is required. That is what the recently concluded "North-South Conference" was all about. And that conference was declared a "total failure." The Nations of the world—both developed and developing Nations—refused to approve the "energy package" that the Trilateralists offered them.

This means that, without help from other countries, the energy crisis becomes far less critical in the eyes of everyone. And that brings up the possibility of the "action of last resort" which is called war.

When the sub rosa government of the world wants to initiate a "new thing" and is then prevented from doing so by the visible governments, the traditional recourse is to start a war! Ergo, "The President Talks Tough" says the front cover of a national newsmagazine; and stories intended to invoke war scare are released:

"Carter Orders Missiles Tipped With Bigger Nuclear Warheads," screams a headline that is followed by a story about how Soviet missiles might be destroyed on their launching pads. This is supplemented by a story with an even bigger and blacker headline: "Pentagon Debunks Report of Soviet 'Ray Gun'": There is an introduction to this article that reads: "The report last month was chilling: the Soviet Union is close to being able to destroy U.S. missiles with a beam of high-energy charged particles. But instead of using the article's effect to pry more weapons research money from Congress, the Pentagon is mounting a campaign to discredit what it terms an inaccurate scare story." However, the attempt to debunk becomes in itself a scare story.

The buildup of tension in Rhodesia and in South Africa could lead to a limited war. The election of a hard-line government in Israeli creates a classical setting for war. The South Korean story merely begins with the dismissal of a General; the real story is yet to be told. In addition to these and other potential locations for a limited nuclear or "grass roots" war, there are some very strange goings-on in regard to that Independently Communist State of Yugoslavia.

During the presidential debates last fall, Carter spoke of possible American action "short of armed intervention" if Tito died and the Soviet Union invaded. On March 31, Tito told his armed forces to be prepared for attack from abroad. On May 5, a Washington Star columnist commented that we should "look to Yugoslavia" for the next crisis.

On May 20, Walter Mondale visited Belgrade and spoke to Tito, who celebrated his 85th birthday and his 40th year of 'independence' from both the Eastern and Western bloc of nations. Mondale brought word that Tito was to receive a nuclear power reactor, a $700 million development courtesy of the Export-Import Bank "and private banks."

Yugoslavia is a hot spot; World War I started in the Balkans, and at least theoretically, Yugoslavia is "neutral territory" and an apt spot for a limited nuclear war.

We sincerely hope that we are totally wrong, but the Trilateralists have been twice thwarted; and if the visible governments don't continue to thwart the sub rosa government, nations could be talked into going to war; and with so many Trilateralists in key positions in our visible government, a "return to brinkmanship" is a mild way of stating our present danger.

FROM INDEPENDENCE TO INTERDEPENDENCE VIA THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF AMERICA

CAPTIVE AUDIENCE STRATEGY

"The students in our public schools constitute, as my colleague Francis Keppel puts it, the nation's greatest and most attractive sucker list. Everybody who has anything to sell... would naturally like to get at this market of future American adults, and get at them as early in life as possible.... Those of us with global perspectives to sell may chafe at the sluggish reaction of American public education, but we had better first try to understand its profound and not illogical motivation."

So wrote Harlan Cleveland in the foreword to A New Civic Literacy, a book published by The Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies. In this same book his associate Keppel also said, among many other things: "The education of the nation's adolescents must be superior to that of their parents. Part of this superiority must be an enhanced sense of the globe as the human environment.... All secondary school students should receive a basic global education." And yet again: "...experimental activities should be undertaken to see to what degree formal learning experiences can shape the world views of Americans so as to make those views more compatible with (or at least less resistant to) adjustments in behavior and attitudes necessary to cope more effectively with problems of global interdependence." (Italics added).

As a matter of identification, Harlan Cleveland once was Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations, was U.S. Ambassador to NATO, presently is Director of International Affairs for The Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies, and is a member of the National Commission for Coping with Interdependence. He has edited many left-wing publications, follows the ADA line in his political activities and is a member of The Council on Foreign Relations. He believes it is the job of the public schools to prepare students to become World Citizens. In writing the preface to the book A New Civic Literacy (world citizenship), he implied that the schools were not doing enough in preparing future adults for their roles in the New World Order.

This was before the Trilateralists gained control of the federal government of the United States. Now, things have speeded up and the public schools are being used as members of the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies would have them used. An indication of this can be seen in President Carter's recent order that the bussing of school children must be used to the fullest extent possible in order to achieve proportionate race-mixing in classrooms. (Race mixing is, of course, one of the prime goals of the One World Concept). The following article, published June 8, 1977, tells the story if one reads between the lines:

"CARTER REVERSES U.S. STANCE "ON SCHOOL BUSING

"New York - (AP) - The Carter Administration, reversing a stand taken by the Ford administration, believes it is sometimes legal to withhold federal money from school districts that won't use pairing as a desegregation tool, the New York Times said Tuesday. The ruling would be applied by the government to reject the desegregation plan of Kansas City, Mo., the newspaper said.

"Pairing, or clustering, means merging predominantly white and black schools to balance out the racial composition; it usually requires some amount of busing....

"The Times said this reversal of the Ford administration position was contained in a memorandum from Attorney General Griffin Bell at the request of Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr. The Bell memorandum concerns the interpretation of a 1975 law that bars HEW from withholding money as a means of forcing a school district to bus children to schools other than the one closest to their homes."

The ruling means, of course, that every public school in the United States must be "mixed" according to orders laid down by federal judges, regardless of the number of students that must be bused, or the distance they must travel every school day in order to achieve "pairing" or "clustering."

Two incongruities that condemn the scheme should be mentioned. First, the Carter administration insists that there is an energy shortage and that we must conserve fuel. Yet one of the greatest expenders of fuel is this multitude of school buses that must travel millions of unnecessary miles in order to "pair" and "cluster" them, and get them as far away from home and parental influence as possible as often as possible. And secondly, the Carter administration demands that "majority rule" be established and maintained in Africa. Yet, in the United States, where a vast majority or citizens—both white and black—are against the busing of school children for purposes of desegregation, this same Carter administration reverses the rule and insists that the minority must rule.

But, back to the children:

The National Enquirer of June 7, 1977, published an organizational chart of the Office of Education... "only one 'small' part of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. HEW, which spends more than one-third of the federal budget, and has more than 129,000 employees, was recently asked by Congress for an accurate count of the number of its programs. It took more than five months for HEW to come up with an answer... and during that time it responded with at least four different figures, ranging from 250 to 320, according to the House Government Operations subcommittee."

This organizational chart is too large and too much of a tangle of criss-crossing lines to be reproduced in this Report; so we shall try to describe it understandably:

The chart is labeled: "Department of Health, Education and Welfare; Education Programs of the Office of Education." Under the heading "Office of the Commissioner of Education" there are an Office of Planning, an Office of Management, and five Bureaus: Bureau of Post-Secondary Education, Bureau of Education for the Handicapped, Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education, Bureau of School Systems, and Bureau of Indian Education.

Under the Bureau of Post-Secondary Education there are some 22 different agencies, most of them involved with various grants and fellowships. Under the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped there are another eleven different offices involved with grants and services. The Bureau of Occupational and Adult Education has fifteen different branches. The Bureau of School Systems has eighteen different programs; while the Bureau of Indian Education boasts seven categories. In all, there are 73 different "programs." These are funneled down through three "Intermediaries," which are titled "Post Secondary Institutions," "State Education Agencies," and "Other State Agencies." These three "Intermediaries" then extend aid, control and supervision over the "Recipients," which are titled: State and Local Governments, Profit Making Organizations, Non-Profit Organizations, Individuals, Post Secondary Institutions, State Education Agencies, Local Education Agencies, Non-Public Schools, and Other Federal Agencies.

As complicated and detailed as this chart may seem to be, it is still incomplete in that it fails to show—perhaps intentionally—the ten principal "intermediaries" through which federal control is maintained at the local level. The Ten Federal Regions, with their District Capitols, are the real "intermediaries". These Regional Government Centers, with their networks of sub-regional agents and agencies, make it possible for the Central Government in Washington to exercise direct "personal" control over the manner in which every "federal" dollar is spent for any educational purpose. How that power is exercised is amply demonstrated by this latest order from Attorney General Griffin Bell to HEW Secretary Joseph Califano, permitting the withholding of all federal funds for educational purposes unless the local officials at Kansas City knuckle under and order the "pairing" and "clustering" of whites and blacks in all public schools in that sub-region of Federal Region VII.

Speaking personally, this reporter is against compulsory public education, and has been against it ever since he learned that compulsory public education of all children is one of the twelve most important planks in that platform framed by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels for the purpose of Communizing the world, which was first published as a part of their Communist Manifesto.

It is and has always been our belief that the education of children is a parental—not a governmental—responsibility. Since it is impossible for most parents to adequately educate their children, it follows naturally that they will delegate that authority to someone else. So they—voluntarily and not compulsorily—will get together and build schoolhouses and hire teachers and elect officers to act as their representatives in carrying out the parental obligation and responsibility. But this would be a local, not a State or Federal function; and it would be a societal, not a governmental, institution.

That's the way it was in the United States in the beginning. But Horace Mann came along and got the government to take charge of the schools. Then Karl Marx planted the idea that attendance should be compulsory; and the age of Washingtons and Madisons, Franklins and Adamases, Masons and Henrys and other giants in statesmanship came to an end. Since that time, real statesmen have been few and years between.

Coincident with the decrease in statesmanship came a decrease in morality, in reverence for and obedience to the laws of that God in Whom we say we trust, nationally if not individually. Also, love of country became lessened, family life began to lose its place as the unit upon which ordered and peaceful society is built.

We are not saying that government-controlled compulsory education caused these conditions; but we are saying that national obedience to this Marxist commandment did create the field where all kinds of subversive seeds could be planted. As Harlan Cleveland said, the students in our public schools (a captive audience) constitute the nation's greatest and most attractive sucker list, and men like Cleveland have ever been eager to sell their wares to the "suckers" whose parents can neither prevent the sale nor protect their children from the effects of the product being sold; unless they are fortunate enough to be able to send their children to a religious or private school of their own choice.

In our public schools there have been men like (in alphabetical, not chronological order) Theodore Brameld, Nicholas Murray Butler, William Carr, George Counts, John Dewey, Robert Maynard Hutchins, William Heard Kilpatrick, Harold Rugg, Rexford Guy Tugwell, and many, many more, who have used this "captive audience" to plant the seeds of socialism, distrust of the private enterprise system, atheism and anarchy, world government and interdependence.

It is important that certain facts be brought to the attention of parents and patriots at this time because a school term has ended, school vacations are at hand and the Carter-Griffin-Califano triumvirate will use this time to introduce new schemes and tighten administrative controls over all educational institutions and processes. There is a hue and cry being raised by certain groups because they have suddenly learned—after all these years—that high school graduates have difficulty reading traffic signs. CBS-TV has produced a series of reports depicting the inefficiency of teachers and school administrators. An educational crisis is being developed, much as an energy crisis has been created, and by the same opinion-molding groups. Such a created crisis in the educational arena could lead to the creation of a new Department of Education, separate from HEW and endowed with absolute and dictatorial powers over all the teaching and training of all the people of the nation, from womb to tomb. The age of Newspeak spoken of by the political prophet George Orwell will have come to full bloom. Before this comes upon us, the people have a right to know how such a situation came about, and what can be done about it to save our children (to use a slogan made popular and meaningful by the courageous Anita Bryant).

In a brilliant and invaluable work titled Betraying America in the Schools, two researchers have brought the educational plot up to today and now. Barbara M. Morris and Joan M. Masters have traced the trail of what they call the new psyche-creators who "did not work with test tubes, nor Bunsen burners nor electron microscopes. They did not experiment on caged and numbered animals. Their laboratories were the schools and the great universities and their experimental subjects were millions of captive American children. These children, who were bred by nature and nurture to be God-fearing, family-loving, patriotic future citizens, were viciously and systematically broken into fragments and re-coupled to form new combinations of alien human beings. They were, and are, being produced to people the new economic world order with the new robotized world citizens. Surreptitiously behind the closed learning 'laboratory' classroom door, the new recombinant human being is being created."

The authors point out that the once crass and overt techniques of 'brainwashing' have begun to evolve into much more sophisticated and devious processes," and that these are being used in the public schools "with massive amounts of federal and foundation monies via intense teacher training and centrally 'developed' curricula." These new methods of brainwashing have been given new names. No longer are they called "behavior modification," "sensitivity training," "psycho-drama," "group dynamics," and the like. These are already "old-hat" names that are subject to criticism and opposition. "The new names," say authors Morris and Masters, "are titles parents can relate to—a deliberate device to make the old methods more acceptable to the public. Now it's 'citizen education,' 'values clarification,' 'moral reasoning,' 'global perspectives,' 'ethical reasoning,' 'peace studies,' 'interdependence curriculum,' 'Philosophy for Children programs,' and others as innocuous sounding."

"This 'newspeak'," the researchers continue, "it is hoped by its innovators, will conceal the true purpose of the programs and help to quiet the protests of parents who objected to the more precisely named psycho-social courses. The new methods, in most cases, will be unidentifiable, being overlaid or permeated throughout the more traditional curricula."

The foreword to Betraying America in the Schools ends with this depressing but honest statement: "We would like to comfort you with the knowledge that there is a great deal of time left to either stop or offset what is happening in the schools. We cannot. What we are addressing ourselves to is not 'future shock'; it is present reality. Whether or not this present reality continues to its obvious conclusion is up to those who understand the situation and will make the effort to reverse the course we are on." *

We are not ready to admit that these psyche-creators have been successful in their attempts to create "the new citizen for the new world order." They have not yet been able to produce the robot-like human in the multitudes that are required. Instead, they have produced little demons, anarchists and juvenile terrorists who have lost all understanding of whom to respect and whom to obey, and therefore have determined to "do their own thing," regardless of the future consequences. Lost, bewildered and a law unto themselves, these are the mutations that the psyche-creators have produced—because without a value system there can never be a peaceful and orderly society. It is as though these change-agents have tried to replace God and have only been able to exalt Satan for a time.

We spoke of a value system. We'll try to explain. Traditionally, American government has not established morality, in the sense of what is right and moral. As Harold O. J. Brown notes in The Reconstruction of the Republic, traditional American government "has taken what it found in the moral and spiritual heritage of the people and attempted more or less vigorously to reinforce

it. It is a simple historical fact that most values in America, a nation of largely European ancestry and of British institutions, are biblical in origin. If we cut off or suppress the biblical sources of values, we are left in a vacuum... The less effectively a shared moral consensus operates in a society, the more use a government must make of compulsion and coercion. No society can endure chaos. Where the population does not keep a measure of order on its own, because of its own inner values, it will be put under coercion by government"; and "If we do not know what is good, the government will tell us. Totalitarian governments... are happy to tell their subjects what is good, and useful. When a strong value-structure exists, a totalitarian system will make an effort to break it down. Where there is no strong, shared value-structure, totalitarianism holds an obvious attraction...."

"In the United States... government... has been active in downgrading and pushing into the background traditional Christian values. Many of those engaged in this undertaking are not entirely aware of what they are doing... some are doing it deliberately."

We speak of those who are doing it deliberately, and who realize that the students in our public schools constitute the nation's greatest and most attractive sucker list." They are preparing the United States to become an interdependent nation-state in a global, one-culture, one-world community.

This calls for a new kind of citizen, one who knows nothing of Christian morality, one who will act and react for the good of the world as an elitist cult determines what is good and acceptable. The government schools are, of course, the laboratories where this new global slave is developed.

At present the new robot-like human is not being produced en masse; blackboard jungle types predominate. But the change-agents will say this is because there is still too much parental influence, too much Christian teaching to be untaught, etc. They will say the solution is simple: more federal money for government schools and more federal control over private and church-operated schools. Unfortunately, too many parents will believe them, and continue to look to Government for their salvation.

"WE THE PEOPLE OF THE PLANET EARTH, IN ORDER TO FORM A MORE PERFECT UNION..."

NEW DIRECTIONS FOR A NEW WORLD ORDER

When Jimmy Earl Carter was inaugurated as the 39th President of the United States, he spoke to the people of the United States, asked them to accept a "New Spirit" that would lead them into a New Order. On that same day he also spoke to the people of the world, telling them about that New Order into which the United States would lead the whole world. The speech was heard around the world, thanks to communications satellites and in the various important languages of the world, thanks to instant interpretation which must be used until one universal tongue can be perfected and accepted. We have just seen a complete copy of Carter's Message to the World, and in respect to what has happened since that time, it seems important that we should record the words that were spoken by Jimmy Carter to the world on the day he moved into the White House. Following is the complete text of Carter's Message to the World.

I have chosen the occasion of my inauguration as President to speak not only to my own countrymen—which is traditional—but also to you, citizens of the world who did not participate in our election but who will nevertheless be affected by my decisions.

I also believe that as friends you are entitled to know how the power and influence of the United States will be exercised by the new government.

I want to assure you that the relations of the United States with the other countries and peoples of the world will be guided during our administration by our desire to shape a world order that is more responsive to human aspirations. The United States will meet the obligation to help create a stable, just and peaceful world order.

We will not seek to dominate nor dictate to others. As we, Americans have concluded one chapter in our nation's history and are beginning to work on another, we have, I believe, acquired a more mature perspective which recognizes the fact that we alone do not have all the answers to the world's problems.

The United States alone cannot lift from the world the terrifying specter of nuclear destruction. We can and will work with others to do so.

The United States alone cannot guarantee the basic right of every human being to be free of poverty and hunger and disease and political repression. We can and will cooperate with others in combating these enemies of mankind.

The United States alone cannot insure an equitable development of the world resources or the proper safeguarding of the world's environment. But we can and will join with others in this work.

The United States can and will take the lead in such efforts. In these endeavors we need your help, and we offer ours. We need your experience. We need your wisdom. We need your active participation in a joint effort to move the reality of the world closer to the ideals of human freedom and dignity.

As friends, you can depend on the United States to be in the forefront of the search for world peace. You can depend on the United States to remain steadfast in its commitment to human freedom and liberty. And you can also depend on the United States to be sensitive to your own concerns and aspirations, to welcome your advice, to do its utmost to resolve international differences in a spirit of cooperation.

The problems of the world will not be easily resolved. Yet the well-being of each and every one of us—indeed our mutual survival—depends on their resolution. As President of the United States I can assure you that we intend to do our part. I ask you to join us in a common effort based on mutual trust and mutual respect.

Jimmy Carter,
President of the United States of America.

Thus did Jimmy Carter ask the nations of the world to accept him as their leader, even as the people of the United States had accepted him as their leader, and together, we shall "shape a world order that is more responsive to human aspirations."

One indication of how the New World Order was being shaped could be observed from the words and actions of U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Andy Young, former assistant in charge of rabble rousing to the late Martin Luther King, and "the best public servant I ever knew," according to Jimmy Carter. Almost single-handedly, Young managed to lay the groundwork for an all-out war in Southern Africa. Then, when the situation became "too hot to handle" Andy and Jimmy decided that the former should transfer his activities from Africa to Latin America and take up where the latter's wife left off in her toadying to Communist and left-wing dictators in Central America. The three of them—Jimmy, Rosalyn and Andy—in their shaping of the New Order for Latin America, made it quite obvious that some of

The following Resolution was Passed Unanimously at the Board Meeting of the National Association of Pro America held in Boulder, Colorado, May, 1977.

Whereas With the deadline (March, 1979) for the ratification or rejection of the so-called Equal Rights Amendment (E.R.A.) drawing nearer, the fight by radical members of the women's liberation movement, aided by the unconstitutional lobbying of both ex-President Ford and President Carter and their wives, becomes steadily more bitter; and

Whereas Section 2 of the E.R.A. which reads "The Congress shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article" gives to Congress alone the power of legislative enforcement, and would be a wholesale and permanent transfer of power from the state legislatures to the federal government; and

Whereas Many amendments to preserve certain rights women now have were proposed in Congress (such as exemptions of laws which sought to protect women from compulsory military service and from serving in combat units, exemption of laws which maintain father's responsibility for support of children, which secure privacy to men or women, or boys or girls, which make sexual offences punishable as crime, which prohibit sexual activity between persons of the same sex or marriage of persons of the same sex) but all were defeated; and

Whereas The National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year (IWY) has been established by Executive their best friends were Communists.

In his final sallies before leaving Africa to the natives and their Communist mentors, Young praised Fidel Castro for "bringing peace to Angola" by sending Cuban troops into that sad mini-state. He then suggested that Castro might bring peace to Ethiopia by sending more Cubans into that country. As a final faux pas before coming back to the United States, Young managed to infuriate both the citizens of Sweden and the New York City borough of Queens with one outburst. Talking to newsmen in London, he said: "The Swedes are terrible racists. They have an ideology which makes them very humanitarian and liberal, but when the crunch comes the black in Sweden is treated just like the black in Queens." In answer to official protests, Young said they should not be offended. All he meant to say is that everyone is a racist.

The Central American scenario began with President Carter announcing that as a first step toward diplomatic recognition of Cuba, each country would place ten or more diplomats in a neutral embassy in each other's capital. Concurrent with this announcement came word from Panama that the Carter Administration had given in to Omar Torrijos' demands. The new draft treaty would turn over 60 per cent of the Panama Canal Zone land and water to the Torrijos government immediately, and the very last vestige of U.S. control would end December 31, 1999.

Order and extended for ten years, with a congressional appropriation of five million dollars of taxpayers' money for a National Women's Conference, as well as for fifty-six preceding conferences in the fifty states and six United States territories; and

Whereas Among the foremost goals of the IWY Commission are ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, government funded abortion facilities and child care legislation; and

Whereas Although the Federal Advisory Committee Act required that such federal commissions or bodies be "fairly balanced in terms of the points of view represented", appointments thus far to the National Commission are overwhelmingly weighted to reflect pro-ERA opinions; therefore, be it

Resolved That the National Association of Pro America reaffirm all previous resolutions opposing ERA, protest the questionable use of public funds for potential lobbying activities and expose the objectives of the National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year.

Next, Firstperson Rosalyn Carter went to Jamaica to visit Prime Minister Michael Manley, who is a fervent admirer of Fidel Castro and whose island government is loaded with Cuban advisers. Said Mrs. Carter: "We want to consult closely with you and strengthen our ties of friendship, as you strive for more social and economic justice." Prime Minister Manley replied that he was "greatly encouraged" by her husband's "new approaches to international affairs." Whereupon the Firstperson responded: "You have roused the admiration of the people of our country by your democratic achievements. I know that you are aware that what you are doing here in Jamaica has great significance not only for Jamaica but for all the developing world."

The weekly "Human Events" editorialized: "It is really incredible. Clearly, Carter and Andy Young are revolutionizing our foreign policy. Fidel Castro is no longer to be treated as a pariah. On the contrary, we are signalling to the Third World countries that their closeness to Fidel will in no way harm their relationship with the United States. Indeed, it may help that relationship considerably."

So much for the shaping of the New World Order as it affects the Third World. Here, briefly, are items indicating the progress of the "reshaping" in other parts of the world:

1. Shades of George Marshall and the sell-out of Free China. Dateline Tokyo: "Mike Mansfield, the new American ambassador to Japan, Wednesday (June 15) called on Mainland China and the Nationalist Chinese government on Taiwan to hold bilateral talks to resolve the two-China problem.... At a news conference, Mansfield said,... 'Our policy is to continue to try to further normalize relations with the People's Republic of China, but the one roadblock is Taiwan. My feeling is the way to solve this is for Taiwan and Peking to get together and reach an amicable decision'."

As a onetime old China hand, we might say, "This is where we came in." Thirty years ago, George Marshall went to China to offer the same proposition: that Chiang Kai-shek and Mao Tse-tung get together and form a coalition government. The idea was very profitable for the Communists in the early years of Communist expansion. One or two Communist officials would get into official positions in an otherwise stable government; and in a few years the whole country would become a Soviet Satellite.

Chiang Kai-shek refused Marshall's offer, and moved to Taiwan where a model republic was established, with a free enterprise system of economics; and the country has prospered. Now, however, all the principals involved in that original offer—Marshall, Mao Tse-tung, Chiang Kai-shek—are gone and Communism has engulfed almost all of mainland Asia. Regrettably, Mansfield may be able to accomplish what Marshall could not. It seems the Trilateralists are intent upon destroying free enterprise wherever it may still exist, even when this means turning whole nations over to the Communists.

2. The following, by Al Rossiter, Jr. UPI science editor, may leave you wondering just how, with our superior technology, we can make a new product and then be forced to send it to Russia to test it:

"The United States is flying a colossal experimental magnet to the Soviet Union later this month for testing in a power generator because this country has no facility in which to test it. The 40-ton magnet, a highly efficient unit which uses super-conducting technology, was built by the Energy Research and Development Administration specifically for testing in Russia under a cooperating energy research program that began in 1973.... The magnet, more advanced than any the Soviets have used, was developed at the Argonne National Laboratory near Chicago and will be flown from Chicago to Moscow on a U.S. Air Force C5A transport...."

3. It seems that the spirit of cooperation with other nations is the hallmark of the Carter administration's foreign policy. The following may seem unbelievable to most U.S. taxpayers, but here is the direct quote

U.S. TO PAY FOR ARAB LANDS Official Claims Peace Deal Set

Washington—The United States expects to pay for any compensation awarded to Arabs for lost property in a Middle East peace settlement, a high United States foreign policy official said Thursday. The official acknowledged that if such claims should be lodged against Israel, the U.S. would have to pay them because the Jewish nation is too poor.

President Carter raised the issue of compensation last week, followed by a demand from Egyptian President Anwar Sadat for $2.1 billion for oil pumped from Egyptian wells in Israeli-occupied Sinai. The official, who asked that his name not be used, said compensating Arabs would settle claims for damages and lost lands and thus add stability to a peace settlement....

NEW DIRECTIONS

When a ruling Elite decides to initiate a New World Order—or any other new order involving masses of people—it is not sufficient for the rulers simply to issue directives and proclamations; those directives must be carried out and the proclamations honored and obeyed. This may be accomplished in three ways: by force, by persuasion, or by a combination of the two—the “carrot and stick” syndrome. Carter is said to be a populist (a politician who claims to represent the grass roots), and this country is said to be a democracy (majority rule). Therefore, any great “reshaping” would be accomplished by persuasion. Force would be reserved for use against dissidents and as a last resort against mass resistance.

The communications media are the “great persuaders” in this country. Kevin Phillips, author, attorney, syndicated columnist, said recently: “Today’s news media wield power that staggers the imagination. With fully 75% of our population living in urban areas, a relatively few metropolitan newspapers reach and influence millions of Americans each and every day. Television and radio newscasters, using the powerful immediacy of their media, can and do introduce new heroes (and villains) overnight to vast numbers of people. Increasingly, we live in a society that can be described as a ‘mediacracy’ where communications and the ‘Knowledge Industry’ elite play a dominant role.”

However, in a government where powers are still somewhat divided, where the Congress may not submit wholeheartedly to playing the role of rubber stamp to the Administrators, it is necessary that lobbying groups be formed for the purpose of making the congressmen see the advisability of following in the footsteps of the Elite-directed Administrators.

For this purpose, and to apply personal persuasion wherever needed, a new set of lobbying organizations have been formed. Most powerful of these is New Directions, an organization of about 100 “committed and respected Americans (who) have joined to create a new people’s lobbying force.”

“Unfettered by tax prohibitions,” says a promotional letter signed by the President of the new lobbying force, “New Directions will be able to take realistic, hard, political action to influence our government’s policy on global issues which affect our daily lives.” Translated, this means that if the Congress does not approve the actions taken by the Elite, then powerful methods of “persuasion” will be used.

New Directions is a powerhouse where such lobbying activity is required. Its president is Russell W. Peterson, Republican, former Governor of Delaware, former chairman of the executive committee of Nelson Rockefeller’s National Commission on Critical Choices for Americans. He moved into the federal government with Rockefeller to become chairman of the President’s Council on Environmental Quality. Then he resigned that position in September, 1976, to assume the presidency of the newly formed New Directions.

The Chairperson of the Council of New Directions is Margaret Mead, anthropologist, humanist, etc., while Chairperson of the Governing Board is Jack T. Conway who was the first president of Common Cause, an officer of the United Auto Workers, the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, etc. Other members of New Directions include John Gardner, Norman Cousins, Theodore Hesburgh, Douglas Dillon, Sol Linowitz, Cyrus Vance, Paul Warnke, Shirley Temple Black, etc.

The Club of Rome is a super-exclusive organization of international bankers, multinational heads and monopoly capitalists who are interested in establishing—and then ruling—the New World Order. It is more exclusive than the Bilderberg Group of the Trilateral Commission; and it has an American branch called the U.S. Association of the Club of Rome. Recently Russell Peterson of New Directions addressed this group. His closing words were:

“We, the people of Planet Earth, with respect for the dignity of each human life, with concern for future generations, with growing appreciation of our relation to our environment, with recognition of limits of our resources and with need for adequate food, air, water, shelter, health, protection, justice and self-fulfillment, hereby declare our interdependence and resolve to work together in brotherhood and in harmony with our environment to enhance the quality of life everywhere.”

This is the propaganda line that you will hear again and again. Those who forget Who really rules the world will fall for it.

HUMAN RIGHTS VERSUS THE BILL OF RIGHTS

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

The summer doldrums is a time of the year when lurking legislators await a propitious moment, then sneak onto the floor of the House or Senate some measure that wouldn't have a chance of passage if a majority of the Members were present and really knew what the measure was all about. There are some resolutions and treaties that don't get passed anyway. So the promoters set their pet project aside, wait for the next Congress and the propitious moment, and try again, and again, and again—sometimes for thirty years and more.

One such perennial is the Atlantic Union Resolution, long range objective of which is to create a Regional Central Government made up of all the Nations that are members of NATO. For thirty-seven years the proponents of this world government scheme have been trying to get Congressional approval for setting up a convention that would draw the plans—and the Constitution—for such a Regional World Government, to which we would surrender our national sovereignty.

This year the Atlantic Unionists tried something new. They camouflaged the measure—H.J. Res. 460—as a resolution “Relating to the Thirtieth Anniversary of the Marshall Plan. But the same old wordage is contained in the text. It would (a) have a thirteen (13) member U.S. delegation to meet with similar delegations from NATO countries, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and other such countries as the President determines for the purpose of making a comprehensive assessment of existing institutions and to formulate recommendations for presenting and perfecting these institutions in order better to protect the general welfare, liberty and sovereignty of the people of the participating countries.” The objective: Interdependence at first; then federal union.

However, despite the camouflage and the innocent-sounding verbiage, the insidious measure lost again. In fact, Nelson A. Pryor of the Center for Federal Policy Review, who keeps an eye on these perennials, says the measure didn't even get out of Committee this year; was defeated by a vote of 13 to 9 on May 25. Of course, the Atlantic Unionists will try again next Congress.

Next perennial to watch is the Genocide Treaty, which awaits its propitious moment for presentation on the floor of the Senate. This is a more dangerous matter, because a treaty can be approved more easily than an ordinary bill, because only the Senate must approve a treaty, and a treaty is approved “provided two thirds of the Senators present concur” (Article I, Section 2, U.S. Constitution). Not only this, but —

“...All Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding” (Article VI).

This means a treaty can affect or nullify the provisions of a State Constitution, without the citizens of the State having any voice in the matter. A treaty can also nullify any State Statute or any State Supreme Court decision; it can also nullify existing federal legislation on the same subject.

In addition to all of the foregoing, there are many Constitutional authorities who insist that a treaty can actually nullify the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights. Many of these authorities say that the U.N. Charter affected or nullified the Constitution in many respects, and that the proposed Genocide Treaty would nullify the Bill of Rights (the first ten Amendments to the Constitution).

Once again, on the agenda and likely to be called up for vote (at a propitious moment) is this Genocide Convention, which was approved by the General Assembly of the U.N. in December, 1948. It came into force over all signatory nations on January 12, 1951. President Truman submitted it to the U.S. Senate for ratification in 1950, but it was never reported out of the Foreign Relations Committee. President Eisenhower tried to get the convention ratified; he also failed. President Kennedy chose a different route—one which is reminiscent of the way Carter is approaching the subject. Kennedy asked the Senate to approve three conventions on “Human Rights.” These were to be stepping stones toward ratification of the Genocide Convention. But the Senate did not fall into the trap, refused to approve any "Human Rights" Conventions. So Kennedy gave up on this subject. However, on February 19, 1970, President Nixon urged its passage, and the Genocide Convention did get out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. However, the Senate refused to give its "advice and consent."

The proponents of the Genocide Convention believe that 1977 is "the year," and Presi-

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

ARTICLE I. The Contracting Parties confirm that genocide, whether committed in time of peace, or in time of war, is a crime under international law which they undertake to prevent and punish.

ARTICLE II. In the present Convention, genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group as such:

- (a) Killing members of the group;
- (b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
- (c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
- (d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
- (e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

ARTICLE III. The following acts shall be punishable:

- (a) Genocide;
- (b) Conspiracy to commit genocide;
- (c) Direct and public incitement to commit genocide;
- (d) Attempt to commit genocide;
- (e) Complicity in genocide.

ARTICLE IV. Persons committing genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III shall be punished, whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals.

ARTICLE V. The Contracting Parties undertake to enact, in accordance with their respective constitutions, the necessary legislation to give effect to the provisions of the present Convention and, in particular, to provide effective penalties for persons guilty of genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III.

ARTICLE VI. Persons charged with genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE VII. Genocide and the other acts enumerated in Article III shall not be considered as political crimes for the purpose of extradition. The Contracting Parties pledge themselves in such cases to grant extradition in accordance with their laws and treaties in force.

ARTICLE VIII. Any Contracting Party may call upon the competent organs of the United Nations to take such action under the Charter of the United Nations as they consider appropriate for the prevention and suppression of acts of genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III.

ARTICLE IX. Disputes between the Contracting Parties relating to the interpretation, application or fulfillment of the present Convention, including those relating to the responsibility of a State for genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III, shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice at the request of any of the parties to the dispute.

dent Carter with his emphasis on "Human Rights" may be enough to weigh the balance in favor of passage (more about the Human Rights thing later in this Report).

We have reproduced the pertinent parts of the Genocide Convention. You will notice that it undertakes to create a whole category of new crimes and provides for the punishment of public officials, as well as private citizens for causing, among other things, "mental harm" to members of a racial or ethnical group. It does many other things to affect and encroach upon the rights of American citizens. It is a step toward world government, and toward Socialism.

The late Frank Holman, past president of the American Bar Association, wrote in 1951 that the Genocide Convention "is so drawn that it does not apply to liquidating political groups as 'enemies of the state.' Hence, it does not apply to genocide as practiced by Stalin in Russia or in the Russian satellite countries. In drafting Article II of the Convention, and in order to appease the Russians, genocide was limited to 'national, ethnical, racial or religious groups.' The political group was omitted... Hence, dictators can sign the Genocide Convention with complete immunity."

President Carter, in his address to the U.N. on March 17, 1977, advocated ratification of the Genocide Convention. Even more important, perhaps, is Carter's continued reference to "Human Rights" in all his foreign policy statements.

THE HUMAN RIGHTS CRUSADE

In that March 17th address before the U.N. General Assembly, Carter also called for the creation of a new U.N. Division of Human Rights and for the naming of a U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights. He told the U.N. delegates: "I will seek congressional approval and sign the U.N. Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights." Then while in London on May 2, he told the BBC television viewers he would maintain an undeviating commitment to human rights "until the last day I'm in office."

We've been trying to find for some time just what President Carter means when he talks about "human rights." Just what is his definition of "human rights"? We know that our Declaration of Independence speaks of "unalienable Rights" and they are defined as "Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness." We also know that by the "pursuit of happiness" the signers of that Declaration really meant the right to own real and personal property. And our founding fathers instituted a new kind of government in order to secure these rights to life, liberty and property. To really secure those rights for succeeding generations, they added to the Constitution a "Bill of Rights."

But this is not what Jimmy Carter is talking about when he mentions human rights. For example, those U.N. Covenants of Human Rights which he promised to sign actually deny individuals the right to own private property!

Since Carter doesn't give us his definition of human rights, we must seek our answer from his words. When he spoke to the citizens of the world on his inauguration day, Carter spoke of "the basic right of every human being to be free of poverty and hunger and disease and political repression." This would seem to indicate that Carter's definition of human rights would mean the right to be cared for by Big Government from womb to tomb. After all, what human agency other than a centralized, totalitarian government can guarantee to multitudinous masses of people freedom from poverty, hunger, disease and political repression? It follows, of course, that the guarantee of such "human rights" requires that the recipient become a slave. Which means that "human rights" as Carter uses the term could be defined as "The Security of Slavery." Such a definition refers in no way to the rights that are defined in the basic documents upon which our Representative Republic was founded.

Furthermore, Carter's reference to the U.N. Human Rights Covenants takes us right back to the time of the Genocide Convention:

Thirty years ago the Genocide Covenant had a twin, born at the same time and of the same parentage. It was called the Covenant on Human Rights. Speaking of this latter Covenant, Frank Holman said at the time:

"...On the way to completion for submission to our Senate, is a Covenant on Human Rights. The program is to have this document ratified as a treaty. It is full of provisions that can and will affect the basic right of Americans to legislate for themselves on matters heretofore of domestic concern. It can and will affect and disturb the intended constitutional relationship between the several States and the Federal government. We are told that from time to time there will follow other pacts and conventions, to be ratified as treaties. This accumulating body of treaty law can result in changing our form of government from a Republic to a Socialistic and centralized state—with such increase in the power of the Federal government at the expense of the States that the doctrine of States Rights and local self-government can become as non-existent in the United States as in the highly centralized governments of Europe and Asia."

Holman was right in his prediction except for one thing: the Covenant of Human Rights struck out. When the U.N. was formed, there was established a Commission on Human Rights, with a High Commissioner on Human Rights to run this office, which was a Division of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. There was prepared a Universal Declaration of Human Rights, duly adopted by the U.N. in 1948. But when they get down to the job of writing the actual Covenant on Human Rights, the delegates and officers of the U.N. couldn't agree on how it should be written. There was a great dispute over "political rights;" they had been left out of the Genocide Covenant, and the Soviet delegates insisted that any reference to "political rights" also be omitted from the human rights convention. A Convention was finally drawn up, was submitted to the U.S. Senate for ratification in 1953, was rejected. By 1957 all efforts to draft a covenant that was acceptable ceased and the U.N. Division on Human Rights just faded away.

U.N. officials then broke down the proposed Covenant on Human Rights into a series of Covenants. These were the covenants that President Kennedy tried to induce the Senate to ratify; the Senate wisely refused to do so.

And that brings us up to March 17, 1977, when President Jimmy Carter urged the U.N. to reinstate a Division on Human Rights, with a High Commissioner to run the office. He also promised to support and attempt to get the Senate to ratify those fragmented Covenants, on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and on Civil and Political Rights.

In Carter's opinion—or perhaps we should say in the opinion of the Trilateral Commission—ratification of the Genocide Convention is not enough to turn our Republic into a Corporate Socialist State through Treaty Law—the ratification of a series of Human Rights Treaties is also necessary.

Carter's insistence that the U.N. reinstate its Human Rights Division also means that the original U.N. Declaration on Human Rights is to be revived and presented to the world as a part of the Carter Crusade for Human Rights. The titles may be confusing, but the Declaration on Human Rights is the original document, or charter, from which the Covenants were written and presented as Treaties to be approved by the governments of the world. These include the discredited Covenant on Human Rights, and the two newer Covenants which Carter espouses: the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

So, this Declaration on Human Rights is the parent of them all, and the most dangerous of them all. Examples:

Article 22 of the Declaration provides that everyone has "the right to social security." Article 23 says everyone has the right to "just and favorable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment," and everyone has the right to "just and favorable remuneration." Article 24 provides that everyone has the "right to rest and leisure" and "periodic holidays with pay." Article 25 states that everyone has "the right to food, clothing, housing, and medical care and necessary social services and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age." Article 26 provides that everyone has the right to education and that "education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms."

Now, compare the foregoing with Carter's own televised statement to the world on Jan. 20, 1977: "The United States alone cannot guarantee the basic right of every human being to be free of poverty and hunger and disease and political repression. We can and will cooperate with others in combating these enemies of mankind."

It seems, then, that Carter's rhetoric about human rights is an attempt to lead the world into the imagined utopia of a Universal Welfare State, via Genocide and Human Rights Treaties. Now, a Welfare State is a Socialist State, and a Socialist State must become a Slave State, with the Elitists becoming the Slavemasters, however benevolent and humanitarian their intentions may be. By the term "Elitists," we refer to the International Bankers, Multinational Cartelists and Monopoly Capitalists.

Under the false and misleading banner of "Human Rights," this is all to be accomplished through, to use the words supplied by Carter's National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski, "consultations, political caucuses, negotiations, discussions," these culminating in declarations, covenants and treaties that will "shape a system which embraces the entire global community, and our trilateral regions can find a special opportunity in moving towards that end."

Let it be known that, through the protests of patriots, Congress has once again thwarted the "trilateral regions" planners, by refusing to go along with the scheme for converting the Atlantic Alliance Nations into an Atlantic Union. Their next step would be to secure Senate ratification of the Genocide Convention, this to be followed by the other Carter-espoused Human Rights Conventions.

Therefore, our next step must be to secure one more defeat for the Genocide Covenant. In this battle, Phyllis Schlafly provided some live ammunition in a recent statement over a national radio network. She said, in part:

"President Carter has wrapped this reject from six previous administrations in his new rhetoric about human rights and is trying to push it through the Senate this year... The definition of genocide includes acts by a single individual against another single individual. The Genocide Convention thus converts domestic crimes into international crimes and makes it possible for individual citizens to be tried in some international court outside the United States. It would be naive to assume that the United States Bill of Rights would be respected in any foreign or international court. Our unique American guarantees such as the right not to be charged for a capital crime except after a Grand Jury indictment, the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury in the State and District wherein the crime is alleged to have been committed, the privilege against self-incrimination, the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, the writ of habeas corpus and the right not to be denied life or liberty without due process of law would all be meaningless in a foreign or international court. The Genocide Convention would not give any human right to anyone, but it surely would take away Constitutional rights from Americans."

Like Carter's Human Rights Crusade, the Resolution Relating to the Thirtieth Anniversary of the Marshall Plan, ERA and other schemes of similar ilk, the Genocide Convention is an innocuous title for an insidious plot. The Genocide Convention has little or nothing to do with the crime called genocide but it has everything to do with converting domestic crimes into international crimes. It is one more plank in the construction of de facto world government; it must be recognized as such and fought against as such.

OUR POLITICAL BIRTHRIGHT SOLD FOR RED POTTAGE

PROLOGUE

It has been 201 years since the Founding Fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. But, on this July 4th, it is obvious that decadence has developed. The independence for which men pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor is being bartered for a cowardly condition of slavery called interdependence. The men in high authority who now create what they call "the Law of the Land," no longer acknowledge that there is such a person as a Creator who has endowed men with anything, let alone unalienable rights; they have become "human rights," endowed by humans often contrary to the laws of God, as in the right to murder through abortion, the right to practice homosexuality legally and even to teach it in the government's schools, etc.

To complete the change of our Republic into a democracy we have a President who would abolish the electoral college and institute instant voter registration at the polling place on election day. The first would prevent the States from having any voice in presidential elections since such elections could be decided by the direct vote of the residents of the larger cities. The latter would lend itself to repetitive voting by the same voter, bloc voting, error, fraud and the building of another vast federal bureaucracy to administer the new universal voting program. Also, where once there were thirteen independent and sovereign States requiring a federal agent to secure and protect their independence and sovereignty; now there is to be one interdependent federal agency, without sovereign rights, requiring ten federal districts to replace the States, and a multitude of sub-regional districts to replace Counties.

Two centuries ago, Americans engaged in a counter-revolution to regain lost freedoms. Today, Americans are involved in a revolution which would bring about the surrender of those freedoms for which so many have given their last full measure of devotion.

For the foregoing reasons, and because our Republic may be suffering terminal illness, in this one Weekly Report, we are going to turn back the pages of history, forget the problems of today, and look instead at the losses and the victories, the miseries and the glories, and, most of all, the faith of our fathers, which sustained them through their troublous times, and gave to us a Republic—if only we could have kept it....

PREDESTINATION

They were called Separatists, a remnant that separated itself from the state church to worship God in their own way. But they were persecuted, and they determined to find for themselves a home in the New World where they might set up their own church and their own government. So, from this remnant that was divided between Scrooby in England and Leydon in Holland, a smaller remnant was to sail for America. Two boatloads were chosen, but the Speedwell proved unseaworthy and only the Mayflower made the voyage. They were to have landed in the Virginia Company's territory, but found themselves far to the north, in Cape Cod harbor. There they determined to land, and stay. However, there was no patent with the Virginia Company for this land. So they set up their own government, drew up their own Mayflower Compact. That Compact, drafted "in the name of God," was the beginning of our American Republic. The Colony was founded "for the glory of God."

"In spite of the terrible hardships and their unspeakable suffering and losses, the Pilgrims stayed...because they saw the eternal in the temporal, and the invisible in the visible, and because among them the material was dominated by the spiritual.

God had sifted three kingdoms to find the wheat for this planting, Then had sifted the wheat, as the living seed of a nation;
So say the chronicles old, and such is the faith of the people!

Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where first they trod!
They have left unstained what there they found—Freedom to worship God!"
(From "Unto the Generations").

Like the Hebrews of old, these Pilgrims were convinced that they were called of God and predestined to set up a standard in His name in a new land of His choosing. This conviction of predestination was reflected a century and a half later, after the War for Independence had been fought and won. In an Election Day Sermon delivered on May 10, 1783, Rev. Ezra Stiles, President of Yale College, began with these words:

"And now, my fellow citizens of this independent republic, my fellow Christians of every order and denomination in this assembly, and all you that fear God and hear me this day, give audience.

"The Most High planted our fathers, a small handful, in this Jeshimon, and lo! we, their posterity, have arisen up to three millions of people. (Deut. 10:22). Our ears have heard, and our fathers have told us, the marvellous things God did for them; but our eyes have seen far more glorious things done for us, whereof we are glad and rejoice this day."

The early settlers came from many lands, but they lived as colonists of Great Britain. Finally there were thirteen colonies with one set of complaints: they were British subjects but their political rights and privileges were limited. Differences with regard to taxation and money policies developed great discord. As early as 1660 the British government passed and attempted to enforce the despised Navigation Acts. 100 years later, in 1760, George III came to the throne, and "oppression followed oppression, insult was heaped upon insult, injustice was added to injustice until the elemental intelligence, character, and feeling in the Americans were ready to burst forth like a volcano. When Patrick Henry cried: 'Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery?' he made articulate the overwhelming feeling in many an American breast."

A Continental Congress was called in September, 1774, "to consult on the present state of the colonies; and to deliberate upon wise and proper measures for the recovery of their just rights and liberties; and the restoration of union and harmony between Great Britain and the colonies, most ardently desired by all good men." But the impossibility of restoring harmony became apparent when the Congress sent a petition to the King, and the King refused to receive it.

In April, 1775, the Battles of Lexington and Concord had been fought, the Revolutionary War had actually begun, and a second Continental Congress was called to meet in May, 1775; and out of that Congress came the Declaration of Independence.

However, the first official declaration of Independence came from Mecklenburg County in North Carolina. The date, May 20, 1775, is inscribed on the official flag of North Carolina, and its anniversary each year is a State holiday. Known as the Mecklenburg Resolves, it reads in part:

"We conceive that all Laws and Commissions confirmed by, or derived from the Authority of the King or Parliament, are annulled and vacated, and the former civil Constitution of these Colonies for the present wholly suspended." All powers were to be vested in the provincial congress of each colony "under the Direction of the Great Continental Congress."

DECLARATION

Meanwhile, that Great Continental Congress was discussing the same action. Historian Benson J. Lossing wrote (1877): "...On the 7th of June, 1776, he (Richard Henry Lee of Virginia) arose in his place in the hall of Congress—a spacious room on the State-house at Philadelphia, and ever since known as Independence Hall—and with his clear, musical voice read aloud this resolution: 'That these United Colonies are, and of a right ought to be free and independent States; and that all political connection between us and the State of Great Britain is, and of a right ought to be, totally dissolved.'

"John Adams instantly seconded the resolution... a committee was 'appointed to prepare a declaration to that effect.' The committee was composed of Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, and Robert R. Livingston... The Declaration was fully discussed in committee, and when its topics were settled, the task of putting the whole in proper form was committed to Mr. Jefferson... At the end of two days he submitted a draft which was adopted unanimously by the committee, after some slight verbal alterations by Adams and Franklin..."

"When the question was taken on that bright cool day, the 4th of July, 1776, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by the unanimous vote of the thirteen colonies... The Declaration of Independence was signed on the same day by every member present, who voted for it... These signatures were attached to a copy on paper, and the instrument was ordered to be engrossed on parchment. This was done, and the copy on parchment was signed by fifty-four delegates on the 2nd of August. Two others afterward signed, one in September and the other later in the autumn.

"Immediately after the adoption of the Declaration, it was printed, and was sent out in every direction, with the names of only John Hancock, the President of the Congress, and Charles Thompson, Secretary, appended to it. The erroneous impression has prevailed that only these two officers signed it on the Fourth of July."

For purposes of comparison, then with now, here are some of the grievances against George III, as they appeared in the Declaration of Independence. For the "King," substitute "the Federal Administration":

The History of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated Injuries and Usurpations, all having in direct Object the Establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid World.

He has refused his assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public Good....

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the Tenure of their Offices, and the Amount and Payment of their Salaries. He has erected a Multitude of New Offices, and sent hither Swarms of Officers to harass our People, and eat out their Substance....

He has combined with others to subject us to Jurisdictions foreign to our Constitution, and unacknowledged by our Laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:...

For imposing Taxes without our Consent: For depriving us, in many Cases, of the Benefits of Trial by Jury:....

CONSTITUTION

After the Declaration of Independence had been proclaimed throughout the land, it then seemed essential to the wellbeing of the new and beleaguered States that they confederate and establish a contract which would bind them together against a common enemy. Accordingly, Congress prepared in 1777 the "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union between the States," and provided that the Articles should go into effect upon ratification by the 13 States. Maryland was the last to give consent, and the Articles went into effect in March, 1781.

Meantime, the War had progressed nearly to a successful conclusion; a final Treaty of Peace was signed Sept. 3, 1783. But the great leaders who had won the long and arduous struggle for independence found the Articles ill fitted for permanent union. The inability of the Continental Congress to raise money was one of the chief objections. General Washington asked for no pay for himself, but often found it necessary to pay the troops out of his own funds because not sufficient money could be raised by the Continental Congress, then operating under the Articles of Confederation. There was talk of amendments and alterations to the Articles. But then Pelatiah Webster, a Philadelphia businessman and political science student, made a bold suggestion: He asked the Congress why it didn't call a Convention and draft an entirely new Constitution. He wrote a pamphlet outlining his ideas, proposed the creation of a Federal government with three independent but coordinated departments: legislative, executive and judicial. Others, especially James Madison, took Webster's idea and began to develop it into a draft constitution.

Meanwhile, George Washington, who had been "first in war," now showed himself to be "first in peace." Having retired to Mount Vernon, he was much interested in arranging rights of navigation in Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac River. On March 28, 1785, he asked the joint commissioners of Virginia and Maryland to come to Mount Vernon and draft a navigation treaty. This business successfully completed, they began talking about other commercial problems affecting the States. The States were all pulling in opposite directions and Washington pointed out that there must be a Union, in fact as well as in name. As a result of that meeting at Mount Vernon, the Legislature of Maryland sent a proposal to the Legislature of Virginia suggesting a trade conference. A trade conference was duly held at Annapolis where a resolution was adopted on Jan. 21, calling for a Constitutional Convention.

After much haggling and conferencing between Continental Congressmen and State Legislators, the date was set for the convening of the Constitutional Convention: May 14, 1787. However, a quorum of the delegates did not arrive in Philadelphia until the 25th; the first historic session then began with the choosing of George Washington to be its presiding officer.

Benjamin Franklin was the oldest of the 72 delegates, and in the midst of the convention when the delegates were deadlocked and the solution of the problems confronting them seemed impossible, it was Franklin who rose to say (the words were recorded by James Madison): "I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth: That God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? We have been assured, sir, that 'except the Lord build the House they labour in vain that build it.' I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel...."

It was also Franklin who said that they had given us "a Republic, if you can keep it." James Madison later observed that "there never was an assembly of men, charged with a great and arduous trust, who were more pure in their motives, or more exclusively or anxiously devoted to the object committed to them." And President Washington, dismissing the delegates, gave the benediction: "We have raised a standard to which the good and the wise can repair; the event is in the hands of God."

James Bryce of Great Britain commented: "The Constitution of the United States, including the (first ten) amendments, may be read aloud in twenty-three minutes. It is about half as long as Saint Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, and one-fourth as long as the Irish Land Act of 1881. History knows few instruments which in so few words lay down equally momentous rules on a vast range of matters of the highest importance and complexity."

The Constitution, in the words of Harry Atwood, is "a statement of purposes, followed by a plan for setting up and maintaining a mechanism to administer a Federal representative government in harmony with the purposes set forth in the Preamble."

The Constitution is a set of rules, but it is not a source of values. At the time of the writing of the Constitution, the source of values was the Bible. The Constitution was to be a supplement, a set of rules for maintaining those values. As Harold O.J. Brown comments.

"The United States Constitution is not a source of fundamental values. It is an instrument whereby fundamental values can be protected, defining the procedures, principles and methods, whereby government can function to allow the people to give content to their lives. But the Constitution itself cannot give that content. In the early days, no one supposed that it would... There was little doubt as to the fundamental nature of good and evil, of virtue and vice. These things were not defined in the Constitution because Americans of the federal era generally knew and agreed about what they are."

A reading of our historic documents will show that this nation was founded with a trust in the God of the Bible. This does not mean that all were Christians; it does mean that all accepted the Laws of God as the fundamental Laws of the Land. The motto "In God We Trust" was not a rhetorical flourish; people meant it when they read it or repeated it.

For the better part of two centuries, we enjoyed a success unparalleled in the history of nations. It was as though the Lord were building our house. But then things started going wrong. People will say that it is because we departed from the Constitution and from the Declaration which made it necessary. This is true. But, in a greater sense, it is because we have departed from the faith of our fathers; we have substituted faith in humans for faith in God. It is well to say that we must return to the sources of our liberty, to the fundamentals of the Declaration of Independence and to the purposes of our Constitution.

But we must do more than return to the sources of our liberty. We must return to the Source of the sources of our liberty. Else we have builded the house in vain.

COMBATting ERA, IWY AND WOMEN'S LIB

FOR GOD, FAMILY, AND COUNTRY

It was a fraud and a deception from its very beginning; a scheme designed to rid women of the privileges and responsibilities of motherhood, of the restrictions imposed by marriage and family life, and to draft them into the worker and warrior world where all are said to be equal, regardless of sex or conditions of servitude.

Conceived in the UN, International Women's Year was readily adopted by President Ford in 1975. He issued the necessary proclamations and instructions for creating a federally-funded task force to develop the scheme. Then the United States Congress followed through by authorizing a budget of five million dollars to finance an International Women's Year Commission. This Commission was to arrange Women's Year Conferences in each State and Territory, and then hold a National Conference in Houston, Texas in November, 1977. At each of these State Conferences interested women, supposedly leaders in the various fields of endeavor—home, church, business, profession, education, etc.—would get together, conduct workshops, discuss and debate, and finally produce a set of resolutions and recommendations. These would serve as a mandate and the Women's Year Commission would tell the State politicians: "We all got together, we gave everyone a chance, and this is what women want. This is what you'd better enact if you don't want to lose the women's vote." Then the same thing will be repeated nationally after the national convention in Houston in November.

And here's the catch: These State Conferences have been planned, staffed, run, and attended by members of the Women's Liberation Movement.

It was planned that way from the very start of International Women's Year (IWY) activities. Bella Abzug, former U.S. Representative from New York City, after losing her bid for election to the U.S. Senate, was immediately appointed permanent "chairperson" of the IWY Commission. Bella had important qualifications for such a job. While in Congress, she introduced the first "Gay Rights Bill." It was to be an amendment to the Civil Rights Bill. If passed, it would have prevented discrimination against homosexuals. This is the very thing that Anita Bryant fought in Miami, Florida and is now fighting nationally. The passage of such legislation at the national level would mean that homosexuals could teach children in public and private schools, could be counselors in city, state, or federally supported camps. As those who fight these Gay Rights ordinances and bills say: "Homosexuals can't reproduce; they must recruit." That's why they want so desperately to get into positions where they can influence the children. Their passion to recruit, and their hatred of those who can reproduce (two of them allegedly murdered forty people in California, the media admits), these things show, naturally, why the Bible condemns them spiritually.

When Bella Abzug was named chairperson of IWY, her first official act was to send out correspondence to all State IWY Committees asking them to add to their agendas for the State conferences, workshops on "sexual preference," which is a pseudonym for homosexuality.

Another person on the IWY Committee—this one appointed by President Carter who also approves of the activities of IWY—is Jean O'Leary, Executive Director of the National Gay Task Force. O'Leary is an activist who wants to present "the true facts about lesbianism" in children's school textbooks. On the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the magazine Ms., O'Leary issued a statement: "I feel confident that over the next five years a dramatic change in public attitudes toward lesbians and gay men will take place—a recognition on the part of people everywhere that the right to love is an individual liberty we must all protect if there is to be real freedom and justice in this land."

As for the other members of this IWY Commission, President Ford made the original appointments. When President Carter took over, he re-appointed most of the original members, named a few new ones. The final result: Of the 45 members of the International Women's Year National Commission only one is anti-ERA and anti-abortion!

These, then, are the people who are spending that five million dollars of taxpayers' money in order to tell politicians at the State, National and International level, what American women want and what kind of laws they must enact to satisfy the women of America! This is why we call it a fraud and a deception from its very beginning.

OKLAHOMA WAS DIFFERENT

We also said that the IWY State Conferences were "planned, staffed, run, and attended by members of the Women's Liberation Movement." However, there was one important exception, and there may be more if what happened at Stillwater, Oklahoma on June 16, 17 and 18, 1977 is an indication. An article appearing in the Broken Arrow Ledger of June 23, 1977, recorded the results:

"The ballroom of the Oklahoma State University Student Union was packed for the State's International Women's Year Conference Plenary Session... Before the day had ended more than a thousand citizens were claiming an overwhelming victory for the women of Oklahoma, more than 200 others (women's libbers—Ed.) had challenged the session's right to exist... The 22 delegates elected (to attend the national conference in Houston in November—Ed.) were included on an approved list circulated by anti-ERA citizens—those against the Equal Rights Amendment and its associate concepts...."

The background: Opposing the control of IWY by women's libbers is an organization called the IWY Citizen's Review Committee. National chairman is Rosemary Thomson of Morton, Ill., and Oklahoma State chairman is Mrs. Bob (Dianne) Edmondson of Broken Arrow, Okla. About three weeks before the IWY State conference, Mrs. Edmondson made a speech urging citizens who oppose ERA and "its associate concepts" to attend the IWY conference as registered voting delegates. In this way they would be able to control the meetings, have their slate of delegates to the national conference elected and submit their own resolutions and recommendations to the State politicians.

The talk was so well received that a tape recording was made (cassette) and copies were sent to some 200 different individuals, church groups, civic organizations, etc. The result: Out of 1265 people attending the conference, over 1,000 were dedicated to the Christian American point of view. They were able to reject all the resolutions introduced by the women libbers, passed their own, and nominated and elected all 23 of the delegates to the National IWY Conference in Houston in November.

Mrs. Edmondson began her talk by quoting James 4:17; "Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Here is a part of what followed that quotation, and we are quoting from the tape sent us.

...I am sure that most of you are aware of the evils of the Equal Rights Amendment. But the womens lib movement goes much further than does the ERA... 44 of the 45 members of the National IWY Commission are what we can classify as members of the womens liberation movement. They are pro-ERA, which is certainly the god child of the womens liberation movement....

If we look at the womens liberation movement, we are going to find that there are three major themes that always run through all of their literature and all of their talks. These three themes are the family, sexuality and the Equal Rights Amendment. Now, let's take a minute and examine this, using their own material, some of the things they have said; because I feel that the only way to understand what womens lib really means is to look at what they say, not at what I say about them, but what they say about themselves.

Let's start with the area of "the family." I am going to quote from Gloria Steinem, who is the editor of Ms. Magazine, considered to be more or less the bible of womens lib. Gloria Steinem spoke in Houston several years ago. A friend of mine went to hear her talk, and has on tape this quote from Gloria Steinem:

"For the sake of those who wish to live in equal partnership, we have to abolish and reform the institution of legal marriage."

I think that's very clear. "Abolish" means to do away with the institution of legal marriage. Another quote I'd like to share with you comes from a little booklet called The Document: A Declaration of Feminism. This little booklet was published in Minneapolis, and it says that:

"Marriage has existed for the benefit of men, and has been a legally sanctioned method of control over women. The end of the institution of marriage is a necessary condition for the liberation of women. Therefore, it is important for us to encourage women to leave their husbands and not to live individually with men. Now we know it is the institution that has failed us, and we must work to destroy it."

Another quote from the same source says:

"With the destruction of the nuclear family, must come a new way of looking at children. They must be seen as the responsibility of the entire society rather than of individual parents."

Going further... Carolyn Byrd (?) in a book called Born Female: A Source Book for the Womens Liberation Movement, says:

"The new liberated woman of 1970 is not an old battle axe. Well educated, privileged, she is often attractive and almost always young. She is, in addition, idealistic, intense, and she is curious. She has nothing against premarital sex and has usually tried it. It is just that she finds it disappointing at best not worth the trouble.... She wants to reform sex practices in line with sex experiments. Bad language is a way of proving you're not a lady. So liberated women toss off four letter words, from which men extract a sexual thrill."

I know that these things I am sharing with you are shocking to some of you and I am sorry to have to be so blunt; but, believe me, I have cut out as much of the bad language as I can in order to share these with you in the most Christian way that I know how. I think we must know the face of our enemy, and Satan is definitely behind anything along these lines. And it does get even stronger in other parts of these books. For example, back to The Document: A Declaration of Feminism, it says:

"Liberated sexuality is freedom from oppressive sexual stereotyping; the freedom to choose heterosexuality, homosexuality, bisexuality, or asexuality, but not to be bound." This is, of course, a direct contradiction of Scripture and what God has as His plan for human sexuality.

One more quote I should like to give you is from The Humanist Manifesto, and the Humanist Manifesto is actually a doctrine of people who believe in human good rather than in God. Many of the signers of the Humanist Manifesto will classify themselves as feminists and supporters of the womens liberation movement. One in particular is Betty Friedan, founder of the National Organization for Women (NOW), and author of the book that might be said to have started the womens lib movement: The Feminine Mystique. When she signed the Humanist Manifesto, she certainly agreed with what she signed; and one of the startling statements in this Humanist Manifesto is:

"In the area of sexuality we believe that intolerant attitudes often cultivated by orthodox religions and puritanical culture, unduly repress sexual contact."

In other words: "In your church you have been teaching that adultery is sin, that sex without marriage is sin, that homosexuality is sin; you have unduly repressed our people and that is not right." This is what the humanists and the feminists believe, or what they say they believe.

One more quote from Gloria Steinem, because I think this shows how they feel about God's plan for us. She said: "By the year 2000 we will, I hope, raise our children to believe in human potential, not in God."

...Let's talk a little about sex education. I am not talking about biology...the reproductive system must be taught in biology courses. But this is not what the feminists mean when they talk about sex education. Let's take a look at a booklet called The Revolution Tomorrow is Now. This is the handbook of NOW, the most prominent organization within the womens lib movement. It calls for "the upgrading of sex education courses to include factual information on contraception, and on the ecological crisis of overpopulation, to remove all references to ideal or normal masculine or feminine etiquette, social behavior or vocation. The provision of contraceptives and abortion counseling in the same way that draft and drug counseling are now part of many school programs."

In other words, they want your child taught how to use contraceptives, where to get them, how to have an abortion; they want your child also taught that there is no right or wrong, no normal or ideal circumstances for sexual intercourse....Furthermore, we are not even to refer to masculine or feminine. This, of course, again opens the door for homosexuality and immorality, to be taught through the sex education courses in the schools....

In Minnesota the feminists had a half course on education....I can't share with you some of the language in some of the books they recommended. But one thing came through loud and clear: they recommended that there be lesbian counseling in the schools, that lesbians be encouraged in their homosexuality. It was specifically stated that no counselor should try to encourage a gay student to go straight. Instead, they said the counselor should tell them to accept the homosexuality, be proud of it, and share it with others. They even called for lesbian social clubs for study of lesbians in history....

The last area of the three that I mentioned: family, sexuality, and ERA; this last is, of course, the primary goal of all feminists.

How does IYW fit into all of this? Let's take a look at what they themselves tell us. It's very interesting to note that they explain their conferences by saying that we're going to have a conference in every State and the women in that State will decide what's important to them, and what they're concerned about. "We'll make a report from that State and it will represent the wishes of the women within that State."

This isn't anywhere near the truth, because the IWY nationally has already drawn up a full report on what it says is important to the women of this country. It's in a book called To Form a More Perfect Union, a book that you can order through the Department of State. It's about an inch and a half thick and it's absolutely filled with one sided decisions on what the women of this country want. More specifically, they have adopted sixteen resolutions already that we will be voting on at every State IWY Conference. They've already told us this. I have a list of them right here. And, a very interesting thing; these resolutions call for, first, passage of the Equal Rights Amendment. They call for federally-funded day care centers. And if we look back to The Revolution Tomorrow Is Now, we find that the NOW organization, on page 14, calls for the very same thing: "Resolved that NOW actively work to have federal and state governments set up day care centers for children of all ages. NOW endorses the goal of developmental care based on a child's needs at various ages, rather than mere custodial care."

Developmental care is what the feminists are calling for. This is to develop your child's thinking processes, his spiritual life - and that's what IWY is calling for!

There's another of these sixteen resolutions calling for strengthening and extension of the Supreme Court ruling on abortion. In other areas, IWY resolutions touch on education, calling for total integration of the sexes in all athletic events, and so forth....

Every one of these resolutions start out: "The federal government shall..." or "The President shall..." In other words, the shift of power is being pushed to Washington. Every one of these sixteen recommendations calls for an extension and enlargement of federal power, into all these areas of our life....

You are at a kind of crossroads now. You're going to have to think about this information I have given you, and try to decide what to do with it. There are two roads open to you. You can decide that the Lord expects you to do something about this evil that has been exposed to you; He expects you to do good and expose this evil. Or, you can choose to forget, or try to forget, what you have heard. You can choose to go back to sleep, and let the other guy do it. Which reminds me of a statement by Edmund Burke, who pointed out that all that is necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing. Please, don't choose to do nothing. Don't let the triumph of evil rest upon your shoulders.

I'd like to close with another quote from the Scriptures, one that I think will encourage us and show us all that with the Lord's help nothing is impossible, that we can overtake the lib movement, and in fact overcome it, and stand tall for God, family, and country. Let's close with this quote from Ephesians 6, verses 10 to 13:

"Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand."

The following item from the Montrose (CA) Ledger of June 23, 1977, is pertinent:

"First Lady Rosalynn Carter said Tuesday homosexuals should be free of harrassment but declined to say if she would allow her 9-year-old daughter Amy to be taught by a homosexual. Mrs. Carter at first tried to skirt the question. Then she said: 'I don't think they should be harrassed.' Asked if she would mind if her daughter Amy were taught by a gay teacher, she said: 'I think Jimmy answered that question very well. He said he had enough problems to worry about without having to take on another one'."

TO BUILD A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

JUSTIFYING THE MEANS

"It has dawned on the liberals of his party that Jimmy Carter is not entirely one of them. Some people knew that all along—David Rockefeller, for instance, who now has a friend at the White House." So reads the sub-title of an article appearing in the July 1977 issue of The Atlantic Magazine, by Christopher Lydon. Carter is a "Rockefeller Republican," says the article, and his most obvious Rockefeller connection is The Trilateral Commission, which Lydon describes as: "David Rockefeller's brain-child, a somewhat more energetic young cousin of the elite Bilderberg Conferences at which Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands had been gathering senior bankers and political figures from Europe and the United States since the mid-fifties. Should the Trilateral Commission be viewed as a cabal of multinational financiers—indeed as the first step toward a multinational government? . . ."

Jeremiah Novak supplies a neatly white-washed answer to that question in an article following immediately after Christopher Lydon's article in the same issue of the same magazine. Under the title The Trilateral Connection, Novak writes: "For the third time in this century a group of American scholars, businessmen, and government officials is planning to fashion a new world order."

Novak quotes C. Fred Bergsten, assistant secretary of the treasury and one of sixteen top Carter appointees who belong to the Trilateral Commission: "After every major war in this century Americans sought a new world order. Wilson pushed the League of Nations; Roosevelt and Truman constructed the UN-Bretton Woods system, and now after Vietnam, Jimmy Carter gives us the Trilateral plan. . . . Liberal internationalism is our creed. . . . and Jimmy Carter is its prophet."

At the close of his article, Novak supplies some information not previously revealed by the communications media:

"The Trilateralists' internationalist stance is being lobbied for in Congress by a new organization called New Directions. The group was founded at the instance of Theodore Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University and chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation. Hesburgh, with the support of Vance and Paul Warnke (Secretary of State and arms limitation negotiator, both Trilateralists), was able to recruit John Gardner, chairman of Common Cause, and others to form the new lobby group. Essentially, the group's 'Approved Action Program' reinforces Trilateral positions on expansion of international financial institutions, increased development assistance for poor nations, a strong plank for conservation of energy and reduction of arms sales.

"The alliance of Common Cause and New Directions with Trilateral thinking gives the Trilateralists two formidable companion organizations. It was Harlan Cleveland, a member of the board of governors of New Directions, who, on July 4, 1976, wrote a Declaration of Interdependence for the Bicentennial program at Philadelphia. He also published a paperback called The Third Try at World Order.*

"Jimmy Carter, as President, presides over this new internationalism. Indeed, it is said that when he faces Congress he goes as an internationalist; and when he travels to Western Europe and Japan he is welcomed as a brother Trilateralist. In the last analysis, it is Carter who directs the third try for a new world order." (unquote).

However, Carter and the Congress do not see eye-to-eye in matters of foreign policy, and in national defense they are at loggerheads on many vital issues. Despite aid from the Trilateral Commission, Common Cause, New Directions, Council on Foreign Relations, Committee for Economic Development and other potent lobbying groups, Carter is an "outsider" to most Senators and Representatives, and something of a cold war is developing.

The B-1 Bomber controversy is a case in point. The majority of Congressmen feel that development of the B-1 is essential to national defense. When Carter suggested a compromise, that is, the building of five of the big super-bombers, Congress was in agreement. But when Carter made another unexpected about face, Congressmen were shocked, some were downright angry. The Goldwater-Thurmond faction insists that the fight isn't over, and that Congress may override Carter. On the other hand, praising the President were McGovern and Proxmire, who acted as spokesmen for a gaggle of leftist lobbying groups such as American Friends Service Committee, Americans for Democratic Action, Catholic Peace Fellowship, Common Cause, Council for a Livable World, Fellowship of Reconciliation, Friends of the Earth, Gray Panthers, NOW, PUSH, SANE, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, War Resisters League, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, YWCA Legislative-Social Action Committee, and others of similar leaning.

* Novak erred in stating that Harlan Cleveland wrote a Declaration of Interdependence for the bicentennial program at Philadelphia. It was the leftist educator-historian Henry Commager who drafted that infamous document. For more information concerning New Directions, refer to our Report #24, 6/17/77.

As a measure of appeasement because of B-1 opposition, Carter agreed to "develop but not deploy" the controversial neutron bomb. This is a phony arrangement, but the Congress seemed to fall for it. It's phony because there's nothing new about this neutron bomb; it's 20 years old and was the focus of a similar hassle back in 1961.

The "enhanced radiation device," as the weapons designers called it, was actually developed and completed in December, 1958 but there was a nuclear testing moratorium being observed at that time by the United States and Great Britain, and in word but not in deed by the Soviet Union. U.S. military chiefs wanted to test what the media had dubbed the "neutron bomb"; and it was tested in the spring of 1963 in the Nevada desert. So the experts know all about this neutron bomb that is being presented as something new and undeveloped—and the Russians probably know all about it, too.

According to Robert Gillette of the Los Angeles Times: "Weapons experts...express surprise at the intensity of the current controversy over neutron bombs. They note that it already has been debated, developed, tested and—in a limited sense because the United States has built only one ABM installation—deployed."

To present this 20-year-old neutron bomb as something that will "scare the Russians and make up for the lack of B-1 bombers" is naive and childish—but Congress is going to vote money to "develop but not deploy;" and congressmen will be angrier yet when they discover they've been duped, and the "potential adversary" hasn't.

But, to return to our central theme: Carter isn't getting what the Rockefeller Cabal expect him to get out of this administration; and out of the other world chiefs of state. He is on a tolerably good relationship with the nations represented by the Trilateral Commission: Britain, Western Europe, and Japan. But he has managed to alienate most of the rest of the civilized world. Here at home he has been forced to give up his pet "tax rebate" scheme; he has had to compromise on those water projects; his plan to fund Social Security out of general revenue will surely fail; pulling troops out of Korea now that a helicopter has been shot down seems doubtful; relinquishing control of the Panama Canal is not yet certain; the plan for a Consumer Protection Agency at Cabinet level is being given up; Congress is making mince-meat of his original energy program; Carter has promised to cut inflation to 4% and unemployment below 5% by 1980, but these are promises he cannot keep and, to quote Paul Hencke of the U.S. News Washington Letter: "... a growing army of skeptics thinks Carter is whistling in the dark...the leading doubters are saying: 'Carter's goals are inconsistent.'" The metromedia will probably say that "Carter and Congress are trading threats and ultimatums—but after the yammering has been done they get together and agree on most of the points at issue." That's what the papers will tell you; but then, to paraphrase a Time Magazine TV ad: "The media will tell you what they want you to believe."

And that brings us to the crux of this commentary: There are many, many changes in policy, plans and programs that Carter's superiors demand. Many of these changes require approval by the Senate, the House, or both. If the Senate won't approve the treaties, conventions and agreements that are demanded at the international level; if the House won't approve and initiate the money bills that are demanded to carry out new plans and programs; if the joint Congress won't go along with the bureaucratic reshuffling that is mandated by Carter's bosses, there is an alternative: The President of the United States can declare a state of national emergency!

There is Executive Order #11921, of June 15, 1976; Executive Order #11490 of October 30, 1969, and other Executive Orders, all having the force of law, which can be used to establish a federal dictatorship whenever the President deems it expedient to declare a national emergency.

Under these orders, the federal cabinets and agencies, and the regional councils can—under color of law—control all food supply, money and credit, transportation, communications, public utilities, and all other facets of the lives of every citizen; and, we repeat: to exercise these dictatorial powers, the President merely declares by a signed proclamation that a national emergency exists. From the moment that proclamation is published in the Federal Register, it has the force of law.

Recently, Gary North, editor of Remnant Review, uncovered yet another emergency regulation which doubly accents the awful predicament in which we will find ourselves if and/or when a national emergency is declared. This is titled "Emergency Banking Regulation #1" and was signed by the then Secretary of the Treasury Robert Anderson, on January 10, 1961. Like these other executive orders, it has never been implemented, but would become "the law of the land" whenever a national emergency were declared.

In his Remnant Review, Vol. IV, No. 13, of July 1, 1977, Mr. North wrote:*

"...Consider the implications of this. Here is a regulation which will confiscate the bank accounts of everyone in the country. Here is a piece of non-law that can be implemented by the President of the United States merely by declaring a national emergency, specifically, that the nation has been attacked—not necessarily directly. For instance, if the U.S.S.R. were to interdict the delivery of oil from the Middle East, this would probably constitute an attack. Anyway, it would be hard for anyone to challenge the President's interpretation...."

"The justification of regulations like this one is national defense. These rules are there to protect public order (from the chaos of the free market) in times of national disorder .."

"Edward J. Phelps, the Deputy Assistant Director for Economic Stabilization of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, an environmental determinist, announced: 'The world is changing. I guess we are changing with it, and we haven't any choice but to learn to live in the environment surrounding us...we have no national choice but to live learn to in a new kind of world and to prepare ourselves to respond to whatever may happen.' This means... more government planning... and we have no choice but to... create a 'going concern' to operate after an attack. 'It would be a regulated system beyond our past powers to imagine and solvent at least to the extent it were possible to make it so.' Substitute the word 'corporatism,' or 'fascism' for 'going concern,' and you've got the general idea.

"He informed his audience that local community planning organizations (regional councils—Ed.) will have to impose full-scale price controls and rationing immediately after a nuclear attack, until the Federal government can take over the system later. The same point was made by Robert W. Winsor, an Economic Stabilization Officer with the OCDM in Region 7, Santa Rosa. For five days after an attack, there will be no retail sales permitted anywhere in the country, except perishables, but especially no sales of food and petroleum products. Food will be rationed, bag by bag, family by family. 'The last phase of rationing operations would involve the gradual and eventual national consolidation of local-state operations by the federal government. National policy assumes that this would take several months.' He was very specific on one crucial point... 'There must be no supply of the rationed item available except through the rationing system.'

"Finally, to quote Edward Phelps again, we had better realize that we are not talking about nuclear attack as such. If the attack is nuclear, local governments will control the population. If it is a conventional war, the Federal government will do it."

(end of extended quotation)

In his Review, Gary North reprints the entire text of the "Emergency Banking Regulation No. 1." We shall reprint only the most important parts of Chapter V of the document:

CHAPTER V

Restrictions on Cash Withdrawals and Transfers of Credit

Section I. Cash Withdrawals.

- (a) Withdrawals in the form of cash, whether by the cashing of checks or drafts, the making of loans in cash, or any other form of cash disbursement are prohibited except for those purposes, and not in excess of those amounts, for which cash is customarily used.
- (b) Banking institutions are further authorized to restrict and ration cash withdrawals to the extent necessary in the event a sufficient amount of cash should not be available.

Section 2. Transfers of Credit.

- (a) No depositor or share or savings account owner may transfer in any manner by any device whatsoever any balance to his credit on the date on which this Regulation becomes effective, except for the payment of (i) expenses or reconstruction costs vital to the war effort, (ii) essential living costs, (iii) taxes, (iv) payrolls, or (v) obligations incurred before the date on which this Regulation becomes effective, to the end that the best interests of the war effort and the public will be served.
- (b) Banking institutions shall prohibit the transfer of credit in any case where there is reason to believe that such transfer is sought for any unauthorized purpose.
- (c) After this Regulation becomes effective, banking institutions shall retain until released by Federal authority the original or a photographic copy (face and reverse sides) of each check and other evidence of transfer of credit in the amount of $1,000 or more.

(end of quotation)

A GOVERNMENT OF LAST RESORT

A citizen of the United States of America doesn't need to be a student of American history or political science to realize that vast and dangerous changes have been made in our system of government during the past century. It should be equally obvious to any interested observer that far more dangerous changes are being planned. The ultimate goal is global. It involves a New World Order, with world law, a worldwide economic and monetary system, a world police force to replace national military and police units, and all the other paraphernalia that goes into the making of a World Government.

Now, to achieve such a worldwide goal, it is necessary that vast changes be made in the U.S. Governmental System; for we were different from all the rest, now we must be like all the rest (that also must be changed to fit the universal pattern). Among these changes are: 1) federally controlled regions to replace the States and sub-regions to replace County and local governments so that the Nation itself can be converted into an Interdependent Region within a World Governance System; 2) creation of a national police agency to control all local policing units (LEAA); 3) creation of a system whereby the National (Super-Regional) Government is responsible for every citizen, and every citizen is responsible to the National Government (energy control, consumer protection, national health care, cashless and checkless money system; 4) etc.; etc.

Many of these final changes were planned to be made during the Carter Administration (he ran as a "populist" for this reason). Now, if the people (and the Congress that is supposed to represent the people) can be propagandized and persuaded to accept the planned changes, there will be little bloodshed and a gradual acceptance of the "new way of life."

But, if the people resist and the changes must be made by force, or if the Congress refuses to obey and agree, then there is that set of Executive Orders that can be implemented by presidential proclamation; and Congress will be out of business, and the country will be run by the Federal Bureau-cy via the Regional Councils and sub-councils.

Because a rift is growing between Carter and Congress, conditions seem to be developing (or are being developed) toward a critical situation whereby the declaration of a national emergency might seem reasonable and rational. Example: New York Times of July 10 had in-depth report on how New York residents could neither protect themselves or be protected in case of disaster. Three days later disaster came in the form of a power blackout, and "the night of the animals" ensued. Example: the change-agents met in Palm Beach County. The local Post said: "The briefing was on disasters. And officials from the Florida division of disaster preparedness who spoke to county and municipal employees yesterday didn't mince words..." We wonder how many other disaster preparedness divisions operate in how many other States?

Other examples: an unexplained rash of fires in penal institutions; terrorist activities now being accredited to "nazi" groups; rush to enact federal laws to govern crimes that are the business of State and County governments; plethora of pleas for federal aid in areas that should be the province of the individual citizen; etc.

Too long have people looked to Washington to do for them things they should do for themselves. Now that Washington has accepted that responsibility, we are to have "security"—but at what a price! We can only thank God that His power is greater than that of governments.

THE DEATH OF A REPUBLIC: BY MURDER, OR SUICIDE?

IDENTIFYING THE CORPSE

A Republic, by basic definition, is a State whose sovereign power resides in a certain body of people (the electorate), and is exercised by representatives elected by and (at least in theory) responsible to the electorate. Whenever sovereignty (the supreme political power) is exercised by any person or group of persons other than the elected representatives of the enfranchised citizenry then that State has ceased to be a Republic.

In the beginning of our Republic things were vastly different. Americans conceded that sovereignty belonged to God, that it was delegated by Him to free men, that free men then chose representatives to exercise that sovereignty, or supreme political power. Also, it was agreed and believed that there were certain unalienable rights which were bestowed upon men by God, and that in order to protect (secure) those rights, governments were instituted among men. Governments could not grant any rights; they could only guarantee and preserve the rights that were endowed by their Creator. As Richard Perry, a constitutional lawyer, explained:

"The liberties of the American citizen depend upon the existence of established and known rules of law limiting the authority and discretion of men wielding the power of government." (emphasis added).

Notice the difference; The U.S. Constitution was not written, and the U.S. Republic was not instituted to grant liberty to people; they were written and established to protect the liberties of people, by limiting the authority of men chosen to represent the people!

The "beginning of our great American brain-wash" in this regard is excellently revealed in an article which recently came to us as a clipping taken from an unidentified source. Please study the following carefully:

* * * * *

"LET ME READ YOU YOUR RIGHTS"

Don't let anyone tell you that you have "Constitutional Rights," or that the First Ten Amendments are the "Bill of Rights". These terms should make every liberty-loving American quake in his boots. They reverse the intent of the United States Constitution so that the Federal Government can dispense "rights", with the people being subjects.

In The Federalist, No. 4, we read: "Bills of rights' are, in their origin, stipulations (1) between kings and their subjects, abridgements (2), prerogatives (3) in favor of privilege, reservations of rights not surrendered to the prince. . . . They have no application to constitutions, professedly founded upon the power of the people and executed by their immediate representatives and servants. Here, in strictness, the people surrender nothing, and as they retain everything, they have no need for particular reservations." (Emphasis added.) Keep this in mind the next time a TV cop reads the boob-tube public enemy his "Constitutional Rights." Unless the American people understand this we could very well find ourselves with the government allotting us our rights.

Friends, you may read the Constitution of the United States forever, but you will not find a single right of the people described there. Search the first ten amendments and you will find the same. The Constitution, in the first seven articles, sets up the way in which the Federal Government is to be "constituted." Hence the term "Constitution." The people, through this Constitution grant certain powers and responsibilities to their Federal Government. The first ten amendments, far from being a "Bill of Rights" for the people, are a bill of "further restrictions" on the powers of the Federal Government. The term "Bill of Rights" was never intended to be the title of the first ten amendments.

The Constitution of the United States was drawn up to protect the rights we already had, before any Constitution or laws were ever drawn up. It does not grant, list or describe our rights. If it did, our rights would be limited by those granted, listed or described. Moreover, any tyrant who wished could deny us any "right" so granted, listed or described. He could dash away any or all of those listed any time it would serve him.

TRANSACTION DESCRIPTION	GROSS COST	YOUR SHARE
National Debt	544,000,000,000.00	10,880.00
Other Fiscal Liabilities	69,000,000,000.00	1,380.00
Undelivered Orders	130,000,000,000.00	2,600.00
Long-term Contracts	12,000,000,000.00	240.00
Financial Commitments	175,000,000,000.00	3,500.00
Insurance Commitments	1,481,000,000,000.00	29,620.00
Annuity Programs	3,499,000,000,000.00	69,980.00
Unadjudicated Claims	10,000,000,000.00	200.00
International Commitments	10,000,000,000.00	200.00
Miscellaneous Commitments	31,000,000,000.00	620.00

Liability growth in Fiscal 1976	600,000,000,000.00	12,000.00
TOTAL	$ 6,561,000,000,000.00	$ 131,220.00

We would be completely at his mercy.

Thank God, our Constitution does not work that way. Instead, it grants, describes, limits, defines and circumscribes the "Constitutional Rights" of the Federal Government (See Federalist Nos. 51 and 83 for example).

I was outraged some months ago to read of some people who were actually talking of "waiving" their "Constitutional rights." Horrors! Can Americans actually be maneuvered into such a recantation? We cannot give away our rights, even if we should decide to try it. (Persons may commit the ultimate folly and "waive" their freedom to practice their rights, but the rights are still theirs).

- (1) Stipulation: point or condition agreed upon as in a contract.
- (2) abridge: to deprive of rights, privileges, etc.
- (3) prerogative: a prior or exclusive right or privilege.

(End of article accredited to Ardette R. McLaughlin of Redmond, Washington. Emphasis as in the original article).

So, that's the way it was in the beginning, the way it still is, only the brainwash has been added to deceive the citizenry.

Also in the beginning, people really did choose representatives who exercised the God-given sovereignty in their behalf and protected the God-given rights by limiting the power of the Central Government, which is going to put itself in the place of God if permitted to do so.

Remember this fact: In a Republic, the powers of government are exercised by people who are elected to represent the people. Now, to illustrate how things have changed, here are some items and articles, correspondence and reports, selected more or less at random:

From National Taxpayers Union, 325 Pennsylvania Ave. S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003, which prepared the accompanying statement of each citizen's personal indebtedness to the government:

"A study by the National Taxpayers Union (based on official Treasury Department figures), reveals that U.S. taxpayers are now on the hook for at least $6.5 trillion. Your personal share is over $130,000. That's up by a staggering $17,000 from last year.... Irresponsible politicians, almost totally under the sway of special interests, are threatening to spend you into bankruptcy.

And the process is well under way. By diverting billions into useless purposes and debauching the currency through inflation, politicians have already reduced your standard of living...you're becoming poorer every day...your real income is declining...an important part of your bank account, your life insurance, your stocks and other financial assets has been lost." (unquote)

From Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana, an apologist for Big Government:

"The federal government is a maze of incredible complexity. Nearly everyone complains about its size but few people really realize how big it is. A few statistics are revealing. The federal government:

- * Employs 5 million, or one in every 43 Americans;
- * Spends an amount equal to about 1/4 of the country's total output of goods and services;
- * Owns 1/3 of the country's land;
- * Occupies 433 million square feet of office space;
- * Administers over 1,000 aid programs through 11 cabinet departments, 59 independent agencies and 1,240 advisory boards.

"The federal government touches almost every aspect of American life. It manages the economy, provides for the national defense, operates as a global power in an interdependent world, promotes science and responds to personal problems in thousands of ways by providing entitlements and services to the people." (unquote).

From Arthur O. Miller of Dallas, Texas, to his congressman:

"I am a member of the largest, most unwanted, unrepresented, unpopular, unprotected majority in America—a white, male, Anglo-Saxon, protestant, law-abiding, tax-paying, loyal American citizen who is forced to contribute the equivalent of 3 months out of every year in involuntary forced labor toward the persons mentioned above. I am in the forgotten, disfranchised group that is ignored on tax rebates, tax relief, low income loans, college scholarships, promotions based on merits instead of 'goals' (quotas). I am first considered in new sources of taxation, United Fund drives, Red Cross contributions, and as cannon fodder for future wars.

"I am one of a vast army of unorganized nonpersons who have pleaded in vain for the following:

"Get some control of the wild, inflationary spending by Congress and the federal bureaucracy. Stop buying votes with my tax dollars. Give us some relief from Big Brotherism. Quit talking about it and do it! Stop federal judges from making laws! They are not elected and have no right to set themselves up as our governors. Stop taking my tax dollars and sending them to overseas political cronies such as Korea, India, etc., under the guise of foreign aid. Cut out foreign aid! You can't buy friends.

"Stop all this talk about negative income tax. All this means is taking my tax dollars and giving them to someone who won't work. All this talk about a shortage of jobs is pure political hogwash!

"Wipe out the whole HEW outfit. They have ruined our schools, ... forced discrimination against whites in favor of blacks.... Our country can't stand much more of this.

From Alan Griswood, president of the Texas Retail Federation, sent out after an official tour of Washington, D.C.:

"...a spell of despair fell over me as I reflected upon the gigantic Government grist mill grinding out new laws, volumes of regulations and executive orders. For some time now it has been quite obvious that Congress has by statutory edict delegated most of its authority to the powerful and autonomous Federal agencies such as HEW, FTC, OSHA, CPSC, EPA and others. Beyond this, there has developed a huge network of Congressional Committee Staff Aides now numbering about 3500—the strength of a Roman legion.

"The 'Shadow Power' of these congressional committee employees impacts on almost every bill passed by Congress, affecting farmers, businessmen, consumers — people throughout the entire nation. While most of them are professional people, they have lost contact with or are ignorant about the private sector. Senator James B. Allen (D) of Alabama reports '...unfortunately, to a large extent, Staffs orchestrate and call the tune for Senate committee members. We're being taken over by non-elected, mushrooming staffs.' In despair and discouragement one seeks for either an escape or a means by which to change the status quo...."

POST MORTEM

In headlining this Report "The Death of a Republic," we asked the question: "By Murder, or Suicide?" The answer is moot. Our Republic was murdered by parties both known and unknown; but we, the electorate, who could have prevented it, stood by and permitted it to happen.

Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, apologist for Big Government and previously quoted in this Report, provides the alibi. He writes:

"Big is not necessarily bad.... The federal government touches almost every aspect of American life. It manages the economy, provides for the national defense, operates as a global power in an interdependent world, promotes science and responds to personal problems in thousands of ways by providing entitlements and services to people."

In listing the activities of the federal government, Rep. Hamilton is describing, not a Republic, but a Socialist Welfare State.

A Republican form of government would not "manage the economy." Ours was a free enterprise system, and government's only role was to act as referee, never as manager.

Nor would a Republican form ever tolerate any role in an "interdependent world." The very word "interdependent" connotes the surrender of sovereignty to some body other than the elected representatives of the people. And Hamilton's use of the word "entitlements" suggests that our rights are granted by the federal government, that our rights can be given—or taken away—by Big Brother. No longer unalienable, no longer endowed by our Creator, our rights are nothing more than what appointed bureaucrats and appointed federal judges say they are at a given time and under given circumstances.

The death stroke to our Republic was probably the decision that the federal government has a right to "manage the economy" of the Nation. Managing the economy can be accomplished only if the economy of every industry, every State and County, every community and every household can be managed. And that kind of managing demands Planning. And National Planning is synonymous with Socialism.

A few years ago an interesting conference was held at an Illinois State University. Present as speakers were a Marxist theorist, Harry Magdoff; and a multinational industrialist, Fletcher Byrom of Koppers, Inc. They both agreed that "planning is the key to improving the American economy." But they differed on how this should be done. One said socialism was the answer; the other said it could be done by capitalism. However, what Byrom really meant was monopoly capitalism, as his further statements proved. And monopoly capitalism is just another name for Corporatism, or to use the old-fashioned name for it: fascism.

We like the way Anne Garni said it: "Capitalism can be either a monopoly system or a free enterprise system. It depends upon who owns the capital; the people or the power structure. As we move further into a socialist state, both power and money move from the people to the ruling elite. Socialism can only work in a dictatorship—a government monopoly. It requires the centralization of money and power to siphon the earnings of the workers through the bureaucracy, then redistributing what is left back to the communities, with the usual strings attached. A free enterprise system can only work and flourish when government is restricted from competing with, and dominating the economy. The Rockefellers are monopolists and international socialists, not advocates of the competitive free enterprise system...."

This is important: It was the Rockefellers and their banker and cartel associates who financed the creation and institution of a new kind of government that would replace our representative republican form. It is called Regionalism. We, the People of Wisconsin, published the following:

"Regionalism is the transfer of power from your local government to a bureaucrat-dominated regional planning commission.

"Regionalism is the necessary administrative basis for socialism in the United States. Without the powerful and all-pervasive bureaucracy created by the regional planning commissions, big socialistic government cannot operate. It would lack the machinery for control.

"Regionalism is centralized power resting in the hands of bureaucrats, a concept foreign to our tradition as a representative republic of limited power, and decentralized power.

"Regional planning commissions are the work horses of regionalism. There is one in your area. They consist of a cadre of professional bureaucrats who advise and dominate a commission consisting of local elected officials and selected private citizens. Allegedly, the power lies with the local officials and the citizens, but a single visit to your regional planning commission will prove this false. The power lies with the professional planners who are able to obtain money from the federal granting agencies, and who use the technical language of planning, programming, and management to mystify local officials. The planners, serving as representatives of the federal granting agencies (such as the Department of Housing and Urban Development) deliver the Washington bureaucrats' demands to your local officials, who dutifully follow instructions believing that they must cooperate, or they will lose federal funding.

"Using the lever of federal funds, the regional planning commissions are working throughout Wisconsin (and every other State and Territory) to institute a form of socialism in which all important aspects of your economy and society will be planned, programmed, and managed by bureaucrats."

THE ROUTE TO REGIONAL WORLD GOVERNMENT

DIVIDE TO CONQUER, THEN REGIONALIZE TO RULE

Iosif Visserionovich Dzhugashvili, who was better known to the world as Joseph Stalin, dictator of the Soviet Union for nearly thirty years, also wrote books. One of them, titled "Marxism and the National Question," was published in 1942. We have never read the English translation of the book, but according to the Valley Times (Central Valley, California) of March 22, 1973, Stalin outlined the following principle:

"Divide the world into regional groups as a transitional stage to total world government. Later, the regional groups can be brought all the way into single world dictatorship."

We cannot vouch, first hand, for the authenticity of this statement, but some years ago—before the United States was regionalized—Johnny Johnson of the Citizens Information Center, Phoenix, Arizona, published an item which goes along with what Stalin is alleged to have written. In order to fit this into the proper time frame: when the New Deal Brain Trusters first began scheming to divide the United States into federal regions, the idea of "river authorities" was being promoted; the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) being the first of such developments. Johnny Johnson's article deals with that time when some of FDR's best friends were Communists and "Uncle Joe" Stalin had many supporters in high places in the United States. The article follows:

About 12 years ago, Mrs. Carl (Mary) Mundt, wife of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, wrote the following article for the National Newsletter of the National Federation of Republican Women's Clubs:

"If I push this button I can turn off all the lights in San Bernardino, and if I push this one I can turn off the water in Los Angeles." It was the operator in one of the control rooms at Hoover Dam speaking.

"What would happen if the wrong person should get in here some time and start pushing buttons?" Someone asked. The operator shook his head. "The wrong person pushing buttons in here could play havoc with the entire west coast area," he replied.

"My thoughts went back to a dimly lighted, dusty room in Denver in 1934. My husband and I had infiltrated a meeting of the Communist Party which was presided over by a professor from the University of Colorado. He was presenting a communist plan for seizing control of the government of the United States. Several times during the evening he repeated the phrase: 'An invasion of this country may not be necessary. If we play our cards right it can be taken from within.'

"On the wall was a large map of the U.S., but it looked strangely unfamiliar. All the boundary lines of the States had been erased and the country was divided into nine sections controlled by river authorities similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA).

"The professor continued his lesson: 'We can never hope to take over this country if we have 48 strong State governments to oppose,' he stated. 'We must get the States to depend more and more on the federal government for their very existence.'

"He turned to the map: 'Here we have a picture of this country controlled by nine river authorities, all of which are dominated by the central government. The TVA is now a reality and I'm happy to tell you that we have some of our party members planted there. We must have more Valley authorities. There must be an MVA, and CVA, and so on until the nation's light and power is controlled from a central source. We are not interested in cheaper power for the people. What we want is to get our members planted in vital spots where at a given signal by merely pushing a button or pulling a lever they can plunge the country into darkness and disaster'."

So ends Mrs. Mundt's article. Kind of interesting what with all this talk about "power grids" and "inerties," i.e. the linking together of the various federal power projects.

(End of Johnny Johnson's article.)

As we indicated, the foregoing is "dated."

The takeover of all private power companies and the creation of a monopoly of "public power" never developed as the New Dealers (and the Communists) hoped. There are now 22 River Valley Authorities, but they have not developed the political clout that the Socialists wanted them to attain. Likewise, the plan to "nationalize" all power plants and thus create a public power monopoly did not materialize as hoped; although there does exist the very real fear of power black-outs on a wholesale scale that "can plunge the country into darkness and disaster," as in New York City recently. Moreover, the plan for dividing the nation into federally controlled regions is in operation. This is in line with the regionalism plan written about by Stalin in 1942, and outlined about that same time by a Communist professor from the University of Colorado.

Please note: we are not suggesting that the scheme to regionalize the United States—and the world—is a "Communist plot." The idea of regionalizing and centralizing the world's banking facilities was put into operation through central banks and our own Federal Reserve Districts, years before Joe Stalin wrote anything about regionalism.

What we are suggesting is the exact reverse: that Communism was financed and promoted by the Central Bankers and the Monopoly Capitalists of the world, as a part of the plan to, in Stalin's words: "Divide the world into regional groups as a transitional stage to total world government."

However, in view of his many conversations with Roosevelt and Churchill—and their aides and assistants—during World War II, Stalin himself may have known that Communism was not an end in itself, but the means to an end that transcended both communism and capitalism!

Moreover, in view of the recent growth of what is called "Eurocommunism," the following statement from Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.—one of the really important planners—which appeared in the Spectacle du Monde, Paris, in July 1962, becomes important: "To win, we must adopt revolutionary dynamism. We'll do it by taking the communist parties away from Moscow and leading them ourselves through proving to them that America is the real progressive nation."

Hilaire du Berrier is one of a few reliable and authoritative observers of world affairs who believes in the "Conspiratorial Theory" of history, and he consistently points out to his readers that "one of the master conspiracies of history" is the practice of the "divide-and-rule" technique; this especially since the end of World War II. He refers to it as the practice of "splintering nations into units too small to revolt, and too shackled to unite." This, in a nutshell, is Regionalism when applied at the world level. At first it was practiced on a continental scale—Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Africa—but when such international organizations as the Round Table, Bilderbergers, and the Trilateral Commission entered the conspiracy, it became a global movement.

Much of what follows in this Report is based on or adapted from the writings of Hilaire du Berrier. His H du B Reports is a monthly foreign affairs letter, $15 per year. The domestic address: P.O.Box 786, St. George, Utah 84770. Highly recommended.

In this 20th century the first serious attempt to form a new world order resulted in the ill-fated League of Nations. At the end of World War I, the Treaty of Versailles, of which the League Covenant formed a part, created a new map of Europe. Three empires, six kingdoms, twenty-nine duchies and principalities were wiped off the map. Replacing them were new regional arrangements which often threw together people of different traditions, religions, languages, and national loyalties. The League failed, not so much because the United States refused to join, but rather because when the planners remade the map, they did not take the precaution of "removing the barriers of tradition and national loyalty first."

But World War I brought another lesson to the planners. They learned that there is a way to make citizens forget traditions and national interests: a way that was neither political nor military, but economic and financial instead. We quote du Berrier:

"On May 11, 1931, Austria's great banking house, Credit Anstalt, went to the wall... It shook governments and banks around the world. A tidal wave to the left was set in motion as unemployment mounted. England went off the gold standard on September 21, 1931, and managed paper currency was in. Scandanavian countries, tied to the pound sterling, saw their money depreciate against countries still on the gold standard. Other countries had to devalue or lose their exports. With no fixed medium of exchange, trade slumped and capital fled from country to country in search of constant assets.

"The lesson: Make citizens desperate and they will forget national interests. Scramble the world map as though it were a jigsaw puzzle, separate mother countries from their colonies and both will accept anything that promises survival. Destroy the catalyst of patriotism and the stage is set for the 'new world order.' Roosevelt and his utopians were ready when the propitious moment of history arrived...."

"Professor Louis A. Fanning, in his excellent book, 'Betrayal in Vietnam,' observed that 'the original American involvement in Vietnam took place in the administration of President F.D. Roosevelt during World War II...During his secret meeting with Stalin in Tehran in late November, 1943, with Charles Bohlen acting as interpreter, FDR and Stalin planned the ousting of the French from Indo-China and the British from India, as a starter. Roosevelt saw the empires he intended to break up as sources of land and people for the United Nations. Stalin saw the whole Roosevelt dream as a ground-clearing for communism (Roosevelt dreamed of becoming president of the world, while Stalin dreamed of becoming world dictator; both were being deceived by the Planners who used them for a different purpose—Ed.)

"The same premature splintering of nations was underway in North Africa...It was a utopian dream with wheels within wheels from the start. Roosevelt visualized the UN as a World Government ruling over mother countries and colonies alike. Monnet and his 'Europeans'—Rene Pleven, Robert Schuman, Joseph Retinger the Pole, Duncan Sandys the Britisher, and a host of others—planned to package Europe's countries in a super-state as their only alternative to going under."...(End of quotation)

As mother countries were being separated from their colonies, the move to end statehood in favor of regions, and to replace patriotism with class loyalty, was begun in Europe. Vertical loyalty (from citizen to country) was denounced and horizontal loyalty (class solidarity) was extolled. Walter Reuther told the workers of the world: "International labor solidarity is a trade union obligation." Then came the theme that small nations cannot survive, and large nations must become "interdependent" if they are to avoid the horrors of invasion, inflation, mass hunger, mass unemployment, energy crises, etc.

But in Europe, says du Berrier, a hitch developed: Patriotism refused to die as easily as the Planners expected. "With their outlets (colonies) amputated and patriotism denounced as selfish nationalism, nations still clung to what Spengler described as 'standards and tastes mortised in the centuries.' National and traditional loyalties remained (with citizens) stubbornly clinging to the borders and landmarks they knew. Nations had to be broken up further. The answer was regionalism!"

Some of the examples the author cites: In Italy, they began by deposing the king after World War II. The U.S. Office of War Information provided sound trucks and speakers, and they set up a "stacked plebiscite" that deposed the king and paved the way toward the entry of Communism. Later, Italy was divided into twenty semi-autonomous regions. Adroit politicians were able to play these regions against Rome and by 1976 every major Italian city was communist-governed and the provinces were said to be wallowing in such chaos that the prime minister of Italy has just concluded a visit with President Carter, asking for help and promising that his alliance with the Communist Party will not upset the balance of NATO and the Atlantic Alliance.

To defeat patriotism and traditionalism, the other nations of Europe were "regionalized" as Italy had been regionalized. Then, to take the next step in the development of the new world order, the Planners began to complete the mass regionalization of all Western Europe, via the European Common Market.

But there remains the paradox: the Planners promote nationalism in the smaller states or communities, as with the Flemish and Walloons in Belgium, the Basques in Spain and France, Catalonia in Spain, etc. Then they demand that they become "regions" in the super-regional world government which is called E.E.C. and which headquarters at

THE METRIC MENACE

The following footnote from a correspondent should serve as a warning:

"P.S. Have recently returned from a trip to England, which is in a state of utter chaos. Another couple of years of Socialism and it is unlikely they will ever be above sea-level!

"They have recently 'gone metric,' which means that all building materials, lumber, doors, windows, cement blocks, bricks and electrical and plumbing supplies are all in brand new sizes. If you have to change a switch it won't fit in the wall box. Plumbing sweat couplings don't fit either, so fixing a burst pipe is a major operation. If and when we do likewise, all our industry will have to completely re-equip with new machines, at fantastic cost, and then try to compete with the rest of the world, who are already on the metric system. The effect on our economy will be disastrous.

Brussels. The Planners may seem to be working at cross purposes, but this is meant to confuse those they intend to conquer. It's an adaptation of the trick popularized by Friedrich Hegel that's being used to complete the Regionalization of Europe:

1. Dissatisfied regions are depicted as "colonized" countries in the grip of a nation that still looks upon itself as a colonial power (England, France, Spain, Portugal, The Netherlands all were colonial powers before Regionalization began).
2. These "colonies" are propagandized into declaring themselves independent states.
3. Once "independent" they are shown that they cannot exist as an independent state.
4. The synthesis: they are accepted as "interdependent regions" in the Regional Superstate which is the EEC, or Common Market.

It should be noted that by the terms of the 1957 Treaty of Rome, which founded the the EEC, the Treaty takes precedence over the constitutions of member states, and a state once in the EEC can not secede. When England was forced into the EEC, its status as a Super-Region of the world was assured. Now that Spain, Portugal and Greece are suing for membership, the continuance of the "United States of Europe," made up of Regions within Regionalized Interdependent nations, is assured.

To sum it up in du Berrier's words: "Parliamentary elections to the regional super-state in Brussels will be held in late May or early June of 1978. Breakaway movements are being fostered in member countries to strengthen the centralization of power in Brussels and weaken still further the states which make up its parts. Each breakaway movement of a region or minority is encouraged in the name of nationalism, while national resistance to centralization of power in the Common Market (EEC) is denounced as nationalism... All of the phases since World War II have followed a prescribed order: decolonization, no winism wars, formation of the Common Market as a move toward a Marxist United States of Europe, and regionalization as a means of immobilizing national resistance."

So much for Super-Regionalism in Europe, except for this important footnote: Most of the principals involved in the creation of this developing Regional World Government which is called the European Economic Community, were United States citizens. Those who were of European citizenship were members of the Bilderberg Group, of the European Division of the Trilateral Commission, of the Club of Rome, or of the Paris based Organisation for Economic Co-Operation and Development (OECD). Those Americans involved were members of the Council on Foreign Relations, the Bilderberg Group, the Committee for Economic Development, or the Trilateral Commission.

The names will be familiar because these same persons have been involved with the development of Regionalism within the United States, and Interdependence abroad. A few of the names: Cord Meyer, Jr. of the United World Federalists and the CIA; John J. McCloy, Wild Bill Donovan of the OSS (forerunner of the CIA); Walter Reuther and Irving Brown, labor agitators; Averell Harriman, Robert Murphy, Mike Mansfield, Henry Cabot Lodge, C.L. Sulzberger of the New York Times, and of course, the Rockefellers and their direct agents; notably Kissinger, and Brzezinski.

Here in the United States, Regionalism was essential, not so that the USSR could take over without military invasion as the Communist professor from the University of Colorado suggested; but so the federal government could take over, centralizing all power in a federal bureaucracy, while at the same time destroying States Rights and the States themselves.

To this end the "Civil Rights" Crusade has been a powerful force. It has created crises so that the Feds could step in and establish Regional control over State and local governments. Terrorism has served its purpose well. It has permitted the creation of Regional police control, centrally directed from Washington. President Carter's "Human Rights Crusade" will be a powerful force in the promotion of Regional Governance, both abroad and domestically. The alleged "rehabilitation" of criminals so they can be let loose to prey on citizens again and again—all these "crises creating" events help strengthen centralized control and regional governance—brush fire wars and civil revolts do the same thing abroad.

And we can't help thinking that FDR was absolutely right in one thing he said: that things don't just happen; they are planned.

Stalin was also right about Regionalism; but neither he nor FDR saw the total picture. They were mere "super-pawns in the game." As are all those who seek to build the New World Order. For the New Order they seek and know not how to find, is "not of this world."

THE CARTER REORGANIZATION FORMULA: REDUCTION THROUGH EXPANSION

NOW A DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

President Jimmy Carter's energy package, which takes this nation a giant step closer to a completely socialized energy industry, has been signed, sealed, and delivered. Almost everything Jimmy asked Congress for, Jimmy got. The new $10.6-billion agency, headed by Czar James Schlesinger and starting out with 20,000 employees, is Jimmy Carter's way of "reducing" the size and the cost of the federal administration. The reduction, however, has to do with the number of agencies, not the number of federal employees, or the number of dollars spent. For example, Baby DOE, as the new department has been nicknamed, will consolidate and absorb the functions, and all the employees, of the Federal Energy Administration, the Energy Research and Development Administration, the Federal Power Commission, and the segments of other departments and agencies now dealing with energy. So, the power will be centralized, but there'll be more—not less—federal employees. As for the cost, the following from the Wall Street Journal tells that part of the story:

"A Chevron statistician has been sizing up the $10.6 billion budget of the proposed new Department of Energy. For example, it is about double the value of all the oil the U.S. imported from Saudi Arabia last year. It exceeds capital and exploration expenditures by the petroleum industry to find and produce oil, gas and gas liquids in the U.S. in 1975. It exceeds by $800 million the 1974 profits of the seven largest international oil companies. Chevron can't resist adding that these profits were described by a U.S. Senator as 'obscene.' It is equivalent to about $3 a barrel of domestic crude oil production; which means, if our own arithmetic is correct, that you could decontrol all domestic crude oil prices and still end up paying less for oil than the federal energy bureaucracy costs. And one should keep in mind that the $10.6 billion is only the cost of the newly born baby DOE. Think what it will cost when it grows up!" (This is quoted, not to defend the "obscene" profits of the oil companies or the editorial policy of the Wall Street Journal, but to show the "obscene" cost of Baby DOE in terms of energy and taxpayers' money—Ed.)

In addition to the $10.6 billion that Baby DOE will cost taxpayers, it will clamp massive federal regulations upon industry, impose heavy new taxes upon consumers and producers (all such taxes become consumers' taxes in the long run) and bring the natural gas company under complete federal control. And here is what actually happens with the creation of Baby DOE:

The number of federal agencies is reduced somewhat, but the cost becomes greater and the number of federal employees grows! Also, there is this important positive fact: the bureaucratic power that was previously scattered among several agencies, now is concentrated and wielded by one energy czar with cabinet-level status. This concentration of power within the President's Cabinet is an important part of the Carter Reorganization Plan.

We see this same move to concentrate power at the top in a recent directive issued by Joseph Califano, czar of HEW, the first Cabinet Department to be completely socialized, or, if you prefer the stronger word, communized. On July 20, 1977, the following report appeared in the Los Angeles Times and other metropolitan dailies:

"Joseph A. Califano, secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, stripped his regional directors of their titles and much of their authority over field offices in a shakeup of the regional bureaucracy. The 10 regional directors had operated as mini-secretaries of HEW, supervising tens of thousands of federal employees outside Washington headquarters. HEW's regional offices are in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia, Atlanta, Chicago, Dallas, Kansas City, Denver, San Francisco, and Seattle. Califano said in a memorandum that the regional heads now would hold the title of 'principal regional official' and would act as personal representatives, reporting to him through a deputy undersecretary in Washington."

Note that this changes the concept of Regional Governance in no way; this is merely a move to concentrate power at Washington, and make it more difficult for regional administrators to deviate from the policies and directives laid down by the heads of HEW and OMB.

Just four days before Califano issued his directive to his regional heads, President Carter sent his proposal to Congress for a broad reorganization of the White House—a reorganization that would, according to Carter, cut the presidential staff and produce savings estimated at $6 million a year. The AP report implied that this was all a

THREE YEARS LATER

Dear Mr. Bell:

It has now been three years since the start of the textbook protest in Kanawha County, West Virginia. The protest has pretty much run its course and, in the strict sense of the word, as a militant protest it no longer exists. But, three years after the protest started, what are the conditions in Kanawha County in the public (government) schools, and in private schools?

As far as the public schools are concerned, all the filthy anti-Christian and anti-American textbooks that were protested are still in public schools in Kanawha County. The public school system, never reformable from its inception, has continued to be totally unresponsive to protest or complaint. It simply wears its adversaries down with dialogue, pretending to talk reform and "quality education" (but) it never does anything in these areas except to talk.

While what happened in Kanawha County helped to alert people across the nation to the brutal fact that they had better start checking into their own public school systems, the emphasis here now among most concerned parents is the promotion of private Christian education. By informing people as to the insidious nature of the public school system it is our hope to remove as many children as possible from the influence of that system so they can have the benefit of a Christ-centered education.

...The public school system, as it exists in our nation today, began in the late 1830's and was instituted and promoted by people who believed that the state ought to control the educational process. These people, largely Unitarians, were strongly opposed to the church-run schools which, they said, were out of date. Their opposition to Calvinist church schools was most especially rabid. The public school system was, then, basically instituted as a reaction against Christian education.

hoax. It read:

"Carter fell well short of carrying out a pledge to cut the White House staff by 30 per cent. The announcement claimed a 28 per cent reduction, to 351 from 485. However, officials acknowledged that more than half the cutback—70 jobs—simply would be transferred from the White House payroll to a new central administrative unit within the larger staff of the Executive Office of the President. Making his first use of reorganization powers given him in April, Carter said he wants to reduce the Executive Office staff by 242 authorized positions, including the White House staff reduction, and eliminate seven Executive Office units, including the Domestic Council.

"The basic thrust...is to strengthen cabinet government." Carter said...

"Despite the planned reduction of 242 Executive Office positions, Director Bert Lance of the Office of Management and Budget said

The conversion of American education into an instrument of government (local control is a myth) has been one of the most severe steps into socialism and collectivism this republic has ever taken. The socializing... of a child is far more radical and revolutionary than the collectivizing of income, monetary wealth or property. For, if a child is effectively radicalized, he will have no concept of his God-given liberty or of any thing except that concept fed to him by the socialist "planners." And so, let me state again the fact that the concept of state-run education is one that is constantly at war with the Christian faith. This being the case, we need to remember that a state-run educational system is increasingly intolerant of any rivalry, but most particularly intolerant of Christian school rivalry. If Christian schools cannot be openly closed down they will be browbeaten with fire codes and all manner of ordinances designed to make it all but impossible for them to function. This failing, the attempt will be made to at least neutralize the effect Christian schools have.

Some of this... may give you a little insight as to why the public schools will not be reformed from their stated task: the socialization, or to put it bluntly, the communizing of your children. Are you as parents willing to let that happen? If not, then let's get out and work to promote private Christian schools (devoid of any government "help") and to help those who sacrifice to give their children a Christian education.

Al Benson, Jr.

'Nobody will lose their job.' (Emphasis added—Ed.)

Here again we see the same pattern: There will be a reduction of agencies and offices, but there will be no reduction in payroll or personnel, and the real purpose behind the reorganization ploy is to further centralize (collectivize) political power at the highest possible level; or, as Carter expresses it: "strengthen cabinet government."

Carter has received Congressional approval of his energy program and the cabinet department which will utilize the awful power that has been given it. Carter's White House and Executive Office staffs revamping must endure a 60-day period during which the Congress could turn down the plan (but it never does reject a Presidential Executive Order). Next, then, is the revamping of the Welfare Program. And that brings us back to

JOSEPH "WHIZ KID" CALIFANO

H.E.W. Secretary Joseph Anthony Califano, Jr. is the czar who will administer whatever welfare program Carter is able to obtain with the advice and consent of Congress. He is—and has been—a man to watch. A product of Harvard Law School. In April 1961, he became, through the influence of his friend Adam Yarmolinsky, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, where he later became Secretary of Defense Robert Strange McNamara's "right hand man." In 1965 he received appointment as Special Assistant to President Lyndon Johnson, remaining in this position for nearly four years, until January 20, 1969. In 1966 Johnson told his Cabinet, "when Joe speaks, that's my voice you hear." It was his former boss, McNamara, who described Califano as "the man who, next to the President, has contributed more than any other individual in our country, to the concept, formulation and implementation of the program for the Great Society."

Frank Capell, in his Herald of Freedom of May 6, 1977, reports that while Johnson's chief domestic adviser, "Califano exercised White House control over the Department of Labor, various welfare programs in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the poverty program, the Agency for International Development program, and all aspects of foreign trade. Califano organized a task force to advocate the Model Cities plan—meanwhile overcoming resistance from housing officials who insisted the program was too large and controversial to undertake in the first year of the new Department of Housing and Urban Development."

"Throughout his White House career," Capell continues, "Califano concentrated on domestic affairs and avoided the issue of Vietnam. Although he had both the position and expertise to become an authority on the war, Califano preferred to remain silent in order not to place himself in conflict with McGeorge Bundy who was then national security affairs adviser. As the Vietnam War expanded, Johnson began to devote less and less time to domestic affairs until by 1968 Califano had taken over almost complete supervision of all domestic affairs."

When Johnson retired and returned to his ranch in Texas, Califano traveled around the world on a Ford Foundation grant, studying the "student-youth-and-establishment" problem, wrote a book about his travels titled The Student Revolution: A Global Confrontation. He continued to write books, special articles, etc. He also practiced law quite profitably until returning to "public service" in the Carter administration.

"As the architect of the Great Society," Capell concludes, "Califano was responsible for the creation of federal welfare projects which cost the U.S. taxpayers billions of dollars and which did not improve anyone's standard of living nor did they solve the problems they were presumably intended to solve. As H.E.W. Secretary with an almost unlimited budget with which to work, Califano can be counted on to promote more Socialism through the Department of Health, Education and Welfare."

Califano is a member of the New-World-Order promoting Council on Foreign Relations and seems to have the full backing and approval of the Invisible Government in all that he does as HEW Czar. In fact, he hasn't even received official reprimand for violating the presidential austerity order in employing a chef and a body-guard at higher than permitted salaries.

At present the "welfare mess" is referred to as a "monster out of control." Under the direction of Califano there may be some control, but for purposes that will make it even more of a monster to the taxpayer. The

GENOCIDE SHOWDOWN DELAYED

Following is from the New York Times of August 2, 1977:

Backers of an international treaty against genocide agreed reluctantly today to postpone a Senate showdown on the issue, admitting they did not have enough votes to overcome the opposition. But they promised new efforts during the August recess to obtain the votes needed for American ratification of the 28-year-old treaty this session.

President overrode the warnings of Rep. Al Ullman, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and presented his plan despite Congressional opposition to many of his give-away schemes. We have not seen a completed copy of the new welfare program, but the U.S. News & World Report of Aug. 8 gives this outline:

"The proposal calls for scrapping much of the present welfare system and replacing it with an entirely new arrangement: a guaranteed minimum income for needy families and individuals who are not expected to work, and jobs with income supplements for those who can and should work."

In other words, a guaranteed minimum income for all residents of the United States—and this would include an estimated 16 million illegal aliens in the country who are to receive amnesty (that's one of Carter's pet words). Also, food stamps will be given out free to millions and more freely to other millions. Carter explains that the actual reorganization of the existing welfare system will mean no additional cost to the ever dwindling rank of taxpayers. But the new programs that are being planned will cost more. Califano will be in charge, and it must be remembered that, as author of the Johnson Great Society Anti-Poverty Program including Medicare, Headstart, the Model Cities Program, etc., Califano is directly responsible for much of the mess that exists in Welfare today. Commenting on the mess he helped create, Califano said: "Given the vast resources this nation spends on income assistance, it is appalling that our programs are so poorly coordinated. (They) unfairly exclude millions from adequate aid, contain absurd incentives to break up families or discourage work... and are an administrative jungle, incomprehensible to legislators, administrators and the American people alike."

Examples: In aid to families with dependent children there are 11.2 million people who received $9.9 billion in aid in 1976. Under the title "aid to the aged, blind and disabled," 4.2 million people received $6 billion. Medicaid was responsible for $15 billion being paid to 24.4 million recipients. Food stamps worth $5.3 billion were distributed to 17.3 million people. Under the catch-all heading of "General Assistance" 905,000 people received payments of $1.6 billion. This adds up to $37.8 billion paid to 58 million people in 1976. It required 346,000 government employees to administer the program.

Remember, the above does not include such expensive items as unemployment insurance, job retraining programs, educational grants, social security, medicare, etc.

To take care of these billions of dollars that are spent in welfare programs (all of which are unconstitutional) there are taxes— income taxes, hidden taxes, social security taxes—and inflation, which is the cruelest tax of all since it amounts to felonious robbery by our own government, of all people, especially those with fixed incomes. An interesting admission on the part of the Treasury Department, as reported by U.S. News & World Report of July 4, 1977: "One dollar out of every 4 paid into the Federal Treasury now comes from Social Security taxes. It's the fastest growing federal revenue source. Social Security taxes jumped 233 per cent in 10 years. Individual income taxes, 160 per cent; corporate income taxes, 62 per cent." Yet the Social Security program is bankrupt! Think that over.

Here is the real reason for the so-called Carter reorganization plan, which we have described as Reduction (of the number of Federal agencies) through Expansion (of the money spent and the employees on the federal payroll):

People are coming to realize that Big Government has the characteristics of a dinosaur—huge body and tiny brain. It hatches plans that are unreasonable and oppressive. It presents itself as a humanitarian force, but must operate on a basis of coercion. The American people (the taxpayers and the law keepers, that is) are fed up and want to curb Big Government.

So, by previous appointment, along comes a peanut farmer with a plan that seemingly reduces the size of Government. But, what it really does is complete the centralization of power at the federal level. It also puts more people on the welfare rolls, plans to nationalize industry, beginning with energy; and complete the construction of a Corporate Socialist Regional Government which will take its place in the New World Order!

With approximately one out of every four Americans dependent upon government pay, handouts or subsidies of one type or another, with the federal government about to finance all elections to House and Senate, with the "instant voting" plan about to be adopted, and with Big Brother watching us all, what chance has the taxpayer and the law abider to really curb Big Government? Our Declaration of Independence outlines a plan.

THE PANAMA PERFIDY: PAYING TRIBUTE TO COMMUNISM

TRILATERALIST TREACHERY?

On August 10, 1977, Ellsworth Bunker and Sol Linowitz completed their arrangements for the giveaway of the U.S. owned and operated Panama Canal to the Communist controlled government of Panama. They then flew to Washington, D.C. to report to their trilateralist chieftain Jimmy Carter, and to provide him with the details of the draft treaty they had fabricated (we use the term advisedly).

These acts of infamy occurred while the United States Congress was on vacation and at a time when Senators might be approached and influenced by their constituents. Public opposition to the proposed treaty was well known. Senator Jesse Helms (R., N.C.) had reported to the press the results of a survey showing that 78% of the American people want continued U.S. ownership and control of the canal, that only 8% favored turning the canal over to Panama, and that a mere 14% hadn't made up their minds or had no opinion.

Faced with strong opposition and knowing it will be necessary to cajole or coerce 67 U.S. Senators into approving the draft treaty when they've reconvened on or after Sept. 7, President Carter is said to have done a strange but expected thing: he communicated in varying ways, directly or indirectly, with all U.S. Senators. He asked them, in effect, not to be swayed by the voice of their constituents, and to reserve judgment on the proposed treaty until he could talk with them personally and convince them of the desirability of relinquishing the title (that had been given "in perpetuity" to the United States) to the Panama Canal and the Zone through which it runs, connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans.

Since this proposed treaty must be approved by two-thirds of the U.S. Senate, and since the Senate is in recess until Sept. 7, there is time for constituents to override the pressures of President and controlled press, and convince their Senators that voting to give away the Panama Canal would be a perfidious act in opposition to the will of the people and tantamount to treason in the eyes of patriots.

For this reason, we are devoting this Report to the findings of Senator William L. Scott (R., Va.) who went to Panama to see for himself and report back to his colleagues. The remainder of this Report is taken from material submitted to the U.S. Senate by Senator Scott, and which appears in the Congressional Record for August 4, 1977, pages S13630-39.

...Based upon the facts as I have been able to ascertain them, from the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, from discussions with officials and private persons, both American and foreign, the contemplated transfer (of the Panama Zone and Canal) appears to be against the best interests of the United States from an economic, political and a national defense point of view. The Supreme Court has held that we own title to the Canal Zone and the fifth circuit court of appeals has held that it is the unincorporated territory of the United States. Therefore, unless the Congress, or the American people can prevail upon the White House or the Department of State not to enter into a treaty to give away our property, the only recourse is for the Senate to refuse to ratify the treaty and for the Congress to refuse to appropriate funds specified in the treaty.

...I left Dulles airport near midnight on June 29th and arrived in Panama early the following morning... During the 10-day trip we obtained the views of more than 100 individuals, some American citizens and some foreign nationals. Our Ambassador to Panama and a former Foreign Minister of Panama favored the proposed treaty. Others had a different point of view. The general consensus of these views was that the United States had constructed the canal and had utilized it in the best interests of all countries of the world without profit, and with toll charges only to cover the cost of operation... Fear was expressed that the Panamanians would not have the necessary skills, or expertise to operate the canal... We were also told that there were Communists with important positions within the Panamanian Government and regardless of the terms of a treaty, the canal might be nationalized by the Panamanians and might come under the control of Communists dominated by Cuba and Russia....

Americans working and living in the Canal Zone were especially bitter about the prospects of transferring control to Panama.

They indicated that all of our military ships but 13 could go through the canal; that war material of all kinds could transit it, including men and equipment; that over 90% of all ships afloat throughout the world could go through the canal; and that the fares paid by ships of any Nation flying any flag were the same with no discrimination, and in time of peace all Nations of the world are permitted to utilize the canal.

Americans living in the Canal Zone stated that the Panamanian Government was inefficient and ineffective; that it was socialistic in nature, headed by a dictator, with little freedom of the press, speech or other civil liberties.

Following are excerpts from a position paper presented by U.S. Civic Counsels to the House Subcommittee on the Panama Canal, April 12, 1977.

The Panama Canal was created by United States taxpayers' dollars, American ingenuity, engineering and medical expertise, and dedicated labor, transforming a sparsely populated, fever-infested jungle into the eighth wonder of the world. In fact, the Republic of Panama owes its very existence to the United States and the Panama Canal. ... Likewise, Panama owes its former prosperity to the United States and the Canal Zone, not just from the annual railroad annuity, but also from wages paid to Panamanian employees in the Canal Zone, from purchases made by U.S. citizens and agencies of the Canal Zone, and from the millions of dollars in foreign aid given so lavishly out of U.S. taxpayers' money. The U.S. citizen work force in the Canal Zone is comprised of highly-skilled, dedicated, technical employees, who have left their homeland, not for service in a foreign country, but in the service of the United States government under the flag of the United States.... These people believe strongly that the Panama Canal cannot operate effectively or efficiently without a Canal Zone which is under the jurisdiction of the United States—with U.S. laws, courts, postal system, police and fire protection, and schools with U.S. curriculum and U.S. citizen teachers. We believe that the U.S. government owes a strong legal and moral responsibility to these loyal employees to protect their job security, their lives, their property, and their families, while at the same time protecting the tremendous investment of taxpayers' money in the Canal.

... We live next door to the Republic of Panama all year long! We use our eyes and ears to observe what is going on there and we are not naive enough to believe that the Guardia Nacional, that mistreats fellow Panamanians with arbitrary beatings, imprisonment, expatriation and murder, is going to give special treatment to those "hated colonialist gringos" who have finally come under their jurisdiction.... The actions of the Panamanian government during the past year-and-a-half have done nothing to sell the U.S. employee in the Canal Zone on the idea of living under Panamanian jurisdiction....

The State Department is negotiating a treaty which IT is willing to ratify. They make the assumption that they know what is "in the best interests of the United States," and that all other opinions are to be considered ill-informed, unenlightened and out of step with modern times.... We urge you (members of the U.S. Congress) to visit here for more than three days, to observe the situation with your own eyes and not to depend solely on briefings by U.S. or Panamanian government officials. The new treaty with Panama will have long-range repercussions that coming generations will have to live with; we urge you not to ratify a new treaty solely because the State Department says that a treaty is the cure-all to problems with Panama. The Russia-Cuba axis and the American electorate are waiting to see which way the treaty goes. A hasty decision on the part of our Congressmen without giving deep and thoughtful study to the question would please the former and infuriate the latter.

Statement by Admiral Thomas H. Moorer, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1970 to 1974, to the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers.

Mr. Chairman and Distinguished Members of the Subcommittee on the Separation of Powers, I am honored to be here as a witness. I hope my testimony will prove helpful in these hearings regarding the U.S. Canal Zone and the Panama Canal.

My military experience during the last twelve years of active duty, from 1962 to 1974, offered me some extraordinary and unique opportunities to assess the importance of the Panama Canal to the United States, as well as its value to our Allies and friends and, indeed, to all maritime nations.

My evaluation of this waterway as an invaluable possession of the United States was intensified in 1962. At that time I was Commander Seventh Fleet operating in the Western Pacific. Frequently my fleet's capabilities depended on the prompt arrival of supplies from the Atlantic seaboard, supplies loaded aboard ships which were utilizing the Panama Canal.

From the Seventh Fleet I went to Commander-in-Chief Pacific; from there to Commander-in-Chief Atlantic; and NATO's Supreme Allied Commander, Atlantic; from there to Chief of Naval Operations and from there to Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Each of these commands provided unique opportunities, and sometimes urgent reasons, to evaluate the Panama Canal. I saw this strategic waterway from many vantage points and under stressful circumstances.

As Commander-in-Chief, Pacific, I recall in some detail the Tonkin Gulf era of 1964. During that period I saw the Panama Canal as a conduit for rapid reinforcement from the Atlantic Fleet should the naval forces of the Soviet Union or Mainland China become involved in the Vietnamese War. The U.S. high command was never sure during those early phases of the war of the intentions of either the Soviet Union or Mainland China. We knew they had the naval and air capabilities to make trouble and therefore we had to draw up contingency plans for such eventualities. In order to equalize the wartime exposure and hardship throughout the entire Navy, large numbers of Atlantic Fleet units were continuously rotated through the Canal to the combat theatre in the Pacific. In addition, as the Pacific Fleet Commander, I looked to the Atlantic side for rapid logistics support. The U.S. Army, the U.S. Air Force, the U.S. Marine Corps and the U.S. Navy all required a continuous and heavy flow of logistic support; such necessities as fuel, ammunition, spare parts and food. Our allies fighting with us in Vietnam also required considerable support from the United States. If the Panama Canal had not been open and available, the war in Vietnam would have been much more difficult and costly to conduct. This conclusion is also true for the war in Korea.

To give you some idea of the magnitude of Panama Canal usage and its relationship to the war effort, in 1963 there was a total of 300 U.S. government transits through the Panama Canal. As the war escalated, the number of government ships transiting by 1966 had almost doubled. The records show for that year—1966—a total of 591 government ships transited the Canal. Most of these ships were carrying critically needed logistics support to the forces operating under my command.

As Commander-in-Chief, Atlantic, and NATO Supreme Allied Commander, I saw the situation at Panama in another perspective. That was for the period 1965 to 1967. The war in Vietnam was still expanding, but now I was looking at the Canal not only as a means of sending support to the Commander-in-Chief, Pacific, but also from the Atlantic perspective. I saw the possible need to reverse the flow of ships through the Canal, particularly if the situation deteriorated in the Middle East or in the Caribbean during those volatile months of tension and conflict in both these areas. Both in our U.S. planning and in our NATO planning we envisioned contingencies calling for reinforcements from the Pacific Ocean areas. We envisioned the need for combatant tonnage, Army and Marine Divisions, and particularly we saw the need for amphibious lift.

As Chief of Naval Operations I had to look at the Panama Canal as an essential means of equalizing the strength and providing the balance between the Atlantic and Pacific fleets. The Canal made it possible to preposition certain types and tonnage, but always with the knowledge that the balance could be shifted to meet unforeseen situations. The Panama Canal gives the naval planner much flexibility and versatility that he would be deprived of without it.

As Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I became even more sensitive to the strategic value of this U.S. Canal as a means of protecting the security of the United States. My job as Chairman involved all of the Armed Forces of the United States—their collective requirements—and I was primarily responsible to the President for their ability to carry out their roles and missions as assigned by the Congress. Any Commander acting in that capacity will immediately perceive that it is vital to United States interests to retain complete ownership and control of the Panama Canal.

It was at this juncture of my command responsibility that I became concerned about the proposals to surrender the Panama Canal to a leftist oriented government allied with Cuba. There existed the potential danger for giving this U.S. advantage to a man who might allow or might be persuaded that it was to his best interest to permit Soviet power and influence to prevail by proxy over the Canal, in much the same manner as happened in Cuba. I was convinced as Chairman of the JCS—and I remain convinced today—that if the Soviet Union ever gained proxy sovereignty over the U.S. Canal Zone and Canal through Cuba, U.S. security as well as U.S. prosperity would be placed in serious jeopardy... because interocean mobility would be threatened. The mobility of allied commercial shipping and naval forces would face the same threat. The economic lifelines of the entire Western Hemisphere would be needlessly jeopardized, and the point is: there is no point in surrendering this vital interest. I have yet to see any solid justification advanced as to why the United States should willingly sacrifice the strategic advantages afforded it by our possession of the Panama Canal. Also, by relinquishing control of the Canal Zone and the Canal, we would force all those nations who depend on our power and leadership to accommodate to the adverse implications of such action on our part. The Canal Zone could become the satellite base of an adversary, and the advocates of "giveaway" do not appear to take this factor into account.

For the foregoing reasons and others not listed, I co-signed with three former Chiefs of Naval Operations a letter to President Carter. The key message in that letter was this: "Under the control of a potential adversary the Panama Canal would become an immediate crucial problem and prove a serious weakness in the overall U.S. defense with enormous potential consequences for evil."

The military and commercial considerations are obvious.

Although the large aircraft carriers and large supertankers cannot use the Canal, 97 per cent of the world's commercial and naval fleets can use the Canal as it is. The Canal does need some modernization. About two-thirds of all the current Canal traffic is bound to or from U.S. ports. When ships round the Horn instead of going through the Canal, they must travel about 8,000 extra miles of wear and tear, need 8,000 extra miles of fuel. On an average it takes 31 extra days to round the Horn.

If we were denied use of the Canal, we would have to build a much larger Navy; much larger storage and harbor facilities on both the East and West Coasts of the United States, and provide more merchant ships as well as escorts.

Surrender of U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone would inevitably lead to the transformation of the entire friendly character of the Caribbean and the Gulf of Mexico. Everything would depend on the attitude of those who held sovereignty and ownership.

In military affairs there is no substitute for ownership of the territory and the ability to control or to deny the waters and the air space.

After having lived through three decades of conflict I don't believe it takes much imagination to envision some of the pitfalls we might face in turning the U.S. Canal Zone and Canal over to any government that might see fit to use it against us.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to include in the record the letter signed by four Chiefs of Naval Operations, including myself, and the forwarding endorsement signed by four distinguished members of the United States Senate as part of my statement.

Regarding the question of sovereignty, ownership and control of the U.S. Canal Zone and the Canal, I am not a lawyer, but I am satisfied with the Supreme Court's decision of 1907 in the famous Wilson vs. Shaw case, that the United States does have legal sovereignty and ownership for the purposes enumerated in the Treaty of 1903. This ruling was reaffirmed as recently as 1972. Also, our Constitution states in Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2, that only Congress has the authority to dispose of U.S. territory and other property of the United States.

The language in the Supreme Court's decision of 1907 is quite precise. It is not ambiguous. So is the language in our Constitution. Since the Supreme Court's decision of 1907 still stands—it has never been overruled—and since the Constitution, in my opinion, is still the best governing document in existence, I can only conclude that we would be well advised to abide by these documents in our negotiations with other countries.

(End of statement by Admiral Moorer)

The Senate Subcommittee on the Separation of Powers of the Senate Judiciary Committee held extensive hearings on the question of "the authority of the executive branch of Government to negotiate for a transfer of title" of the Panama Canal Zone, since the Constitution specifically states: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all necessary rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States..." So, there is no new treaty with Panama, unless and until the U.S. Senate approves. It is our duty to prevent that approval!

THE PRESENT DANGER OF THE DOUBLE-DEALERS

DOVES IN HAWKS' FEATHERS

Mid-August 1977 was a time of crises and impending crises, both foreign and domestic. Here in the United States there was the long delayed Democratic Watergate, the Korean Bribery Scandal, which would stretch wider than ever that credibility gap which always seems to separate the people from the truth about their government's activities. There was the case of the manipulated millions by Jimmy Carter's banker and friend Bert Lance who, as Director of the powerful Office of Management and Budget, should be as the wives of Caesars were supposed to be but seldom were—above suspicion. There was the alleged Energy Crisis that grew phonier and phonier with each passing piece of legislation it engendered. There was the high-pressure campaign to sell the idea that giving away the Panama Canal to a Communist-dominated government—and paying that government to take it—was the patriotic thing to do, and in the best interests of the United States and the Western Hemispheres. There were the continuing crises of inflation, unemployment, the rising cost of living, the crime wave, the welfare mess. And still more that could be named.

Yes, truly, this was a time of crises and impending crises on the domestic scene. And internationally, where Uncle Sam had a finger in every pie, the situation was no better, perhaps worse and more dangerous.

Defying the United States, the Arab Nations and the United Nations, the Israeli government had ordered the construction of three more "permanent" settlements on the disputed, occupied West Bank of the Jordan River, an invitation to war. Race riots were adding to the miseries of Great Britain. An "escaped war criminal" was causing a war of words between Italy and West Germany. The United States dollar was sinking ever lower in value in international dealings. There were rumors that Russia was entering the monetary melee by introducing a gold-backed ruble which would be at least theoretically "as good as gold" and cause further weakening of the dollar and of America's power to buy and sell competitively. There were further rumors that the Arabian oil producing and exporting countries were getting together with the countries of the European Common Market to create a new gold-backed medium of international exchange, which would seriously jeopardize the ability of the United States to buy, and pay for, oil from the Middle East.

And strange things were said to be going on vis-a-vis the United States and the Soviet Union; both commercially and politically. It seems that East-West trade is in trouble; and this means that Rockefeller's Chase Bank and the Rockefeller industrial and commercial activities in the East are in trouble. The London Economist is usually accurate in matters such as this, and under the heading "Business Briefs" in the August 6th issue, we read:

"East-west trade is in trouble. Comecon (Russia plus its satellites), which accounts for over 70% of all east-west trade, has a large trade deficit. Comecon members want to export more but cannot because western economies are growing too slowly and western companies dislike barter. Comecon countries are already heavily in debt. They owe an estimated $50 billion...."

Since the Comecon countries cannot (or will not, or are not permitted to) pay their legal debts to the western banks, both the government operated and the Federal Reserve member banks, the monopoly capitalists have devised a formula which protects their investments and at the same time benefits the Red countries, but is harmful to western workers and free enterprisers. In a recently published paper by Janez Stanovnik, executive secretary of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, the author pointed out how the monopoly capitalists might, figuratively, have their cake and eat it, too. It's called "industrial cooperation" and it means (this is a direct quote, we'll translate later):

"the economic relationships and activities arising (a) from contracts extending over a number of years between partners belonging to different economic systems which go beyond the straightforward sale or purchase of goods and services to include a set of complementary or matching operations (in production, in the development and transfer of technology, etc.); and (b) from contracts between such partners which have been identified as industrial co-operation contracts by governments in bilateral or multi-lateral agreements."

So much for the multinational jargonese. In practice, this means:

- 1) The licensing of communist countries to use western technology, then pay off in finished goods instead of money. The finished goods would then be sold in competition with western produced goods.
- 2) Complete plants and/or production lines would be supplied the communist country,

THE SOVIET INITIATIVE IN PANAMA

Following is from The Congressional Record, August 4, 1977, page H8704.

Mr. Rudd (R-Ariz.). Mr. Speaker, I am most surprised and dismayed that neither the administration nor our vigilant news media have benefitted the American people with the ominous news that Soviet negotiators have been in Panama to make highly important and significant economic and commercial agreements with the dictator Torrijos government. I have learned from news dispatches in two Spanish-language Panama newspapers—Matutino and Critica—which are both mouthpieces for the Torrijos government, that a special Soviet commercial delegation headed by Nikolas Zinoviev met in Panama for several weeks last month with Panama Government officials led by Dr. Ernesto Perez Balladares, director of the Panamanian Commission on Legislation. These meetings and the tentative agreements reached between the Soviet and Panamanian sides were confirmed for me this afternoon by a U.S. State Department official who was fully aware of all aspects of the Soviet-Panama agreement.

Mr. Speaker, as we all know, the Soviet Union and Panama do not have diplomatic relations, and yet at this very time when our own American negotiators are preparing a new Panama Canal treaty to give away the Panama Canal to the Torrijos regime, the Soviet Union is initiating an economic and commercial agreement with Panama that is highly favorable to Panama and in the short run not so favorable to the Soviet Union.

The four main points informally agreed upon by the Soviet and Panama representatives on July 19 are as follows: First, approval of the possibility that the Soviet Union will purchase 50,000 metric tons of crude sugar from Panama....Second, the Soviet and Panamanian negotiators have agreed to the possibility of establishing a major factory and they would pay for same in finished goods. This same payment in finished goods would also apply to:

- 3) co-production and specialization;
- 4) subcontracting;
- 5) joint ventures;
- 6) joint construction and similar projects.

This "industrial cooperation" is especially appealing to the multinationals because the communist countries (especially the Soviet Union) are relatively untapped sources of raw materials, their costs are lower than in the western countries, there are no strikes, and wages are minimal. The communists in return get advanced western technology and knowhow, foreign capital and easier access to western markets. Furthermore, since labor is forced and domestic prices are fixed, there is no unemployment problem, and no runaway inflation to contend with.

Need we explain what such "industrial cooperation" does to the American worker, the in Panama to repair heavy equipment relating to the sugar industry. Third, the Soviet-Panama informal agreement calls for the possibility of a Soviet-built hydroelectric plant to help Panama's plan for national electrification. I understand from the news dispatches that this might also become an oil storage plant, with a Soviet investment of somewhere around $40 million. Fourth, the Soviets would be allowed to take advantage of the free zone at Colon for Soviet merchandise, and to make several installations at France Field—an old Air Force base that the Panama Government is currently leasing from the Canal Zone with the idea of expanding the free zone.

Additional agreements are being worked out for the Soviets to open a major bank in Panama to conduct their economic and commercial affairs in that country....

I believe that we should all take pause to consider the ominous meaning and significance of what is taking place....Can there be any question that when the United States leaves a void in Panama, as the result of the unfortunate treaty that is now being negotiated over the Panama Canal, that the imperialistic Soviet government will fill that void....Let us know that the Soviets are losing no time to entrench themselves in Panama the moment that the U.S. presence and influence is removed from that country. And let us consider the awesome danger that such a Soviet presence in Panama, so close to Cuba, and to our own borders, poses to the American people and to our neighbors throughout Latin America....

American standard of living, and the free enterprise system, it helps monopoly capitalists and socialist governments, but it makes slaves of the people!

So much for the economic picture as it concerns cooperation between the Trilateral countries and the Comecon countries. There are political developments which alter the picture and might make a mockery of the neat little scheme called "industrial cooperation." During the past months there has developed a phenomenon that is called Eurocommunism. Stated simply, the Communist Parties of the countries outside Comecon have decided that their problems and their programs are different from those of the Communist Party which governs the Soviet Union or the Satellite Countries.

In Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, etc., the Communist Parties have told Moscow that they will no longer take orders from the International Communist Headquarters in matters that are peculiar to the country in which they operate. These parties, in other words, are adopting a form of national communism, as opposed to the international communism which prevailed when the Moscow-based Comintern issued all orders to all Communist Parties in all countries—except in Yugoslavia and Albania where National Communism prevailed, and later in Communist China.

This political development has caused considerable consternation, both for NATO and the Warsaw Pact Nations, but especially for the latter and for the Soviet Politbureau. One result: the Prime Minister of Italy flew to Washington, D.C. to assure the Carter administration that the presence of communist members of his government did not mean that the communists had taken over; they were merely cooperating. Another current result of the Eurocommunism development: Brezhnev, now President as well as Premier, has been entertaining Tito at the Kremlin, for the obvious purpose of trying to get Yugoslavia as a partner rather than a competitor in the Red Constellation.

Also, and this seems important, Brezhnev has stopped barking at, and started cooing to, Carter and the Trilateralist hierarchy!

Thus the strategy is altered and new tactics are adopted in this created Conspiracy that pits Communism against Capitalism for the purpose of gaining control over the world. Now Communism is mellowing, appears splintered into many segments and therefore weakened and supposedly different—not as dangerous. Even Chinese Communism seems to be softening as Secretary of State Cyrus Vance goes to Peking to engage in exploratory talks (the Chinese Reds can afford to appear amenable if this causes U.S. withdrawal of support for the Republic of China on Taiwan).

But notice the shift in strategy: As International Communism appears to soften and weaken, the Capitalist Giant (U.S.A.) becomes more belligerent and tougher—or at least appears to do so. President Carter launches a Human Rights Crusade as a follow-up to the Helsinki talks and as a lead-in to the upcoming arms limitation conference in Belgrade. Carter appears to be on the offensive and Brezhnev appears to be on the defensive (the word appears is used advisedly).

But the strangest tactic of them all: here in the United States a flock of former doves who used to say "better red than dead" now are acting and talking like hawks, and are screaming that "The principal threat to our nation, to world peace, and to the cause of human freedom is the Soviet drive for dominance based upon an unparalleled military buildup."

There is some truth in the statement, of course, and such a statement would not be surprising if it came from, say, the John Birch Society, the American Conservative Union, or from any one of the patriotic and right wing groups that are and have always been anti-Communist in principle. But to know that this statement is made by a group of liberals and former communist appeasers; this—to borrow a phrase—is something else!

The group to which we refer calls itself the Committee on The Present Danger. In an official policy statement, the Committee declared that "Our country is in a period of danger, and the danger is increasing." That danger is the Communist military buildup. "Soviet expansionism threatens to destroy the world balance of forces on which the survival of freedom depends" says this committee. But it says not a word about our destroying the world balance of forces by giving the Panama Canal to the Communist-dominated government of Panama.

Lest we forget, a brief summary of events in this Capitalist vs. Communist Confrontation seems appropriate.

we said in the headline to this Report that there is a Present Danger, and it is the Double-Dealers. The dictionary defines double-dealing as the profession of one thing and the practice of another. This also defines this Committee on The Present Danger. But, more importantly, it defines our federal government's policy toward International Communism from the time it started by calling itself Bolshevism until today. By profession, our central government is anti-Communist. We have even fought wars to prove this. Communist countries are said to be our adversaries, and we are often told that we are engaged in a life-and-death struggle against the atheistic and totalitarian way of life that is engendered by International Communism. Such is our central government's profession.

In practice, however, influential Americans in policy-making positions have financed the rise of Bolshevism, its conquest over Imperial Russia, its spread into Eastern Europe and Mainland Asia. Whenever the "Communist Experiment" seemed to be faltering and threatening to die because it could not support itself, we (meaning the central government and those who controlled it) rushed aid and experts, food and technology to the Soviet Union. At every step of the way Capitalists have paid the bills that kept Communism alive, and have financed the advancement of Communism on a world-wide scale!

This has been done, principally, by such organizations as the Council on Foreign Relations and its affiliates. The CFR was able to take over the U.S. State Department prior to America's entry into World War II. It later extended its control to all branches of the White House Executive Office and presently through the Trilateral Commission this same group controls the entire administrative branch of the federal government.

We mention this because here is the interlock: Of the 141 men and women who are listed as founding members of The Committee on The Present Danger, 47 are also members of the Council on Foreign Relations. Many others are Bilderbergers, Trilateralists, members of the Committee for Economic Development, etc.

Examples: There are three co-chairmen of the Committee on The Present Danger. They represent—perhaps by accident—the three most important sections of a Corporative Socialist State: Government, Corporation, and Organized Labor. To wit:

Henry Fowler. Former U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, presently a partner in the International banking firm of Goldman, Sachs & Co., member of CFR.

Lane Kirkland. Secretary-Treasurer of Big Labor's AFL-CIA, member of CFR.

David Packard. Chairman of the Board of Hewlett-Packard Co.; former Deputy Secretary of Defense, charter member of the Trilateral Commission.

Since the Committee on The Present Danger is a policy-making group, perhaps its most important officer is the Chairman of Policy Studies, who happens to be Paul Hilken Nitze. Nitze is now promoting big defense spending and preparations to overcome the "principal danger" which he says is the Soviet's "unparalleled military buildup." But when Nitze was Deputy Secretary of Defense under McNamara and Kennedy, he was an advocate of unilateral disarmament! We quote from "The Politics of Surrender" by M. Stanton Evans, published in 1966, pages 242-3:

"The nation's chief disarmament advocates include such prominent citizens as former presidential adviser McGeorge Bundy, his deputy Carl Kaysen... Walter Millis, Arthur Waskow, James Warburg... Vincent Rock, Dr. Jerome Wiesner, Prof. Seymour Melman, ... Roswell Gilpatric, Navy Secretary Paul Nitze and many others...."

Again from the same book, page 255:

"In 1960, Nitze journeyed to Asilomar, California, to speak to military and civilian personnel about the intricacies of American defense. In that speech, Nitze suggested America should not strive for nuclear superiority over the Soviet Union... Instead, he proposed the United States should aim for a 'secure second-strike capability.' Nitze expanded his theme as follows: 'The actions I propose are... That we multilateralize the command of our retaliatory systems by making SAC a NATO command... that we inform the United Nations that NATO will turn over ultimate power of decision... to the General Assembly of the United Nations'..."

In "Kissinger on the Couch" by Phyllis Schlafly and Chester Ward, page 758:... "Nitze originated the unilateral program, created its theoretical basis and rationalization through sophisticated manipulation of the 'it's safer to be weak than strong' concept."

This is the man who now writes the policy statements for CPD, and says exactly the opposite from what he preached in the '60s. When such turncoats as Nitze and the 140 other founding members of CPD suddenly stop cooing like doves and start squawking like hawks, we can know that Lincoln was right when he said the principal danger to the Nation would be from within.

THE WHITE HOUSE THAT IS DIVIDED AGAINST ITSELF

ROCKY'S TRILATERALISTS VERSUS CARTER'S CRONIES

"I have always claimed that Jimmy Carter's crowd were experts in shallow water, but when they got out into deep water, they were lost and did not know what to do," said Roy V. Harris, president of the Citizens Councils of America, a Southerner who knew Carter when Jimmy was just another peanut farmer.

"When Carter was Governor of Georgia," Harris continued, "he acquired a reputation for consolidating the different departments of State Government. All he did was move the desks, typewriters, and wastebaskets from one room to another and assemble them again, and put a new crowd on top to supervise them. They call that reorganization because they lumped maybe half a dozen departments under one head, but they still kept the same divisions, and nobody lost a job...."

"For the first time in his life, Carter is beginning to get into deep water. He and his crowd can no longer wade along in the shallow water, and when the waves begin to come in, you are going to see them topple. ... The high waves are rolling in and they are lost...."

Mr. Harris is referring to the Carter cronies, not to the Eastern Establishment Trilateralists who are on the President's staff. In this Mediocracy in which we live, the public at large has never been told, publicly, that Carter's administrative army is divided into two camps. There are those that David Rockefeller and his adviser Zbig Brzezinski called to become members of the Trilateral Commission and then chose to occupy high places in the federal government, Carter's name leading all the rest in this respect. Then there were those who were with Jimmy Carter when he became Governor of Georgia, and who campaigned actively and faithfully for Carter during the Democratic Primaries and the National Election.

The Establishment Elitists and the Georgia Crackers could never see eye-to-eye, and this has worked a schizophrenic hardship on the President, because he is both an Elitist and a Cracker, while at the same time claiming to be a Populist and professing to be a born-again Christian. In the political sense, he must obey the edicts of the Elitist Cabal, but he must also remain loyal to the crowd he brought up from Georgia.

The coming conflict was evident when, after the election and before the inauguration, Hamilton Jordan announced publicly:

"If, after the inauguration, you find a Cy Vance as Secretary of State and Zbigniew Brzezinski as head of National Security, then I would say we failed. And I'd quit. But that's not going to happen. You're going to see new faces, new ideas. The Government is going to be run by people you have never heard of."

Jordan was wrong on all counts, of course. And he didn't quit, he stayed with Carter to become the President's Political Coordinator, a title that can mean almost anything. The other Carter Cronies probably resented all those old faces and old ideas just as much as Jordan; but they didn't quit, either. Bert Lance, the Georgia banker, came to Washington without even receiving the customary FBI check prior to Senate approval. The same applies to Charles Duncan, the former Coca Cola executive from Atlanta who became Undersecretary of Defense. Charles Hughes Kirbo, "Special Employee" of the Government, is attorney for Coca Cola. Attorney General Griffin Bell was with Kirbo's law firm before becoming Attorney General. Joseph Califano was Coca Cola's Washington representative at the time of his appointment as H.E.W. Secretary. J. Paul Austin, director of Coca Cola, was one of Carter's principal campaign financiers; he didn't receive a government job—didn't want one. Instead, he was invited to become a Trilateralist—something he did want. (Note the special item on Coca Cola).

Also coming to Washington from Georgia with Jimmy Carter was Peter Bourne, the British drug expert and mind manipulator, and his wife Mary King; Robert Lipschutz, Atlanta lawyer and past president of B'nai B'rith; Stuart Eizenstat, Carter's special contact man with the "Jewish community;" Jody Powell, the President's Press Secretary; Mary Fitzpatrick, convicted murderess who was released from prison to become Amy Carter's nursemaid.

There are other Carter Cronies who went to Washington, but there are space limitations, and background highlights on the foregoing seem required. The following information is from various sources, all probably more reliable than the New York Times or the Washington Post:

Dr. Peter Bourne. English-born Psychiatrist, came to the United States in 1957, studied at Emory University, served for a time in Vietnam, in 1968 became involved in the "counter-culture activities" in San Francisco Bay area. Took part in the 1968 riots at the Chicago Democratic Convention; in 1973 was cited by the House Internal Security Committee as coordinator for Vietnam Veterans Against the War, a communist front organization.

Bourne moved to Georgia, in 1971 became director of the State's Drug Abuse Service and was said to be the only doctor in the State to receive a Methadone permit. The Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader quotes Dr. Bourne as stating: "The addictive property of Methadone is one of its major merits." Bourne became Governor Carter's mental health adviser and is credited with shaping Carter's stand on marijuana, changing him from a "hawk" to a "dove" on the Vietnam issue, manipulating his move for a blanket pardon for draft evaders. He is credited with having organized the case that led to the Supreme Court ruling for abortion in 1973, and helped draft the Democrat pro-abortion plank in 1976.

According to Spotlight, Bourne had long been interested in getting a president elected from the "behavioral point of view," and he recalls that "David Rockefeller agreed immediately (with Bourne) that Jimmy Carter was the ideal politician to be 'built.'" It has never been explained why the Senate Committee on Human Resources abruptly called off its hearing on Bourne's confirmation as head of Carter's Drug Abuse Office when strong opposition developed.

It has been reported, but of course without official confirmation, that it is Bourne who serves as Carter's "mind manipulator" and keeps the President "in line" on important issues.

Mary King is Peter Bourne's wife. In the '60s, she was the white girl friend of Stokely Carmichael, the black leader of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), served as an officer in same, was jailed with black violators in civil rights demonstrations. She was Carter's campaign adviser in civil rights, womens' lib, government child care, and still serves as an adviser on womens' rights, etc.

Hamilton Jordan is a chief aide to the President. The relationship is unusual in that the President claims that he is a "born again" Christian, while Jordan is an avowed atheist and often boasts of the fact.

In Playboy Magazine for November, 1976, there is an article by Robert Scheer titled "Jimmy, We Hardly Know Y'All." On page 98 the article reads:

"There are two roads at the edge of Plains (Georgia) that meet at nearly right angles. One goes toward an integrated farm called Koinonia and the other leads to Americus. Both places were sources of the main shock waves from civil rights that reached the Carter family. Americus has been much discussed in the press.... It was in Americus that Martin Luther King, Jr., was jailed and told to sweep the floors. (Americus also is the home town of Attorney General Griffin Bell—Ed.)

"But Koinonia was something else. It... was founded in 1942 by a progressive white couple named Clarence and Florence Jordan. It was a courageous attempt to show that an integrated communal farm run on Christian principles was a possibility in the Old South. It is seven miles from Plains."

Correction: Koinonia was a communal farm which collaborated with the Highlander Folk School of Monteagle, Tenn., a Communist training school where Martin Luther King, Jr. and his chief assistant Andrew Young (now U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations) sometimes lectured (there are pictures to prove this, by the way). Koinonia Farm and Highlander Folk School jointly operated an interracial "summer camp" in the 1950s.

The founder of Koinonia, Clarence Jordan, was the uncle of Carter's chief adviser, Hamilton Jordan.

Now back to that Playboy article for another quote, this time from page 186: "... on the Carter campaign, I met Hamilton Jordan and asked him if he were related to the Clarence Jordan I'd met years ago, Hamilton told me Clarence, who died in 1969, was his uncle and 'one of the two people in my life I have respected most,' the other being Carter."

Jody Powell is the second half of a team. In his book, "Jimmy Carter/Jimmy Carter," Gary Allen notes that Powell and Jordan were the two "whiz kids" that planned the Carter program, which began in 1972. Of Powell, Allen wrote: "Powell has been Carter's press secretary since Jimmy became governor. He knows his boss so well, according to U.S. News & World Report, that 'he can just about anticipate what the former Governor wants to say.' But Powell seems a curious choice, to say the least, to be Carter's alter ego with the media. Since very few reporters intentionally antagonize a future President, there has been an understandable reluctance to question Carter about the propriety of having, as press secretary, a chain-smoking, heavy-drinking PR man who was kicked out of the Air Force Academy for cheating. Powell, who is as disheveled as Carter is neat, is known for a lack of tact and a bristling devotion to his man."

Bert Lance, as Carter's Director of the Office of Management and Budget, is the most important single Carter Crony, and if the Establishment Elitists who form the other half of the Carter Administration wanted to go a'warring after the Crony Camp, then Bert Lance would be the most vulnerable target; and there is every indication that he has become just such a target. Perhaps he was set up to become such a target from the very beginning, since the rules were bent almost to the breaking point in order that he might be appointed to the crucial post at OMB. Here is an upstart banker who is not a member of the CFR. He has not made the proper obeisances to the Eastern Establishment Elitists who can make or break such men as Lance. He is merely an opportunist who got his first big break by marrying the boss's daughter, got aboard Jimmy Carter's bandwagon at the proper time—when the Carter Peanut Agribusiness needed $4 million to expand—but couldn't make it on his own as a politician.

Any man who would write seven overdrafts on his own bank account or accounts after becoming Director of OMB should never have been made OMB Director in the first place. But now that Lance has the position, with the consent of Congress, Carter must stand behind Lance to the bitter end; as John Foster Dulles stood behind Alger Hiss, as Truman stood behind Vaughan, Eisenhower behind Sherman Adams, and Nixon behind Spiro Agnew.

But there does appear to be a touch of old fashioned political conspiracy behind this Lancegate affair. Because, in the Elitist's camp there is a man even more vulnerable to attack than Lance. And he is not attacked by the media. In fact, he is praised for his part in arranging for the giveaway of the Panama Canal.

Known to the insiders but never published in the controlled Media are the facts concerning Sol Linowitz's heavy investments in Panama. Due to the deterioration of the Panamanian economy under the Torrijos dictatorship, Linowitz's only hope of covering his losses and realizing some profit on his investments, was to conclude a new treaty and pay Panama for taking the Canal off our national hands. So Sol Linowitz, member of the CFR, Trilateralist, favored Elitist, was selected as an ambassador to aid the aging and somewhat senile Ellsworth Bunker, in the writing of this new treaty. Talk about conflict of interests!

Senators Strom Thurmond and Jesse Helms dared to mention this on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, August 21. But there has been no other Media coverage of the facts. In a statement opposing the Canal giveaway Senator Thurmond said:

CARTER'S COCA COLA CONNECTION

The following information has been gleaned from various issues of Spotlight, Newsweek, Christian Crusade, Voice of Liberty, Herald of Freedom, other independent and patriotic sources, and Webster's Encyclopedic Dictionary:

The "coca" in Coca Cola refers to the coca shrub, indigenous to the Andes, whose dried leaves are the source of cocaine and other alkaloids. The coca leaves are imported, processed, the alkaloids allegedly removed, and the residue provides the "secret ingredient" that makes Coca Cola different from other cola drinks.

During World War II, Coca Cola president Robert W. Woodruff issued a directive: "We will see that every man in uniform gets a bottle of Coca Cola for five cents wherever he is." Thus gaining the cooperation of the U.S. Military Establishment, Coca Cola was able to ship complete bottling plants for installation in foreign markets near combat areas, ending the war with 155 bottling plants in the six former military theaters of operation. Coca Cola Co. now does $3 billion worth of business annually in 139 different countries. Only the U.S.S.R. refused to allow the installation of Coca Cola bottling plants. But this last outpost will be conquered soon; arrangements have been made for Coca Cola to be the official drink at the 1980 Olympics in Moscow.

Charles W. Duncan, former Coca Cola president, upon becoming Carter's Undersecretary of Defense, was not required to divest himself of his $13 million in Coca Cola stock, allegedly because "Coca Cola is not involved in military procurement contracts," so there would be no conflict of interest!

“President Carter, while campaigning, said, ‘I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone’ ...but now has appointed Sol Linowitz a negotiator. Linowitz is on record as favoring the giveaway of the Panama Canal... and is being sued for conflict of interest. He has been involved in loans to the debt-ridden Torrijos dictatorship.” (Emphasis as in the original statement.)

It was that suit that caused more trouble for Linowitz. Unlike Lance, Linowitz was appointed by Carter, but he had not yet been approved by the Senate. His was an interim position; he was serving while awaiting the necessary Senate confirmation. When the news of Linowitz’s loans to Panama leaked there was little hope of Senate confirmation. So Linowitz hustled through the sessions with Panamanian officials, hoping to get the treaty written before the Senate could take action against him.

But time was running out and as a result the new treaty was never written! All Bunker and Linowitz had was an agreement on general principles! The fine print of the treaty had not been written or agreed upon; but the unwritten agreement was presented as a completed treaty! This effectively stalled Senate action on Linowitz’s confirmation; the Senate then took a holiday, and when it reconvenes after Labor Day, the treaty will have been written out ready for approval—and interest will center on the treaty rather than Linowitz’s conflict of interest.

But, note the contrast: Linowitz and Lance are both culpable. However, Linowitz is a member of the Elitist Camp, while Lance is a Carter Crony. So, Linowitz is praised by the Media, while Lance is condemned. Note the treatment in Newsweek’s lead story in its August 29 issue, complete with cover picture and head, and five pages of inside pictures and print. First paragraph reads:

“They stood together onstage in the gingerbread Old Executive Office Building, the President smiling into the heat of his first serious moral challenge, the budget director waiting with lowered eyes for his boss’s benediction. What brought them forth was the mixed verdict of the U.S. Comptroller of the Currency on Bert Lance’s high-rolling past as a Georgia banker—a guarded and otherwise unflattering judgment that he had done nothing he could be indicted for. That was bottom line, as it turned out, was enough to inspire Lance to hang tough in office and Jimmy Carter, at some risk, to lay on his unreserved blessings. He pronounced his embattled old chum ‘a man of complete integrity,’ proclaimed his ‘complete confidence’ in him—and so mortgaged a piece of his own simon-pure reputation to Lance’s still uncertain future.”

In this careful, expertly written paragraph, there is an ominous warning, not just to Bert Lance’s future—political and otherwise—but also to the “simon-pure” reputation of President Jimmy Carter. Here we can see the Carter dilemma: On the one hand he must remain loyal to his cronies, to the men who stuck with him, programmed his campaigns, and carried him through from Governorship to Presidency. On the other hand, he is bought, paid for and owned—lock, stock and “simon-pure reputation”—by the men who called him and chose him, and programmed him on how to be a President. These two camps—he must try to be loyal, true and reverent to both—do not see eye-to-eye. And there is evidence that the Elitists are not too pleased with Carter’s outspoken attitude toward Israeli’s land-grabbing, and with his Human Rights Crusade which has been badly handled and pushed too far. It has hampered Elitist Cy Vance’s efforts toward amicable arms surrender to Soviet Russia, the giveaway of Taiwan to Mainland China, and the establishment of peace and security in the Middle East.

If the Elitists want to remind Jimmy Carter of his prior obligations toward the Trilateral Commission’s New World Order, then getting at Bert Lance would be an excellent way of reminding Jimmy that his first loyalty is to the men who made him what he is, and not to the men who put him where he is. This is the subtle difference between the Camp of the Elitists and the Camp of the Cronies: The Elitists programmed Carter, the Cronies programmed Carter’s campaign.

Speaking personally, we say a pox on both their Camps. However, the strategy of “divide and conquer” has been used very effectively by tyrants and dictators throughout the centuries. If this strategy could be used to their disadvantage and to the advantage of patriots who can discern the difference between loyalty to Country and loyalty to government, or political party, the time is ripe for action. And a good start can be made by gaining the defeat of Lance in the one Camp, and defeat of the proposed Panama Canal treaty in the other.

OUR VERY FOREIGN FOREIGN POLICY

ONE MAN, ONE VOTE HYPOCRISY

"You Americans conquered space, but you are abandoning your place on earth.... You no longer seem able to distinguish between friend and foe." So said Morocco's King Hassan after he had done for Xaire what the United States could not or would not do for Angola: Send in sufficient aid to repel an attempted takeover of that country by Cuban led Communist insurgents.

This is but one of many examples that might be cited to show how leaders of countries in Africa, Asia, Europe and South America are becoming bewildered at the "new foreign" policy that has been foisted upon the world by the Trilateralists. Leaders of the countries not represented in the Trilateral Commission could point to many strange new trends since President Jimmy Carter began directing our external relations. To name a few:

- * The obvious double standard that characterizes Carter's Human Rights Crusade.
- * His headstrong push for a new Panama Canal treaty when everyone who cannot be bought, blackmailed, coerced or intimidated seems to be against it; including the responsible governments of South and Central America that are not dominated by Marxist dictators.
- * His sending of Cyrus Vance on hopeless missions to the Soviet Union, the Mideast, and Red China, where nothing of benefit to the United States has been, or could be accomplished.
- * His sending of Andrew Young to Africa where things positively dangerous to the United States and to the free world could be, and are being accomplished.
- * His innocuous yet significant offer to the people of Ulster, promising them new industries and more jobs if they will do as he says: quit fighting, ecumenize their Catholic and Protestant differences, and initiate an era of peace and justice.

In an attempt to explain it all, U.S. News & World Report's "Tomorrow" newsgram of Sept. 5 begins (emphasis as in original):

"Carter is coming smack up against the hard facts of the Presidency. It turns out that desire alone won't always solve the kinds of troubles that sooner or later test the man in the Oval Office. At issue: the nature of the President himself, how he acts under fire. People are surprised by Carter's stubbornness — his fierce loyalty to Bert Lance in the face of mounting outcry, his headlong push for a new Panama Canal treaty, his pressure on South Africa, his dam cuts, his sending Secretary of State Vance to the Mideast and to China when little could be accomplished. Is he a man of rare determination, or is it just country cussedness? How Carter emerges from these tests of his ability will help determine the character of the rest of his Presidency."

A measure of justification for both the so-called Carter Doctrine and the Carter stubbornness can be supplied if we understand that the man from Plains is in the legendary horns of a dilemma. As we wrote in our last Report, he is the captain of two opposing forces: the Trilateralist Elites, and the Carter Cronies. The President has been balancing these two forces by assigning all domestic matters to the Carter Cronies, and all external affairs to the Trilateralists. It is not always possible to separate the two but Carter has done better with his self-imposed juggling act than might have been expected.

If we are to understand Carter's very foreign and Trilateralist-programmed Foreign Policy Doctrine, unblemished by any regard for Domestic Policy, then we could do no better than to refer back to a couple of speeches on the subject made by Jimmy Carter. One was delivered by Candidate Carter before the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations in March, 1976. The other was a commencement address delivered by President Carter at Notre Dame University on May 12, 1977. An excellent review of Candidate Carter's speech appeared in the Santa Ana (Calif.) Register on April 6, 1976, written by Lee Edwards. He summarized:

"I've already mentioned his fascination with the concept of 'a world order' in which U.S. rights would presumably be submerged for the greater good.... That is, he would ...put the U.N. and other international bodies first and the United States second.."

Carter did not criticize the concept of detente but the way it is presently being conducted. He strongly implied there is no alternative to detente when he declared: 'I reject the strident and bellicose voices of those who would have this country return to the days of the Cold War with the Soviet Union.'

"Carter, who promised that he and not his Secretary of State would conduct U.S. foreign policy, asserted that 'detente can be an instrument for long term peaceful change within the communist system, as well as the rest of the world.' A few more comments like that and, who knows, Moscow may join the Carter bandwagon." (unquote).

Speaking at Notre Dame a year later, President Carter added that we are now living in "a new world." From now on, he said, the United States must abandon its previous "inordinate fear of Communism" and pursue a more idealistic policy, one that is based on America's "fundamental values." Central to this idealism is a continual emphasis on human rights issues around the world. And, said the President: "We are confident that democracy's examples will be compelling."

Out of the foregoing we can see highlighted three principal terms: detente, human rights, and democracy. Put them all together and they are supposed to spell New World Order!

Oddly enough, detente and human rights have been partners from the very beginning. It will be recalled that, under Carter, there has been no real change in the concepts enunciated by the State Department. There has been a change in personnel, but not in principle. To illustrate: "The Meaning of Detente" and its relationship to human rights was spelled out very clearly in a Department of State Publication No. 8766, General Foreign Policy Series 280, page 4, June 1974. The following is a direct quote:

"Some argue that cooperation with a country whose domestic system is incompatible in many respects with American traditions and values can only be pursued at the expense of our ideals and moral principles. Others contend that we should take advantage of the Soviet interests in trade and technology to attach political conditions requiring basic changes in Soviet domestic policy.

"The Administration sympathizes with the natural tendency of Americans to want others to share the rights and freedoms we value so highly. But if the United States attempts to make increased freedom within the Soviet Union a rigid precondition for improved relations, we will risk obtaining neither—neither improved relations nor an increased regard in the Soviet Union for human rights. We will, of course, not abandon our ideals in pursuing improved relations with the Soviet Union. But we are convinced that our foreign policy must be aimed principally at influencing the foreign policies of other governments and not their domestic structures."

This, according to the State Department, is "The Meaning of Detente." Neither the Helsinki Agreement nor the Carter Inauguration changed that meaning insofar as the Soviet Union and other Communist-dominated countries are concerned.

But in regard to other, free countries of the world, Carter has changed this concept and attempts to change the domestic structures of governments, such as Rhodesia, the Republic of South Africa, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Uruguay, etc. But, save for a few words of condemnation of the Soviet Union's treatment of dissidents—mostly to appease the Zionist lobby—little or nothing is said about the violations of human rights in the U.S.S.R. Nor has Washington denounced the brutal deaths of perhaps two million people in Cambodia since the Communists took over in 1975. Nothing has been said about the half million people in the southern half of Vietnam who have been forcibly resettled in communes and "re-education camps."

Mainland China has been the scene of the worst of all violations of human rights, with an estimated fifty million murdered. Yet our government seeks to "normalize relations" with Red China, without a word being said about human rights. Cuba has more political prisoners than all the other Latin American countries combined. Yet our government is happy to resume diplomatic relations with that Communist dictatorship. Refugees from Panama tell of the atrocities committed by that Marxist government. Yet, flying in the face of all his preachments on human rights, Carter arranges a gala production for his act of signing a treaty giving an American Canal to the Marxist government of Panama—a gesture that will really rebound to the discredit of Carter if more than one-third of the Senators present fail to approve Carter's showmanship.

So goes detente and the Human Rights Crusade: Where Communist governments are concerned "our foreign policy must be aimed principally at influencing the foreign policies" of those governments. But, where anti-Communist governments are concerned "our foreign policy must be aimed principally at influencing their domestic structures." This is the double standard in human rights that has been adopted by the Carter Administration!

Just as foreign and un-American is Carter's promotion of democracy. In his hypocritical campaign against Rhodesia and South Africa which is being led by Carter's "perfect public servant" Andy Young, it has become obvious that Carter's definition of democracy is "one man, one vote." This doctrine is being preached by those who would destroy the only stable governments in all of Africa, and certainly the only countries on that continent where "human rights" has any meaning at all.

The hypocrisy of Carter's stand is easily demonstrated. He says the United States is the greatest democracy of them all. If this be true, then "one man, one vote" should really have meaning in this country. But Carter is contradicting his own words in regard to the Panama Canal treaty. For the vast majority of voters in the United States are against giving away the Canal; yet Carter is determined to give it away! Is this democracy in action, Mr. President?

Aside from the history-proved fact that it is impossible for the "one man, one vote" concept ever to produce a stable government, a peaceful society, and a prosperous country, there remains the more basic fact that nowhere in Africa is there a government that practices the "one man, one vote" principle. Why, then, should the only two governments in that part of the world that are stable, be forced to adopt this unworkable system?

One answer to that question involves geopolitics; the inter-relation of geography, economics and politics. Africa is rich in minerals and other natural resources, and in human resources (slave labor). But of even more immediate importance, Africa guards the delivery of black gold (oil) from the Middle East to the industrial nations of Europe, and to the United States. Seagoing tankers provide the only economical means for transporting this oil. Therefore, the control of the waterways is of extreme geopolitical importance. This control involves three key areas: entry to and from the Mediterranean, shipping around the southern tip of Africa which is controlled by the Republic of South Africa, and Africa's Horn where the Red Sea, the Gulf of Aden, and the Indian Ocean meet. Control of these three vital positions is a primary objective of the Soviet—for obvious reasons. Control of the American Canal in Panama is important to the Communists for the same geopolitical reasons.

The Soviet buildup of naval forces and of military bases from the Soviet-controlled

Black Sea, through Marmara, the Bosphorus, and along the Mediterranean shores of North Africa is well known. One whole U.S. Naval Fleet (the 6th) is kept in those waters constantly, to keep the sealanes open and for other reasons. Britain's control of the Gibraltar is an important safeguard, as were Spain and Portugal when their governments were firmly anti-Communist. Now they are softening and Communist control threatens.

Absolutely safe and well guarded was the route around the Cape of Good Hope, until South Africa's supposed friends started trying to destroy her—thus playing directly into the hands of the Communists!

The African Horn is the third target. Once controlled by Ethiopia to the west and the British-held Aden on the east, the route was secure and safe for the shipment of oil to all parts of the world. But then the British pulled out, a Communist-inspired revolution in Ethiopia eliminated Haile Selassie, "the Lion of Judah" who had defended his country against both Italian Fascism and Soviet Communist while he reigned. Then the anti-colonial movement wrecked the rest of the Horn's defenses. Chaos has resulted. After the new Ethiopian government kicked out the American advisers and joined the Marxist camp, neighboring Somalia decided that Ogaden Province belonged to her and not to Ethiopia. War began, with the Soviets supplying the Ethiopians with arms and other aid, and with—as of September 1—the United States government refusing to aid Somalia, after having previously promised aid to that State.

Just to complicate matters, another war is in progress; this one between Ethiopia and Eritrea. And the newly-created State of Djibouti now enters the picture. As matters now stand, the shoreline of the Horn of Africa is controlled by Eritrea, Djibouti, and Somalia. This means that Soviet-controlled Ethiopia is landlocked. This is a situation that the Soviets will not permit to continue. And it appears that the United States will do nothing to prevent the Soviets from having their way in the matter.

Now, on the Mideastern side of the waters that outline the Horn of Africa, Saudi Arabia and the other oil-producing Arabian countries are determined that the Red Sea shall remain an Arabian Sea, not a Red sea in the literal sense. Soviet control of this sealane would amount to Soviet control of the delivery of Arabian oil to Europe and the United States.

However, to prevent the Soviet takeover of this vital shipping lane, the Arabian States must have the backing of the United States.

This brings up yet another complication: the Zionist Lobby in Washington frowns on the giving of any aid to the Arabs, lest this hurt the Israelis as well as the Soviet. As one observer, attempting objectivity, said:

"Events under way in the volatile Horn of Africa are being followed with great interest and concern by governments throughout the world. Whether the Soviets will be able to realize their objectives in the region, or will be thwarted by the pro-Western Saudi Arabians, will determine the future control of the vital oil lanes to Western Europe and the United States. In the shifting patterns of the region's diplomatic geography, this is the central issue in the minds of strategists on both sides of the east African struggle for power."

Control of the world's vital sealanes is the current and "number one" objective of the Soviet government. For this reason the Soviet has floated the world's biggest navy; has constructed military and supply bases at crucial spots along those sealanes, and has made strategic trade and aid agreements with countries such as Panama in order to gain control of important sea passages such as the Canal bisecting Panama.

All of this would be of less importance and could easily be controlled and offset were it not for the fact that the American branch of the Trilateralist Commission and the United States Central Government are aiding and abetting the Soviets in this program!

How else can one explain the absolute determination of Jimmy Carter to give away the vital passage through Panama? Or the attitude taken by the chief U.S. agent in Africa, Andy Young, who says we should not be alarmed about Russians and Cubans in Africa; that the presence of Communist troops in Africa "may even bring stability;" and that even if any new Marxist States are created, they can be "won over" to friendship with the United States?

For that matter, how can we explain the fact that the man assigned to represent the United States in all dealings with African States, especially Rhodesia and South Africa, was connected with the Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tennessee—an admitted Communist training school?

The truly un-American spirit of our African policy can be seen in the attempts to justify the destruction of Rhodesia and South Africa in the name of "Human Rights!"

"How utterly unmindful the United States seems to be of contemporary Africa's agonies—witness Angola, Mozambique, Uganda and now the cruel fate of the people of Ethiopia, crushed under the weight of one of history's most sanguine Communist pogroms," wrote one observer of the African scene. "Are six million more people—the South Africans—also expendable for America's newly perceived interest (human rights) that is couched in terms of a vague political principle (one man, one vote) extant nowhere else in Africa? Not without reason, leading South Africans accuse the United States of applying double standards and of caving in to Third World pressure, making a complete mockery of its professed aim of human rights."

Recently the so-called free world expressed shock at the very thought that South Africa might be developing nuclear weapons for purposes of defense. People were brought to the realization that neither Rhodesia nor South Africa is going to meekly self-destruct in order to satisfy the United States, the Soviet Union, and the Third World. Said one South African patriot: "Let those states in Africa who give launching pads to the Communists and let those in the Western World who would be our friends know that South Africa will not commit national suicide. Those who wish to push South Africa to the brink must not be surprised if their extremist threat to the very existence of the South African society evokes the ultimate defence as made possible by its nuclear capacity."

Nevertheless, America's leaders push on, oblivious of future dangers, seemingly obsessed with the idea that the United States also must meekly commit national suicide, in order that the New World Order may rise from its ashes.

There are certain facts that should hearten all lovers of liberty. South Africa is not about to commit national suicide. Its leaders refuse to assist Britain's Owen and America's Young in the ritual murder of Rhodesia. That nation's leader, Ian Smith, has won a resounding, unanimous vote of confidence at the polls. Here at home there is every hope that the U.S. Senate will refuse to give away American territory to the Communists. And finally, the arduous task of defending both Bert Lance and Andy Young must be beginning to tell on Jimmy Carter.

Finally, when a young Rockefeller warns a Carter that he is out of step, there is hope. So, let us keep on keeping on.

WHEN THE POLITICAL HONEYMOON HAS ENDED A GREAT AWAKENING COULD OCCUR

CANAL STRATEGY MIGHT BACKFIRE

When Trilateralist spokesman Jimmy Carter rose from his seat of honor to embrace the Marxist dictator Omar Torrijos, the Multi-nationalist banker David Rockefeller smiled broadly and appeared well pleased. The President of the United States and the Maximum Leader of the Revolution of Panama had just completed the signing of treaties that would outline the terms whereby the United States would pay Panama the sum of $70-million plus annuities if she, Panama, would take over that strip of United States Territory known as the Panama Canal Zone. David Rockefeller's smile was occasioned by the fact that this was the only way in which his bank—the Chase Manhattan—could recover the loans that had been made to the State of Panama.

This ceremonial signing of treaties by the heads of state did not validate them, of course. It would be necessary for the people of Panama to approve by plebiscite, for the U.S. Senate to ratify, and for the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate to approve of the relinquishing of American territory to a foreign power (Art. IV, Sec. 3 of the U.S. Constitution). Approval by the people of Panama is a foregone conclusion; in a dictatorship few people would dare to vote against the wishes of their leader. The ratification by two-thirds of the Senate is a doubtful matter. But approval by two-thirds of the Senators present is required, and the Senate leadership has been known to await a propitious moment when only a handful of Senators are present, then to rush a treaty to the vote, thus passing it without the knowledge of opposing Senators—until too late to do anything about it. This would be extremely difficult in this particular case because Senators opposing this treaty are going to be very alert and have promised a filibuster if necessary. In view of the opposition by so many Senators, a vote on the treaty is not expected until next year, when the Carter Canal Strategy will have won over sufficient legislators to assure passage.

There remains the House, where a vast majority opposes giving away the Canal. In this connection, the L.T. Patterson Strategy Letter has uncovered some important information. It states that the TV networks are being used to wipe out Congressional opposition and that congressional careers are "on the line if they dare oppose our sub-rosa government on (the) Canal."

"By Thursday morning, August 18th," says the article, "both CBS and NBC had swung into action to wipe out the careers of Congressmen in opposition to the Panama Canal treaties!... It took them approximately 48 hours to dig up some slanderous material on one of the major opponents, chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Officers Committee John Murphy (D-N.Y.) The first stab at Murphy had to do with influence peddling with his constituents in the Marine industry. ... Murphy has had the 'arrogance' to insist on constitutional procedures calling for the ratification by Congress of treaties which relinquish control of U.S. property!... The solvency of the Rockefeller banks could hang in the balance as bank loans to Panama remain unpaid and will have little chance of repayment without the new Canal treaty ratification... Therefore, it might behoove John Murphy and others to travel with a privately contracted bodyguard for the duration of the hearings... remember we are dealing with vicious killers who have caused the deaths of women and children in Rhodesia." (unquote, emphasis as in original)

The Constitutional requirement to which Congressman Murphy referred is: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;" (Art. IV, Sec. 3, U.S. Constitution).

"The question is," asks LTP, "Will the administration attempt to violate the Constitution of the United States (and bypass the House) asking only for Senate ratification...? It is clearly their intention to bypass the House, in spite of constitutional requirements that both Houses of Congress must approve the relinquishing of U.S. property....If such a bold arrogant act is allowed to succeed, the openness with which the law is flaunted should serve as a red flag that civil liberties and basic freedoms may be extremely short lived!"

In all this personal crusading by Jimmy Carter, there is one obvious and outstanding conclusion that can be drawn: He has staked his entire political future as a world leader on the outcome of his battle to win approval of the Panama Canal treaties. If he fails in this, he might as well give up in all the other foreign policy ventures he has embarked upon. To coin a phrase: Panama is Carter's Waterloo. If he loses this battle (we'll do our best to see that he does) then he can put aside all his dreams of being "President of the World."

This seems to be the "between the lines" message of James Reston, The New York Times' "Voice of the Eastern Establishment." Reston points out that Carter is pinning all his hopes on Panama, and there is the ominous undertone that "he had better win" or else Rocky's Trilateralists will find another boy to send to do a man's job for them. Following is a part of Reston's column of Wednesday, September 7:

Washington, Sept. 6—There have been more heads of government in Washington this week—all of them from the Western Hemisphere—than at any time since the funeral of President Kennedy in 1963. They are here at the invitation of President Carter, who has a clear purpose in mind. He is trying to dramatize the fact that his Panama Canal treaties are not merely a concern of the United States and Panama but a fundamental issue for all the trading nations of the world. The President has the bright hope that this gathering will stand as a revival of the spirit of Franklin Roosevelt's Good Neighbor Policy and President Kennedy's Alliance for Progress....

But as he faces mounting foreign policy dilemmas in the Middle East, Africa, Asia and even in Europe, his longer-range objective is to make sure that he has a more secure political, economic and military base in the Americas, to steady him as he faces all these other troubles overseas.

Mr. Carter does not have such a secure base just now. Even Canada is threatened with the secession of Quebec, which would create alarming strategic problems for the defense of North America. And it is interesting that Prime Minister Trudeau is here for the signing of the Panama treaties. On our southern borders Mr. Carter is struggling with an invasion of illegal aliens. He has a jungle of racial, political and economic problems in the Caribbean islands, and specific differences with Cuba, Brazil and other military dictatorships in South America. All this has confronted President Carter with the problem of reconciling his campaign promises with his Presidential responsibilities. He committed himself (Louisville, Nov. 23, 1975) never to support "nations which stand for principles with which their people violently disagree, and which are completely antithetical to our principles."

But the Panama treaties, among other things, have brought him to see that sometimes he has to support and even to seek the support of nations that violate the yearnings of their own peoples and the principles of the United States. So he has been dealing here with Omar Torrijos of Panama...and with others whose enthusiasm for President Carter's human rights philosophy is somewhat limited. But Mr. Carter took them, one by one, for long private discussions in the White House, and argued that they had a common political dilemma....

Now he is trying to make contact with Cuba, while trying to get his Panama pact through the Senate. And his opponents are saying, having abandoned Vietnam, where will you stop? After Panama, why not Guantanamo, and then maybe Alaska and the Louisiana Purchase?...

Get the message? Carter did: He must give up any principles he has espoused, forget any promises he has made to those who voted for him, and by whatever means that may be necessary get those Panama treaties ratified. Establish a "secure base" in the Western Hemisphere. Then solve those foreign policy dilemmas in the Middle East, Africa, Asia and Europe.

But, first, Carter must prove himself by giving away the Canal in Panama. Then he can give away Taiwan, Free China. After that there is to be the turnover of Rhodesia, Namibia and finally South Africa to the blacks; because the Trilateralists find it easier and more profitable to deal with the blacks.

Everything else of importance on the foreign policy agenda has been stalled until the Panama Crisis has been resolved (which is a mixed blessing in disguise to Americans but not to the Trilateralists). SALT has not only lost its savor, it has been dissolved into the sea of time, and new talks on disarmament and nuclear control have been postponed. The Geneva Conference on the Middle East has been shelved until the participants can agree on rules of order and on who is qualified to attend. The nations of Western Europe—especially West Germany—have not yet recovered from the shocking news that the Carter Administration had conceded that, in the case of a Soviet attack against NATO, at least one-third of West Germany would be overrun by the Russians before an effective defense could be set up. This news was later qualified, but the damage to U.S. prestige in Western Europe was already done.

To round out a list of failures, South Korea has become a political scandal rivaling the Watergate affair, and a case of military treason comparable to our early days in Southeast Asia. Finally, the latest attempts to complete the conquest of Africa by the Trilateralists short of all-out war, have been declared ridiculous and unworkable by both defending patriots and attacking terrorists.

In this African Connection, Carter's course of action is complicated by his determination to defend his crony Andy Young. There is a grim matter of hypocrisy that ought to be revealed. Before becoming a politician and an alleged diplomat, Young called himself a Christian minister, assistant to the man who also called himself a Christian minister, Martin Luther King. And, although the claim has fallen into disuse since his election, Jimmy Carter the Candidate called himself a "born-again" Christian. But, for any Christian—or even any humanist who leads a worldwide "human rights crusade"—to promote our present African policy is hypocritical to the final degree. Our official African policy, proclaimed by Carter and actuated by Young, is totally destructive of the rights of all whites in Africa, and of all blacks who have even been touched by the blessings of Christian civilization.

W. Earl Douglas is a black columnist who dares to write the truth about his people. His column appears regularly in the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader. Recently he wrote an article for that paper, telling of the fate of the blacks in Africa after their "liberation" from the white men of Europe. Much of what he writes is so shocking that we have deleted portions of his article. Here is what Douglas wrote of the condition of blacks in Africa:

"Liberal politics has apparently little to do with truth, no matter which political party is involved. Of course the big thing at this point in time is not to offend the black voters, which Governor James B. Edwards (S.C.-R.) is alleged to have done on his recent visit to South Africa. That the governor spoke the truth when he intimated that the human rights issue was overdone, must mean that the liberals feel it is perfectly allright to tell black people a lie so long as it does not offend them. If it is the truth that offends anyone, then they need to be offended.

"Being an eminent authority on blackness, by virtue of my ethnic persuasion, I am compelled to accept the reasoning of the liberals, of both parties, as nothing less than an insult. Governor Edwards spoke the truth when he said that 'America does not show concern for the rights of blacks in authoritarian black regimes.' And there is an abundance of evidence to substantiate that fact. That so many people in this country are more interested in hearing what they like to hear, instead of the truth, is unfortunate. They may find the following a wee bit more than their programmed minds can handle.

"America does not concern itself with the interests of blacks in black regimes. In Zambia they have closed all schools, abolished all churches, and most of the Lundas in that country have been eliminated.

"In Mozambique all privately owned real property has been confiscated, families are gang-raped in full view of the husbands and fathers, then the male members are tortured and slaughtered.

"In Ghana they jail all political opposition. In Angola they dismember their political opponents with buzz saws. In Malawi they tie men and women together...afterwhich they are beaten to death or left to starve. In Zaire they still practice cannibalism, killing and eating their enemies. In Nigeria they committed 30,000 murders in one day, and then started a civil war that took the lives of over two million more. They shot all prisoners of war, nailed children up in huts, then burned down the huts....

"In Liberia if you happen to be black-black you don't vote, and slave trading was carried on by the ruling class as late as the 1930s, and may yet be going on....

"In the Central African Republic there is legalized mutilation for criminal offenses, where the first offense is one ear and the fourth offense is the neck. This is the country where they solve the problem of overcrowded prisons by beating all the prisoners to death; and torture their political enemies by making them crawl naked through ant hills.

"What is going on in most of the black African nations is what we in America call black on black crimes. Black Africa is where slave trading yet exists, and all of the slave trading black nations are members of the United Nations.

"The liberal media in America does not want black America to know the truth about 'human rights' in black Africa. They want you to think of Africa as being the place where nothing exists but the idyllic villages pictured in 'Roots,' where the people are all very 'human,' family oriented and never taken advantage of by their own, only by the white man.

"There is no doubt that such people do exist in Africa, but why are the liberals afraid to show us the other side of the coin? Why can't they tell the American people the truth, that the Trilateralists want the chrome in Rhodesia and South Africa and they can get it much easier from the blacks than they can from the whites?

"The sale of black slaves by blacks, the butchery of blacks by blacks, and the savagery, torture and genocide practiced against blacks by blacks has nothing at all to do with the President's human rights, simply because it cannot be used as propaganda to sell American blacks on liberalism. Thus it is perfectly all right, according to Carter's human rights, for a black African student to have his fingers cut off by blacks, simply because he can write. Or for a black to be killed by another black because he was caught wearing shoes. But somehow it becomes a horrible sin against human rights for a white African to refuse to sit down to dinner with a black African.

"This 'pick and choose' type of human rights says that all black Americans are fools, and they would have to be fools to buy such a 'con game.' Black Americans should ask what the Anti-Slavery Commission at the United Nations is doing about the selling of black slaves to Southwest Asian countries. Of course we are supposed to be so programmed by the liberal media that we wouldn't think of asking such a question.

"It is a sad commentary on America when we realize that the entire liberal political machine in this country depends on the selling of lies for its success. That the favorite target for those lies is American blacks, and that the main reason for those lies is to maintain the black vote for the liberals, can be considered nothing less than the ultimate insult to all black Americans." (End of an extended quotation from an article by W. Earl Douglas, black columnist for the Manchester Union Leader.)

The conditions that exist in "black black" Africa as described by columnist Douglas, are the conditions that the Carter-Young team and its supporters intend to bring to Rhodesia, Namibia, and South Africa; not to promote human rights, but to obtain access to the natural resources of Southern Africa. There is this hope: public opinion polls—even those that try to favor Carter and the Trilateralists—are beginning to show that the people are beginning to discover the "real Carter" and there is general agreement that as a "President of the World," Jimmy Carter is a failure, as were Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Delano Roosevelt before him. Let us pray that the discovery will not lead to another World War, as it did with his predecessors.

So much for Jimmy Carter and what he is expected to accomplish in the foreign policy field to prove himself worthy of the support of the Elitists who made him what he is supposed to be in their sight. There is also the other side of the coin, the business of being the President of just the United States and its territories and dependencies. And here we are faced with Carter's lack of the people's trust because of his trust in "Loophole Lance."

Just as we were concluding this Report, the President of the United States issued yet another statement, affirming his belief that Lance had done no wrong and that upcoming Senate hearings would confirm this belief. Carter may have changed his mind by the time this Report is being read, but the damage to Carter's integrity has been done. Marvin Stone wrote editorially in U.S. News & World Report: "The implications go well beyond the Lance affair. For if no one is in a position to challenge Carter on this issue, who is there to stand up to him and challenge him on the vital issues that lie ahead?" Such words signify an awakening. But have we slept too long?

NOW, A CANAL TO THE COMMUNISTS AND NEXT, THE ISLAND OF TAIWAN?

LEST RED CHINA GROW JEALOUS

When the exiled Solzhenitsyn came from persecution in Soviet Russia to comparative freedom in the United States, he warned all who would listen and heed: "Lenin told his followers, 'We will give a rope to the bourgeoisie and the bourgeoisie will hang itself'. Khrushchev came here and said, 'We will bury you'. Now they say, 'Detente'.

"The situation in the world is catastrophic. Beginning at Yalta, your statesmen of the West have signed one capitulation after another. The occupation of Mongolia, Moldavia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania was silently recognized. Nothing was done to protect Eastern Europe and eight other countries were surrendered. Stalin demanded that Soviet citizens who did not want to return home be handed over to him, and the western countries handed over 1,500,000 human beings.... The constant retreat, the surrender of one country after another, to such a point that there are Soviet satellites even in Africa; almost all of Asia is taken over by them."

Solzhenitsyn was correct as far as he went with his warning. We are surrendering country after country to the Communists; but it was not so obvious at the time he spoke, that we are also surrendering sea after sea and ocean after ocean to the Communists.

There are five strategic points that control the flow of goods between nations, and the movement of navies between seas and oceans. They are: Gibraltar which guards the passage of ships to and fro between the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, the Horn of Africa and the Suez Canal which control the flow of oil from the Middle East through the Indian Ocean, the Cape of Good Hope which guards important southern sea-lanes, Singapore which stands as a sentinel overlooking passage between the Pacific and the Indian Oceans, and the Panama Canal which connects the Atlantic and the Pacific at a most strategic spot between the two continents of the Western Hemisphere.

The Communists have no need to take these strategic points by force. All they need to do is—as Lenin predicted—wait until these places that control ocean traffic are given to them by the Western powers; the Panama Canal giveaway being an example of how easily this can be accomplished.

However, in our current generosity toward these our official adversaries, our central governments have gone beyond gifts of land and water, and even wheat and industrial plants and top-rung technology. Now the Soviets are being shown what weapons we are going to use and how we are going to defend ourselves in case we are attacked by the Soviet military.

At recent U.S. Army war games, Soviet officers were permitted to observe. Moreover, from Kassel, West Germany, comes this report: "With an official Soviet observer watching NATO maneuvers for the first time, about 50,000 American troops joined their allies Tuesday (Sept. 6) for the start of the annual Reforger war games. Major General Alexander Knyrkev, Soviet military attache in Bonn, is Moscow's first representative to take advantage of provisions in the 1975 Helsinki accords allowing nations to observe the major military maneuvers of other signers...."

Also significant is the following report concerning our NATO ally, Britain: "Naval officers from a Communist country are, for the first time, undergoing training with the Royal Navy in Britain. A Yugoslav Commander and a Lieutenant Commander are just completing six months on the Staff Course at the Royal Naval College, Greenwich."

BUT WHAT ABOUT THE MAOISTS?

A necessary digression: It should be observed that there is more than one kind of Communist. They all accept the doctrines of Marxism-Leninism. All Communist Parties in all countries abide by the principles of "Democratic Centralism;" which means that all decisions reached by the top committee must be obeyed absolutely by every member of the Party. He must believe what the Party teaches, love and hate as the party instructs, and do what the party directs. As one student of Communism puts it: "The decision of the highest committee is the source of truth, morality, and the action program."

And yet, while all Communist Parties profess to be faithful followers of Marx and Lenin, they can be divided into three groups:

- 1) Supporters of the Soviet Union.
- 2) Supporters of Communist China.
- 3) Independents who may criticize both the Soviets and the Maoists, as the Communists of Yugoslavia and Albania.

This communist "unity in diversity" is also apparent in the United States. Dr. Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communist

OPEN LETTER TO BREZHNEV

President Leonid Brezhnev
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Re: Alaska Via the Panama Canal

Tovarich:

If the United States makes an offer to return Alaska to Russia (at no charge), will you accept if we throw in one million dollars a week for twenty-two years?

Following prolonged discussions, the U.S. has persuaded your Panamanian puppet, Torrijos, to take our canal. He held out and got a million 'till the year 2000!

Alaska is yours for the taking:

- 1) Central to the Canal negotiations was the concept of "returning" the territory to Panama. Should this territorial treaty be Senate-ratified, legal/diplomatic precedent will establish full force and color of law to Soviet actionable demands for the "return" of Alaskan real estate to Russia;
- 2) The anti-colonial doctrine of the United Nations denying "non-adjacent territory" to member states is applicable to Panama but equally so to Alaska.
 - a) Amusingly, Senator Inouye of Hawaii is a treaty prime mover and guess what fate may befall Hawaii?
 - b) Does not Russia have the stronger claim to Alaska than does the U.S. under the doctrine of "non-adjacent territory"? Soviets can see and mukluk across the Bering Straits on a clear cold day to Alaskan-land once Russian;

League, a recognized authority on communism, lists seven different communist parties which operate in the United States and are large enough to publish their own newspapers, or magazines, or both. Each party is supposedly antagonistic toward all the others, yet all are Marxist-Leninist. The seven which Dr. Schwarz lists, with their respective publications:

- 1) The U.S. Communist Party, which publishes The Daily World, The People's World, and Political Affairs.
- 2) The Socialist Worker's Party, which publishes The Militant.

Please respond promptly, because Senate ratification of the canal treaty could then speed the re-marriage of Alaska to Russia with a million a week dowry from Uncle Sam for twenty-two years.

the same ultimate goal of a Communist One World? Dr. Schwarz gives this answer:

"Each party practices the science of Marxism-Leninism. This means it harnesses and uses Social Forces. A Social Force is an idea or emotion that is shared by a significant number of people and which can stimulate them to action. The communist leadership must discern a social force and design a program of action to utilize it. This leads to applying the formula: 'Find out what people want; promise it to them; go to work to get it for them so that you can come to power over them.'

"Significant groups of people desire different, and sometimes contradictory things. Some want the Equal Rights Amendment enacted, others want it defeated;...some believe that nuclear power provides a safe and clean energy source while others believe it threatens the continued existence of mankind. Different communist parties can adopt policies so that each group can be attracted and utilized for the common communist purpose of weakening and demoralizing the U.S. society as a prelude to communist conquest." (unquote)

TO RED CHINA, WITH LOVE

Now back to the original theme of this Report: Disregarding the Corporate Socialist takeover of the United States and much of the Western World via Regionalism, there are three principal communist forces which we may call Soviet, Maoist and Independent. In his gift-giving to these communist forces Uncle Sam has been favoring the Soviet and the Independent to the possible fear and chagrin of the Maoist forces. Not since the giveaway of Southeast Asia have we paid much attention to Red China. True, there was the so-called Shanghai Agreement, but it was at best merely a sop-gap (sic). But as for the Soviet: our government avoided interference with the conquest of Angola, we have turned our backs on Soviet military buildup in the Indian Ocean, ours has been a hands-off attitude toward the Soviet takeover of the Horn of Africa, we have aided and abetted the weakening of South Africa's ability to defend the Cape of Good Hope, we have polished this off with the treaty that would allow the Soviet to take over the Panama Canal—which we would be paying them to take via Puppet Torrijos. (By use of the pronoun "we", we mean our Central Government, of course).

Now that Mao has been laid to rest and properly mummified for visible adoration, the Red Chinese Dictatorship is growing restive. China is jealous of Russia and resents the way in which the U.S. has showered gifts upon the Soviet while disregarding Cathay. This became apparent when Red China, rather petulantly, announced that it would not renew its mutual friendship agreement with the Kremlin. It was also apparent in the contrast between the way Vance of the USA and Tito of Yugoslavia were treated when each visited Peking. Vance's treatment was cold, formal, and meaningless. Tito, on the other hand, was feted like no foreigner had ever been feted in Communist China. He was even accorded a preview of Mao's body.

Therefore it seems reasonable to assume that our Shadow Government would reach this conclusion: If that Balance of Power between the Communist Giants, which Henry Kissinger worked so hard to establish, is to be maintained, the next important gift-giving on the part of the United States must be directed toward Peking. And the gift is to be Taiwan, the free National Republic of China!

John M. Fisher, President of the American Security Council sensed this, and he wrote: "...We are writing urgently, now while there is still a little time left to stop the next giveaway of a friend to the grim grip of Communism. Who's next? It now seems clear that the Carter administration has decided to turn its back on our long time allies on Taiwan in order to embrace Red China.

"Even before Secretary of State Vance's trip to Red China he made this clear. In his speech on U.S. Asian Policy on June 29th he declared '...there is but one China... I shall be in Peking to talk with the leaders of China.' Vance did not mention the Republic of China at all. He merely said that we would leave to the Chinese themselves the 'peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question'."

"Washington insiders say this means that in Vance's rush to improve relations with Red China, he is ready to bow to the Communist demands that to 'normalize' relations we must abandon Taiwan by 1) cutting off diplomatic relations, 2) tearing up our Mutual Defense Treaty and 3) removing all U.S. military forces. If President Carter finally makes such a decision, following the earlier unilateral decision to withdraw U.S. troops from South Korea, it would signal to our few remaining Asian friends that the United States is in the process of abandoning them all to Communism.

"This would also totally destroy the remaining belief in U.S. dependability by all our allies in the world." (unquote)

GOLDWATER DISSENTS

It may have been the terms of that Mutual Defense Treaty with Taiwan which caused Vance to delay the act of gift-giving when he visited Peking recently. The world has come to expect Communist governments to treat treaties as mere promises made to be broken at some opportune time. This is what we should expect to be the fate of those new Panama Canal treaties if they are ratified. However, the U.S. government has not made a practice of violating treaties—except treaties with American Indian Tribes, which is an ugly blot on the pages of American history.

Senator Goldwater doesn't like the idea of permitting the Carter administration to double-cross the Republic of China, and he may have established the first line of defense against Vance's "One China" policy when he addressed the U.S. Senate on Sept. 8th on the subject of the Constitution and the abrogation of treaties.

"The subject I have in mind," said the Senator from Arizona, "is the termination of treaties, particularly the mutual defense treaty between the United States and the Republic of China, without the approval of either the Senate or Congress. Negotiators for the U.S. Government had no authority to accept or consider this policy because the Constitution clearly requires a role for the Senate or Congress in the termination of any treaty.... The initial step of recognizing Red China is bad enough in and of itself. I have often stated the numerous reasons why I believe the recognition would be harmful to the United States, with no compensating gain. To top off this already harmful proposal with the added disgrace of treating the defense agreement as having lapsed, without even giving the one year's advance notice required by its terms, would represent the most callous and immoral attitude toward a friend that the U.S. Government has ever been asked to adopt....

"Since the Constitution puts the power to abrogate, or terminate, a treaty in the hands of the President and the Senate together, or the Congress, the advocates of this shameful proposal are asking the President to commit an unconstitutional act....

"In conclusion, no President acting alone can abrogate, or give notice of the intention to abrogate, existing treaties with the government on Taiwan unless he obtains the advice and consent of the Senate, or the approval of Congress.... It must be clearly understood by all that the check of impeachment is one of the safeguards provided by the Founding Fathers against political offenses such as an irresponsible abuse by a President of a constitutional discretion. In fact, a study made by the Library of Congress in 1974 on the abrogation of treaties concludes by observing that in the situation where a conflict arises between the President and the Senate or Congress over the question of abrogation of a treaty, and the President acts contrary to the wishes of the Senate or Congress the President 'might be impeached.'

"Any President who would violate the Constitution on such a major matter as breaking faith with the Nation's treaty obligations runs the risk of impeachment.

"This is not a threat. It is a simple statement of fact which those who are unwisely urging this course of action upon the President should understand. They apparently do not know the consequences of what they are asking the President to do." (unquote)

In the preceding, Senator Goldwater leaves a leading question unanswered. Who are these unidentified people who are urging the President to abandon Taiwan to Red China? Who are these unnamed people who are so anxious to "balance" the Communist Giants by giving Red China an essential link in the control of the Pacific, and eventually in the control of Singapore, the strategic port which controls the flow of all goods to and from Indonesia, Malaysia and between the South China Sea and the Indian Ocean?

Who are these people the Senator refers to, who are giving countries to the Communists, and seas and oceans and strategic points such as Panama and the Horn of Africa on the one hand, and South Korea and Taiwan on the other? These are not the Communists. They merely "supply the rope."

Yes, Senator, there is a Shadow Government and we can name most of its members. But, can you and your elected colleagues control that Shadow Government, or must we use the rope?

SOL LINOWITZ -- A STUDY IN CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

HON. GEORGE HANSEN OF IDAHO
In the House of Representatives
Monday, September 12, 1977

Mr. Speaker, the administration's sellout of American security and rights in the proposed Panama Canal treaties are blatant attempts by the President to circumvent the Constitution of the United States and the will of the American people.... The very circumstances surrounding the treaty negotiations are scandalous and absurd. President Carter is attempting via secret agreements, bending of the law, and attempted coercion of the American public to implement the biggest international welfare ripoff in history.

The treaty talks began in earnest 6 months ago under scandalous conditions, with negotiator Sol Linowitz being given a special appointment allowing him to bypass the scrutiny of the U.S. Senate and avoid disclosure of any conflicts of interest, some of which I have since exposed in the courts to the embarrassment of all parties concerned. Linowitz was forced to resign as a member of the board of directors of the Midland Bank of New York which has an $8 million loan with the Republic of Panama and is on the Federal Reserve's trouble list as a result of my legal actions. However, the scandal continued right to the time of the treaty agreement which came only 4 hours and 40 minutes before Linowitz's appointment was terminated.

One must ask, why the panic, why the rush, and what was the price for quick agreements that Americans will have to pay? With Panama owing commercial international banking interests some $200 million and the Nation reeling under a $1.2 billion total debt with loans coming due, was Mr. Linowitz's job to get quick agreement to quickly shore up the revenue and asset picture of the Torrijos government? Furthermore, why did President Carter refuse to let the Senate scrutinize Linowitz's Ambassadorial appointment?

The background of Ambassador Linowitz is a tingling web of intrigue when it is combined with the recently concluded negotiations. His leftist and one-world philosophy and background have been well established through the years as is evidenced by his own biography. Sol M. Linowitz was born in Trenton, N.J. December 7, 1913.... He was admitted to the New York Bar in 1938... he was employed as assistant general counsel of the Office of Price Administration from 1942 to 1944 and then became a partner in the law firm of Sutherland, Linowitz, and Williams—1946 to 1958. He then became a partner in the firm of Harris, Beach, Keating, Wilcox, and Linowitz of Rochester, N.Y. from 1958 to 1966. He joined the Xerox Corp. as chairman of the board, chairman of the executive committee and general counsel from 1958 to 1966. In 1966 he became chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Xerox International. In the same year he was appointed Ambassador to the Organization of American States, a post he held until 1969 when he became a senior partner in the international law firm of Coudert Bros. in Washington, D.C.

Linowitz's background includes: a directorship of Time, Inc., Pan American World Airways, Inc., Marine Midland Banks, Inc., a trusteeship of the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York, and active membership in the Rockefeller organization called the National Commission on Critical Choices for Americans.... Linowitz has served as chairman of the national council of the leftist, radical, world-government-promoting Foreign Policy Association, and has been president of the New York State Division of the American Association for the United Nations. He has served as a director of the National Planning Association and a long-time member of the secretive world-government-promoting Council on Foreign Relations (as well as being a charter member of Rockefeller's Tri-lateral Commission—Ed.)

According to the official biography Linowitz submitted to the Senate... (he) is shown as a member of the board of trustees of the Center for Inter-American Relations. It is the opinion of informed sources that the Rockefellers exert the major influence in the Center for Inter-American Relations, as they do in the Council on Foreign Relations. In addition to Nelson, other Rockefeller members of the Center are David, John D. III, Margaret and Rodman. All but Margaret are also CFR members, as are a large number of

ROCKEFELLER LINKED TO PANAMA CANAL GRAB

From "The Spotlight,"
Sept. 26, 1977

Washington—One of America's best-known authorities has 'opened up' to The Spotlight in an exclusive interview under the condition that his name not be used. This man, whose experience in government spans almost 30 years and who has held some of the nation's top offices, is known not only throughout the U.S. but the entire world. He has had access to top-secret information and is on a first name basis with the country's most influential leaders.

He was recently interviewed about the Panama Canal. "This plan is purely and simply a money deal. It is nothing but a grab by the banks which have lent money to Panama. Panama is bankrupt and without the help of the U.S. taxpayers the banks will not be able to get their money back," he said.

"Panama owes $2.7 billion to the banks and to international finance organizations. About $1.5 billion is owed to Chase Manhattan and other banks. They want control of the revenue from the canal as well as outright cash from the taxpayers. The banks also want to establish Panama as a bankers' paradise. There are 10 banks involved in this and they plan to make Panama a haven for banks, with tight secrecy laws, little or no regulation or taxation.

The informant listed the banks as Bankers Trust, Bank of America, Chase Manhattan, First National City, First National of Chicago, Security Pacific, Security Pacific Interamerican Bank, S.A., Marine Midland, First National Bank of Boston, and Pimco International Bank.

The informant emphatically pointed out that the entire movement to give away the canal was banker-inspired, with David Rockefeller the primary leader. "David Rockefeller personally made the ground rules and Torrijos accepted them. After this, the State Department began giving Torrijos unlimited support to keep him in power."

other members of the Center. The Center is another socialistic world-government-promoting organization dominated by the CFR for the purpose of influencing American policy in Latin America. Among its objectives are: to get the United States to relinquish sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone, to restore diplomatic relations with Cuba, and to extend trade and credit to the Castro government.

Sol Linowitz was a registered foreign agent of the Communist government of Chile during the Salvador Allende regime... was registered as an active foreign agent for the Government of Colombia as well as other vested interests in Latin America...

President Lyndon B. Johnson, whom Linowitz supported continuously both on foreign and domestic issues, appointed him to the President's General Advisory Committee on Foreign Assistance Programs in 1965. On October 6, 1966 he was brought into the Democratic administration itself and given a policy-making rather than advisory role in twin posts: U.S. representative to the Organization of American States with the rank of Ambassador, and U.S. representative on Inter-American Committee for the Alliance for Progress.

Linowitz was chairman of a Ford and Rockefeller Brothers funded Commission on United States-Latin American Relations—Linowitz Commission—whose report is being used as a guide for U.S. abandonment of its leadership role in the Western Hemisphere and for the institution of a new policy of nonintervention against Communist aggression on America's doorstep. Persons involved with the Linowitz Commission state that an Institute for Policy Studies' Transnational Institute (IPS/TNI) report entitled "The Southern Connection: Recommendations for a New Approach to Inter-American Relations" is being called the "Son of Linowitz Report." The report was produced by an ad hoc group working on Latin America formed in 1976 by Roberta Salper, coordinator of IPS's Latin American unit, and Orlando Letelier, IPS/RNI Director. The ad hoc IPS/TNI group staff consists of the following, among others:

Abraham F. Lowenthal was special consultant to the Linowitz Commission. In a broadcast interview Lowenthal argued that diplomatic and trade relations with Cuba would benefit U.S. businessmen and the U.S. economy.

Riordan Roett was also a consultant to the Linowitz Commission and is director of the Latin American Studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies. After the Allende Unidad Popular government was deposed in 1973, Roett headed the Emergency Committee to Aid Latin American Scholars, which received a $40,000 grant from the Ford Foundation to organize the placement of Chilean Marxists as instructors at American colleges and universities. Among those "placed" was Orlando Letelier, the Cuban agent.

Richard Rees Fagen, another consultant to the Linowitz Commission, traveled to Cuba in July 1969 with a group of U.S. revolutionaries, mostly members of the Weatherman faction of SDS, to meet with North Vietnamese Communists and Vietcong officials. He was a recipient of Ford Foundation grants in 1967-68-69 and 1972-73 during which period he lived in Chile as a "consultant" under the Marxist Allende regime. In 1967 he was a founding sponsor of the U.S. Committee for Justice to Latin American Political Prisoners (USLA), a front of the Socialist Workers Party, the U.S. section of the Fourth International which has organized the training of Latin American Trotskyites as terrorists by the Cubans since 1962. The USLA's function is to provide support to arrested members of the revolutionary groups.

Both the Linowitz Commission and the IPS/TNI Report are demanding that the U.S. government prevent terrorist actions against Cuba. However, the Cuban Communists began exporting revolutionary terror to many Latin American countries in the 1960's. These activities continue unabated and have caused death and injury to thousands.

In this country, the Cuban (Communists) coordinate support work for a wide range of Soviet-sponsored terrorist groups in Africa, the Middle East, Far East, and Latin America. The Cubans are linked to the Weather Underground Organization and the FALN terrorists in this country, and dominate the Marxist-Leninist Puerto Rican Socialist Party which has been involved in violent activities for over 15 years. Selected members of the Venceremos Brigade have received training in sabotage and terror in Cuba; and Cuba has provided sanctuary for a number of U.S. revolutionaries wanted for criminal activities....

In brief, both the Linowitz Commission reports and the IPS/TNI "Son of Linowitz" call for sweeping changes in U.S. foreign policy toward Latin America and the Caribbean. They call for the United States to state that it will never intervene directly with military force or with any economic or other political pressure to try to stop the imposition of a totalitarian Marxist-Leninist regime; that the United States give away the Canal Zone and Panama Canal to the leftist dictator of Panama; that the United States withdraw militarily from the Caribbean leaving the Cuban Communists free to carry out subversion and/or direct intervention; and that the United States provide the technology and food and finished goods to subsidize the Communists....

Conflict of interest charges against Linowitz were pressed with the White House and in the Senate by Senator Jesse Helms, of North Carolina, one of the leaders of the Senate group opposing the turning of the strategic waterway over to Panama. Senator Helms called attention to Linowitz's role as a director of the Marine Midland Bank and Pan American Airways, both of which have a direct financial interest in the support of the Torrijos regime. It was revealed that the bank had made substantial risky loans directly to the Republic of Panama. Senator Helms reported:

"The proposed treaty, which Linowitz has long advocated and is now negotiating for the United States, would give away billions of dollars of U.S. investments in the Canal Zone, vastly increase payments to the Republic of Panama, and strengthen the Torrijos regime, which is tottering both financially and politically."

It was revealed that Linowitz served not only on the board of directors of the Marine Midland Bank but also on its executive committee which approved major loans. Senator Helms noted that the Panamanian Government is in deep financial crisis as a result of its own mismanagement and the international banking community has grave doubts whether the outstanding indebtedness incurred by Torrijos can be paid. Senator Helms revealed that if the Panamanian Government fails because of its financial crisis it could well mean the end of the bankers' paradise created by Torrijos which provides United States and other banks with a tax haven for international financial transactions outside the United States.

When Marxist dictator Omar Torrijos took over Panama in a military coup, he reorganized the banking law in that country in 1970, and the new laws were so favorable that the banking industry in Panama went through a startling expansion from what then was a few banks until today there are 72 banks in Panama with assets of $8.2 billion involved in transactions throughout the world.

"Ambassador-negotiator" Linowitz represents the international bankers, the one worlders, and has acted as agent for a Communist country. Little wonder he has been working hard to relinquish U.S. sovereignty of the Panama Canal and Zone and turn it over to Marxist dictator Omar Torrijos, who is supported by Communist Cuba.

Mr. Speaker, the conflicts of interest which infect the representation of the United States in negotiating a treaty over the Panama Canal fall into three separate classes, any one of which would and should have made Linowitz inappropriate to be a negotiator for the United States. When this issue was first raised, it arose in the context of Linowitz's appointment with the personal rank of Ambassador. The law, 22 U.S.C. 901a, clearly requires an appointed ambassador to reveal his campaign contributions. To this day he has refused to do so. The intent and purpose of the law was to preclude purchase of a position of eminence and power. The device of personal appointment served to prevent the exposure of the matters which the law required revealed in 901a. It also prevented a confirmation hearing before the U.S. Senate in which any real and potential conflicts of interest would be revealed. That is, a confirmation hearing would have revealed those interests of the nominee which would have made the post worth purchasing in the first place. Instead, a State Department formality was substituted for a confirmation hearing....

Within a week of my filing a suit contesting the legality of Linowitz's appointment, he resigned his seat on the board of the Marine Midland Bank of New York. Marine Midland as part of a consortium of banks was a creditor of Panama for $8,000,000.... To this day no one has seen the alleged State Department clearance on Linowitz. No one outside the administration knows how many "Marine Midlands" it contains. But the public record tells us a few more conflict of interest connections which do not lend confidence in the treaty negotiated under the aegis of Mr. Linowitz.

First, Mr. Linowitz represented the Republic of Panama over the Panama Canal issue to President-elect Carter in late 1976. Mr. Boyd of Panama boasted of the fact. Two months later, Linowitz began representing the United States on the same issue between the same parties. By its terms such a situation is a conflict of interest....

Second, Linowitz was negotiating the treaty while Linowitz's law firm, from which he had not resigned, remained a registered agent for South American governmental interests—perhaps an oversight; but the fact that Linowitz himself and his law firm have represented South and Central American interests for at least two decades is not an oversight. Panama and Chile sugar interests all have been represented by Linowitz and his firm and all are interested in one way or another in a resolution of the canal issue favorable, in their lights, to Panama. Linowitz could not be so insensitive to the realities of international interests to be ignorant of the obvious interconnection of all these issues.

The ultimate issue remains that Linowitz was a foreign agent for the very countries pressuring the U.S. for divestiture of the Canal. He is on boards which have a vested interest in retaining favorable connections and even money recovery from Panama, a country with a deficit worse than the United States on a per capita basis. Finally, he represented Panama in these very negotiations. Both the reality and the appearance makes the treaty produced with his connivance more than suspect.

What is to be said of an administration that trades on morality as its daily staple? Was it unaware of Linowitz's interests and the conflicts? Did not Vance tell the White House? Or did it not matter? Will the Senate now be asked to save the face of the President at the expense of the Nation? When should they have known the facts? Will the House be asked to pass enabling legislation and appropriations on a treaty with such suspect antecedents? Why should the United States give up the Canal for a set of Linowitzes to profiteer at the expense of its citizens?

WORLD GOVERNMENT THROUGH "PIECEMEAL FUNCTIONALISM"

ELIMINATING AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SUPREMACY

During the past few weeks the pinch that has been strangling U.S.-based industries has become apparent to all who read, look, or listen. Zenith, having boasted for years that its radio and television sets were made by Americans, has been forced to transfer much of its manufacturing operations to Mexico and Taiwan. Over five thousand skilled workmen are being laid off. Even more ominous: steel plant after steel plant is being closed down, permanently, because they can no longer compete with Japanese producers.

These events follow the previous deliberate destruction of the American shoe industry, the natural textiles industry, the slow-down of American production of petroleum and natural gas so that the nation became dependent upon oil imports. There was the concurrent shift of whole American factories and industrial plants to other parts of the world, and the import of foreign-made cars and other machines and finished products. Simultaneously, foreign firms began building plants in the United States, foreigners began buying up whole American industries, hotels, real estate, etc.

As an example: in May 1977, it was announced that a joint venture between the Communist-controlled State of Rumania and Armand Hammer's Occidental Oil Company had been consummated. They had jointly purchased a high-grade coal mine in the State of Virginia, U.S.A. There have been numerous other examples: OPEC Nations and the U.S.S.R. have been vying with each other in buying up banks in the United States wherever and whenever possible—three in California recently. It will also be recalled that an Iranian multimillionaire was about to buy up Bert Lance's controlling interests in some Georgia banks, until the notoriety accompanying the disclosure of Lance's unorthodox financial manipulations caused the deal to be quashed.

These things don't just happen; behind it all there is a deliberate plan, a plan to level off American industrial supremacy through a piecemeal regional and worldwide distribution of manufacture and industry. The age of National Supremacy is to end, to be replaced by the Supremacy of Multinational Institutions and Multinational Corporations!

The free enterprise economist Henry Hazlitt gave a clue as to how the Carter Administration is cooperating in this effort, when he wrote in the October 1, 1977 issue of Human Events:

"As he moves from one proposal to another, President Jimmy Carter's economic philosophy becomes increasingly clear. He has no belief in a free market economy. He wants to solve every economic problem by more government intervention and controls.

"Before his election he talked much about budgetary restraint, budgetary balance, and reduced taxation. But though he came into office with a budget already heading toward a near-record deficit, he has been constantly proposing still greater expenditures. He has asked Congress for a huge increase in taxation, on top of an already unprecedented burden of taxes, and called it an 'energy program.'

"His proposals have been systematically hostile to private business. He proposes to repeat all the old economic blunders of the New Deal and pile new ones on top of them."

Mr. Hazlitt's choice of the word "blunders" was ill-advised. But he makes his point: The destruction of private enterprise is the aim, and the "energy program" is little more than a clever and immoral way of raising taxes. Columnist Robert M. Bartell wrote, and we are quoting from the California Mining Journal for September 1977, that a government economist had told him:

"President Carter's message to Congress was very dramatic and was meant to be so. It is expected to be reverberating among our legislators and in the country for the next two years, at least; perhaps all the way into 1980, when President Carter will be seeking re-election. But in documenting his diagnosis he has used a set of facts and figures that would appear questionable, especially in the matter of petroleum reserves—the oil and natural gas reserves on which this country can count for its future supply of hydrocarbons.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA – THE "CLIMB DOWN SYNDROME"

By Ivor Benson, in "Behind the News"
Natal, South Africa

It is now possible to take a short cut through millions of spoken and written words to explain quite simply what has been happening over the future of South West Africa, a territory described abroad as "Namibia."

The South African Government, trying to fulfil responsibilities granted by the old League of Nations decided a couple of years ago that the time had come to help the people of South West Africa to shape their own political future.

There is, of course, no such creature as "a Namibian". The territory's population comprises 396,000 Wambo, 99,000 Whites, 75,000 Damara, 65,000 Herero, 56,000 Kavango, 51,000 persons of mixed race, 37,000 Nama, 29,000 East Caprivis, 26,000 Bushmen and 5,000 Tswana. Each of these groups has its own language and customs, with the minimum of overlapping.

So the South African Government called together a conference of representatives of all these racial and linguistic groups in a building in Windhoek known as The Turnhalle and asked them what they would like to do. There could be no doubt what they wanted. They did not mind the setting up of a new and independent state for the territory but they insisted that each ethnic group should be allowed to preserve its identity, leaving each group to take care of its own purely local and internal affairs.

Four days after the Turnhalle Conference had completed its mammoth task of drawing up a new draft constitution in accordance with the wishes of the groups represented, the United Nations sprang into action and a strongly worked diplomatic note was delivered to the South African Prime Minister by

"The figure President Carter used for the total crude oil reserves of Saudi Arabia... is not 170 billion barrels...but at least 300 billion, as everybody inside the Arabian American Oil Company knows. And Saudi officials will privately tell you as much. The difference—an additional 130 billion barrels—would cover our total oil needs for 20 years at the present rate of consumption."

"The President," Bartell continued, "also overlooked the recent tremendous boost in the known oil reserves of Mexico... But that's only the beginning, because the prolific oil formations also extend into next door Guatemala and Honduras—as well as under the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific. Carter also overlooked the reserves off the coast of Argentina, which the U.S. Geological Survey estimates at 200 billion barrels—rivaling Saudi Arabia's. But his most glaring omission concerns the oil reserves waiting representatives of the five Western nations in the Security Council. At once, South West Africa's fate became negotiable.

A Climb Down

There was a flurry of conferences between the South African Government and representatives of the five Western Powers. To cut a long story short, the South African Government capitulated. Political development in South West Africa must be in accordance with the requirements of the United Nations and not of the indigenous people as represented at the Turnhalle.

External forces, officially represented by UN, have firmly made up their minds what they want and what they need. They want a situation in South West Africa which they can control, mainly because they want a base from which to exert pressure on South Africa. The South West African People's Party (SWAPO) has been set up and financed from outside the territory and has hardly any following. In spite of its unconcealed Communist associations, make no mistake about it, that is the group which external forces mean to install in power—and it is highly probable that they will succeed....

Ivor Benson.

to be tapped under the Beaufort Sea, north of Alaska, where the prolific Prudhoe Bay formations get progressively thicker, with huge hydrocarbon structures. Only two wild-cat wells have been drilled there so far... and both hit it rich.

"It appears someone is feeding the President some faulty information...and he doesn't seem to care." (unquote).

Disregarding oil reserves and turning to other known and available sources of energy Idaho Congressman Steven Symms says:

"More and more Americans are beginning to realize that the so-called energy crisis is really a production crisis, pointing to the need to develop nuclear breeder reactors and new energy sources. There are 240,000 metric tons of refined Uranium 238 in government stockpiled, mined, bought, and paid for. If that supply was used in breeder reactors to produce electricity, it would produce 1,200 trillion kilowatt hours of electricity—enough for a 600 year supply for the United States. And there is a 500 year supply of unmined coal in the United States, and extensive untapped natural gas fields. Just one field in the Gulf of Mexico has an estimated 60 year supply of natural gas at the present rate of consumption. These resources would be available if the price was allowed to rise to the point where it was economical to mine and drill wells."

Now, put all these together—the destruction of whole American industries, what Henry Hazlitt says about the deliberate killing of private business in the United States, and what Bartell and Symms say about the so-called energy crisis—and we come up with the conclusion of Harry E. Walkup, M.D., honorary member of the American Sunbeam staff:

"...all of this while we the people foot the bill through personal income taxes and swelter in the Establishment's created and sustained double-digit inflation, a contrived energy crisis, and a carefully nurtured 10 percent unemployment rate. (John Maynard Keynes appropriately termed this Establishment mechanism, Euthanasie of the rentier: the process of ruining fixed income investors—the middle-class.)"

(unquote; emphasis as in original)

The end result of all of this for the citizens of the United States was clearly expressed by Ned Lincoln in an article concerning Richard Cooper, Jimmy Carter's Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and potentially the most dangerous man in the Carter Administration. The article appeared in the March 14, 1977 issue of The Spotlight under the title "Appointee Sees Re-Ordered World Government." We quote:

"Richard Newell Cooper preaches a doctrine that 'marginal' establishments (small businesses and manufacturers—the multinational corporation's competition) must go out of business; that the workers must be uprooted

In acceptance, Norman Lear said on ABC's 'A.M.-America' and at the conference that he coveted the humanist award more than the Emmy....

from their smug community life and become nomads roaming about the country and even the world in search of job opportunities: 'If there are no jobs, give them unemployment insurance, and when that runs out, put them on welfare.'"

So much for the aims of this Re-Ordered World Government Scheme which we have titled (their phrase) "Piecemeal Functionalism." Now, let's note how the program is supposed to work at the world level, to create a functional world government. And insofar as possible, we shall use their own words, with a grateful "thank you" to Harry Walkup, who did the actual research, and to the American Sunbeam which first published Dr. Walkup's series of articles on a similar theme.

It was Elizabeth Mann Borgese, a senior fellow at the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, who surmised that, "...world government will eventuate, and that it may evolve along functional rather than territorial lines...."

This, of course, is the philosophy of the British-American Atlantic Establishment's "piecemeal functionalism" approach to world INTERdependence. Trilateralist and Carter-appointed Ambassador to Italy Richard Gardner expanded on this theme in an article appearing in CFR's Foreign Affairs, in 1973, titled "The Hard Road To World Order:

"Our best hope for the foreseeable future seems to be, not in building a few ambitious central institutions of universal membership and general jurisdiction as was envisaged at the end of the last war (WW II), but rather in the much more decentralized, disorderly, and pragmatic process of inventing or adopting institutions of limited jurisdiction and selected membership to deal with specific problems on a case-by-case basis, as the necessity for cooperation is perceived by the relevant nations."

Nelson A. Pryor of the Center for Federal Policy Review (conservative) summarized this by describing it as,

"...a piecemeal layering-in of regional entities for the same, but slower, results-world government."

In a series of articles dealing with the destruction of the nation's shoe industry (the tip of the iceberg), the author summarized: "Examination of the preceding background data...leads one to the inevitable conclusion that the United States is under Corporate Socialism, right here and now. In fact, Carter's National Security Council director, Zbigniew Brzezinski, intimates that we are currently under Marxism, and only emerging into the so-called technetronic age. The stars of the collectivist play, Michael Blumenthal and Richard Newell Cooper, along with 14 co-stars from the Trilateral Commission, including the relative newcomer, Brzezinski, have slithered into the federal government in the highest of economic decision-making positions. The number of Kennedy-Johnson retreads entering the Carter administration, typified by Blumenthal, Cooper and the principal architect of the Great Society program, Joseph Califano, are too numerous to be coincidental. They undoubtedly represent a return of yesteryear's actors whose contract calls for the revision and updating of the script for their change society: world domination hit-show. And to assure the success of their one-world-oriented play, these movers and shakers have brought with them the League for Industrial Democracy's Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) radicals of the 1960's. These understudies, working under the direction of the man with the sardonic smile, have achieved the philosophical direction-change announced in the late sixties: To work within the system. Their obvious presence assures futuristic-continuity; and the show must go on!

"As to the future of America's independent, free-enterprise... so-called 'marginal' establishments, it is obviously bleak. Current administration management plans call for them to either merge with the multinational corporations or 'go out of business'.

"...in the light of the direction in which the current administration is taking us, it is time that every American review the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. Therein lies the solution to the nation's problems...."

As a Nation, we have three standards to which we may repair: The Holy Bible to give us faith and power, the Declaration of Independence to give us political direction, and the Constitution to give us the blueprint. But these three are of no avail unless they are catalyzed into action.

"EVERYBODY'S PICKING ON THE PRESIDENT"

PLANS TO ABOLISH THE ELECTIVE OFFICE?

"I have believed for some time," wrote a correspondent whose opinions we respect, "that there exists a conspiracy to do away with the Office of the President of the United States."

Our correspondent reasoned that instead of a President elected indirectly by the people we would have a National Administrator appointed by a Board of Elders. This is the type of bureaucratic dictatorship envisioned by Col. House and described with great detail in his book Philip Dru—Administrator.

We hadn't thought of Jimmy Carter in connection with this particular conspiracy until recently. Watergate might have been designed to destroy the Presidency. The Ford administration lent little toward rebuilding the prestige of the office. But when Jimmy Carter took over there was a touch of the Kennedy charisma and a feeling that all was well with the Office of the Presidency regardless of what one might think of the occupant of the office. Carter's stepping out as though he were President of the World lent a certain amount of respect to the office, and if Carter had done even a few of the things he promised to do if elected, there would have been little thought of a conspiracy to destroy the Office of the Presidency.

But, lately Carter has been getting himself caught in one jam after another, many of them jams of his own making, some of them seemingly deliberate. For Carter to be criticized by his political opponents is to be expected. But when his best friends start picking on him, then something new is brewing. He has alienated the Democratic Congress; his strongest supporters, the Zionists, are infuriated; Big Labor is complaining; in truth, everybody seems to be picking on the President, even the picked press. Typical is the following:

"There's a lot of soul searching going on—in Washington and around the country—a questioning mood, an uneasiness about the future. A major reason is President Carter.

He is still an enigma to many. Congress sees him as a tinkerer, shifting projects and stands constantly. He seems unable to sell his energy package to the people. Law-makers increasingly feel free to rebuff him on details of his fuel proposals. Programs, such as welfare reform, are laid on the table before all the kinks are worked out. Presidential proposals are piling up in a jumble. His big vision, if he has one, is seen as vague. The 11-day trip to four continents looks more like a media ploy than a grand diplomatic design.

"A pragmatic engineer, yes. Carter is intent on making things work better, especially the Federal Government. But he can't seem to fit himself and his proposals into an ideological frame that people can grasp. That is not going to change in the months ahead. And it will continue to confuse liberals who thought that candidate Carter was a liberal, and conservatives who are sure that the Georgian is a conservative at heart." (Quoted from U.S. News & World Report, Oct. 10, 1977.

To compound the confusion surrounding Jimmy Carter, there are developments in the news that could lead to any one of three conclusions:

- 1) The Office of the Presidency is going to be changed;
- 2) The Occupant of the Office is going to be changed; or
- 3) Both.

The treatment which Carter gave to the Universal Covenant on Human Rights is a case in point.

HUMAN RIGHTS COVENANTS

These covenants and their companion Declaration on Human Rights are vicious examples of how a treaty can be used to create domestic law. A treaty, declaration, covenant, or convention all have one thing in common: they supersede the Constitution and become the law of the land the moment they are ratified by the United States Senate. Article VI, Clause 2 of the United States Constitution reads:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges, in every State, shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding" (emphasis added).

There are those who say that, since the United States ratified the treaty "Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations" on March 19, 1970, the UN then became a sovereign organization and that, therefore, any treaty enacted by the United Nations automatically becomes binding upon every member nation of the UN, regardless of whether the member nation ratified the treaty. There are others who say that when the United States ratified the "Enabling Act" which brought the UN into legal existence, the United States is automatically bound by any treaty, declaration, covenant or convention adopted by the UN General Assembly. Moses Moskowitz, in an article appearing in the American Bar Association Journal for April 1949 agrees with this, stating that:

"...once a matter has become, in one way or another, the subject of regulation by the United Nations, be it by resolution of the General Assembly or by convention between member states at the instance of the United Nations, that subject ceases to be a matter of being essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the member states."

So far as we know, there has never been any legal adjudication of this touchy point in treaty law-making. But we do know that the proponents of Human Rights Covenants, Genocide Treaties, etc., have attempted to play it safe by having the U.S. Senate ratify these treaties. But the Senate—to its credit—has consistently refused to ratify any of these controversial and dangerous United Nations treaties. And this is where Jimmy Carter stepped in, defied the Senate and did it his way:

*On October 3, 1977 Carter made a speech before the UN General Assembly. How well he was received was indicated by the fact that only once in the entire address was he interrupted by applause. That was when he promised the delegates that the U.S. would use nuclear weapons only if the United States were attacked first. However, something of far greater importance than just another speech was to occur on the following day, October 4. We were listening to the proceedings as described on Public Radio by Pauline Frederick, long-time announcer, apologist and commentator for the U.N. We turned on our tape recorder, just in case something important was said, and while setting the scene for the arrival of President Carter, Ambassador Young and Security Chief Brzezinski, Pauline Frederick said:

"Tomorrow, the President is expected to return to the United Nations to emphasize his interest on human rights — in human rights — by signing the Covenant, the Human Rights Covenant, which has not yet been signed by the United States. The President will emphasize his strong interest in that particular — those particular documents by signing the Covenants which have been in existence for quite some time..."

What Carter did was—as with the Panama Canal Treaties—pre-empt the Senate and sign two covenants that the U.S. Senate had refused to consider, session after session and year after year. One was a covenant—or treaty—on civil and political rights; the second document was a covenant on economic, social and cultural rights which recognizes people's "right to work, social security, fair wages and adequate health and living conditions." Carter said the first treaty concerns what governments must not do to their people," while the second treaty "concerns what governments must do for their people."

National Socialism by Treaty Law would be a better description of the two documents Carter signed in defiance of the Senate and the taxpaying citizens of the United States.

BEHAVIOR MODIFICATION AND THE ENERGY CRISIS

The principal event that may make Carter become a dictator or become dispossessed is the fact that his energy program has been ground into little pieces by the Congress. Carter and his Trilateralist bosses were counting heavily on that energy program. Not because it was designed to conserve energy, or to provide new ways for raising taxes, or to make us even more dependent upon foreign suppliers. The Trilats expected all these results from the Carter energy program; but the most important, the hidden and overriding goal of the energy scheme was to force the American people to accept a new way of life!

Writing in the Winter 1974-75 issue of CFR's Foreign Policy Magazine, Zbigniew Brzezinski demanded "a significant change in our social and political lifestyle." This was to have been the real purpose of the energy program as presented to Congress by Carter.

Senator Jake Garn (R-UT) was one of the few on Capitol Hill who really understood the underlying significance of the energy package. In the Congressional Record of Sept. 9, 1977 (page S14640), under the title "Energy Scoops," Senator Garn said:

"It is possible, of course, to change social behavior in radical ways. It has been done in Communist China... In fact, in the August issue of Human Behavior, Kenneth Lamott has described for us the behavior modification techniques in use in China, as they might be applied to the energy wastrels in the United States."

Lamott points out that Americans will not voluntarily sacrifice their freedom and their right to live their own lives as they will, therefore more drastic measures must be taken by the dictocrats to change the social and political life styles of Americans. The author then points out how it was done in Red China. Following are direct quotes.

As a review of history since World War II makes clear, the late Mao Tse-tung... was the greatest behavioral psychologist of the 20th century. Under Mao's guidance, a quarter of the world's people went through the greatest mass process of behavior modification in history. This great achievement was accomplished by psychological means and not (or at least not usually) at the point of a gun....

Thought and behavior reform in Mainland China thus came to depend on two main structural elements: (1) Neighborhood Associations set up everywhere to monitor behavior and exert pressure for compliance; and (2) study groups of 6 to 12 people organized in every office, factory, shop and school. Everybody had to belong. There was no escape in silence—every member had to take part. There was no escape in pretending to agree — criticism and self-criticism were the order of the day. Refractory citizens were not sent to the firing squad; instead, they were exiled from the group.

While neighborhood associations and street committees kept close track of sanitation, family health, delinquent behavior, rationing, and social services the study groups probed the psyches of the great mass of the Chinese people, bringing their thought and consequently their behavior into accord with the official line. In gross, pragmatic terms, the prescription worked....

I am...now going to offer a rough outline of a system that will adapt the essential principles of the Chinese model of a mass behavioral control to American conditions in a time of scarcity. Let us call the proposed system simply the American Way.

These are the 12 keys to the American Way:

1. The roots of the American Way will be found in our national experience—in the thrift and frugality practiced by the Indians of the plains and forests, by the earliest settlers, by the pioneers who moved the frontier westward, by the immigrants who settled in our great cities and by everyone old enough to remember the Great Depression.
2. The President will declare a state of emergency equal to a major war, following his declaration with symbolic actions equivalent to FDR's bank holiday.
3. The mass media will launch a vigorous campaign designed to create a national spirit equal to the spirit of World War II, our last 'good' war.
4. The American Way Administration (a cabinet-level agency) will organize a nationwide network of committees of corres-

THE LOST LETTER

A Personal Report

The Don Bell Reports for October 7, 1977 was never completed, never mailed, and we believe you deserve to know the reason.

It began with Mom's accident; she fell and suffered a fractured femur (hip bone). The resulting concern, confusion, emotional strain and added work load took its toll on the other two members of the "staff." Ginny came down with what the doctor called flu, and at the same time he diagnosed Don's trouble as pneumonia. That's when we decided to call it quits with the Oct. 7 DBR.

We'll spare you the details of how the help of family and prayer of friends pulled us through. An addition is being built onto our home so Mom can be with us for the rest of her days. And we'll do our best not to miss any future issues of DBR.

Please pray for us: that we can get these unexpectedly high bills paid, that we'll have increased strength and added devotion to the work for which He has called us.

pondence. All adult Americans will belong. Employed people will belong to the committee at their place of work; housewives, househusbands, the unemployed and the retired will serve on apartment-house or neighborhood committees.

5. Universal registration will be assured by drawing on the computerized files of the Social Security Administration and the Internal Revenue Service.

6. Each Committee of Correspondence will consist of several subcommittees of no more than 12 persons each who work in the same shop or live on the same floor or in the same block.

7. Chairpersons elected by each committee will be trained in the dynamics of the encounter group, with particular attention to the hand-to-hand combat of the Synanon 'group.'

8. Preparation for the American Way will become a central part of the school curriculum.

9. Existing organizations — churches and synagogues, bowling leagues, labor unions, Rotary and Kiwanis, the League of Women Voters, the Sierra Club, the Masons and Odd Fellows, the John Birch Society, the American Medical Association—will be enlisted as powerful adjuncts to the American Way.

10. The target behavior to be changed will be identified by each Committee of Correspondence in response to local conditions but within the scope of guidelines prepared by the American Way Administration.

11. About 10 percent of Americans will become chairpersons, who will belong to regional organizations of their own that ultimately report to the American Way Administration. Eighty percent of the population is expected to accommodate themselves to the American Way with varying degrees of enthusiasm.

12. Incurable wasters—probably about 10 percent of the population—will identify themselves by their behavior. Wasters will not be punished by committees or subcommittees. They will be expelled from their committee and subcommittee and their names forwarded to the American Way Administration....

Our acceptance of the American Way will be made a little easier when we recognize that it will provide many bonuses besides the conservation of energy and resources. It will be particularly useful in the administration of public health. Drug abuse, including cigarette smoking and alcoholism, can at last be wiped out....May we not benefit by following the Chinese model?...Finally, we must start now rather than waiting for the results of studies that will take many years to finish and evaluate. Like the Chinese, we must strike out boldly, experimentally, and not be afraid to make mistakes. Mao Tse-tung once said, "As the struggle will continue to experience ups and downs, we shall have both tense and slack moments during our work and shall have to proceed in a zigzag." (End of extended quotation from an article titled "The Mao Solution," by Kenneth Lamott in the August 1977 issue of Human Behavior.)

After introducing this entire article into the Congressional Record, Senator Garn concluded: "There is one point about this scenario that is particularly frightening. And that is that the Carter administration has, apparently seriously, suggested a mechanism by which this kind of mass pressure could be brought to bear on the formerly free citizens of the United States. That is the proposal for a youth corps of snooping teenagers who would go around to 'help' people recognize that they are wasting energy, and to help them learn how to conserve. I have not seen the manual which has already been prepared for these snoops, and I understand the administration is now reluctant to give it much publicity. But I find it disturbing that such a thing would even have been dreamed of in a society that prides itself on freedom from coercion...."

"A significant change in our social and political lifestyle," was the real goal of the Carter Energy Program, and the professional change-agents were prepared to adopt the methods utilized by Mao Tse-tung to accomplish this goal. Using patriotic terms such as "the American Way" and "Committees of Correspondence," we were to be cajoled or coerced into accepting a socialist police state while being told it was the patriotic thing to do!

But in this effort, Carter has again failed. Does this mean a change of the Office, or of the Occupant, or Both? It's still too soon to know, but not too soon to beware of created crises!

THE HUMANISTS' STRUGGLE TO SAVE E.R.A.

CONGRESS TO THE RESCUE?

It might have been expected. The promoters of the ERA (Equal Rights Amendment) felt they were beginning to lose the fight. The drive had lost its blitzkrieg momentum and the forthcoming National Womens' Conference to be held in Houston November 18-21, 1977 would not save ERA. So the ERAites called on the federal administration and the U.S. Congress to come to their rescue.

The following article, reprinted in full from the October 19, 1977 issue of the Miami (Florida) Herald is self-explanatory:

WILL ERA DEADLINE BE MOVED?

By Vera Glaser
herald washington bureau

Washington—The White House, Justice Department and House Speaker Thomas O'Neill are swiftly and quietly moving to extend the ratification deadline for the Equal Rights Amendment. Their chances of success appear bright in the House but cloudy in the Senate.

As Congress moves toward adjournment, O'Neill plans to rush through a joint resolution to extend by two years, until March 1981, the final ratification date for the measure to ban sex bias.

Supporters hope to avoid an election year hassle that could occur if they waited until the 1978 session.

A legal opinion from the Justice Department affirming that Congress has the right to extend the deadline by a simple majority vote is expected to reach the White House by early next week. It would provide the springboard for introduction of a House resolution calling for the extension. O'Neill has predicted such a resolution will pass the House, but Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd sees a possibility of a filibuster by hard-core ERA foes.

Phyllis Schlafly, leader of the "Stop ERA" movement, has threatened to "fight up to the Supreme Court" the move to alter the deadline.

Senate action is not expected before next year. Since last summer Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), the main Senate ERA proponent, has been exploring the legal ramifications of altering the deadline. He believes the deadline can be extended but has reservations about the political wisdom of doing it.

The 11th-hour strategy has developed as the amendment lies stalled three states short of the required 38 ratifications to make it law. Eighteen months remain before the March 1979 deadline and some crucial state legislatures are not scheduled to meet next year.

Sentiment for and against the controversial measure polarized in recent years as ERA foes waged a fierce lobbying battle to kill it on the state level.

As soon as the Justice Department ruling reaches the White House, Reps. Elizabeth Holtzman (D., N.Y.), Margaret Heckler (R., Mass.) and Millicent Fenwick (R., N.J.) among others, will sponsor the House resolution.

In 1971 the House overwhelmingly passed ERA, 354-23. The following year the Senate approved it, 84-8, after decisively rejecting nine separate proposals to alter or defeat it. Supporters worry that the extended, emotional controversy in recent years may have eroded congressional support. But Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization of Women (NOW), contends that an informal poll of Congress taken last summer shows enough Senate votes to break a possible filibuster against extending the deadline.

Several weeks ago in a private meeting with O'Neill, pro-ERA House members were assured of the speaker's support and were told the resolution would pass the House. The White House then requested the legal opinion from Justice. At about the same time, NOW sent its own 20-page brief to Justice. The brief concluded that Congress "has absolute and unreviewable authority to extend the ratification period ... by a joint resolution approved by a simple majority of the members present in each House." NOW pointed out that the ratification period was contained in the preamble to the ERA and not in its text. That means Congress could alter the time period without state action, which would be necessary if the text itself were changed, the brief contended.

On Oct. 12, Reps. Holtzman, Heckler and Fenwick chaired an unpublicized strategy meeting in the White House. Present were presidential aide Midge Constanza, deputy White House counsel Margaret McKenna,

FOR GI JILL IT'S A SHORT STEP TO WAR

Frankfurt, Germany (UPI)—American women soldiers, already available for battlefield assignments, "are only one step from combat," according to a civilian who led a team analyzing women soldiers in this month's war games.

The Army's 50,000 women soldiers may not yet be given combat assignments, said Cecil Johnson, technical area chief of the Army Research Institute.

"But women now can be used geographically anywhere on the battlefield, although not as part of an assault or combat unit, and they will defend themselves," he said.

"Most Americans do not realize the gravity or significance of women now serving in combat support units," Johnson said in an interview shortly before he returned to Washington Sunday.

"If a combat unit were run over, combat support units would find themselves in combat," he said. "The women are only one step away from combat."

Johnson, who said that a complete report on women soldiers' field performance is due in December, said they tend to be smarter than the average male soldier and "can figure out ways to overcome lack of strength."

The Army analyzed women soldiers in a series of 72-hour field maneuvers in the United States last autumn. A report on their performance is due next week, and Johnson said the Army's decision to test women in the field in West Germany shows they passed the earlier exam.

"We already have unisex basic training," Johnson said. "Men and women have identical training in 16 basic fields. The women throw grenades and handle weapons. The women are not given bayonet training. They receive rape-prevention training instead."

Judy Carter, the President's daughter-in-law who has lobbied actively for ERA, and other feminists.

(End of article from Miami Herald,
October 19, 1977)

In the foregoing article, mention is made of the fact that when the Senate approved ERA, on March 22, 1972, this was done after "rejecting nine separate proposals to alter or defeat it." The nature of those rejected proposals (amendments) will give a very clear understanding of the true intent of the Equal Rights Amendment. The proposed amendments to ERA:

1065 would have exempted women from compulsory military service. Defeated 73-18.

1066 would have exempted women from combat service in the military. (See accompanying, separate article in this Report.) Defeated 71-18.

1067 would have maintained the existing legal protections and exemptions for women. Defeated 75-11.

1068 would have maintained existing legal protections and exemptions for wives, mothers and widows. Defeated 77-14.

1069 would have maintained responsibility of fathers to support their children. Defeated 72-17.

1070 would have maintained existing laws securing privacy for males and females. Defeated 79-11.

1071 would have maintained existing laws making sexual offenses punishable crimes. Defeated 71-17.

1072 would have recognized legally the "functional and psychological differences between sexes." Defeated 82-9.

1044 was essentially a combination of the previous eight amendments. Defeated 82-9.

"From the above," we wrote in a previous Report (2/4/77), "it must be obvious that ERA intends that the women of this country shall be exactly like their sisters in the Soviet Union and in Israel, to have "equal rights" with the men. Women will have to work side by side with men, digging ditches, fighting no-win wars, turning their children over to the State so they'll be able to enjoy the equal right to work in mines and mills."

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S YEAR THE 5 MILLION DOLLAR FRAUD

Whenever ERA is mentioned, IWY must also be brought into the picture, because its leaders are the principal promoters of ERA. Those leaders—appointed by President Jimmy Carter, include such feminists as:

Bella Abzug, chairman of IWY, who as a Congresswoman introduced a bill to give "civil rights" to homosexuals; and who authorized lesbian workshops at the 50 State conferences which preceded the upcoming National IWY Conference in Houston in November.

Gloria Steinam, editor of Ms. Magazine, who proclaims: "Overthrowing capitalism is too small for us. We must overthrow the whole * * * * patriarchy!" (Patriarchy is the Humanist's term for the traditional or biblical family concept). At a Houston meeting Steinam said: "For the sake of those who wish to live in equal partnership, we have to abolish and reform the institution of marriage." She also said: "By the year 2000 we will, I hope, raise our children to believe in human potential, not God."

Jean O'Leary, co-executive director of the National Gay Task Force. An avowed lesbian, she wrote: "School counselors should be required to take courses in which... a positive view of lesbianism is presented.... Students (should be) encouraged to explore alternate life styles, including lesbianism.... Lesbian clubs should be set up in schools."...

BACKGROUND

The United Nations designated 1975 as International Women's Year (IWY). On Jan. 9, 1975, President Ford issued Executive Order No. 11832, setting up a National Commission on IWY, which opened an office in the State Department, with a paid staff of 13. Ford then appointed a National Commission on IWY consisting of 35 members, all but one pro-ERA. This National Commission, using federal funds, attended a World Conference for Women in Mexico City in June 1975. A "World Plan For Action" was drawn up and endorsed by the U.S. delegation. In addition to "women's rights" the World Plan called for equitable distribution of income (socialism), world disarmament, and other matters having nothing to do with "women's issues" as such. The U.S. delegation pledged to strive to implement this World Plan into U.S. domestic law. This is what IWY is all about: It draws up resolutions which are supposed to represent the wishes of the women of America, and then lobbies to get these resolutions translated into law! The National Commission on IWY has already drawn the blueprint of its goals which are contained in a book To Form a More Perfect Union (obtainable from the State Department). With the passage of ERA its top priority, other IWY goals include:

Federally funded and federally controlled 24-hour child development centers for all children, thus transferring prime responsibility for child rearing from parents to government; federally-financed retraining centers for "displaced homemakers"; government-financed abortions on demand; school-based education in family planning, which would include provision of contraceptives, lectures by lesbians on lesbianism, etc.; full legal and social status for homosexuals; world interdependence, world disarmament, guaranteed annual income, and other socialistic measures.

The Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) had been approved by Congress in 1972. But the amendment suffered stunning and surprising defeats in New York and New Jersey referendums on Nov. 4, 1975. This prompted the IWY Commission to persuade President Ford to issue another Executive Order extending the "year" of IWY to June, 1976. Enabling legislation was introduced by Congresswoman Bella Abzug, calling for $5 million for IWY, and extending the life of the IWY until March 31, 1978. Then in the spring of 1977 President Jimmy Carter reconstituted IWY, appointed new members and named Bella Abzug chairman of the IWY National Commission. Of the 45 members appointed or reappointed by Carter, only one is anti-ERA and anti-abortion. The National Commission then named members of State Coordinating Committees of IWY; these also were pro-ERA and pro-abortion.

The purpose of IWY meetings in 50 States and 6 Territories was to elect delegates and alternates to the National Convention that is being held in Houston, November 18-21, 1977, and to pass resolutions to be considered by the National Convention and then lobbied into law.

Martha Andrews, in The Voice of Liberty, Vol. 17, No. 2, gives an apt description of what developed at most of these State meetings. We quote:

"In each State pre-selected IWY committees arranged pre-planned packaged thinking to produce pre-determined results. All materials selected for distribution supported ERA, abortion, and other women's lib goals. The August 1977 Phyllis Schlafly Report declared that the majority of IWY State conferences were characterized by rigged elections, ruthless parliamentary tactics, and railroading of the pre-scripted IWY resolutions. No speaker opposed to ERA was allowed to address any general session.

Leaders of workshops were at a ratio of about 100 pro-ERA to one pro-family. The hundreds of workshops were permitted to discuss only the topics selected by IWY, such as ERA, abortion, federal child care, lesbian privileges. Rules were changed hourly in any way necessary to elect IWY delegates to the national conference and to pass IWY resolutions. It was standard procedure to unplug the microphones when any non-IWY participant tried to speak.

"At the Georgia blast-off meeting, many irregularities were witnessed. When candidates for delegates were being nominated, the chair ruled it irrelevant for them to give their views on ERA, etc.... The workshop on 'Homemaking' had nothing to do with homemaking, but with putting monetary value on housekeeping. At one workshop panelists introduced themselves as lesbians who discussed 'rights.' The workshop on psychology was a lecture on 'The Joys of Female Masturbation.' The one on health turned out to be on 'Abortion.' A workshop on 'Education' called for small children to be taught 'correct terminology' for sex organs and acts. At the final general session some 50-60 pages of resolutions from workshops were considered. It was voted that there be no discussion; thus many proposals heard for the first time by the majority, were decided without discussion or explanation. Among resolutions adopted were some calling for male contraceptives and teaching family planning at all school levels. A resolution that 'choice of lifestyle' be taught, meant that lesbianism be taught in schools. And these resolutions supposedly represent the thinking of the women of the State!

"Virtually all States reported similar controlled, manipulated meetings, indicating that IWY conferences did not represent the thinking of the majority of their women; but the meetings were used to promote women's lib goals as if coming from the grass roots." (End of quotation from The Voice of Liberty, Vol. 17, No. 2, 692 Sunnybrook Dr., Decatur, Georgia 30033.)

But in spite of the rigging and manipulation things began to fall apart for the feminists. In an article in Nation's Business for Sept., 1977, James J. Kilpatrick reported:

"... The first few State conferences passed without incident. Vermont women turned out, despite a heavy snowstorm, to endorse the prepared slate of delegates to Houston and to adopt all the right resolutions.... Alaska

... Arizona ... New Mexico ... North Dakota ... Colorado ... Wisconsin ... and Oregon all went by the book.

"But small clouds began to gather. The Minnesota conference obediently supported all the national goals, but a confrontation developed between anti-abortion and easy-abortion factions. Missouri was a shocker. There the anti-abortion and anti-ERA groups formed a potent coalition. Oklahoma was a real shocker. There the official state planners found themselves outplanned, out-hustled and outmaneuvered by an unexpected army of churchwomen who suddenly arrived in Stillwater, ready to shout down the national resolutions and to adopt some spirited resolutions of their own.... Montana also came undone. The liberationists who had lined up the program found themselves overwhelmed by a legion of Montana women who refused to be roped, tied and corralled.... In Utah the professional planners never had a chance. Thousands of Mormon women calmly took over the state conference and made it their own. Ohio and Mississippi balked at the parliamentary ride they had been expected to take. One of the angriest conferences occurred in Florida, where embittered dissenters felt they were flattened by unfair parliamentary rulings from the chair. Perhaps the most embarrassing session took place in Hawaii, where a dance group entertained the assembled women with lesbian skits." (unquote)

Faced with such unexpected opposition, the Feds are seeking to extend the deadline on ERA ratification, and Bella Abzug has invoked the privilege of appointing 500 feminist delegates-at-large to overcome those anti-ERA delegates who were elected at State conventions. And in retaliation, anti-ERA groups are scheduling their own rallies and conferences in Houston, Nov. 18-21. For information on how you can attend or help, write to Citizens Forum, P.O. FROM WATERGATE TO CARTERGATE

SAME OBJECTIVE, BUT DIFFERENT STRATEGY

"Watergate was someone named Martinez breaking into Democratic headquarters in the dead of night. Cartergate is David Rockefeller breaking into the Oval Office in broad daylight." So said investigative reporter Craig S. Karpel adding that "At least Nixon thought he was acting in the national interest; but Rockefeller, Carter, and the rest of the Trilateral Commission think they're working in the Multinational interest."

Had such a statement appeared in a magazine with a national circulation before Jimmy Carter was elected President of the United States, the statement would have created a sensation. Before Jimmy's nomination, only privately circulated newsletters and independent publications of limited circulation, would have dared to expose the Trilateral Commission and Carter's connection with the Rockefellers. However, with Carter's election assured, the Trilateralists no longer seemed to be concerned about the publicity they might receive, unfavorable or otherwise. As Congressman Larry MacDonald observed: "Until recently the policies, plans and operations of the Trilateral Commission established by Chase Manhattan Bank head David Rockefeller were the concern of a relatively small number of expert political analysts. Now... the activities of the Trilateral Commission are beginning to receive a public airing."

Example: Craig Karpel begins his latest article about the Trilateralists with this statement: "The presidency of the United States and the key cabinet departments of the federal government have been taken over by a private organization dedicated to the subordination of the domestic interests of the United States to the international interests of the multinational banks and corporations."

In a similar article by Robert A. Manning we are told that "even before Governor Carter first began to get presidential fever, after the 1972 election, prominent and far sighted members of the foreign-policy elite were picking up the pieces shattered by Vietnam and creating the Trilateral Commission... Carter's path to the White House parallels the development of the Trilateral Commission." Then we are given this interesting chronology of events:

May 31, 1971: Time magazine features a cover story on Jimmy Carter and the "new South." Time editor-in-chief Hedley Donovan (who is now a trilateral commissioner) was impressed with Carter and not long thereafter mentioned Carter to George Franklin, then executive director of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Late fall 1971: Carter has lunch with David Rockefeller in the Chase Manhattan Bank offices in New York City.

August 1972: At the Democratic National Convention, Carter, acting as a moderating force between the "twin evils" of George McGovern on the Left and George Wallace on the Right, backs Vietnam hawk Senator Henry Jackson for nomination.

Fall 1972: Carter announces candidacy for the 1976 presidential election.

Winter 1972: David Rockefeller gives a series of three speeches at Chase Bank forums in Montreal, proposing an organization to forge closer cooperation among the industrialized democracies. George Franklin, North American secretary of the Trilateral Commission, told Penthouse in an interview that the Trilateral Commission "was entirely David Rockefeller's idea originally. He was getting worried about deteriorating relations and growing competition between the U.S., Europe, and Japan."

Spring 1972: At the Bilderberg meeting (an exclusive semisecret group of Western corporate and political leaders that has met annually for twenty-five years to discuss global problems), Michael Blumenthal (then head of Bendix Corporation, now secretary of the treasury) —according to George Franklin—"thought things were in a very serious condition, and couldn't a private group bring together the industrialized countries?" According to Franklin, Blumenthal's repeating of Rockefeller's idea then drew an enthusiastic response from the next eight speakers.

July 1972: A private planning conference was held at Rockefeller's estate at Tarrytown, N.Y., attended by leading foundation heads and academicians. Study and organization efforts got under way shortly thereafter for the creation of the Trilateral Commission.

April 1973: George Franklin, chief organizer of the Trilateral Commission, travels to Atlanta to meet with prospective members. "We were impressed that Carter had traveled to Europe and Japan, opening trade offices for the State of Georgia," a Trilateral spokesman told Penthouse.

Spring 1973: Zbigniew Brzezinski (now Carter's national security adviser) is chosen director of the Trilateral Commission.

July 1973: The Trilateral Commission is officially formed, becoming one of the world's most exclusive fraternities. Brzezinski becomes its driving force. According to George Franklin: "I don't know if it would have gotten off the ground without Zbig."...

Autumn 1973: Carter and Florida Governor Reuben Askew dine at the Tarrytown estate of David Rockefeller. Present at the dinner is Brzezinski (who) later said that "we were impressed with Carter." Dr. Peter Bourne, Carter's deputy campaign manager, said that David and Zbig both agreed that Carter was the ideal politician to build on."...

October 1973: The first major Trilateral seminar is held. Out of such meetings come a series of thirteen papers on international finance, monetary reform, and politics. George Franklin told Penthouse that Carter "was a very active member - he never missed a meeting. I think we have had a large influence. (We've been) his principal education in foreign policy."

October 1973: In a prophetic interview, Brzezinski said: "The Democratic candidate in 1976 will have to emphasize work, the family, religion, and, increasingly, patriotism, if he has any desire to be elected."...

Fall 1975: Carter's campaign autobiography, "Why Not the Best?" is written. Of the Trilateral Commission, Carter wrote: "Membership on this commission provided me with a splendid learning opportunity, and many of the other members have helped me in my study of foreign affairs."...

June 1976: Carter delivers his first major foreign policy speech before the Foreign Policy Association. The speech begins: "The time has come for us to seek a partnership between North America, Western Europe, and Japan.... These countries already have a significant world impact, and they are prepared to play even larger global roles in shaping a new international order."

November 4, 1976: Carter wins the presidential election.

January 23, 1977: Vice-President Mondale arrives in Brussels on the first leg of a trip to Europe and Japan designed to bring into harmony the policies of the industrialized capitalist nations. Mondale says that the purpose of the visit is to "set the tone" of the focus of the new administration. Whereas the Kissinger focus was a balance-of-power politics based on the U.S.-U.S.S.R. superpower equation, Carter's centerpiece of foreign policy is to be the "trilateral alliance."

March 1977: Carter completes the appointment of major figures in his administration. Besides Carter and Mondale, the members of the Trilateral Commission who join the Carter administration include the following:

- (1) Cyrus Vance, secretary of state.
- (2) Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser.
- (3) W. Michael Blumenthal, secretary of the treasury.
- (4) C. Fred Bergsten, assistant secretary of the treasury.
- (5) Richard Holbrook, ass't secretary for East Asian and Pacific affairs.
- (6) Warren Christopher, deputy secretary of state.
- (7) Richard Gardner, ambassador to Italy.
- (8) Leonard Woodcock, head of U.S. mission to Communist China.
- (9) Harold Brown, secretary of defense.
- (10) Richard N. Cooper, under secretary of state for economic affairs.
- (11) Lucy Benson, under secretary for security affairs.
- (12) Andrew Young, ambassador to U.N.
- (13) Sol Linowitz, conegotiator for Panama Canal Treaties.
- (14) Paul Warnke, director Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (ACDA) and chief SALT negotiator.
- (15) Anthony Solomon, deputy secretary for monetary affairs.
- (16) Elliot Richardson, U.S. representative to U.S. Law of the Seas Conference.
- (17) Henry Owen, economic adviser.

It should be noted that all Trilateral Commission members are "suspended" from the commission while they serve within a government. So, the foregoing names will not be seen on an active membership list of the Trilateral Commission. However, they still attend the meetings and follow the guidelines established by the T.L.C.

Also important are the new members who have been added recently. The following is from the latest Paul Scott column:

"Washington, October 19: The highly influential Trilateral Commission... has taken in some interesting new members with far-reaching future political implications.

"Most important of the new members are Illinois' Governor James R. Thompson, considered as a possible GOP presidential candidate in 1980; West Virginia's Governor John Rockefeller IV, one of the new faces in the Democratic party; and former secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who would like to establish a national political base by becoming a GOP Senator from New York... With Carter looking more and more like a one term President, Commission members are looking toward 1980 by 'educating' and 'building up' such political hopefuls as Thompson, Kissinger and Rockefeller. This widening of the Commission's influential base also is indicated by other important political figures brought in as new members in recent weeks. These include:

"George Bush, former director of the CIA, and chief of the U.S. Liaison Office in Peking and former GOP National Committee Chairman; Senator John C. Danforth (R. Mo.); Senator Alan Cranston (D. Calif.); Representative Thomas Foley (D. Wash.); Representative William Cohen (R. Me.); Anne L. Armstrong, former U.S. Ambassador to the United Kingdom; and William Scranton, former Republican Governor of Pennsylvania and Ambassador to the United Nations."

As one observer commented: "It would be unfair to say that the Trilateral Commission dominates the Carter administration. The Trilateral Commission is the Carter administration." And we might add: Although Carter seems to be losing the confidence of the people of North America, of Western Europe, of Japan (and consequently of the Trilateral Commission itself), if and when the "Carter" administration ceases, the event will have little bearing on the final objectives of the Trilateral Commission. This economic, monetary and political power center will continue to determine what U.S. foreign policy is to be. If Carter does not finish his term because of, say, assassination as with Kennedy, or resignation or impeachment as with Nixon of Watergate; Walter Mondale has been conditioned to take over—in name only, of course. And if Carter survives as U.S. President until 1980, then Republican James Thompson and Democrat John Rockefeller IV are already being programmed for the Presidency by TLC, and it won't matter to the power elite which man becomes "the peoples' choice."

THE PORNO MEDIA

It may seem unusual and even distasteful that, when one sought for the real facts about Jimmy Carter, the best source among commercial publications was Playboy Magazine, at one time king of the porno publications. Carter himself chose to give his most revealing interview to Playboy. In a similar situation, when George Franklin of CFR and TLC chose to reveal some of the secrets and global aspirations of the Trilateral Commission to a commercial publication, he chose that competing pearl among pornos, Penthouse Magazine.

Again a similarity of treatment: After Carter had told Playboy what he wanted published, the Playboy staff dug a little deeper and later published much information that Carter did not want published. Likewise with Penthouse: after Franklin broke the ice by giving an interview, the Penthouses did some investigating and printed material that the TLC power elite could not have wanted made available to the public in a magazine sold on—or under—newsracks.

Craig S. Karpel, previously quoted in this Report, published a series of articles dealing with TLC. Here are pertinent and factual quotes from his article appearing in the November 1977 Penthouse:

Brzezinski's idea was to weld... the world's industrial giants... into an alliance that would rule the world and exploit their own citizens... to create a new, three-sided 'axis' that would subdue the rest of the world, not militarily, but economically. The key to Rockefeller and Brzezinski's plan was to gain control of the executive branch of the U.S. government. The first step was the selection, in 1973, of an ambitious, capable presidential candidate with no political base of his own, to be a founding member of the Trilateral Commission... The second step was to get this candidate elected... The third step was for the new president to appoint Trilateral Commission members to all the policymaking roles in the departments of State, Defense and Treasury—and to name Brzezinski himself to replace Henry Kissinger as head of the National Security Council....

One of the basic principles of the Trilateral Commission—perhaps the most basic—is free trade. David Rockefeller built his reputation as spokesman of the international finance community by delivering speeches at business conclaves on the virtues of eliminating tariffs... Heavy duties are okay, you see, if a company does business only in the United States and is in competition with imported goods. But is a multinational corporation has plants and markets both here and overseas, tariffs just gum up the works. To ship a gadget from a Chrysler plant in France to a Chrysler plant in Detroit, Chrysler has to pay a tax. Multinational corporations don't even call themselves 'multinational' anymore—now they're 'transnational.' They don't just operate in a multiplicity of nations: they transcend nations. Nothing is more annoying when you're out there transcending a nation than that nation's voters decide to tax you...

One of the essential reasons for the Trilateral Commission's invasion of Washington is the code phrase 'strengthening multinational financial institutions.' The idea is this. In the wake of the 1973 Arab oil hijacking the 'less-developed countries'... have had to borrow $50 billion from U.S. banks to pay the increased cost of oil. As a result of the worldwide recession that doesn't seem to want to go away, the LDCs don't have enough cash to pay off these loans. Loans to LDCs represent a sizable proportion of the banks' total assets. Recently Zaire informed its New York creditors that, regrettably, it would not be able to make its next loan payment... All it would take would be for a few more LDCs to welsh on their debts, and the big banks would be in much trouble. The only solution is to lend the deadbeat LDCs still more money to pay off the loans that are about to go sour. Problem: the banks don't have enough good money to throw after the bad—because they have already lent all the good money to the LDCs that now can't pay. Solution: steal the money from the U.S. taxpayer.

What 'strengthening multinational financial institutions' means in good old Anglo-Saxon is that the American public will be taxed, our tax money will be paid into the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and IMF will lend it to the less-developed countries, and the LDCs will pay our tax money to the New York banks. In March 1977 David Rockefeller gave a speech before the Economic Club of New York in which he advocated just such a flimflam—not surprising, considering the Chase Manhattan Bank's precarious position in general and its enormous exposure to shaky LDC loans in particular....

"Strengthening multinational financial institutions"—Trilateralese for strengthening the Chase Manhattan Bank, Citibank, the Bank of America, Morgan Guaranty Trust Company and First National Bank of Chicago at the taxpayer's expense—is so important to the Trilateral Commission that it has created a "citizen's force" called New Directions, a front group masquerading as a public-interest lobbying organization. ...

Jimmy Carter was elected the thirty-ninth president of the United States. He governs as the first president of the Developed World... in every one of Carter's actions, the interests of other countries come before those of America. In every area of Carter's policy, the interests of the international banks and corporations come before those of the American citizen, the American workingman, the American taxpayer, the American consumer....(unquote)

THE IMPENDING CRISIS

DRIFTING TOWARD DISASTER

The heading read: "At home and abroad, the President is bogged down in a swamp of problems. Search is on for quick successes to regain momentum—but they won't come easy." The story beneath the heading said:

"Inside the White House, it is starting to sink in that Jimmy Carter is in deep trouble. The President, entering his tenth month in office, finds himself struggling with a stubborn Congress, a dubious public and an inexperienced staff. . . .

Overseas, the influential business weekly, The Economist, echoes this sentiment. The London based weekly, in its October 28th issue, said that Carter's "most vaunted asset—the fact that he was a political outsider—is his greatest liability." The article noted that "The heap of legislative proposals that have emanated from the White House in the past nine months sit on Capitol Hill—with few exceptions—either neglected or, worse for the President, savaged beyond recognition. . . ."

"In the key positions close to him," said The Economist, "Mr. Carter still lacks advisers with enough stature or authority to help him make decisions and to carry them convincingly up to Capitol Hill . . . the President is still getting most of his advice on domestic and economic matters from a team that was largely put together to win primary elections, not to govern a continent."

It is obvious that it is the "Georgia staff" that is being criticized, not the Trilateralist Commissioners who control U.S. foreign policy for the benefit of Rockefeller & Co. However, if the truth were told, the Trilats are also getting a bit desperate, a fact that we shall touch on later.

It was the U.S. News & World Report which said of Carter that "a search is on for quick successes—but they won't come easy." The President might have looked upon his signing of the new minimum wage law as "a quick success." But it didn't turn out that way. The public, already experiencing minimum wage results, know that such a law increases unemployment, and one of the most serious crises the Nation faces is still unemployment. In a forecast of what would happen when the new minimum wage bill was signed into law, Senator Orrin Hatch of Utah said:

"In a statement introducing his economic package for the nation, Carter said, 'High unemployment is morally unacceptable. . . .'" Yet during his administration the unemployment spiral continues upward with no apparent relief in sight. At the same time the Carter forces in Congress are pushing for an increase in the minimum wage—action which the Secretary of Labor, himself, says will increase unemployment. The United States Chamber of Commerce chief economist, in testimony before the Senate Human Resources Subcommittee on Labor, said: "830,000 people will immediately lose their jobs if the minimum wage is raised from $2.30 to $2.65 an hour. And if the Carter plan is followed through 1980, it will cost the nation 3.4 million jobs—mostly young people."

Black young people—whom Carter strives to please through preferential treatment in schools (medical colleges are a case in point) and in industry, are the worst hit by this minimum wage law. Nationally, among black young people unemployment averages over 40 percent, and in isolated areas figures of 60 to 70 percent are not uncommon. Those figures will rise, because no businessman trying to make a profit can afford to pay top wages to inexperienced workers.

Carter's energy program was to have been one of those "quick successes" that would restore momentum. But people have begun to doubt the statements of the man who said in countless speeches during his presidential campaign: "I want to be your president; so I can give you a government that's honest and that's filled with love, compassion, competence. . . . If I ever lie to you—or if I ever mislead you—please don't vote for me."

It seems that the man who would not lie or mislead in this particular instance was not Jimmy Carter. It was Samuel P. Huntington; Harvard political scientist, Trilateral Commissioner, and author of the TLC Report, The Crisis of Democracy. Huntington wrote:

“Once he is elected... the president’s electoral coalition has... served its purpose. The day after his election the size of his majority is almost... entirely irrelevant to his ability to govern... The governing coalition need have little relation to the electoral coalition.”

To seek “quick successes to regain momentum” Carter bit one of the hands that fed him, the oil industry; and his attack on Big Oil and Gas merely rebounded to his further discredit. But the thing that really labeled Carter’s Energy Program for what it really is, was the forced resignation of D. Vance McKelvey, Director of the U.S. Geological Survey. McKelvey gave a non-political talk that made liars out of Carter and his energy team. In a speech to a national energy forum in Boston on June 13, McKelvey refuted the notion that the U.S. is rapidly running out of energy. He said there are vast amounts of hydrocarbons sealed away in forms not presently recoverable economically, such as gas in tight formations in the Rocky Mountains, gas in black shales in the Eastern U.S., and gas occluded in coal beds throughout the country. In addition, there are vast reserves of natural gas in the geopressurized zones of the Gulf Coast region, both on and off shore (estimates of as much as 60,000 to 80,000 trillion cubic feet of natural gas available, a three hundred year supply at the present rate of consumption).

When word got back to the White House that Geologist McKelvey had shown how Carter had lied and misled the people, McKelvey was told to resign.

Now Brezhnev of the USSR has taken advantage of Carter’s search “for quick successes to regain momentum” by suggesting that all Nations declare a ban on the building of nuclear weapons, and on the production of plutonium and other materials that might be used to create nuclear missiles. Forgetting that it was the father of modern communism, Lenin himself, who said that treaties are made to be broken, and that promises are to be kept only so long as it is advantageous to keep them, the Carter administration are taking Brezhnev’s offer as the great breakthrough for which they have been waiting, and that Brezhnev can be trusted to stop breaking treaties and promises—even when violations of the Helsinki agreement are staring them in the face.

The truth of the matter is: the Soviets have built more than 5,000 cruise missiles of all types during the past 25 years and have several thousand now deployed and operational. We have better missiles, but they are mostly on the drawing board, have not been deployed by the military services; this according to the Strategic Studies Center of the Stanford Research Institute. This study which is currently being circulated among members of the Senate and House Armed Services Committees, indicates that if a moratorium on nuclear weapons were in effect today, the USSR would have superiority over the US. In addition, the US is in the process of developing a nuclear weapon that can kill without destroying buildings, a most effective weapon in case of war in Europe, for example. Obviously, the USSR would like to halt the production of such a weapon. So, Brezhnev suggests a moratorium, and the Carter administration welcomes the extended hand (while the other holds a dagger) and looks upon this development as the possible answer to that search “for quick successes to regain momentum.”

This is thermonuclear blackmail, of course. Unlike many conservatives, this reporter has little fear of the Soviets using nuclear weapons to conquer the United States. If they can get our own government to give them the Panama Canal and thus make it impossible to transport Alaskan oil to the Eastern Seaboard via the canal, why should they resort to the use of the military? If they can induce our government to destroy South Africa and thus make it possible for the USSR to block oil shipments from the Middle East to Europe and the United States, why should they resort to arms? However, to be able to boast of military superiority, that can lead to most advantageous blackmail on the part of the government of the USSR.

There is a Soviet plan to force the surrender of the United States, not necessarily to the Soviet Union, but to International Socialism. And that Soviet plan might be expressed by the formula: “External Encirclement, Plus Internal Demoralization, Plus Thermonuclear Blackmail Leads to Progressive Surrender.”

This plan does not contemplate thermonuclear war, but it does rely heavily on thermonuclear blackmail; and President Carter is taking the bait in the Soviet trap. As Secretary of State Cyrus Vance told the media: “The proposal he (Brezhnev) made is in the direction of what we have been talking about for several months..." Next step: a new SALT treaty to come out of the recently resumed negotiations in Geneva.

MORE ABOUT TREATIES

In our Report #40, 10/14/77, we wrote of the President's signing of two human rights covenants on October 6th. Due to personal and staff difficulties at that time, we were not able to analyze the covenants in detail. But according to Alice Widener, publisher of U.S.A. Magazine: "As finally drafted in 1966, the United Nations Covenants signed by President Carter authorize the expropriation or nationalization of any private property considered as 'necessary or desirable' by any Member State of the United Nations. This amounts to U.N. sanction of the right of theft of property, a fact that has been repeatedly pointed out by U.S. delegates to the U.N., by all administrations previous to the Carter Administration since 1948, when the U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted."

Another report reaching us adds: "Called the Covenants in Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Civil and Political Rights, they are legally treaties that violate the 5th and 14th Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. And remember, the U.S. is the only nation to recognize treaties as the 'supreme law of the land.'

"These covenants also allow member nations to confiscate, without payment, any foreign investment, thus putting the U.N. stamp of approval upon the theft of any of our properties abroad. Ratification of these covenant/treaties strengthen the Socialist and Third World forces who are out to destroy the most precious of our human rights, the right to private ownership of property.

"Strangely, our president does not recognize this right and by his actions on Oct. 6 in signing and bragging about these 'human rights covenants,' has only confirmed last year's statement of HUD's Secretary Carla Hills, that the 'social theory of property' is already the national policy of the United States." (unquote)

Of course, both of these covenants require Senate ratification and under ordinary circumstances the Senate wouldn't dare to ratify them. The Senate has rejected them for the past 29 years. However, Alice Widener warns that "there is some talk on Capitol Hill that because the Senate is balking at quick ratification of the Panama Canal treaties, there might be an effort by some Senatorial supporters of the Carter Administration to win quick ratification of the United Nations Covenants in order to shore up Presidential prestige and pacify the Administration." Or, to look upon these covenants as "quick successes to regain momentum" for the failing Carter administration.

In that same Report in which we first wrote of Carter's signing of the Human Rights Covenants, we also wrote that: "A treaty, declaration, covenant or convention all have one thing in common: they supersede the Constitution and become the law of the land the moment they are ratified by the United States Senate." Then, however, we should have added that this is true only if the treaty, et al, conform to and are in harmony with the United States Constitution. Later in the Report we stated that "So far as we know, there has never been any legal adjudication of this touchy point in treaty law-making." And here we were dead wrong, as a number of constitutional authorities have pointed out to us. Here is a condensation taken from the letters we received on the subject:

* * * * *

The U.S. Supreme Court, in Reid v. Covert, October, 1956, stated: "This Court has regularly and uniformly recognized the supremacy of the Constitution over a treaty." The court cited Marbury v. Madison (1803) which held that "The United States is entirely a creature of the Constitution. Its power and authority have no other source. It can only act in accordance with all the limitations imposed by the Constitution."

The Court (1956) added that: "...No agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or any other branch of government which is free from restraints of the Constitution. Article VI, the Supremacy clause of the Constitution declares, 'This Constitution and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land...' There is nothing in this language which intimates that treaties and laws enacted pursuant to them do not have to comply with the provisions of the Constitution. Nor is there anything in the debates which accompanied the drafting and ratification which even suggests such a result... It would be manifestly contrary to the objectives of those who created the Constitution, as well as those who were responsible for the Bill of Rights—let alone alien to our entire constitutional history and tradition—to construe Article VI as permitting the United States to exercise power under an international agreement without observing constitutional prohibitions.” (emphasis was added).

More recently the U.S. State Department contended that the United States was obliged by the United Nations to close down the Rhodesian Information Office. Senator Harry F. Byrd of Virginia denounced the administration's support of the UN resolution as demonstrating “a dangerous lack of concern for the very principles upon which this nation was founded.” The issue was challenged in the U.S. District Court by Rep. Charles C. Diggs of Michigan. And on June 19, 1972, the District Court ruled that:

“The proposition that the United States has somehow surrendered its sovereignty to the United Nations is soundly rejected.” The Court added: “Congress has the Constitutional authority to abrogate in whole or in part the treaty obligations of the United States.”

On October 31, 1972, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld the lower court's ruling with the comment; “It is settled constitutional doctrine that Congress may nullify in whole or in part a treaty commitment.” Finally, on April 16, 1973, the United States Supreme Court let stand the rulings of both lower courts.

If we contrast the foregoing Court decisions with what is actually termed “law” in our country today, there is one obvious conclusion: Unless actually challenged in a Federal Court, any treaty, agreement, convention or covenant is assumed to be, and is acted upon by the executive branch of the government as being “the law of the land.” Such action is unconstitutional and hence unlawful and illegal, but is assumed to be binding upon all judges, unless challenged and shown to be otherwise.

How did we get into such a “lawful” mess? Well, back around the turn of the century, an Under Secretary of State, J. Reuben Clark Jr., gave an excellent explanation. One of this country's truly great Secretaries of State, Philander Chase Knox (1853-1921), called Reuben Clark “one of the greatest legal minds in the country.” Here is Clark's explanation of how treaties can be accepted as “domestic law,” and how executive orders, bureaucratic rules and regulations, IRS assessments and seizures of property, and other forms of “administrative law” have come to be accepted as the “law of the land” although they are all unconstitutional:

“In the first place, I think the legal profession must assume a great, if not indeed the major, part of the responsibility. The approach of the alien influences was gradual; the full meaning of the plan was not at first perceived. Accustomed to dealing with legislative and quasi-legislative enactments that, by design, were to fall within the Constitution, the lawyers so treated these new enactments and sought ways of constitutionally justifying the usurping enactments, rather than attacking them as unconstitutional. Then the enactments began in the midst of a great depression, and the lawyers were inclined to wink at usurpations in hope that somehow they would pull us out of our troubles. This feeling was encouraged by the easing up in enforcement procedures or the writing of a new prescription whenever popular outcry became too threatening. Then as time went on and the plan developed, the lawyers became fearful of governmental retaliation if the enactments were contested. Finally, they seem to have given up the fight and to take as constitutional every law, every ‘directive’ or other enactment that appears. They have advised their clients to bow their heads and bend their backs to every imposition that came.

“This attitude of the lawyers was aided by the plans of the perverters of our institutions who, so authentic reports say, aimed to keep these directives and other enactments out of courts because they thoroughly understood the principle of our jurisprudence that laws and their implementing regulations are enforced as constitutional until they are declared otherwise. Therefore, so long as these enactments could escape adverse judicial action, they could be enforced. In effect, the lawyers and the perverters worked together just as harmoniously and effectively as if they had reached an understanding thereto.”

LEARNING TO LIVE WITH TERRORISM

EPIDEMIC AND GROWING

Terrorism is on the increase on a worldwide scale. Political assassinations, kidnappings for political blackmail or for profit or for both, hijackings and skyjackings, bombings, takeovers of public and business buildings, murders by individuals just to satisfy some personal frustration ("Sam told me to do this," mugging, rapings, arson—all these criminal and terroristic activities are on the increase. Here in the United States, terrorist and revolutionary bombings are now said to be occurring at the rate of at least 2,000 per year. Many of the crimes, such as the bombing of La Guardia Airport, have never been solved. The Hanafi Muslim capture of more than a hundred hostages in the nation's capitol and the consequent killing of a reporter, the FALN bombing of Fraunces Tavern in New York City, the bombings of public and business buildings always make the headlines. The kidnaping and entombment of a busload of school children caused shockwaves across the nation.

Other terrorist activities may receive little publicity. For example, Huey P. Newton, founder and leader of the Black Panthers, was finally being tried for murder and the armed march on the California Capitol at Sacramento eleven years ago. A woman who resides in Oakland was to be a chief witness for the prosecution. Now the Black Panthers are supposed to be non-violent do-gooders; they say they have reformed and are peace-loving. But:

At about 5:15 a.m. on Sunday, October 24, 1977, Mrs. Mary Matthew, a 56-year-old self-employed bookkeeper, was awakened by the sound of someone trying to force open her front door. She telephoned police and took out her .38 revolver when she also heard sounds of someone at her back door. As the door was being forced, Mrs. Matthew fired her revolver, hitting one of the intruders. His accomplices then opened fire with shotgun blasts and automatic rifles, spraying her kitchen with bullets. Mrs. Matthew continued to fire her revolver at her assailants, preventing them from breaking into her house and saving her life. When the police arrived one Black Panther was dead, another had a bullet wound in his hand (or should we say paw, since he, too, was a member of the Black Panther Party?)

The irony of the situation: this was a Black Panther assassination squad out to murder the key witness against Huey Newton; but Mrs. Matthew was not the witness; the terrorists had attacked the wrong house.

An important sidelight: After the Black Panther Party had, allegedly, reformed and become nothing more than a social action organization, preparations were made for the return of the "reformed" Huey Newton to the United States to stand trial for his previous terrorist activities. Preparations for his return commenced with the filing of a federal lawsuit in December 1976 by the National Lawyers Guild on behalf of the Black Panthers, charging the government with "invasion of their privacy" etc. The BPP also set up the Committee for Justice for Huey P. Newton and the Black Panther Party. A committee pamphlet asserts that "contributions of $25 or more may be tax-deductible." Two other organizations joined in to help: the Center for National Security Studies and the Campaign to Stop Government Spying. A joint appeal issued by these two outfits and signed jointly by Congressman Ronald V. Dellums (D-CA) and Morton H. Halperin, says: "We are personally asking you to support this crucial case with whatever resources you have. These activities must be exposed and this lawsuit won so that we may protect the rights of all of us."

Sponsors of this Committee for Justice for Huey P. Newton include: Ralph Abernathy, Fr. Daniel Berrigan, Julian Bond, Malcolm Boyd, Ramsel Clark, Rep. William Clay (D-MO), Harvey Cox, Rep. Charles Diggs (D-Mich), Daniel Ellsberg, Jane Fonda, Rep. Charles Rangel (D.NY), Pete Seeger, Dr. Benjamin Spock, Rep. Fortney Stark (D-CA), I.F. Stone, etc.

So, some eleven years after the armed Black

Panthers marched into the California Capitol in Sacramento, the BPP continues to encourage—and engage in—violence against businesses and law enforcement officials under the guise of “armed self-defense” against the government of the United States.

In addition to the BPP, there are many other well organized terrorist organizations operating in the United States. To name some of them: Afro-American Liberation Army, Americans for Justice, Black Guerrilla Family, Black Liberation Army, New World Liberation Front, Red Guerrilla Family, Weathermen, and dozens of others.

During the past few years, especially in Europe, South America and the Middle East, terrorists have resorted to kidnappings and hijackings, and these now pose a danger to the United States as well. Unfortunately our defenses are down. Forces such as the National Lawyers Guild, the Committee for Justice, the Center for National Security Studies, the Campaign to Stop Government Spying, and others of similar ilk have been hard at work attacking federal intelligence agencies, congressional investigating committees, state and local police departments. Files on subversives have been destroyed, there is no longer any adequate official defense against terrorists and terrorism.

As a result, the private sector must find ways of defending itself, since the government has been persuaded to make impotent all its previous security agencies. Great secrecy surrounds this subject, but we are of the opinion that the following information is authentic.

Large firms are spending millions to protect their managers and important executives. Bodyguards and armed escorts are being employed. Travel plans of executives are treated as top secret information. Bullet-proof limousines are being purchased as fast as they can be delivered. Company chauffeurs are being given special training in defensive driving. Ransom insurance is being taken out on important people, at very heavy premiums. Lloyds of London offers kidnap coverage, and premiums up to a million dollars a year are being paid. It is estimated that as much as $7 billion yearly is being spent by business firms to protect key people. This, of course, means higher business expense, which is passed on to the consumer through higher prices.

Especially vulnerable are nuclear and armament plants. Example: a pipe bomb was exploded at 3:22 a.m. on October 10, 1977, outside the visitor center of the Trojan nuclear power plant at Ranier, Oregon, some forty miles northwest of Portland. A man called a Portland radio station, KPAM-FM, directing reporters to a “communique” that was hidden in the men’s room of the Portland Greyhound Bus Station. The “communique” was terse, contained two misspelled words, and began:

“On today, the tenth anniversary of the death of Ernesto Che Guevarra, who fell in S.E. Bolivia fighting the United States imperialists and their Bolivian lackies—the Environmental Assault Unit (EAU) of the New World Liberation Front (NWLFF) attacked the Trojan nuclear power plant.

“Along with the attack we are forwarding two demands. 1) Environmental Demand: The NWLFF demands an end to the construction and operation of nuclear power plants in the United States.... 2) Socio-Economic Demand: The NWLFF demands that all people that are forced to exist on a fixed income (Social Security, welfare, etc.) be supplied electricity, free of charge. Further action and communiques will follow....”

A small thing in itself, this threat; but the NWLFF is affiliated with scores of similar terrorist groups, and this “communique” might be looked upon as a harbinger of evil activities yet to come.

Perhaps we should point out that there are two types of terrorism. First, there is “personal terrorism.” This occurs when an individual becomes so frustrated with his situation, or imagines himself to be so frustrated, that he can’t see his way out of it. He may turn to suicide, or he may decide to kill his family first; or he may take his rifle, go to the top of a tall building and start shooting at everyone who comes within his rifle’s sight and range, while waiting for police officers to arrive and shoot him dead. In “personal terrorism” if the revenge motive is present, burnings and bombings may occur; or a fast car may be used as a projectile.

But it is the second type of terrorism with which we are most concerned in this discussion. This involves terrorism brought about by organized groups of people who have joined together to seek a common end. The “permissive society syndrome” causes much unrest among young people, and they often turn to anarchism or religious cultism with drugs aiding and abetting their conversion to terrorist activism. Whenever Marxian principles are introduced, terrorist groups increase. Such groups are usually convinced that they cannot find "justice" in any other way, so they automatically turn to the principle taught by Mao Tse-tung, Castro and Che Guevara: Create a rebellion and use whatever violence is necessary to achieve your ends.

Francis B. Watson, in his book Political Terrorism: The Threat and the Response, describes this kind of terrorism:

* * * * *

Whatever the circumstances, and whatever the country, terrorists function from a group base, not as individuals. They have gathered themselves together to seek political change which they believe cannot be effected through totally legal or ethical methods as accepted in the existing authority system. They have come together around a political objective for which they are willing to sacrifice all else. They will have devised a strategy for attaining this objective. They will have selected and trained themselves in tactics with which to follow this strategy. And, at every step of the way, they will have had occasion to rationalize, even among themselves, the objectives they are pursuing and the means they have chosen for doing so. Thus, they will have produced a body of interrelated arguments which they believe will support their activities. It is from these that they will conduct propaganda. And, however unrealistic their political objectives may at times seem, or however bizarre their actions, the thrashing-out processes through which their propaganda has passed will produce a recognizable pattern and order...the political terrorist cannot be understood or dealt with in terms of perceived personality disorders. He may or may not have them, but as a member of a terrorist group these are not the determinants of his behavior—group directions are. The concentration on the personal history or characteristics of the members of a terrorist group will usually not only fail to provide explanations for acts already committed, but will cause us to miss clues as to what they will do next. In fact, it is not uncommon at all for individuals to make a complete about face in personal behavior after joining a terrorist group. One need only look at Patricia Hearst as such a case. It is simply that the terrorist recruit submerges his or her personality and submits to group discipline. We need to look at the patterns of the group's behavior, not the individual's, in order to understand terrorism.

* * * * *

In his book, Living With Terrorism, Major General Richard Clutterbuck, a British army officer who is an acknowledged authority on guerrillas and political terrorism, was prophetic when he wrote, in 1975:

Terrorism is almost sure to increase. It will increase primarily because, in the short term, it seems to pay; political blackmail gets results: convicted terrorists are released, huge ransoms are paid, and publicity, on a scale unimaginable before the television age, is acquired free.

"It will increase, secondly, because industrial society becomes more vulnerable every day. Fifty years ago, a power stoppage would have been little more than a nuisance. Today it can cause immediate unemployment and the loss of millions of pounds worth of the community's production and reserves, and of the goods which it exports to earn its living. It can deprive the community of food, warmth, water and drainage and quickly reduce it to chaos and disease. In cold weather people die. Public transport is just as vulnerable....

"Terrorism will also increase because terrorists can travel more and more easily. As their funds are built up, by ransoms and robberies...air fares will worry them no more than bus fares worried an anarchist in the 1880s...Terrorist ideas travel even more easily than the terrorists themselves. Their underlying politics—not initially violent, but carrying the seeds of violence—are disseminated in student meetings and cells in universities all over the world. Ample funds again, provide for the printing and circulation of their writings on a massive scale; for the financing of radio stations and for the provision of transistor radios with which to receive their broadcasts (this tactic is especially useful to terrorists today in Rhodesia and South Africa—Ed.)... Also, violence is news, so 'armed propaganda'—the staging of incidents which will attract the attention of the media—gives free and vivid publicity to the terrorists, and brings their actions and ideas to the attention of an audience so vast that, even if the overwhelming majority reject them, the tiny proportion in whom they may strike a chord of sympathy amounts to a lot of people all over the world.

"As well as receiving support from foreign governments (Red China, Cuba, etc.), terrorist groups as they get both richer and better informed, cooperate increasingly with each other. An IRA or Palestinian terrorist wanting to mount an operation to blow up the Tower of London or to shoot down aircraft taking off from London Airport can, through a normal screen of cut-off men, quickly make contact with groups in Britain which will provide him (if he needs them) with guns, ammunition, explosives, material for fuse mechanisms, stolen cars, false number plates, guides, telephone facilities, logistical support and—above all—a 'safe house' from which to mount his operations." (End of extended quotation from "Living With Terror," by Richard Clutterbuck. Arlington House Publishers, New Rochelle, N.Y. Copyright 1975. 160 pages, library edition, $7.95).

CRIMINAL VIOLENCE

In addition to the terrorism that can be caused by an individual "gone berserk," and the mass terrorism that can be created by organized groups, there is a third kind of terror that is closer to home—or even in the home—with the majority of law-abiding citizens. This is the terror and violence that is associated with armed robberies, rapings, muggings, murders, and loss of property that is caused by the ever-increasing criminal element within our society. Recently, ex-diplomat and current conservative columnist Henry J. Taylor devoted his column to this phase of terrorism. We quote:

The latest Federal Bureau of Investigation reveals that about 90 per cent of all crimes go unpunished. There are at least two million full-time criminals in our country. Yet, we live under a dangerous code in which the rights of criminals are more important than the rights of the sufferers.

"Highly specialized" pickpockets are now making about $15,000 a year. Burglars steal about $300 million; embezzlers take $300 million; rail and cargo thieves $1.5 billion. Violence is endemic and has become epidemic in our great country. We see an elevation in the prestige of violence.

The laws are inadequate. The forces for law and order are even more inadequate. Of 500 offenders involved in police killings, nearly 80 per cent have been previously arrested. Nearly 60 per cent have been previously convicted. Two-thirds of the police killers have been on parole or probation. Three out of ten were on parole when they killed a police officer. Obviously, our court system is a ghastly joke. With postponements, appeals, etc., it now takes about seven years to convict a wrongdoer.

Seventeen major offenses make up the bulk of criminal acts. In every single one of the seventeen the conviction rate has declined, dismissals before trial have increased, and there is a drop in the percentage of defendants pleading guilty. With the crime rate increasing five times as fast as the population, arrests increased only four per cent and convictions actually decreased eight per cent.

...One in every six teenagers will be in trouble with the law before he or she is 18. About 40 per cent of all serious crimes—repeat, serious crimes—involve boys and girls 18 or under. One quarter of all arrests involve those under 15....

We Americans must repudiate the sick sentimentality that condones criminality as "society's fault." This is a false reading of human nature. At the same time we must subscribe to Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes' famous dictum: "Justice delayed is justice denied."

One of the fundamental goals of life is the control of one's own security—where you live, where you work, where you and your family walk—anywhere. The politicians did not make law and order the issue that it is. The people did. And it's high time the people prevailed.

Three types of terrorism: Terrorism created by the individual terrorist, by the terrorist organization, and by the two million full-time criminals in our country. There is a very definite connection between these three types. The teenage criminals are prepared grist for the mills of the organized terrorist gangs; at odds with society, they seek companionship in their rebellion. And we recall that subversive forces, years ago, launched a program to empty the prisons in America, because the freed criminals would be ready-trained front-line combatants in the war to destroy representative government, free enterprise, the Christian family, and the Christian American way of life.

We can live with terrorism and ultimately defeat it if we remember and act upon the words that cause us to remember Patrick Henry.

THE POWER BROKERS WHO GOVERN OUR GOVERNMENT

THE 'INVISIBLE' GOVERNMENT IS BECOMING VISIBLE

People are asking questions because:

1) Day after day we are being told that there is an energy crisis. However, the statements of experts who can speak without fear of reprisal seem to agree that there is no such crisis. Nevertheless, we must lower our standard of living (they call it changing our lifestyle) and exist as though there really is an energy crisis, even when we suspect that this is nothing more than just another gimmick to raise more taxes for the government. 2) More and more of the employers' capital and the employees' paychecks are going into the government's withholding tax funnel. 3) The cost of goods and services continues to skyrocket and there seems no end to the inflationary spiral. 4) Fewer and fewer citizens are paying more and more of their incomes in taxes, while more and more people are being supported by the government. 5) Despite the exorbitant price we are paying for "peace and security," we seem to have neither. There is American involvement in the Middle East, in Korea, in Europe and in Africa, and each of these areas of involvement could turn into military involvement. Meanwhile here at home, the government seems determined not to stop the crime and terrorism that continues to mount.

These are a few of the reasons why people are asking questions. But few will accept the basic answer: that we have lost control of our representatives in Washington and in our State Capitols, that we have permitted a new kind of Regional Government to be installed in our Nation, that a Power Elite has taken over our government and we are becoming a part of a world government that is "evolving along functional rather than territorial lines."

That may be a difficult statement to digest in one reading. Back in the 19th Century Benjamin Disraeli, British Prime Minister, said it more simply: "The world is governed by very different personages from what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes." But in this age of instant communication and controlled media, a little more has been revealed regarding those "different personages" who govern the world. Marcus G. Raskin, co-director of the Institute for Policy Studies, wrote in a column on the editorial page of The New York Times that "Command power wielded within a constitutional framework is understood by a President to mean the limits placed on him by representatives of independent power, the 'barons'—men who control or manage the banks, insurance companies, armed forces, large industrial corporations, bureaucracies, and labor unions. The barons... expect the President to provide the kind of broker's leadership that will maintain an empire abroad and order among the economic classes at home. (Emphasis added).

So, there you have it: The President is hand picked to represent the Power Elite, the Bilderbergers, the Trilateral Commissioners and the selected members of the Council on Foreign Relations and similar "Establishmentarian" organizations; and a comfortable majority of our elected representatives are wined and dined, bought or blackmailed, courted or coerced into doing the bidding—or at least to refrain from openly opposing—the Power Brokers.

How did this political (and now economic) enslavement come about? Let's look at the record, which has been hidden from the bulk of the population for nearly a century.

On May 29, 1977, in Kansas City, Missouri, the National Justice Foundation returned an indictment calling for the impeachment and recall of the 104 representatives who signed the "Declaration of Interdependence" which was published on January 30, 1976 in Philadelphia. As a part of those proceedings at Kansas City, on May 28, 1977, Norman Dodd appeared and said, in part:

"My background includes my acceptance of a responsibility for a... Special Committee of the House of Representatives. This was in 1953. The purpose of the committee was to carry out the terms of a Congressional Resolution which asked five members of the Congress to investigate tax-exempt foundations for the purpose of answering this question:

“‘Could their activities and could their tax exemptions be gained in the event that their grants were deemed to be un-American — (without defining what Un-American meant)?’

“In that position, as the Director of this operation, I gathered experiences which were then without parallel, and they exceeded my imagination. By the Chairman of this committee I was asked point-blank if I would conduct this investigation for the purpose of disclosing what he considered to be a fact, namely, that this country had been the victim of a conspiracy. I consented to do it. In going in that direction, I had occasion to write a letter to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.... So I found myself in their office on a Saturday morning in the presence of Dr. (Joseph) Johnson, two vice-presidents and their own counsel, a member of the law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell in New York. Dr. Johnson said: ... If I would select a member from my staff, send that member to New York, they would provide the member with a room in the library and all of the minute books of this endowment from its inception.

“My first reaction was they’d lost their minds. Then I realized that all of these men were in the position they were in relatively recently. Dr. Johnson, who was Alger Hiss’s successor, moved in from the State Department; the two vice presidents looked younger and the counsel ... was a relatively young man. Then I made up my mind that none of them had ever read the minutes themselves. I had an inkling in my own mind as to what these minutes would contain, so I accepted the invitation. A member of my staff spent two weeks in New York going over these minutes. Now, that member was a girl... she took with her dictaphone belts to eliminate the necessity of copying, and she brought these belts back to me, and on those belts were what I shall now recite to you.

“We are roughly in 1908 when this endowment came into being, and the trustees had their first meeting. They are very prominent individuals in three fields in New York City — finance, law, and education. And they raise at this meeting a very specific question, and it is as follows:

“‘Is there any means known to man more effective than war, assuming you wish to alter the life of an entire people?’

“They discussed this in a very scholarly and academic fashion for a year. And they came to the conclusion that war is the most effective means known to man, assuming you wish to alter the life of an entire people.

“Then they raised question number 2. We are now in 1909. Question number 2 is as follows: ‘How do we involve the United States in a war?’ ... And that raises question number 3, which is: ‘How do we do it?’ The answer to that comes up: ‘We must control the State Department.’

“That caught up with the findings we arrived at from another direction, namely: That no high appointment in the State Department takes effect unless it is cleared through an entity about which the American people know very little. It’s called the ‘Council of Learned Societies.’ And here we have the tie-in: this Council was set up by the Carnegie Endowment....

“We’re in a war and the trustees meet in 1916... to congratulate themselves on the wisdom and the effectiveness of their original decision because the impact of war on the life of the people of this country promises a change... they sent a message to President Wilson, the subject of which was cautioning him to see the war did not end too quickly. The war ended; they then turned their attention to what they referred to as ‘preventing a reversion in this country to what life was prior to 1914,’ and they hit upon the answer to that as: ‘We must control education.’ They realized that that is a pretty big order so they solicited the assistance of the Rockefeller Foundation in that task....

“Now, this sets the stage to justify what I’d love to have you understand, namely, this foundation world is a network. It has a central clearing house, known as the Russell Sage Foundation, and all endowed foundations that come into being get their policy from the Russell Sage Foundation, so that the whole thing is a centralization of the already-developed wealth in private hands for a specific purpose.... The ultimate product that has emanated from this network is entitled ‘A Declaration of Interdependence.’ (End of extended quotation from address by Norman Dodd, Reproduced by permission of the National Justice Foundation, 1977).”

Now, let’s refer back to the end of that first world war in which our country become involved because it was the most effective means of altering the life of an entire people, according to Dr. Dodd’s testimony, which history corroborates. Another aim of those who involved us in that war was to establish a World Government by way of the League of Nations Covenant, which was made a part of the peace treaty ending that war. But the United States Senate refused to ratify that peace treaty with its Covenant, so the conspirators were forced to adopt new methods for the achievement of this goal.

That's why the foundation-supported Council of Foreign Relations came into being. Col. Edward House convened a meeting of the men that mattered in America and Britain at a Parisian hotel in 1919. The participants agreed to form private councils dedicated to "the study of international affairs." The American council came to be called the Council on Foreign Relations, and was to draw its financial support from the Rockefeller, Carnegie and Ford Foundations. Later multinational corporations also were to give financial support to the CFR.

It was the CFR which arranged our entry into World War II, arranged post-war settlements which were to change the face of the globe called earth, and with the aid of the Communist leaders of Russia, set up another model world government to be known as the United Nations. CFR member Alger Hiss helped write the Charter, CFR member Leo Pasvolosky induced the Senate to accept it, CFR member John Rockefeller provided the land so the UN could be headquartered in the United States.

The aim of the CFR was to dominate foreign policy formulation. It succeeded: practically every Secretary of State, Deputy Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Deputy Secretary of Defense, Secretary of the Treasury, Director of Central Intelligence and National Security Adviser since the Eisenhower Administration has been a member of the Council on Foreign Relations. Of the 1,725 current members of the CFR, the Christian Science Monitor reported that almost half of them "have been invited to assume official government positions or to act as consultants."

The power brokers who worked through the CFR and its satellite organizations soon began to realize that the UN, all alone and by itself, was not going to 'get the job done' for them. This was especially true when the decolonization program began loading the General Assembly with mini-states each of which commanded the same voting power as the United States. Moreover, as corporations became more and more multinational, the accent was less on political policy and more and more on economic and financial policy. The power brokers began to think less about a World Government organized along territorial lines (as the United Nations implied) and more and more about a World Government organized along functional lines.

In short, an organization composed of international leaders, as opposed to the national leaders who made up the UN, seemed very important and very necessary. This led to the creation of the Bilderberg Group.

Very briefly: Joseph Retinger, a Polish politico, was the Col. House of Europe in the 1940s, and Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands was as Woodrow Wilson of the 1910s. Retinger sought alliances and institutions, and he found plenty of assistance from the CFR; so much assistance that soon the Rockefellers dominated the Bilderberg Group, just as they dominated the CFR.

Meanwhile, a new economic force was fast developing in the shape of the revitalized and highly industrialized Japan. Up to this point in time the Bilderbergers had not reckoned with the industrial and financial power of Japan; and Henry Kissinger had left that Nation out in limbo when he opened Red China to the West and created his Trilateral Constellation—which also left Western Europe out of proper economic and financial consideration. So once again some changes were called for.

We are told on good authority that at the Bilderberg meeting in 1972 Michael Blumenthal suggested that a new organization of power brokers was needed, one that would include the bankers and industrial leaders of Japan, and provide more recognition to the International Bankers and Industrial Cartelists of Western Europe. As with the CFR and Bilderberg Group, David Rockefeller took charge. In 1973 he and his agent Brzezinski presided over the birth of the Trilateral Commission and the next President of the United States had already been selected. He would be a Southern peanut farmer who, in the words of Marcus Raskin, understands "the limits placed on him by representatives of independent power, the barons who control or manage the banks, insurance companies, armed forces, large industrial corporations, bureaucracies, and labor unions." And these "barons expect the President to provide the kind of broker's leadership that will maintain an empire abroad and order among the economic classes at home."

And that, dear reader, is how we lost our Republic and are forced to settle for a Corporate State within a Socialist World Government. For the names of some of these power brokers, please turn the page.

THEY STILL CRY PEACE WHEN THERE IS NO PEACE

A GREAT PUBLICITY STUNT

When Sadat of Egypt flew to Tel Aviv to shake hands with Begin of Israel, the whole world seemed to stand still. Politicians looked upon the universally televised event as a "great breakthrough." Fundamentalist Christians were told by their pastors that the event was a fulfillment of prophecy. Zionists looked upon it as a "divide and conquer" tactic which would permit them to hang onto the west banks of the Jordan, to Golan Heights, and to the Gaza Strip without the necessity of another immediate war. The displaced Palestinians looked upon it as an act of treason. Leaders of oil-rich Arabian lands were still trying to decide how to appraise the event. And Trilateralists were breathing a sigh of relief.

Brushing aside all the false hopes and the great expectations that the event brought about, we are left with the fact that this was a publicity stunt of ultimate magnitude. People who never knew how to spell Anwar Sadat's name, or how to pronounce Menahem Begin's name, or which name was connected with what country, suddenly were given an eye-witness view of the workings of international politics, together with the pomp and circumstance that traditionally surround such extravaganzas. But as to actual accomplishment in the diplomatic, political or military areas, nothing really happened! It was a great show, and little more. James McCartney of the Knight Newspaper Chain spelled it out in a news analysis that was surprisingly objective. He wrote, and the Miami Herald published on the morning of Tuesday, November 22, 1977:

"Jerusalem—The exchanges here between Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin highlighted once again how deeply divided the Arabs and Israel are on basic issues. And no one is claiming, despite the euphoria that has swept this country because of Sadat's visit, that these differences have been resolved, or even that progress has been made in resolving them. Sadat is still demanding total Israeli withdrawal from all the territories occupied by Israel in that June, 1967 war. He said he really shouldn't even have to bring up the issue, but it is obvious, as he put it, that 'no peace could be built on the occupation of the land of others.'

"'To speak frankly,' he said in his speech to the Knesset Sunday, 'our land does not yield itself to bargaining.'

"'But the frank fact is that the Israelis are not about to withdraw from all of these territories. The Begin government is prepared to withdraw from most of the Sinai Desert and to make major withdrawals on the Golan Heights, but it is not prepared to give up effective control over the West Bank of the Jordan, and there is no sign at all of a change in this basic position.

"'Sadat also is still demanding a Palestinian state. The Begin government is categorically opposed to a Palestinian state. Sadat said in the Knesset that the Palestinian issue was the 'crux' of the problem in the Middle East, but Begin did not so much as mention the word 'Palestinian' in his response.

"'In a news conference Monday, Begin said 'we have proposals to solve the issue,' but he did not indicate what they are.

"'As far as can be determined, the Israelis continue to believe, as they have for a long time, that a 'Palestinian state' could somehow be established with a confederation between neighboring Jordan and the Arab communities on the West Bank. If there is a basis for a negotiated solution to this problem. It has not yet surfaced.

"'In discussing withdrawals, Sadat also raised an issue that may be the most difficult of all—the future of Jerusalem. He insisted, once again, that the Israelis will have to give up occupation of Arab Jerusalem, about a third of the city. The Israelis in the 10 years since the 1967 war have encircled Arab Jerusalem with vast housing developments and apartments. Government officials have repeatedly said that it will never be surrendered. And Begin, when he mentioned Jerusalem in his speech to the Knesset Sunday, gave the impression that he expected the city to be Israel's capital forever.

"In short, the tough issues are still unresolved, and the immediate question is whether a Geneva conference on the Middle East can reopen...." (End of extensive quotation from Miami Herald.)

A CANADIAN LOOKS AT REGIONAL GOVERNANCE IN THE UNITED STATES

Ann Watson is a commentator on Canadian Cable-Television Channel 2, Toronto. She also writes a column entitled "The News That Is Left Out." When Mrs. Billie Bowles of Walnut Creek, California appeared as a guest on "The Ann Watson Report," they talked about Regional Governance, Mrs. Bowles being a student of that subject. As a result of that TV discussion, Ann Watson wrote a special article which appeared in the independent Canadian monthly, "Speak Up," (P.O.Box 272, Station B, Toronto, Ontario M5T, 2W2, Canada.) We reprint that article as it appeared in "Speak Up":

Behind closed doors, far away from the eyes of the American public, never explained or admitted by the press and television media, a revolution is taking place. We are now experiencing Federal Regionalism in every state, every city, every corner of the United States.

Federal Regionalism is a revolution that is developing 'behind the scenes'—designed to bring totalitarian rule to the United States. Those who have paid close attention to what is happening have witnessed the transfer of constitutional powers from elected officials into the hands of planners, appointed agents not responsive to the people. Those who have paid close attention are fully aware of the objectives of the planners, who are changing our Constitution. The arrogance of these Regional Revolutionaries is beyond belief. They tell us again and again that they know "what is good for us," and that they are making all these changes for the betterment of society.

Karl Marx was a devoted student of Hegelian principles of change. The famous German philosopher was used by Marx and all the social planners that came after him to bring about changes in a three-step process — Thesis, Antithesis and Synthesis. If you read Karl Marx in the original German text you will find that the concept of regionalism fits perfectly into the old scheme which is Now comes what we consider to be a more important question: If the Sadat-Begin confrontation produced no visible results in the political, military and territorial spheres of action; could there not have been a hidden, "behind-the-scenes" objective to be gained through a Sadat-Begin meeting, and was that objective achieved? The answer to this question has to do with money, oil, and economic power. And, in an international sense, Israel and Egypt were but pawns in the game.

now applied in America. The theory is very simple: in order to arrive at a pre-conceived objective, first create a problem. That is called Thesis. Then the planners create, or establish opposition to that problem; panic and hysteria. That is Antithesis. The American people are being told "we do not have water, our air is polluted, we must let the Government divide the land, etc." Then the planners offer a solution to the very problem they originally created. This is Synthesis. The solution is the original objective. The environmental "solution" means control of the people by controlling private property; the land, food, water, travel and air. In order to survive we must turn everything over to the planners in the Government, Federal Regionalism means federal control of all the land wherever it may exist, anywhere in the United States. The land provides, and always has, food and water and the natural resources we need to survive.

The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations is a cell within (the government) controlled by a few men. The ACIR mission is to prepare mail-order legislation which will advance federal regionalism goals under the guise of State legislation, bills, resolutions, and even new constitutions, for the States. It puts these in what is called a Blue Book. Now they actually have ten books directing legislative action by the respective State Legislatures in every area of the society from land control, to education, to crime and punishment. These legislative bills are then disseminated to appropriate commissions in the State Legislatures, and to the Governors and the Lieutenant Governors. State agencies then take the bills out of the Blue Book and they are changed in minor ways to conform to local standards, then are given a rubber-stamp of approval by the State Legislature; and they then become the law of the State. Failure to adopt ACIR "laws" risks loss of Federal Funds.

It should be understood that neither Israel nor Egypt can be called self-supporting. Israel is dependent upon the United States for her existence, as is Egypt dependent upon oil-rich Saudi Arabia for her alleged independence.

It should also be understood that Israel is a political state, and is in no sense a religious society. Israel was created by action of the United Nations, that action being confirmed by President Harry Truman and acknowledged somewhat reluctantly by the United Kingdom. Those Zionists who then went to the newly formed state of Israel to help build it into a nation, were nationalists of the Ben Gurion type. But the powerful, the wealthy Zionists did not emigrate to Israel. The Zionist bankers and industrialists remained in New York City, in London, in Paris, in Zurich and in other cities where international bankers headquarter. These wealthy Zionists lent financial support but had no intention of lending their physical presence except on occasional pilgrimages. Nevertheless, the new state could always depend upon that financial help, especially in the sale of bonds for Israel and the gift of arms for Israel.

However, in the past few years the financial situation has been changing. The shut-down of oil production in the United States and the increasing dependence upon oil from Arabia has created a shift in the balance of financial power. Coming literally from nowhere a decade ago, the Arab bloc has risen to awesome power in the world by exercising control over its huge and vital oil production. In the beginning the Internationalists had control over the situation in that the Arabian oil producers were mere pawns in the hands of the "Seven Sisters," a name given to the seven oil companies: Exxon, Texaco, Shell, Gulf, Mobil, Chevron and Atlantic Richfield. But the Arab leaders got wise, began to throw off the shackles, and became a power group that the other power groups had to reckon with. Consequently, according to the reliable L.T. Patterson Strategy Letter of August, 1977, a secret agreement was made with Saudi Arabia; probably at the time that Prince Fahd of Arabia visited with President Carter at the White House. However, Prince Fahd and President Carter were mere figureheads in the deal. The real negotiating was done by a Trilateralist group known as the U.S.A.—Saudi Economic Planning Commission, with Treasury Secretary Blumenthal a party to the deal. Chief negotiator for the Saudi side was the Minister of Finance and National Economy Sheik Muhammed Ali Abu Al Kahil. Here was the agreement:

- (1) Rockefeller controlled banks would receive approximately 17 billion dollars from Saudi—guaranteed with one year notice of any substantial withdrawal.
- (2) The International Monetary Fund was to receive 2.5 billion (only) of Saudi money. This may have had something to do with IMF head Witteveen's resignation.
- (3) The Saudis have agreed not to increase the posted price of petroleum by more than 5% in any given year for the period ending December 1984. This commitment applies irrespective of any price increase agreed upon and enforced by OPEC.

The American quid pro quo:

- 1) The United States has agreed to guarantee the principle amounts of Saudi capital invested in U.S. government securities—plus interest payments of 7.5%.
- 2) The IMF contribution also is to be paid 7% interest during the first 12 months, this guaranteed....

But, according to the LTP Letter: "Most shocking feature of this agreement is the United States pledge...to use...'its full political, military and economic might to assist the Saudi government...in any way that might prove necessary in light of developing circumstances'" (end quote). The term 'any' is not defined by our sources, but would logically have to include the commitment of U.S. troops!... The failure of the Treasury to seek Congressional approval for such treaty agreements—including the promise of military aid—and commitment of American troops—is so incredible that many readers may well question the veracity of the information. But note that such agreements, bypassing Congress, was the way in which U.S. forces were committed to a no win war in Southeast Asia! It would appear that, to guarantee the stability of certain New York Banks, American troops are being guaranteed available to fight a 'no win war!'" (End of quotation from Patterson Strategy Letter for August, 1977. Published monthly; 12 issues $75.00. P.O.Box 37432, Cincinnati, Ohio 45237).

We assume that this pledge of U.S. military assistance to Saudi Arabia had to do with any potential Communist aggression, not with Zionist aggression. However, there were the proverbial straws in the wind that seemed to indicate that the United States was not well pleased with the Israeli government's actions since Begin began to run that government. Begin began to betray the new look of calmness and serenity. He was the terrorist who blew up hotels and murdered British troops in the old days; and other world leaders couldn't be sure that Begin had really reformed. The U.S. was not pleased when Begin began to build new settlements in the disputed West Bank area. The U.S. showed some irritation because Begin refused to show moderation toward the admission of PLO representatives at the coming Geneva conference. Furthermore, the U.S. was selling arms to Arabs at a rate that could disturb a surrounded country. And to top the list, oil-rich Arabian governments were becoming a power bloc that Israel couldn't hope to stand against if the U.S. turned its back on its "51st state."

So, facing such a situation—presumed or real—even a reformed terrorist might feel the urge to get into action while Israel's arms supply could outmatch all the rest of the Middle East countries combined. Besides, it might be good policy to throw a scare into those Trilateralists who were running things in Washington, and who were making deals with Saudi in order to stay solvent.

This seems to have been the background for a story by George Nicholas which appeared in the November 28, 1977 issue of Spotlight. We quote from that exclusive article:

"A chilling threat of all-out war triggered by Israel—confronting mankind with the present danger of a nuclear holocaust, perhaps within months—dominated the secret discussions of the Trilateral Conference in Bonn on October 22-23 and prompted Egypt's Anwar Sadat to go to Israel.

"The conferees, among them some of the world's most astute and influential power brokers, were shaken to learn that in recent weeks Israel's defense minister Ezer Weizman has told U.S. and British leaders that if current talks with Egypt and the Geneva Conference on the Mideast planned for next year fail to produce a 'satisfactory settlement,' Israel plans to launch a 'lightning war of annihilation' against her Arab neighbors.

"Equally chilling was the effect of a three-hour briefing conference chaired by Rear Admiral Dykman van Stroop, a retired Dutch intelligence expert on Palestine. Israel, the briefing revealed, is now the dominant power in the Middle East. Its armed forces are stronger than those of Egypt and Syria combined....

"The Trilateralists discussed evidence that Israel now has 22 nuclear bombs of great power, although their exact megatonnage is unknown.... For almost a dozen years, the security and intelligence authorities charged with safekeeping nuclear materials have known that substantial stockpiles of high grade uranium were being pilfered and secretly diverted from American stores to Israel, but were powerless to stop it. In early 1965 an inspection team of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission discovered that a major plant licensed and security-cleared to process high grade uranium, the Nuclear Materials and Equipment Corporation at Apollo, Pa., could not account for large quantities of the uranium it had been issued to turn into Navy reactors and fuel for a space rocket which never took off. A secret report of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission rapidly determined that at least 381.6 pounds of highly enriched uranium had been diverted from the Pennsylvania plant to 'an undetermined destination'—i.e., Israel....

"The revelation of stunning military might acquired by Israel, coupled with Begin's bullying threats to launch a 'war of annihilation' which were anxiously discussed by the Trilateralists last month, set off anxious diplomatic scurrying among Western and Mideastern capitals. It is reported that several recently retired American foreign-affairs troubleshooters, among them George Ball and Kissinger's erstwhile deputy Lawrence Eagleburger, as well as CIA official Russell Wharton, a former aide to Kim Roosevelt, long experienced in secret dealings with Arab leaders, were sent to Cairo and Jerusalem to push, urge and entreat Egypt and Israel toward an accomodation before war becomes inevitable. Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's stunning decision to visit Israel—a risky and potentially dangerous step—is unmistakably the first result of these concealed confabulations." (End of extended quotation from Spotlight, a weekly newspaper. $12 per year. 300 Independence Ave., S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003.)

So now you know the real reason for the Sadat-Begin confrontation; news that could never be revealed by captive media.

THE DILEMMA OF THE DIMINISHING DOLLAR

THE IMPENDING THREAT OF INFLATIONARY DEPRESSION

Recently the communications media have been permitted to tell some of the truth about our precarious financial situation. A prime example is contained in the current "Newsgram" on page 11 of the Dec. 5th U.S. News & World Report:

"More and more it is Washington that is pumping inflationary pressures into the economy. That means people are in for more battering on living costs. Despite cooling in some goods, price rises aren't likely to stay moderate. Government red ink is only part of the problem. The debt reached a record 700 billion dollars—$3,220 per american—on November 17, and is expected to go up another 100 billion within a year. That's a classic way to boost prices. But note, too, how other U.S. actions will work to hike prices...

"Employers next year will have to pay higher Social Security taxes, higher minimum wages, higher unemployment-insurance taxes. Costs will be passed on. The energy package will mean higher fuel charges for everybody. New mine and tanker safety regulations will add billions more to energy costs. For food buyers, federally ordered acreage cuts will put upward pressure on grain prices. Help for dairy farmers and sugar producers translates into a retail jump of 6 cents a gallon for milk, about 10 per cent for sugar. Trimming back on imports will result in higher bills for shoes, TV sets. Postal Services and Amtrak keep pushing up mail rates and railroad fares.

"Paper work—reports required by Washington—piles another 18 billion dollars on the cost of doing business, a new Washington University study shows. Then there are Government regulations that require capital outlays as well as reports. Businesses' bill for compliance: at least 62 billion dollars a year. Some of the major areas and the costs to industry:

"Consumer health and safety, 5 billion; job safety and working conditions, 4 billion; energy and the environment, 7.8 billion; financial, 1.1 billion. On top of the burden to the private economy, the Government spends 3.2 billion dollars a year to administer the regulations.

"Stopping or even slowing down the federal engine of inflation won't be easy; many price-pushing operations are too attractive politically to ax." (end of quote).

H.E.W. is, of course, government's biggest money-eater. Reader's Digest for December, 1977 in an article by Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, reports that the cost of America's welfare system has multiplied eight-fold in the last twelve years. President Carter has a plan which would complete the socialism of the Health, Education and Welfare program, and at the same time increase the cost.

In a similar vein, Jeffrey St. John reported on the Mutual Broadcasting System radio network: "It cost the American taxpayer $5 million to put on the International Women's Year Conference that closed up shop in Houston, Texas... When adjourning, the feminists passed a resolution demanding that the federal government fund another such convention. The other resolutions adopted at Houston read like a shopping list for socialism. Hardly one of the long list of 'rights' adopted in Houston by the feminists did not demand some form of government intervention or massive expenditure of taxpayer's money, be it abortion on demand, daycare centers, or special federal subsidies misrepresented as rights. If all the resolutions passed by the radical feminists in Houston were funded by the federal government, it would cost the taxpayers billions. The radical feminists' long list of demands illustrates why we've been saying the womens' liberationists are engaging in a form of larceny misrepresented as a right. To be sure, it is just one more group clamoring to politicians to raid the treasury, or in less polite terms, picking the pockets of the taxpayers, men as well as women. So, perhaps the expenditure of taxpayers' five billion to stage the Houston womens liberation convention will have a positive achievement, demonstrating that the radical feminist is demanding, not rights and freedom, but a free lunch." (unquote).

There are so many millions demanding a free lunch and so few to pick up the tab, that a real crisis seems to be on the way. As Gary North sees the situation, we are facing a new kind of depression which he calls the "inflationary depression," which results from the collapse of Keynesian policies; and the Keynesians are baffled by

HOSTAGE RELIEF ACT—TO ALLOW ERA RESCISSIONS

Hon. George Hansen of Idaho in the House of Representatives, November 11, 1977:

Mr. Speaker, in the name of fairness and sound constitutional practices, I invite my colleagues to cosponsor my bill, H.R. 9812, the Hostage Relief Act of 1977. This legislation is designed to release the hostages, those States who have and would reverse ratification of a constitutional amendment during the accumulation process and prior to the final approval of 38 States. This is particularly important in the event of serious consideration of the legislation to arbitrarily extend the time for approval of ERA as proposed by House Joint Resolution 638 as introduced by Rep. Elizabeth Holtzman.

Support for my bill will be a blow for liberty and against the doctrine of legislative entrapment. It simply provides that any State Legislature which rescinds its ratification of a proposed amendment to the Constitution shall not be considered to have ratified the amendment. The blatant attempt to rig the ratification of a constitutional amendment by arbitrary extensions of time and refusal to accept reversals of legislative action is shocking and reckless....

... complaint regarding the attempt to undermine our constitutional processes is effectively made in the following letter to a fellow Member of Congress by John Remington Graham, associate professor of law at Hamline University in St. Paul, Minn.:

"Dear Congressman: I write concerning the proposed resolution, which, if passed by Congress, would extend the seven-year limit originally set for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment by the several States. In the strongest terms, I urge you to vote against the measure.... All learned authorities agree that a constitutional amendment must be passed within a reasonable time of proposal, or fall altogether by reason of this phenomenon and don't know what can be done to prevent the impending economic collapse that their policies have created. Their solution calls for more Federal spending and larger Federal deficits. This in turn creates more inflation, more unemployment, more people requiring free lunches and fewer taxpayers able to pick up the tab. The value of the dollar finally diminished to such a point that some drastic measure must be taken to prevent total chaos.

That "drastic measure," according to many economists and monetary experts, will consist of a drastic devaluation of the dollar by calling in all the existing "greenbacks" which we now call money, and issuing in their place a new series of "redbacks" or "bluebacks" or whatever color the Federal Reserve Corporation may choose. Dr. Franz Pick is among those who insist that a new currency issue has already been printed, is secretly stored in Federal vaults, ready to be issued whenever this last-ditch effort seems necessary. Dr. Pick is probably right but, like the gasoline ration books that were staleness....

"When proposed, most people were told, and consequently believed, that the ERA would simply mean equal pay for equal work and such like. One State after another ratified. Passage appeared certain. Then it was learned that the measure was actually radical and destructive, an attempted erasure of all sex distinctions in the law, even those necessary to human liberty and happiness. The common citizen began to rebel. The States began to rescind earlier ratifications. In double-think fashion proponents answered that, while States could ratify after earlier rejections, they could not rescind earlier ratifications. After the last season of legislative sessions among the several States, ERA appeared to be in real trouble. Now proponents seek extra time by retroactive deprivation of vested rights. The record amply demonstrates that proponents of ERA in the name of liberation, have sought to undermine even-handed fairness. I think they have played politics with our constitution long enough." (End of quote).

There is great need for stopping any efforts for arbitrary extension of time for ratifying the ERA and for passage of my legislation which would end the political practice of holding States hostage to one-time action of ratification of a constitutional amendment.

reportedly printed but not issued in 1974, these "redbacks" may never be issued and established as the new unit of exchange. Instead, the Big Bankers who control our money issue may just wipe out any and all kinds of paper money and substitute for it the "electronic money" which is already in use in some parts of the country on a test basis. They're "getting the bugs out of the system," and then they expect to make it nation-wide, finally world-wide.

Every now and then the media issues a report on how the banks are being "snowed under" by piles of paper; checks that are used to pay bills and purchase goods and services, and then must be processed by the banks, with voluminous records of all larger transactions being kept because of Federal snoopers from IRS and other agencies.

Also currently, on the boob-tube the telephone industry is running a commercial that shows a picture of a telephone exchange in 1910, with the supervisor wearing roller skates in order to oversee the scores of "hello girls" that were required to service telephone calls. Then the scene shifts to a modern exchange, where electronics has replaced the scores of operators.

There's a connection between these two current stories concerning banks and telephone exchanges. Years ago, before dial telephone, company executives foresaw that at the rate of growth, it would soon be impossible to find enough operators to supply the demands of telephone users. So, the dial telephone was invented. Then direct dialing for long distance calls was introduced. Now direct dialing on calls to other continents is being developed, and in most parts of the United States a person may dial directly to London, Hongkong, or dozens of foreign cities.

There have been similar developments in the banking industry. At one time all checks had to be handled manually, and distributed manually. But with the growth of commerce and industry it soon became apparent that something had to be done to ease the work load. So, MICR (Magnetic Ink Character Recognition) was developed. Our banker tells us that those funny looking numbers printed along the bottom of a check are called MICR numbers and are readable by automatic check-handling machines. This eased the work load amazingly. But it was not enough; bank clerks would still be buried under piles of paper checks unless something more could be done. However, investigators found that little more could be done to speed up the handling of checks. So they started seeking ways to eliminate checks entirely (and eventually to eliminate paper money as well). The Federal government agreed with the plan, and so did the Federal Reserve System officials. An article appearing in the Houston Chronicle of Jan. 10, 1975 read:

"New York (UPI)—A cashless society, in which all transactions from buying groceries to paying the telephone bill are handled electronically, is possible within 10 years, according to a Federal Reserve Bank officer. Thomas G. Waage, senior vice president of the Fed's New York Branch, said that unless a new system of exchange is developed the nation's banking system will 'choke' under an avalanche of checks.

"...To reduce check volume, Waage proposed a system whereby personal checks would be paid directly by a bank to the creditor. All bills and computer programming would have to be standardized for 'a uniform transfer.' A national standard for all bills would have to be adopted so they contain 'all the necessary information' and could be translated by either magnetic tape or optical scanning devices.

"Under this system, an individual would take or send his bills to the bank, which would make direct payments from the individual's account to the creditor's bank account through electronic transfers of money between the banks. The Federal Reserve would act as an automated clearing house. Again, no paper would change hands.

"This system,' Waage said, 'has been used successfully in Europe. In the Netherlands, 90 percent of all house payments and rentals are made this way,' he said. 'Such a system could be implemented in a year's time,' Waage said, 'if everybody would do it. It would be a first step to a cashless society.' "

Let us suppose that the cashless society has arrived; this is how the system would work (this according to its developers):

The working individual would not get a pay-check. Instead, his pay would be recorded with the central financial computer for his town or city. This central computer would transfer the individual's "take home pay" from the company's bank account to his own bank account. Then, as this individual goes to a store to buy something, he will take his "super" credit card with him instead of cash or checkbook. After selecting whatever he wishes to buy, he hands this "super" credit card to the clerk. The clerk would go to the computer terminal, enter the item number (identifying what was purchased), then would insert the "super" credit card into the computer terminal (identifying the purchaser of the merchandise), and 'money' would immediately be transferred from the individual's account to the store's account. All of this would occur electronically, without a single piece of paper changing hands. At the end of the month the individual would receive from his bank a detailed printout of all of his transactions during the month. Thus, only one piece of paper would change hands; and the savings in paper and in handling would be enormous. But — the town's central computer would have a full and detailed record of everything bought or sold by every individual or business within that central computer's territory!

Then, when these local central computers are set up to report to regional computers, when regional computers report to national computer banks, and when all this information is forwarded electronically and in a split second to a world computer bank, what then will happen to liberty and the pursuit of happiness?

For such a system to work, there will have to be a single identifying number for each individual. This would also mean that all present credit cards would have to be scrapped and a single "world" credit card issued to each individual, that card to bear the individual's identifying number.

Jim McKeever, an economist who helped design this system, and who now edits an "Investment & Survival Letter," made the following confession:

"Let me first state that I do not think this coming system is good. Today I regret some of the efforts that I expended in conceiving and designing portions of this system. Back in my more naive days, while speaking to a group of bankers I labeled this system SAVE (System for Automatic Value Exchange). Today it is known as EFTS (Electronic Funds Transfer System). Even though I now do not like the idea of such a system, nor want it imposed upon us, I still believe it is inevitable. There are too many forces pushing us in that direction. The 'big brother' implications are horrifying. The government could keep track of all of our expenditures. They could put us on a budget, allowing us use of only a portion of our funds each week. The IRS could tag your account, preventing you from making any purchases. If a dictator were ever to arise, he would have the technology that would enable him to totally control the population....

"This electronic money and credit system will not be instituted all at once. There will be bits and pieces of it implemented here and there. At times these pieces will seem unrelated. However, ultimately they will all become part of this net that will encase us. First we will see our regular credit cards come more and more into prominence. Eventually these will probably be merged into a single credit card. This might be privately owned, or might ultimately be taken over by the government. If we have a depression and people in mass cannot pay for their credit card charges, it is likely that the government will have to nationalize this card (s). We will see more terminals appearing in stores. We might begin to see heavy charges for using checks. Bit by bit the system will take shape." (unquote).

Meanwhile, the dollar as an international currency is sinking fast, and the new international currency is to be the Trilateralist's Bancor, which is to be a fiat currency medium issued by the IMF acting as a world Federal Reserve Bank. As Vilas & Hickey, specialists in international investments, wrote in their newsletter of Nov. 1, 1977:

"It is all too apparent that a lender of last resort will be required to shore up loans between the Third World and major establishment banks. That lender of last resort must, by default, be the IMF." And the IMF is, at Trilateralist Commission request, in the process of selling all its gold, preparing to use the fiat currency BANCOR as the international medium of exchange.

Since the new international monetary system and the electronic money system are being sponsored by the same group of bankers (the Rockefeller and Rothschild affiliates), it is conceivable that our net worth according to the central computer will be expressed, not in dollars, but in electronic Bancors.

WHEN MEN, AS GODS, CONTROL THE WEATHER

TO PLAN, TO PROGRAM, TO RULE, TO REGULATE.

"Hot spells in Alaska, snow in Miami, the most severe droughts, floods, hurricanes, and tornadoes in recorded history; has the weather gone crazy, or have the Pentagon and the Kremlin discovered the ultimate weapon?"

The question is asked by Lowell Ponte, author of the book, "The Cooling: Has The Next Ice Age Already Begun? Can We Survive It?" (Prentice-Hall, 1976). Until 1970, Ponte did research into environmental warfare and technological terrorism for the International Research and Technology Corporation, a think-tank often consulted by the Pentagon. In an article appearing in the December, 1977 issue of "Gallery" magazine, Ponte says the Soviets spend more than any other country on attempts to tamper with the weather. "They seed clouds. They have projects to divert several rivers flowing northwards into the Arctic Ocean. Their computer studies show that these projects will decrease ice in the Arctic, enhance their own climate, and very likely mess up the weather over croplands in neighboring China."

"But last winter," Ponte continued, "the Soviets tried something new and frightening. They launched an elaborate pattern of polar-orbiting satellites. The U.S. did the same. ... These new satellites apparently had much to do with the high energy electrical impulses from the Soviet Union that last winter played havoc with shortwave radio (and, combined with certain "Tesla" experiments that we shall discuss later, also played havoc with power plants and lines, as well as with the weather—Ed.)"

"Five years ago the Soviets began experimenting with an old theory that by configuring such (high energy) transmissions it would be possible to deflect storms, and even to move the jet stream, thus altering global weather. ... The Canadian Government has issued a secret diplomatic protest to the Soviet Union about this—that the Soviet experiments were part of the cause of the terrible winter North America suffered in 1977."

Ponte says that, from the Pentagon's point of view, the U.S. has been in a secret race with the Soviets for decades over development of such environmental weapons. He thinks "it's time we took such research out of CIA and military hands," that "this sort of tampering is too dangerous to leave to people who wear ribbons and have lightning bolts on their visors."

Ponte does not mention that the military has no monopoly on attempts at weather control. Federal and State agencies, as well as private corporations and individuals, have experimented with weather control ever since it was discovered that silver iodide could be seeded into clouds and winds and cause unusual and even unnatural things to happen. Lately, however, the Federal government has taken a special interest in attempts to regulate the weather, along with attempts to regulate anything and everything that can be regulated. In fact, Planning, Programming, Ruling, Regulating, and Budgeting is an excellent definition of what we call Corporate Socialism, what Mussolini called Fascism, and what the Fabian Socialists who surrounded FDR called New Dealism; and Jimmy Carter sees himself as the political reincarnation of FDR. So, with Carter, as with Roosevelt, "Regulation is the name of the game," as the U.S. News Washington Letter points out, intending this statement to be a compliment, no doubt. The Letter reminds its readers that "The President chose activists to run the various agencies and Departments and they are striking out with a boldness that is unmatched in recent times. While Carter and Congress seem all tied up — look at the regulators: They're changing the way business is done, how professionals operate, the environment we live in, our food intake, the nature of the products we buy...."

The Letter might have added that regulators are also trying to change the way weather operates in these United States; this to the sorrow and suffering of certain residents of

States and cities that have experienced untimely, unusual, unexpected and devastating floods in the past few months.

"Regulation is the name of the game" with weather, as well as with land, water, coal, petroleum products, energy, food, et al. Not surprisingly, the man chosen to regulate the weather is none other than the super change agent Harlan Cleveland, whose dossier we need not explore at this time.

Weather regulation was the subject of an editorial which appeared in the November 15 1977 issue of the Springfield (Mo.) Daily News. We quote from that editorial:

* * * * *

Perking away on a far back burner of the bureaucratic stove — but perking — is the Weather Modification Advisory Board, a creation of the National Weather Modification Policy Act, also known as Public Law 94-9400, passed by Congress in October, 1976. This board intends to formulate a national weather modification policy for submission to the secretary of commerce. The board will draft, as well, a national program of research and action designed to put the policy to work.

We are stunned to learn that a federal agency is working quietly away at the task of designing the weather. Certainly, the program is but a germ, for the moment and for quite a time to come. But the seed is planted. Little acorns, mighty oaks. Government studies and reports, full-fledged agencies with budgets and staffs, goals and action plans. Little things get to be big things; it is a law of bureaucratic life.

What stuns (and frightens) us about this business is the brazen ignorance of mankind. Modify the weather, indeed! We can't decide how gravely fluoro-carbons damage atmospheric ozone. We don't know for certain that the planet is cooling, although the evidence is strong. For the short run, this is the essence of our wisdom: The weather isn't acting like it used to act.

From the depths of this ignorance, we talk about 20-year plans to find out how the weather can be tailored to our needs. Harlan Cleveland, chairman of the advisory board, noted recently before a Congressional panel that the only routine weather modification project at present is to find out how to clear cold fog. Cloud-seeding, of course, is high on the waiting list. Further down the road, it seems, are the suppression of lightning and hail, hurricane control, and the opening of winter clouds to open the earth to warming sunshine.

Cleveland, an academic and veteran diplomat, told the legislators that weather is the largest uncontrolled variable affecting food and energy conservation. With the weather tamed, the vision goes, man could do a vastly better job of running things.

There is a sense of inevitability about all this. First, research of undoubted value in helping us understand and predict the weather. Second, proposals to put the knowledge "to good use." Finally, conversion of the world into a laboratory for experiments with making it rain in the Dakotas, making the sun shine in Philadelphia, making hurricanes stay in the Gulf of Mexico.

... The way of our technology ... seems to be, if we can do it, do it. If we have the tool, use it. If it looks good from here, try it. What is lacking, something tells us, is a moral sense of the limits of human capacity.

Do we—human beings who live for a moment on the planet and die—accept the responsibility for engineering the weather of the world? Have we such perfect confidence in our wisdom?

It is said that scientific knowledge of the universe, epitomized by the Copernican removal of Earth from the center of things, teaches humility. The case seems otherwise. Man plainly believes himself the center of the universe, the new lord of creation; atoms, chromosomes, the weather — all these things are in his hand.

Here we stand, bespectacled, grave of countenance, terrified of death, and lusting to hurl thunderbolts. Can we be serious? Who could doubt it?

(end of editorial)

We are left with the feeling that this editorial was left unfinished, that there should have been a final paragraph. It might have read: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me. Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding? Who laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? ... Who hath put wisdom in the inner parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart?" (Job 38: 2,3,4,5,36).

Before the creation of this federal Weather Modification Advisory Board with Harlan Cleveland as its chairman, there had been many weather modification programs conducted on a local basis with little regard to what such programs might do to surrounding areas. One report from a federal agency concerned with environmental monitoring listed nineteen States as having had weather modification programs conducted within their borders. Oklahoma was first with 12 programs, California second with 11, North and South Dakota had 6 each, Idaho 5, Washington 4, Michigan, Utah and Texas 3 each. This gave impetus to the Congressional creation of the Weather Modification Advisory Board, and more federal control over the weather.

However, the Planners have no intention of designing weather for the United States alone. They look forward to the time when world government will have become an actuality; and they are making plans for a global weather designing agency. In fact, plans have already been completed by the Fellows of the Center For The Study Of Democratic Institutions.

One of the Fellows at the Center is a Mr. Wendall A. Mordy, who is said to be "one of the world's leading cloud physicists." The Fellows have a monthly magazine, "The Center." According to this magazine, Mr. Mordy, "with the collaboration of other Center Fellows," prepared a report on the conferences they held "for the National Science Foundation's Program on Research and National Needs." Mr. Mordy made a speech which was published in "The Center" magazine. Here are excerpts from that speech:

* * * * *

On the premise that world government will eventuate, and that it may evolve along functional rather than territorial lines, in the manner suggested by Center Senior Fellow Elisabeth Mann Borgese, in her work on the Ocean Regime and other aspects of prospective world government, this is an attempt to take a very long-range view of functions that would be necessary for atmospheric management in the future, and to suggest structures that might evolve for their future performance.

...a new view of the importance of the atmosphere as a resource is emerging. There is also a greater awareness that transnational issues are increasingly involved in our concern for the atmosphere. As an exploitable resource, the atmosphere will ultimately, and perhaps soon, yield to large-scale manipulation or control. When this occurs, the energy thus controlled by man will be several orders of magnitude greater than that envisioned in projection of anthropogenic energy production. Great caution and effective political control will be needed....

Management of the atmosphere requires policymaking, administration, planning, and scientific and technological knowledge. This suggests that a possible structuring for a World Atmospheric Management Community would include;

- (1) an Assembly and Policy Council;
- (2) an Administrative Agency;
- (3) a Planning Board; and
- (4) a Meteorological Institute.

A World Atmospheric Management Administration might evolve from an enlargement of the present World Meteorological Organization (WMO), with its increased functions dictated by the global unity of the atmosphere and the needs implied. Such an administration could have responsibility for world wide data acquisition and distribution.... In the long run, it might be more efficient and economical for this system to be operated on a global rather than a national bases. Such a system could conceivably evolve gradually from increasing co-operation among national services, and gradual consolidation. In carrying out this responsibility, the agency's duties would include operating a communications network, coordinating satellite observation operations with other agencies, using satellites for other purposes such as Earth resources monitoring and communications, and coordinating the monitoring of certain atmospheric constituents with other environmental monitoring agencies.

The agency could be charged with the responsibility for providing appropriate regulatory agencies with analyses of the extent and concentration of pollutants and an assessment of their air quality effects. Regulation of air quality, that is, setting standards and policing them, would probably be more appropriately placed in, perhaps, a global environmental agency and in local regional regulatory agencies.

Assuming that some day in the future, nations will not claim the right to perform such operations, and that agreement could be reached that it could be beneficial, a WAMC might be responsible for conducting, or funding, large-scale weather modifications proposed by the Planning Board, and approved by the governing body. Later the agency might also be charged with the res-possibility of regulating smaller scale operations by private or governmental operators, according to rules set by the governing body of WAMC, in regard to approval of plans, licensing, and reporting on results.

A WAMC Planning Board would serve the dual purpose of providing the planning function for the WAMC, and of funneling technical input from atmospheric specialties to the broader planning processes of the world government as a whole. The Planning Board would be responsible for the preparation of plans for large-scale weather modification, and for soliciting evaluations from the points of view of other planning groups. Ultimately, it might take on the functions of approving applications for small-scale weather and climate modification operations, according to rules set by the governing body of the WAMC. Finally, if now only suggestive of science fiction, the Planning Board should deliberate on new and as yet unforeseen uses of the atmosphere.

(end of extended quotation)

In all of this weather control syndrome, a Hegelian pattern seems to emerge. At the national level, cloud seeding and other experiments led to competition between the States, and many real disasters may have been brought about because of the attempts to change weather patterns. As an example: over 100 occurrences since June, 1972, have been labelled "major disasters" by the Federal government. Flooding headed the list. This prompted legislation designed to provide flood disaster insurance. There was a "trap" in the legislation: States and communities were "required" to participate in land use and control programs which are a part of the Regional Governance program: HUD controls the financing and enforces participation. Let us suppose that many of these major disasters were created by uncontrolled weather control programs. This occurrence of disasters would provide the need for Federal control. But Federal control becomes Federal promotion of weather control programs.

Then, at the world level, competition is created between the two major powers, the United States and Russia. There is nothing new about this. The whole World Government movement was originally based on the idea that competition between the two major powers could lead to total disaster for the world (better red than dead).

The Planners who designed weather control followed the same formula: competition was created between the two; and there is little doubt but that some of these experiments have led to disasters, and unusual weather.

In this competition there is one phase that is seldom publicized. This has to do with experiments with what have come to be called "Tesla transmissions." Nikola Tesla was an electrical genius who, among other things, discovered the alternating current concept. But his greatest discovery was never developed, due to his death. Tesla was developing a system of wireless transmission of electric power. In 1928 he lit a bank of electric lamps at a distance of 26 miles in Colorado, without using wires for the transmission of the electricity. He also transferred electric power from Quebec to New York City. But there the development of the system stopped.

During the past few years, interest in the "Tesla transmissions" has been revived. A certain type of tower is required for this Tesla transmission of electricity without wires. Such towers are said to exist in Timmons, Canada; in Sidney, Australia; in Mexico City; and several in Soviet Russia. The "American Sunbeam" of August 15, 1977, reported that in July, 1976, several nations noticed severe interference with radio transmission. The source of the trouble was pinpointed as coming from Riga, in Soviet Russia. Then, on December 26th of 1976, Canadian investigators noted two sets of signals coming from Russia. Their conclusion was that the Soviets were using the Tesla system to charge particles of air, forcing bad weather patterns over the United States and Canada.

"The latest conclusion," said the article, "is that the New York City blackout was the result of a Tesla injection of massive electrical power... The point to remember is that there also was a blackout in Mexico City, and Sidney, Australia, at the same time."

It must be remembered that weather control and electrical transmission without wires may seem like great scientific progress, but if it is used merely to promote world government and to glorify Man, then our "lusting to hurl thunderbolts" is progress toward disaster.

THE CONSPIRACY TO SOVIETIZE THE WORLD

THE SEEDS OF SURRENDER

In the opinion of most military experts, the Soviet Union is today the most powerful military state in the world. We are told that in nuclear weapons, in armed forces, in its naval fleet, it either surpasses the United States or will soon do so.

A recent article by columnist Allen Brownfield began: "Surrender is a word being heard more and more in Washington to describe the dramatic deterioration of the Carter administration's position concerning a SALT II agreement...."

The most respected journal, "Jane's All the World's Aircraft," in the foreword to its 1978 edition, warns that: "If our planet is subjected one day to the unimaginable horrors of a third World War, 1977 might be recorded as the year in which the seeds of defeat were sown.... It is...vital for all peoples to understand that the fragile co-existence maintained for a generation by balanced East/West military power is being allowed to slip inch by inch from our grasp. We live in an age which considers itself so omniscient that it can learn nothing from history...."

"What many Americans do not know," says Brownfield in his syndicated column, "is that the Soviet Union could never have achieved this remarkable status without our help. In non-military areas, the Soviet Union remains a primitive society. Indoor plumbing, television, automobiles, telephones—these remain luxuries for the few. In nuclear warheads and missiles, however, Soviet technology is second to none. Unfortunately, it is we who helped to make it this way."

What Brownfield should have written (but his column would have been 'blue-penciled' if he had), was that we—the citizens of the United States didn't make it that way, not consciously, at least. It was the men without a country, the internationalists, the Elite, who made it that way. It was planned to happen as it has happened, and the Elite did its utmost to keep all others from knowing that the conspiracy existed, or exists.

Causing World War III was not the real reason why the Elitists built the Soviet Union into a world power to be feared by all other nations. A World War would destroy the industrial development and the technological progress that the Elitists themselves owned or commanded in both the West and the East. A major war would be a last resort, to be incited only if and after all other means had failed. There was a time when wars were profitable to the Elitists. Small and controllable wars still are profitable to them; such as occurred in Korea, Vietnam, parts of Africa, the Middle East. But a major war where nuclear weapons would be used; that would be avoided if at all possible.

The real reason for making the Soviet Union a power equal to or surpassing the power of the United States was to make people fear the possibility of such a war, and to accept a new world order, a world government that would "eliminate the possibility of a major war," and, incidentally, make all multinational investments safe and all loans secure.

We are reminded of a passage in Taylor Caldwell's best seller, "Captains and the Kings":

"Rory knew all about this Invisible Government which decided the destinies of nations, their survival or their obliteration, for his father had told him.... 'The world really exists on money and nothing else,' a professor had told his students. 'This is a fact of human existence which must be acknowledged, however we might wish to protest. Some call manifestations of it commerce. Some call it politics. Some call it "spontaneous movements of the People." Some call it "revolutionary changes of government." Some call it holy wars in behalf of freedom. But all these things are implacably plotted by the men who really rule us, and not our ostensible elected administrations. It is a matter of money.'...."

It is, for example, a matter of money that prompts the movement to give away the American canal in Panama. It is a matter of money to permit the Soviet Union to become militarily superior to the United States. It is a matter of money that prompts the crusade to create a New World Order. It is a matter of money which caused the writing of a new "Constitution for the Federation of Earth" when a group of change agents from 25 countries met at Innsbruck, Austria June 16 to 29, 1977. One of the many propaganda angles being promoted by the Elitists is reflected in this group's "Universal Call for Ratification of the Constitution for the Federation of Earth." One of their propaganda sheets projects this fear that the world is going to be destroyed unless we accept world government:

"During these latter days of the 20th century, the realization is growing that all life on Planet Earth is threatened with imminent destruction from many sources. After thousands upon thousands of years of toil and struggle, people thought that material abundance and expanding opportunities could soon be enjoyed peacefully by all. But it is now evident that the same technology which promised abundance also promises universal disasters even more quickly—unless major problems can be solved without further delay. Whatever illusions remain that peace and security and human rights can be achieved through military arms, must be discarded. Whatever illusions remain that adequate progress can be made through negotiations among sovereign national governments for the solutions to the inter-related global crises confronting humanity, must also be discarded. The inescapable alternative for humanity today is the establishment of a democratic federal world government..."

To arrive at this point in history where the people of the various sovereign nations of the world would accept world federation as an "inescapable alternative" required the building of two competing world powers which would threaten to destroy civilization unless they could be "united" in a world federation!

The manner in which the Elitists worked through established sovereign governments to create a world power called the U.S.S.R., has never been told to the people—and we suspect they wouldn't believe if they were told. Here, briefly and incompletely, is how the United States Government was "used" to create the Soviet Monster:

Almost immediately after Lenin announced the takeover of Russia, U.S. experts were sent to the Soviet Union to aid in the industrialization and modernization of the Soviet Union. Agricultural consultants, labor organizers, engineers, technicians, and educationists were sent to Moscow. Walter and Victor Reuther of Big Labor, and John Dewey of "Progressive Education" are prime examples. As for "peaceful trade," Armand Hammer was the first American to receive a Soviet trading concession. In 1920 he was made manager of the Alapievsky Asbestos Concession. Hammer introduced U.S. equipment, supervised rehabilitation of the mines, and exported mined ore to the United States. In 1923 Amerikanskoi Obiedinnoi Kompanii (Allied American Corporation) was formed to promote trade with the U.S. Julius Hammer (the father) was named President of the corporation, son Armand was Secretary, and brother Victor Hammer was a Director. The company represented 38 large American firms, was financed by the Soviets and profits were split 50/50 between the Soviet government and the Hammers. After 1925 the Hammers operated a pencil and stationery plant in Moscow. In 1931 the name was changed from A. Hammer Inc. to Sacco and Vanzetti Co., and the Hammers returned to the United States to operate a U.S. trading company when Amtorg was barred from trading with U.S. firms. Armand Hammer continues to promote trade with the Soviet Union, specializing in oil, asbestos, and fertilizer.

In 1930, Albert Kahn Co., builders of the Ford River Rouge, General Motors, Packard and other large plants, went to the Soviet Union to construct the largest plants the company had ever built. The Kahn group designed and built all the light and heavy industrial units projected in Lenin's Gosplan (the first five-year plan).

Then the Lend-Lease Plan began in 1941, was ended officially in 1945, but continued for Russia through 1947. As a result, the Soviet Union, in spite of war damage, ended World War II with a greater industrial capacity than in 1940. Today, it is estimated by experts that "as much as 95 per cent of all Soviet military vehicles are produced in plants originally designed by Americans." Allan Brownfield (op. cit.) cites this figure and adds:

"This is not simply historic—it is all going on at the present time, and involves computer technology as well as complete factories. In 1972, the U.S. Government issued $1 billion in licenses to export equipment and technical assistance to the Kama truck plant. Planned as the largest truck plant in the world, it covers 36 square miles and produces more heavy trucks than the output of all U.S. heavy manufacturers combined. Thus, although it is not known by most Americans, we face an enemy which we have largely made into the powerful force it is today."

Add to this the fact that when Allied Forces entered Berlin toward the end of World War II the United States Treasury 'lent' to the Soviets U.S. Government printing plates, with which the Soviets printed sufficient U.S. money to finance their occupation of East Berlin and much of East Germany. This plus the fact that the Soviets were 'permitted' to steal nuclear knowhow and space flight technology from the United States, even to the point that the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. became 'partners' in highly technical astronomical exercises. In short, the United States Government was 'used' by the Elitists, both directly and through the issuing of trade licenses to multinational corporations. This was done in order to create an enemy sufficiently powerful to 'scare' the citizens of sovereign nations into accepting the surrender of their sovereignty to a world federation as the "only alternative" to worldwide destruction!

Let it also be known that the U.S.S.R. was not the only government which was given extraordinary aid by the U.S. Government in order to create conditions that would lead to world government. There is the case of Israel and the 'leak' of enriched uranium so that Israel could manufacture atomic bombs. From the "Washington Star" of Dec. 8, 1977 in an article by John J. Flalka, it was reported that the CIA knew as early as 1968 that Israel "had received enough highly enriched uranium to make several atomic bombs."

The CIA discovered the physical presence of enough uranium to make 10 bombs at a time when "only five nations were known to have the capacity to 'enrich' uranium, which requires an extremely costly, complex and still secret process which separates and concentrates U-235, a lighter and more unstable uranium isotope which can support a nuclear explosion. The nations were the United States, Britain, France, the Soviet Union and China. At the time the United States was by far the largest producer and the only commercial source of highly enriched uranium." Conclusion: the uranium possessed by Israel was smuggled from the United States. However, John Mitchell was

U.S. Attorney General at the time of the CIA discovery, and he "is said to have concluded that there was not enough evidence to support an espionage charge."

It should be understood that the U.S. Government was not the only government 'used' to build up the U.S.S.R. industrially and militarily so that the Communist-dominated Soviet Union could become one of the two "super powers" which would be played against each other in order to make world federation "the only alternative." From the British Views-Letter "Candour" for November/December 1977, we quote the following:

THIRTY YEARS IN DARKEST DETENTE

Ever since 1945 when the shadowy Internationalists behind Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks put their clamps on the British Empire through the general agreement on tariffs and trade (GATT) we, the British nations, have experienced only imperial disintegration and national degradation....

The agreements between the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom since 1945 fall into four main groups. The 1947 agreement, that had some of the characteristics of a preliminary try-out; those signed between 1959 and 1968, under which surreptitious help was given to the Soviet military and industrial build-up; 1968 to 1974, when this assistance became blatant; and May 1974 onwards, when British Ministers have acquiesced in Britain being treated as a Soviet satellite state....

1. The first of the post-war agreements was the 1947 Trade and Finance Agreement.... that at first sight would appear to be concerned with the exchange of a railway system and power stations, together with the equipment required for their operation for a certain amount of grain. It contained the phrase "such further goods as may be agreed." Those further goods included Rolls-Royce Derwent and Nene engines, copies of which were used in the Chinese air force planes in the attack on Korea a few years later. The inclusion of such open-ended phrases has been a constant feature of our agreements with the Soviet Union ever since.

2. The development of Anglo-Soviet trade relations continued and in April 1955 "A comprehensive list of machinery, equipment and ships which would be ordered by the Soviet organisations from the U.K. was handed to the U.K. representatives. The representatives of the U.K. pointed out that a part of the list was covered by existing strategic controls. In the 1959 agreements, and since, there has been nothing to suggest that confidential or classified information has been officially denied to the Soviets....

3. The next phase in the development of our relations with the Soviet Union came with the Agreement for Co-operation in the Fields of Science and Technology.... All the statements in it are open-ended and far-reaching. It has paved the way for the transfer of virtually the whole of our science and technology to the Soviet Union.... Along with the Long Term Trade Agreement (1969) it provided for industrial investment to go into Soviet strategic industries instead of into British strategic industries. The scrambling of our major industries with those of the Soviet Union, and the takeover of British companies by multinational corporations cooperating with the Soviets was encouraged.... In return for our investment in the USSR we agree to accept the Soviet essential raw materials such as chromium and nickel, instead of obtaining them from our normal suppliers.... To assist in maintaining Britain's need to import from the Soviet nations, our merchant navy is being run down to be replaced by Soviet freighters, passenger ships... and fishing vessels....

4. From May 1974 onwards there has been a noticeable change in our dealings with the Soviet Union and Britain is now openly treated as a satellite state.... One list of goods that we will import from the USSR includes those products that until recently were among our main exports.... This means that by 1984 we have been committed to buy instead of selling, on terms favourable to the Soviet Union, goods that we would rely on manufacturing and exporting to keep our economy viable.

The place of France in all this should not pass without comment. Since 1917 it can be observed that there has been a considerable measure of collaboration between the Soviet Union and France.... It was in 1966 that the French left NATO and formed a military alliance with the Soviet Union. At that time an ex employee of Rothschild, the most influential of the French bankers, was their Prime Minister, i.e. Pompedou....

Since the United Nations Organization was set up, its form being determined by discussions between Soviet Agents in the United States, there has been constant pressure for the breakup of Old British Commonwealth. In the forefront of this campaign have been UNESCO Committees dominated by the French. One very practical result of this has been that the rich uranium deposits in Old Commonwealth countries are mined by firms either controlled by French bankers or whose controllers work in close collaboration with the French bankers (meaning the Rothschild interests—Ed.).... Technical information (regarding nuclear developments) France receives through the European organisations would seem to be passed straight on to the USSR.

...Detente means Sovietization. And in pursuance of this policy the British Foreign Secretary consults with Marxist and puppet Marxist leaders in Africa as to how best to destroy the remains of the Old Commonwealth and hand over South African minerals to multinational corporations co-operating with the Soviets. (End of extended quotes from "Candour." $6.50 per annum. Forest House, Liss Forest, Hants GU33, 7DD, Hampshire, England).

Thus, you see, the Elitists through their Trilateral Commission, Bilderberg Group, the Communist leadership, et al, are using the Governments of the nations of the world to promote the interests of the multinational cartelists and the international bankers. These Governments are at the same time destroying themselves, for they are to be but administrative parts of regions in a regionalized world government, now to be constructed along functional rather than territorial lines.

For this purpose the Elitists have established two super powers that are to control all other powers, and in turn be controlled by an Elitist Group until such time as the Elitist feel that the time has come for de facto world federation.

The smaller nations are supposed to fear and obey the two Super Powers, who are supposed to fear and obey the Elitists, while the people of the world are supposed to believe that the "only alternative" is World Federation. For consolation, we read the Second Psalm.

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS THE RELIGION OF HUMANISM IN THE NATION'S TAX-SUPPORTED SCHOOLS

TAKING CHRIST OUT OF CHRISTMAS

The covering letter, addressed to leaders in the State of Florida, informed us of an upcoming Pro-Family Rally to be held at the Sheraton Twin Towers in Orlando, Florida January 14, 1978, from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. The letter stated that "Recently we have heard that Florida will be the target of economic sanctions designed to force our State legislators to pass the Equal Rights Amendment against the will of the people. Florida is in a precarious position. If we lose just one Senator to such blackmail, we could lose and see the ERA Amendment passed due to our silence....It also appears that Florida has been selected to become the homosexual haven that California now is. Anita Bryant set their program back when she stopped the Dade County Ordinance, but they have not given up. Their hopes have been raised by the IWY Conference and President Carter's homosexual reception in the White House, and efforts to pass the ERA, including congressional extension if needed.

"Attacks on the home and family intensify through the feminist movement...abortion, homosexuality, pervasive pornography, and an educational system which undermines respect for family, God, and country...."

In addition to the covering letter from which we have quoted the envelope also contained a copy of a letter written by Mrs. Shirley Correll of Lakeland, Florida, addressed to the Florida State Commissioner of Education. While this letter is of primary importance to parents who are citizens of the State of Florida, its subject matter is of vital importance to citizens of every State in the Union. The Religion of Humanism has replaced Christianity as the "official faith" being taught children in all tax-supported schools throughout the United States. And most parents don't know this, and don't realize what this is doing to their own children. Therefore, in the hope that this letter will help awaken parents of America to the true situation in the tax-supported schools in America, we are publishing the letter from Mrs. Correll to Ralph Turlington:

Mr. Ralph Turlington
Florida State Commissioner of Education
The Capitol, Tallahassee, Florida

Dear Mr. Turlington:

In reference to your directive to all school districts across the State of Florida, concerning the observance of Christmas and the removal of Christ from Christmas; this has the effect of observing Christmas, but making its observance without meaning—just another pagan celebration by State edict. I am aware that you deny this, referring to it as "erroneous press coverage", but so that all involved may be fully informed, let me quote from your directive, page 4:

"Religious observance of Christmas, Hannukah, or Easter depicting the Birth, resurrection, or crucifixion of Christ constitute a form of religious teaching, and are therefore unconstitutional."

It should be noted that this statement purposely misleads one to believe that it is directed at the Jewish as well as the Christian religion. It is readily understood that this is decidedly biased against the Christian religion when one understands that Hannukah is a Jewish religious holiday having nothing whatsoever to do with the "birth, crucifixion, or resurrection of Christ". Therefore, while attempting to convey the inference of impartiality, it is clearly directed at only the Christian beliefs, a decided discrimination.

If, however, as you say, that in regard to the public school practices or activities, that any religious observance of Christmas or Easter depicting the birth, crucifixion, or death of Christ is unconstitutional, then hadn't you better send out another directive forbidding Christmas (which is the observance of the birth of Christ) and Easter (which is the observance of the resurrection of Christ) vacations? Why, sir, should the entire school close down to observe the birth of Christ or the resurrection of Christ whom the teacher is forbidden to accurately depict? Would it not be better for the State to remain neutral in this area rather than to destroy the deep significance of this Christian observance?

Perhaps, sir, you are not aware that you are carrying out the proposal made by William Z. Foster, then Chairman of the Communist Party, U.S.A., in his book, "Toward A Soviet America," published in 1932. Communist Foster predicts: "God will be banished from the laboratories as well as from the schools.... The studies will be revolutionized, being cleansed of religious, patriotic, and other features of the bourgeois ideology."

Perhaps you should read the United States Constitution: "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." It appears to me that you have caused much confusion and dismay by overemphasis of the first part, "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion" in a manner not intended—and have completely ignored the second half, "or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The Founding Fathers' reason was just this in seeking refuge in America. The intent of the first Congress was not to disassociate government completely from belief in deity; rather, the purpose of the First Amendment was to prevent the establishment of an official religion in the U.S. such as the once Church of England and the Catholic Church, or the Jewish religion of Israel. By your directive, you have put the government directly into the business of regulating religion. Your edict not only disregards the religious heritage of the nation, but it is patently unconstitutional. Moreover, it is not applied to all in the same manner, but is applied in a discriminatory manner purposely directed at and denying observance of the Christian religion only.

It is important to note that the Pilgrims braved hardships and left their native countries because of their determination to worship God freely as their consciences dictated. The undergirding fact of their lives was their belief in God. This conviction stabilized their lives. It gave purpose and direction to all they did and all they were destined to become. It appeared on their coins, it directed their courts of law, it built their houses of worship and their universities—and, yes, even their schools (which now forbid the truths of Christ to be mentioned) were begun to teach children to read their Bibles that they might come to accept Christ as their Saviour. It appears to me as our children become less stable, have less purpose and direction to their lives, you have added to this confusion. Perhaps the students of today will have to strike out in search of new lands free from governmental interference in religious freedom, and become the pilgrims of tomorrow.

I suggest to you, sir, that perhaps you are not quite objective in your directive. I find no mention of Godless Humanism, which has been declared a religion by the U.S. Supreme Court (in Torcaso v. Watkins 367 U.S. 488), and which is pervasive throughout the tax-supported schools. But, again, that there be no confusion, let me define a few of the tenets of this religious belief, and place them in proper educational perspective (see below).

RELIGIOUS HUMANISM

1. Universe self-existing; no God, heaven or hell
2. Autonomous (man has no higher authority); self-actualized (describes one who has become autonomous)
3. Situational ethics, "Ethics is autonomous and situational—no definite rights or wrongs
4. Sexual freedom, including birth control, homosexuality, abortion, etc.
5. Death with dignity
6. Deplore nationalism; promote world government
7. Leaders John Dewey, Kirkendall, Ellis, B.F. Skinner, Betty Friedan, etc.

HUMANISTIC EDUCATION

1. Teaches evolution as fact, not theory
2. Student urged to make his own decision free from influence of parents, church, or law
3. Situational ethics taught—one example, survival games.
4. Sexual freedom, including counseling, passing out of birth control pills to girls as young as age 12 without parents' consent or knowledge
5. Death education
6. UNESCO teachings, world government education
7. John Dewey, Kirkendall, Albert Ellis, Betty Friedan, etc.

If, as you say, you are intent on equal application of the First Amendment, what steps have you taken to apply the same rules to the Religion of Humanism? The State-adopted textbook, "Psychology For You," by Sol Gordon, is listed in the Catalog of Florida State-Adopted Instructional Material as a humanistic text. And it consistently carries out the tenets of the religion of Humanism. It even goes so far as to refer to Jesus Christ as a myth, and to encourage the students to read "Playboy" magazine so that they might adopt the immoral sexuality of the Humanist religion. In your directive, you quote Justice Clark's words regarding neutrality (School District of Abington Township V. Schempp 374 U.S. 203). In that same case, you should also go a little further and read Justice Douglas' remarks: "The First Amendment does not separate church from state in all respects... otherwise, the state and church would be aliens to each other, hostile, suspicious, unfriendly. We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a belief in the Supreme Being... No government facility may be used to commit inhibition or hostility against religion." I suggest your edict uses a government facility to commit inhibition against religion and further, the mentioned textbook, approved and recommended by yourself, commits hostility to the Christian religion by portraying it as a myth, and therefore untrue.

To illustrate that the Gordon textbook is not simply an isolated example, consider Macos-Man, a course of study, a federally-funded program which has been used extensively in Florida. According to Peter B. Dow, principal developer of Macos, the course challenges "the notion that there are eternal truths (e.g. the Ten Commandments), that must be passed down from one generation to the next." Among others: values education, "New Model Me", values clarification, moral education, and world education are but a few of the many Humanistic educational techniques and programs. Many are prevalent in Florida. One of the Humanistic beliefs, evolution, is taught as fact, not theory. In a recent survey of Florida textbooks, the method was overwhelming. Rarely was any other method of the origin of the earth and its inhabitants even considered, even though a large number of scientists today consistently state there is not one shred of scientific evidence to support the theory of evolution, and a great deal to show it is scientifically impossible.

The American Humanist Association has launched a major attack on the growing trend in school systems to adopt a fair and balanced approach to origins. Enclosed please find Rampa "Tribune" article outlining Humanism in government-supported schools in Florida, October 19, 1976.

I believe that because of exploitation of Supreme Court rulings, such as yours, millions of children in the United States are being denied the right to religious freedom. I believe that the fruit of Humanistic teaching is manifested in more and more deviate behavior by our youth. Mr. Turlington, I charge you with contributing to this problem.

I am looking forward to your response... It should be remembered that we will be governed in our evaluation by the statement made by a famous Person who said, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Sincerely,
Shirley M. Correll

"Among religions in this country which do not teach what would generally be considered a belief in the existence of God are Buddhism, Taoism, Ethical Culture, Secular Humanism and others."

ARE SCHOOLS TOO HUMANISTIC?

Early this week when parent groups protesting the content of school textbooks testified before a state legislative committee, one of their targets was "humanism," a philosophy which they say permeates the public schools.

From puzzled looks on spectators' faces and whispered inquiries, it was obvious many of those present had no idea what these parents were talking about. Yet this single complaint cuts to the core of what protestors are striving for—to do more than just eradicate the dirty words and pro-revolutionary sentiment they claim to have found in school texts.

"Our children are definitely being inculcated with the tenets of humanism in the public schools," said a Baptist minister from Jacksonville. "Every facet of the educational process is being affected by social engineers who are attempting to shape the world of the future through education." The social engineers the Rev. Don Glen refers to are educators; and while the word humanism is seldom heard among them, those familiar with the concept agree it has become entwined with all levels of our educational system.

Viewing humans as the ultimate beings, applauding their individual differences and directing all things toward the betterment of human life, this philosophy has been described by some as secular or social religion and by others as non-religion. Rooted in thinking of ancient Greek and Roman philosophers, humanism came to full flower during the Renaissance period and in this century has been adapted by followers to deal with current issues. That's where the problem with dissenting parents comes in.

The group that's been causing the most stir in the state textbook controversy, the Florida Action Committee on Education (FACE), is made up of people who say they are all politically, socially and ethically conservative. And when teachers or textbook authors of a humanistic bent deal with issues such as overpopulation, war, nationalism, sexual equality or food and energy shortages with the well-being of all humankind as their guiding light, the result is something the FACE parents find unacceptable. They say they want students to be conditioned into patriotism, loyalty to this country alone, into accepting current laws without question, into respect for authority for its own sake....

"Our children are being taught situational ethics—the doing away with any absolute standard," says the Rev. Glen. "They are given a watering down of black and white in religion and morality, told nothing is true or untrue, right or wrong."

sheila Jarsonbeck, a curriculum specialist with the public schools here who is training other teachers in the application of humanism in the classroom, agrees that the principle is being taught in the schools. Rather than give children any absolutes in the area of morals and values, she explains, teachers should give youngsters a means for searching out their own feelings and thoughts so they can formulate their own ethics.

Various aspects of what Mrs. Jarsonbeck teaches—values clarification methods, transactional analysis, behavior modification techniques—may be observed in any number of educational settings from kindergarten through college, although use of them is not always labeled humanistic.

What the FACE parents are asking is whether the public schools have the right to wean children away from their parents' beliefs, values and prejudices; and even if they do, is the education system the proper vehicle for engineering social changes?

These questions did not originate with the textbook controversy, however. They have arisen with increasing frequency in recent years as the public schools have begun to shoulder more of the burdens of indoctrinating children into this society — burdens formerly borne by family and church.

In this instance, though, dissenting parents feel that if they can just exercise control over what public school children are offered to read, they may be able to substitute their own conservative ideals for the humanistic ones they now see. Yet even they recognize this may not be possible, that it may be too late to stem the tide....

(End of quotes from article in Tampa, Florida Tribune-Times)

Christian parents are coming to realize that it is too late to stem the tide in the case of tax-supported schools. This letter should be proof of that fact. "Let the government have its schools, and we'll have our own," is the Christian parents' answer to teachers of the Religion of Humanism. "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you.

Year Twenty-Four Number Fifty-One December 30, 1977

1978 - THE YEAR OF THE GREAT AWAKENING ?

PAST IS PROLOGUE ?

"Surely this will go down in history as the age of insanity," wrote Raymond C. Heaps, chairman of the American Independent Party. His explanation is worthy of deep thought:

"Our Founding Fathers gave us a limited Constitutional Republic, and added: 'If you can keep it.' Today, most of the voters obediently vote for candidates of the two major parties, which are controlled by the International Financiers. We were given a system of currency and coinage directly under the control of our U.S. Congress, on which the bankers could draw no interest. Today, a privately owned Federal Reserve System controls our currency; we will pay them over $40 billion this year in interest on money which we print, and which is no longer backed by gold, silver, or even copper. The Congress has abdicated the most important of its powers. The President now creates law by Executive Order and the Supreme Court creates law by fiat, and both are contrary to the Constitution. The U.S. State Department now gives away billions of dollars to foreign countries. According to U.S. Senator Harry F. Byrd, Jr., the State Department cancelled a $2.2 billion debt owed by India to the U.S., and a $2.6 billion debt owed by Russia to the U.S. since World War II. And only last year, a U.S. President granted a pardon to his predecessor, yet it is only the U.S. Senate which has the power to decide on guilt or innocence, or to forgive a president for his crime. But for what could Nixon have been pardoned? A pardon is given only after one has been tried, convicted and sentenced. To avoid a trial, amnesty may be given, but the President has no such power to use for a President or a former President.

"Consider some of the major blunders made by the leaders of our government. After World War II we gave Eastern Europe to the Soviets at Yalta and Potsdam. In 1947 we gave China to the Communists by cutting off arms (to the Nationalist forces under Chiang Kai-shek). In the early fifties we fought a no-win war in Korea. In 1958 we helped Fidel Castro establish a communist dictatorship in Cuba. For twelve years we fought a no-win war in Vietnam and sacrificed 57,000 American lives, while we increased trade and the shipment of wheat to the Soviets; as they sent arms, munitions and advisers to North Vietnam; so that the U.S. finally negotiated a surrender on the same terms the communists had offered to us in 1964. Recently we have seen the Soviets gobble up Angola and Mozambique. Now our leaders want the surrender of Rhodesia, Southwest Africa, South Africa and our Panama Canal to Soviet control; as the whole world watches to see how far we will go in our surrender to Soviet conquest.

"It is never the people of any country, but the leaders who take them into slavery." . . .
(end of quotation)

This "age of insanity" may reach a climax in 1978. Witness the present peregrination of President Carter and the diplomatic muddle that has been made. As Hilaire du Berrier reported from Paris:

"President Jimmy Carter leads America and theoretically the free world. As the year's end approached, out of Washington poured pronouncements, announcements of great plans, then changing of plans. Five men, born within a hundred miles of Plains, Georgia, and totally unfitted for advising a President in one of the most critical periods of history, passed the weekend with the Carters at Camp David in early November: Hamilton Jordan, Jody Powell, Stuart Eizenstat, Frank Moore and Robert Lipshutz, the new faces that Carter the candidate had promised to bring to Washington. Nine foreign governments were deep in preparations for a Presidential visit due to begin November 22. Suddenly the trip was called off. In Venezuela, Brazil, Nigeria, Saudi Arabia, India, Iran, France, Poland and Belgium, the President's prestige slumped. Did or didn't the man know what he was going to do? Hamilton Jordan, the White House secretary, shrugged off charges of amateurishness with a carefree 'Who cares about protocol?' The answer is: All educated statesmen do. Protocol is the etiquette of governments. A British editor described the President's credo as: When in doubt, grin."

Late in December the President's trip was re-scheduled. But this time he would visit only six countries. Ignored and embarrassed were the heads of state of Venezuela, Brazil, and Nigeria. The energy crisis was given as the excuse for the change in plans. The President stayed at home to witness the defeat in Congress of most of his energy program, and the delay of the rest of it until Congress reconvenes in 1978. But in his televised conversation with selected media representatives just before flying to Warsaw, Carter stuck to his "energy theme" and committed a very revealing booboo when he said that the energy situation would "bind us more closely to Europe." This is the aim of the promoters of "Interdependence," and few U.S. taxpayers are anxious to be bound any more closely to Europe or any other part of the world outside the American hemisphere (as George Washington emphasized and James Monroe doctrinized).

Carter's second alleged blunder also came on the eve of his departure for Poland. The Carter Administration needs "Jewish votes and Zionist influence" while the world

THE SAVE-YOUR-LIFE DEFENSE HANDBOOK

Matt Braun, former army officer and Ranger instructor, spent years training both troops and civilians in all aspects of self defense. In view of the rising crime wave and the acts of terrorism that are sweeping the country—and the world—Braun must have felt that he could expand his services by putting his knowledge into a handbook, a manual that would teach both men and women how to defend their property, their family, and their person. But getting such a handbook published wasn't easy. He approached 20 publishers with his manuscript before he found one—Devin-Adair—with the backbone to publish it. Many of the others vilified him for daring to write it. Because it is a frank, no-holds-barred manual of hand-to-hand combat, gun and knife fighting, and other aspects of self defense, with 60 action photographs to demonstrate the various techniques. For those determined to defend themselves and theirs at all costs, this is a must. 6" by 9" paperback, 186 pages, $5.95. needs Arabian oil and the Arabian world's floating capital. To maintain a balance between the two has been a tricky task. As we wrote in a previous Report, Arabian money was bailing out Rockefeller's Chase Manhattan Bank and its satellites to the tune of some $17 billion on the promise that the United States would protect and defend the Arab world. But then it was discovered that Israeli military leaders were planning a preemptive strike that would defeat the Arabs decisively and buy at least ten years of peace. Such a plan had to be aborted, so the Trilateralist Commission arranged for Egypt's Sadat to visit Israeli's Begin, and for Begin to return the visit. Conferences and peace overtures were to continue between the two, with no outside interference from the United States Government until such time as the hoped-for Geneva Conference was convened.

But Carter let something slip that angered the entire Arab world. He told reporters that he saw no reason for the creation of any Palestinian State in Palestine. This has been the crux of the dispute between Sadat and Begin, and is the hottest spot on the entire Arab-Israeli gridiron. Begin smiled, Sadat couldn't believe his ears, and the Arab world wondered after the breach of faith on the part of Carter.

Then, as though it were planned that way (and who is to say it wasn't?) Secretary of State and Trilateralist Cy Vance stepped in to reassure Rockefeller's Arabian creditors by insisting that President Carter didn't really mean what he had said.

Then came the most bizarre blooper of them all, involving an insult to the people of Poland, the one communist dominated country to be visited by Carter on this "good will" trip. It so happens that Jimmy Carter's most important "Rockefeller Connection" is Zbigniew Brzezinski. Also, it so happens that Brzezinski is a Polish-American; and yet again it happened that Warsaw, Poland was to be Jimmy Carter's very first stop on his grand tour. Here's what happened, according to a CBS radio news report:

"A new interpreter will be on hand this morning (Dec. 30) to translate the President's news conference into Polish. A State Department employee, Steven Seymour, was relieved of his duties after he made several glaring mistakes in translating Mr. Carter's arrival speech. Among the worst errors was the translation of the phrase 'your desires for the future' as 'your carnal lusts for the future'."

It is said that the great majority of Polish people give true allegiance, willingly, to the Roman Catholic Church, but render only token allegiance, unwillingly, to their Communist overlords. So the people who heard the speech were infuriated at Carter, not knowing that the translator had taken considerable freedom in his translation of the President's remarks.

Three incidents, planned that way? Carter speaking of our being "bound" to Europe; his pro-Israeli, anti-Arab reference to a national home for Palestinians displaced by the Zionist "lesser brethren" who moved to Palestine; and a vulgarizing of a speech of welcome to the least "communized" of the communist-dominated peoples of Europe. Put them all together and they spell ridicule for America and regard for the Soviet. Carter is depicted as something of a barbarian in his disregard of protocol, the etiquette of governments. Then he displays his ineptness at diplomacy by saying what was supposed to be left unsaid about the Middle East controversy that could become a conflagration if mishandled. Finally, vulgarisms hurled at the Polish people seemingly by an honored guest, the President of the United States.

Yes, an age of insanity; but an age of planned insanity; and in this coming year of our Lord 1978, it appears that it is going to become insaner and insaner, and it is being planned that way. However, there is this consolation: when alleged errors and mistakes by leaders become so obvious that all can see and wonder, then people begin to ask questions, and to seek answers.

One example of this trend comes to us from England, a country which is several years ahead of us on the road toward total socialism. John Junor, editor of London's Sunday Express, was addressing the Fleet Street Institute of Journalists recently. Among other things, he said: "If anyone had told me five years ago that personal freedom was in real danger in this country, I would have laughed at him as a fool. There would be few of us who would do the same today. We are now in a world where union leaders are more important than Parliament." This from the editor of an important London paper, to editors and journalists of other important papers. If they start to write what they now are beginning to understand, a real awakening may be possible.

It seems that another British journalist went even further, writing much the same as this reporter has been saying in DBR for these many years. H du B Reports from Paris, and we quote:

Mr. James Crossbow... openly... used the word conspiracy, a term that a year ago would have made editors call him a kook and lunatic fringer. Group Research, with its Washington office packed with smear files on honest Americans while government security agencies are forced to burn files on blatant subversives, would have issued a call to disrupt his lectures, if Mr. Crossbow had dared go to America. He wrote:

"Specialists in the study of One World Conspiracy differ in their view of the relationship between the American Financial Elite and the Soviet Union. Some see it as a partnership, others as a straightforward attempt to seek Soviet victory. My view is that the Financial Elite seek to advance the Soviet Union to a position where its predominance is not so great that it will demand total victory rather than a merger, yet its strength is sufficient for the American people to be bamboozled or threatened into compliance."

Mr. Crossbow continues: "One prong of the conspiracy works on the American people, its objective being, in the words of the Ford Foundation President Rowan Gaither, 'so to alter our life in the United States that we can be comfortably merged with the Soviet Union.' Another prong seeks by the use of economic power to influence and cajole the Soviet Union to accept the degree of communist advance allotted in the master plan. This involves influencing the internationally-minded element in Russia as against the military types who seek victory, not merger." In Mr. Crossbow's opinion, "the rocks on which One World will founder will be the unwillingness of the toughest elements in the Soviet Union to accept merger in preference to either total victory or stalemate and an empire in Europe and Africa."

This latter, British view, presupposes that the Soviet leaders, with the aid of their Financial Elite masters, may become so successful in their conquest of Europe and Africa that they might emulate Frankenstein's Monster, take over their Elitist masters and proceed to set up a One World Government on their own terms.

There is always the possibility that one prong of a World Conspiracy can grow so powerful that it can "control the head" of the Conspiracy. The Financial Elitists have aided the Soviet in its attempt to take over mastery of the seas; the giving away of the American Canal in Panama to a communist puppet named Torrijos would virtually complete such conquest.

In Europe, the Communist Parties have made great gains in both Italy and France. There is the possibility that Communists can gain control over both of these governments. We are told that this presents no real danger because Euro-Communism is different, and the Euro-Communist leaders have dared to criticize the Soviet regime openly. However, a Communist is still a Communist and while the Parties of France and Italy say they are independent, they continue to support the foreign policy of the Soviet Union, and they still affirm their allegiance to "Proletarian Internationalism." The same is true of the Communist Parties in Spain and Portugal. Eurocommunism is a name given to the sheep's clothing being worn by the International Communist wolf, it was coined by one Franc Barbieri, who wrote in the April, 1977 issue of "Deutschland-archiv": "I have chosen the expression 'Eurocommunism' because I consider it a geographically precise but ideologically vague term.... And precisely because the very meaning of the term 'Eurocommunism' is unclear, I am led to wonder whether an European Community of predominantly Euro-communist countries would continue to be such as when originally formed. Today the Community expresses the traditions of Western Europe. The Eurocommunists do, in fact, say that they would like to keep it as an independent force between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.... But this is an illusion. A Euro-communist Europe would surely mean Europe's Sovietization."

So much for Eurocommunism, which the Financial Elite promotes and subsidizes in France, Italy, Spain and Portugal. As for the "African Empire" which is being built for the Soviets, it has become obvious to the world that the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom are being used to destroy the stable governments of Rhodesia and South Africa, making their takeover by communist forces as easy as it was in Angola and Ethiopia. As for the rest of Black Africa, Cuban forces are being used as Soviet surrogates and a free hand is being given everywhere to terrorist and revolutionary bands, with the Soviet supplying the weapons and Cuba providing the "advisors."

Meanwhile domestically, here in the United States, 1978 will be a busy year for the Planners who are struggling to complete the socialization of the Newstates and to make Interdependence a necessity. For them there is the Genocide Convention to be ratified; the Human Rights Conventions that Carter signed still must be approved by the Senate; there is the troublesome task of getting the Senate—and perhaps the House as well—to approve the giving away of the American Canal in Panama. National Health Insurance and a Guaranteed Annual Income are yet to be legalized. Hanging fire is the watered-down but still fatal Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill which provides for the full socialization of the United States. The real danger here: Senator Humphrey, "The Happy Warrior," is a terminal case, but his influence will live long after he has passed from the world stage. The Congress might be tempted to approve S. 50 "as a fitting memorial" to Humphrey. Emotion is often more powerful than logic when bills are debated. Also of vital importance to the Planners are gun control legislation, ratification of ERA, more consumer product control, more power to the Regulators in all areas of American life.

A group of "experts" from Hudson Institute, Bell Laboratories, Stanford Research Institute, and Forecasting International got together to predict events that will come to pass in 1978. A few of their forecasts: Inflation will continue; tax reform is unlikely; military forces may become unionized; the present postal system will begin to disappear to be replaced by some form of electronic system that is less costly; electronic money handling will continue to grow; gasoline will be rationed; and more of the same type of predictions from the "experts." A pivotal year is the consensus of the captive communications media.

If the Planners are right, then things are really going to get worse before they can get better. But, in the spirit of that bleak year of 1778, let us face the year 1978 with the firm resolve that we "have just begun to fight." "Wherefore, gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to you" ..

THE IMPENDING DEATH OF THE U.S. DOLLAR

KILLED BY A COMPUTER?

The front page headline screamed out the news that the "Battered U.S. Dollar Dips Again." The story that followed, written by the Miami Herald's financial editor, James Russell, gave the details:

"The battered U.S. dollar took another steep dive Tuesday (Jan. 3) and carried the nervous stock market down with it. The new year opened on Wall Street and on foreign exchange markets around the world with intense selling pressure on the dollar along with a rise in the price of gold and a new round of weakness in American stocks. Some market analysts blamed the situation on America's worsening trade deficit...but more outspoken observers saw other reasons as well, including President Carter's widely publicized bloopers on his foreign tour (his pre-trip statements on the Palestinian issue which angered President Anwar Sadat, the incorrect translations suffered in Poland, and the overheard remarks about India Prime Minister Morarji Desai) and the realization that outgoing Federal Reserve Board chairman Arthur Burns will no longer be around as a financial safety valve in Washington.

"Whatever the motivation, the once-proud dollar was an unwanted currency in London, Paris, Zurich and other world money markets. The buck suffered one of its worst days as European financial institutions apparently carried out a new year's resolution to sell the U.S. currency short....

"It was not the dollar's slump alone that clipped the stock market Tuesday. Analysts said the sell-off of U.S. currency abroad was merely a catalyst. Lingering in the background were uncertainties about the course of the American economy in 1978, the fear of higher interest rates, the specter of renewed inflation and the question mark over the nomination of William Miller as Federal Reserve Board chairman. 'All over the world, major Central Bank appointments come from the financial circles,' said one Wall Street specialist. 'Miller is a businessman who may or may not know what he's doing in running the Fed.' The same analyst coupled the 'structural weakness' in America's trade deficit with the 'ineptitude' of the Carter Administration to deal with either domestic or foreign problems.... 'The President puts his foot in his mouth everywhere he goes abroad,' said Arnold Ganz, a Miami investment adviser who manages several million dollars worth of investments for various clients. 'World money managers have been trying to evaluate our President, and they didn't get any encouragement from what happened in the past few days. Add to that the appointment of a Federal Reserve chairman who has no experience in dealing with money and credit affairs, and you've got a bad situation'.... (end of quote)

We might suggest that these analysts who are quoted in the preceding article may have overlooked the possibility that Carter's 'ineptitude' in dealing with domestic and foreign affairs may be a deliberately pre-planned part of an overall program; and that the appointment of a multinationalist executive instead of an international banker, to head the Fed, may be an important part of the plot. We'll explain later; but first, to complete the current developments:

On Wednesday, January 5 the story of the "dipping dollar" was published. The next day, on the front page of the same newspaper appeared the headline "U.S. to Bolster Sinking Dollar." The story began:

"The United States Wednesday intervened on a massive scale to prop the dollar abroad, announcing a plan to back the battered currency through a $20-billion swap arrangement with foreign central banks and a special $4.7-billion currency-stabilization fund...."

This is, admittedly, a stop-gap measure. Previously, to bolster the sagging dollar, Japan and West Germany have come to the rescue of the U.S. dollar. This year they refused to do so, and the U.S. Treasury and the Federal Reserve had to trade the more stable foreign currency on hand to purchase foreign-held U.S. dollars. The next step: the United States will be forced to use its remaining gold to buy back Eurodollars and Petrodollars. It is estimated that the U.S. still holds some $25 billion in gold bullion. We have no way of knowing whether this is a true statement, since only the creme de la creme of the Elite are ever permitted to inspect Fort Knox and other carefully guarded vaults where gold may be stored. However, when the last of the gold has been used to prop up Eurodollars and Petrodollars over which neither the U.S. Treasury nor the Federal Reserve has any control, then will come the death of the dollar as an international currency, and the establishment of a new world currency will not be a matter of choice, but a matter of necessity.

Did such a situation just happen? Let's see what the record shows.

After passage of the Federal Reserve Act by Congress in 1913, the Money Barons then began the slow, step-by-careful-step task of removing all gold and silver from the U.S. monetary system—at least as far as U.S. citizens are concerned. First there were gold certificates, which could be redeemed into gold when presented at a Federal Reserve Bank. Then there came the silver certificates which were redeemable in silver when presented. Finally came the final step in 1964, when the currency the public was to use was the Federal Reserve Note, which is nothing more than a trading stamp since it is redeemable in nothing and is "legal tender" simply because, like checks, it is accepted as payment of debts, public and private. Also in 1964 all new coinage was prohibited from having its previous silver content.

Also with the passage of the Federal Reserve Act, deficit financing on the part of the Federal Government became easy and "politically safe." Whenever the government wanted to finance some new project and couldn't obtain the money through direct or indirect taxation, the money was simply "borrowed." The U.S. Treasury would issue interest bearing bonds. If these could not be sold on the open market, then the FED would step in and buy them. This is called "monetization" of the debt. The FED takes the Treasury Notes, issues Federal Reserve Notes into circulation. New money is thus created to finance the new federal project, the FED starts collecting interest on the Treasury Notes. The public debt mounts, the annual interest payments mount, and the public suffers as the resulting inflation causes the Federal Reserve Note to buy less and less.

The FED has some control over inflation at the domestic level, especially through its use of the "Reserve Requirement Ratio" and other instruments with which it can control the interest rates, the amount of money in circulation. The use of these instruments—or the lack of their use—lies at the root of the argument which caused Carter to replace Arthur Burns with William Miller.

But there is another factor over which the FED has little or no control. This has to do with Eurodollars and Petrodollars.

With the creation of the World Bank, IMF, Regional Banks, GATT, etc., the U.S. dollar began to be accepted as an "international" medium of exchange. U.S. dollars went overseas through the Marshall Plan, relief agencies, payments for imports, multinational investments, tourist trade, etc. There were so many of these U.S. dollars floating around that they became "assets" for a European loaning pool from which businessmen, corporations and foreign governments could borrow dollars without using U.S. banks. This money just keeps going around in circles, nobody seems to know just how much there is of it—estimates run from $150 billion to $300 billion. And the U.S. Government is responsible for these "foreign" dollars but has no actual control over them. That is why, when the dollar dips on the international market, the U.S. must literally buy back its own dollars, using the currency of other countries, or the always acceptable gold bullion.

The real danger from these Eurodollars and Petrodollars is that they will buy U.S. products just as well as the dollars in your local bank. It is always possible that the holders of these "foreign" Eurodollars and Petrodollars could make a "run" on U.S. products, properties, and investments. We have heard of gigantic investments by foreign interests and individuals in U.S. properties. The most recent was the purchase of Bert Lance's bank stock at an inflated price by a foreign national who is rich in Petrodollars.

This situation poses a real problem to U.S. based banks as well as to U.S. citizens. And the Rockefeller interests, for the protection of International Bankers and Multinational Corporations, conceived the idea of creating a supra-national organization which could dictate both national and international policies, and control the economic and monetary affairs of the world. This organization bears the name Trilateral Commission and it was understood from the beginning that members of the TLC were to gain control of the external affairs of the nations in which they held citizenship. Thus, Jimmy Carter became a member of TLC because it was felt that he could gain control of the Executive Branch of the United States Government, and because it was believed that he would do the bidding of the TLC Elite in all that the organization's leaders commanded.

Concerning the financial plans of the TLC and the manner in which these plans might lead to the death of the dollar, we call attention to an important article which appeared in the February 7, 1977 issue of the Christian Science Monitor. The Monitor is a liberal publication which for years has been an unofficial mouthpiece for the Eastern Establishment and the Council on Foreign Relations, and now has become an outlet for the Trilateral Commission. We can assume that this article appeared on purpose and not by accident. If we recall how shaky the Big Banks of the U.S. really are, how special deals have had to be made with the Arabs who control the Petrodollars, how the Lesser Developed Countries are finding it impossible to repay the huge loans to U.S. banks, how banks are saddled with municipal bonds issued by technically bankrupt cities, then we can see that many of the larger U.S. Banks are in real trouble, that their liabilities exceed their assets, and that they are going to do something to save themselves, even if this means the death of the dollar and the creation of a new form of international currency.

This is the background to the article we referred to; and here is that article:

(The Trilateral Commission) has devised a plan to totally renovate GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade), the IMF (International Monetary Fund) and the World Bank. The plan would create a world economic system far different from that of Bretton Woods.

To support free trade, the Commission calls for a new IMF, which would function like the Federal Reserve System, but on a larger scale. The new IMF would be able to 'create' money or restrict the 'creation' of money, just as the Federal Reserve now does in the U.S.

To do this, a new currency called "Bancor" would be established. Like the Special Drawing Rights of the IMF, this currency would replace gold and the dollar as the world monetary unit. All currencies would be fixed in terms of Bancor, so that at some future date, even travelers checks and all export-import transactions would be calculated in terms of Bancor.

The new IMF would also be a "banker of last resort," capable of helping national central banks and the multinational banks in times of distress. Like the Federal Reserve and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) in the U.S., the new IMF could step in to help out banks in trouble in any part of the world.

According to an economist at Harvard, "the new IMF is the centerpiece of the system. It would change the system completely and may lead to a whole new era in finance."

The World Bank would be changed as well. At present, the World Bank raises funds on the private capital markets in New York, Tokyo and Frankfurt. "Under the new system, the World Bank could borrow Bancor from the IMF," said one Trilateral official. "This could change the whole system and make possible more foreign aid to developing countries."

The President has recently called the leaders of Europe and Japan to a major "economic summit." Vice President Mondale, a member of the Commission, has been visiting Europe and Japan since the inauguration to discuss the proposals.

"The next summit will be equal to Bretton Woods," said one Carter aide, "and a new economic order could be in the works."

Eleven months have passed since the foregoing article was first published. Since that time, an important meeting of the Trilateral Commission was held (last October) and it is reported that plans were discussed and formalized--and probably set in motion. A deal was made with Saudi Arabia, and with Anwar Sadat of Egypt. It is quite possible that the purchase of U.S. dollars from foreign holders by the U.S. Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve System, was a part of the Trilateralist plan to save certain banks while at the same time killing the U.S. dollar as a dependable "standard" of exchange, and paving the way for the replacement of the dollar by the new Bancor. Certainly, the replacement of Arthur Burns as head of the Federal Reserve System was a part of the plan. Burns is one of the important Money Barons, but he is of the old school and "sot in his ways." He did not go along with the Carter (Trilateralist) programming, and said so publicly. So, it became expedient for Carter to bring in one more "new face," a person who would obey the leaders of the Hidden Government, and help in their creation of the new economic system for the world. G. William Miller seems to fit the role perfectly. While the communications media suggest that Miller knows little or nothing about finance, and is known by nobody of importance in the world of finance, this is patently untrue. Miller was approved by David Rockefeller, was okayed by George Meany, and was talked into accepting the post as Federal Reserve Board chairman by Vice President Walter Mondale.

According to a staff report of the Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing of the House of Representatives (August 1976), G. William Miller is listed as a Class B Director of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston. In addition to heading Textron, Inc., a multinational corporation doing more than $2 billion in sales per year, Miller is also shown to have been a director from 1963 to 1970 of the Rhode Island Hospital Trust National Bank, with nearly a billion in assets. There is also this important notation concerning Miller in this official staff report: "Rhode Island Hospital Trust Corporation, a one-bank holding company, owns this bank." This would hardly qualify him to be called an ignoramus in the field of finance.

Textron, which Miller heads (or headed) at an annual salary of $383,334.00, is not a small business. Textron, with main offices at 40 Westminster Street, Providence, Rhode Island, is the holding company for Bell Aerospace, Bell Helicopters, Bostitch staplers, Hall-Mack bathroom accessories, Donahue Sales sewing products, Eaton Paper stationery, Berkshire typewriter paper, Gorham sterling silver, Homelite chain saws & garden tractors, E-Z-Go golf carts, Allied Paints, Polaris snowmobiles, W.A. Shaeffer Pen Co., Speidel Corp., Talon Zippers, Gibson Electric Co., Security Corporation of Hartford Insurance Co., and about a dozen other enterprises.

So, G. William Miller is hardly an unknown person in the field of multinational executives, or in the financial field.

Nor is Miller a newcomer in the field of partisan politics. He served in volunteer posts during the administrations of John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson. He has been active in the left wing of the Democratic party in Rhode Island for a number of years. In 1966 he served as chairman of the campaign committee for Senator Claiborne Pell who is one of the most liberal of all lawmakers in the Nation's capital. Miller is also co-chairman of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economics Council.

One thing that particularly worries conservative economists is his praise for Keynes. A speech Miller delivered last January (1977) before the Pittsburgh Traffic Club was titled: "The Not Impossible Goal: Full Employment and Price Stability." At one point in the address he said: "Keynesian economics has worked very well to reflate a depressed economy." What we don't need as a monetary dictator is a professing and practicing disciple of Lord Maynard Keynes!

Said the conservative "Human Events": What is even less reassuring to business conservatives is that two of Miller's strongest supporters are AFL-CIA boss George Meany and Vice President Mondale. Meany said Miller's selection means the President 'is clearly moving away from the discredited policies' of Burns. Going from bad to worse, we might add.

We pointed out in a previous Report that the new international monetary system (Bancor) and the domestic electronic money system that is being developed to replace our present "checks and currency" system are being sponsored by the same set of bankers (the Rockefeller and Rothschild affiliates). So, it would appear that G. William Miller, on the basis of his public record, is an ideal "middle man" to help set up a Federal Reserve System on a worldwide scale, while at the same time converting our National Federal Reserve System into a gigantic Computer Bank, where every person will have a number, and where no person shall buy or sell unless he has a number.

FAVORED NATION TREATMENT FOR THE REDS

STEP BY STEP TO CONVERGENCE

There is nothing new about the practice of giving away U.S. military, technological and trade secrets to the Soviet. That practice began in 1933 after Franklin Roosevelt and Maxim Litvinoff concluded an infamous deal providing for the diplomatic recognition of the Bolshevik dictatorship. The practice became "official" when the USSR was accorded Lend-Lease privileges. The practice reached something of a zenith when the Soviet was given the plans and materials with which to build atom bombs (as reported by Major George Racey Jordan in his book Major Jordan's Diaries.)

Despite laws and restrictions designed to prevent "trading with the enemy," the practice has continued to this day, intensifying dramatically after Henry Kissinger established an "open door policy" with both Moscow and Peking. This created a difference: Prior to the 70s, deals that many people looked upon as acts of treason were transacted secretly, or indirectly, through other countries that acted as "middle-men." Now, however, since the Trilateralists have assumed command of our Ship of State, such deals are transacted openly, and even boastfully. For example, the following UPI dispatch would have shocked people a few years ago and they would have demanded somebody's scalp. But the dispatch appeared on the front page of a metropolitan daily on Tuesday, January 10, 1978. It read:

"Washington (UPI) — The Soviet Union is sending one of its top Communist Party specialists in foreign relations on an 11-day U.S. visit to assess the administration's human-rights, arms-control and other policies, sources said Monday. Congressional and administration sources said Boris N. Ponomarev, a secretary of the Communist Party's Central Committee, will arrive Jan. 22 at the head of a high-level parliamentary delegation. One source said the administration hoped Ponomarev would be convinced of the American commitment to detente and improved U.S.-Soviet relations.

"Traveling with Ponomarev will be several distinguished Soviet observers of the American and international scene who also hold parliamentary positions in foreign affairs. They are Dr. Georgi Arbatov, director of the Institute of American Studies; Nikolai Intozemtzev, director of the Institute of World Economy; Georgi Zhukov, political commentator; and Leonid Zamyatin, head of the Tass news agency and formerly spokesman of the Soviet Foreign Ministry.

"Arbatov warned last April in an article published in the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists that under President Carter the United States seemed to be abandoning detente and returning to Cold War policies. Such misgivings may have now been swept away by progress in the strategic arms talks. But the Russians are still concerned about implications of Carter's human rights policies and the outcome of the Belgrade conference on East-West relations.

"The Russians will be guests of the Senate and House. They will make a weeklong tour of the United States, stopping in Houston, Los Angeles, Detroit and New York."

(end of article)

While these high-ranking Communists were preparing to make an on-the-spot inspection to be sure our government is carrying out what the Soviet government must think of as surrender terms, American-based multinationalists were busy making new trade deals with the Communists. The latest reported transaction appeared in Jan. 10th papers:

"Purchase, N.Y. (AP) — A Soviet importer hopes 'to place one bottle of Russian vodka on the table of every household in America.' In return, Pepsi-Cola says it hopes to double the consumption of its soft drink in the Soviet Union. The plans for increased consumption of both beverages was announced at Pepsi-Cola headquarters here. Donald Kendall chairman and chief executive officer of PepsiCo, said that under expansion of a trade agreement with the Russians, five new Pepsi plants would be built in the Soviet Union in the next two years. With the two existing plants and three under construction, that would mean 10 plants with a yearly output of 30 million cases, Kendall said, Kendall said PepsiCo would increase imports of Stolichnaya Vodka to the United States from the current 200,000 cases a year to a million annually." (unquote).

More serious than the exchange of Pepsi Cola for vodka, however, is the fact that some of our federal agencies exchange technical and defense information with the Soviet. It was reported not long ago that the General Services Administration "cheerfully supplied the Soviet Embassy with an 'Inventory and Summary' of some of the Pentagon's most sensitive computer locations. The obliging GSA volunteered, in the spirit of detente, that its staff would be 'happy to assist you if there are any questions.' The secret computers track ship movements on the high seas and provide the Joint Chiefs with critical information about major weapons systems.

Also in the spirit of detente, the US and the USSR have agreed to exchange "official" publications. Each year the United States delivers between 10,000 and 12,000 government documents to the Lenin State Library in Moscow. Recently Czechoslovakia and Hungary signed up for 10,000 selective reports each year from the U.S. National Technical Information Service. The two countries are completely under Soviet domination.

In a recent article by P.A. Del Valle, the retired Marine Corps General asked: "Is it not our government's intention to follow the foreign policy of the now declassified N.S.C. Report No. 68 whose language points clearly to the intention to "Reduce the USA to the point where our people can merge comfortably with Soviet Russia? The verb 'to merge' is described in Webster's Dictionary as meaning 'to lose, or cause loss of, identity by being absorbed, combined, etc.' This explains the absolute indifference of our Washington Government to the fact that we have not only allowed Soviet Russia to gain superiority over us in armed might, but have helped them do so by the grain deals and by trading with the enemy during which we let them have almost every secret and technique we have." (unquote).

In official parlance, it seems that the verb "merge" has been replaced by the noun "convergence," which is defined as "the act of moving toward one point, coming together by gradual approach." In fact, our official foreign policy toward the Soviet since the end of World War II might be described in four words designating four steps in the slow march toward world government:

Cold War to Coexistence
Coexistence to Detente
Detente to Convergence

When Soviet specialist Arbatov warned that the United States under Carter seemed to be "abandoning detente and returning to Cold War policies," what he really meant was that the United States was abandoning Detente and adopting Convergence policies. This can best be seen in our recent action in returning the Crown of St. Stephen to the Moscow-dominated government in Budapest. A brief historical sketch seems indicated: In the 800s A.D. Arpad, a legendary chief of the Magyars, brought his people from beyond the Urals to the more pleasant land that was to be called Hungary. By 1000, Stephen I had succeeded in unifying the people and in converting many of them to Christianity. As a result, Pope Sylvester II presented Stephen with a crown, to symbolize his kingship as political and spiritual ruler of his people. Later, King Stephen was canonized and came to be known in history as St. Stephen. The crown has been used in over fifty coronations, and has deep religious as well as political significance to the Hungarian people.

The Hungarians have known much foreign domination. In 1526 it was overrun by the Turks; at the end of the 17th century the Austrians replaced the Turks; in 1866 a measure of independence was regained when the Austro-Hungarian empire was formed.

After the defeat of the empire in World War One, Hungary declared itself an independent nation. That was in 1919. But just two months later the Communist Bela Kun established himself as a dictator. Bela Kun was replaced by the more lenient but yet authoritarian Admiral Horthy. When World War II began, the nation was occupied by German troops. Hungary's last free election was held in 1946, following the defeat of Germany. Hungary declared itself to be a republic; but then the trouble with the Communists began. In 1956 a revolt erupted and the Soviet army moved in and took control, killing thousands of freedom fighters and Janos Kadar was declared Communist dictator of the country, a position which he still holds, thanks to the presence of Russian troops in Hungary.

In 1968, Hungary and the United States resumed full diplomatic relations and since that time the Rockefeller-led multinationalists have been "developing" trade with Hungary. Hungary has state-owned multi-nationals with plants in Western Europe, and these state-owned multinationals have inter-plant agreements with American multinationals.

But back to the Crown of St. Stephen. When it appeared that Hungary was to continue as a vassal state, this time to the Soviet, the Crown and other royal jewels were turned over to the United States for safe-keeping. They were kept in West Germany for a while and later was shipped to Fort Knox, Ky., where it remained until Secretary of State Cyrus Vance handed them over to the Moscow dominated Hungarian government in Budapest.

There was a great public outcry when it was announced that President Carter had decided to return the Crown. As an example, Phyllis Schlafly stated in part: "Why should United States policy on the Crown of St. Stephen change now? Why should we dignify this Godless regime with a Holy relic symbolic of Christianity and freedom? The Communists know the Hungarian tradition that says no state ceremony is considered legitimate and no ruler is legitimate without the Crown. The Communists want to give Dictator Kadar the appearance of legitimacy despite a long record of taking power by force and violence.... We became keenly concerned about the Crown of St. Stephen in 1971, for it was then that His Eminence Joseph Cardinal Mindszenty, at age 78, was finally released by the Communists after 23 years of imprisonment and confinement due to his belief in God and God-given human rights. We visited him, received his blessing, approval and encouragement in the Foundation's activities, and then he made his first request of us. He said, and I quote: 'Action is very necessary to keep the Holy Crown in freedom. It must never be returned to the Communist government. Ask your members to help save it.'"

Top labor leader George Meany was another who protested the return of the Crown. In a letter to President Carter he said in part: "As you know, the Crown of St. Stephen is not merely a trapping of state power, but more a symbol of moral and religious importance to free people...the world over. A return of the Crown of St. Stephen to the Kadar government will cause great sorrow among millions of people in the world even though it may please and serve the purposes of the small elitist leadership of dictatorships in Eastern Europe. The sharp reaction throughout the world...will cast a doubt on the position of the United States concerning human rights and freedom. It is my hope... that the Crown of St. Stephen be protected until such time as the government of Hungary is freely and popularly elected by her people."

It was reported that more than 100,000 letters, telegrams and phone calls flooded the White House when word leaked out that this symbol of Christian freedom was being handed over to the Communist Kadar. The person who carried on the longest fight to keep the Crown in this country was Congresswoman Mary Rose Oaker of Ohio, a Democrat and a former supporter of Jimmy Carter. Her Cleveland district contains the largest concentration of Hungarian Americans in the United States, many of them freedom fighters who escaped from Hungary in 1956. Rep. Oaker introduced legislation in an attempt to keep the Crown in this country. She supported the appeal to the Supreme Court (a futile gesture), she testified before a Congressional Committee on behalf of her constituents, and finally she wrote a blistering letter to President Carter on December 15th, in which she told him that "deceit and deception have characterized the entire handling of this issue by your administration." She added that the administration had conducted what amounted to an elaborate charade: speaking in terms of concern for the views of those opposed to the return of the Crown, but going ahead with the plan "as if we did not exist." As Rep. Oaker pointed out, the administration kept reassuring her that nothing definite had been decided and that the views of those who opposed the transfer would be taken into account. But when she and Hungarian American spokesmen said they would oppose the turnover unless Soviet troops were withdrawn from Hungary, and free elections were conducted, they heard nothing more about the matter. Rep. Oaker concluded her letter to the President by saying:

"I had fully supported your human rights policy you enunciated at the beginning of your administration, believing it to be consistent with the highest traditions of American foreign policy. Now it is clear that your human rights policy is nothing more than empty rhetoric."

Now, here is a situation that is very similar to that of Carter's insistence upon giving away the American Canal in Panama while at the same time paying the Torrijos government some $40 million a year to take it. In both cases—the Canal and the Crown—Jimmy Carter knows that there is overwhelming opposition to his actions. Yet he insists upon going against the will of the people, and even in going against the wishes of his own backers and party members. Why?

In the case of the Canal, the answer is an easy one. There are certain international bankers who will suffer great losses unless the American taxpayers can be forced to pay rent on the Canal, so that Torrijos will have the money to pay his debts to the bankers. The fact that this scheme will end with the Communists controlling the Canal means little or nothing to the Internationalists who have been in partnership with the Communists ever since the Banker Barons financed the transport of Trotsky from New York and Lenin from Switzerland for the Bolshevik conquest of Imperial Russia.

The story behind the story was told by an organization calling itself the American Defense Group. We quote from their Intelligence Report Number 3:

"The American Defense Group has predicted the current moves of the Rockefeller forces in the American government to expand their financial empire into Eastern Europe. The opening moves in this expansion plan came with the announcement that the United States government will return the jeweled Crown of St. Stephen to the Hungarian communist government.... The Carter administration is returning the Crown to the communist regime of Janos Kadar in order for Rockefeller forces to have America obtain 'most favored nation' trade status with Hungary.... In addition to the financial benefits involved, the return of the Crown will also further demoralize the anti-communist movement in all Eastern European nations, the emigres of these nations in the West, and their American Nationalist Supporters. Rockefeller forces also feel that this expansion of trade with Hungary could act as an opening wedge for expansion efforts in other East Bloc nations....

"This hybrid condition (a communist-capitalist partnership) is the goal of Rockefeller forces in Eastern and Western Europe, and worldwide. This doctrine of convergence between East and West with economic and political union also fits into a related plan on the part of the Rothschild interests for a controlled Eurocommunism, where Eastern and Western European nations would function as a union of 'Socialist' economic powers firmly under the control of Rothschild interests. Much of the confusion of Patriots on European political matters is due to the conflicts that come to the surface between the Rockefeller forces convergence doctrine and the Rothschild Eurocommunism designs which often cloud coherent analysis....

Hungary is to become the showcase of the convergence doctrine with Kadar's acquiescence.

The primary movers behind the return of the Crown of St. Stephen operate out of two areas. The prime tool of the Rockefeller forces is the Council on Foreign Relations subsidiary known as the Business Advisory Council (sometimes shortened to Business Council—Ed.). The secondary movers in this effort are those Business Council members who are prominent in the U.S. Council of the International Chamber of Commerce. This include such figures as Roger Blough, U.S. Steel; Charles Percy; Donald Kendall, Pepsi Cola; William Hewitt, Deere & Co.; J. Paul Austin, Coca Cola; Arthur Wood, Sears Roebuck & Co.; Lee Morgan, Caterpillar Tractor Co.; David Packard, Hewlett Packard; J. K. Jamieson, Exxon; etc. Most of these men are also Trilateral Commission members and Dartmouth Conference participants, both key nexuses of convergence operations. The Chamber of Commerce will willingly go along with the high-powered manipulations of its Rockefeller sector and also with the dictates of Rockefeller controlled financial interests such as Chase Manhattan, Citibank, and the Bank of America, all of which are on shaky ground and need new investment sources and markets in order to prop up the credit structure and the American dollar. The Levi Strauss Co. has just announced plans to open up production in Hungary and hopes to expand into other East European nations.

"The drive to undercut American workers (and the American middle-class—Ed.) is so strong that the return of St. Stephen's Crown becomes a small price to pay for the huge profit potential. However, the leading BAC figures (as well as the Trilateralists—Ed.) are committed to the entire political, social, and economic convergence pattern."

THE SECOND COMING OF THE NINETY-FIFTH

GOING ALONG WITH JIMMY

There's one sure thing about every second session of every United States Congress: All of the Representatives and one-third of the Senators, if they hope to keep their jobs, must face the ordeal of the election that will come in November. This causes Congressmen to act with a little more care and caution when casting their votes for money-squandering and controversial legislation. However, this year there is a complication: as this second session of the 95th Congress gets down to the business of legislating, it finds itself in a mess not entirely of its own making. Jimmy Carter and his Trilateralist conclave have made a mess of U.S. foreign policy, while Jimmy Carter and his Georgia counselors have made a mess of domestic affairs. The Nation's first Trilateralist President seems to have made a name for himself as a leader who will say one thing today and then contradict himself tomorrow. Even the Gallup Poll, which seldom reports a trend accurately but often starts one, says that "Jimmy Carter's first-year approval rating among Americans is lowest of any elected President since World War II." The overall approval rating went like this: Kennedy, 78%; Eisenhower, 71%; Johnson, 69%; Nixon, 61%; Carter, 57%; Ford, 46%; and Truman, 50%.

Not that such figures mean much, but the opinions of other leaders do mean something. Following Carter's recent seven-nation tour, this reaction was voiced by Conrad Ahlers, editor of the Hamburger Morgenpost and a member of the Bonn Parliament: "The worst political failure of the past year was Jimmy Carter. There are hardly any differences of opinion about that among statesmen in the West, the East and the 'third world.' Whatever the U.S. President has touched—be it the human-rights issue, disarmament negotiations, the Middle East, the worldwide recession or the rate of the dollar—he smashed valuable china."

"Almost as devastating," said U.S. News & World Report, "was an attack by Prof. Stanley Hoffman of Harvard, once a colleague of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and White House national-security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski. Hoffman's detailed critique in Foreign Policy magazine charged that the Carter Administration's policies, while well intentioned, are flawed by 'contradictions... quick, poorly prepared initiatives... the frequency of painful changes in direction by a combination of initial failure and continuing desire for fast motion'."

U.S.N. & W.R. commented: "At the end of a year of unexpected initiatives and equally sudden reversals of direction, President Carter's new-look foreign policy is coming under attack both at home and overseas. Many of his major moves are being challenged as unrealistic or contradictory. In some areas, pressure by U.S. allies and friends, as well as adversaries, has forced the Administration to retreat from key policy decisions. Relations with three principal partners—West Germany, Japan and Brazil—have deteriorated sharply. They express concern over what they regard as Washington's strong-arm diplomacy and resent actions that adversely affect their vital interests. In dealing with Russia, the Administration is charged with undermining its credibility by first initiating a tough line and then switching to an ardent pursuit of detente that is being described as 'Kissinger revisited'."

"At home," said U.S.N. & W.R., "Carter's ability to conduct an effective foreign policy is threatened by a possible Senate veto of the Panama Canal treaties he signed in September or of the strategic-arms-limitation treaty that he hopes to sign soon with Russia."

Inept handling of the Middle East situation is the latest blunder. Israeli's Begin was preparing to launch an all-out attack against its Arab neighbors and the Trilateralists stepped in and made a deal with Saudi Arabia whereby Egypt's Sadat would propose peace and block Begin's blitz buildup. So far, so good. Begin, Sadat and their aides were getting along better than could be expected and President Carter promised that ours would be a hands-off policy. We would not interfere in any way, said Jimmy. The Arabs and Israelis took him at his word, and soon that long-awaited Geneva conference seemed possible, and soon. But, suddenly, all was changed. The Presidential promise of non-interference was broken. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance was sent to Jerusalem where he would sit with the Israeli and Arab negotiators and tell them what they should do about a Palestinian State. The attempts at harmony dissolved into dissonance. At a state dinner Begin insulted Sadat, Sadat replied by ordering his representatives home and Vance was left trying to explain what had happened. Later, Carter called Sadat and the latter appeared mollified; but the damage was done, whether intentionally we cannot say. But one is left with the impression that, so far as America and Americans are concerned, the Trilateralists are doing a very poor job of running the world, and that Jimmy Carter is the one who is to be held accountable if and when an accounting is demanded by the people. In other words, most of our foreign policy mess seems to be the result of Trilateralist attempts to "re-structure" the World Order. The new plan is to build world government "along functional rather than territorial lines" while yet retaining the Concept of Regionalism.

A recent column by Paul Scott is very revealing in this respect. Scott says that Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's national security adviser, gave an interview to a selected few correspondents shortly before their recent trip to seven nations.

Scott reports that, according to Brzezinski, Carter pictures the world as having four different power centers:

- 1) The Trilateralist Nations, plus Australia.
- 2) The Communist countries; Russia, China, Cuba, the Eastern European Nations, etc.
- 3) The OPEC countries and the rich developing countries; Iran, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Taiwan, South Korea, etc.
- 4) The poor countries of Africa, Asia and South America.

The overall foreign policy of the Carter administration, according to Brzezinski, is now being developed on the assessment that "power is being dispersed so that besides such continuing powers as the U.S. and the Soviet Union, a new and growing role is being played, regionally and beyond by the likes of Saudi Arabia, Iran, Indonesia, Brazil India, and Nigeria."

When newsmen pressed Brzezinski to be more specific about the new forces involved in this transformation of power in the world, Brzezinski is said to have replied: "The main force involved is the increasing impact in world economies of countries in the developing world, which are competing with developed countries. These relationships are often unstable and filled with tensions, such as that between the West and the oil producers. All of these have transformed the economic role of the west, created a need for a different, broader economic system, and given importance to the relationship between regional conflicts—such as in Africa or the Middle East—and potentially broader ones, and created issues that are global in character, such as arms control and human rights." (unquote).

It should be noted that the foregoing is supposed to be a statement of American foreign policy as viewed by President Carter (which is, of course, the Trilateralist view). But, this is not a statement of foreign policy based on national interests; it is a world policy based on multinational interests. It is not a policy based on what is best for the United States and her allies; it is a policy based on what is best for the world. It is not a statement of political policy based on considerations of national sovereignty; it is a statement of economic policy based on considerations of industrial potential and the location of natural resources (including the human resource of cheap labor). It envisions a World Government established "on functional rather than territorial lines," and Jimmy Carter reflected this vision when in his so-called State of the Union address on January 19, 1978, he stated his international objectives as being "to ensure economic justice, to advance human rights, to resolve conflicts without violence and to proclaim our constant faith in the liberty and dignity of human beings everywhere." However high-sounding, this is a reference to the state of the world, not to the state of the Union.

In his message to Congress, Carter promised to reduce inflation and unemployment, hold down government spending, lower the tax burden; he scolded Congress for not passing an energy bill, put in plugs for ratification of the Canal Treaties, and for passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill.

BEWARE OF HUMPHREY MEMORIALS

In our Report #51, of 12/30/77, we gave a brief outline of the 1978 program of "the Planners who are struggling to complete the socialization of the Newstates and to make interdependence a necessity." We noted that "Hanging fire is the watered-down but still fatal Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill which provides for the full socialization of the United States. The real danger here: Senator Humphrey, 'The Happy Warrior,' is a terminal case, but his influence will live long after he has passed from the world stage. The Congress may be tempted to approve S. 55 'as a fitting memorial' to Humphrey. Emotion is often more powerful than logic when bills are debated."

It seems that, unfortunately, we may have been right. Already liberal Congressmen have started the campaign to enshrine the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act as a "Memorial to Hubert Horatio Humphrey." Lest we forget how dangerous this bill can be if passed and signed into law, we reprint a statement made recently by Senator Jake Garn, of Utah:

"The Humphrey-Hawkins Act is making its second appearance before the Senate this session. When the original version of the bill met with great opposition, it was sent back to the Banking Committee for further revision. The first Humphrey-Hawkins Act would have directed the federal government, including the President, the Congress and the Federal Reserve Board to design and coordinate economic policies and programs so that there would be an economic plan of action to insure full employment and balanced growth. I am adamantly opposed to any legislation that will further involve the federal government in national economic planning and eventually make the government the ultimate American employer.

"The second version of the Humphrey-Hawkins Act has the same economic goals but it has been returned to the Senate with some major revisions. It does not make the government the employer of last resort and it does not direct the President to take specific action to achieve the goal of reducing and keeping a ceiling on unemployment at 4 percent. Even though the enforcement teeth have been taken out, I still oppose these attempts at national economic planning.

"History has proved that national economic plans are disastrous. The five year plans implemented in Russia and China were not successful as proven by their lack of productivity and economic stability.

"The Humphrey-Hawkins Act II will not improve the economy, and it will worsen our inflation rate. As a member of the Senate Banking Committee, I have heard numerous testimonies from proponents of the Act. It was stated by Dr. Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office, that the lowest estimate of increased costs for implementing the Act would be in the neighborhood of $40 million to $50 million a year. Economist John Kenneth Galbraith, who also favors the legislation, testified that the Act would be highly inflationary unless there were strict wage and price controls to go along with it. It is easy to see the pattern of more and more government involvement taking shape. The Humphrey-Hawkins Act II would be an overwhelming centralization of national economic power which could seriously hurt private enterprise where economic stability has proved itself in the past.

"Certainly the goals of greater employment espoused by Humphrey-Hawkins II are worthy. I doubt that anyone in this country would be opposed to reducing the unemployment rate to 4 percent. However, it would involve a fundamental shift in American economic policy and greater inflation would result. This is not the answer.... Our free enterprise economy, which is the finest and most flexible in the world, must be preserved. The Humphrey-Hawkins Act II would ignore the law of supply and demand, and the free market and I will vote against it."

CARTER'S LABOR BILL

In addition to the proposed Humphrey-Hawkins Act, there is another bill of a similar nature that is being lobbied by the Carter Administration, which is labeled "labor law reform legislation" and bears the number S. 1883. According to Senator Orrin Hatch of Utah, if this bill is passed "The U.S. will be governed by a 'labor' party, just as in Great Britain. Everyone is aware of the devastating decline of this once great nation." Dr. George S. Benson, in his American Citizenship Letter agreed:

"Labor unions have two chief objectives at the present time. One is to remove section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits States to have "Right to Work" laws, protecting a man's right to work for wages without being forced to join a labor union. The other is to obtain the 'Common Situs' amendment, which would permit even a tiny specialized union on a huge construction job to tie up and stop work, not on its own part of the job, like hanging doors, but on the entire contract from foundation to roof.

"This Reform Labor Law goes a long way toward softening up, and preparing the way for attainment of each of these two union objectives. That is why labor unions are putting so much into this fight, and accumulating so much money for propaganda. If they win, America will soon be right in the middle of State Socialism, and only a step away from Communism. It was labor unions, led by educators, who led England into socialism in 1945. Now each would like to get back to capitalism. But the capital has been wasted. They have no way to get back." (unquote).

Behind all this drive for labor law reform is a scheme that is seldom, if ever, talked about openly. Like the word "conspiracy" we are scoffed at and ridiculed if we refer to the phrase "Corporate Socialism." But this imposed silence to the contrary notwithstanding, it is the aim of the Elitist Planners to convert this Republic into a Corporate Socialist State.

Now, a Corporate State is governed by Corporations in partnership with Labor Syndicates! Corporate control of the federal government has been accomplished, if we concede that the Trilateralists really run our government—a rose is a rose by any other name. However, Big Labor has not been quite so successful in its role as partner. Big Labor does control the votes of many U.S. Representatives and Senators, and Big Labor spends over $2 billion a year for political purposes. Also, labor unions are slowly gaining control over federal employes and hope to unionize the Armed Forces.

Labor unions are protected from monopoly laws, they have been the recipients of much favored legislation. But if they are to fulfill the role planned for them by the Elitists, Labor Unions must grow and grow until the whole field of "work for profit" is controlled by Big Labor. Hence the importance to labor leaders—and to the Trilateralist-controlled Carter Administration—of S. 1883.

When Senator Williams of New Jersey introduced S. 1883 in the Senate last year, he told his colleagues: "President Carter transmitted to Congress his recommendations for the reform of the National Labor Relations Act... Senator Javits (N.Y.), Congressman Thompson (N.J.) and I have worked closely with the White House and Secretary of Labor Marshall to develop a legislative proposal. ... The Labor Reform Act... which I will introduce today, reflects the consensus we reached. It represents both my views and those of the administration on this important issue of public policy."

If it should happen that the Humphrey-Hawkins bill and this Labor Reform bill should both become law, then Senator Hatch and Dr. Benson will be right: we will have become a Socialist State. About the only thing remaining for the Planners will be the convergence of the United States and the Soviet Union in a World Government. And in that connection:—

CARTER'S DEFENSE POSTURE

Whether it was planned that way, or Carter blundered in carrying out orders, we cannot say. But, nowhere have his reversals in policy and contradictions in carrying out policies been so evident as in his dealings with the Soviet. A year ago he was going to cut defense spending to the bone. The B-1 program was halted, and troops were going to be brought home from Europe, a little at a time, of course. But, when he last visited Europe, he promised NATO allies that he would beef up our defense posture in Europe and now he is asking Congress to appropriate more money for defense purposes.

Again: At the beginning of his administration, Carter announced a "get tough" policy with the Soviet Union. In April he presented to Moscow his SALT II proposal, which was promptly turned down. However, according to Time Magazine of April 10, Carter told Congressional leaders: "Don't worry. I intend to hang tough."

Perhaps humorously, the Conservative Union told the rest of the story in its Battle Line publication, December issue: "As promised last April, President Carter is hanging tough in his talks with the Soviets... He is hanging by his neck and the Russians are holding the rope."

We are told that "Militarily, politically, economically, and in spirit, the state of our Union is sound." But when said by one who so often contradicts himself, are we really expected to believe such a statement?

THE PLANNED SOCIETY - ANALYSIS OF AN INTERLOCKING WEB

BIRDS OF A FEATHER....

If, to paraphrase Abraham Lincoln, the parts of a structure are prepared in many different places by many different individuals and groups, and if when brought together, these various parts fit perfectly to form a complete structure, then there must have been a master plan—a conspiracy—it must have been planned that way before any single part of the structure had been started.

This Report is composed of a partial listing and identification of the several units that combine to form one part of an overall conspiracy; and we shall begin with an item appearing on the front page of the current, January 23, 1978 issue of The American Sunbeam:

"Apparently Kent State University (KSU) is a testing ground for radical concepts which are not quite acceptable to most American citizens who understand the Constitution and are aware of the differences between a republic and a democracy. The KSU United National Affairs Council (UNAC) is sponsoring the sixth annual Ohio-Wide Model United Nations (OWMUN). A pamphlet promoting the program states: 'The OWMUN is designed especially for secondary school students... The OWMUN will introduce students to the practical side of international politics, the functional structure of the United Nations as an organ for managing contemporary international problems by stimulating discussion and study.'

"The KSU campus is the home of the Center For Peaceful Change (CPC), which sent a delegate, Roger Base, Professor of Administrative Science and head of the CPC, to the World Constituent Assembly held at Innsbruck, Austria." ... (unquote).

Kent State University drew nationwide headlines when Vietnam War demonstrators went berserk and some of them were shot by National Guardsmen while trying to keep the peace. Demonstrations again racked the KSU campus last year when there were protests to the administration's plan to build a stadium on the ground where the original mob action occurred. And here is our first "interlock":

Playing the leading role in last year's KSU demonstrations were members of the Revolutionary Communist Party (RCP). Originally known as the Revolutionary Union, it was one of the organizations that emerged from the Berkeley campus riots of the University of California during the sixties. Its leader was Bob Avakian, who later reorganized the Union and, together with a "founding congress" of fellow Communists, adopted a new "Constitution and Programme" in 1975. The RCP is anti-Soviet Union because "the forces of capitalist restoration" have succeeded in turning the Soviet Union itself into "an imperialist country... now bound by the same laws of capitalism as the U.S." So the RCP rejects the Soviet and accepts the Maoist doctrines:

"The Revolutionary Communist Party bases itself on Marxism-Leninism, Mao Tse-tung thought. Mao Tse-tung, in leading the Chinese revolution for many decades, has enriched Marxism-Leninism in many areas—in its application to warfare, culture, revolution in colonial countries, in philosophy and in other fields. Most importantly, Mao Tse-tung has developed the theory of continuing revolution under the dictatorship of the proletariat, showing how the working class must continue to transform society in order to carry through the full transition to communism."...

The "full transition to communism" goes like this, according to the "Programme and Constitution of the Revolutionary Communist Party USA," the document from which we have been quoting:

"When all society has been transformed, the ulcers left over from capitalism have been eliminated, and the community of workers has been established, then communism, completely classless society, will have been achieved, and humanity will enter a whole new stage of history. There will no longer be the need for the state, since there will no longer be any class to suppress, and the state will be replaced with common administration by all society.

"But the advance from capitalism to communism requires a long period of transition. This transition period is socialism, which is the first, and lower stage of communism. During this entire transition period, the dictatorship of the proletariat must be defended

OUT OF THE MOUTHS OF KINGS

The following excerpts are verbatim quotes from an article appearing in the January 1978 issue of The Middle East, a magazine published in London by International Communications, 63 Long Acre, London WC2E 9JH:

"... Arab leaders have been widely reported holding secret backstage conferences to thrash out their political differences. The Middle East can confirm that at least one of those highly discreet meetings actually took place last month—because five of the leaders chose the neutral ground of our London offices to confer. King Khaled of Saudi Arabia invited President Sadat of Egypt, President Asad of Syria, King Hussein of Jordan and PLO leader Yasser Arafat to a reconciliation which the editors of The Middle East were kindly allowed to attend. ... We have little compunction in reproducing the following verbatim transcript of the proceedings....

"KHALED: ... Now shall we get down to the business at hand. The real issue as I see it is the International Zionist-Communist-Freemason-atheist conspiracy to take over the entire world and doom civilisation as we know it. My younger brother (who can communicate on the same wave-length as the Americans, I understand) has had quite a few chats with President... er, Carter about this, but unfortunately he doesn't seem to be getting through. The tragedy of our position is that even the President of the United States, little though he appreciates it, is no more than a puppet dangling on the strings of a world-wide network of plotters fanatically dedicated to their sinister aims. The same unbelievers who run the show in the Kremlin also manipulate the Wall Street stock market AND (this is the real point) control Israel. No wonder we can't get back to pray in Jerusalem against that kind of opposition, and it's about time the world was woken up to what's going on...."

(unquote, and no comment)

and strengthened by the working class." (unquote)

Note that the RCP keeps talking about the "working class." But the members of the RCP are not "working class" people, but professors, students and trained terrorists. And they must abide by the principles of what Mao called "Democratic Centralism." Mao explained it in these words:

1. The individual is subordinate to the organization;
2. The minority is subordinate to the majority;
3. The lower level is subordinate to the higher level;
4. The entire membership is subordinate to the central committee."

Which means that a member of the Revolutionary Communist Party must believe without reservation any information or interpretation he receives from a higher official and obey absolutely any order given (this according to information supplied us by Dr. Fred Schwarz, a leading authority on the various communist parties, organizations, and their beliefs and strategies).

So, at Kent State University, to attract a certain type of potential revolutionary, there was the Revolutionary Communist Party. But there are many—both professors and students—who dislike violence and blood, and hope to bring about the New World Order through legislation and persuasion. And for them there is the previously mentioned Center For Peaceful Change (CPC), whose leader is professor Roger Base, he who went to the World Constituent Assembly at Innsbruck, Austria last year.

At Innsbruck in June, 1977 delegates from 25 countries drafted a "Constitution for the Federation of Earth." This Constitution was presented to the United Nations for approval and "At the same time copies of the Earth Constitution were sent airmail from the U.N. postoffice to the Heads of State and Heads of Government of the 160 national governments presently dividing Earth, together with the Call for Ratification...."

The "World Constitution and Parliament Association" in its December, 1977 newsletter "Across Frontiers" announced that it had adopted a "five year plan, defining a schedule of action aimed at convening a Provisional World Parliament by 1980, and hopefully at reaching the First Operative Stage of World Government by 1982, to keep pace with the necessity for solving world problems." Then from the publication World

Citizen, Vol. 4, No. 2, we learn that this World Constitution and Parliament Association is just one spoke in the World Federalist wheel:

"The Second World Citizens Assembly met in Innsbruck, Austria, from June 25-29, 1977, and in Paris, France, the following week from July 1-5. Theme of the Assembly was 'To Build a World Community.'...Meetings in both Innsbruck and Paris were held concurrently and in joint session with meetings of other peace, mundialist and nongovernment groups, both Eastern and Western, in order to share common concerns and combine strength in mobilizing a people's voice to help meet the needs of a changing world society.

"The four Commissions of the Assembly were as follows: Commission I, 'To End the Arms Race'; Commission II, 'To Meet Basic Human Needs and Preserve the Environment'; Commission III, 'To Promote Education for World Community and Citizenship'; and Commission IV, 'To Develop Supranational and Global Institutions.'

"About 100 of the 250 registrants in Innsbruck were members of the World Citizens Assembly. Following meetings of their own commissions, they met jointly with other groups such as the World Constituent Assembly, the Unity of Man Conference, Women's Universal Movement and the Association of World Education. These meetings resulted in plans for combining strengths and working together to develop programs on global issues, to be developed further at the Paris Assembly the following week."

Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau gave his blessing to this Paris Assembly. He wrote and we quote:

"I am pleased to extend my warmest greetings to the World Federalists as you gather in Paris for the World Assembly. We on the North American continent enjoy a high standard of living. However, the welfare and dignity of others will be the measurement of our own condition. We must be ready to accept the challenges of poverty, hunger, environmental degradation and nuclear proliferation. These issues will determine the stability of tomorrow's world. They will require innovative solutions and co-operative endeavour in a common cause of global dimensions. I would remind you of Thomas Paine's words of two centuries ago: 'My country is the world, and my religion is to do good.' I know that you will be discussing these issues and wish you fruitful deliberations. (signed) Pierre Elliot Trudeau."

Out of Kent State University we have seen how students who are potential activists and terrorists can be inducted into the Revolutionary Communist Party; and how those who prefer the methods of legislation and persuasion (the Fabian Socialist method) can be enrolled as World Citizens via KSU's own Center for Peaceful Change, which is a

CARTER'S ENEMIES LIST...

...not a joke - but a grim reality!

... The Carter CFR combine is utilizing the Justice Department as a vehicle to intimidate lawmakers who happen to be opposed to parts of Carter's programs... Included in the Justice Department retaliatory strikes are Rep. John Murphy (D.-N.Y.), Dan Flood (D.-Pa.), and Ed Derwinsky (R.-Ill.), all vigorous critics of the Panama Canal Treaty and opponents of the Trilateral policy of collaboration and accommodation of criminal Marxist government!.. Murphy and Flood have both had the guts to embarrass "Mr." Carter by their revelations of drug smuggling activities by the Torrijos family!... Derwinsky is marked for extermination because of his holding hearings on the implementation of the Carter human rights policy toward foreign gov'ts... The human rights policy is being used to force radical political changes in a number of pro-American gov'ts and to soften them up for Rockefeller-Trilateral takeover (through N.Y. Bank and UN personnel).

The Justice Department investigations of these lawmakers have been triggered by allegations passed along by (of course) the State Department - but at the same time there has been a refusal by Justice to investigate allegations of congressmen being involved with Communist gov'ts (such as Cuba)!! PSLm's should be forewarned by the vicious, malicious and wanton nature of this program to wipe out opposition!! What you can do: write all three congressmen, indicating that you are aware of why they are being attacked! They'll need all the support they can get to prevent them from giving up and collapsing to slippery-smiley's demands!

local branch of the World Federalists. There is one avenue yet open: In addition to the revolutionary activists and the Fabian progressivists, there are the Planners, those who want to act as change-agents and to build a New World Community according to man-made evolutionary plans. Here we enter the think-tank world of the Futurists:

In addition to KSU's Center for Peaceful Change, there is a course of study called "Business in the 21st Century" which is conducted by Donald F. Mulvihill, professor of marketing and coordinator of the Institute for 21st Century Business. This latter just happens to be a local branch of the World Future Society (WFO).

Last year this WFO prepared a "Resources Directory for America's Third Century." The directory was published as a result of a federal grant to the World Future Society (Grant No. 055 75-01241 A01). Additional funding was provided by foundations, educational institutions and other non-profit organizations and associations—which means that the tax-payers of the United States paid for this and other projects of the WFO and its satellites and branches.

On page 242 of this Resources Directory for America's Third Century we find and quote:

Course Description: Futurists and careers; limits to growth; population and food crisis; changes in technology; ocean bed activities; developments in space and space movements; development of huge urban areas; political and economic change; possible future state government organization in the U.S.; choices for the future; stress throughout on the relationship of these concepts to business. Activities: lecture, discussion, outside resource speakers, films, student reports. Source Materials: Books: Gray and Martin: "Growth and its Implications for the Future"; Meadows: "Limits to Growth"; Kostelanetz: "Social Speculations"; Borgstrom: "Too Many"; Toffler: "Future Shock". Films: The Futurists; Food Revolution; Alone in the Midst of the Land; Introduction to Lasers; Man and the 'Second Industrial Revolution'; The Computer Revolution; Energy Crisis; The Deep Frontier; Deep Sea Trawler; Man Invades the Sea; Surviving in Space; Man and his Resources; Boonsville. Various articles. Special features. (unquote)

This World Future Society, which holds strings connecting it with Kent State University and with most all universities in the United States, is a master-planning organization which aims to blueprint the future of the world, give the blueprints to administrators, legislators, bureaucrats, educators and activists who can carry out the plans. One of the first great achievements of the WFO was the creation of what they call "think factories" and their use by the U.S. Government in national planning projects (National Planning is a synonym for National Socialism). RAND was the first "think factory" actually employed by the federal government (it used the Vietnam War as a vast laboratory for experiments in psychological warfare, etc.) Out of RAND came the Delphi technique which is used for forecasting future events, the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System which later came to be known as "Management by Objective," etc. After RAND came Herman Kahn's Hudson Institute which is credited with having compiled the controversial "Report From Iron Mountain." Then came numerous think tanks, most of which are busily engaged in blueprinting some phase of the Planners' World of the Future. In these blueprints provision is made for the work that is to be done by Heads of State, by educators, by business executives, by both producers and consumers, both management and labor, both housewives and "liberated" women, by people in every segment of society, including students.

In this Report we have attempted to select one location, KSU, and identify some of the threads which connect it to an overall Conspiracy. Our report would have been much longer if we had selected, say, Harvard University. We have also tried to show that, in this interlocking web, the agents of the Conspirators make of our educational institutions training grounds for terrorists and revolutionary activists, for those who prefer the Fabian gradualism of legislation and gentle persuasion, and for those who are to become change-agents and planners.

The World Future Society is an intriguing outfit. More about it in future reports.

THE SELLING OF THE AMERICAN CANAL TREATIES

ANOTHER COMMUNIST DREAM TO BECOME A REALITY?

Not since the 1945 Conferences at Yalta and Potsdam have political leaders of the United States so brazenly betrayed this Nation and its citizens. Now they're at it again in the proposed giveaway to the Communists of the American Zone and Canal in Panama. At Yalta President Roosevelt and at Potsdam President Truman combined to give to the Communists control over Poland, Eastern Germany, Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia. Now, a third of a century later a third President, "I'll never lie to you" Jimmy Carter, has signed two treaties which, if approved by the U.S. Senate, will give control over the American built, American owned, American operated Canal that connects the Pacific Ocean with the Caribbean Sea, to the Communists.

Stealing this vital waterway from the United States is one of the oldest objectives of the Communists. John Reed, the U.S. communist whose body lies buried in Moscow's Red Square, wrote that "internationalization of the Panama Canal was one of the oldest cries of the Communists." In 1945 convicted collaborator Alger Hiss, then acting as temporary secretary of the United Nations, was the author of a report in which he referred to the Canal as "occupied territory." In that same year Ralph de Toledano wrote an article which appeared in "Plain Talk" magazine entitled "Stalin's Hand in the Panama Canal," in which he commented that "The Soviet Government... has long taken an unhealthy interest in the 'Big Ditch'—the keystone of the American defense system. As far back as 1933 the world was treated to the sensational exposure of an international spy ring which showed Stalin's hand deep in the military establishment of the Panama Canal." In February, 1959, the 21st Congress of the Communist Party re-emphasized the importance of Latin American agitation to wrest the Panama Canal from the United States. Finally, with Castro becoming dictator over Cuba, and with his friend and disciple Torrijos attaining dictatorship over Panama, the time seemed ripe indeed to press for Communist control of the Canal, a first step toward attaining Communist control of the U.S. Naval base at Guadacanal, and thus converting the Caribbean into a Communist Sea.

During these years, Alger Hiss was not the only official who, consciously or otherwise, aided and abetted the Communist objective of gaining control of the Canal. A brief historical review should demonstrate this fact:

With the newly created Republic of Panama the United States entered into a treaty in 1903, wherein we purchased the Panama Canal Zone, a ten mile strip stretching from the Pacific to the Caribbean for the sum of $10 million plus an annuity. This was not rent, or just rights; we acquired both ownership and sovereignty in perpetuity and made the Canal Zone United States territory.

In the years preceding our planned entry into World War II, President Roosevelt instigated a treaty that waived our rights over defense bases and our right of eminent domain needed for defense of the Canal. This forced us to beg for sites for defense of the Canal during World War II.

In 1955 President Eisenhower concluded yet another treaty: Panama was given more money and land, and we were granted use of an air base which we had built during World War II, but which President Truman had given back to Panama in 1948.

Then Communist-incited riots began in 1958 and Dr. Milton Eisenhower made a "good will visit" to Panama; and since that time things grew worse, and the agitation for giving the Canal back to Panama began in earnest. The "World Marxist Review" in March, 1965, declared that:

"In the opinion of our party, the national liberation revolution in Panama will pass through two stages. In the first stage, the task will be to set up a national, democratic peoples-government which will consistently carry out an agrarian reform, pursue an independent foreign policy, do away with curruption, take vigorous steps to develop the national industry, and embark on deep-going economic and social reforms.... The party resolutions state that only a revolutionary peoples government, uniting all segments of the nation opposed to the oligarchy will be able in the second stage of the revolution to combat the U.S. and its monopolies, to remove the imperialist ulcer and pave the way to nationalization of the Canal."

It was President Lyndon Baines Johnson who was selected to begin "to pave the way to nationalization of the Canal" by asking the Senate to ratify three new treaties that were similar to the two now proposed and already signed by President Carter. A group of patriots got together to oppose the treaties (successfully). Calling themselves the "American Emergency Committee on the Panama Canal," they launched a nationwide campaign, using the same arguments as are being used today. One of their appeals, dated October 2, 1967 read in part:

"The treaty of 1903 was the birth certificate of the Republic of Panama, the United States guaranteeing both internal order and national independence for the nation which Americans had created. And now, President Lyndon Johnson would give it all away. On June 26, 1967, after more than two years of secret talks the United States and Panamanian governments announced agreement of three new treaties which would replace all previous treaties.... As a result of the Chicago Tribune's publication of the three treaties in early July (their contents had been kept secret until then)—and the ensuing outcry against the treaties—both the U.S. and Panamanian governments have delayed formal signing. President Johnson still hopes to slip the treaties through Senator William Fulbright's Foreign Relations Committee—and then the Senate—without too much trouble. It only remains for sufficient public pressure to be brought to bear upon the Congress to prevent one of the greatest giveaways in American history...."

It soon became obvious to the proponents of the Canal giveaway plan, that at least two-thirds of the responsible citizenry were dead set against the plan. So the three treaties were pigeon-holed and proponents awaited a propitious moment for trying again. However, a real emergency arose last year: some of the Big Banks found that they were in deep trouble and might expire. They had made vast loans to the developing countries, and Panama, and none of them could make the expected payments on the loans. Something had to be done to bail out Chase Manhattan, Citibank, Midland, and others.

So the scheme was hatched: If a new set of treaties with Panama could be ratified, giving Panama vast amounts of U.S. money (over $12 billion in all) then U.S. taxpayers could give money to the Panamanian government, the Panamanian government could give the money back in payments to the Banks; and all would be well with the overextended International Banks.

Since the Trilateralists had captured the White House, and since most of the bankers involved were Trilateralists or at least members of the Council on Foreign Relations or its British counterpart, the road to recovery (for these bankers) seemed smooth and easy—if that responsible citizenry could be flim-flammed into accepting the treaties that would be necessary for two-thirds of the U.S. Senators to approve. And, even if the people were solidly against the giveaway of both the Canal and their tax dollars, well, so what? If sixty-seven Senators could be coerced into approving the treaties, then the "public be damned."

So, last summer Jimmy Carter was told what he must do. The first thing was to break a campaign promise about not surrendering American control of the Canal; the second was to give Sol Linowitz (a Trilateralist whose Midland Bank was involved) an "interim" appointment to work with Ellsworth Bunker in framing the treaties. In August, Linowitz and Bunker announced that a new agreement had been reached, just a few hours before Linowitz' special six months interim appointment was to expire. The interim appointment made it unnecessary for the Senate to approve the appointment.

Bunker and Linowitz rushed back to Washington to receive a warm welcome from President Carter, and to take part in the carefully orchestrated campaign to convince the American people that these new treaties were something in which we all should rejoice. A few days later former President Ford and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger allegedly were given well publicized special briefings, and they both most dramatically announced their support for the two treaties (which actually were still unwritten.) Then the treaty promoters began pulling out all the stops, beseeching, bamboozling, coercing, deceiving, in an effort to create the impression that "all the people at the top" favored the treaties. This was supposed to overawe the "ignorant masses" and convince them that if they really knew the score they'd be in favor of them, too. These "top people" included Dean Rusk, who was one of the architects of our Vietnam policy. Then the Joint Chiefs of Staff were paraded before the masses to convince one and all that giving up control of a strategic waterway was important to our national defense. With the case of General Singlaub fresh in their minds, they didn't dare say otherwise if they wanted to keep their jobs. General Singlaub had dared to say, off the record, that Carter's Korean troop pullout was an invitation to war. He was quickly relieved of his command.

Then, on August 16th William Buckley paid his initiation fee into the Council on Foreign Relations by writing a series of columns praising the two Canal treaties which he had not even seen at the time. They got Senator Hawakaya to make a statement that seemed to favor the treaties. Then on Sept. 7th came the big show: "A triumph of stagecraft over statecraft," said one commentator who described it in these words:

"President Carter raised the curtain in Washington on a carefully choreographed extravaganza—The Treaty Signing Ceremony. Just about everybody who was anybody showed up: Nelson Rockefeller, Jerry Ford, Dean Rusk, William Rogers, Henry Kissinger, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Ladybird Johnson—and Muhammed Ali. A couple of dozen Latin American heads of state put in an appearance to brighten the occasion and give it the putative stamp of pan-Hemispheric approval. None of them had read the treaties when they accepted the invitation to come, and they had earlier refused to sign a decision endorsing them. It was a good show. But it didn't get uniformly rave reviews. The liberal, pro-treaty New Republic could not suppress an editorial sneer at what it called 'Carter's parade of tin-horn dictators.' Before the ink was dry, Carter went over and publicly embraced his co-signer, Omar Torrijos—one of the tinniest tin-horn dictators ever to hornswoggle an American president into an act of consummate folly. But the 'embrazo' was a perfect symbolic climax to the whole transaction: Latin machismo had met American masochism—and they hugged each other!

"To use the terminology of Daniel Boorstin, the whole signing ceremony was little more than a colossal 'pseudo event'—because the American Constitution is quite clear: no treaty has force or effect until and unless it is ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. And Article 4, Section 3, paragraph 2 further stipulates that the entire Congress must grant its approval to the giving up of American territories and possessions. On Sept. 7, the required Senate approval was far from assured—and Carter knew it.... And the White House has been trying desperately to shut out the House of Representatives from having any say in the matter, because it knows that the representatives of the people are overwhelmingly opposed. And that is not surprising, because the American people are overwhelmingly opposed. They see no good reason why we should turn over a vital artery of global seaborne trade to a small, weak, chronically unstable banana republic currently under the thumb of a sleazy, erratic, left-wing dictator—a pal of Fidel Castro and Muammar Qaddafi—Omar Torrijos, a man who for the past nine years has systematically used anti-American diatribe and ugly threats in a grotesque effort to frighten the United States of America into giving him our canal....

"A number of prominent businessmen came out in favor of the treaties—especially those connected with the multinationals with large interests in South America. And—as Chicago News columnist Charles Bartlett had noted ... "The (new) canal treaty has no supporters more fervent than the American bankers, whose hopes for repayment rest on a revival of the Panamanian economy."

"These are 'Establishment Treaties' par excellence: Big Government, Big Banks, Big Labor, Big Business and the Top Brass were selling the Dickens out of them. But the public still wasn't buying.... What a strange and distressing situation for Jimmy Carter. There was a consensus for the treaty—but only among the elite... the American people remained adamantly opposed. The people have had their fill of the policies of concession, appeasement, and surrender which (the elite) has been following since World War II—Yalta and Potsdam, and the Berlin Wall... Korea and the Bay of Pigs, Vietnam, Cambodia... and the impending sellout of Free China. The people have had enough of betraying allies and fawning on enemies. Now when we are told that we must give our great Canal on the Isthmus of Panama to a pip-squeak Marxist bully they have dug in their heels and with a voice of thunder that is rattling the windows on Capitol Hill, the people have said — no — never!" (Extended quotation is taken from a statement by Philip Nicolajides, Santa Ana, California public relations executive, in a debate held at San Diego State University.)

Mr. Nicolaidis estimate of the opposition to these treaties is confirmed by Senators—and by Jody Powell, the President's press secretary. Senators who have commented on the subject admit that their mail, wires and telegrams are running heavily against the treaties, as high as nine-to-one in some cases. And after the President's fireside chatter, Jody Powell admitted that calls ran four-to-one against the President.

When the elite began to realize that they were playing a losing game and that there was little chance of gaining Senate approval on the treaties as written, a new approach was made. It was suggested that a few "amendments" could be made in the text of the treaties. The "amendments" are little phrases which really mean nothing; they do not alter the fact that we are giving American territory to a country run by a Marxist dictator, and paying the country billions to take the territory off our hands.

Nevertheless, the strategy seemed to work. Senator Byrd, majority leader in the Senate, said the amendments would make the treaties acceptable, and he joined the parade. Then Senator Baker, minority leader in the Senate, reckoned that he could support the treaties now that the amendments were to be added. Meanwhile, special tourist trips to Panama were arranged for Senators who were "on the fence" and might be won over if given the "grand tour" and shown in a face-to-face confrontation that Omar Torrijos and his Marxist menage were really very gracious and hospitable people who wouldn't even think of doing anything that would harm the United States or its defense capabilities. Just how many U.S. Senators were swayed by such special treatment cannot be known until the final vote is taken on the Senate floor.

But it seems certain that nothing was said to these "on the fence" Senators about Torrijos' drug connections. An intelligence report from the Justice Department's Drug Enforcement Administration, obtained and published by Senator Jesse Helms, says in part: "In early February, 1975, a confidential source, in direct conversation with Ramiro Rivas, owner of a cement block company in Pedregal, Panama, learned that Rivas maintains a $750,000 bank account at the International Bank of Miami located at 627 S.W. 27th Ave., Miami. Rivas stated that he was in partnership with Omar Torrijos, a Panamanian General.... Rivas further stated to the source that Hugo Torrijos, brother of Omar Torrijos (and four others—Ed.) are all involved with him and Torrijos in narcotics trafficking."...

This intelligence report states that narcotics (marijuana and cocaine) are flown into Panama from Cuba, Peru and Colombia, than "are transported to the U.S. by aircraft, vessels, and in some cases, by vehicles overland to the Mexican border." There are allegations that Hugo Torrijos was using Panamanian Air Force planes to transport the drugs. Also, DEA files contain allegations that General Torrijos and his associates "planned to assassinate former Panama President Arnolfo Arias, who was then in exile in Miami."

It also seems certain that proponents of the treaties are not telling hesitant Senators that they should vote for the treaties because certain Big Banks are going to lose a lot of what is still called money unless the treaties are ratified. Nor is it being told that in spite of the fact that Panama currently owes the United States (unpaid loans) over $8 million which is long overdue, and that in spite of this more money is to be poured into Panama in more government loans if and when the treaties are ratified. It was very noticeable that when Jimmy Carter made his final degrading sales pitch in his fireside chatter of February 1st, he made no mention whatever of the money involved in the deal. Instead, he used scare tactics: he brought up visions of "sending our sons and grandsons to fight in the jungles of Panama" if the treaties are not ratified. To bolster his arguments this man who said, if elected, he would never lie to us, did just that several times; most noticeably when he insisted that "We do not own the Panama Canal, we have no sovereignty over it. We have only the right to use it."

SUMMARY: The Trilateralists conducted one of the most intensive sales campaigns of the century, and the people would not buy their shoddy merchandise. However, they still can cajole or coerce two-thirds of the Senators into voting to ratify these treaties. When the vote is taken it will be important; for then we shall know who should not be allowed to remain in Washington as representatives of the States and the people.

THE DANGER OF "MEMORIAL" LEGISLATION

MURIEL CARRIES ON

Rep. Claude Pepper of Florida in the U.S. House of Representatives, Jan. 25, 1978: "Mr. Speaker, Hubert Humphrey, to whom we today pay tribute, was one of the greatest legislators in the history of our Congress... When the soul of Hubert Humphrey ascended into Heaven I know the gates of his celestial home were wide ajar and as it entered to the beautiful music of the angels there came forth the words, 'well done my good and faithful servant. Enter thou into the joys of the Lord'."

Speech of Rep. Frank Horton of New York in the U.S. House of Representatives, Jan. 25, 1978: "...Hubert's accomplishments are legion. His name, his dedication and his concern are tied to virtually every major legislative initiative in recent years. The Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Peace Corps, foreign assistance, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill and many more accomplishments owe their success of his relentless drive to improve the quality of life of Americans of every political persuasion, every ethnic background, every religious denomination will remember him for his monumental contributions to humanity. As he asked, it is best if we do not mourn his death, but rather take his advice and attempt to bring about his vision of America. Hubert Humphrey is no longer here to rally us, but his legacy will always be a rallying point for Americans across this Nation."

Rep. Steven D. Symms in the U.S. House of Representatives, January 31, 1978: "Mr. Speaker, after the death of Hubert Humphrey, many people feel that the Humphrey-Hawkins bill should be passed as a tribute to the late Senator. I do not believe that this bill which would heighten inflation and create more costly jobs in the public sector is a fitting tribute to anyone. I submit the following article from Barron's Weekly, January 23, 1978, which highlights many of the problems with this bill:

"The Humphrey-Hawkins Bill Is A Poor Monument To Anyone. De mortuis nil nisi bonum, adjured the Romans; of the dead

(speak) nought but good. Regarding the late Hubert Horatio Humphrey, we cheerfully respect the conventions... Unfortunately, however, the "great liberal" and "Happy Warrior" has left his countrymen, besides a wealth of memories, a political legacy which with the best will in the world, we can only view as unwelcome: the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, currently pending in the House and Senate. Thanks to the orgy of emotionalism which has swept the nation, prospects of its passage, as a kind of farewell gesture or final tribute to the departed, have sharply improved. Thus, to quote the resident Washington sob-sister of the New York Daily News: "So the basic question now, with Hubert's body buried in the snow-covered frozen ground of his beloved Minnestoa is, in the words of the country song, 'Will the circle be unbroken?' A definitive answer is not possible yet and probably won't emerge for several years, but the first important test may well come when Congress takes up the landmark Humphrey-Hawkins bill later this year."

"If a camel is a horse designed by a committee, a legislative monument, so the record suggests, is a monstrosity. On this score, let's not forget the disastrous spate of measures, including the first of many subsequent one-way grain deals with the Soviet Union, which a sorrowing Congress sped to passage after the assassination of JFK. Again, if one is to believe Nelson Rockefeller, the incredibly wasteful and inept Urban Development Corp. in New York State became a kind of monument to Martin Luther King. More recently, as a tribute to the late Senator Philip A. Hart, the legislators, with the cry "Let's pass this one for Phil" whipped into law the Hart-Rodino-Scott Anti-Trust Amendments of 1976, an ill-conceived, misguided bill... Bad enough that for years the purse strings in the House of Representatives were clutched by a payroll padder, and that most of the nation's postwar tax enactments were the handiwork of a drunk. Far worse to have public policy, so to speak, held hostage to the survival of some good ol' boy on Capitol Hill.

"All of which brings us to Humphrey-Hawkins.... Last fall the latest version of Humphrey-Hawkins won a hesitant nod from the President, who, in the current mawkish climate of opinion, reiterated his stand in (his) State of the Union message. "A major step in the right direction," so Jimmy Carter told his fellow countrymen "would be the early passage of a greatly improved Humphrey-Hawkins bill." While Jimmy Carter would never lie to us, that last statement, hopefully, will be a matter of debate...."

"Instead of monuments, what this country desperately needs is good government'."
(unquote)

Excerpt from a letter written by E.P. Thornton, political analyst and author of the trustworthy column "A Conservative Speaks Out": "Your Jan. 20th (DBR) struck me with great force, possibly because I see, and saw, the same danger involving the maudlin hero-worship of socialist Humphrey.... I dare to hope that you will write another letter on the theme of the Humphrey danger. That danger is greater now that the Invisible Forces have put Muriel in Humphrey's place. The motive could be nothing more than to keep the Humphrey name before the gullible public, until as you say they try to pass the Humphrey-Hawkins bill as a 'memorial.' However, not enough is being said about the fact that Humphrey has been the leading champion of the Genocide treaty for many years."...

Copy of a letter from Hubert H. Humphrey, to a constituent whose name we shall withhold, dated July 19, 1972:

"Dear.....
"It has been twenty-one years since the Genocide Convention was first submitted to the Senate for ratification and yet the United States, to its shame, has not yet become a signator of that convention. The convention was conceived as a means to provide the international sanctions against the kind of holocaust which occurred in World War II..

"...There is an implicit contradiction in our failure to ratify this convention which so many prominent Americans were responsible for drafting. On the one hand, we claim as a member and founder of the United Nations to be pursuing the goal of justice, equality, and dignity which embraces these very ideals. What have we to fear in the advancement of human dignity which could be achieved through the signing of the Genocide Convention? I strongly urge that you reconsider and look at the question from this viewpoint. I am sure you will concur that we should muster all the public support we can behind the movement to ratify this convention. I sincerely ask that you do so. Best wishes.

Sincerely,
(signed) Hubert H. Humphrey."

Please note that Senator Humphrey referred to the "holocaust which occurred in World War II." In all of his correspondence and public utterances when promoting the Genocide Convention, he constantly and consistently referred to "the holocaust." This, as you know, is the name given to the much-publicized story of the "murder of six million Jews" by the Nazis during World War II. No doubt you also have noticed that, since the announcement that Senator Humphrey's illness was terminal, and especially since Anwar Sadat made his historic visit to Jerusalem, there has been more and more public mention of "the holocaust" and of "Nazi atrocities" committed in the 1930s and the early 1940s—more than thirty years and several wars ago. There are references to "the holocaust" in feature stories in newspapers and magazines, in movies and in TV and radio "specials" and talk shows. When local authorities gave permission for some young sensation seekers calling themselves Nazis to stage a parade in the streets of an "all Jewish community," the event made headlines from coast to coast.

Granted that much of this retelling of Nazi atrocities is designed to generate sympathy for and to sell bonds for the State of Israel. But the "revival of terror" movement also serves a secondary and important purpose: to bring about the ratification of the Genocide Convention by the U.S. Government.

We have former Judge and Representative John R. Rarick to thank for uncovering this latest ploy of the Anti-Defamation League and the National Council for the Social Studies. We quote from his "You've A Right To Know," of January, 1978:

THE GENOCIDE LOBBY'S NEW POLITICAL EDUCATIONAL OFFENSIVES

The one-world promoters, often defeated, never quit in their efforts to destroy individual liberty and constitutional government. They simply withdraw, reorganize, and take the offensive again.

The Genocide Treaty...can't get off the ground with Americans who know what's going on and remember that our people have never committed genocide. So, Genocide International, tax supported and tax exempted, has come up with a new offensive: Forget the present U.S. generation, go after the youth and by "education" teach overthrow of the U.S. Constitution to ratify the UNO Genocide Treaty. While most patriots are embattling the Canal Treaty, ERA, Abortion, and Gun Control, the Genocide Lobby is readying for their blitz....

The next assault is already under way. The prime sponsors and promoters are the ADL, i.e., Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith. ... The budget for brainwashing to secure ratification of the Genocide Treaty must be exorbitant. At least until the ADL can get their "educational" program tax supported as a legitimate "controversial" subject by the federal education czars.

On October 9-11th of 1977, the ADL in collaboration with the "National Council for the Social Studies" (NCSS), conducted a national invitational conference at the Sheraton Hotel, La Guardia Airport, New York, for the announced purpose of "Teaching about Genocide and the Nazi Holocaust in Secondary Schools."...

The New York ADL conference objectives, announced to its invited delegates were:

- * to underscore the need to teach about the Holocaust in secondary schools;
- * to probe various perspectives of the Nazi era and other instances of genocide;
- * to analyze the implications of the Holocaust for society and the schools;
- * to showcase significant and readily available films, graphics, publications and resource units which can be used in courses in history, literature, social problems, humanities and the arts;
- * to provide participants the opportunity to experience activities appropriate for classroom use;
- * to develop strategies for furthering the inclusion of Holocaust studies into current curricula.

...Nor should the ADL's announced aims and objectives be taken lightly. The NEA (National Education Association), 1201 1st St., N.W., Washington, D.C., the AFL-CIO labor equivalent of America's teachers, claiming a lobby for over one million educators, was represented at the New York ADL conference by a Mrs. Lynne Koblitz, who announced NEA "was most sympathetic since NEA maintained a close liaison with the Israeli Teachers Union. In her remarks, she indicated the two organizations were considering the possible usefulness of Israeli textbooks for use in U.S. schools. In fact, according to the NEA spokesman, the NEA has already reprinted publications of the Ministry of Information in Jerusalem for distribution in the U.S. She concluded with a political call for those present to join with NEA in its lobbying efforts for the passage of the National Council of Social Studies, recommended that "Genocide be taught in our schools and be systematically embedded into formal education so as to increase the sensitivity of students."

The ADL's National Program Director, Theodore Freedman, labeled the educational innovation as possessing a "sense of urgency."

Also attending the Genocide meeting was Dr. Thomas K. Minter, U.S. Deputy Commissioner for Elementary and Secondary Education (HEW), who spoke of the possibility of HEW funding of the Genocide farce under the "Innovative Projects" provision of PL 93-380, Title 4, Part C of the Education Act of 1974....

Educators from some 19 states...were reported in attendance and participating. They must be considered as in support of further prostitution of education to achieve the political goal of ratifying the Genocide Treaty even at the cost of destroying public education and the destruction of constitutional government."...

(For the list of those attending this conference, write to "You've A Right To Know," Drawer E, St. Francisville, LA 70775. Ask for Vol. 4, No. 1, January, 1978. 35¢ per copy, 4 for $1.00, 50 for $5.00).

We have attempted to show, in this Report, that the enactment of Memorial Legislation to honor deceased lawmakers is a rather common practice with U.S. Senators and Congressmen. The chief "memorials" that have been chosen to honor the late Hubert Horatio Humphrey are the Humphrey-Hawkins bill and the Genocide Convention. Concerning the latter, a review seems in order:—

On Dec. 11, 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted the following Declaration on Genocide:

"Genocide is a denial of the right of existence of entire human groups, as homicide is the denial of the right to live of individual human beings; such denial of the right of existence shocks the conscience of mankind, results in great losses to humanity in the form of cultural and other contributions represented by these human groups, and is contrary to moral law and to the spirit and aims of the United Nations.

"Many instances of such crimes of genocide have occurred when racial, religious, political and other groups have been destroyed, entirely or in part.

"The punishment of the crime of genocide is a matter of international concern. The General Assembly, Therefore, Affirms that genocide is a crime under international law which the civilized world condemns and for the commission of which principals and accomplices... are punishable;"

Then follows the text of the Genocide Convention, which the United States Congress has refused to ratify each time it has been presented for ratification, for the past 31 years. Here are some of the reasons why:

Article II of the Convention defines genocide as an act "committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such,"

There is an important omission here: the opening Declaration includes the word "political," but the actual Convention omits this word. The reason: the Declaration was adopted in 1946, the Convention not until 1948. At that time the Soviet Union was engaged in massive "political" genocide in Russia and its captive European nations. As John B. Gest of the American Bar Association's Section on International and Comparative Law explained:

"The crime of genocide of political groups, or on political grounds, appears to be regarded by the Soviet rulers as 'legal' when committed to advance their plan of world domination."

So, to accommodate the Soviet: national, ethnical, racial or religious genocide is a crime—but political genocide is not a crime! As a result of this "accommodation," the Soviet Union approved the Genocide Convention; but the United States did not, and should not accept the Convention.

Furthermore, Article IV of the Convention provides: "Persons charged with genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction." In plain language, and borrowing from Article

III which defines genocide, this means that any person, be he President of the United States or a welfare recipient, who causes "serious bodily or mental harm" to a group or a member of a group, can be charged and tried by an international court! As the American Bar Association commented:

"What does 'charged' mean? And by whom would the charge be made? We have our own criminal procedural methods for bringing an accused person to trial before the proper tribunal and with constitutional safeguards to protect his rights.... The potentialities of such an international tribunal are apparent.... We should never consent that a person charged with crime in the United States be taken abroad to be tried by a foreign or international tribunal and deprived of his constitutional rights.... We join wholeheartedly in condemning the crime of genocide 'whether the crime is committed on religious, racial, political or other grounds' (Declaration) but we cannot recommend approval of the Genocide Convention for the reasons presented above." So ended this critique of the Genocide Convention by a ranking officer of the American Bar Association.

CONCLUSION: To keep the name Humphrey alive and influential in the United States Senate, Muriel Humphrey has been named to take the late Hubert's place and push for passage of legislation that was dear to the heart of "the greatest liberal of them all." In this same spirit of happy remembrance, fellow liberals in the Congress of the United States would erect legislative memorials to the "Happy Warrior." Two of the most dangerous of these "memorials" are the Humphrey-Hawkins bill and the Genocide Convention. The first would bring us closer to total national socialism; the second would commit United States citizens to the jurisdiction of a system of world courts.

Let us resolve that they shall not pass!

THE "NEW LOOK" OF COMMUNIST STRATEGY FOR THE CONQUEST OF THE WORLD

IMPERIALISM AND EUROCOMMUNISM PLUS MONOPOLISTIC CAPITALISM

A series of shocks have been felt by the nations of the so-called free world, felt especially by those nations whose governments are dominated by members of the Trilateral Commission. The shocks were administered by and emanated from the countries whose governments are dominated by Communists. Understandably, people are confused as to the meaning of it all.

If we are to choose a starting point for these confusing happenings, we might say it all began with the near take-over of France and Italy by a new breed of Socialists who have been named Eurocommunists. The possibility of Communists seizing control of the governments of these two nations caused consternation at NATO headquarters in Belgium and at TLC headquarters in New York City. President Carter made a trip to Europe, made it plain that U.S. support depended upon the ability of these nations to keep control of their governments out of the hands of the Eurocommunists. He also broke another campaign promise; said he'd send more troops and more military aid to NATO. France and Italy survived the Communist threat in a manner of speaking. The shock wave ebbed.

Then came the sudden rush of thousands of Cuban surrogate troops and hundreds of Soviet advisers and technicians to Ethiopia, the sudden offensive against Somalia; and the United States faced the possibility of yet another Vietnam-like experience in the Horn of Africa. The same pattern loomed: First, military aid; second, military advisers; third, military forces; fourth, another no-win war. Because control of the Horn of Africa means control of the shipping of oil from the Middle East, the possibility of American involvement remains.

Then came the Canadian shocks. Suppressed in the United States is the story of a huge ice floe in the far north polar region of Canada; a floating island of ice on which there are 30 huts and 60 tents which serve as shelter for an estimated 100 men from the Soviet Union. A 150 foot high radio tower with elaborate cable connections can be seen from the air. There also is a mile-long landing field sufficient for the 7 AN-2 propeller-driven aircraft and the 3 NY-8 helicopters stationed on the floating ice-island. Canadian authorities have pictures, and have measured the speed of the "island"; it is floating at approximately four miles per hour and it is estimated that it will reach the west side of Canada's St. Patrick Island sometime in June, 1978. Canadian Minister of Defense Barnett Danson released a statement: "Even though we do not know exactly what they are doing, it makes me very suspicious. The only logical explanation is that the Soviets are using the ice base as a supply and maintenance base for submarines operating in the Antarctic. Deep holes have been drilled in the ice which could be used for nuclear weapons.... We are concerned. We are prepared for anything."

Canadians received another shock when it was discovered that the Soviet Secret Police (KGB) had attempted to infiltrate their famed Mounted Police; this following upon the unnecessary falling of a radioactive Soviet satellite on Canadian soil (unnecessary because an early warning was given by U.S. authorities and the satellite could have been destroyed in space before ever touching the earth.) Unheralded by the media was the fact that a similar visitor from space crashed into the Atlantic Ocean near the Florida coastline at about the same time as the Canadian incident. Authorities say this was just a falling meteorite, but they can't prove it since the object was not recovered.

Perhaps floating Soviet bases on ice floes and Soviet spies falling from space are coincidental, but the U.S. Defense Department has admitted that the Soviet Navy now has 350 submarines in operation, many of them nuclear powered and capable of firing nuclear missiles, and most of the 350 are now operating in the Atlantic. Furthermore, the Soviets are currently turning out one new submarine every five weeks. We—and all of the NATO countries combined—are far behind the Soviets in naval construction and preparedness.

And speaking of islands, there is the hush-hush story of the Soviet occupation and use—for sinister purposes—of an American island in the Arctic Ocean near Alaska. According to an exclusive story appearing in

DEFENSE SECRETARY BROWN'S PLAN FOR MILITARY UNIONIZATION

Hon. Bill Young of Florida in the House of Representatives, Jan. 31, 1978: Mr. Speaker, on October 6, 1977, a Department of Defense directive was signed by Defense Secretary Harold Brown relative to the relationships with organizations which seek to represent members of the Armed Forces in negotiations or collective bargaining. In reviewing this directive, I find most disturbing the Secretary's decision that military and civilian personnel of the Armed Forces may participate in such organizations as long as the Secretary determines there is no "clear danger" that such participation might adversely affect "discipline, loyalty, or obedience to lawful orders." In view of Secretary Brown's conditional endorsement of military unionization, I believe it is time to prohibit by law such unionization of America's armed forces.

Mr. Speaker, ever since 1974 when the American Federation of Government Employees decided to explore the prospect of organizing the military, concern has been growing in both the public and private sectors over the possible ramifications of military unionization. To their credit, the members of the AFGE subsequently voiced opposition to such unionization.

Our national security rests upon the capability of our Armed Forces. When our military is called upon to defend us, there can be no room for bargaining or negotiating in the critical moments of battle. Just as those who assume the burden of command must know that their orders will be responded to directly and not after a process of negotiation, the individual soldier in combat must likewise be assured that his fellow comrades can be relied upon to perform their assigned functions without going off to caucus in the midst of battle. An effective military force is built upon discipline, patriotism, and quick response capability. As a consequence, the operation of unions within the military cannot be tolerated if we are to have an effective Defense Establishment....

Spotlight for Feb. 20, the U.S. Navy landed on the uninhabited island in 1881 and claimed it for the United States. Later, a Russian gunboat kidnapped a colony of Americans homesteading there and seized the island illegally. Now, Wrangle Island—which lies about 160 miles west of Alaska—is being used by the Soviets as a concentration camp where "inhuman medical and scientific experiments" are being carried out on prisoners. Thousands of prisoners of war, thought to be dead since World War II, are said to be imprisoned on three camps on the island. Experiments on the prisoners are said to be in the form of injections, diets, "endurance thresholds of the human organism, how it responds to an insufficient supply of oxygen, to motion, to weightlessness."

Rep. Robert Dornan of California saw an official declassified map of Wrangel Island. A pilot for 27 years and skilled at reading aviation maps, he said: "There is a huge airfield, as large as anything needed for jumbo jets, located on the southern coast of the island. There are also two large meteorological stations there. But the most intriguing thing is that there are three roads that lead nowhere. That sometimes can indicate some type of underground facility."

Increased KGB activity, spies in the sky, islands that serve as airplane and submarine bases and tracking stations, fishing fleets that fish for information instead of fish, a crash program to increase the size of what is already the world's largest submarine fleet; these all add up to what could be a most dangerous situation, one involving the very existence of the United States as an independent Nation. Then comes the added information that Soviet personnel are flying observation planes out of Cuba, supposedly because all Cuban pilots have been sent to Africa. And on top of all of this, our own President insists that we give our Canal in Panama to a Communist-oriented dictator!

What does this all really mean? Well, on the assumption that "it was planned this way," let's use the guide recommended by Patrick Henry and see what answer history will give us:

Prior to World War I, the Socialists of the world were divided into two major camps. One camp believed in victory through evolution (called Mensheviks in Russian and Fabian Socialists in English). The other camp believed in victory through revolution (called Bolsheviks in Russian and Communists in English). Lenin was the acknowledged leader of the Bolsheviks and, while the more moderate Evolutionary Socialists were talking about "persuasion, education and legislation" as the best method of converting the world to Socialism, Lenin insisted that the absolute destruction of all bourgeois states and societies was essential. There could be no compromise. In his book, State and Revolution, published in 1917, Lenin laid down his doctrine that: The Communist State 1) is a machine that must destroy all enemies of communism; that 2) only after eliminating all its enemies can the Communist State begin to "wither away" and become a true Socialist State. In other words, a Dictatorship of the Proletariat must be established in one State (Russia); then every "bourgeois state and society" must be "smashed to bits." After that, the world dictatorship will slowly "wither away" and a stateless form of true Socialism will be the final synthesis. Lenin admitted that this "withering away" period would encompass years, perhaps centuries.

After Lenin died and Stalin gained control of the dictatorship, a slight change began to manifest itself. Because of his inability to overcome Tito's brand of National Socialism without resorting to total war, which seemed inadvisable at the time, Stalin conceded that war and revolution were not necessarily the only way that communism could be established in a country. In his book Foundations of Leninism, published in 1932, Stalin wrote:

"...Of course,...if the proletariat wins in the main capitalistic countries and if the present capitalistic encirclement is substituted by a socialist encirclement, the 'peaceful' path of development will be quite possible for some capitalistic countries, whose capitalists deem it unwise, in view of the 'unfavorable' international situation, to make 'voluntary' serious concessions to the proletariat...."

Just before he died, and after atomic bombs had been detonated, Stalin said that communism was inevitable and therefore wars were also inevitable, but the Soviet Union must promote the wars and then stay out of them! Hence the use of Chinese and North Korean troops in one war, of the Vietcong in another war, and the Cubans in yet other wars and revolutions in South and Central America, and now in Africa.

Malenkov took over for a while after Stalin's death, and he almost immediately made the statement that "war in the atomic age is unthinkable." Unthinkable, of course, if the USSR were directly involved. War for other nations was, of course, inevitable, because wars must come if communism is to win—and "communism is inevitable."

Then Khrushchev replaced Malenkov, and it was Khrushchev who made Eurocommunism possible. At the 1956 Communist Party congress, Khrushchev said that war was no longer "fatally inevitable." He went on to say that different countries might take different ways to Socialism, and that in certain lands and under certain circumstances, revolution might be achieved by peaceful means. This was the signal that communist leaders in France and Italy were waiting for. It meant that in countries that did not have a common border with the Soviet Union, the communists could develop their own methods of gaining political power. If the Menshevik (Fabian) method of "persuasion, education and legislation" seemed preferable to violence and armed revolution, then such procedure now had the Kremlin's blessing.

But then came the big blow-up with Communist China. The December, 1960, Communist Conference was the last at which all 81 of the world's Communist parties would meet together. The Chinese delegates blasted Khrushchev for his attacks on Stalin, for his "betrayal of Leninism" and most especially for his acceptance of "different paths to Socialism" and for his rejection of the "fatal inevitability of war." This, they insisted, was "revisionism," which is the most deadly sin in Bolshevik eyes.

This was to give Eurocommunism the break it needed. Evolutionary (as opposed to revolutionary) Socialism had been approved by the Kremlin, denounced by Peking, and if the Communist parties of Spain, Portugal, France, Italy and other countries—including the United States—wanted to take the Fabian (as opposed to the Bolshevik) route toward world Socialism, then the Soviet must approve or else it would be siding with China and Maoism!

It will be noted that, despite Khrushchev's fall from Soviet grace and the enthronement of Brezhnev, there has been no change in this particular policy. Hence, in the United States the Communists and/or Socialists who look to Moscow for guidance have now "gone into politics or education", and have quit throwing bombs and causing riots. The terrorists of today are, in the main, adherents to Maoism. As Rep. Larry McDonald pointed out in a series of articles appearing in the Congressional Record: "Since the beginning of the 1960s the communist parties in Europe and Latin America have been increasingly using the tactics of participation in the electoral process and formation of political coalitions. Facilitating these alliances has been the development of the so-called Eurocommunist style of Communist Party...the Eurocommunists...maintain a policy of collaboration with the Soviets in all matters of foreign policy such as drives for detente and disarmament, trade, and support of the Soviet-sponsored Marxist 'national liberation movements' in the Third World without objection to their use of terrorism."

In the Communist/Socialist World, the real split is between the Leninists (Maoists) and the Moscow Revisionists. And this brings us to the role played by Monopoly Capitalism in the Socialist scheme for creation of the New World Order:

There has been cooperation between Communism and Monopoly Capitalism from the very beginning. International Bankers financed the transport of Lenin and his associates from Switzerland, and Trotsky and his aides from New York City to Russia, and financed the conquest of Russia by the Bolsheviks. Then British and American engineers, experts, technicians and advisers were sent into Russia to aid in the "transformation" of Russia from a "feudal to an industrial society." The Soviet system has been, from its very inception, a Monopoly Capitalist system. The "holding company" is the "board of directors" of the Communist Party, and important stockholders are the agents of the Rockefeller and the Rothschild interests, the Eatons and the Hammers, the Pepsi-Cola, Coca-Cola, Fiat and other multinational giants that have huge investments in Communist-dominated countries.

Rather belatedly but important, is an article appearing on page 52 of the current (Feb. 20, 1978) issue of U.S. News & World Report. The article begins: "The Soviet Union is turning to one of the capitalist world's most potent weapons, the multinational corporation, in a bid to capture new markets in the West. Russia has created nearly 40 international companies with subsidiaries in 13 non-Communist countries. Prime areas of activity: banking, export promotion, shipping."

The article does not explain that these Soviet multinationals have any connection with "free world" multinationals, but a clue is provided in its explanation of how Moscow Narodny's branch bank in Singapore got into trouble through bad investments in Hong Kong and Australia and "Moscow finally sent an English executive to straighten out the mess and oversee the bank's future investments." Cooperation and collaboration is the name of the game among monopoly capitalists, whether they be private corporations such as Chase Manhattan, or public corporations such as the Soviet Government.

Currently, the Soviet is engaged in building a Communist Empire in Africa; and there is great rivalry between the Rockefeller and the Rothschild interests as to who is going to reap the major rewards from this African Development. The New York-based monopoly capitalists are favored by the Soviet Communists, while the London-based monopoly capitalists are in control of the Eurocommunists of Western Europe.

But the key goal is the creation of a new "Communist Empire" in Africa which is to include Rhodesia, South Africa, and the mineral-rich South West Africa. This is to be accomplished through capital investment by the "free world," political infiltration by the communist world, and military operations by surrogate Cuban troops and communist-controlled, western-financed native African terrorist groups.

For such a massive operation involving the takeover of an entire continent, something must be done to keep the attention of the people of the world focused on other problems, keep them worried about other things. Hence, we have a world-wide energy problem, concern over NATO, strikes by farmers and coal miners, threats of a possible Soviet attack upon the United States Mainland and, though the connection will never be admitted by the authorities, weather manipulation affecting Western Europe, the British Isles and the United States, and bringing milder weather to the USSR.

In this explanation of the "new look" of Communist strategy for conquest, we could be wrong. We hope we are. But we doubt it.

A WORLD IN TROUBLE

A TIME FOR NATIONAL CRISES?

In the usual course of national events, we are told that it is the ultra-conservative, or the right-wing extremist, who always cries wolf; that is, who is always posting danger signs and warning everybody that the Nation is in grave danger, either from external attack or internal collapse. But, lately, something new has been added. Now even moderates and members of that so-called silent majority are beginning to feel that something may be wrong with the way our Ship of State is being piloted, and that real danger may be facing us. In fact, if even half of the people believe half of the things being told them by political leaders and by some of our newspapers, they would begin to feel that something really is wrong — and that nobody seems to be doing anything to alleviate the situation. Perhaps it takes Watergates, Koreagates, pre-programmed coal miner strikes and manipulated weather crises to make folks start asking questions. Or perhaps the many about-faces of Jimmy Carter had something to do with it.

That Jimmy Carter faces a mess of trouble, both at home and abroad, is no secret. That he seems unable or unwilling to solve or resolve the troubles that beset him—and the Nation because he is its Chief Executive—also is no secret. The fact that many of the troubles are of his own making does not alleviate the situation. For example:

The Middle East Situation. When Jimmy was a candidate he made some promises: 1) that he would oppose the sale of arms to Egypt if such arms could be used in a strike against Israel (in a statement in a St. Louis Jewish Letter (3/31/76); 2) he said he'd not try to force Israel to give back territory won from the Arab States (in a telegram to the American Jewish Press Association, 5/25/76); 3) he said he'd give Israel whatever military and economic aid that was necessary (in a speech on the Middle East 6/6/76).

However, when it was discovered by the Trilateralists that Israel planned a blitz against her Arab neighbors (a move that would halt oil shipments to Europe and the United States), Carter & Co. hastily made a deal with Saudi Arabia whereby Sadat of Egypt would become a messenger of peace. Then Carter broke a promise and insisted that certain occupied lands should be given back to the Arabs. He broke another promise by selling warplanes to Egypt and Saudi Arabia. Result: Begin and Carter are clashing openly over peace terms, and Carter has probably incurred the wrath of the powerful Zionist bloc, and may have lost at least "six million" votes if he chooses to run again in 1980.

The SALT II Agreement. While campaigning for the Presidency, Carter promised that he would move quickly to secure a new SALT agreement with the Soviet Union, and that he would do this "before both sides start a new arms race and before new missile systems are tested and committed for production." (Statement reported in The New York Times, 6/23/76). Upon taking the oath of office, Carter predicted early success in arms-limitation-negotiations. But the SALT II Treaty ran into a solid deadlock. A February II article in the Soviet Communist Party newspaper Pravda demanded a new set of treaty terms that were clearly unacceptable to the U.S. Senate.

Complicating matters further, the NATO Defense Command reported that the Warsaw Pact Nations now have a superiority of more than 2½-to-1 over NATO in tanks and conventional weapons. Then, on February 7th, Senate Majority Leader Richard Byrd began the legislative day by telling his colleagues that the Soviet has developed a new outer space weapon that could "ground" all American defense efforts. Here is a part of that speech:

"We should be acutely aware of, and deeply concerned over, Soviet advancement in outer space weaponry. In the past 8 years, it is reported that the Soviet Union has launched, for military purposes, 325 space satellites. The Soviets are, in fact, well on their way to developing a so-called hunter-killer satellite. Such a space armament would be capable of destroying the communications network by which the United States controls its military deterrent system. ... such a threat cannot be ignored or placed on a security backburner.... The Washington Star, in an editorial on February 7, posed the question: "Why would the Soviet Union be developing a satellite-killing system capable of severing the communications link that makes U.S. deterrence work, unless with hostile intent?"

The Declining Dollar. On the morning of Friday, February 24th, the wire services reported: "For the first time since World War II, West German banks Thursday paid American visitors only two marks for a dollar. Eight years ago the dollar bought four West German marks.... The dollar also tumbled to new lows against the Swiss franc, the Belgian franc, and the Dutch guilder, following criticism that the United States was not doing enough to bolster its sagging currency. It also fell in London, Milan, Paris and Tokyo."

More Brush-Fire Wars? With this rash of international crises coinciding with a coal crisis, and a weather crisis, along comes the threat of potential Vietnam-type wars which would involve Americans in more no-win confrontations on distant battlefields. It should be remembered that, whenever a nation found itself in serious economic difficulties, war often was seen as a way out of the economic troubles. Nowadays a large-scale war is unthinkable, but a brush-fire war that can be contained and limited, as in Korea, Vietnam, or even the Middle East, is still looked upon as a way out of domestic crises. This makes an article that appears in the current (Feb. 27) issue of U.S. News & World Report of particular importance. Following are important excerpts:

* * * * *

In the face of an aggressive new Soviet challenge, this country is once more starting to put together an elite military strike force to rush to any trouble spot in the world. The aim is to insure that, in a foreign crisis af-

OOPS! SORRY:

In Report #5 (2/3/78) 4th line, 2nd column, page 1, we erred. Reference was to the U.S. Naval base at Guantanamo, not Guadalcanal. This correction will be made in all future reprints of the Report titled "The Selling of the American Canal Treaties."

fecting vital U.S. interests, American power arrives first—ahead of any Soviet intervention force. Two Army divisions and one from the Marines have been initially tagged for the quick-reaction assignment....

... A Soviet nuclear attack on the U.S. (is) the least likely danger as long as the present "balance of terror" is preserved. A Soviet drive to overrun Europe also is viewed as a remote threat—but one that requires the bolstering of NATO to convince the Russians that a conventional blitzkrieg offensive cannot achieve a quick victory.

A different threat is spotlighted by administration strategic analysts: a military move by the Soviets to exploit a local crisis in an area where significant U.S. interests are at stake—notably South Korea, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf....

Viewed with particular anxiety by these planners is a possible Russian attempt to establish a foothold in the Persian Gulf region by exploiting a local crisis. That would endanger vital oil supplies for the U.S. and, even more, for its European and Japanese allies.... The consequences of a successful Soviet military move into the Persian Gulf region could be disastrous for NATO....

A dramatic example of the new threat posed by Moscow is seen in the speedy and large-scale Soviet intervention in the Horn of Africa in collaboration with Cuba, which is reversing the course of the conflict there.

... Whatever the technical military problems involved in implementing a rapid-reaction strategy, top administration officials stress that the most serious obstacle is political. In the words of one of the President's most influential policy advisers: "The crucial question is a matter of will—whether there is a national will, in the aftermath of Vietnam, to use American military power except to defend this country or its allies from an overt Soviet attack."

(end of quoted excerpts)

* * * * *

A far more important question: If there is a real threat of war with the Soviet, brush-fire or European, then why is our own federal government aiding the Soviet Union in its conquest of Africa and Central America?

Example: Andrew Young is U.S. Ambassador to the UN. He says the Communists are in the process of "stabilizing" the world. The Communists prefer the word "liberating," while those who cherish freedom call it "enslaving". But "stabilizing" is Young's preference. When the Cuban troops were "liberating" Angola, Young referred to them as a "stabilizing" force. A howl of protest from the general public caused Jimmy Carter to caution his "finest public servant" about using such terminology, and Young uttered what apparently was accepted as an apology—and Martin Luther King's beloved disciple controlled his tongue for a spell. But, a few days ago, he proved that his original statement was no slip of the tongue. In an interview with the Rand Daily Mail of South Africa, he repeated the same statement, as reported in the Los Angeles Times of February 6th.

Now the Soviet Union is assisting its Cuban satellite in "stabilizing" Ethiopia. The plan is to sustain the Communist dictator Mengistu in power, aid him in "stabilizing" Somalia and Eritrea. Then the Horn of Africa will be totally "stabilized" and a giant step will have been taken toward the conquest of all Africa and the economic strangulation of the United States, since the Horn provides control over the vital oil shipping lanes in that region.

Control of the American Canal in Panama is another giant step if the Communists are to accomplish this economic strangulation of the United States. And our own government is aiding its enemy in this respect. If you remain unconvinced of this, then read what the Communists themselves say about the Canal. The Communists of Panama, who are members of a party they call the People's Party, have published a statement about the Canal, which appeared in the information bulletin of the World Marxist Review, No. 18, 1977. We are indebted to Fred Schwarz of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade for the text of this statement. Following are the more important parts of the statement.

The new Panamanian-U.S. treaty, signed by General Torrijos and President Carter... marks a further step in the talks between the two nations. However, this treaty has yet to be ratified by the U.S. Senate and by a plebiscite of the people of Panama. It is vital to win these two important battles in order to consummate yet another phase in the struggle against colonialism....

We, Panamanian communists, support the treaty signed by Torrijos and Carter inasmuch as it is a vehicle of our country's decolonization and point out the need for strengthening anti-imperialist national unity in order to advance toward complete liberation through the defeat of the imperialist oligarchy in all areas and consummate the structural transformations launched in preceding years. We have taken a step forward. The struggle continues!

People's Party of Panama,

THE TRILATERAL CONNECTION

In addition to the Communist Parties of the world, there is another group of internationalists that is most anxious to affect the severance of all direct and official connections between the governments of Panama and the United States. The giving of the Canal to Panama is an essential part of that severance.

Some time ago, the multinational "bancorporations" decided that certain small States should be set up as "protected enclaves" where they could operate without too much strict government supervision, where taxes would be at a minimum, where government bank examiners would provide no hazard, and where international money manipulations could be conducted with a minimum of red tape. Panama was selected as one of these "protected enclaves" for international bankers, and Torrijos is said to be right when he boasts that there are more banks per square block in Panamanian cities than in any other part of the world. The only catch is that those cities lie within the Panama Canal Zone, which is still United States territory. Get the Zone turned over to the so-called Republic of Panama, and the place would be a true "bankers' paradise."

The story is told in detail in an exclusive interview appearing in the February 27th issue of Spotlight (weekly, $16 per year, 300 Independence Ave. S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003). In case you haven't read this

THE RIGHT WOMAN — STATUS REPORT

Jo Ann Gasper, of the Anti-ERA Ad Hoc Committee on the IWY, has published an important report on the status of women's legislation in the 95th Congress. This is a between-the-sessions summary of important bills introduced, action taken, and prospects for the Second Session. Compiled on Capitol Hill, it gives capsule information on what has happened, where the battles will be fought in 1978. 16 pages. article, George Nicholas interviewed an international banker with interests in Panama. The banker asked that he not be identified, and told Nicholas that "Panama serves as a sort of fulcrum for vast currency leverage deals. This massive manipulation of global money markets progressively aggravates a number of serious economic problems:

- * It contributes to the catastrophic decline of the U.S. dollar.
- * It results in shrinking trade and accelerating inflation.
- * It makes for unstable farm and commodity prices.
- * Among its side effects are increasing unemployment and a depressed equity market.
- * It accelerates an unmistakable shift toward international fiscal anarchy."

The banker told Nicholas that under the old Bretton Woods, fixed-exchange convention the international monetary system—and much of the global economy—was managed by the central banks of the major powers (ours is the Federal Reserve System.) But in 1973 a floating-rate system was adopted, under which currency values were to be set, not by governmental controls, but by the free movements of the market. The Rockefellers were the first to realize that under this new system "the central banks would lose much of their power to control the world's economy. This power was now up for grabs and—joined in alliance with a group of private transnational banks—the Chase Manhattan, flagship bank of the Rockefellers, made a determined grab for it."

"Like a great battle tank converted into a warship," the banker continued, "the Chase Manhattan went 'offshore.' By the end of 1975, overseas financial ventures accounted for more than half of Chase Manhattan's earnings." Other megabanks were quick to follow and "overseas banking came to concentrate on so-called 'offshore enclaves'—the Bahamas, the Cayman Islands, and most importantly, Panama.

"The megabanks moved to Panama much like a man contemplating rape and robbery leaves his own home and moves to a less regulated environment where he can do what he wants in anonymity. To engineer vast international currency deals, with all their inevitable hazard and irresponsibility and potentially destructive aftereffect, Chase Manhattan had to escape the U.S. regulatory system which insists that banks behave prudently and responsibly. To accumulate the funds to control these huge gambles, it had to evade U.S. taxation. And to attain control of the world market, the transnational banks had to treat the U.S. dollar, not as the essential tender of their own home country, but as just another currency, to be manipulated and 'shorted' if necessary. In their quest for power, the megabanks often bet against their own currency, helping, in effect, to devalue the dollar."

"This whole ruinous scheme," concluded the banker who—for obvious reasons—asked that his name not be used, "has left us with one energetically if senselessly ongoing project: the insane Panama Canal giveaway. If—God forbid—it is ratified, the drunken and corrupt Omar Torrijos may yet emerge as the one permanent beneficiary of what might otherwise be known as 'the era of the bankers' folly'."

* * * * *

CONCLUSION: It seems evident that the Money Managers of the World are willing to grant Political Management of the World to the International Communists, in order to serve their own ends. Of course, World Political Management must of necessity include World Policing Power.

Surrendering the American Canal in Panama to the Communists is not an isolated action. It is also proposed to hand over Southern Africa to Communist political and military control. Whoever controls the combined mineral resources of Southern Africa and the Soviet Union has the following domination of the world's known raw materials: 90% of all uranium, 90% of all platinum, 85% of all gold, 80% of all vanadium, 75% of all manganese, and 96% of all chrome. Furthermore, over 10,000 ships pass through the Canal at Panama annually and over 23,000 ships pass the Cape of Good Hope annually. If both were controlled by the Communists we could be strangled economically, our sole chance of survival would involve our surrender to The New World Order.

INTERDEPENDENCE AND THE TRILATERAL CONNECTION

UNION NOW RESTRUCTURED

We missed the article entirely. But a subscriber found it tucked away on page 89 of the January 18, 1978 Chicago Sun Times, and forwarded it to us. We believe it is of sufficient importance that it should be republished. First, a comment: The Trilateral Commission is not a think tank; neither is the Atlantic Institute. Both are power bases, funded by Rockefeller-Rothschild interests and charged with the task of creating a New World Order, one that will be most beneficial to International Bankers, Multinational Cartelists and Monopoly Capitalists. Please bear this in mind while reading the following article.

U.S. THINK TANK CONSIDERS MERGER WITH EUROPEAN UNIT

Washington—The Trilateral Commission—the David Rockefeller-founded group, many of whose members moved into influential positions in the Carter administration—is considering a merger with another heavy-weight private organization of prominent international movers and shakers.

The prospective partner is the Paris-based Atlantic Institute, which isn't exactly a household name in the circles where most people move. But in that special arena where global thinkers, multinational business executives and politicians rub against one another in an effort to influence world events, the move has potentially large significance. Its impact in its sphere is roughly comparable to General Motors joining forces with Volkswagen.

If the merger goes through, it's likely to trigger some new versions of the conspiracy theories heard a year ago when so many Trilateral Commission members turned up in key jobs within the Carter administration. That caused both left-wingers and right-wingers to speculate about the commission being a mechanism for infiltrating the government.

President Carter was a member. So, too, was

Vice President Walter F. Mondale. And Carter's national security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, had been a director of the commission. Other Trilateralists in the administration include Sec. of State Cyrus Vance, Treasury Sec. W. Michael Blumenthal, Defense Sec. Harold Brown, UN Ambassador Andrew Young, Deputy Sec. of State Warren M. Christopher and Undersecretary of State Richard N. Cooper.

George Franklin, the Trilateral Commission co-ordinator, denies a conspiracy. The merger talk, he said, is prompted by the fact that the two organizations overlap in many areas of interest, activity and membership. By getting together, he added, they might be better able to avoid wasteful duplications of effort and—by no means an incidental consideration—competition in raising funds.

What's more, Franklin stressed, a merger is by no means certain. The two organizations, he said, are only beginning to explore the idea. (End of article).

Like the Council on Foreign Relations and the Bilderberger Group before being exposed by Mary Davison, Dan Smoot, Don Bell et al, the Atlantic Institute is virtually unknown by the public and almost never mentioned in the communications media. However, since its creation in 1961, the Atlantic Institute has been a most potent force in the promotion of Interdependence and the creation of an Atlantic Union to be composed of the nations of Western Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Although the Atlantic Institute is a Paris-based organization, its first Director-General was Henry Cabot Lodge, who also was a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, a Bilderberger, etc.; and the Rockefeller Brothers Fund financed the founding and early operations of the Atlantic Institute. Later, because of being a Paris-based organization, it is reported that the Rothschild interests took over the major part of the necessary funding of the Institute, although many of its members are also members of the Rockefeller-controlled Council on Foreign Relations and the Rockefeller-funded Bilderberg Group.

In a book, Partnership For Progress, A Program For Transatlantic Action, published by Harper & Row for the Atlantic Institute, Henry Cabot Lodge wrote, in the preface:

“There is no lack of statements of the truth that the nations of the free world are interdependent. Even the most chauvinistic do not deny that the well-being of every nation—even that of the United States—will depend increasingly on its participation in some sort of grouping of nations...

“Our failure to organize ourselves is certainly not due to any lack of warning. As far back as 1958 the Rockefeller Brothers Fund Report said: ‘The free world must devise the institutions for a world community... President Kennedy on July 4, 1962, in Independence Hall, said that ‘alone’ the United States could do none of the big things which should be done in the world, but that ‘joined with other free nations’ it could....

“Later events, however, were to make clear that such efforts at political union, however laudable the idealism impelling them, are apt to lead to dead ends... unless preceded by economic foundations.”

Here was the key phrase: Economic Union must come first, then political union will follow. This statement of policy was to be confirmed by history. It became possible to create the European Economic Community, now generally known as the Common Market. The European Free Trade Association was established as something of a counterweight to the Common Market. Other regional economic cooperatives have been tried with some success. But, up to this point in time, the successful creation of a political regional government involving the merger of two or more countries has been accomplished only through coercion, never by consent of the people.

This situation became troublesome as giant multinational corporations began to develop and multinational executives found themselves and their corporations hampered by the various and varying economic restrictions, taxing regulations and labor laws of the different host countries in which they chose to do business. As Richard Barnett and Ronald Muller commented in Global Reach, The Power of the Multinational Corporations, pages 118-20:

“The heart of the legitimacy problem for the global corporation is the clash between global corporate loyalty and national law... e.g. the State Department, not ITT, is supposed to set foreign policy. It is evident that governments are losing control over important international transactions and that nominally private organizations are gaining control over such transactions. The ancient political question By What Right? keeps plaguing the global corporations as they become more assertive in acting like states. Their justification for their power, as we have seen, is efficiency: ‘We can deliver’ is their political slogan.

“But the World Managers know that neither slogans nor ‘education campaigns’ are enough to legitimize the exercise of political power. Authority must be sanctioned by law. Thus men like George Ball have been talking for years about international chartering of global corporations by some world organization... The World Managers... are not enthusiastic about the United Nations... They would rather have organizations dominated by industrial countries, such as the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development... The International Chamber of Commerce has proposed the adoption of international guidelines for regulation of the behavior of corporations and governments, and the Atlantic Institute, among others, sees a possible solution to the legitimacy problem in a ‘code of good behavior’ to which all World Managers would faithfully subscribe. David Rockefeller believes that the reformation must include the global corporations themselves. Stock ownership must become more truly multinational... The corporations should take steps to ‘remove the air of mystery which sometimes surrounds them,’ advises the Atlantic Institute....

“The World Managers who are orchestrating the Great Crusade (have a) liberal vision of a world corporate society promising peace and abundance.” (quoted from Global Reach, by Richard Barnett and Ronald Muller, Simon and Schuster, $11.95).

In an attempt to bring an end to this war between national political sovereignties and multinational economic sovereignties, David Rockefeller founded and funded the Trilateral Commission. Its purpose was to “educate and program” young politicians who would then be placed in key positions in government where they could see to it that national economic and foreign policy did not compete with the Multinationalists’ economic and developmental policies.

However, after a year of control of foreign, economic and monetary policy in the United States and, to a lesser extent, in the other Trilateral-controlled States, the Commission has not been as successful as the TLC team in Washington, D.C. had hoped. One important failure was the reported defeat of the proposed new international currency called Bancor. The L.T. Patterson Strategy Letter for January, 1978 announced:

“Rockefeller plans for a new world currency (Bancor) were delivered a devastating defeat when the White House ‘threw in the towel’ and agreed to permit an increase in the discount rate, just prior to the close of business Friday, Jan. 6th—and prior to a critical Bank for International Settlements meeting in Basel, Switzerland.... PSL sources say that the European Central bankers and Saudi royal family members threatened the Americans with devastating retaliation in the gold market if the dollar were not given the support of increased interest rates. ... The ‘Bancor’ will work only in a worldwide totalitarian state, and we’re not there yet. Therefore, we can see the bankruptcy of the plans for a new Trilateral world monetary system.... Thus plans to implement the new monetary system must be delayed... a way must be found to destroy the dollar, while stabilizing the stock market.”

“In the end,” continues PSL, “after Trilateral policies have utterly destroyed our currency, they will find that the rest of the world will insist on a gold-based, international system of settlements. We realize how many people stand ‘in awe’ of the Brookings Institution, the Council on Foreign Relations and their slick pamphlets, magazines and books—which have automatic acceptance at the offices of the federal government and universities. Nonetheless, in spite of all the ‘trappings of success’ such plans are nothing more than fantasy as far as the rest of the world is concerned. Of course, such a toilet-paper currency can be used by America (we are already using a toilet-paper currency). But that, in no way, implies the ability of the Rockefeller government to force a toilet-paper settlements system on the rest of the world!” (unquote).

Now it becomes clear why the New York based Trilateral Commission wants to form a partnership with the Paris based Atlantic Institute. The Central Banks of Europe are rejecting the Trilateral Commission plans (the American dollar is taking a terrible beating meanwhile) and a European power base is needed to get the governments of Western Europe “lined up.”

While this international struggle is going on, there also is trouble with Trilateral control of the State Department in Washington, D.C. Richard N. Cooper, formerly of Yale, is the Trilateral Commissioner in charge of international economic policy, and it seems that there is trouble in his commissariat. An article by Stephen M. Aug, in the Business and Finance section of the Washington Star of January 25, 1978, is noteworthy. Here are quotes:

Members of a prestigious State Department business advisory committee have been told for the first time they are going to need security clearances to attend secret briefings, which has at least one member of the committee upset. The committee, which deals with the problems of multinational business firms, has a high-level corporate membership which has included several prominent businessmen now in top-level Carter Administration posts. It also has consumer, labor and academic members. The committee is supposed to advise the department on policies involving multinational corporations, and members receive briefings on the direction in which the administration and State Department intend to go in matters affecting corporations whose businesses cross international boundaries.

The requirement for security clearances was made in a letter to the members from Richard N. Cooper, undersecretary of State for economic affairs. He said the security clearances were needed because the committee may be given sensitive background briefings on international negotiations....

The committee, formed about three years ago, is called the Advisory Committee on Transnational Enterprises. Past members have included W. Michael Blumenthal, now Secretary of the Treasury; C. Fred Bergsten, assistant secretary of the Treasury for international affairs; and William G. Miller, Carter’s nominee as chairman of the board of the Federal Reserve Board....

The committee is involved in consideration of such matters as international accounting standards, problems concerning the transmission of computerized data across international borders, an international code of ethics for transnational businesses (particularly a proposed United Nations Treaty on illicit business payments), and transfer of technology to developing nations....

(End of quotes from article)

Other members of this State Department's Business Advisory Committee include top executives of such multinational firms as Exxon, Texaco, Kennecott Copper and other members of the Council on Foreign Relations Business Advisory Council. Also included are academics, labor representatives and a director of Ralph Nader's Congress Watch. To exclude these latter individuals from attending the secret briefings was the purpose of Richard Cooper's order. This would provide Trilateral Commission and Council on Foreign Relations control of the State Department's policy concerning Multinational Corporations. This is an essential step in the creation of a Corporate State!

THE AFRICAN CONNECTION

The Regional Development formula adopted by the Trilateral Commission and the Atlantic Institute, "economic unity first, then political unity must follow," worked well for the industrialized nations of the world: Western Europe, Japan and North America. But this formula would never work in the "developing" states of Africa. Here the "colonial control" of whole areas had to be eliminated. Then new governments had to be set up, and some measure of political control had to be established before economic development could be hazarded (this, of course, did not apply to South Africa and Rhodesia, where stable governments had been established without "outside help.")

A complicating factor has been the inability of the "developers" to form stable governments in Africa. But they have proceeded with their "developing" in spite of this. Result: the multinational bancorporations can't collect payments on their loans, and the "developers" can't be sure that their "developments" are safe from vandalism, or nationalism.

This situation has led to a military development in Africa which has been kept secret for some time, and which is being variously interpreted now that the "news has leaked." We refer to the creation, by West Germany, of a missile base in Zaire.

On March 26, 1976 an agreement was signed between Mobutu Sese Seko, president of Zaire (formerly known as the Congo) and a West German multinational corporation, OTRAG (a German acronym for "Orbital Launch and Rocket Corporation"). OTRAG was to give Mobutu a reported $50 million a year, and Mobutu was to give OTRAG exclusive control of an area about the size of the State of Colorado, located in the Shaba (formerly Katanga) Province.

Here the Germans built and manned a secret missile-launching base, allegedly with the approval of the Trilateral Commission and the Carter administration, and with the CIA and the BND playing a crucial role in its development (BND means "Bundes Nachrichtenendienst," the West German counterpart of the CIA). To assist the German scientists American scientists were sent to the base—Heading the list was Kurt Debus, who was assistant to Werner Von Braun at the Army Rocket Research Center in Huntsville, Ala. in the early 60s. OTRAG's president is also a top missiles expert, Dr. Lutz T. Kayser, who reportedly had worked for NASA at the height of its space program.

At first, the Germans insisted that all they were doing was building weather satellites. But when observers and investigators were refused permission to enter the area, people became suspicious; and the suspicions were confirmed when they began testing cruise missiles and IRBMs.

Also involved with OTRAG in the building of missiles in Zaire are the German aircraft company Dornier which supplies airframes, Messerschmidt which provides the engines, and the French Thompson-CSF company which builds the navigational-guidance systems for the German missiles.

The lease for this Shaba territory runs until the year 2000, and no Zaire government can cancel the contract. There are air strips, launching ramps, housing and hospital facilities and other conveniences for the OTRAG personnel, who enjoy full diplomatic privileges and immunities—and only authorized individuals with full clearance are allowed to enter the area.

Multinationals developing their own defense department? Germans rearming? An Allied defense post against native insurrection or communist intervention? Preparations for aggression against South Africa? There is much speculation and no official answers. But where there are powderkegs there is always the threat of explosion.

THE RESURGENCE OF VIOLENCE AND TERRORISM

VANDALS STILL WITH US

"When the Vandals, a fierce Teutonic tribe, rampaged through the tottering Roman Empire in the mid-fifth century A.D., so wanton was their destruction that they came to symbolize senseless havoc through all the ages.

"The vandals are still with us, destroying swiftly that which was laborously built by others. Of course, the difference today is that modern vandals are not an invading army of barbarians storming our gates—they are homegrown barbarians in our midst. They assume many destructive forms. Some are arsonists, some bombers, some wreckers, some litterbugs and a lot of them leave a trail of graffiti."

"Whatever subversion of civilization they pursue," the editor continued, "modern vandals share one common trait with all of their infamous predecessors—a total disregard for their fellowman and an irreverence for all that is good.

"The incidence of vandalism rises and falls in different generations. This has fascinated historians. Suffice to say that vandalism has become a major problem in our country today. It is a vicious manifestation of our permissive times. Nothing is safe—eagles slaughtered, museum masterpieces smashed and redwoods slashed.

"Nationally our schools are hit by vandalism that costs $600 million annually. The worst of it is that vandalism is growing. There is no relief in sight.

"Until decency and morality are again made an integral part of training for life in this country and families assume their responsibility to give proper direction to their offspring, the only answer we see is swift and severe punishment for vandals. Such a solution is a poor second to the real need, but it is the best we have to offer."

We were not able to identify the author of this editorial, but it is obvious that his chief concern is for the acts of vandalism committed by the younger generation, by those who will be "running things" a few years from now (unless their present actions help to force us into a totalitarian dictatorship before they "grow up.")

The editor's concern should not be taken too lightly. Because a recent UPI report stated that here in the United States, 5,000 school teachers are attacked by students each month, and that 1,000 of them sustain injuries serious enough to require medical attention. A study by the National Institute of Education shows that 282,000 students are attacked by other students each month. About 11% of all secondary school children—2.4 million out of 21 million—have something stolen from them in a given month; usually something valued at less than $10. About 12% of all teachers—12,000—have something stolen in a given month; about 6,000 of them have something taken by force, weapons or threats. More than one-fourth of all public schools are subject to vandalism each month at an average cost of $81 for each act of vandalism. About 10% of all public schools are burglarized each month. The report says nothing about the incidence of rape, the peddling of drugs, the drinking of alcoholic beverages, the smoking of various weeds on school premises, etc. But it is evident that the public schools are becoming training grounds for vandals, terrorists and criminals of all sorts. One other fact also is slowly becoming evident: the more money we put into school facilities and equipment, the worse the situation becomes.

We do not wish to create the impression that vandalism and terrorism are centered in the schools; these are merely kindergartens in the overall program. The advanced school of violence (or nihilism) utilizes the writings of Lenin as modernized by Mao, as its textbook. And there has been a certain sequence to the acts of vandalism and terrorism which indicate that "somebody has planned it that way." The sequence following World War II, went like this:

First, there was the near take-over of the executive departments of the federal government by communist agents, this being coincident with the take-over of the movie industry (remember the "Hollywood Ten"?) Through the efforts of such men as Whittaker Chambers, the young Richard Nixon, Senators McCarthy, McCarran, and others, this infestation was controlled, at horrible cost to the characters and the memories of the patriots who were active at the time.

Later came the student uprisings, followed by the vandalism and looting that accompanied the race riots. Then came the Weathermen, the Manson family, the various "liberation" gangs. Then came a wave of bombings of public buildings, occupation of public buildings with the holding of hostages, etc.

Skipping the details up to the more recent past, vandalism has taken a new turn. There were the mysterious and unexplained explosions and burnings of silos and wheat storage facilities. Then came the vandalism accompanying the current coal miners' strike and the attempts to shut down the non-union mines.

Still in the news are the railroad disasters of the past few weeks. Authorities dismiss the idea of vandalism or sabotage in all but one case. But the circumstances surrounding the incidents seem to belie official claims. For one thing: striking miners have been destroying trucks and upsetting railway cars in their attempts to prevent the transportation of coal to places where the need was the greatest. For another thing: these disasters all occurred in the Southland; and the Big Bosses of organized labor have a thing against most Southern States. They have right-to-work laws, which prevent Big Labor monopoly; and many industries have moved to the Southland because labor relations are better. There is the possibility that Big Labor would do most anything—even to causing train wrecks—in order to provide reasons for "organizing" the Southland. Finally, the fact that the Union that Reuther built, the UAW, is lending millions to the UMW so the miners can stay out on strike, when such a prolonged strike might cause the lay-off of all UAW members soon, is a most unusual thing.

When so many similar wrecks occur in so few days, people do get suspicious. In Waverly, Tenn., there was a derailment and, as men tried to transfer liquid propane gas from a tank car to trucks, there was an explosion which leveled 14 buildings, killed 12 and injured at least 50. Two days later, as a 140-car freight train was passing through Youngstown, Florida, all five locomotives jumped the tracks, piling up 47 cars like jackstraws. From one ruptured tank car a cloud of deadly chlorine gas poured out and covered the land for miles around. Eight were killed, 50 injured. Also in the same week, at Cades, Tenn., a 101-car train jumped the tracks. This time the danger was a car filled with caustic sodium hydroxide. Two days later 33 cars of a 91-car train were derailed near Bowling Green, Ky. In neither of these latter accidents were there any deaths.

Then, the strange airline coincidence: A plane bound for Honolulu from Los Angeles in taking off blew two tires. At about the same time at Honolulu a plane bound for the United States was taking off, blew two tires. In Los Angeles, 2 dead, 73 injured. In Honolulu, no casualties.

Then from trains and planes to museums and showplaces. From San Diego came word that fire gutted the historic Old Globe Theatre in Balboa Park on Wednesday, March 8, 1978. The theatre, famous for its annual Shakespearean Festivals, was about 200 yards from the San Diego Aero-Space Museum and Electric Building, destroyed by apparent arson on February 22, 1978.

There may be several reasons for this apparent resurgence of vandalism and destruction of property. The first such reason has to do with the fact that the old-time commies and fellow-travelers are crawling out of the woodwork, are being forgiven and their original accusers persecuted, while they are being honored and feted. One such incident was brought to light by Reed Irvine who recalled the past history of one Joris Ivens. Writing in the current (March 4) issue of Human Events, Mr. Irvine said, in part:

"Recently on ABC's 'Good Morning, America,' host David Hartman introduced an elderly man saying that he was 'a well-known documentary-maker who's been shooting film in China since 1938.' He added, 'And in 1972 he spent a year and a half filming the everyday lives of the Chinese people. He has made a remarkable 12-hour movie which will be shown in a series beginning today at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, for those of you who will be fortunate enough to be able to go and see it...."

"Hartman showed a few portions of his guest's film. The first sequence showed peasants engaged in hard labor on the farm. The guest identified that as a 1930 shot. It was then contrasted with one of his shots of Shanghai in 1972. The guest commented that people in China are better off today than they were previously.

"The implication seemed to be that the Communists had built the great city of Shanghai, eliminating the hard physical labor that the peasants had performed back in the bad old days before Communism.

"One had to wonder about a documentary-maker who would even imply something so patently false.... My curiosity aroused, I looked into the background of Hartman's guest, Mr. Joris Ivens.

"Mr. Iven's undoubted artistry with the camera has been at the service of Communist causes for half a century. In an interview with a French weekly reprinted in the June 1976 issue of Atlas, he said that he had been a Communist and a revolutionary since 1928."

Reed Irvine went on to show that this man who was honored as a great documentary-maker on a national television network, had spent his entire professional life serving Communist causes. In 1932 he produced a documentary called "Song of Heroes" in the Soviet Union, made to celebrate the conclusion of Stalin's first five-year plan. Then he filmed "Spanish Earth," which was designed to win support for the Loyalist side in the Spanish civil war. Even the New York Times described it as "definitely a propaganda effort."

Ivens did an autobiography, "The Camera and I" which was published by International Publishers, the Communist publishing house, in 1969. In it he said that documentary films need not be objective; instead, they should "agitate-mobilize" people "to become active in connection with the problems shown in the film" (the TV networks seem to agree with Ivens in this respect: few of their documentaries could be considered 'objective').

Besides making documentaries in the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, China, Castro's Cuba, he also did several propaganda films for Hanoi during the Vietnam War, which he described as the fight of the Vietnamese people "against American aggression."

Now Iven's propaganda films are being shown to American television viewers as "works of art." To the Communists they undoubtedly are.

Iven's is not an isolated case. There is Dalton Trumbo, one of the Hollywood Ten, who took time out from his movie propaganda efforts to help Alger Hiss set up the United Nations (we met them both but did not know them well in San Francisco in 1945). Trumbo is more influential than ever, and Hiss is suing for absolution and redress, both of which he seems sure to obtain. There are so many others, once officially identified as Communists and now high in public esteem and honored as "martyrs to McCarthyism."

Also aiding in vandalism and terrorism is "organized Christianity." As Frank Capell reported recently, "It has been well documented that the World Council of Churches and its affiliate in the United States, the National Council of Churches, have contributed and continue to contribute funds to radical, revolutionary, violence-prone and even outright guerrilla organizations."

Yet another reason for the resurgence of vandalism and terror in the United States is the fact that there is a legal organization dedicated to the task of keeping terrorists out of trouble and keeping them out of jail if they are caught. The National Lawyers Guild is an association of about 5,000 revolutionary lawyers which serves not only as a defense apparatus but also as a clandestine communications network between imprisoned terrorists and their at-large or fugitive comrades.

As we noted previously, Lenin wrote the textbook. In 1906 he laid down the rules; "Marxism differs from all primitive forms of socialism by not binding the movement to any one form of struggle. It recognizes the most varied forms of struggle; and it does not 'concoct' them, but only generalizes, organizes, gives conscious expression to those forms of struggle of the revolutionary classes which arise of themselves in the course of the movement." Lenin pointed out that armed struggle had two objectives: that of assassinating certain individuals, and that of getting funds to finance vandalism and terrorism.

Later, following Lenin's rules, it was decided that funds should be used to form a legal defense organization to aid comrades who got into trouble with the courts in the United States. So, in 1936 the National Lawyers Guild was formed with the assistance of the Comintern. It was first cited as a Communist front by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities in March 1944. In 1950 the House Committee on Un-American Activities said the NLG was "the foremost legal bulwark of the Communist Party, its front organizations and controlled unions."

At its 1971 national convention, the NLG adopted a statement which read in part: "There is no disagreement among us that we are a body of radicals and revolutionaries. We are not simply servants of the movement. We are radicals and revolutionaries who now propose to carry the struggle for social change into our lives and our profession."

In 1975 the NLG adopted a "position paper" that stated: "Members of the Guild who insist that the politics of armed struggle have no place in a Guild publication ignore this organization's history and self-definition. The Guild is not merely a legal organization—it is not the ACLU or the ABA (American Bar Association).... The Guild itself has not only defended but actively supported the armed actions at Attica and Wounded Knee and has in some sense joined these struggles...."

Members of the National Lawyers Guild have formed the defense teams for virtually every U.S. revolutionary and terrorist group, including the Weather Underground Organization, the Black Liberation Army, the George Jackson Brigade, the Symbionese Liberation Army, etc. The wide range of the NLG's activities can be illustrated by its having adopted a special resolution concerning the current coal miners' strike. The resolution read in part:

"Whereas wildcat strikes have proven to be the most effective means by which miners have been able to resist company safety and contract abuses; and

"Whereas, the current economic crisis has created a need for the BCOA (Bituminous Coal Operators Association) and other employers to intensify their exploitation of workers; and

"Whereas, the militancy of the miners represents a threat to that exploitation;

"Therefore, be it resolved that:

1. The National Lawyers Guild fully supports the miners and their demands for the right to strike....

2. The National Executive Board opposes the use of a Taft Hartley injunction, the use of the National Guard to transport scab coal, and the use of the grand jury system to intimidate miners (by which they mean use of the grand jury system to investigate acts of organized violence, vandalism and terrorism by groups of militants against the non-striking mines, non-organized miners, and transporters of coal—Ed.)."

The activities of the National Lawyers Guild become more dangerous to the peace and security of us all when it is realized that members of the NLG have infiltrated into various legal service groups and projects that have been set up by the federal government, and are financed by taxpayers. The Legal Services Corporation is a case in point. The following is quoted from the March 4, 1978 issue of Human Events:

"The president of the Legal Services Corp., Thomas Ehrlich, informed Senator Harrison Williams... that he was totally unconcerned that members of the far-left National Lawyers Guild may have prominent positions in various legal services groups and projects funded by his taxpayer-supported corporation....

"The NLG, Ehrlich blithely contended, 'is one of many bar associations that attorneys... are free to join. It is possible that some staff members of the corporation, as well as some attorneys in our local programs, are members of the National Lawyers Guild.'"

In effect, Ehrlich admitted that there are lawyers working within the federal government, who are being supported by the taxpayers, and who are attempting to destroy the very government that they have sworn to defend. This adds up to a form of treason—and the president of the federally-funded Legal Services Corporation, Thomas Ehrlich couldn't care less! This reveals the amazing tolerance U.S. officials have developed toward pro-revolutionary groups, terrorists and vandals.

The work of radical and revolutionary lawyers is made much easier because the State and Federal Courts seem infested with a host of rotten judges. Says U.S. News & World Report of March 13, 1978: "A broad attack on judicial misconduct and incompetence is developing in State capitals... special investigative panels... have unearthed instances of... judges accepting bribes in return for light criminal sentences; offering to trade favors in court for sex with female defendants;..."

When justice has departed from the land can vandalism and terrorism be contained?

THE PRESIDENT'S ADMINISTRATIVE SCHIZOPHRENIA

JANUS-FACED JIMMY

When the late John Foster Dulles served the International Conspirators while acting as the U.S. Secretary of State, he made an ominous pronouncement. He said that "there is no longer any difference between U.S. foreign policy and U.S. domestic policy." There were angry protests and emphatic denials, but the CFR-guided Eastern Establishment did its utmost to maintain such an egalitarian policy, and did a noteworthy job of it through the administrations of Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford—until the coming of Carter. Then a change began to develop; not so much by deliberate design but rather as a matter of expedience and compromise. Carter was the mouthpiece for two different and unrelated groups of men: the Trilateralists and the Georgia-based Carter Cronies. He found that in matters of foreign policy he must do what the Trilateral Commission dictated; while in matters of domestic policy he should do what his Georgia-based staffers advised. Being split between the two groups, and speaking for both, the Janus-faced Jimmy has proved to be a failure both as a foreign leader and a domestic leader. As the current issue of Newsweek observes, with surprising objectivity and amazing accuracy:

"Suddenly, it was raining trouble on Jimmy Carter. His world was crowded nearly from horizon to horizon with problems that seemed to resist solution—the revolt in the coal fields, the sputtering peace process in the Middle East, the quickening strains on White House relations with American Jews, the decline of the dollar, a disquieting new spurt in inflation, an attack of jitters over the fate of the Panama Canal treaties.... Carter's labors on all these questions have been complicated by his continuing slide in the polls, to 47 per cent in George Gallup's latest and 41 per cent in Louis Harris's, and by the daily speculations of the press and the political Establishment about whether he is competent...."

In matters of foreign policy, there isn't much he can do differently. He is the appointed mouthpiece of the Rockefeller-dominated Trilateral Commission, he accepted the job with full knowledge that all foreign policy would be determined by a fifteen-man staff of "former" Trilateral Commissioners. He can only act upon the advice given him by Zbigniew Brzezinski, Cyrus Vance, Michael Blumenthal, and the dozen others.

In matters of domestic policy, however, Carter has a freer hand. The difference: his foreign policy advisers were appointed for him while his domestic policy advisers were appointed by him. In matters of domestic policy Carter can still pick and choose, and make decisions. So, while Carter can do little or nothing about improving his image as President of the World, he still has the power within his grasp to alter his image as President of the United States. How he intends to do this is outlined in a perspective article appearing in the current (March 20) U.S. News & World Report. Titled "How Carter's Staff Plans to Avoid Another Round of Blunders," the article reads in part:

"A setback in the coal strike is only the latest in a series of missteps that are forcing Jimmy Carter to overhaul the way his White House staff operates. Failure to end the coal walkout in brisk fashion caps a difficult year for an administration facing troubles in Congress and plunging public confidence in the way the White House is run. Now the Carter team seems determined to make mid-course corrections to avoid further problems. Changes already under way:

- * Conciliatory approaches to lawmakers on Capitol Hill that include a drive to bring Democratic congressmen solidly into the Carter camp.
- * Widening responsibilities for three key aides—Stuart E. Eizenstat, Robert S. Strauss and Hamilton Jordan.
- * Alterations in Carter's schedule—how he spends his time, whom he sees and how he reaches the public.

"... To further improve the operation of the White House, Carter has expanded the already grueling workloads of three top advisers. Stuart Eizenstat heads a group within the White House called the Domestic Council. Every piece of domestic legislation launched by the administration comes to Eizenstat's desk before the President sees it. In addition to his role of legislative coordinator, Eizenstat has been pushed by Carter to get more involved in economics and trade. He has stepped in so quickly that he is now considered one of the most influential economic-policy advisers in Washington....

"The White House is finding new ways almost daily to employ the seasoned political talents of Special Trade Negotiator Robert Strauss. The former Democratic national chairman is rapidly becoming the President's most indispensable troubleshooter—working one week to pacify angry farmers and flying the next to Japan to negotiate delicate trade deals....

"Despite (Hamilton) Jordan's being accused in gossip columns of rowdy behavior in night spots, Carter has formalized and expanded his duties. Jordan now sits in on national security briefings and calls regular meetings of senior assistants. As de facto chief of staff, he is providing needed coordination and political assessments of issues."

(end of quotations from article)

It should be noted that in the preceding excerpts from Newsweek and USN&WR, the accent is on domestic policy. Foreign policy is handled by the Trilateralist team: Brzezinski, Mondale, Vance, Blumenthal, Brown, Christopher, Young, Cooper, Benson, Holbrook, Warnke, Richardson, Solomon and—for a time—Linowitz (not necessarily named in the order of their importance). This team was selected by David Rockefeller and programmed by Zbigniew Brzezinski (who also selected and programmed Jimmy Carter to become President, and Walter Mondale to become Vice President).

The "domestic policy" team was not as carefully chosen, and Jimmy Carter obviously was given a freer hand in the selection of its members. It is this "domestic policy" team that is being criticized by the media for "blunders, ineptness, misconduct, rowdy behavior," etc.

The contrast between the "foreign policy" team and the "domestic policy" team was made apparent from the very beginning of the Carter administration, and Bert Lance was selected as the "fall guy." David Rockefeller, the "economy-minded" took over from brother Nelson Rockefeller, the "politics-minded," and Brzezinski was named to replace Henry Kissinger as foreign policy director. As domestic policy director, Jimmy Carter chose his friendly banker, Bert Lance. Immediately there was controversy; a man who couldn't handle his own budget should never be allowed to occupy the Czar-like post of OMB Director. .

It is generally known in Washington circles that any dirty tricks Bert Lance may have committed as a banker had little or nothing to do with the treatment he received after having been named to the directorship of the Office of Management and Budget by Jimmy Carter. Many other appointees as well as many other electees have committed far worse indiscretions and malfeasances without ever having been exposed to public ridicule and scorn. Bert Lance, however, like Agnew and Nixon before him, was not the "right man in the right job." The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, according to the order of precedence prevailing at that time, would have been the virtual dictator of domestic policy. OMB controlled the system of Regional Governance that had been installed in previous administrations. As dispenser of budget funds, and as head of the Planning, Programming, Budgeting System, the Director of OMB was in control of every domestic program of every Department and Agency of the Federal Executive. To put it another way: Bert Lance would have been to domestic policy, what Zbig Brzezinski was to become to foreign policy. And Bert Lance was not an "Eastern Establishment" man, and could not be trusted to do the will of the Elite.

Perhaps it should be added that, while the "foreign policy" and "domestic policy" teams are composed of different members, and have different short-range programs, and often seem to be working at opposite ends, their long-range objectives are identical!

The New World Order requires the creation of a State of Interdependence wherein no one nation retains its sovereignty and all power is surrendered to a Central Governing Body. The creation of such a New World Order is the work of the "foreign policy" team which is composed of Trilateralists.

In order to achieve such a state of interdependence at the world level, it is first necessary to create a state of total dependence upon a Central Government at the national level. This is the work of the "domestic policy" team which is composed mostly of varying types of socialists.

Also, the standard of living of all the peoples of the world must be "equalized," and all "human rights" universalized and controlled by world law. This is the work of the foreign policy and domestic policy teams cooperating with each other in such areas as energy control, inflation, devaluation of the dollar and creation of a new universal monetary system, creation of a world food bank, so-called nationalization of certain industries, etc., etc.

In the important work of framing domestic policy in such a way that the United States would "fall into world government without appearing to be pushed," there was a man who seemed to fill the bill adequately, insofar as the sub rosa government was concerned. However, that man would not be made Director of the Office of Management and Budget. Instead, he would be appointed to head the Domestic Council, and this Council would then be given control over all domestic policy. That man's name is Stuart Eizenstat and, to honor his ascension to the throne as Domestic Czar, he is acclaimed in all organs of the communications media that are read by people that matter. For example, in the current issue of Business Week, more than five full pages are devoted to:

STUART EIZENSTAT: THE POWER BEHIND DOMESTIC POLICY

"Last month," the article begins, "a crisp memorandum from Stuart E. Eizenstat, President Carter's assistant for domestic policy, arrived on the desk of Health, Education & Welfare Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr. It directed him to get moving on a national health insurance plan. Sparing no detail, it laid out what questions to address, what government agencies should join in seeking the answers, and it set Mar. 31 as the deadline for the job to be done. Califano went right to work on it, because a message like that from Eizenstat carries as much weight in Washington these days as an order from the President himself."

"Eizenstat has emerged as the strong man in domestic policy," the article states; and "under a new decision-making method known as the 'policy review memorandum' (PRM) system, he has been formally empowered by the President to shape the terms and timetables for new domestic programs.... The system allows Stu, as a starting point, to set the terms of a domestic policy, develop its philosophical framework, set its schedules, and force interventions when it falters. ... His staff now performs a number of watchdog functions that fell to the OMB during the Nixon-Ford years."

The "watchdog functions" referred to in the preceding paragraph, refer primarily to overseeing the activities of the Regional Governance System, under which the Nation is divided into ten Federal Regions, from the Capitols of which, subregional, State, County and Metro programs are governed. There is a "Regional Council" composed of the Assistant Secretaries of the Federal Cabinet rank departments and agencies of the Executive Branch. Aiding and abetting this Council is the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) and overlord of this whole "new branch of government" is the 27-person Domestic Policy Staff that is headed by Stuart Eizenstat.

This new "power behind domestic policy" is a Harvard lawyer who first came into so-called public service as a member of the Democratic National Committee in 1967. He came to the attention of President Johnson and was invited to help shape domestic policy for LBJ. "This was during the height of the Great Society," said Eizenstat, "and I certainly was attuned to that sort of thinking. We believed that a strong federal commitment was needed to overcome massive structural problems in the society. I have never had any trepidation about federal assistance for social-welfare programs or for education." Which means that he went all out for national health insurance, socialized medicine, federal control of education, etc.

When it became obvious that LBJ was going to quit the political scene and return to his ranch in Texas, Eizenstat quit the Johnson team and jumped onto the Humphrey bandwagon. The Humphrey campaign of 1968 "was built on towering liberal themes: a $12 to $15 billion increase in spending for social programs; ... national economic planning; job guarantees for all willing to work; a 'Marshall Plan' for the cities, and tax relief for the low-income groups."

"The things Humphrey stood for in 1968," says Eizenstat, "were the things I very much believed in. He had long been a hero of mine."

But when Humphrey didn't make it to the White House, Eizenstat began looking for a new hero to believe in. So, shortly after it became apparent that Trilateral Commissioners and Brookings Institution think-tankers were training Jimmy Carter for the Presidency, Eizenstat jumped onto the Carter bandwagon. "By that time," said Eizenstat, "I had learned that there are limits to government's ability to solve every problem. ...and that we need to keep trying." (That is a direct quote; we're not quite sure what he means by it, either).

The closing paragraphs of the Business Week article are important for what they almost say:

"The Annapolis stamp of the Carter White House may also limit his (Eizenstat's) effectiveness. 'Carter manages things in a military way,' says a top aide. 'He believes in delegating authority in precise areas, so one adviser has responsibility for domestic policy, but doesn't get into foreign policy, for instance. The system may lessen tension—but also has some minuses to it.'

"Unlike most of Carter's people from Georgia, however, Eizenstat has an edge: He has been in Washington before. 'He has always wanted to do this sort of thing,' says a White House insider, 'and he attached himself to Carter to do it. That differentiates him from people like Hamilton (Jordan) and Jody (Powell)—they have always been attached to Carter by an umbilical cord.'

"Nonetheless, Eizenstat's standing in the Oval Office has grown increasingly solid over these last 13 months. Carter has responded to his performance in typical fashion —by heaping more and more responsibility on him. Coming from Carter, that is recognized around the White House as the supreme compliment." (unquote).

What these paragraphs almost say:

Carter has two teams, and for public consumption, he is said to be captain of both. One team is for carrying out foreign policy, the other team is for carrying out domestic policy, and "never the twain shall meet," except in the case of Eizenstat, who has been selected to see to it that all domestic issues are kept in harmony with all foreign issues, and that the domestic policy team be kept separate and apart from the foreign policy team, while at the same time working for the same final goal: The New World Order. Also, since Hamilton and Jody and most of the rest of the domestic policy team are attached to Carter by an umbilical cord, and most of the foreign policy team are attached to Rockefeller by a golden cord, Stu Eizenstat must be attached to both as a policy coordinator.

What makes this man who is the "power behind domestic policy" doubly dangerous is the fact that his real attachment is for the program that was being promoted by the late

Hubert Humphrey. Eizenstat is in a position where he can lobby and promote the passage of all the "memorial legislation" which already has the approval of Carter and which is being guided through the Senate by the Widow Muriel.

The labor reform bill—anethema to small business and southern industry—has already passed the House and has been awaiting Senate disposal of the Canal treaties before being presented to the upper house. Also, as we were preparing this report, word came that the House had passed the dangerous Humphrey-Hawkins Bill. It, too, will go to the Senate for action, and probably will be approved and signed into law.

The immediate danger on the home front is the so-called Labor Reform Bill, S.B. 1883. Passage of this bill would mark the virtual end of all Right to Work legislation and coupled with the campaign financing act of 1974, would put the union bosses higher up in the labor monopoly saddle than they have ever been before. It is said that Senators have received more letters, telegrams and telephone calls opposing this bill than they have received on any other proposed action, including the Canal treaties, the first of which was passed as we were writing this report. But, in the case of the Canal treaty, the power of the Eastern Establishment had more clout with Senators than the voices of their constituents. Likewise, Big Labor's political power is such (as UMW has demonstrated) that the union bosses have more power in Congress than the general public.

In the development of a Corporate State, it is necessary for the State to seize control of industry and communications (coal mines and railroads are current examples) without actually displacing the management, so that private corporations really become public corporations in all but name. At the same time, labor syndicates should become parts of the government structure (as with the unionization of government employees and members of the military forces). When the corporate structure and the labor structure become equal parts of the government structure, the Corporate Socialist State has been completed. Stu Eizenstat is one of the key builders of this developing monstrosity.

"WE'VE ONLY BEGUN TO FIGHT"

IT'S STILL A U.S. CANAL

There are 68 United States Senators who would like to have the subject dropped and forgotten. They say it has been beaten to death and they are sick to death of hearing about it. They hope most sincerely that it will be dead and buried before they must face their constituents again in another national election.

But the subject won't be dropped, because there is still one more treaty—the important one—to be debated and voted on. If this second treaty is rejected, then it will be as though the first treaty never existed. If the second treaty is approved, it appears that the House of Representatives will then get into the act, either by affirming their right to vote on the treaty, or by refusing to pass any enabling legislation which will be necessary in order to make the treaties effective.

Those 68 Senators who voted in favor of the first "Panama Canal Treaty" are beginning to feel the heat and some of them may have to "get out of the kitchen," lest they be kicked out of the Senate. Here are a few examples:

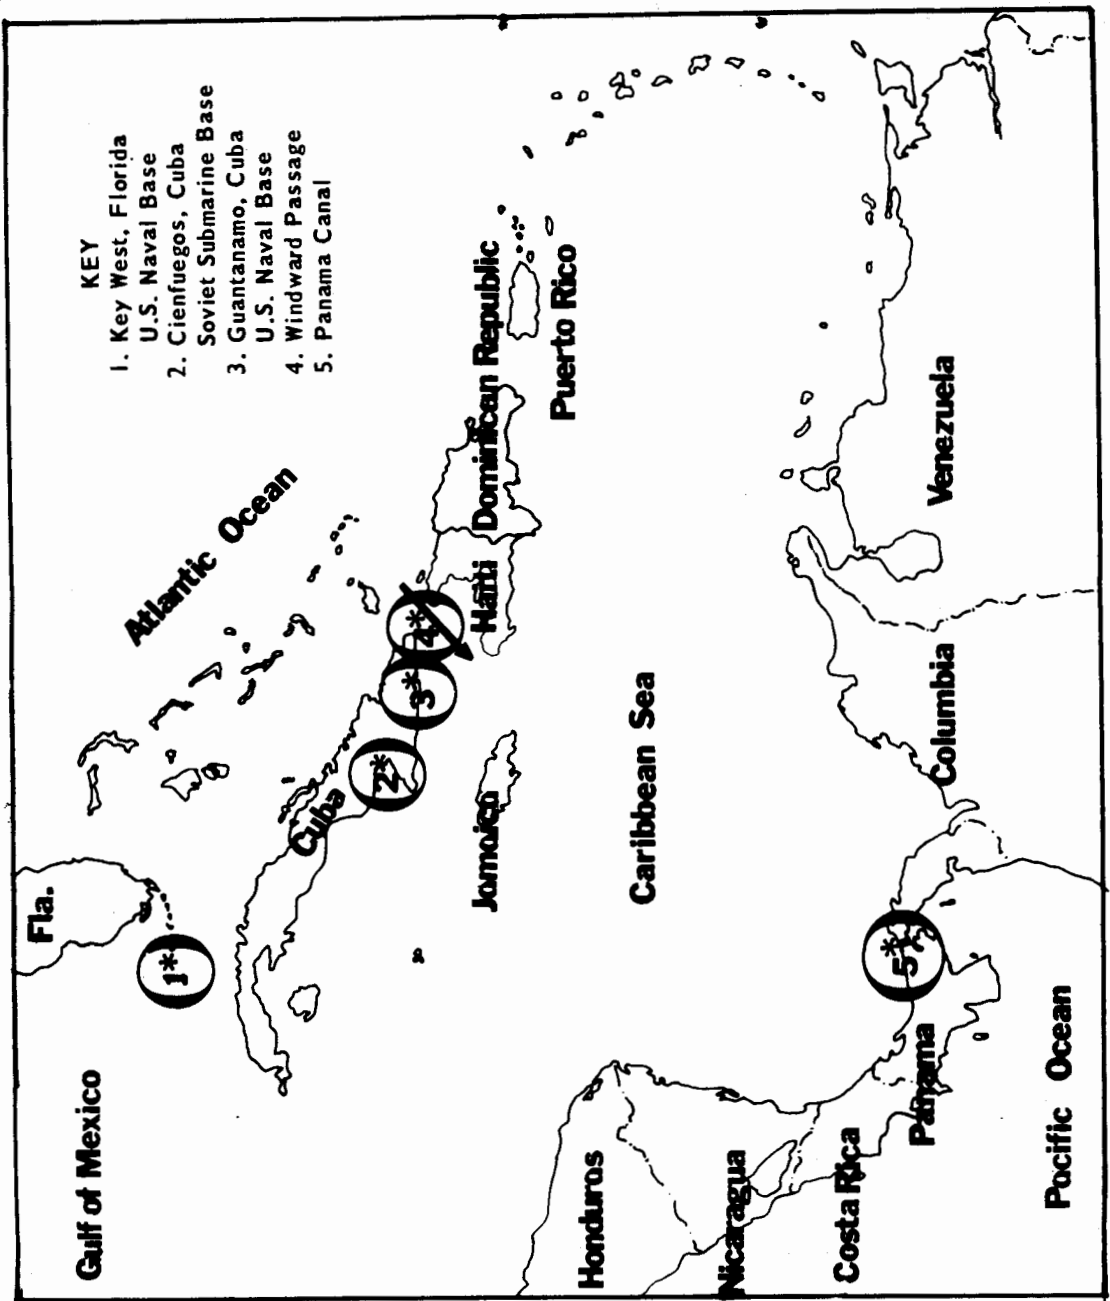

Senator Howard Baker, Republican leader who voted to give away the Canal, received a letter which is said to be typical. We have a copy, and the letter reads in part: "Senator Baker, I was amazed to receive a letter over your signature expressing your concern about our national security and soliciting funds to spread the word that we must keep our defenses strong. Your plea states, capitalization yours, 'I personally believe this is NOT the time to gamble (IN ANY WAY) with our national defenses.' If this is your belief, why then are you voting to give away the most vital link in that defense, the Panama Canal?...I deeply resent being 'fingered' for money to help preserve our national security by any pro-treaty senator who puts his loyalty to the Wall Street bankers above his oath of allegiance to the United States....I consider you a fraud."

Senator Robert Byrd, the Democratic majority leader, was another turncoat. He had lobbied vigorously for the treaty, declaring that it made no difference what his constituents thought about it, he was going to vote for the treaty anyway. And he did, in the most dramatic manner possible. He passed the first round of voting on March 16, so he would be in a position to cast the 67th and deciding vote. Previously, however, Byrd had been on the other side of the fence. Hansen quoted from a May 1, 1974 newspaper article, where Byrd had declared: "I am opposed to the United States turning over the Panama Canal to the Republic of Panama. There is too much doubt about Panama's ability to operate the canal or to provide for its security."...What made Byrd change his mind? And what will he say when his time for a try at re-election comes along?

We have copies of letters from two other Senators—Stone and Chiles of Florida—both of whom had promised constituents that they would never vote for the giveaway of the Canal. We believe, but cannot prove, that over half of the 68 senators who voted for the treaty had previously said that they would never vote for the surrender of the Panama Canal to any other country. Perhaps most despicable of them all was Senator Jennings Randolph, also from West Virginia, as is Robert Byrd. Randolph faces a tough re-election fight, and he knew what a vote for the treaty would do to his chances of being re-elected. Yet, he had promised Carter and Carter's bosses that he would vote with the Administration if it became absolutely necessary. So, like his fellow senator from West Virginia, Randolph passed the first round of voting. Then, when Byrd cast the 67th, deciding vote, Randolph heaved a sigh of relief, sprang to his feet, voted a resounding "no", and sat down looking very satisfied with himself.

What Congressman Hansen revealed about Senator Byrd came at a most historic time. In Congress's 200 years, it has been rare indeed that a Representative has appeared on the Senate floor to present a House resolution. This occurred on Feb. 10th, but the controlled media said hardly a word about the event. Congressman Hansen presented to Senator Byrd a House resolution signed by 219 Congressmen—more than half the members of the House—formally requesting that the Senate recognize the Constitutional right of the House to vote on the property transfer aspects of the Panama Canal treaties. Said Rep. Hansen in part: "This is a constitutional issue and not one of partisan politics. It is the duty of each elected representative of the people to assure that their voice is heard. The Constitution calls for it—now we must assert ourselves and demand it. We cannot accept the transfer of a major U.S. asset, specifically one that will affect every American economically, without the consent of the House as well as the Senate."

Senator Byrd is doing his best to ignore the demands of the House, just as he ignored the demands of his constituents (all the members of the House from West Virginia are co-sponsors of Hansen's resolution). The question will probably go to the Supreme Court for final decision—and nobody can be sure of what that body might decide. In any case, the House still has a trump card: it can refuse to pass any enabling legislation, which action would nullify most of the terms of the treaties.

Before the debate on the next treaty begins there are certain aspects of these treaties which need to be explored, and published throughout the land. For example, little has been said of the fact that there are really four treaties, not two. We mean that there is a Spanish text for each treaty, and an English text for each treaty, and the Spanish and the English texts of the treaties do not agree! We personally are not a student of the Spanish language, but in our neighborhood there are bilingual Cubans who have been able to obtain Spanish language copies of the treaties (a very difficult chore) and they assure us that there is a vast difference in the English and Spanish texts. This means, of course, that if the two treaties are ratified, what the English version says will mean little or nothing to Torrijos and his Communist friends. He will have his own version of the treaties to honor or tear up, as expediency dictates.

Also, the interest shown in Panama by the multinational bankers should be explored in depth. Panama City—which is adjacent to the Canal Zone but not in it, as was erroneously reported in a previous letter—has become a bankers' haven and sanctuary. We have a letter from a subscriber living in the Canal Zone who writes in part: "I have read in the Panama newspapers that there are over 100 banks there (in Panama City). I took the 1978 yellow pages of the phone book and made the attached list from that. ... the total is easily over 100."

The list sent us began with Adela International Financing Co., and ended with World Banking Corporation. Sandwiched between were such prominent names as Citibank, Chase Manhattan, Banco de Boston, Bank of America, Bank of London, Bankers Trust, First Chicago Bank, Korea Exchange Bank, Marine Midland Bank, Swiss Bank Corp., Bank of Nova Scotia, Bank of Tokyo, Royal Bank of Canada, etc. These are the multinational Banks whose directors seem very anxious to rid Panama of all U.S. influence and to turn the Canal and Canal Zone over to the dictatorship of Torrijos. The people of the United States should be told why.

THE WESTWARD PASSAGE

There is one other aspect to this giveaway of United States territory which has received little or no notice in the controlled communications media. Please refer to the accompanying map. The cartographer and co-author of this part of our newsletter is E.P. (Gene) Thornton, who writes the widely circulated (in patriotic publications) column, "A Conservative Speaks Out":

Remember when the Soviet Union threatened to land missiles in Cuba? President John Kennedy got a huge press when he spoke out against this, and he got credit for making the Soviets turn back their missile-bearing ships.

BUT, in return for this Kennedy agreed never to invade Cuba, and to see to it that no Cuban patriots in the United States ever be allowed to make the United States a staging area for any invasion or attempt to get back their Castro-infested country. Kennedy agreed to no spyplane oversights. He said, in effect: "Because you are agreeing to turn back these missile-bearing ships, we henceforth and forever hand over to you the Island of Cuba, out of which you are now free to make a military base just 90 miles from Florida."

We now see the disastrous consequences. The USSR now openly uses Cuba as its front line in the attack on South America, on the Panama Canal, even on Africa. This is the Soviet-cherished "detente": We give everything, they take but give nothing. We keep our promises, they either break theirs or never make one that is definite and binding on them.

Under this amazing Khrushchev-Kennedy agreement, Russia has built a deep water submarine base at Cienfuegos, Cuba (No. 2 on map) less than 400 miles from the U.S. military and naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba (No. 3 on map).

The after results of this kind of diplomacy should be enough to cause the American people to revolt against such "deals." We

THE HONOR ROLL

Here is a list of the U.S. Senators who voted against the first Panama Canal treaty on March 16, 1978. May their number increase when the vote is taken on the second treaty, on or before April 16th:

Democrats: Allen, Burdick, Byrd (Va.), Eastland, Ford, Johnston, Melcher, Randolph, Stennis, and Zorinsky.

Republicans: Bartlett, Curtis, Dole, Domenici, Garn, Goldwater, Griffin, Hansen, Hatch, Helms, Laxalt, Lugar, McClure, Roth, Schmitt, Schweiker, Scott, Stevens, Thurmond, Tower, Wallop, and Young.

have the right and duty to wonder what would be the aftermath of a Canal deal engineered and signed by President Carter.

The Windward Passage (No. 4 on map) is a most important shipping lane. A standard encyclopedia describes Windward Passage as "a 55-mile-wide body of water between the eastern tip of Cuba, Cape Maisi, and the northwestern tip of Haiti, Cap-a Foux. About 5,350 feet deep, it is an important route to the Panama Canal and is guarded by the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo, Cuba."

Although Guantanamo commands the Windward Passage, its existence is already partly neutralized by the Soviet submarine base at Cienfuegos; the two bases being within short missile range of each other.

If the Communists wind up with complete use of the Canal and control of the Windward Passage—as they now have complete use of Cuba for their continued attack on all other non-communist nations, the United States is finished. We MUST be able to move our fleet quickly from the Atlantic-Caribbean into the Pacific, or vice versa. Otherwise we would need two navies, one for each ocean; and there is neither the time nor the money to bring this about.

A quarter of a century ago, things were different. Our foreign policy toward Europe and the Middle East already may have been weakened and made ineffective; but there still was regard for the Monroe Doctrine, and communist infiltration into the American continents was guarded against. True, our administration fell for the New York Times-promoted fiction that Fidel Castro was not really a Communist, but merely an agrarian reformer. But when the Communists made a pass at the Dominican Republic, American Marines were sent. In 1958 Eisenhower sent troops to aid Lebanon against a Communist threat. In that year troops were also sent to aid Nationalist China (Taiwan) in holding the Quemoy Islands against Communist China. Back then we did have something of a policy. Now we have only politicians.

The strategy is clear. The United States is to be isolated, thus forced into accepting her "equal and interdependent" position in a Socialist New World Order. If 68 Senators remain blinded to the plot or, more likely, are slaves to the Monopoly Capitalist-Communist Coalition, then let them be reminded of what happened to Great Britain as the result of a parallel plot involving the Suez Canal. The consequences were disastrous for Britain as a world power—just as surrender of the Canal in Panama will be for the United States as a world power. The parallel should provide a lesson for all who have eyes to see.

There were treaties which gave Britain the right to keep the Suez Canal open. But when the liberal Anthony Eden replaced Churchill as Prime Minister, he withdrew British forces from the Canal zone. As a result, in 1956, Colonel Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the canal in the name of the Egyptian government, and later closed it to all traffic. England and France moved in to retake the canal—as existing treaties entitled them to. But the U.S. government under Eisenhower teamed up with the Soviet government under Khrushchev, and ordered the British and French governments to cease and desist. As Rep. Philip Crane observed, "The Suez Crisis of 1956 was probably the most damaging diplomatic confrontation between the United States and two of her oldest allies, France and England, in the entire postwar period." Later, to prevent the canal's use, Nasser ordered the sinking of cement-loaded barges in the locks, and the dynamiting of bridges over the canal. The Suez Canal was closed for eight years. When the canal was reopened, the United States did the work, and U.S. taxpayers paid for the dredging and the clearing of the canal—and Britain never regained the position she occupied as a world power before the Suez Crisis of 1956.

"By surrendering our right to sovereign power in the Canal Zone we would place the government of Panama in approximately the same position as that of Egypt on the eve of the 1956 crisis...and Torrijos is a far more crude, unstable leader than Nasser," commented Congressman Crane. And in a similar situation, the USSR, the UN, the Third World and perhaps even France and England, would support the right of Torrijos to nationalize the Canal.

There is one sure way to prevent this crisis: get 34 or more Senators to vote against this second treaty. Proponents are so fearful of this happening that they have advanced the voting date to "on or before April 16th." Let us strive to make that which they fear come to pass.

PRESIDENT CARTER'S "NEW PARTNERSHIP"

FEDERAL REGIONALISM RECEIVES A NEW NAME

The timing of its presentation to Congress and to the people had to be chosen with care. Supposedly a new urban policy, it was really nothing more than a reinforced system of Regional Governance, that new branch of government that had been installed by President Nixon in 1972. Carter gave it a new name, calling it a "New Partnership." But this was merely a rehash of Nixon's rather cumbersome "Coordinated Intergovernmental Policy."

As we said, the timing of its presentation to Congress and to the people had to be chosen with care, because there were indications that nobody was satisfied with the work that had been done by the "Urban and Regional Policy Group" (URPG). Chaired by Patricia Harris of HUD (and the Council on Foreign Relations) and supervised by Stuart Eisenstat, President Carter's Domestic Council chieftain, this interagency group had labored for more than a year attempting to "restructure" the Regional Governance System and make it more effective in resuscitating the Nation's dying urban areas, victims of the Federal government-induced maladies of urban renewal, integration, school bussing, welfare and equal rights legislation.

About all that URPG was able to produce after all the study was the proposal for an interagency Regional Bank and "more than 160 changes in 38 existing Federal programs to make them more sensitive to urban needs ... about 30 components of which will require new legislation;" this according to The New York Times of March 28, 1978.

Carter's top echelon bureaucrats had been briefed on the "New Partnership" scheme by Harris and Eisenstat at a special briefing session held in the Old Executive Office Building on Good Friday, March 24th, but the Congress had not yet been told about the "New Partnership" program. Therefore:

At a time when Congress was not in session (legislators were on their Easter vacation), President Carter presented his program. Then he flew to Venezuela. Thus, the media would tell of his good will trip to South America and Africa, and omit criticisms of his "New Partnership" policy for the United States.

ABOUT REGIONALISM

A brief review seems called for:

Nine years ago, on March 27, 1979, the President of the United States issued an executive order which divided the United States into ten Federal Regions. They are: Region I—Capitol, Boston. States: Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont.

Region II—Capitol, New York City. States: New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands.

Region III—Capitol, Philadelphia. States: Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, District of Columbia.

Region IV—Capitol, Atlanta. States: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee.

Region V—Capitol, Chicago. States: Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, Wisconsin.

Region VI—Capitol, Dallas-Fort Worth. States: Arkansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas.

Region VII—Capitol, Kansas City. States: Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska.

Region VIII—Capitol, Denver. States: Colorado, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Wyoming.

Region IX—Capitol, San Francisco. States: Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada.

Region X—Capitol, Seattle. States: Alaska, Idaho, Oregon, Washington.

On February 12, 1972, another Executive Order was published authorizing the staffing of the ten regional capitols, and the appointment of a chairman for each region. The Order read in part: "There is hereby established a Federal Regional Council for each of the ten standard Federal regions.... The President shall designate one member of each such council as Chairman of that Council.... Representatives of the Office of Management and Budget may participate in any deliberations of each Council."

Over these Regional Councils is a Washington based Council composed of Assistant Secretaries of the various Departments and Agencies which are involved in Regional Governance. The permanent chairman of this group was the Assistant Director of the Office of Management and Budget. But one of the first acts of President Carter was to appoint Stuart Eizenstat as his Domestic Council Chief; thus Eizenstat takes over as Czar of the Regional Governance System.

Aiding Eizenstat in making policy is the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR). Helping to implement all policies and programs at the local and sub-regional levels is the National Association of Regional Councils (NARC). Also involved are the various organizations associated with 1313, the Committee for Economic Development, the National Association of Counties, the National Municipal League, the National Association of Neighborhoods, the National Urban League, etc.

During the Watergate period, little was heard of the Regional Governance System and its promoters and agents continued to solidify this new branch of government's hold over the other branches of government, State and local. Then, when Jimmy Carter became President, he began the task of "restructuring the Executive Branch. Included was the Regional Governance System; hence the naming of the Urban and Regional Policy Group, which was to revamp and simplify the Regional System.

Aiding URPG in the formation of Carter's "New Partnership" were the participants of a White House Conference on Balanced Growth and Economic Development, held January 29 through February 2, 1978. This White House Conference would serve three noteworthy purposes: 1) to introduce John D. Rockefeller IV, Governor of West Virginia, to the national political scene as heir-apparent to the position of political prominence now held by Nelson Rockefeller; 2) to promote the Humphrey-Hawkins Balanced Growth and Economic Development Act; and 3) to set guidelines for the URPG report that would introduce Carter's "New Partnership" act. The April, 1978, Bulletin of the Committee to Restore the Constitution gives the following report:

"Five hundred political sycophants and supernumeraries, representing a thousand regional governmental organizations and related associations, converged on the Sheraton Park Hotel...to attend a White House

Conference on Balanced Growth and Economic Development, and to set the course America is to follow as we enter our third century.

"Focus of attention was John D. Rockefeller IV, Governor of West Virginia, principal financial sponsor, and Chairman of the White House Conference;... The White House Conference was the debut of 'Jay' Rockefeller as public spokesman for the king-making dynastic trio: Nelson-David-John Rockefeller.

"...Conference Chairman Rockefeller, in the second hour of the five-day meeting, introduced members of the Advisory Committee, men and women controllers who would keep the proceedings on track and debate within desired parameters. Many names are familiar as career change artists in the chessboard moves of nation-wrecking."

(End of quotes from CRC Bulletin, Suite 480, Savings Building, Fort Collins, Colo. $3 per 100 copies.)

Representing Carter's Cabinet in the above-mentioned Advisory Committee were Patricia Harris, Secretary of HUD and Chairman of URPG; Juanita Kreps, Secretary of Commerce; and Bob Burgland, Secretary of Agriculture. Among the six principal themes that were discussed at the conference was, and we quote:

"Streamlining Government

"How can government institutions, structures and processes be adapted so that they can better address problems of growth and development which cut across jurisdictional boundaries of contiguous government, across various levels of government, and across departmental and agency lines of the same government? Should the Federal Government attempt to institutionalize a process for formulating and implementing a national growth and development policy?"

Out of workshop discussions of this subject at the White House Conference, came the outline for the "New Partnership" that was developed by Patricia Harris' URPG, under the supervision of Stuart Eizenstat and his 26-member Domestic Policy Commission. Here are highlights of the "New Partnership," which Carter announced just before flying to Caracas. We quote from Carter's message to Congress as published in The New York Times of March 28:

...The urban policy I am announcing today will build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work. It is a comprehensive policy aimed both at making cities more healthy and improving the lives of the people who live in them.

The major proposals will:

- * Improve the effectiveness of existing Federal programs...
- * Provide employment opportunities... This will be done through a labor-intensive public program and tax and other incentives...
- * Provide fiscal relief to the most hard-pressed communities.
- * Provide strong incentives to attract private investment to distressed communities, including the creation of a National Development Bank....
- * Encourage states to become partners in assisting urban areas through a new incentive grant program.
- * Stimulate greater involvement by neighborhood organizations...
- * Increase access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstance or a history of discrimination.
- * Provide additional social and health services to disadvantaged people...
- * Improve the urban physical environment and the cultural and esthetic aspects of urban life by providing additional assistance for housing rehabilitation, mass transit, the arts, culture parks and recreation facilities....

The review of existing Federal programs has resulted in more than 150 improvements in existing programs.... Some will require legislation. None will increase the Federal budget. The new initiatives which I am announcing today... require $4.4 billion in budget authority, $1.7 billion in new tax incentives, and $2.2 billion in guaranteed loan authority in fiscal year 1979. For fiscal year 1980 the budget authority will be $6.1 billion, the tax incentives $1.7 billion and the guaranteed loan authority $3.6 billion.

(End of excerpts from President's Message to Congress, 3/27/78).

* * * * *

David S. Broder of The Washington Post attended the Good Friday briefing of top echelon bureaucrats (at least the tone of his column so indicated). He is not in any sense an opponent of Regionalism, but he does consider Carter's "New Partnership" a failure, whether Congress approves or disapproves its parts that require legislation. Broder referred to the program as "10 recommendations supported by 38 strategies, or maybe 10 strategies supported by 38 recommendations, plus 160 suggestions for improving old programs left scattered in five agencies—in short, a smorgasbord."

"None of the 160 recommendations calls for eliminating a single existing Federal program," said Broder, "despite the almost universal acknowledgement that some of them are real losers. Instead, the recommendations guarantee more bureaucracy, regulations, and frustrations for local officials. Instead (of scrapping programs that have failed) the recommendations call for 'tougher' guidelines, tightened selection criteria, and those other bureaucratic favorites, 'closer linkages and focused coordination' with other 'infrastructure programs'." "And so it goes," Broder continues. "Instead of resolving the jurisdictional and bureaucratic struggles, this new proposal compromises and compounds them. The new development bank for urban industry was fought over by Treasury, Commerce, and HUD. Solution: Make it an interagency bank, with all three departments represented equally on the board. The guaranteed effect: A slowdown of its ability to make loan and grant commitments...."

"By five o'clock, an hour after the briefing had begun, Eizenstat had reached the point where he was reading off the list of little programs awarded each agency as a payoff for its participation in the whole ghastly process." (unquote)

WHAT'S THE "NEW PARTNERSHIP"?

In this presentation of the alleged "urban policy" proclaimed by President Carter on Monday, March 27, we have quoted from the President's message to Congress, from The New York Times, and from David Broder's column in The Washington Post. Taking these three sources in reverse order, we must affirm that Broder misses the target, the Times avoids any reference to the real target, and Carter sets up a false target that is intended to deceive all but the "elect" (by which we mean the members of Eastern Establishment clubs, managers of Foundation money, and change agents). Broder bemoans the lack of efficiency in the proposed "New Partnership." A good point, but the wrong point; because efficiency is not the aim of the "New Partnership." The aim is control; control of all social life, control of all economic development, control of all governments including regional, state, sub-regional and community governments. In the criticisms of the "New Partnership" there is talk of not enough money being spent on the one hand, and talk of too much money being spent on the other hand. But the wasting or the saving of money is not the point. If the value of these Federal Reserve trading stamps we call money were of any real importance to our subrosa government, then we would see some attempt on the part of the Carter Administration to try to control inflation, and we would see a real attempt on the part of the Central Banks to prevent the death of the dollar. True, this paper money is good for "buying" local politicians and for appeasing the masses who think the government owes them a living. But the actual value, or the number of bills handed out, seems of little importance. After all, with international money-changers, manipulating the value of money is the name of the game. If the situation becomes dangerous—for them—they have the power to re-value, re-issue, or set up some electronic exchange system in which even trading coupons will be unnecessary.

The "New Partnership" has nothing to do with efficiency or with cost. It is merely a new name for Regionalism. "The Federal Regional concept seeks to dissolve county governments, transfer state powers to a 'regional capitol', administer the affairs of U.S. Citizens through a network of federal regions and state sub-divisions from a central authority in Washington, D.C., seize control of private property and production facilities, change the form of government in America from a Republic to a corporate dictatorship of the financial elite, and reduce her people to the status of economic serfs on the land which once was theirs."

The "New Partnership" is but a modernized version of the above definition. President Carter said: "The urban policy I am announcing today will build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work. It is a comprehensive policy aimed both at making cities more healthy and improving the lives of people who live in them" (accent added).

Put more plainly, Carter intends that the Federal government become a senior partner in every phase of the citizen's life; in his local government, his local economic and social activities, in his pursuit of art, esthetic values, recreation, in health services, in every aspect of life. And remember that "what the government subsidizes, the government controls." "New Partnership," then, is Corporate Socialism!

However, Domestic Policymaker Eizenstat may have gone too far too fast in this "New Partnership" scheme. One of the 500 who attended that White House Conference on Balanced Growth and Economic Development was Frederick B. Dent, former Secretary of Commerce under Nixon, president of Mayfair Mills, Arcadia, South Carolina. He issued a statement: "After two and a half days of participation in the White House conference... the nearly universal theme being expressed by the delegates from all regions is a great dissatisfaction with the role the federal government is playing in our lives. Businessmen, labor leaders, elected officials all are telling Washington, 'Get off our backs.'... the fundamental responsibility for growth rests with the free market sector and does not include a responsibility on the part of the federal government to fashion a national growth policy. But expression of this view has not been encouraged by either the staff or structure of the Conference... the staff would apparently see a greater, rather than a reduced, federal role."

If there are enough businessmen who feel as Mr. Dent feels about federal government intervention, and who will say so where their voices count, then there is hope that this Carter-Eizenstat "New Partnership" plan will never be approved, nor will its companion, the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill, which now awaits Senate action.

Col. Arch Roberts, a long-time opponent of Regionalism (Corporate Socialism) in any form, and who tours the country advocating a return to Constitutional government, is of the opinion that "disenchantment with the federal regional concept is evident at every level of the American society. An increasing number of Americans correctly view regionalism as a world government concept imposed upon the people without their knowledge or consent.... The key to corrective action... is the half-forgotten fact that the Federal Government is a creature of the States, which created it." Roberts believes that we must work through State governments if we are to reverse the trend toward Corporate Socialism. Appeals to the Federal government seem fruitless; so let's try it his way.

CREATING THE CITIZENRY FOR THE NEW WORLD ORDER

THE BEHAVIORAL CRISIS

Economically and politically, monetarily and even socially, the architects of the New World Order have made great strides toward their ultimate goal. However, in the province of preparing future human occupants for that New World Order, they have been less than successful. Educationists and behavioral scientists may have come a cropper. But, first things first:—

When Jimmy Carter returned recently from his unnecessary journey to two countries in South America and two countries in Africa, he told reporters that the trip had something to do with "preparing for the future." If this be true, then the future for citizens of the United States is bleak indeed. His theme was "equalization." He wants to raise the standard of living of the rest of the world—especially third world nations—by lowering our own standard of living. Permitting the dollar to sink lower and lower in value on the international market seems a part of the plan. Blaming it on the concocted energy crisis also seems an invented contrivance. As Carlos Gandiaga of Malmo, Sweden wrote to The Economist of London: "You say that the troubles of the dollar are because of American oil imports. Japan imports practically all of its oil, natural gas and coal. So does Switzerland. Germany imports 90% of its oil and 85% of its gas. These countries still manage to pay the bill while enjoying favourable trade balances, and it is against their currencies that the dollar is weakest. ... For the foreseeable future, for better or for worse, the world must learn to live with floating exchange rates. But America is the leader of the free world and should retain her gold reserves as an asset of last resort. How would the treasury and the Pentagon feel the day they faced the prospect of only being left with paper and bookkeeping entries as so-called 'assets'?"

We must remind Mr. Gandiaga that we already face that prospect; and there is evidence that the "architects" planned it that way. Also, that the Pentagon faces another even more serious problem: refusal to permit the building of the B-1 bomber, the on-again-off-again attitude in regard to production of the nuclear bomb, other strange actions intended to keep the U.S. military a little weaker than that of the U.S.S.R. These attempts to jeopardize the ability of the United States to defend herself seem to have been planned in "preparation for the future." Along with this goes the plan deliberately to "internationalize" the sea lanes of the world by relinquishing control of the Canal in Panama and by spreading rumors that we no longer need to maintain a military base at Guantanamo, Cuba. Permitting the Soviet to take control of the Horn of Africa seems a part of the plot. So does Carter's plotting with the Nigerian head of state to force the new integrated government of Rhodesia to form a coalition with the Communist-led revolutionaries and rebels who want to bring total chaos to Rhodesia by killing all the resident whites.

In Europe, we are told, there is the steady growth in political power of that supposedly new strain of socialism that is called Eurocommunism. This is a very convenient halfway house between Eastern Communism and Western Capitalism, where the two can meet and fraternize openly and submit to political marriage (coalition), and raise offspring that are generically known as Corporate Socialist States.

To further promote the aims of the New World Order, we are told that AID (Agency for International Development) is being re-vamped, presumably so that deserving nations can be denied aid on the grounds of having violated Jimmy Carter's rules concerning "human rights," while pro-communist countries can be given more aid without regard to their record on human rights. Also USIA (United States Information Agency) has been reorganized to include the activities of the Voice of America. Now the VOA will not use its microphones to broadcast news and promote American ideas and sometimes ideals. Now it will be "ear as well as mouth" and propagandize for interdependence and World Togetherness.

On the home front, according to Dick Pettigrew, Assistant to the President for Reorganization of Government, the more than 200 programs being administered through the departments and agencies of the Regional Governance Complex, are to be overhauled. Through inter-department and inter-agency planning, programming and budgeting, those 200 programs will be reduced to 25 all-inclusive programs that will be overseen by Stuart Eizenstat who, in the words of The New York Times, "is said to read Carter's mind," and who has "earned a reputation for being indispensable in the formulation of domestic policy."

Carter's new "urban plan" is a part of this reorganization and centralization plan. We featured this new approach to Regional Governance in last week's Report. But then it was too soon to obtain opinions and reactions. U.S. News & World Report, in an analysis of Carter's urban plan (4/10/78) makes the following noteworthy comments:

"As much as they want more money from Washington, city officials and taxpayers are being confronted by the hard choice spotlighted in President Carter's urban plan: Should they take the federal dollars and lose more local independence, or should they turn down the aid and risk foundering financially? Miami's Mayor Maurice Ferre puts the problem this way: 'Without federal aid, the city wouldn't exist. But we do not have local control. Washington sets the standards and guidelines. There is no question the cities are being run from Washington.'

"...For instance, Washington routinely attaches at least 33 national policy requirements to most aid programs for cities, according to the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, a quasi-federal agency.... Cities that, in Washington's judgment, make insufficient effort to comply with the declared national doctrine of equal access for the handicapped, for example, can lose their assistance....

"David B. Walker, assistant director of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, sees what is happening as the beginning of a new era of regulation... the time may be coming when city dwellers will say: 'Who the hell cares about the mayor? He's just an agent of the federal government.'" (End of quotes from U.S.N. & W.R. article).

Direct federal control of cities via the Regional Governance route has been the aim of those "architects" who are preparing the United States for entry into a Regional World Government; that goal is about to become a reality.

Then there is the case of the coming double digit inflation, which seems to be a part of the plot to destroy the dollar, install an international currency, and make Americans "equal" with the rest of the world. While in South America, Carter was questioned about inflation. He remarked that it was a world-wide problem and that, when he returned to the United States he was going to do something about it. He did; he arranged to make a speech before an appropriate group of people on Tuesday, April 11th. However, whatever Carter says or does about inflation nothing of real importance is going to be accomplished until it is admitted that inflation is not the fault of business or labor, but of the federal government itself. Back in 1954 a Special House Committee which was investigating tax-exempt foundations, had occasion to report on "Economics and the Public Interest." The closing paragraphs of that report are pertinent today:

"The preservation of fiscal stability is indispensable to the maintenance of monetary stability.... It is indispensable to the prevention of inflation with its distorting effects on the price and wage structure, and thus to the maintenance of social and political stability. As someone has said, 'What the government gives away, it takes away.' And that is true, even if it comes from the printing presses."

Charles Schultz, chairman of Carter's Council of Economic Advisers, is responsible for whatever is done about inflation. In a public radio interview he did admit that government is "partly responsible" for the galloping inflation, but he said very little could be done about it, except maybe to veto a farm bill and any other bills that will increase federal spending. Otherwise, "we can try to make sure that economic expansion is slow, doesn't rush, doesn't overheat the economy. We must try to get business and labor to cooperate. There is no magic answer." The one worry Schultz seemed to have: if inflation is stopped, we'll have a depression. In other words, to paraphrase an old saying: the people have let the government play; now the people must pay the piper.

Dwight D. Eisenhower, while president of Columbia University, before he was made into a Republican and taken over completely by the builders of the New World Order, made a statement that strikes at the heart of our present difficulties. In a letter to former Congressman Ralph W. Gwinn, he said: "I firmly believe that the army of persons who urge greater and greater centralization of authority and greater and greater dependence upon the Federal Treasury are really more dangerous to our form of government than any external threat that can possibly be arrayed against us."

This statement was made in opposition to a general Federal-aid-to-education program on June 7, 1949. Which brings us back to the statement made at the very beginning of this Report, that "Economically and politically, monetarily and even socially, the architects of the New World Order have made great strides toward their ultimate goal. However...educationists and behavioral scientists may have come a cropper."

Change agents were supposed to develop a new kind of human being to populate this Brave New World that was being created. These new beings were supposed to be similar to the characters depicted in Huxley's book of that same name. For the contented inhabitants life is quite luxurious. Each person has his own helicopter. There is ample time for sports, theaters, restaurants, all kinds of amusements. But since any semblance of initiative or individualism endangers social stability, these human attributes are strictly prohibited. People must "run with the herd, or else." Most important in this New Order is the doctrine that "God is not compatible with machinery, scientific medicine and universal happiness." True, God exists, but "manifests Himself in society only by his absence."

Here is where the change agents failed: they could not eliminate initiative and individualism in the children they were indoctrinating in the government-controlled public schools. They only succeeded in having these attributes manifest themselves in different ways: in vandalism, arson, sex crimes, dope addiction, terrorism and revolutionary activities.

These change agents could have taken a lesson from the fictional Dr. Frankenstein: they can be destroyed by the very monsters they have helped to create; as can be verified by teachers who have suffered and even died while serving in blackboard jungles.

However, they're still at it and still trying with all kinds of unusual experiments in what they still call education. One of the truly bizarre experiments is being sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. The organization sponsors congresses of high school students in which these teenagers are asked to solve the world's problems, something which the world leaders are unable to do.

We have a copy of the program that was conducted by some 500 high school students in St. Paul, Minnesota March 8,9,10,11, 1978. On the cover is an illustration of the globe, supported by a ribbon on which appears the single word, "Interdependence." Above the globe is the title, "Congress on Global Priorities." Beneath the globe is the subtitle: "A Student Congress Designed to Promote Global Citizenship." Overleaf we are told that "The National Conference of Christians and Jews is a non-profit, non-partisan, educational organization. It is an educational vehicle by which citizens can come together to discuss and resolve issues of deep concern. It attempts to do this by sponsoring seminars and conferences such as 'The Congress on Global Priorities'."

The students were to discuss the questions of human settlement, trade and development, disarmament, human rights, global security, environmental protection, U.N. reform, etc. The purpose of all this we are told, is to: "promote a better understanding of global interdependence; emphasize the importance of creating a dialogue on global issues;... establish a priority list of global issues in which international organizations, as well as our Federal Government, could focus their major resources on in 1978-79."

RETURN OF DR. BRAMELD

Another revolutionary educationist who is unhappy with the products of the public school system is Theodore Brameld. A professor of educational philosophy, retired, Brameld was associated with John Dewey, William H. Kilpatrick, George S. Counts, Harold Rugg, and others who saw the school system as the ideal way to bring about that messianic age which is now called the New World Order. Some called it Socialism, some called it Communism, others called it participatory democracy, others gave it progressive titles; Dewey chose to call it Progressive Education; and World Understanding was a principal theme.

As Progressive Education slowly succumbed to newer educational theories, we thought that its promoters had also died out. Not so in the case of Brameld. He retired from his post at Boston University, but he continued his lifelong writing career. His first serious effort was at the University of Chicago, in 1931, where his thesis was on The Role of Acquiescence in Leninism. Soviet education and society remained one of his major fields along with subtle variations on the theme of Progressive Education.

We mention all of this because Brameld was a featured writer in the October 1977 issue of the highly respected (in educationist circles) magazine Phi Delta Kappan. In this article Brameld says that sweeping cultural changes occurring in the past quarter century now demand a "new map" if we are to arrive at the Utopia that others call the New World Order. Because Brameld does have "clout" in the world of education, it seems important that we know what he proposes. Here is his "agenda," in his own words:

* * * * *

Social Frontier I: The goal of a democratically controlled and planned world order of all nations should supersede the totally outmoded national sovereign states that divide and threaten the entire world. Let us name this radical new order a "World Community of Nations"—a WCN.

Social Frontier II: Systematic reduction of armaments should outlaw all nuclear military force and come under the exclusive control of the WCN, itself acting solely as an international police sufficiently powerful to block recalcitrant behavior by any member nation.

Social Frontier III: A planetary-designed economic order should increasingly and predominantly replace so-called "free enterprise" (which indisputedly, prima facie, is multicorporate power) with socially democratic public enterprise. This system would embrace all natural resources of earth, water and air. Its aim would be to provide an adequate standard of living for citizens of all participating nations according to varying individual or group services and abilities.

Social Frontier IV: The emerging system of public enterprise should constrict technological expansion within manageable "limits to growth," at the same time firmly limiting population expansion as well as pollution-generating, life-debilitating industrial production.

Social Frontier V: Education should become free and open to people throughout the globe from infancy to old age, directed by a World Education Authority responsible entirely to the WCN. Standards of skill (such as literacy) should be taught according to the most sophisticated techniques of humanist-oriented social psychology as developed and experimentally tested by the World Education Authority.

Social Frontier VI: Equality of rights and free participation should be guaranteed for both sexes, including the privileges to marry, to divorce, and to confine parenthood to no more than three children, as well as the right of abortion, the right of intermarriage among different races, and the right to private sexual celebration before or after marriage.

Social Frontier VII: Health services should be freely available to citizens everywhere, without assessed fees and under the direction of a World Health Authority also established by the WCN.

Social Frontier VIII: Multimedia communication (including television, radio, telephone, and cinema), authorized by a World Communication Authority, should be freely available to citizens as a public service comparable to education and health.

Social Frontier IX: Art in all forms—including graphic, musical, terpsichorean, architectural, cinematic, theatrical, poetic—should be fully available to citizens as a public service under a World Art Authority. Artists should be guaranteed complete freedom of expression.

Social Frontier X: Scientific research and application should be governed by a World Science Authority.

Social Frontier XI: Outer space exploration should be encouraged and supported by the WCN, with prospects of establishing population frontiers on nearby planets, on the moon, or conceivably in other solar systems. Science fiction and other forms of imaginative literature should be included in school curricula... with fullest encouragement from the World Education Authority.

Social Frontier XII: Exploration on our own planet should be made as freely available as possible... and would be academically recognized by the World Education Authority.

REGIONALISM REVISITED

ACIR'S NEW APPROACH

When President Carter announced his new urban program, it became obvious that he had adopted and was following the guidelines laid down by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. ACIR had "restructured" its campaign to attain total control over local government and to concentrate all political power at the Federal level; and Carter was issuing his Executive Orders in accordance with ACIR's "Comprehensive Development Guide."

In the beginning; that is, when President Nixon divided the Nation into Ten Federal Regions and established Ten Regional Capitals from which all directives, permits and grants were to be issued; a very radical political program was adopted. Wherever possible, County Governments were to be abolished in favor of "Regions" or "Areas" comprising two or more counties, with these Regions or Areas crossing State boundary lines wherever geographically feasible. Also, the fifty States were to be liquidated through the adoption of a new United States Constitution and the dividing of the Nation into a set of Newstates.

However, these plans proved to be far too radical for acceptance by the people of the United States; the plans involved what the chairman of ACIR called "intolerable political breakage." There was yet another obstacle which gave the change agents great difficulty: the original plan called for the elimination of elected officials; they were to be replaced by appointed officials. This proved to be almost impossible at the local governmental level. The Mayor might be just an agent of the Federal government; but he was going to be an elected agent, not some stranger brought in from out of town to run their city.

Because of these unacceptable conditions, Robert E. Merriam, chairman of ACIR admitted that except for a few scattered examples:

"There has been a total resistance to the concept of even limited governmental authority to deal with urbanized problems of both metropolitan and nonmetropolitan areas."

So, said Merriam, "ACIR forged a new approach to this complex problem: The (ACIR) Commission said, 'accept the facts of life about annexation and metropolitan government and consolidation, and find a mechanism which will achieve important results without intolerable political breakage.' This proposed policy needed action by the Congress, the President, governors, state legislators, and local officials, but it represented—in the (ACIR) Commission's views—a doable, workable set of actions."

Then, in an official report to all the agents and promoters of Regional Government, the chairman of ACIR outlined the new policy that would be adopted for the promotion of Regionalism at the State, sub-state and local levels. There were ten principal steps to be taken. Briefly, they were as follows.

1. Activate the state-created substate districts (only on paper in a majority of the states) through state legislation and gubernatorial action;
2. confer legal status on these districts as an agency of local government;
3. Require by state law that all local governments within the district belong to it;
4. specify that at least 60% of the district membership be elected officials of general purpose local governments;
5. provide the optimal one-person, one-vote procedure;
6. designate the district as the A-95 review agency—with the power to "resolve" local differences;
7. provide state funding, at least in part, of the district;
8. require that state capital improvements and local programs affecting the region, i.e., waste disposal, be reviewed;
9. give the district a policy role over all • multijurisdictional special districts;
10. authorize the district to assume an operating role, when the majority agree, in areawide activities such as waste disposal, transportation, sewage treatment, water supply, etc.

In addition to these ten specific proposals, the ACIR Report (published in June, 1977) states:

1. Recommendations for substate districts have been spelled out in legislation introduced by Senator Magnuson and Congressman Ashley.
2. States should create state ACIRs.
3. ACIR recommends a three-part approach in the continuing evolution toward implementing substate regions: 1) strengthened regional councils; 2) state authorization of local government reorganizations to create areawide local governments; 3) state policies and programs which would assign local and areawide responsibilities.
- 4) Home Rule powers are needed for unified executive or administrative leadership and clear accountability to the electorate.
- 5) Federal programs encourage substate regionalism
- 6) HUD's Section 701 funds have been substantially reduced and redirected from general planning to specific land use and housing topics, while EPA has added a major new source of temporary planning funds.
7. Federally-sponsored coordinative processes to promote regional government include OMB A-95 review and comment process, the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966 and the Inter-governmental Cooperation Act of 1968 (Note: the OMB A-95 review and comment process requires that a regional agency must approve a local government's request for federal funding before OMB (federal Office of Management and Budget) will release funds for the project.
8. There are some 500 A-95 review clearing houses in existence today and their authority has been expanded to cover some 200 federal programs.
9. OMB Circulator A-85 provides still another opportunity for strengthening Federal approaches to areawide coordination. A-85 requires federal agencies to "consult with" and receive "comment from" persons attempting to influence administrative regulations before they become final and appear in the Federal Register. Federal agencies, DOT, EPA, HUD have joined together with NARC (National Association of Regional Councils) to pioneer in a new areawide coordinate process known as Regional Capital Improvement Programming (RCIP).
10. 76 counties have qualified as providers of urban services through powers granted to them by the Federal Community Development Act. They are empowered to condemn property, provide housing, employment, etc. in cities and villages within the county. (Note: This is the true purpose of regional government—the destruction of State sovereignty, the Republic, and our Federal Constitution. This federal legislation overrides State Constitutions, and State legislation—Ed.)

11. This (regional government) can be accomplished either through county home rule or transfers of functions from municipalities to counties. In multicounty areas, functions would have to be transferred to a strengthened regional council. (Note: this should be a warning to county officials. The transfer of powers to county boards is a temporary measure. Creation of multicounty regional councils acting under the authority of the federal government and bypassing state governments is the ultimate aim—Ed.)

Instead of commenting on the foregoing plan for the promotion and strengthening of regional government, let's examine the way in which the plan actually works when put into actual practice. As an example, let us take the San Francisco Bay Region, with its multicounty Association of Bay Area Governments. Thanks to Mrs. Jean Blasdale of the "Berkeley Citizens United," we have a copy of a Draft Environmental Management Plan which was financed to the tune of $4.3 million by EPA, and prepared in cooperation with the Bay Area Air Pollution Control District, the Metropolitan Transportation Commission, the San Francisco Bay Regional Water Quality Control Board, the Army Corps of Engineers, the California Air Resources Board, the California Department of Health, the California Department of Transportation, the Council of Bay Area Resources Conservation Districts, the Governor's Office of Planning and Research, the Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory, the Lawrence Livermore Laboratory, the San Francisco Bay Conservation and Development Commission, the State Water Resources Control Board, the State Solid Waste Management Board, the Wastewater Solids Study, and the officials of the Counties of Sonoma, Napa, Solano, Marin, Contra Costa, Alameda, San Mateo, and Santa Clara.

Representatives of all of these official and quasi-official groups presumably got together and the change-agents in their midst spent the $4.3 million and, among other visible results, produced a 600-page plan which was made public on January 9, 1978. These are sold to the public at $10 each.

A less formidable 80-page summary also was published to sell at $2 each. It is this latter book that we have tried to read and digest, finding it bitter to both our mouth and our belly (compare Revelation 10:10).

It should be noted that this ABAG plan is not an isolated instance. We are told that 170 other regional planning agencies have had to compile similar plans. 171 of these sets of plans at, say, $4 million each, makes a considerable expenditure which taxpayers are supposed to pay. This particular weapon which ACIR is using to advantage, is the result of two Congressional acts, the Water Pollution Act of 1972 and the Clean Air Act amended in 1977.

The following is quoted from the BCU (Berkeley Citizens United) Bulletin for February 1978:

On Wednesday, January 11, the first full-scale public workshops on EMP (Environmental Management Plan) were held... A spokesman for the Regional Citizens' Forum which is fighting the plan, wrote a guest column... from which we excerpt the following:

"The primary goal of the plan is to improve air quality in the Bay Area under guidelines of the Federal Clean Air Act. ABAG proposes a strategy of 'compact growth' to bring this about, and land use controls will help to implement the strategy. Land use controls... are methods which attempt to improve the environment by modifying the behavior of those who pollute, rather than by directly suppressing pollutions."

Calling it "people control" Freeman says that the ABAG plan seeks to "control the actions of the people who must live, work and move about in the environment." The costs are "simply beyond calculation. It will raise the cost of land as it creates artificial land scarcity; force further crowding; make it harder for low and moderate income families to raise their standard of living; and result in greater local unemployment as businesses shut down and move out of the area because of high costs and the restrictions on economic activity."

ABAG has estimated that the EMP may result in 4 to 7% improvement in air quality by the year 2000... a modest benefit from the social disruption which will ensue from the plan."

Moving on to the specifics of the Environmental Management Plan, we will itemize its most important proposals as outlined in the Draft Summary. Under the proposals for controls on cars we find:

p. 12-"Controls on pollutant emissions (sic) from vehicles, including a 50% cleaner car than current regulations would require and a regionwide program of inspection and maintenance of all vehicles to see that pollution control equipment is functioning properly.

"A program of transportation controls (e.g., toll increases, more mass transit, parking regulations) coupled with management of development to put jobs and residences closer together, to put jobs and residences closer to mass transit and to otherwise reduce the use of the automobile....

p. 60-"Minimize hydrocarbon emission from motor vehicles by adopting and implementing more stringent vehicle (light duty and heavy duty) hydrocarbon exhaust emission standards—approximately 50% below the ultimate level currently prescribed by State and Federal regulations."

p. 61-62-"The objectives of the transportation actions recommended are to discourage use of the 'drive alone automobile' and to encourage the use of public transit and other high occupancy travel modes. the actions include both economic and physical incentives and disincentives to accomplish the objectives."

p. 62-Actions would include: "Increase of tolls to $1.25 during peak traffic periods and $1.00 during off-peak periods for all transbay bridges." Implement a "regional parking tax. A 35% parking tax would be applied to all vehicles entering paid parking facilities between 6 and 10 a.m. This would "increase the cost of driving for commuters..." Require provision of preferential parking for carpools...." "Gas taxes might be increased and smog charges levied...."

The EMP proposes mixed residential, commercial and industrial areas and adopting programs to "reduce the imbalance between jobs and housing throughout the region, so that distances between jobs and homes can be shortened."

EMP would "limit development of land within urban service areas where soil, slope or other conditions can support low-density development" (low-density development is a bureaucratic euphemism for single family homes. ABAG Planner Rune Carlson admitted that zoning patterns for higher densities would be enforced in Berkeley and that "50% of all new housing in Berkeley would be 'walk-up' or multiple dwelling apartments.") ...

There are many more such proposals, all of which are anti-people, anti-business, anti-choice of jobs, residence and life style. The cost of implementing the Environmental Management Plan is estimated to "range from $535 million to $620 million a year. "At least a portion of the costs of cleaning up industrial pollution would be passed on to the consumers.... Tax dollars would pay for public water pollution control facilities. ... Property taxes may increase in locations where funds have not been committed to match State and Federal money for this program.... Costs borne by local governments in implementing the plan will fall more heavily on persons of low and moderate income due to the regressive nature of property and sales taxes. The plan would also increase certain consumer prices.... and even though these increases may be minimal they would fall more heavily upon people with limited incomes."

(End of quotes from BCU Bulletin)

In the introduction to this Draft Summary from which most of the preceding is quoted, we learn that: "The Association of Bay Area Governments was designated by the State and Federal governments to prepare an Environmental Management Plan for the San Francisco Bay Area."

Under the guise of providing cleaner air and safer water, and with the promise that these will be from 4% to 7% better by the year 2000, private property rights have been transferred to a new central authority that answers not to the people of this 8-county area, not to the constituted local governments of these counties and cities, but to a new and unconstitutional kind of central authority which is one of over 170 similar units in the Regional Government Plan. This is one of the principal objectives of the Federal Regional Concept: to transfer the rights of private property to a central political authority in Washington, and to appointed agents at the ten federal regional capitols.

Now, under the Carter Administration, the Concept is to be made more acceptable to the citizens by enlisting Governors and Mayors of "needy cities" as agents of the Federal Government. The shame of it all: the United States is passing from a Constitutional Republic to a Corporate Socialist State, and the citizens are permitting it!

NOW A CONFERENCE ON FAMILIES

Controlling local governments isn't enough; now the federal government must enter into the life of the family itself. Here is something that should be watched carefully. On January 30, 1978, the Office of the White House Press Secretary issued the following:

"In order to help stimulate a national discussion of the state of American families, I (Carter) will convene a White House Conference on Families in Washington, D.C., December 9-13, 1979. Families are both the foundation of American society and its most important institution. In a world becoming more complex every day, our families remain the most lasting influence in our lives.

I am confident that the American family is basically sound and that we can and will adjust to the challenge of changing times. Yet American families confront growing problems. Two out of five marriages now end in divorce. One child in eight is born outside of marriage. A million young Americans now run away from home each year. In the face of these difficulties I am encouraged by the increasing interest in the state of the family by people from all walks of life.

The main purpose of this White House Conference will be to examine the strengths of American families, the difficulties they face, and the ways in which family life is affected by public policies. The conference will examine the important effects that the world of work, the mass media, the court system, private institutions, and other major facets of our society have on American families. This Conference will clearly recognize the pluralism of family life in America. The widely differing regional, religious, cultural and ethnic heritages of our country affect family life and contribute to its diversity and strength. Families also differ in age and composition. There are families in which several generations live together, families with two parents or one, and families with or without children. The Conference will respect this diversity. The work of this Conference... can help strengthen and support this most vital and enduring social resource. I look forward to participating in the work of the Conference and receiving its report." (Joseph Califano of HEW is organizing the White House Conference on Families.)

THE CANAL TREATIES: RETROSPECT AND AFTERMATH

*"It isn't the spirit of today that drives men mad.
It is the remorse for something that happened yesterday,
And the dread of what tomorrow may disclose."*

from The Golden Day, by Robert Jones Burdette.

Sixty-eight United States Senators voted for the International Bankers and their allies, the International Communists. They voted against the citizens of the United States and against the lovers of freedom everywhere.

To say that they, the senators and their sub-rosa masters, may live to regret their action, is to tell but a part of the story. So must we all regret their action, we citizens of the United States of America and all the peoples of the world who have looked to the United States as their "leader and supporter." The situation was stated quite plainly, and honestly, before the vote on the second Canal treaty, by Hon. Philip M. Crane in his book Surrender in Panama. We quote:

"In the past decade, the United States went through something very close to a collective national breakdown. Assassinations, rioting, war, campus violence, Watergate, and the tragic, humiliating collapse of Indo China all have contributed to a global climate in which most of the world — but especially those nations and those ideologies who wish us ill — are watching the United States through wolfish eyes, searching for any trace of irresolution or weakness of purpose. In Korea, in Taiwan, throughout Africa, Asia, Europe, the Middle East, and Latin America, wherever freedom is on the line and we must choose, America's image, strong or weak, will help to determine their fate. And the weaker our image becomes, the greater the danger of miscalculation, of adversaries pushing us too far in the belief that we will take any amount of pressure and abuse before standing up for what is right.... In Eastern Europe, in China, in Cuba, in Angola, and in Indonesia, we have seen all too well what can happen when boldness and strength are on the side of evil. This is no time for America to abandon a just claim to a symbol of our national resolve and a vital safeguard of economic and military security for the entire free world. There must be no surrender in Panama."

But there was surrender in Panama, just as there had been military surrender in Korea, and in Indo China; just as there had been yet another kind of diplo-military surrender involving the B-1 bomber and the neutron bomb. These actions caused the following reactions in Europe, according to Theo Sommers, editor-in-chief of the Hamburg weekly Die Zeit, who also writes for Newsweek's International Edition:

"The new quarrel comes at a time when European-American relations are wobbly enough. In the name of nonproliferation, Carter has been drifting into a head-on clash with America's closest allies over civilian nuclear policy, trying to impose a U.S. solution on Western Europe. He has been fighting a running—and as yet unresolved—battle with West Germany over the proper strategies for rekranking the world economy. And there is still latent resistance in Europe against his human-rights righteousness—a policy that many fear might sacrifice the feasible to the utopian. Now Carter has carried the controversy into the military field, a province previously characterized by a remarkable congruence of views. He reversed his stand on the neutron bomb without indicating what alternative he may have in mind for improving the obsolescent tactical nuclear forces deployed in Europe. He has given no hint how else to change the military equation in the European theater, or by what other means he will get the Soviets involved in meaningful negotiations. He has made fools not only of NATO's military leaders, but also of important political partners, and he did so precisely at a time when Schmidt, for one, had decided to forgo further public bickering. The result is a dangerous erosion of confidence in the Carter Administration. It seems bent on proving to the world that it is possible to lose friends without influencing one's enemies." (unquote).

But, enough about the current situation until later. Let us now examine the historical record from the standpoint of the Canal in its relationship to International Communism and International Banking. We should first note that it was V.I. Lenin himself who pointed out the importance of the Canal in Panama to the cause of Communism. Shortly before his death in 1924, Lenin told his comrades and followers that they must gain control of three vital waterways: the Suez Canal, the Panama Canal, and the Strait of Malacca which lies between Sumatra and Singapore and connects the Indian with the Pacific Ocean. We also have the written statement of the American Communist John Reed: "Internationalization of the Panama Canal was one of the oldest cries of the Communists." Much later, in February, 1959 at the 21st International Congress of the Communist parties of the world a resolution emphasized "the importance of Latin American agitation to wrest the Panama Canal from the United States. Also, the World Marxist Review for March, 1965 declared:

"...only a revolutionary peoples government uniting all segments of the nation opposed to the oligarchy will be able to combat the U.S. and its monopolists, to remove the imperialist ulcer and pave the way to nationalization of the Canal."

It was in 1945-46 that the plan to "internationalize" the Canal materialized. This was accomplished by means of the United Nations Charter which was drafted at Dumbarton Oaks under the guidance of V.M. Molotov representing the Communist Party and the Soviet Union, and Alger Hiss representing the Council on Foreign Relations and the U.S. State Department. When the final draft of the Charter was completed at San Francisco, Molotov made a speech in which he condemned those "imperialist" nations that had colonies and territories in which the people were not "liberated." Here is an excerpt from the official translation of Molotov's address:

"The point at issue is the creation of an effective organization to protect the general peace and security of nations for which all the sincere partisans of the development of nations have long been yearning but which has always had numerous irreconcilable enemies in the camp of the most aggressive imperialists.... They are carrying on their subversive activities even now, though in most cases they are doing it in a latent and veiled form...."

Molotov was not talking about Nazi Germany or Fascist Italy, or any of the other active wartime enemies of the Soviet Union. He was talking about the "imperialist colonial powers" of 1945; about Britain, France, Portugal, the Netherlands and, yes, the United States. And while Molotov was condemning "imperialists" in San Francisco, his immediate superior Joseph Stalin was sending out the word from Moscow, urging all the peoples who were being ruled by colonials to "seek self-determination, including independence."

The idea of doing away with empires and setting up scores of small mini-nations that were to be allegedly independent, was not an original idea with the Communists. The International Bankers desired the same kind of a world setup as a temporary measure, at least. The clients of International Bankers are not individuals or small businesses; their chief clients are governments. So, until such time as a true one-world government was established (one which their clients would control outright in their behalf), why, the more governments the better - so long as there was a World Bank of some sort through which the Central Bankers could operate on a worldwide scale.

So, while Molotov and Hiss were at Dumbarton Oaks planning the destruction of empires (so a one-world empire could be established) Communist Agent Harry Dexter White and Fabian Socialist John Maynard Keynes were at Bretton Woods setting up a new International Monetary Fund and an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, commonly called the World Bank.

Meanwhile, to "liberate" the colonies and territories via the United Nations, Hiss and Molotov had written into the U.N. Charter Article 73, a "Declaration Regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories." Important parts of this Article are self-explanatory:

"Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibility for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government... accept as a sacred trust the obligation to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions...."

In short, the "imperialist nations" (with the exception of the U.S.S.R.) were to give up their colonies and territories and permit the peoples of same to govern themselves so the International Bankers could make loans to their governments, so the International Developers could take over their natural resources, and so the International Communists could give them "the blessings of Socialism."

To see to it that the "imperialist nations" (except the U.S.S.R., of course) were following through in regard to this "sacred trust" section "e" was added to Article 73 of the U.N. Charter. It provides that these imperialist nations (except the U.S.S.R.) would "transmit regularly to the Secretary-General... statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories for which they are respectively responsible...."

Alger Hiss, as Under Secretary of State, was responsible for submitting such a report to the U.N. Secretary-General. Hiss listed the following as American Territories:

Alaska, American Samoa, Guam, Hawaii, the Panama Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. This was in 1946; and it is important to note that the Republic of Panama, prior to 1946, had made no claims to sovereignty over the Canal Zone. So, we can thank Alger Hiss, the convicted perjurer, for starting all the trouble which ended with our government's giving away to a Communist-led government, the Canal Zone and the Canal in Panama. What Hiss of the C.F.R. started, Carter of the Trilateral Commission was able to finish.

An important aside: In addition to this U.N. decolonization program that has caused wars and revolutions, acts of genocide and wholesale terrorism, and other untold atrocities in Africa, Asia and the Middle East, there was yet another U.N. Crusade which proved to be a lost cause—until Jimmy Carter came along. Article I of the U.N. Charter had been drawn up allegedly "to achieve international cooperation in promoting and encouraging respect for Human Rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion." To further this aim, a "Universal Declaration on Human Rights" was written. From it three separate Covenants were written and presented as treaties to be approved by the governments of the world. They were 1) the Covenant on Human Rights; 2) the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; and 3) the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. In 1966 the UN moved against United States objections and adopted the Covenants without Article 17, which reads: "Everyone has the right to own property alone, as well as in association with others. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property."

Because this property rights statement had been removed from the document, Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon and Ford all refused to sign the Covenants. But on March 17, 1977, President Carter did sign two of the Covenants, the one on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the one on Civil and Political Rights (he had already launched his personal campaign on Human Rights). The Covenants that Carter signed as treaties do not honor or recognize the right of individuals to own property alone or in association with others. These dangerous treaties are not yet effective because they have not been approved by the U.S. Senate; but a body of legislators that would approve those Panama Canal treaties might sign anything the Trilateral Commissioners tell them to sign!

But, we're neglecting the Money Barons and the Multinational Cartelists and their part in the Conspiracy. We might begin when Col. House acted as liaison man between President Wilson and the Subrosa government. Then Bernard Baruch took over and came to full power with Roosevelt. John J. McCloy then took over, first as head of the newly created World Bank, then he ran West Germany, eventually returned to New York to become chairman of Rockefeller's Chase Manhattan Bank. When Eisenhower came on so did "what's good for General Motors is good for the United States" Charles Wilson. Kennedy had George Ball of Lehman Bros. and George McBundy of Ford Foundation. Then came Robert Strange MacNamara, from running the Ford Motor Company to running the Vietnam war to running the World Bank. After Watergate Nelson Rockefeller moved in to make the world safe for the Subrosa government. Finally, brother David brought in his self-chosen Jimmy and the whole gang of Trilateral Commissioners, to make the world safe for Corporate Socialism, for Money Barons, and for Multinational Cartelists.

But the world wasn't really safe. First, because the government had overspent so much promoting and financing socialist countries overseas and socialist programs at home, that it was out of money. And second, because the Big Banks were in the same fix. What was needed was money, real money, not paper promises. Petrodollars from Saudi Arabia helped—and brought on the present Middle East crisis. And we suspect that drug traffic money from South America via the Torrijos Brothers of Panama also helped. There was a closed Senate hearing—but not a word was released, at least officially.

Anyway, getting some money to Torrijos so he could give it back to the Bankers was a very important part of the Canal giveaway; as the strange case of Sol Linowitz will amply demonstrate.

We mention all of these different things, because there are conspiracies within conspiracies, even as there are wheels within wheels when we speak of Big Government and Big Money. But the most serious of them all may have to do with the realization of that original Communist dream; that of controlling all the vital waterways on the Seven Seas and in between them. And here is where we must be concerned with the aftermath of the Panama Canal Treason.

In Don Bell Reports #12 (3/24/78) we published a map of the Caribbean Sea area that had been prepared by E.P. Thornton. That map showed the strategic importance of the Panama Canal, the Windward Passage, and it also showed how the U.S. Guantanamo military base is sandwiched between the Windward Passage and a Soviet submarine base which has been constructed at Cienfuegos, Cuba.

Now that Carter and the Senate have given away the Canal, next on the "hit list" will be Guantanamo. It protects the Windward Passage and, in line with Lenin's instructions to gain control of the vital waterways of the world (a continuing program on the part of the Communists), "Gitmo" becomes of great importance to our acknowledged "number one enemy."

Castro, representing the U.S.S.R. in Latin America, has been nagging, threatening, pressuring the United States in every way short of outright military action, in his attempts to take over the Guantanamo Base.

A historical sketch follows:

In 1492 Columbus claimed Cuba for Spain. In the ensuing centuries the island was often raided by pirates, and England made one serious attempt to take Cuba, but Spain held on. Then, in 1895 civil war erupted and the U.S. Battleship Maine was sent to Havana harbor to protect American interests. There was a mysterious explosion and the Maine was sunk. A declaration of war against Spain followed. Spain retired and the U.S. established a military government in Cuba, and in the Philippines. It might be recalled that General Arthur MacArthur was the first military governor of the Philippines. Half a century later his son General Douglas MacArthur became the military governor of Japan. In each of these occupations, in Cuba, the Philippines and Japan, the people were aided, their governments restored, and then the American governors retired. In Cuba, yellow fever was stamped out, schools and hospitals were built and much progress was made in public works. The Cubans adopted a constitution in 1901, set up their own government; and at that time the U.S. leased its naval base at Guantanamo for 99 years.

Chaotic conditions caused American re-occupation of Cuba in 1906, but only for three years. Guantanamo remained a leased property. However, during the missile crisis in 1962 when Russia was sneaking weapons into Cuba, Castro first demanded that "the U.S. give up its rights in the Guantanamo Naval Base." From Encyclopedia Britannica 1975 edition: "Since the 1959 (Castro) revolution, the Cuban government has refused to accept the rent and periodically has threatened to seize the Guantanamo Naval Base." Among other things, Cuba cut off the base's fresh water supply, and a desalinization plant had to be installed, along with a power plant to supply electricity.

Note the parallel pressures by the Soviet and Cuba to force the U.S. to give up its rights in Guantanamo Bay, as in Panama. The two belong together as parts of vital American defense strategy. In both cases we stepped in to bring order out of chaos, eliminated disease, and now we are permitting the enemy to destroy our defenses without firing a shot—and paying the enemy to do it!

Guantanamo, just as certainly as was the Canal in Panama, is on the Communist "hit list" and has been ever since they established Cuba as their advance base for hemispheric and world subversion.

Guantanamo is next, then Puerto Rico, then what? What will it take to awaken people before all is taken away?

Don Bell Reports

Year Twenty-Five Number Seventeen April 28, 1978

MUST WE SURRENDER?

The sequence of events was startling and, while the surrender of the Canal in Panama was the highlight, it was but one of a series of occurrences that seem like steps toward the surrender of the United States to a World Authority.

This latest series seems to have begun with the visit of the Communist Dictator Nicolae Ceausescu to the White House. Like a meeting of the Bilderbergers or an International Conference of Trilateral Commissioners, whenever the name of the President of Romania gets into the news, something new in East-West relationships is about to develop.

After the manner of a marriage broker, Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania has been set up by the Powers-In-High-Places as a quasi-deal-maker between the Communist East and the Capitalist West. The reason: back in the early '60s, when the Cold War was being replaced by Peaceful Coexistence, it became obvious to the global diplomats that a go-between was necessary if the contradictory policy of "private alliance and public hostility between East and West" were to continue. Romania seemed the best choice for a half-way house where East and West might meet. So, that satellite country was permitted to pretend a kind of independence from Moscow. In April 1964 the Romanian Communist party issued a statement that preceded similar statements by Eurocommunist countries by more than a decade. The Romanian statement affirmed that a Communist country has the right to shape its own political program without interference. That statement received the Kremlin's "reluctant" approval, and the way was clear for Romania to maintain friendly relations with the U.S.S.R., with Red China, Red Albania, and with the nations of the West as well. Romania adopted a national program that is half way between communism and capitalism (national ownership of all industry, but no national planning or national quotas). Nicolae Ceausescu was selected to be Romania's president in 1965 and since that time he has pleased the leaders of both East and West. Examples: It was Ceausescu who arranged Henry Kissinger's first visit to the Forbidden City of Peking in Red China. And it was Ceausescu who acted on behalf on the Trilateral-Saudi Arabian interests in arranging that unprecedented visit of Sadat of Egypt with Begin of Israel.

So when Ceausescu of Romania paid a somewhat unexpected visit to Carter of the United States, this was a "sure sign" that something new and different was being planned. When Secretary of State Cyrus Vance then paid a seemingly unnecessary and supposedly unprofitable call on President Brezhnev in the Kremlin, it was apparent to observers that some new development was being planned. Then, when it was announced that national security adviser Brzezinski was to go to Peking on May 20 for high-level talks with Red Chinese leaders, it seemed certain that something quite important was being planned!

Then, to acquaint the "elitists" with what was being planned, the Bilderbergers met over the week-end (April 22-24) to get the news and their instructions first hand. They met behind the usual closed doors at Princeton, New Jersey, with Lord Home of Great Britain replacing Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands as chairman of the group. Among those attending this session were Zbigniew Brzezinski, Frank Cary of IBM, David Rockefeller, NATO Secretary General Joseph Lums, Fiat President Giovanni Agnelli, President Gaston Thorn of Luxembourg, and contingents from Canada and the countries of Western Europe that are "represented" in the Trilateral Commission.

In all, there were 105 persons from 20 different countries. Behind armed guards they met in extreme secrecy in Henry Chauncey Conference Center, near Princeton University; and Rockefeller's organizers took over an entire hotel complex to ensure secrecy. A reporter was able to learn, however, that two topics highlighted the meeting: "Western Defense with its Political Implications" and "The Changing Structure of Production and Trade; Consequences for the Western Industrialized Countries.”

Ceausescu to Washington, Vance to Moscow, Bilderbergers to Princeton; these events would set the stage for what was to follow:

Shortly after Cyrus Vance returned to the United States without telling the public what he and Brezhnev had talked about, the Pentagon suddenly announced a drastic cutback of defense bases and facilities in the United States! Note the timing:

The Canal in Panama had been given away and there were rumors that the next to go would be the Guantanamo, Cuba Naval Base which was being turned over to Castro. Then on the evening of April 25th came the radio announcement that the Naval Base at Key West, Florida was to be closed down. This was bad enough. But as the night progressed so did the enormity of the planned cutback. Around midnight, EST, came the news that the Key West base was just one of 35 that was being closed down. A few hours later the number had swelled to 85, and then with the dawn came the announcement that 107 bases in the United States were to be shut down or their operations reduced drastically. Finally, on April 27th, The New York Times published some of the details: “The Pentagon proposed streamlining the military base structure by closing, cutting back and combining operations at 107 installations.”

These questions deserve to be answered: Is the subrosa government of the world preparing the United States of America for abject surrender to a de facto World Government? And is it to accomplish this by destroying this Nation's ability to defend itself from enemies foreign and domestic? And is fear of a Communist takeover the principal weapon being used to force us to surrender? If this is not true, then why is the Soviet Union being strengthened at the same time that the United States is being weakened and surrounded by hostile forces?

In a very alarming book, Will America Surrender? (Devin Adair, 1973), the author, Slobodan M. Draskovich points out that: “Our foreign policy since 1933 (the recognition of the USSR by the U.S. under President F.D. Roosevelt) up to the present day has not been one of fighting communism, trying to stop its advances, break its aggressiveness, defeat its drive for world conquest—but one of seeking compromise, accommodation, as well as active help to communism in various countries under diverse pretenses, explanations and excuses.... The American people sense that it is unnatural that the U.S. should be going down all the time and that they should be told that nothing can be done about it, that nobody is responsible, that only right-wing extremists and alarmists view things pessimistically, but that actually things are going fine.... But an increasing number of ordinary Americans are increasingly asking some elementary questions:

- is it true that there is no alternative to our foreign policy of coexistence (now called detente—Ed.) and surrender, save nuclear war and global annihilation?
- is it true that our leaders have a sacred obligation to save mankind, but have no obligation to save America?
- is it true that our unilateral disarmament would induce the communists to disarm as gentlemen should?
- is it true that helping communists (Tito, Gomulka, Gierak, Castro, Ceausescu, etc.) is good for freedom?
- is it true that the best possible and most American thing to happen to the U.S. is to surrender abjectly to communism? Is that the natural logical conclusion and end of what the Founding Fathers dreamed, conceived, created and launched as one of the greatest, most nobly ambitious ventures in the history of mankind? As people raise such questions, it becomes increasingly difficult to sidestep the issues and to silence the questioners by means of slander, character assassination, moral blackmail, distortion or ridicule.”

(unquote)

In this dangerous period in our short time as a Nation, let us try to keep the basic facts straight and in order. As Disraeli said more than a century ago, “The world is governed by very different personages from what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes.” It is these “very different personages” to whom we refer when we speak of the “subrosa government.” Since these personages are international bankers, multinational cartelists, monopoly capitalists and in some cases utopian idealists, it is certainly reasonable to assume that they have no desire to see the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. destroy each other. What they want is to see these two powers brought together as parts of a New World Order. However, in order to accomplish this, they must pit one power against another, make war seem so inevitable unless both surrender to a World Government, that both will submit and even demand the creation of a World Government.

These "very different personages" utilize the same old Hegelian formula:

Thesis: Capitalism

Antithesis: Communism

Synthesis: Socialist World Government.

In this Hegelian Dialectic, Brinkmanship also must play its part. The world must be brought to the very brink of total war time after time, until "total interdependence" is seen by the masses as the only alternative to total destruction of "Space Ship Earth." To paraphrase a prophet, in these kingdoms of the world the lamb must be forced to lie down with the wolf and the American Eagle must eat hay with the Russian Bear.

However, this is an extremely dangerous game these "personages" are playing when they continually weaken the United States and her ability to defend her citizens, and when they continually strengthen the USSR and its ability to enslave the world. These "personages" use capitalism and communism as tools and weapons. They overlook at least one important set of facts in regard to communism. The dedicated Communist—and he is dedicated—knows little or nothing about these "personages" that are set over his Communist Leaders. He knows his cell leader and his party leaders, and he has been taught the aims of communism, not the goals of the "personages." Authorities on the subject of International Communism tell us that Communist doctrine teaches:

- 1) Communism will inevitably rule the world
- 2) A worldwide conflict between progressive and reactionary forces exist. The progressive forces will inevitably win.
- 3) Every organization or force that works for communist victory is progressive. Every organization or force that opposes communism is reactionary.
- 4) The communists are the leaders of all progressive forces. The United States, through its imperialism, is the leader of international reaction.
- 5) All communists must work to aid progressive forces.
- 6) The interests of the world struggle take precedence over the national self-interest of any communist-ruled country.

This is like Dr. Frankenstein's Monster, one the "personages" have constructed to force all freedom loving peoples of the world into world-wide economic and political enslavement. The Monster could turn on the "personages" and destroy them; but in doing so it might destroy us all!

we are to be "conditioned" for a future merger with communism. Evidence abounds:

Zbigniew Brzezinski is the chief foreign policy maker in the Carter administration. Former director of the Rockefeller-created Trilateral Commission, member of the Council on Foreign Relations, fresh from a briefing session with the Bilderberg Group and scheduled to represent the United States at a policy-making conference to be held in the Red Chinese capitol at Peking beginning May 20th, Brzezinski has made his purpose quite plain. In 1970 he wrote a book entitled Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technocratic Era in which he stated:

"Marxism represents a further vital and creative stage in the maturing of man's universal vision. Marxism is a victory of reason over belief."

Again in 1976, in Detente, published by Universal Books, Brzezinski wrote: "Our view is that the ideological and political cleavages which divide the advanced world are anachronistic, that they reflect the past rather than provide guidance for the future and that it is therefore in the interest not only of our two societies and political systems (the USSR and the USA—Ed.), but of the world community as a whole to repair those cleavages and change the status quo. To do so one must move forward on a broad front: one must bring the two societies into much closer contact with each other than they are now, and one does this by eliminating the ideological hostility between them. Simultaneously one proceeds to create a web of co-operative relationships so that the two societies are increasingly inter-meshed and inter-dependent." (Accent added—Ed.)

This same philosophy was reiterated in a speech delivered by Brzezinski at the Trilateral Commission conference held in Bonn, West Germany, last October.

Then there is the testimony of one Henrick Hertzberg who draws a salary of $32,500 a year for writing speeches for President Jimmy Carter. It seems that Hertzberg also is a contributor to a left-wing publication called WIN, founded by the War Resistor's League, a socialist organization. In a WIN article by Hertzberg, published in August 1974, he said: "It would be undeniably 'better' for the United States alone to be destroyed (in a nuclear war) than for the Soviet Union, Europe and so much of the rest of the world to be destroyed as well."

When the Communists took over in Vietnam,

On the other hand, here in the United States,

Hertzberg wrote for WIN on May 1, 1976: "I welcome their victory... as a pacifist, I take some comfort in the fact that the Communist victory was not a military but a moral victory." Finally, in a letter written by Hertzberg and published in WIN last February, Carter's speech writer said: "socialism and freedom are inseparable."

More evidence? In Foreign Affairs, official organ of the Council on Foreign Relations, Richard Gardner (now U.S. Ambassador to Italy, appointed by Carter) wrote that: "the House of World Order will have to be built from the bottom up rather than the top down... an end run around national sovereignty, eroding it piece by piece, will accomplish much more than the old-fashioned frontal assault."

Then there is Father Hesburgh, a member of the CFR and president of the University of Notre Dame, who likes to equate the drive for the New World Order with religious ecumenicism. In 1973 he said: "The unity of mankind must be the wave of the future... This leaves the one great divider of mankind, perhaps the worst of all, national sovereignty." (emphasis supplied.)

These men we have quoted are agents of the "personages" who govern the world, and who want to set up a New World Order. The first phase of this conspiracy (in this century) was the creation of a super power (the Soviet Union) which they could play against that other super power (the United States of America). By playing Communist manpower against American money and technological power, they now seem prepared to enter the final stage of their program; which calls for the "merging" of those two super powers. But, in reality, the USSR is not the superior power which it claims to be. True, Soviet Russia holds military superiority. Unilateral disarmament, technological and industrial aid from the United States "to Russia with love" have seen to this. But the "personages" must still be worried about the success of their scheme, because they still seek ways to weaken and isolate the United States from necessary imports of such items as oil, chromium, and other metals. In this latter connection, what the communists are doing in Africa is almost as serious to the U.S. as are their machinations in Central America and the Caribbean (now to be Red) Sea. The following report by Dr. Howard E. Kershner, first heard on Dean Manion's weekly broadcast of April 23, 1978, is important and we quote:

"I'd like to speak of two significant important places in Africa that probably will control the destiny, not only of Africa, but of the West as well. The first of these is the Horn of Africa... placed just south of the Gulf of Aden where it will control the Red Sea and the Suez Canal and all traffic coming out of the Middle East. Nothing can move out of the Middle East that will not have to go around this Horn of Africa. And if the Russians fortify it, of course, they can bottle up all of the oil. The oil does not go through the Suez Canal because it is not big enough to accommodate modern ships. The oil goes past the Horn on the way southward to go around the Cape of Good Hope to reach Europe and the West... By fortifying the Horn of Africa they (the Communists) will control all of the shipping that goes past there. This would cut off the oil supply to the West—our country and Europe. Worse than that, it would throw all of this oil in the Middle East into the hands of the Russians because we would have no way to get the oil out... Our commercial life and our future would belong to the Russians because they would be the only source we would have..."

"Then, if the Russians move into southern Africa, they will control all of the traffic between the Western Hemisphere and the Eastern Hemisphere that goes past the Cape of Good Hope. That traffic amounts to half of the shipping of the world... Now, what kind of condition would the West be in if we lose our shipping lanes that go around the Horn of Africa and past the Cape of Good Hope? We are going to lose both of those things if we don't help somebody who is trying to defend them. It is pretty late to do anything now because we have rebuffed the government of South Africa so much that..."

"...Whoever controls Africa will probably control the world... if we let gold, diamonds, uranium, coal and agricultural land, all of the wealth of this African country go over to the Communist side, it is going to be a sad thing for us in the West." (unquote)

Our hope of national survival rests in men who have taken an oath to defend against enemies foreign and domestic. This is where the counter-revolution should begin.

INVITATIONS TO TERRORISM

The officials of our federal government are elected or appointed to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." In taking an oath to defend the Constitution, government officials have sworn to do these very things. In many cases, however, they are doing the very opposite of their sworn duty. The respected columnist Paul Scott recently wrote about one such instance. "The emerging foreign and domestic policies of the Carter administration," he wrote, "appear designed to accommodate and cooperate with Moscow-Havana backed terrorism rather than directly opposing it. This ominous trend is beginning to surface in policies being pushed by Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Attorney General Griffin Bell, the two senior members, with the full backing of President Carter."

Scott referred to Vance's attempts to force the newly integrated government of Rhodesia to collaborate with the Soviet-Cuban trained guerrillas and terrorists who have refused to renounce the use of violence. Vance, Andrew Young and Jimmy Carter insist that the black leaders of these terrorist groups must be given major positions in the governments of both Rhodesia and South West Africa. As for Griffin Bell, his department has issued orders to arrest and prosecute all anti-Castro Cubans who are in the United States and who might become activists against the Castro regime. Also, Havana is to be notified of any activities directed against Castro from any other countries in the Western Hemisphere. In other words, the United States Intelligence Community is being used to protect the Castro dictatorship. It is a well established fact that Cuba is the Soviet's main base for all terrorist and espionage activities against the United States, Canada, South and Central America, as well as Africa--and now, thanks to Griffin Bell, Cuba is under the protection of the United States, thanks to Griffin Bell, and American authorities will be powerless to interfere!

The domestic implications of this policy can best be understood if we realize that William Webster, newly appointed FBI Chief, regards the urban terrorism that is sweeping Western Europe--especially Italy and West Germany--as being of epidemic proportions and that "it is likely to come to the United States." Consequently, he has sent an FBI team to Europe "to study methods of coping with urban guerrilla warfare and kidnaping." At the same time, however, here in the United States, FBI agents are being arrested and prosecuted for having used "unethical" methods while investigating the activities of the highly "unethical" and terroristic activities of the Weathermen. This Weatherman outfit is said to be tied in with West Germany's Baader-Meinhof Outfit, Italy's Red Brigade, Japan's Red Army, Turkey's Popular Liberation Front, and various other national and international groups.

We are told that these terrorist brigades, columns, groups, armies, cells or by whatever name they are called, whether they be Trotskyist, Maoist, pro-Moscow or allegedly independent, are interlocked and coordinated through a Cuban-based organization known as the "Tricontinental Organization of Solidarity of Peoples." The slogan of Tricontinental is "Anti-Imperialist Solidarity." It handles training camps for terrorists in Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Lebanon, Yemen, Cuba, etc. and according to one European observer,

Tricontinental turns out 1500 efficient and well trained terrorists every year, many of them American. The eminent political observer, Hilaire du Berrier, reporting from Europe, says that the main transit point for these terrorists is Paris and "each nation's terrorists have their own objectives but the one overriding goal they have in common is the undermining of the United States and her allies, through cells dispersed around the world. Sabotage groups are in place and waiting in ports, factories, and universities. Yet America was one of the 66 nations which voted in 1977 to extend the Geneva Convention and accord prisoner of war status, protection and privileges to ordinary terrorists. Only Brazil and Israel voted against it. The effect of this ruling is to give exoneration to criminals if their acts can be given a political motive."

The internationalist scope of these terrorist activities can be shown by the testimony of one Georgas Phillipot, a Haitian exile who was captured in Angola by pro-West UNITA forces opposing the communist government of Angola. Phillipot revealed that he was recruited by Cuban intelligence agents in Montreal, Canada in September, 1977, as part of a hit team to assassinate Jonas Savimba, the leader of UNITAS. Trained in Havana, then sent to East Germany where he received additional training, he was to perform his first mission in Angola; then he was scheduled to return to Canada where he was to participate in an operation devised by the Cubans to scatter bombs around Quebec. Bombs were to be placed around English establishments so that Separatists would be blamed. Others were to be placed around French establishments so the English would be blamed. Objective: to precipitate open guerrilla warfare between French and English speaking Canadians. This "Canadian caper" accomplished, Phillipott was then to be sent to the United States to stir up similar terrorist activity in cities where militant black and far-left groups already were active and awaiting a reason for "going to war." Phillipott said that hundreds of militants in the United States have been recruited for this purpose, trained in Cuba and East Germany, and then sent back to the United States to engage in terrorist activities similar to those now occurring in Italy and West Germany.

The terrorist activities in Italy and West Germany center around two principal terrorist groups: the German Baader-Meinhof Gang and the Italian Red Brigade. Renato Curcio is the ringleader of the Red Brigade, which is responsible for the kidnaping of Aldo Moro, leader of the Christian Democratic Party and five times Prime Minister of Italy. Years ago Renato Curcio began preaching about how the Italian state could be undermined and taken over by the communists through kidnapings and assassinations. He told his followers: "Italy is the weak link in the chain of a western democratic system' sliding irreversibly towards collapse. The times are ripe for a frontal collision with an Italian regime in its death throes." That, he declared, would be "Europe's ultimate war for Communism." In his attempts to lay the groundwork for such an "ultimate war," Curcio was observed making numerous trips out of Italy into East Germany and Czechoslovakia, supposedly for the purpose of consulting with other terrorist leaders. Later he was arrested for engaging in armed revolutionary activities and he was in a steel cage in Turin awaiting trial when Aldo Moro was kidnaped. Following Curcio's arrest, West Germany's counter-terrorist service warned the Italian government that a big coup was being prepared against a top level Italian politician. Just fifteen days later Aldo Moro was kidnaped, and the price of Moro's release was to be the freeing of Curcio and twelve other terrorists awaiting trial with him.

Now, this should be a lesson for us: When Moro was kidnaped on March 16, the Italian authorities awoke to the fact that they could do little to trace the criminals because the Italian Security Forces had been "stripped of their eyes and ears." Communist deputies in the Italian government had argued that all security files listing criminals and terrorists should be destroyed. So, the Italian service which had amassed such files, was forced to burn the files - and the service itself had been dismantled. Please note that this same procedure is being carried out in the United States. All anti-Communist files are being destroyed and the FBI, instead of investigating anti-communist and terrorist activities, has been ordered to investigate right-wing organizations.

In line with this move to exonerate communist and terrorist activities is this new attempt to deprive American citizens of the ability to defend themselves by enacting gun control regulations through "administrative law."

The usual procedure for federal lawmaking has to do with the Congress of the United States. Laws are made by the Legislative Branch, are administered by the Executive Branch, and are judged as to their Constitutionality by the Judiciary Branch. However as our Republican form of government has slowly but surely deteriorated, some new ways to make laws have been developed. For example: the federal Courts now make laws by issuing edicts and decrees, as in school bussing cases, realignment of school and voting districts, etc. And whenever the Congress refuses to pass some Act desired by the Executive Department, it is published in the Federal Register and, unless Congress shows its disapproval by formally rejecting the order within sixty days, the "administrative law" becomes effective as the law of the land. This is the procedure that is being followed by Attorney General Bell, with the full approval of the President of the United States, in the case of the current Gun Registration Order.

The Federal Register, according to the official definition, "provides a uniform system for making available to the public regulations and legal notices by federal agencies. These include presidential proclamations and executive orders and federal agency documents having general applicability and legal effect, documents required to be published by Act of Congress and other federal agency documents of public interest." So far, so good. However, the Federal Register has been misused from the very beginning of its legal existence. The misuse began with President Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Whenever he wanted a special law "on the books," and couldn't wait for Congress to accommodate his desire, he would have the "law" put into effect without benefit of Congress. This was discovered by the United States Supreme Court in a case in which a man was indicted and jailed for violating a law that his attorney couldn't find on the statute books, but which had been a "ruling" made by a federal bureaucrat in conjunction with FDR's Executive Order creating the National Recovery Act (NRA). Incidentally, the NRA was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court on the grounds that Congress could neither delegate legislative power to the President to exercise "an unfettered discretion in matters of trade and commerce," nor attempt to regulate purely intrastate business.

But getting back to the Federal Register. The Supreme Court found that several hundred "laws" of this type had been issued by bureaucrats in just one month in 1936. The President had promulgated these "laws" all by himself, had then filed them in the State Department. As a result of this investigation it was ruled that all such administrative laws would, in the future, have to be published in the Federal Register. This was supposed to make all such laws "known to the public," and also give Congress a chance to reject them by taking formal action within a specified time limit (usually 60 days). It was also decreed that "ignorance of what is published in the Federal Register is no excuse for violating its mandates."

Now, concerning this Federal Gun Control edict, which was inserted in the Federal Register by Trilateralist Blumenthal's Treasury Department's Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. The order was first published on March 21, 1978, which means that it will become "the Law of the Land" on May 22, 1978, unless it is formally rejected by the United States Congress before that time. The principal provisions of the edict are:

- All new firearms will carry a special serial number.
- Gun manufacturers, importers and dealers would have to report thefts or losses of firearms within 24 hours.
- Quarterly reports of all gun manufacturing and sales would be made to the federal government.

No actual direct owner-registration of firearms is called for in this edict. But since there has never been any federal gun regulation, and since most people are convinced that this is prohibited by the Second Amendment to the Constitution, even the Carter-Trilateralist administration would hesitate before starting out with a law that is too strict to be generally accepted. However, if they get away with this first effort, we can expect that actual gun confiscation will be a part of their future plans for the New World Order.

Dismissing the domestic dangers for the moment, let us realize that much the same kind of surrender to communists and terrorists is also being planned for other nations that once were our friends and allies. Now that Rhodesia and the South West African territory now called Namibia are being turned over to the terrorists and revolutionaries, it would seem that the Republic of South Africa is to come next.

Remember hearing about that Carnegie Report of 1965, the plan calling for the military takeover of the Republic of South Africa. It would take about 93,000 troops, 3,000 hours of flying time for bombers and strafers, there would be between 18,000 to 37,000 casualties. The document was signed by one Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Foundation, American secretary of the Bilderberg Group, member of the Council on Foreign Relations, etc. The plan received little publicity, was soon forgotten by most people. But Antony Sutton, in his book, "The War On Gold," remarked, "in 1975 the Russo-Cuban takeover of Angola provided a spine-chilling confirmation that the Carnegie Plan for military action was entering its final phase."

Now there is the "Group Action" Plan, a highly professional document aimed at the complete destruction of the South African economy "without at the same time destroying international trade." "Group Action" is the work of the American Friends Service Committee. A 60-page manual, it points out that there are 400 American corporations still doing business with South Africa and there must be a total boycott if South Africa is to be conquered. The Plan is being used as a basis for anti-South African action in U.S. universities and in NCC-affiliated churches. It is supposed to be a campaign against Apartheid, but in reality it is a means of gaining control of natural resources. In the words of Antony Sutton, "South Africa is... a vast storehouse of mineral wealth, an inviting target for every imperialistic cabal in the world, the Soviet Union and the United States included."

Eurocommunism in Europe, Asia sold out, Africa being sold out, Latin America being estranged, control of sealanes being handed over to the Communists, and here at home, invitations to terrorism. Now is the time when we should surely reaffirm our National Motto and really mean it: "In God We Trust."

EVERYBODY TALKS ABOUT INFLATION, BUT . . .

Said the columnist with justifiable sarcasm: "I heard one idiotic congressman on a radio interview state with all of the confidence of complete stupidity that we will have to support Carter's programs if we expect to get out of inflation. He expects us to believe that Carter can spend us out of inflation by giving the products of our labor to other nations, including our enemies, as gifts? Spend us out of what? We are already so deeply in debt that we are bankrupt, and most of the price we have to pay for what we buy is interest on loans our government has made, and cannot pay, so our credit is almost used up, and our land is being used to redeem some of our debts to other countries."

Said another columnist: "...we are going to hear so much nonsense from the White House, the Congress, the Brookings Institution, Harvard, and People of Sensibility that I would like to head off some of it by getting some facts on the record before it begins. First, let's look at the impact of inflation on the taxpayer and on government revenues. We can imagine a jar of peanut butter costing $11.23, a gallon of milk costing $23.49, a pair of work pants costing $80.69? Yet that is exactly what these things will cost 45 years from now if prices rise by 5 per cent a year--and how many of us have heard it said that if we could just get inflation down to 5 per cent a year and keep it there we would have the beast back in the box?"

The cautious Newsgram in the May 15th U.S. News & World Report says in its condensed fashion: "Inflation a growing problem. Hike in consumer prices at 6.5 percent last year may push all the way past 7 per cent in 1978. Alarm bell: Costs leaped 9.3 percent in first quarter, forced White House to up its inflation forecast."

An article in the same newsweekly notes that food, electricity, autos, homes, living costs are spiraling upward at a rapid rate. For consumers there is no relief in sight. A wave of price hikes that threatens to defeat President Carter's new anti-inflation plan is getting stronger with little reason to hope for much of a let-up in months ahead."

In her supplement to the Manion Forum Newsletter daughter Marilyn presented the younger citizen's predicament because of inflation. She wrote: "The proverbial young man in his way up marries and starts a family. His income does increase year by year. But so does inflation; the latter goes up faster than the former. Up also goes his tax bracket. In order to garner enough cash to buy a first home, his wife is forced to go to work--placing the already financially strapped family in yet a higher tax bracket. People used to dream of a little cottage at the lake, of sending the kids to dear old alma mater, of adding a wing onto the house some day. Now they merely hope, with two paychecks, to pay the mortgage and taxes every month and have enough left over to feed and clothe the family.... It all goes on--and on, and on. And so it will, until the taxpayers on their treadmills finally get mad enough to do something about it."

Senator Jesse Helms recently presented some facts and figures, some of which are old, some are new. "When the 20th Century rolled around," he said, "the total federal debt was only $1 billion. As of April 4, 1978, it stood at $740,-453,027,113.26, an increase of exactly $75,400,280.77 during the past twelve months, because as of April 4, 1977, the total was $665,052,746,266.49. The federal debt remained at about $1 billion from 1900 to 1916. Then, with World War I, it climbed in 1917 to $3 billion. In 1918 it stood at $12 billion, and in 1919 it climbed to $25 billion. Then efforts began to reduce the debt. By 1930, it had been reduced to $16 billion. In 1933, the federal government began to run up annual deficits, and by 1941 it had hit an all-time high of $49 billion. Then came World War II, which increased the debt to $269 billion. In 1950, the debt had been reduced to $256 billion. But let's look at what happened thereafter. Looking at the debt at five-year intervals, we see the following totals: 1955, $274 billion; 1960, $291 billion; 1965, $323 billion; 1970, $383 billion; and 1975, $544 billion. If you'll take another look at the current federal debt figure above, you'll see how much it has increased since 1975. This is the story of inflation. . . ."

The popular press besieges us with articles on inflation, but those articles are generally designed to show people how "complicated" the subject is. Like the subject of monet itself, inflation is supposed to be a very mysterious subject which only the Ruling Elitists can understand. Actually, it's very simple, and we are obligated to Henry Hazlitt, a noted free enterprise economist, for giving us the following definition. We quote:

CAUSE AND CURE OF INFLATION

1. Inflation is an increase in the quantity of money and credit. Its chief consequence is soaring prices. Therefore inflation-- if we misuse the term to mean the rising prices themselves--is caused solely by printing more money. For this the government's monetary policies are entirely responsible.
2. The most frequent reason for printing more money is the existence of an unbalanced budget. Unbalanced budgets are caused by extravagant expenditures which the government is unwilling or unable to pay for by raising corresponding tax revenues. The excessive expenditures are mainly the result of government efforts to redistribute the wealth and income--in short, to force the productive to support the unproductive. This erodes the working incentives of both the productive and the unproductive.
3. The causes of inflation are not, as so often said "multiple and complex," but simply the result of printing too much money. There is no such thing as "cost-push" inflation. If, without an increase in the stock of money, wage or other costs are forced up, and producers try to pass these costs on by raising their selling prices, most of them will merely sell fewer goods. The result will be reduced output and loss of jobs. Higher costs can only be passed along in higher selling prices when consumers have more money to pay the higher prices.
4. Price controls cannot stop or slow down inflation. They always do harm. Price controls simply squeeze or wipe out profit margins, disrupt production, and lead to bottlenecks and shortages. All government price and wage control, or even "monitoring", is merely an attempt by the politicians to shift the blame for inflation on to producers and sellers instead of their own monetary policies.
5. Prolonged inflation never "stimulates" the economy. On the contrary, it unbalances, disrupts, and misdirects production and employment. Unemployment is mainly caused by excessive wage rates in some industries, brought about either by extortionate union demands, by minimum wage laws (which keep teenagers and the unskilled out of jobs), or by prolonged and over-generous unemployment insurance.
6. To avoid irreparable damage, the budget must be balanced at the earliest possible moment, and not in some sweet-by-and-by. Balance must be brought about by slashing reckless spending, and not by increasing a tax burden that is already undermining incentives and production.

Henry Hazlitt in "Freeman" Magazine.

Balance the budget, slash reckless spending, lower the tax burden; these three provide the cure for inflation, says Henry Hazlitt; and most of us will surely agree. But, what are the specifics? How are these to be applied? Congressman Eldon Rudd, Arizona Republican, has sponsored some very specific legislation which, if enacted and then acted upon, might cure this disease that is destroying our standard of living and our national economy. We quote at length from a statement made by Congressman Rudd and entered in the Congressional Record of May 4, 1978, pages E 2370-71:

The American people have known for a long time that inflation is our Nation's No. 1 problem...what do the President and Congress propose to do about it? I am cosponsoring legislation to end Federal deficits and require a balanced budget (H.J. Res. 188)...Interest alone on the Federal Government's current national debt is $55.4 billion a year, the fourth highest item in the entire Federal budget...This annual interest on the national debt costs each and every taxpayer an average of $423.22 per year, which does nothing to pay off the principal that keeps going up as Congress indulges in more and more vote-buying deficit spending....

There are other cures for inflation that the President and Congress must support. Government regulation of business has increased immensely in recent years, imposing a burden on taxpayers who must fund the regulatory agencies, on consumers who must pay higher prices because of production cost increases, and on businessmen who must absorb at least some of the increased costs.

This avalanche of government regulations keeps pouring out of Washington on a daily basis. Studies at the University of Washington in St. Louis have estimated that the cost imposed on the American people by federal regulation totaled at least $65.5 billion in 1976, $79.1 billion in 1977, and is estimated to cost $96.7 billion this year and $102.7 billion in 1979. Again, these government mandated cost increases are generally passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices, and are therefore a principal cause of inflation....

I oppose many of the administration's proposals which will lead to increased federal regulation and control of our lives. These include...a new proposed Consumer Advocacy Agency; involving the federal government in new areas of debtor-creditor regulations and the construction of hospital facilities; expanding the regulatory jurisdiction of such agencies as the Federal Trade Commission, Food and Drug Administration, Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, Environmental Protection Agency, and Occupational Safety and Health Administration. I also oppose the proposed multi-million dollar gun control registration scheme....Medicare, medicaid, the federal food stamp program and other government programs are examples of special programs that have an inflationary impact. Whatever their social merits, these programs which were designed to aid the poor and the elderly have resulted in higher costs for everybody....the federal government must reduce and restrict these programs to the truly needy, to reduce their inflationary impact. I also oppose the recent $227 billion social security tax increase which was the largest and most inflationary single tax increase in our Nation's history.

The federal government should stop trying to redistribute the people's income with every new and enlarged program, especially in the welfare area. These programs are tremendously inflationary, and discourage self-reliance and work which are the cornerstone of our productive enterprise system. Congress must stop transferring employment from the private to the public sectors through increased public employment programs. Legislation such as the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA), the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, and others are creating vast new nonproductive government jobs, and are highly inflationary. The taxes of working Americans pay for these programs, which are often competing with private industry jobs that generate products and taxes....

I believe that inflation can be defeated, if the federal government will adopt these anti-inflationary proposals and not try to avoid or shift the burden for positive action. The President asks the American people and business to assume their own responsibility by putting a lid on wage and price increases. This is all well and good. But the people are not likely to take this challenge seriously if the federal government does not itself take the lead in fighting inflation. The people cannot be expected to trust the administration's sincerity along these lines if the President's anti-inflation program is only rhetoric. Instilling trust in his anti-inflation intentions can be accomplished by the President quite easily. He must stop trying to sell as "austere" and "lean" a federal budget that provides for 70,000 more federal employees than the previous year's budget, and that contains sizeable increases for most programs and agencies.

The American people have always carried the burden of inflation. They are not responsible for it. It is up to the President, Congress, and other government leaders to end inflation through action such as I have recommended and supported. (End of excerpts from statement by Congressman Eldon Rudd).

There is one fact which neither Rep. Rudd nor any other person in government employ is likely to admit. That is: There are those in high places who are promoting inflation because it works to their advantage! There are those who seek to establish "equality" on a global scale. If this is to be accomplished, then the standard of living of the people of the United States and of other Western Nations must be lowered to be made "equal" to the standard of living suffered by people in Asia, Africa and the rest of the Third World. Inflation on a worldwide scale is undoubtedly the greatest "equalizer" known to man. Then there are those who promote inflation because they are adept at making a profit from the inflationary spiral. A pertinent example of this is provided by the Big Bankers of New York City. We are told that the U.S. Senate currently is considering the Administration's foreign aid request, which amounts to nearly $8.5 billion. Of this amount exactly $3,504,597,919.00 is to be divided between the International Finance Corporation, the Asian Development Bank, the African Development Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and the mammoth International Finance Corporation. Our favorite financial adviser explains: this money is taken from the taxpayer, is paid out by the U.S. Treasury to these International Banks, where it is then doled out in low-interest loans to Third World Dictators who then can repay their high-interest debts to the Big Bankers. Of course, every single dollar of this circulating money is inflationary; we, the people lose; but the Money Barons make millions at our expense!

Does this help to explain why the controlled media would have us believe that "inflation--like money--is a great mystery and we must take it for "gospel" that the only way to whip it is to support Jimmy Carter's programs." And the media knows that "you can fool most of the people most of the time"....

Year Twenty-Five.....Number Twenty.....May 19, 1978

TOWARD UNILATERAL DISARMAMENT

The speed with which the Communists began to take over country after country since the United States Senate gave away the Canal in Panama might make one believe that this was a signal, a green light telling the Communists that the road was clear for continued conquest, and that we would not interfere. Two weeks after the Canal giveaway Communists staged a bloodbath in Afghanistan. Ten thousand people were reported to have been killed, President Daoud murdered, his supporters rounded up and executed by firing squad. Said the London Daily Telegraph: "As the first fully-fledged Communist state in this part of Asia was being born, there was hectic coming and going outside the Russian Embassy.... The Russians were the first to recognize the new regime, Cuba soon following. By all accounts, the Kremlin had notched up its second major geopolitical victory this year after the resounding success of its policy in the Horn of Africa, again leaving the hapless and helpless Americans with their mouths gaping.... Mr. Taraki, a veteran Communist and underground leader was named head of state"

Shortly after taking over Afghanistan, Ethiopian troops assisted by Cubans and supplied and led by Russians, began a full-scale attack on Eritrea, a step necessary to cement total control of the Horn of Africa. Next, it was reported that Cuban troops were operating in South Yemen. The wire services stated in part that "about 500 to 600 Cubans... are among more than 1,000 foreign Communists, including Russians and East Germans, who are serving in the Marxist nation. South Yemen is near Western shipping lanes to the Red Sea and the Suez Canal.... The State Department has said Cuba has between 38,000 and 39,000 military personnel and 6,000 civilians throughout Africa.

Next on the agenda was Zaire. Communist backed rebels swarmed out of Angola to take control of that country's rich copper mining area in Shaba, formerly known as Katanga when a part of the Belgian Congo.

Meanwhile, from yet another part of the world came news of heavy Communist infiltration into United Nations establishments. The London Telegraph reported that "the defection of Arkady Shevchenko from his powerful post as Under Secretary General at the United Nations in New York stands revealed as a disaster for Russian intelligence. He is believed to be on the point of opening up a treasure house of Russian intelligence and policy secrets to the West in exchange for sanctuary." This "revelation" by Shevchenko well may have been thwarted, since shortly after this article appeared, his wife committed "suicide" in Russia. It could be surmised that other members of his family might also "commit suicide" if Shevchenko talked too freely. However, the London newspaper did publish the following additional information:

In New York there are about 700 Russian officials and of these nearly 200 are members of the KGB or GRU, which deal with military intelligence. In Paris where UNESCO headquarters is based, there is a particularly strong KGB presence. The Russians are involved from two directions. Firstly, there is the permanent delegation of 21 officials, and secondly there are 69 who work as international civil servants. 30 per cent of the officials and the delegation are entered in the card index of the French Secret Service as Russian agents. In Vienna there are two important UN organizations: the International Atomic Energy Agency and the International Development Organization. About 110 Russians are posted to the Soviet Mission to the United Nations and are employed in the agencies. Of these some 40 are either full members of the KGB or officials co-opted to help the spies.

Considering all of the foregoing, it would seem that we can arrive at but one conclusion: While the United States Government is playing at detente and promoting unilateral disarmament, the Communists are engaging in a form of full scale war, using Cuban surrogates on the battlefields and KGB agents in the diplomatic engagements. Aiding and abetting them in the armaments race is one Trilateralist-on-leave named Paul Warnke, a long-time crusader for unilateral disarmament on the part of the United States. Warnke was selected by the Trilateralist-trained Jimmy Carter to head the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT). Carter said he had complete confidence in Warnke, said "he took the job at my insistence," and "his views are well considered by me. I have accepted them. I believe Mr. Warnke's proposals are sound." Lest it be forgotten: Warnke opposed the development of the B-1 bomber, the trident submarine and more missile accuracy. In the 1975 spring issue of Foreign Policy, a CFR-sponsored publication, Warnke wrote: "As its only superpower model, our words and our actions are admirably calculated to inspire the Soviet Union to spend its substance on military manpower and weaponry... We should, instead, try a policy of restraint, while calling for matching restraint from the Soviet Union." It is now obvious that this restraint became unilateral restraint; we quit building and developing, while the Soviet Union continued to build and develop until they had caught up with us, and now have surpassed us.

As for the SALT negotiations, Warnke says they are about to be completed. Columnist John P. Roche made an interesting comment in the Baltimore News-American of May 1st. He wrote, in part: "there are some basic considerations that provide perspective on the issues. The first and most important is the difference in premises between Washington and Moscow. We want a treaty to minimize the risk of nuclear war; the Soviets want a treaty to minimize the risk of our winning a nuclear war. They can be the most forthcoming negotiators in history when, as in 1972, they agreed to cut back ballistic missile defense systems---where we had at least a five-year technological headstart. They will, I'm sure, be glad to freeze development on hunter-killer satellites; theirs are operational, ours are on the drawing board. When they spot a major area of U.S. vulnerability, they move firmly to capitalize upon it."

In plainer language: the Communists can be trusted to keep the terms of any treaty so long as it is to their advantage to do so.

All of this evidence of Russian advances and American retreats becomes gravely important because a UN Special Session on Disarmament is to begin on May 23, and continue through June 28, 1978. At any other time under almost any other President, a special UN session on disarmament wouldn't mean much to the United States. But President Jimmy Carter has made it very clear that he intends to build up the UN, make it just as powerful and just as important in international affairs as he possibly can; this even when the Third World Powers are ruling it and the Soviet Union is controlling it. Remember, Jimmy Carter went out of his way to sign a couple of UN human rights treaties and thus give the UN the right to abolish private property rights for individuals and groups (fortunately, these treaties do not become effective until they are ratified by the United States Senate). Said one commentator: "There is no doubt but that these treaties are being used as the groundwork for world government through the United Nations."

With Communists taking over country after country, with KGB agents installed in strategic spots in the UN, with unilateral disarmament proponent Warnke about to unveil his new SALT arrangements, and with Carter promoting the UN in every way possible, the potential results of a Disarmament Session at the United Nations can be of paramount importance to the security of the United States and to its citizens.

It must be noted that the proponents of unilateral disarmament have been preparing for this special session for more than four years. In the March 1978 issue of the UN Chronicle, we read that: "The Preparatory Committee for the Special Session of the General Assembly Devoted to Disarmament...continued advance work for the special session to be held from 23 May to 28 June...At the beginning of the session, the Committee adopted formally a decision it had taken in principal last year that the four main elements of the principal session documents should be: an introduction or preamble; a declaration on disarmament; a programme of action on disarmament; and machinery for disarmament negotiations."

An interesting sidelight on this Preparatory Committee; One of its five members was Arkady Shevcjenko, former UN Under Secretary General for Political and General Assembly Affairs, but now a political refugee in the United States. Whether his defection had anything to do with preparations for the disarmament session is not known.

As we said, the One Worlders have been preparing for this UN Session for a number of years. Deserving special mention in this connection are such organizations as the World Without War Council, the Unitarian Universalists, the Consortium on Peace Research, Education and Development (COPRED), the International Peace Research Association, the World Council for Curriculum and Instruction, American Friends Service Committee, American Lutheran Church, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Fellowship of Reconciliation, World Federalist Association, Institute for World Order, War Resistor's League, and many more.

Especially important has been the work of the well-financed Institute for World Order which, among other activities, published a propaganda series entitled: Ways and Means of Teaching about World Order. This is a "service to teachers provided jointly by the Consortium on Peace Research, Education and Development and the Transnational Academic Program of the Institute for World Order." Under the pen of Betty Reardon, this Institute has published a series on "Teaching About The Arms Race," a thinly disguised set of instructions on how teachers should teach their students how to campaign for unilateral disarmament. The February 1978 paper began: "This is the first of two special issues of Ways and Means distributed to help educators to prepare their students to understand the significance of the UN Special Session on Disarmament. This session is the result of long and arduous work of many persons and groups committed to the urgent task of reversing the arms race. The Special Session recognizes the imperative of disarmament. The need is evident, but the means to achieve the goal are not yet clear. Educators, therefore, must help students to understand the nature of the present world political system which has given rise to the arms race.... To understand the problem is to begin to solve it."

That favorite strategy of the One Worlders, the Hegelian Dialectic, is used to promote unilateral disarmament. It might be stated like this: Thesis, U.S. arms superiority; Antithesis, the opposing military power of the U.S.S.R... Synthesis; Unilateral Disarmament (as the only alternative to total world destruction). Here is the way Betty Reardon develops the theme:

"Since World War II, world peace had depended largely on the actions of two competing superpowers--the United States and the Soviet Union...a kind of bipolar war-prevention system was developing.... In theory, if a bipolar system is to prevent a world war, each superpower must be strong enough so that neither will attack the other...(But) how effectively can violence be eliminated and wars prevented in a bipolar world?"

Then we come to the "inevitable" conclusion: Since it is impossible for us to force the USSR to disarm we must set the pattern by ourselves disarming and trusting the Communists to do the same.

To bring this about, the more militant War Resisters League has a program of action which has already begun. We quote from a bulletin issued from the War Resisters League headquarters at 339 Lafayette St., N.Y.C.:

April 28-29. National Action at Rocky Flats, Colorado. Plutonium triggers for hydrogen bombs are made at Rocky Flats. This is a nuclear center which plays an essential role in the arms race.....

April 30-May 1. National Action at Barnwell, South Carolina...The Barnwell plant is a crucial link in the nuclear power and nuclear weapons chain....

May 21. Survival Festival to End the Arms Race in Hollywood Bowl, California. Two days before the Special (UN) Session opens, Los Angeles will be having a Hollywood Bowl 'Festival' to support the Special Session and demand an end to the arms race.....

May 22. Mass Civil Disobedience at Trident Base at Bangor, Washington. The Trident submarine--one of them--carries enough nuclear warheads to destroy the entire Soviet Union.....

May 22. Support Demonstration by Trident Conversion Campaign at Groton, Connecticut. This will be an East Coast link to the major West Coast action.

May 27. Mass Rally in San Francisco. While people from the Midwest, South and East gather in New York City, thousands will be gathering in San Francisco on May 27, for a march from Union Square to the United Nations Plaza, where the UN was founded....

May 27. Mass Demonstration at the United Nations. On May 27th there will be rallies throughout the world to support the Special Session and call on every nation to begin concrete moves toward disarmament.....

June 12; Civil Disobedience at the U.S. Mission to the United Nations. WRL has initiated the June 12th action as a part of a long term campaign--a follow-up of the May 27th rally.... Our desperation over the lack of substantial progress toward disarmament leads us to challenge the government and dramatize the shortcomings of present U.S. policy...The stakes are too high, the situation too urgent to be satisfied with promises. Patience wears thin as the nuclear threat to our very survival increases..." (unquote)

ON ALIENATING FRIENDS AND BEFRIENDING ENEMIES

In the May 16th issue of the Los Angeles Herald Examiner two items appeared in a column dealing with world events. The first was datelined Tokyo and read: "China has ordered accelerated combat training for its armed forces because war with the Soviet Union 'will inevitably break out some day', the official Chinese news agency Hsinhua reported. In a dispatch received here, Hsinhua said the military commission of the Chinese Communist Party has decreed intensified anti-tank, anti-aircraft and anti-paratroop training." The second item was datelined Washington and said: "President Carter's security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, leaves this week for a three-day visit to Peking at a time of heightened concern in the United States and China over Soviet strategic objectives. The implications of expanded Soviet influence in Africa and the Soviet arms buildup in Eastern Europe are expected to be major topics in Brzezinski's discussions with Chinese leaders...."

The juxtaposition of these two items may be meaningless; but history does remind us that when the economic collapse of a great nation, or a group of allied nations is imminent, war is often the remedy prescribed to cure the 'malady.' Let's note some other coincidental but interconnected events.

Newsweek of May 29 reported: "Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko, who was to have visited Washington for high-level talks last weekend, had to postpone the trip in deference to Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's national security adviser. Before leaving for China last week, Brzezinski insisted on his right to attend the meetings at which Gromyko and Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance--and probably Carter as well--would be discussing disarmament and other key matters. So Gromyko's visit was put off until this weekend, when Zbig will have returned."

Next incident of extreme importance: May 20 was the date of the inauguration of Chiang Ching-kuo and Shieh Tung-min as President and Vice-President of the Republic of China on Taiwan. Chiang is the elder son of the late Chiang Kai-shek and Shieh is a native of Taiwan. Last year the Republic of China on Taiwan recorded an economic growth of over 8%, inflation was less than 6%, and unemployment a little over 2%. ROC's trade with the United States is about $6 billion per year and American investment in Taiwan is over $500 million. In Taiwan there is no human rights problem, there is a free enterprise economy, and a representative republican form of government exists. As a paid advertisement in Time Magazine states: "President C.K. Chiang views the Republic of China's alliance and partnership with the United States as the cornerstone of peace in the Taiwan Straits and East Asia. He has visited the United States five times and is acquainted with many of America's leaders."

The Republic of China has been a faithful ally and staunch friend of the United States for half a century, ever since the late Chiang Kai-shek became President of Nationalist China. And yet --

On May 20, ROC's Inauguration Day, no American official was sent to Taiwan to witness the ceremony or otherwise represent the United States. Adding insult to injury, Zbigniew Brzezinski chose May 20 as the day he should arrive in Peking to pay respect to the leaders of the Communist People's Republic of China. Said the New York Times: "...the (Red) Chinese were pleased that Mr. Brzezinski chose to arrive on May 20...The Americans said the timing was an accident but in China, where everything is planned from the top it seemed a conscious snub. The Nationalists thought so too, and were outraged".

Another cause for justified outrage was occasioned by the members of a congressional delegation that had visited Red China last January. Six of the ten members of the delegation "called for the United States to cut formal ties with Taiwan and extend diplomatic recognition to Peking this year, according to UPI. Alan Cranston, long-time one-worlder, was spokesman for the group, said in part: "With the consolidation of the new leadership...and the apparent entry of the People's Republic of China into a pragmatic cycle, the majority of the (congressional) delegation believes there is substantial risk to the national interest of the United States if the United States does not establish full diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China as expeditiously as possible." Brzezinski echoed this sentiment by saying, "President Carter desires friendly relations with a strong China and is determined to join you (Red China) in overcoming the remaining obstacles in the way of full normalization of our relations." And it may have been more than a bad joke when, standing at the foot of the Great Wall of China, Brzezinski said to his hosts that "the last one to the top would oppose the Russians in Ethiopia." The New York Times added that "the comment was typical of the anti-Soviet banter the President's adviser tossed at the Chinese. At the farewell dinner, Mr. Brzezinski said the theme that emerged most clearly in his discussions with the Chinese leaders was that 'our shared views outweigh our differences'."

Those 'differences' have to do with America's fulfilling the terms of the 1972 Shanghai Communiqué which was executed by Henry Kissinger. Very little has been said or written about this document, but it was the beginning of the sell-out and betrayal of our friends and allies, the citizens of the Republic of China on Taiwan. Here is what the Shanghai Communiqué said about Taiwan:

"The Chinese side reaffirmed its position: The Taiwan question is the crucial question obstructing the normalization of relations between China and the United States; the government of the Peoples Republic of China is the sole legal government of China; Taiwan is a province of China...The liberation of Taiwan is China's internal affair...The Chinese government firmly opposes any activities which aim at the creation of 'one China, one Taiwan,' 'one China, two governments,' 'two Chinas,' and 'Independent Taiwan,' or advocated that 'the status of Taiwan remains to be determined.'

"The U.S. side declared: The United States acknowledges that all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain that there is but one China and that Taiwan is part of China. The United States government does not challenge that position. It reaffirms its interest in a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question by the Chinese themselves. With this prospect in mind, it affirms the ultimate objective of the withdrawal of all U.S. forces and military installations from Taiwan. In the meantime, it will progressively reduce its forces on Taiwan as the tension in the area diminishes." (End of quote).

So, what Kissinger began, Brzezinski intends to finish. In the interest of the New World Order we will have betrayed millions of people whose chief 'sins' were a dedication to liberty and faith in the United States of America. But, it seems there was even more to this than the betrayal of Taiwan. Because Brzezinski took another cue from Kissinger in the use of 'silent diplomacy.' The former director of the Trilateral Commission went to Peking with a large staff of aides and assistants—but no reporters. All we actually know of what Brzezinski may have promised the government of Red China is what he has told the media, or what has been revealed by the Communists. After completing the very secret mission in Peking, Brzezinski then went to Tokyo where he conferred with the Prime Minister of Japan. Again, no reporters were present. What was said or arranged was not revealed publicly. Then he went to South Korea, conferred secretly with the leaders of that nation; and, again there were no reporters and no formal statement on what actually transpired.

Meanwhile, here in our nation's capitol and at the United Nations headquarters in New York City, strange but interlocking events were occurring. First, the morning metropolitan dailies of May 25th reported that "The House voted overwhelmingly yesterday to withdraw American ground troops from South Korea." In the same edition there was also the report that "Vice President Walter Mondale told the United Nations yesterday the Soviet Union is building up its nuclear threat against Western Europe even as Moscow and Washington stand on the verge of an historic agreement to limit strategic weapons. Mondale, standing in for President Carter, addressed the largest world disarmament conference." James Reston, one of the several Voices of the Council on Foreign Relations associated with the New-York Times, explained some of the unusual events that seemed to be working at cross purposes. He wrote in part:

"Every year the leaders of the nations gather here (UN) to deplore the spectacular rise in the worldwide expenditure on military weapons...for the next five weeks, the United Nations will be holding a special disarmament session...But at the last minute, after the President of France, the Chancellor of West Germany, and the Prime Minister of Britain, among others, had agreed to address the conference, Carter pulled out and assigned his role to Vice President Mondale. So there is a lot of talk here in the delegation about 'the absent host.' Why did the President, who has talked so much about disarmament and about the United Nations as the hope of a better political and moral order in the world, decide to stay away from a meeting he had urged other world leaders to attend?...By some accident or blunder of planning, a meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) was called in Washington this month at precisely the same time as the UN disarmament conference. The NATO allies want to be assured that Carter is going to maintain and even increase Washington's military defense of Western Europe. They are worried by his hesitation to proceed with the deployment of the neutron artillery weapons.... This was a dilemma for Carter. He couldn't make a credible speech to NATO on increasing arms in Europe and at the same time make a credible appeal for reducing arms here at the UN. So he tossed the problem to the vice president....Carter had another problem....The most important military question is a Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT II) with Moscow.... But the Senate, after the bruising battles with Carter over the Panama Canal treaties and the shipment of modern planes to Saudi Arabia and Egypt as well as Israel, is not in a very receptive mood for compromising with the Soviets, particularly after the Soviet aggression with the Cubans in Africa...(So) he chose to leave the (UN disarmament conference) opening to Mondale while he dealt with the NATO allies." (End of quotes from Reston column).

In the foregoing a very large amount of hanky-panky seems obvious. Whatever else may be said of Jimmy Carter, he is not a fool. If he were, he would not have been selected by David Rockefeller to represent Trilateralist interests in the White House, nor would he have been specially trained by such men as Zbigniew Brzezinski in the art of foreign relations. Nor are the men who surround him fools or simpletons. His foreign policy advisers are former Trilateralists, most of them have the double or triple distinction of being members of the exclusive Council on Foreign Relations, or of the Bilderberg Group, or both. Therefore, James Reston's statement that the UN disarmament conference and the NATO meeting were scheduled to be held at precisely the same time is "an accident or blunder of planning" is ridiculous and unbelievable. It is far more reasonable to assume that the meetings were planned that way--deliberately and for a purpose. There are those among the "elitists" who believe that this is one way to keep the masses confused and perplexed: to keep them filled with the hope of peace and security on the one hand, and fill them with the fear of war and annihilation on the other; then they'll not know which way to jump; so they won't jump!

But something of deeper significance seems indicated by the fact that Carter avoided the disarmament conference and attended the NATO meeting instead. Even as Brzezinski had indicated, the time for a change in policy had come. Now our government was going to be "angry with Russia and friendly toward Red China." The massacre in Zaire had provided sufficient reason and people all over the free world were demanding that something be done about the Russian financed and Cuban directed atrocities among the blacks of Africa.

Brzezinski had set the tone with his anti-Russian remarks in Red China, by his praise of the new Communist regime in Peking, by the nice things he said about Japan, and his promise of support for Korea. The media had also been helpful in setting the scene. Typical is an AP dispatch from Johannesburg:

"The massacre of whites in Africa has churned up old fears...The tiger of violence is loose in Africa...Headlines in the region's newspapers the last week have sent shudders of apprehension through many of South Africa's 4.4 million whites. For some it strengthened their resolve against easing white control over the 18 million blacks in South Africa and against turning over South-West Africa, also called Namibia, to the guerrilla-backed militants. In Rhodesia, the Zaire bloodbath...will strengthen the determination of Rhodesians of all races to see that the forces of law and order are maintained in a state of disciplined efficiency...Western intelligence sources say there are already signs that Cubans are training black guerrillas in Zambia, Angola and Mozambique and the Soviet Union is increasing the amount and sophistication of weapons given to southern African guerrilla movements." (unquote).

Thus was the stage set for introduction of the new foreign policy which reads: "Be Angry With Soviet Russia and Friendly Toward Red China." So, instead of going to New York City and the UN disarmament conference, Carter went to Chicago and a Party fund-raising dinner. There he said that Soviet Russia's disregard of the terms of the Helsinki Agreement and the continued aggression in Africa could "adversely affect efforts for a new strategic arms limitation treaty." Carter made it very clear that his chief concern still was SALT, and that he had "no intention of sending American forces to Africa." But he still viewed with disfavor the actions of Russia, Cuba and East Germany in stirring up the natives in Black Africa. Also, there was a second arrow in Carter's sling: Carter wants more power. He is being hampered by the Congress. The present situation in Africa is hand-made for this purpose, provides an excellent excuse for crying that his hands are tied, that he needs more power, that Congress must surrender to him all power in matters of foreign policy. This is necessary if Carter is to do the will of the Trilateral Commission, for he is their servant, and their aim is to establish the New World Order. Therefore outweighing any stated policy toward Russia or China or any other part of the world is the command to "do the will of the Trilateral Commission."

TO ARM, OR TO DISARM AND SURRENDER?

We are living in an age of paradoxes, and one of the greatest of these has to do with national defense. Consider these seeming incongruities: At the United Nations civil rights agitator Andrew Young, actor Paul Newman, and some others of questionable ability as diplomats and integrity as officials, are representing the United States in a world disarmament conference that is allegedly dominated by that non-aligned bloc of nations usually referred to as the Third World. At the same time, unilateral disarmament proponent Paul Warnke and his Trilateralist oriented staff are engaged in negotiating a new strategic arms limitation treaty with the Soviets--a treaty that will be no more honored than the existing treaty which has been broken repeatedly. While these things are transpiring, President Jimmy Carter is condemning Cuba and the Soviet Union for engaging in wars in Africa, is agreeing that a hundred billion dollars must be spent for more arms for NATO defense against the threat of attack by Warsaw Pact Satellites. At the same time, Zbigniew Brzezinski is currying favor with the Chinese Communists and telling them how naughty it is for the Soviets to violate the spirit of detente. Meanwhile, Jimmy Carter is gloating over the fact that he was able to persuade the Congress to give warplanes to Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia all at one and the same time on the assumption that the best way to preserve peace is to make it possible for nations to be able to destroy each other--peace through power! Presently Carter and Congress are deadlocked on the proposition of supplying arms to Turkey.

Meanwhile--and this may be the most dangerous part of the paradox syndrome: While Carter is condemning the Communists for sending men and arms to Africa, he is quoted as saying that it may be necessary to aid the beleaguered little nations of Black Africa by sending them some American advisers. And the men and women of draft age are saying, "Here it is again, just like Vietnam. Only this time they can invoke the draft if they want to, but we ain't goin'."

In regard to this latter rumor, inspired by Jody Powell, it may be mere coincidence that Senator Proxmire says he fears "The military's all-volunteer force cannot survive unless the barriers are removed to bring more women into the military." At the same time, perhaps equally coincidentally, U.S. News & World Report of June 5 carried a cover story about women in uniform, asking, "Can They Save The Military?" The article said: "What has made the Pentagon a late-coming supporter of the feminist movement is a manpower squeeze that raises questions about the viability of all-volunteer services in the decades ahead. Because of a sharply declining U.S. birth rate in the 1960s, the number of 18-year-old men--the main target of military recruiters--will drop steadily until roughly 1990."

Yet another alarming sign of the times is the evidence of recurring Zionist political power in the United States and throughout the Western World. A new International Zionist organization has been formed for the purpose of hunting down former Nazis who allegedly "murdered Jews" during World War II. A new victim has been discovered and his American citizenship revoked by a Judge Hoffman. The victim now faces probable extradition and execution in Israel. Yet another alleged perpetrator of "the holocaust" has been discovered in South America and he probably faces a similar fate. Those who insist that Zionism is the central part of the overall conspiracy point to the fact that President Carter has placed on his staff, not only an abundance of Trilateral Commissioners, but also many so-called Jews. They identify some 46 "Jews who are formulating the policies of President Carter's administration," among them, domestic policy Commissar Stuart Eizenstat, Treasury Secretary Blumenthal, Defense Secretary Brown, Energy Czar Schlesinger, Foreign Trade Negotiator Strauss, Paul Warnke's assistant Adam Yarmolinsky, etc.

In any case, in New York City, leaders talk about disarmament, while in Washington they talk about strengthening the military--with the constant overtone that the United States could become involved, at least indirectly, in war in Europe, in the Middle East, in Africa, or even directly with the Soviet Union!

At first glance, it would seem that our leaders are working at cross purposes; talking war on the one hand and disarmament on the other. However, if carefully handled by the opinion-molders, these two apparent opposites can be made to work toward an identical goal: Convergence with the Soviet Union and eventual World Government! While we are being led to believe that there is conflict, even the possibility of another World War, the real strategy has to do with scaring us into accepting Total Interdependence--as is evidenced by the buildup of NATO and the simultaneous downgrading of the American National Defense system.

As British Lt. Cmdr. M. Baillie-Grohman pointed out: "For the New World Order to be imposed, the world must cease to be nationalistic and must be organized into federal zones while the countries themselves are regionalized so that none is too strong individually to resist the System: we see this now happening in the UK, USA, and Canada. The individual federations can later be amalgamated into a single whole, perhaps under a Soviet 'threat', and without too much trouble. The three zones covered by the Trilateral Commission initially are the Americas, Europe (hopefully including Eastern Europe!) and Japan into whose zone comes Australia and Oceania.... The plan involves the manipulation of the global money supply, the control of all raw materials, the ability to interdict shipping and the ability to oversee the whole world with satellites as the weapons in hand. No corner of the earth will provide a haven and no nation will be able to resist without facing slumps, and starvation. In the name of peace, general disarmament will take place and... a special Peace Corps will be set up which will be armed with coercive force of overwhelming power..."

In such a setup, control of individuals probably would be accomplished through use of the weapons spoken of years ago by the Fabian Socialist philosopher and brainwashing proponent, Lord Bertrand Russell: "Diet, injections and injunctions will combine from a very early age to produce the sort of characteristics and the sort of beliefs that the authorities consider desirable and any serious criticism of the powers that will be, will become psychologically impossible. Gradually, by selective breeding (or cloning--Ed), the congenital differences between rulers and ruled will increase until they become as an organized insurrection of sheep against the practice of eating mutton."

Since Lord Russell's day, however, new weapons have been added, and children are being 'conditioned' for the New World Order through the government controlled national school system. An article came to our attention recently, one that explains this conditioning system. We quote at length from the article which was written by Margaret Nestich, of Phoenix, Arizona:

"Brainwashing is known to take place in the confines of prisons in communist countries. A deliberate and calculated deceit for the purpose of directing, controlling and shaping the minds of unsuspecting victims can be camouflaged and peddled under the shield of acceptable existing principles of Christian beliefs.

If so disguised, deceit is successful in orienting or re-orienting educators, philosophers, policy-makers and leaders; the outlook of the entire nation or society can be slowly but surely changed. A nation oriented toward God thus can become re-oriented toward man.

"Many of the ills found in today's society are directly traceable to the debilitating influences of Hedonism and Humanism. These philosophies are abundantly evidenced in the long-held progressive educational philosophies of over-permissive non-discipline. These are the philosophies which are directly responsible for developing individuals who are self-centered, non-goal oriented, and anti-laws, anti-order, and anti-generally-accepted social mores and customs.

"To indoctrinate the young, our educational system has adopted such Humanist theories as: Value Changing, Values Clarification, Self-Actualizing, Morals Education, Human Development Programs, Situational Ethics, Ethics by Evaluation--all from a nebulous undefined position - by man - void of God. The process of sensitizing a child involves three steps: Unfreezing his values and standards, Changing by giving him different standards, and Re-Freezing to lock the child into the new self. After re-freezing is accomplished, it is impossible for the child to communicate with the conventional person, including his parents. He operates on a different wave length...he will use the same words he formerly used, but the meanings of these words will be entirely different from their meaning as understood by his parents.

"The theory of Humanism evolved from the fact that our planet earth could not find permanent solutions to world peace through the existing order. The propagation of humanism became an instrument in the hands of those desirous of permanent and absolute power. Nihilism, fascism, nazi-ism, communism and socialism are but different names for underlying goal: WORLD CONQUEST!

There arise in this writer's mind some unanswered questions: Is universal dictatorship by the fallacious mind of man the answer to world peace? This universal dictatorship will be run by whom? By a great Humanist who will force the people to behave? Or by a group of wise humanists (such as the Gestapo or the NKVD)? Or, maybe once we are properly brainwashed the natural instincts of man for individual freedom (which is God given) will be erased from the human soul - by the all powerful man? I really wonder.

"The propagandized word is "CHANGE". (How often have you heard, 'Times are changing?'). Are you ready to give up your God-given Freedom? Are you too busy to preserve your own liberty? The Humanists are not too busy to bother with you!

"Wake up America! Our very existence is at stake!"

(Margaret Nestich, 3739 E. Palm Lane, Phoenix AZ 85008).

At this particular time in history, the One Worlders' propaganda pitch has to do with disarmament--unilateral disarmament. Rep. Larry McDonald notes that "The special (UN) session on disarmament comes at a time when the United States...and the Soviet Union are apparently in the final stages of concluding another strategic arms limitation agreement. Therefore, it was logical for the Soviet Union to organize an international pressure campaign aimed at getting the United States to make the maximum SALT II nuclear concessions and to take further steps unilaterally for disarmament while the Soviet Union wages war by proxy with Cuban forces for control of Africa and carried out cold wars of subversion against the non-Communist countries throughout the world. Obviously, one of the main ways to influence the leaders of democratic countries ~~is~~ to manipulate public opinion so as to create an illusion of popular demand for an immediate disarmament agreement no matter how dangerous to the Free World's interests are its provisions. The Soviet Union and what it terms the 'world Communist movement' have developed over the past four decades an effective and complex network for manipulating public opinion in the non-communist countries."

Among the Communist-controlled or influenced organizations promoting this unilateral disarmament drive are the World Peace Council, the World Federation of Trade Unions, the Women's International Democratic Federation, the World Federation of Democratic Youth, the International Association of Democratic Lawyers, and the American-based Mobilization For Survival, U.S. Peace Council, National Council for Soviet-American Friendship, Clergy and Laity Concerned, Women's International League For Peace And Freedom, Women Strike for Peace, Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy....these are just a few of them.

But it should be borne in mind that unilateral disarmament on the part of the United States is not an idea exclusive with the Communists. There are those who actually believe that if the United States leads the way in disarming, then the Soviet Union will follow suit and also start to disarm. The gullible in this respect are almost as dangerous as the dedicated Communists. However, the drive for disarmament is a part of the plot of those elitists who want to rule the world. Disarmed individuals are at the mercy of dictators and tyrants, and disarmed nations are at the mercy of international dictators and tyrants, which is exactly what the elitists hope to become.

Behind the Communist organizations, behind the idealistic utopians and behind the gullible are those organizations that like to label themselves as think-tanks. The Council on Foreign Relations, The Trilateralist Commission, the Bilderberg Group, the Brookings Institute, the United World Federalists, the Atlantic Union, the Royal Institute of International Affairs, the various World Affairs Councils--these are the promoters of disarmament and interdependence. And, as one eminent European authority points out:

"It is noteworthy that the members of all of these think-tanks do not consist of one political power-seeking ideology but, on the contrary, embrace them all. Amongst them are Communists, Tories, liberals, and all shades of labourites; some of them with opposing political 'beliefs' occupy similar positions... They all work together in the pursuit of power. Nor does religion form any barrier between them and, as we are seeing the ecumenicalism of Christianity and the blurring of the differences between creeds and, some would say, the Communization of religions, so we see the accommodation of all differences and ideologies in the pursuit of a stateless, soulless, secular and universal political order."

"Whether this order will be collectivist or corporate will matter not at all to the majority, for both names speak the same language of power and the people of all the world will find themselves enmeshed inextricably in a bureaucratic dictatorship more persuasive, more powerful, more ruthless and more evil than anything hitherto experienced by mankind.... The prison walls now being built will, if we allow them to be finished, scarcely be overthrown by any earthborn power. The control will be complete... peace will have come at last. But this is not the peace spoken of by the Founding Fathers, and it certainly is not the kind of peace promised His own by the Prince of Peace.

REVOLT OF THE TAXPAYERS

With the passage by a 63-37% margin of California's Proposition 13, even the controlled news media now must admit that there really is a tax revolt. The first major threat to bureaucratic dictatorship has made itself manifest. Said our very liberal local morning Post: 'The California referendum represents more than the irritable mood of the nation's largest state—it is, in fact, the leading edge of a political storm of taxpayer revolt. 23 state legislatures have called for a constitutional amendment to ban federal deficits, and moves to limit local government spending are afoot in about half the states. The 23 states' call for a convention to draft an amendment to the Constitution has gone almost unnoticed but more of the 34 states needed to convene such a meeting are expected to join the parade this year or next. The effort to curtail taxes or spending varies from state to state. Tennessee voted in March to limit the growth in state spending, and similar proposals are likely to be on the November ballot in Michigan and Colorado. Other tax or spending control plans may come before the voters of Utah, Idaho and Oregon this year, and such plans are being mapped for other states to consider in 1979.' (Unquote).

The press has also been forced to take notice of a growing revolt on yet another front--what its opponents refer to as "Social In-Security." Donia Mills in the Washington Star reports that Social Security, which includes retirement insurance, disability pensions and public health care for a total of 38.6 million Americans, has a mammoth budget which "accounts for one-fifth of all federal expenditures annually.

"But the system has been flirting with bankruptcy since 1975, when the outflow of benefit payments exceeded the inflow of funds by more than a billion dollars, and the deficit has escalated steadily since. To keep the system afloat, Congress last December approved an emergency measure raising Social Security taxes and effectively tripling the amount of payroll deductions for many workers during the next 10 years... Now, in the wake of public outcry, a battle is raging... At a time when public confidence in the four-decade-program is at an all-time low, a small but feisty number of individuals are pressing for another solution: Do away altogether with Social Security in favor of private pension plans or the old-fashioned savings account. If they can't eliminate the system, these protesters want to bail out of it one by one, rejecting any further involvement with it on either the paying or receiving end.... Officials at the National Taxpayer Union and National Taxpayers Legal Fund, nonprofit organizations which deal with such issues, believe that there are 'plenty of constitutional arguments' on the side of the Social Security dropouts..."

While "The powers in high places are forced to admit that there is a property tax revolt and a Social Security tax revolt, they try to deny that there is also a mammoth revolt against the Income Tax itself, and the Internal Revenue Service. So, of course, little or no public notice was given to the fact that Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina is the author of a Taxpayers' Bill of Rights, a bill which could become a law:--

On April 17 Senator Helms introduced S.2929, telling his colleagues in part: "Mr. President, tonight at midnight is the deadline for the American people to file their individual Federal income tax returns, and I have selected this evening as symbolically appropriate to send to the desk a bill entitled the Taxpayers' Bill of Rights. It is now 3½ months into the year but it will not be for another 3 weeks that Americans will start working for themselves for 1978. All this year up to 3 weeks from now the American taxpayer will have been working to pay his taxes. Thus, 'Tax Freedom' day will be May 6. The Taxpayers' Bill of Rights would extend for the first time to law abiding taxpayers, rights the Supreme Court has said must be given to common street criminals but denied to other citizens".

Under the Helms bill, the IRS would be required to advise the taxpayer that he has a right to an attorney, that he has a right to remain silent and that any statement made by him might be used against him. It would establish that a taxpayer that wins a suit against the IRS be awarded reasonable attorney's fees. "This, said the Senator, "would eliminate the frivolous harassment of the taxpayer by IRS officials." In the wake of the current tax revolt there is a fair chance that Senator Helm's bill could pass.

There also is a fair chance that utter chaos may be "manufactured" in California because of the taxpayers' approval of Proposition 13. Entrenched bureaucrats, appointed administrators and professional politicians will probably cut payrolls unnecessarily, reduce essential services needlessly and perhaps even close schools. When the closing of schools was predicted in Ohio, the citizens said, "Go ahead and close them. We'll open our own." Which is what citizens should be saying--and doing--everywhere.

Which brings up the leading question: Why does Government need so much money to operate these days? We are indebted to Dr. George Benson of the National Education Program for one answer. He referred to a book entitled "Taxation for Prosperity," that was written by a New Dealer named Randolph Paul, then General Counsel for the Treasury, under Secretary Morganthau. Paul wrote: "Why do we have a federal tax system? In answering this question we shall do well to break with tradition and think with open minds. The first item of business is to reject the gospel that taxes are for revenue only. We need to look at taxes in a more positive way as an instrument of social and economic control, wholly apart from the fiscal, making revenue yield only part of the objective -- The point is that taxes may be imposed, wholly apart from their revenue-producing qualities, to achieve desired effects on particular occasions. They then become more than exactions to defray the cost of government; they reach the higher level of operation as instruments of human welfare. On this higher level taxes may be used to express public policy on the distribution of wealth and income.... They may be used to penalize particular industries and economic groups." (unquote).

When President Johnson was leading "The Great Society," he said much the same thing in much simpler language: "We are going to take all the money we think is unnecessarily being spent and take it from the haves and give it to the havenots."

Of course, this business of using tax money for purposes other than to defray the costs of running a government began in earnest under FDR. A Great Depression was arranged, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt was elected to "bring back prosperity." There were WPA, NYA, CCC, PWA, and other welfare agencies, as well as Social Security and the various programs designed for the purpose of redistributing the wealth, in using taxes as a means of rewarding, or punishing companies or groups of people. It was also well understood that the use of tax money could have an important effect on the outcome of elections.

Writing in a different context in his highly recommended Rempant Review, Gary North comments:

"The problem should be seen as one of philosophy, not legislation. What we have created is a national system of supposedly guaranteed living. Children get their benefits--education at state expense--while older people get theirs--retirement at state expense. People in the middle years are expected to pay. They, in turn, are supposedly benefitted by a semi-monopoly, since kids and older people are kept out of the labor force, which increases wages for those inside. It's a crazy-quilt system of redistribution. We simply refuse to allow the free market to operate.... Bureaucracy begins to replace the market in a semi-medieval world of government protection. Everyone wants to know what his privileges are, not the market value of his productivity." (From "Remnant Review." 22 times per year. $60/year. 712 W. Cornwallis Rd., Suite 100, Durham, N.C. 27707).

The preceding is the very definition of Welfare State Socialism: The redistribution of wealth, with the haves being forced to support the havenots. But there will come a time when there are not enough haves making enough money to take care of the havenots. Therefore, something new must be added: Eventually, everything must belong to the people, or to put it more directly, everything must belong to the state, which really means that everything will belong to the Elitist Group which manages the state.

Under such a system individuals are to have no private property, and especially no money of intrinsic value! Computered merits or demerits, or credits and debits in the computer's bank, could replace the dollar when electronic money is installed nationally and finally internationally.

In this connection, in case you are not a subscriber to the L.T. Patterson Letter, we quote from an article which appeared in the Honolulu Star Bulletin of April 14, 1978:

* * * * *

Warnings of double-digit inflation and efforts to destroy the dollar's value

were issued yesterday at the Investment and Economic Conference co-sponsored by the Bank of Hawaii. Wesley Hillendahl, Bankoh vice president and director of business research, said "Inflation is a monetary phenomenon which today is caused exclusively by government, President Carter notwithstanding." Lawrence T. Patterson, head of a financial planning and consulting firm, said: "If we are to survive as a nation, we must have a sound currency. The dollar must not be allowed to collapse."

Hillendahl said the four keys to successful investment are to develop a practical understanding of the conflict between government control and political and economic freedom, to learn to anticipate the location and nature of the crises ahead; to know your skills, assets and limitations; and to maintain flexibility. "At the beginning of the century federal and local taxes took 9% of an individual's income, compared to close to 50% today. It's going to go past 50% in a very short time. Your freedom is 50% gone. They're telling you what to do with half your life."

Patterson was even more pessimistic, predicting that if the Trilateral Commission has its way, paper money will become useless...and the government will force owners of gold and silver to surrender then at a confiscatory price. Much of his speech was devoted to the Trilateral Commission "which fraudulently arranged the election of one of its members, President Carter, through control of the television networks, the wire services, and leading newspapers and magazines." His theme was that Carter intends to debase the dollar and destroy its role as a world reserve currency. In its place will be the Trilateral world currency under Rockefeller control." The reason for the Trilateral "campaign to elect Jimmy Carter is that the Rockefeller name is a political liability."

* * * * *

The tax revolt that is beginning to sweep the country is one of the very important actions to be taken in trying to save the dollar and prevent its total collapse. However, the limiting of direct taxation is not enough. The most vicious tax of all--inflation--would remain. Whenever increasing the tax burden has seemed dangerous or inadvisable, or has been prohibited by means such as Proposition 13, then the government has become accustomed to taking another route: It simply "borrows the money" via the Federal Reserve Corporation. The "money" is created "out of thin air" and paid into the nation's money supply, thus causing inflation. The "borrowed money" never seems to get repaid, but interest on the total national debt is paid each year.

The last "Alert to Patriots" that was published by the late, great patriot, Pedro del Valle, who died last April 28th, called attention to the need to "Repeal the Federal Reserve Act or the Dollar Will Crash!" Here is part of that final Alert, No. 156:

1. FACTS:

a. The American Dollar, Once the monetary standard of the world, is falling in comparison to the currency of many other nations.

b. The Federal Reserve Act of 1913 is a violation of the U.S. Constitution. Congress is given sole control of our money in the Constitution. Since there is no authority in that basic law authorizing any agency of Federal Government to transfer its powers and duties, hence the Federal Reserve Act is ultra vires and unlawful.

c. The Federal Reserve is not a government operation but an agency of international bankers who operate the Federal Reserve to their benefit.

d. Incredible as it seems, the fact is that the U.S. Government prints the Federal Reserve Notes for the Federal Reserve at one cent each bill regardless of their face value. Then the U.S. Government borrows these bills at interest. The yearly interest has risen to $40 billions, all paid from our taxes.....

There have been victories in the tax revolt. Others can be expected. But these do not stand alone. There have been other important victories. During the past week, the following important thing happened:

Clifford Case of New Jersey was one of the 68 Senators who voted to give away the American Canal in Panama. In this week's primary election, he was soundly defeated by an unknown newcomer. This could start a trend. In Illinois, the NOWers and Libbers felt sure of one more ratification for the Equal Rights Amendment. But, this is an election year, and incumbents who want to stay in often have new ideas about voting. So, when the time came to vote on ERA, it was defeated by a narrow margin. Now the action should shift to the U.S. Congress where the move to extend the time limit for ERA ratification is in the works--and must be defeated.

In the House of Representatives an unusual victory was won. Treasury had issued that executive order which would have set up a new Federal gun control law, unless rejected by the Congress within sixty days from the time of its publication in the Federal Register. However, so much pressure was brought to bear that Rex Davis, director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, decided that he'd just resign. At least 20,000 people had written to BATF, protesting the gun registration proposal. Then the House of Representatives decided to cut off the money needed to install the new system; and then came the final blow: the House voted to kill the whole thing!

We're winning battles, but the war goes on -

THE POLICY OF TRILATERAL CONVERGENCE

Perhaps the former Trilateral Commission members of the President's foreign policy team had overplayed their parts. They surely had created the impression that there was great disagreement between Cyrus Vance and Zbigniew Brzezinski, and that both were aghast at Andy Young's defense of the activities of the Russians and Cubans in Africa. U.S. News & World Report called it a "Tug of War Over Foreign Policy" and said that "Contending factions are maneuvering to control the shape of U.S. foreign policy.... On one side: National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski... On the other side: Secretary of State Vance.... Beyond Vance on the 'soft' side: Andrew Young.... In an enigmatic role: Defense Secretary Harold Brown." An editorial comment in the same newsweekly: "To squelch criticism that the administration's foreign policy is in disarray, the White House has sent out word that from now on it will be President Carter and Secretary of State Vance who will make major pronouncements on international matters while National Security Adviser Brzezinski and UN Ambassador Young will lie low."

Echoing the planted rumor that there was disagreement among the elitists that frame America's foreign policy, The London Economist of June 3 1978 featured on its cover a photograph of three men: Jimmy Carter in poor and fuzzy focus, Andy Young in the background, and Zbig Brzezinski in firm and precise focus, his frown sharply defined. Topping the picture was the caption: "Going Brzezinski's Way." The cover story inferred that the real maker of American foreign policy was Brzezinski, not Carter nor Vance.

That President Carter was somewhat befuddled by this alleged disagreement between his aides, and that he was attempting to cater to all of them was the theme of an article written by columnist Mary McGrory. "The Soviets found President Carter's recent Annapolis speech 'strange.' A lot of other people did, too, beginning possibly with the graduating class of 1978 to whom it was ostensibly addressed. The midshipmen must have wondered as they listened to their commander in chief, what is in store for them. This time next year they could be invading Russia; or they could be on a joint U.S.-Soviet patrol on a river in Zaire, dodging bullets from opposing tribes. It could go either way.

"As a prelude the President described the Russians as no goodniks... Still, they must have some good points. Else why would he invite them, several paragraphs later, to join him in Africa on a peace-seeking mission?

"'You and I,' he told the midshipmen, 'leave here today to do our common duty.' He didn't say what it would be. It is possible he doesn't know. All he really did show was that he hasn't yet chosen sides in the civil war raging within his own administration. He is torn between his national security adviser Brzezinski, a 'confrontation' man, and Secretary Vance, who tilts toward 'cooperation.' Carter wanted to be both hawk and dove at Annapolis. But he finally said he was a sitting duck, just waiting for the Soviets to move. He wanted to show the voters he is tough, knows what he is doing. All he said was he doesn't even know what he thinks yet." (unquote)

As we said, perhaps Carter's aides were overplaying their parts. In any case, it seems their elitist bosses, the Trilateral Commissioners, began to take the rumor of 'civil war' seriously; because David Rockefeller's elitist group called a special meeting and 'invited' to attend and to report were Jimmy Carter, Zbig Brzezinski, Cy Vance, Hal Brown, Andy Young, and a few others. Attend they did and if UPI can be believed, they assured the Trilateralists that there was no disagreement whatsoever among them and that they most assuredly were carrying out the policies laid down by their elitist masters. Following are excerpts from the UPI dispatch of June 14:

* * * * *

By Nicholas Daniloff
United Press International

Washington—President Carter and his advisers have told an elite private group that they will press for full diplomatic relations with Peking based on three conditions safeguarding the future of Taiwan, it was learned Tuesday. Administration sources said Carter and his aides made it clear that no deadline has been set for replacing the US-Taiwan relationship with full ties to Peking, but they have decided to speed up negotiations and to ask for specific concessions on the Taiwan issue.

The sources said the three conditions were outlined Monday and Tuesday at a Washington meeting of an influential private study group known as the Trilateral Commission....

The sources said Carter, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, Defense Secretary Harold Brown and other top Administration officials all discussed the emerging US-China policy in their addresses to the current, confidential session of the Trilateral Commission.

Proceedings of the commission—a high-powered group of businessmen, scholars and former government leaders from the United States, Europe and Japan—are off the record, but some participants agreed to discuss the outlines of the administration presentation.... The sources declined to attribute any particular quote to any particular official, nor to disclose which leader discussed which detail of the accelerated negotiation effort. Carter, Vance and Brown are all former members of the Trilateral Commission, which was formed by David Rockefeller as a means of studying and promoting stronger relations among the United States, Europe and Japan. Zbigniew Brzezinski, former executive secretary of the commission and now Carter's national security adviser, was scheduled to address the commission Tuesday, but cancelled because of illness...."

* * * * *

And so it came to pass that the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense and others reported to the Trilateral Commissioners of Western Europe, Japan, Canada and the United States. Zbig did not need to report to the group; he's running the whole show for David. We may assume that all were in agreement as to what the foreign policy of the United States really is; and one part of that policy could be told the public: Taiwan is being sold out. As William Carmichael wrote in the current issue of Spotlight (6/19/78):

"America's two staunchest allies--the Republic of China (Taiwan) and South Korea--are being used as trade bait by the U.S. in a...plot involving a power struggle between the communist superpowers, Red China and the USSR. At stake is control of the Far East for the International banksters.

President Carter and his leftist dominated State Department...are implementing the destruction of America as a world power in much the same way that England was destroyed in the 1930s, with one difference: there won't be a United States to bail us out!"

This matter of "replacing the U.S.-Taiwan relationship with full ties to Peking" is all a part of the present tactic of being rude to the USSR and kind to the PRC. The media have promoted the idea that there is a split between Brzezinski and Vance because the former favors Red China while the latter wants to 'cooperate with' rather than 'confront' the USSR. This alleged disagreement is said to be further compounded because both are displeased with Young's fawning upon the Red-led Black terrorists in Africa. The truth of the matter is that all of this is window dressing for the eyes of the public. Actually, the foreign policy of the United States has been the same for many years through many administrations. If this is to be understood, it must be realized that both Kissinger and Brzezinski were and are agents of the Rockefellers. They are fellow members of the CFR, the TLC, and both are products of the Harvard School of Internationalism. The basic difference between them: Kissinger was born in Germany and poses as a Republican, while Brzezinski was born in Poland and pretends to be a National Democrat. USN&WR of 5/22/78 told part of the story in an article headlined "The Man They Call a Polish Kissinger." We quote;

"When he gets to the office each morning at 6:45 he (Brzezinski) studies the night's reports from the CIA and other intelligence sources. At 8:15 he gives the President a half-hour briefing on what went on while Carter slept. During the week Brzezinski attends dozens of other presidential meetings. . . . daily reads more than 350 pages of memos from the Departments of State and Defense, CIA and his own staff. He compresses these to about 100 pages and sends them to the President. . . . While Kissinger is German and Jewish, Brzezinski is Polish and Catholic. The son of a Polish diplomat, he moved with his parents to Canada. . . . went to McGill University and later to Harvard. . . . taught at Harvard then moved to Columbia. . . . also served as a consultant to the Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon administrations. . . . first contact with Carter came through the Trilateral Commission. . . . views have broadened. . . . He now sees a new global order taking shape that puts more emphasis on the Third World with its markets and raw material resources and its need for the technology of the industrialized nations. New countries are emerging. We no longer just think of Europe and Japan." (unquote).

Note the progression of policy: When Kissinger was in charge he concocted the concept of the Trilateral Constellation. Looking toward the formation of a Regional World Government, he conceived the idea of the world being divided into three equally powerful regions, headed by the United States, the Soviet Union and the Peoples Republic of China. Toward this end, he took President Nixon to Moscow and Peking. But the development of the Trilateral Constellation was halted by two situations. First, Watergate stopped Nixon; and, second, Western Europe and Japan--important industrial areas--became fearful and concerned over Kissinger's catering to the Communist powers. New tactics had to be employed. Therefore, the concept of the Trilateral Constellation had to be set aside for a while and the new Trilateral Commission was formed to take its place, even as Henry and Nelson were set aside for a time, as Zbig and David took their places. Thus were Western Europe, Japan and Canada prepared for their places in the New World Order.

Now the time has come for yet another change in strategy: there must be a return to Kissinger's Trilateral Constellation concept. For this purpose Zbig must begin to act more like Kissinger; but, the USSR must be condemned and the PRC praised, built up and strengthened; for the idea behind the Trilateral Constellation is one of 'equality' between these three super powers.

Also, it is time for the Third World to be brought into its 'predestined' place in the New World Order (predestined by the New World Rulers, of course). Hence, Zbig is not only in the process of selling out our friends in Taiwan and South Korea, but he also is promoting the destruction of Rhodesia and the Republic of South Africa, and supporting the Communist takeover of Africa.

This wacky policy of supporting the Communists secretly and denouncing them publicly could become a dangerous game. The Trilateralists have let the USSR outman and outgun us in all phases of national defense. But they seem confident that the Soviets are too weak industrially and technologically to dare to challenge us openly. The builders of the New World Order are sure that they have everything under control and that no major conflagration is to be expected unless they, themselves, ignite the conflagration. That statement should really bother us.

The London Economist observes that if detente reverts to cold war, we are still safe enough, because "the sale to Russia of some kinds of advanced technology" can be stopped; the exchange of scientists could be halted--and aid to the African nations which are anti-communist should be sufficient to stop the Cubans in Africa...

All of which sounds slightly infantile since we are really supporting, not opposing the Communists in Africa. After all, Andy Young says they are a "stabilizing force".

Most important is the fact that, to the Trilateralists, this is an economic--not a military--operation. But there are some geopolitical facts that are not being reported in the controlled media. Example: so long as nuclear power has not been able to replace oil-power, the Middle East is a vital area that must be kept out of the hands of international gangsters if our own economy is to survive. A French writer and economist, Bertrand de Jouvenal, recently wrote:

"Whoever cares to look at a map cannot fail to notice that the amazing drive of the Cubans through Africa draws them ever nearer to the Arab peninsula...There is so much oil in the peninsula, from which Europe draws its economic lifeblood...hence economic power....It's so short a jump to that peninsula from the coast line of Eritrea, not to name Djibouti. Suppose it succeeds. The provisioning of Europe in oil henceforth falls to protectorates of the Soviets. This would make the countries of Western Europe subject to the good will of the Soviet Reds and consequently to their pressure, to a progressive vassalization. The American-sponsored defense of Europe on European territory would have been turned as efficiently as the French Maginot line was turned in 1940. This without any Soviet military offensive, merely by the economic effects of a grand maneuver executed by small forces, out of sight of the European populations and opinion.

The Third World War would have been won by Russia, this almost in silence by means of distant encirclement, every step of which would have been presented as 'help to the will of the people' in successive countries. Is this a figment of the imagination? But was it not lack of imagination that induced the British to feel confident in the safety of Singapore because they had attended to a possible attack by sea? It came by land. Are we looking the right way?"

Oil is the lifeblood of industrialized Europe, which we are sworn to protect; Middle East oil is essential to our own economy; oil is the source of Rockefeller power (ARAMCO is owned by Rockefeller interests).

Isn't it strange, then, that the Soviet is aiming for control of the world's oil market, and nobody is looking?

It cannot be coincidental that America is pulling back on every front while the communists advance; nor can any rational person believe that our Administration is unaware of the international ramifications of this sellout policy.

TAXPAYER REVOLT REVISITED

It was evident from the beginning that if "Prop 13" was approved by voters in California, the revolt would spread like a prairie fire across the nation. Taxpayers are organizing to amend State Constitutions, local charters, cut federal spending; and politicians everywhere are jumping on the bandwagon in attempts to please the voters everywhere. Some are sincere, some are simply seeking votes. Following are examples of sincere reactions.

Hon. Eldon Rudd of Arizona in the "Congressional Record", 6/6/78:

"A taxpayers' revolt is a perfectly natural and understandable reaction when Government at all levels is taking almost 47 cents out of every dollar earned by the people, in order to pay for Government programs, many of which are wasteful and inefficient.

...I am reminded that English serfs in pre-Revolutionary times were required to give their masters 2 days of work out of every seven. Today the American people are required to give an average of about 2½ days each week of their working time--of their earned income--to the government via taxation... Maybe we can control excessive government and reverse the trend before we get any closer to having the government take more than half our earned income--truly making taxpayers economic slaves..."

Hon. Jack Kemp of New York, in the "Congressional Record", 6/7/78:

"But, I suggest that inflation is the real enemy, the root cause of our economic ills. It is inflation which has pushed up the taxed value of real property. It is inflation which has pushed up the cost of government. It is inflation which has eaten away purchasing power and undercut savings. It is inflation which is pushing all working and saving Americans into steeper income tax brackets. The people of California yesterday rebelled against a result of tax inflation. The people are rebelling from California to Ohio, to New Jersey; it goes on from coast to coast. Jeff Bell's upset victory in New Jersey is a signal to Congress: lower the tax rates and restore incentive to the worker and investor. Inflation is certainly the enemy insofar as individual federal income taxes are concerned, because for each 10% increase in the nominal income of a person, he or she pays 16% more in federal taxes. The harder you run, the further you fall behind. The people are telling us they want lower taxes, lower prices and more jobs in the private sector. They want an economy which is growing... the people feel that they are only working to pay their taxes... Congress must listen to the people..." (unquote).

William Safire, columnist, in "The New York Times", 6/1/78:

"If you are making more money now than you ever made before, but inflation and the 'tax bracket creep' have reduced the purchasing power of your takehome pay, then you are a member of The New Poor. If you used your life savings to buy a home, and rising property taxes are forcing you to sell and move to a neighborhood where houses are cheaper, you are a member of The New Poor... Not only do The New Poor believe that government programs have become too bloated and expensive, they also believe that government policy is directed against their interests. Carternomics stimulates the economy to reduce unemployment and help the 'old' poor, while it causes runaway inflation that creates legions of The New Poor.

"The Consumer Price Index released today, showing a 10.8 percent yearly rate of inflation will be explained away as temporary, caused by flukes, or greedy capitalists or bad weather. But double-digit inflation... is wiggling its victory sign, and the Administration in power cannot pass the buck. Although the government statisticians claim that the cost of living has risen by only 28% in the past four years, an average of 7% a year, they are living in an unreal world.... Since 1974 the cost of a can of Coca-Cola has doubled... a milkshake at McDonald's has risen 47%, Band-Aids are up 75%, dog biscuits up 67%.... The point is that the 'real' cost of living... has risen at a rate twice that of the official inflation rate. And not because of the weather, or corporate greed;...

"How do we stop double-digit inflation and the creation of tens of millions of New Poor? At the local level, as in California, force the reduction of the bureaucracy and accept fewer services; at the Federal level, cut non-defense spending and tighten money to put the brakes on the rise in the cost of living.

"But Mr. Carter has not the stomach for this. When he replaces his token woman in-house liberal, Midge Costanza, he keeps her on the bloated White House payroll; to make way for her successor's staff, he puts the unneeded Costanza crew on the Labor Department payroll for over $100,000 a year. When the late save-the-cities boondoggle was announced it included a budget to employ the President's son at $26,000 a year; to offset this sort of petty patronage graft Mr. Carter's budget calls for 495 fewer FBI agents. Instead of attacking Government-caused inflation, Mr. Carter seems destined to take the Nixon route: he will exhort for a while, perhaps add his own antibusiness finger-wagging, and then in the third year of his Presidency, impose wage and price controls, which will be popular and make him seem activist....

"To deflect the resentments of The New Poor, Mr. Carter will jawbone at selected villains until failure is apparent, and then will treat only the symptoms of inflation with disguised or direct controls. That's a sad scenario. If the Carter men had the courage to apply the brakes now - and thereby gain the productivity increases that a mild recession brings, we would be able to avoid a crippling inflation this year, a loss of economic freedom next year, and a major recession after that." (unquote).

Finally, here is the latest from Washington, as reported by Robert Boyd of the "Miami Herald" Washington bureau on June 22, 1978:

"The Carter Administration's two top inflation fighters told Congress that they have made little or no progress in their battles against the country's most serious domestic problem.

"Failure to get control of rising costs and prices this year means an almost certain recession in 1979, Robert Strauss and Barry Bosworth warned the House Banking subcommittee in a joint plea for restraint on government spending.... A major reason for the failure to halt the inflationary spiral, the officials said, is that everybody is waiting for someone else to make the first sacrifice. 'Business says labor and government should do it. And government says it's up to labor and business....'

Here is a current example of how the federal government is "fighting inflation by cutting down on expenses: Vice President Mondale journeyed to Atlanta to tell the country's mayors about the proposed formation of a new $2 billion "Urbank" to "encourage business investment in 12,000 American communities of all sizes." And, according to the U.S. News & World Report, "While no one was paying much attention, Congress increased the limit on the public debt by $52 billion. This is a new high. It works out to $3,400 for every man, woman, and child in the country."

After that increase was voted, Congress then discussed the possibility of enacting a measure that would allow the Administration to increase the public debt each year without Congressional approval, since the debt is increased each year and Congress has no choice but to approve anyway. It would save time and prevent public notice of how the national debt was growing each year if the increases were made automatically and without fanfare; this was the thinking of the sponsors of the measure, which was tabled at least temporarily.

However, on June 7th, the House was debating the payment of the annual interest on the national debt. When some rather startling information was disclosed, and published in the Congressional Record. Here are items:

Candidate Jimmy Carter had promised he would reduce the White House staff by one-third. He did, by employing deception. It was discovered when the congressional investigators found that the costs of the Executive Office of the President were $79.1 million for fiscal 1977, while the costs for 1979 were $79.8 million; an increase of about $750,000. It was then revealed that Carter hadn't actually fired one-third of the staff; he had created a new office, and 150 people were transferred to the new office. The GAO report added that "25 other personnel were transferred out of the Executive Office between Sept. 30, 1977, and Feb. 28, 1978. However, we were unable to document who they were or where they went."

Hon. Clarence Miller of Ohio revealed that the interest on the national debt has now reached $55 billion yearly, and goes higher each year. Also a total of $108 billion of that national debt is owed to other nations. Said Rep. Miller: "These are nations that we aided, that we helped in the past. ... West Germany has loaned us $26 billion... we will send them interest on the loan... Italy has loaned us $4.8 billion. We know Italy has great problems at the present time, but somehow we apparently are worse off because we are borrowing money from them. In Latin America Venezuela has loaned us $490 million. We had a big problem around here just a few weeks ago concerning Panama. Panama has loaned us $13.7 million. Colombia has loaned us $483 million. Japan loaned us $18.6 billion, and last year we sent Japan $779 million in interest on the $18.6 they loaned us. India has many problems, and there certainly is malnutrition in India. But India has found a way to loan us $775 million on our national debt. Mr. Chairman, I think these things need to be pointed out. I am not sure when they can be pointed out, other than at a time like this, when we are asking for an appropriation for interest on the national debt." (unquote).

Rep. Miller then brought up another item: the postal subsidy of about $1.8 billion. He pointed out that while the ordinary citizen and most businesses are now paying 15¢ for the 1st ounce of 1st class mail and proportionately high rates for other classes of mail; they are also paying part of the mailing costs of many publications which have nationwide circulations. These publications pay the amount required by law, but "it costs almost $10 million additional of taxpayers' money to deliver the Wall Street Journal per year. For Better Homes and Gardens, it costs $4.36 million additional, over and above the postage paid by that particular corporation. Other items that taxpayers must give in aid to some other publications: Good Housekeeping, $2 million; McCalls, $3.33 million; Playboy, $1.29 million; Reader's Digest, $7.47 million; Sports Illustrated, $4.23 million; and Time Magazine, $7.39 million.

Congressmen may complain, but they must vote for overspending, because with our debt-money system the whole economy would collapse if they didn't keep spending. The dictionary tells us what most economists won't, that inflation is "an increase of currency in circulation or an overissue of credit, resulting in a rise of price levels when or if demand for goods exceeds supply." Now, here is the fact that most economists refuse to accept: Unless it is backed by gold, the money supply can be expanded at any rate the central bank may select. However, as Wesley Hillendahl of the Bank of Hawaii recently told a group of business executives: "The burden of government has become so excessive... that economies would collapse unless propped up by an accelerated expansion of money.... It is the total tax burden which is the underlying cause of inflation today.... As a first step in the control of inflation, we must bring a halt to the expansion of government."

"The main point to keep in mind is that the ballgame is being played in the legal arena. If we can restore the necessary legal restraints on government the economic system will take care of itself."

ABOUT PROPOSITION 13.

While it is true that the Jarvis-Gann Amendment gave important impetus to the developing tax revolt, it also must be understood that Prop 13 is not itself an answer to our current national economic problems. The fact that Gov. Brown stepped in, took charge and immediately used Prop 13 for the wrong purposes, proves how much of a trap it can become. Following are editorial comments, the first from a correspondent in California, the second from a conservative leader in Wisconsin:

"Let me warn you about encouraging a general distribution of the Jarvis-Gann revolt... good intentions, but it is a two-edged sword... removes most of the control of the purse from local citizens, and sends the power to the state and federal governments. Now Gann is promoting the Constitutional Convention which the Center for Democratic Institutions started some years back. 28 states have ratified it, and it only needs the support of the good people who do not know that unseen hands can manipulate their opposition to an overbearing government to further the ends which are already planned. If a convention is called, it will not be limited to the one issue. Such a convention would be chaired by the present Vice President or his successor, who is not nor would be one of us. I fear for the results of any such effort. Already passage of Prop 13 has set in motion the chaos and confusion that is necessary for change and in Fresno that chaos is being used to promote the city/county consolidation which was the thesis behind the substate redistricting."

And from a Wisconsin correspondent, this comment: "The main question was never asked: Does it stop or abolish Regional Government? No, it does not. Does it get rid of all the misuses or abuses of Constitutional authority in California? Emphatically NO! It does not abolish the massive bureaus. Governor Brown immediately wrote an executive order to freeze jobs, etc.

Now you have rule by mandate, executive order! Like the Initiative, another far cry from representative government, the executive order accelerates Administrative Rule for the entire State. And, as chaos increases, more executive orders may be used to deal with the crises! Massive shifts in population could even be caused, work camps, and other forms of economic development may take form---master planning by Regional Planners. No, we do not want or need initiative law. We need to restore the original and legal State and U.S. Constitutions as the 'law of the land.' We support an all out Investigative Study of Regionalism to be followed by corrective Legislation."

THE OIL IMBROGLIO - COMPETITION OR CONVERGENCE?

Conservative columnist Edith Kermit Roosevelt recently wrote that "While piously denouncing Western cartel capitalists, the Soviets are busy setting up their own international capitalist enterprises. The role of these Russian firms is to penetrate Western economies and to finance communist parties outside the Soviet Union."

Fortune magazine confirms this in an indirect manner by listing 72 Soviet multinational corporations operating in 22 different Eastern European and Asian countries. And there are a number of Soviet international banking firms, such as Donau in Vienna, the East-West United Bank in Luxembourg, the Handelsbank in Switzerland, and Banque Commerciale Pour L'Europe du Nord in France, also referred to as the Eurobank. Among the Soviet multinational corporations operating in diverse economic fields, there are Stan-Canada, appliances; East-West Agencies in Holland, optical instruments; Koneisto Norge in Norway, machinery; Ruselgno in Italy, lumber; Scansov in Sweden, transport; Pconsa in Spain, seafood; and Scaldia-Volga in Belgium, automobiles. Then, there is Avto-Export which is said to sell about 50 different types of vehicles in more than a hundred European and Third World countries.

Columnist Roosevelt ends her article with this important paragraph:

"...Soviet Russia has a dual advantage. Firstly, its factories and other enterprises are organized in a capitalist manner, including the purchase and sale of stock. Second, ultimate control is in the hands of the government—a perfect setup for economic warfare."

But, please notice: If the Soviet economie system involves corporate management and government control, then it is no different from State Capitalism, or Monopoly Capitalism, or Corporate Socialism; and it is exactly the economic system being promoted by the Trilateralists as the very core of their New World Order!

Again, please notice: If the Soviets are now doing what the Trilateralists hope to be doing, then this is not competition, it is convergence! And the appearance of competition is just a smoke screen to keep the people from knowing what is really going on at the Elitist level!

Let's check this out in other ways:

While strong words are often used by Carter and Brzezinski when speaking of Cuba and the Soviet, the words are never followed by action and they are always softened by Vance and then reversed by Young. So that the most appropriate word to use in describing our policy in regard to Communism is one of simple appeasement.

Even Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, who is hardly our ideal as a Senator, says there is evidence that the Soviet Union "has taken us for a ride". "Through the calculated maneuver of its Cuban pawns in Africa," says the Senator, "The Soviet Union has actually sought confrontation rather than conciliation. The staggering buildup of the Warsaw Pact is both worrisome and inconsistent with the precept of detente."

Recently "McKeever's Investment & Survival Letter" stated the case more accurately and with more detail. Asking the question "Is the USA Surrendering?" the letter answered its own question with 13 points of evidence:

1. The U.S. has lost its will to fight and the U.S. policy appears to be one of "appeasement at any price."

2. The U.S. cannot raise an army. By unconditionally pardoning all Vietnam draft dodgers, Jimmy Carter cut the teeth out of any future drafts legislation.
 3. The U.S. was first tested, after Vietnam, in Angola. Here at the last minute the U.S. not only backed out but also pulled the rug out from under our ally, South Africa.
 4. In Rhodesia and Southwest Africa the U.S. supports the Marxist guerrillas.
 5. The U.S. has lost control of the skies.
 6. The U.S. is losing control of the seas.
 7. The U.S. has given up control of near space.
 8. The U.S. has given up the neutron bomb.
 9. Russia is stronger militarily than the U.S.
 10. The surrender of the Panama Canal was indicative of total surrender.
 11. Developing friendly relations with Vietnam, Cuba, and now Angola, portends surrender to Communism.
 12. The U.S. deliberately lags behind Russia in weapons technology and in civil defense.
 13. The SALT II Agreement being pushed by Jimmy Carter is really an agreement to disarm America.
- (Adapted from McKeever's MISL, #168 P.O. Box 4140, Medford, OR 97501.)

All readers may not agree with all of the preceding statements. But it does appear that the U.S. policy toward the USSR is not one of confrontation, or simple cooperation, but rather is one of convergence, the final goal being to merge the USA and the USSR into Regional World Government in a New World Order!

With this thought in mind, let's spotlight one important part of the world: the Middle East.

Stephen Barber, Washington correspondent for the conservative "Daily Telegraph" of London recently made a profound statement: "The Soviets are standing by (in the Middle East), ready to stir things up. An example is their backing of the PLO with fresh arms and keeping the Iraqis and Syrians well supplied. They will exploit what they can. I feel also the Soviets have, to a great extent, outflanked the Mideast in their push to the Horn. It is possible that this move is part of a longterm plan, and that they have their eye on the oilfields because they too are going to be running short of oil in the mid-Eighties. Frankly, the Middle East--the conflict between Israel and its neighbors--is really almost secondary to the Russian's larger plans." (Emphasis added).

Remembering that oil is the lifeblood of industrial nations, and of nations that hope to become important industrially, let us see what the record shows:

About 7 years ago the Rockefeller and Hammer interests were busily aiding the Soviet Union in expanding and developing its oil producing capabilities in Siberia and Azerbaijan. When 23 American government officials, business executives and oil industry leaders left Moscow for a visit to the oil fields of Siberia, the late King Faisal of Saudi Arabia was quoted as saying he feared the Soviets would eventually gain strategic control of the Persian Gulf. Oil going from the Middle East to Europe must go by way of the Persian Gulf, and if the USSR controls that trade route, the USSR also controls Industrial Europe. King Faisal expressed fear that agitators and red agents were stirring up trouble in the oil-rich sheikdoms bordering the Persian Gulf, and in other oil-producing countries of Asia and Africa."

Perhaps it was coincidental, but soon after King Faisal made that statement one of his many nephews began to receive psychotronic treatments (mind bending, or behavior control) at the school he was attending in California. Later, he returned to Ryadh, where he assassinated his uncle, the king.

The assassination accomplished little since the "Inner Six" (a ruling council composed of the leaders of the six branches of the Royal House of Saud) promptly named Khalid to succeed the assassinated Faisal. King Khalid is equally anti-communist and prefers to deal with the United States, and with American based International Bankers (especially with those having oil interests, such as the Rockefellers).

However, it seems that there was no intention on the part of the communists or their hidden rulers, to take over the Mideast oilfields by direct military action. Instead, the oil producing regions were to be surrounded and all trade routes controlled.

Much the same strategy has been used in Africa, where the rich natural resources of Rhodesia, Southwest Africa and the Republic of South Africa are the prizes at stake. A Red Belt was drawn across the heart of Africa from Mozambique in the East to Somalia in the West. Cubans were used as surrogate troops. They now are being augmented by troops from East Germany. Arms are being supplied by the Soviet Union to at least three main terrorist factions, the ZAPU, ZANU and SWAPO groups. It has been reported that members of the ZAPU faction, led by Joshua Nkomo, have received intensive training in different training camps in the USSR, in Algeria, North Korea, Tanzania, Cuba and Bulgaria. It is this ZAPU group which is said to be responsible for the mass slayings of missionary men, women and children in Rhodesia.

Now there is evidence that some of these highly trained terrorists are being shifted to the Middle East, along with thousands of Cubans, East Germans, and Russian technicians.

Now the current operation seems to be concentrated in regions near the oil producing parts of the Middle East. This all began, of course, with the communist conquest of Ethiopia. An interesting sidelight on this operation has recently been made public.

It seems that when Haile Selassie was ruling in Ethiopia, vast sums of money had been deposited to the country's account in foreign banks, principally in Britain and the United States. Of course, it was said to be in paper of various types, not in gold or anything of intrinsic value. So, when the Lion of Juda was deposed and jailed, that "money" simply "disappeared."

But, back to our tale of the oil plot: At first, the Communists played both ends against the middle; they armed and supplied both Ethiopia and Eritrea. However, when it became clear that Ethiopia was completely in the control of the Communists, Eritrea was simply "forgotten" by the Reds and Ethiopia was aided in its conquest of Eritrea.

With this venture in Ethiopia, control of the important Horn of Africa was assured (the United States not raising a hand or a howl of protest)... Next would come the takeover and solidification of control over the countries that surround the oilfields of Asia.

On April 27, 1978 a military coup was staged in Kabul, Afghanistan. President Mohammed Daud Khan was assassinated, thousands of his supporters were given mock trials, lined up and executed by firing squads. Communist puppet Nur Mohammed Taraki assumed control of the country. Heading a 35-member National Revolutionary Council which handles all policymaking, he hastened to assure the world that the Soviet Union had absolutely nothing to do with his assumption of power. Moscow followed through on May 7 by denouncing the "slandorous reports" from the West that the USSR had inspired the coup. Tass asserted that Western Nations were trying to discredit the new government in Kabul and to cast aspersions on Soviet foreign policy.

The takeover of Afghanistan complete, next step would be the solidification of red control over the strategically important country of South Yemen-- important because its capital city is Aden, which is a virtual fort, built originally by the British to guard the southern entrance to the Red Sea and the Suez Canal. With Communists in control of the Horn of Africa on the one side and Aden on the other, no shipping is possible via the Suez except when permitted by the Communists. Command of the Suez and the Panama Canals has been a long-time objective of the Communists and was spoken of by Lenin as essential to the conquest of the world. Control of the Persian Gulf was also necessary.

The current chapter in the story of the Yemeni began with the assassination of the President of North Yemen. This small country lies in the southwest corner of the Arabian Peninsula and has a military government that is pro-Washington. The United States supplies weapons to North Yemen and the country is on our foreign aid list.

South Yemen, on the other hand, has a Marxist government and has been friendly with the USSR. However, it seems that Moscow wasn't sure of its control over South Yemen; hence the drama that was to unfold. It all began when the President of South Yemen sent a present to the President of North Yemen. It was a gift-wrapped bomb. It exploded and the President of North Yemen was killed. The whole country went into mourning and was "out of the picture" when things began to happen in South Yemen. Here, in a manner suspiciously similar to what had happened previously in Afghanistan, there was a sudden military coup, President Salem Robaye Ali was ousted, then executed, and, according to the "New York Times" of June 27, "Three Southern Yemeni Marxists were reported to be sharing power following the ouster and death of President Ali." It seems that Ali was pro-Moscow but not as pro-Moscow as the Troika that replaced him.

And now, if the expected pattern is followed, Communist control of Iraq comes next. Iraq is under the control of a military faction called Baath, the Arab Socialist Renaissance Party. It professes "scientific socialism" and has a mutual aid pact with the USSR, signed in 1972. It has continual disputes with its neighbor Iran, was allied with Syria in disputes with Israel, then broke with Syria. It has had constant trouble with its Kurdish minority.

In short, the Iraqi government is not a model of stability and a Communist coup and takeover would not be difficult. Such an action would be aimed at Iran, which is solidly anti-Communist, and is vulnerable in that it has a common border with Iraq, with the USSR, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

All of which means that once absolute control over Iraq is established by the Communists, then Pakistan comes next. And then will have been accomplished not only the surrounding of the oilfields of the Mideast, but also the fulfillment of the dream of Peter the Great; that of Russian access to the Indian Ocean by way of the Persian Gulf.

The important thing to remember is this: No nation or combination of nations is doing anything whatsoever to stop this Communist conquest of the Continents. From the very beginning, they have been supported by the very Monopoly Capitalists whom they are supposed to be opposing!

But this isn't too hard to understand if we first understand the game plan: "factories and other enterprises organized in a capitalist manner...but with ultimate control in the hands of a Central Government." This is the basis of The New World Order.

DECISIONS . . . DECISIONS . . . WHO MAKES THEM?

The writer ended his article with this statement: "The President began to walk back toward his Executive study. His daughter stood by the door waiting. She whispered into her father's ear that she had only enough money to buy only one record album, "Saturday Night Fever," and she wanted a little additional to buy a second, "Grease." The President told her that a single record was enough for now, but Amy persisted, tugging at his arm. Finally, after considerable pleading, her father told her to change the subject. Then he relented slightly and said he might allow a second purchase soon. The pattern was familiar, the President was weighing the pressure, measuring the evidence - and keeping his options open."

Such was the concluding paragraph in "an interview with the President" by "Time" magazine's Washington bureau chief, Robert Ajemian. One wonders if we are supposed to read this as a description of how Carter treats all of the people: says one thing, tries to change the subject, relents and then proposes a new policy if the pressure becomes too great, but always tries to keep his options open?

Interviewer Ajemian made one thing quite obvious: he was trying to implant the idea that Jimmy Carter is the boss in all departments, and always makes the final decision. Ajemian explained the administrative confusion in this way: "One week national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski shouts at the Russians and the next week Secretary of State Cyrus Vance cools things down. Administrative officials say this is the President's tactical way of dealing with the Soviets; that Carter uses his aides to strike differing poses, deliberately keeping his own course ambiguous and his options open. When the President wants to mute the voices, however, he does. 'I don't think anyone who works with me,' he said with obvious pride, 'doubts that when the final judgment is to be made, I don't hesitate to make it'." If we are to believe the President, and we are supposed to, of course, then he made such a final judgment at his latest press conference when he said: "We are not trying, nor will we ever try to play the Soviets against the People's Republic of China, nor vice versa." But even the New York Times took exception to that statement when it observed that:

"Keeping the Soviet Union and China at odds by maneuvering between them has been a part of American foreign strategy since the Nixon Administration forged closer ties with both Communist powers. A day after the President went out of his way to appear conciliatory to Moscow, saying that Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev 'wants the same thing I do--peace between our country and theirs', the administration announced that a delegation of American scientists would go to Peking this week in the countries' first government-to-government contact on science and technology. Last month Washington said it favored selling to China geological survey equipment which has remote military applications. Zbigniew Brzezinski, the national security adviser who visited Peking in May has said that a 'strong and secure' China is in American interests." (unquote).

So much for the Trilateral Constellation theory initiated by Kissinger and now being revived by ZBig. But there is a certain geopolitical angle to this Trilateral thesis which is not being

• bruted about in the controlled communications channels:

About two years before Henry Kissinger made his first mysterious trip to Peking, David Rockefeller made a trip to the Forbidden City to confer with Mao Tse-tung, ostensibly to investigate the possibilities of opening up a branch of the Chase Manhattan Bank in Peking, also to make certain deals in line with the Rockefellers' first love: discovering and developing oil fields in Red China.

Equally pertinent: about two months ago a Paris-based Chase Manhattan executive made a secret trip to Hanoi and met with top Vietnamese Communist officials to discuss normalization of relations with the United States-- and also to open a bank and promote the sale of crude oil in that part of the world now controlled by Communists. All of which might have passed unnoticed except that the U.S. State Department felt it necessary to issue a statement admitting that Ridgeway Brewster Knight was a former U.S. diplomat now employed as Chase Manhattan's director of international relations in Europe, that Knight did go to Hanoi, but that he did not carry any message from President Carter, and that he did not in any way carry on any negotiations in behalf of the U.S.A.

It might seem strange that the State Department should find it necessary to issue such a statement. But considerable light is shed on the overall situation when it is recalled that during the Vietnam War much oil was said to be found in comparatively shallow waters off the coast of Vietnam. Even more relevant to the overall complot: Since Rockefeller's visit to Peking, considerable deposits of oil have been found on the Chinese mainland. Hence the recent dispatch of a team of technicians and scientists to Peking. In this connection, an AP report of July 5th, datelined Tokyo, read:

"China is using major Western oil companies to ship Chinese crude oil to non-Communist nations, one of Japan's biggest newspapers reported Tuesday. Mainichi Shimbun said that Caltex, the Texaco subsidiary, and Royal Dutch Shell, the British-Dutch giant, secretly shipped between 220,000 tons and 230,000 tons of Chinese crude to major Japanese oil firms last year. A spokesman for Nippon Oil Co., Japan's leading oil company, said his company did import Chinese crude through Caltex last year, but he refused to give any details. Mainichi said the Peking government has set up a dummy corporation in the British colony of Hongkong to handle the oil shipments to non-Communist countries. Chinese oil is also being shipped through Western oil companies to South Korea. It said the South Korean government is considering expanding its refineries to process the Chinese crude oil. The Chinese government began making contact with Western oil companies after the 1976 purge of the 'Gang of Four,' the four radical leaders headed by Chairman Mao's widow, the newspaper said."

(end of AP dispatch)

Also important in connection with the "policy that doesn't exist" regarding Red China, if we are to believe that ultimate decision-maker, Jimmy Carter, are the following dispatches that have appeared in certain independent (unchained) newspapers.

"The United States and key allies, seeking to check expanding Soviet power, are cozying up to China as if to warn Moscow not to go too far. . . . Asian as well as Western diplomats suggest the process began, at least in public, on May Day. On that day, Sir Neil Cameron, chief of Britain's defense staff, told Chinese officers--with a reporter present--that both Britain and China face a 'common enemy' and ought to work together. For his real or pretended indiscretion, Cameron was mildly rebuked. Other things then followed. . . . A Chinese military mission traveled to France to discuss the possible purchase of military aircraft. . . . Informal talks are going on between London and Peking for China to buy 30 to 40 Harrier jump jets plus the right to manufacture them under license at home. The British would prefer to fulfill Peking's entire demand themselves for about 300 of those planes which do not need runways--which are lacking in China's northern regions near a Soviet border force of about one million soldiers. The United States has raised no objections to these sales except to stress that it would be imprudent to provide Peking with offensive weapons that could be used against Taiwan." (unquote).

Another news item informs us that: "The Carter administration, eager to promote closer American ties with China disclosed. . . it has given preliminary approval to a Chinese purchase of technology that has military applications. The equipment includes sophisticated airborne infrared scanning devices that can detect potential earthquakes and help locate oil deposits."

Despite all of the foregoing information, Jimmy Carter told the world in a televised news conference that "We are not trying, nor will we ever try to play the Soviets against the People's Republic of China, nor vice versa." And Carter said, most emphatically, that he was making all the decisions in foreign policy matters.

The truth is, however, that neither Carter nor any other President of the United States has made a single important foreign policy decision in the past quarter century, or more. All important decisions are made for the President, he merely supplying the voice and/or the signature. This was shown most effectively, although in a different context, in a recent issue of "Fact Finder." Referring to the plan for the unilateral disarmament of the United States which was begun with the "United States Program for General and Complete Disarmament in a Peaceful World" in September, 1961, the article states and we quote:

"Why doesn't the President tell us that he is not responsible for this disarmament? That he gets his advice from Zbigniew Brzezinski, whom he appointed National Security Adviser? And from U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance? And from Paul Warnke, whom he named Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency? And from Harold Brown, our Secretary of Defense? And last, but not least, from Andrew Young, whom he appointed Ambassador to the U.N.? Can't he tell us that these all are members of the Council on Foreign Relations or the Trilateral Commission, or both organizations, under the rigid control of David Rockefeller and his family and friends who are among the top financiers of the world?

"Hasn't the average American heard by now that it was David Rockefeller and his secret organizations who chose Jimmy Carter for the presidency?

"Can any President live and serve with honor under this disarmament plan? Why was President John Kennedy assassinated in office? Why was Lyndon Johnson forced to retire from the Presidency? Why was Richard Nixon forced from office after he accepted Spiro Agnew's resignation as Vice-President and then failed to appoint Nelson Rockefeller to take his place? Why was Gerald Ford put in the presidency and why did he appoint Nelson Rockefeller as Vice-President? Why did Ford's career end after he failed to name Nelson Rockefeller to continue as his running mate for re-election? Why was Ford replaced by Jimmy Carter? What fate lies in store for Jimmy Carter? The Brainwashed never wonder. . . . Does Carter ever wonder?" (Quoted from "The Fact Finder," P. O. Box 10555, Phoenix, AZ 85064.)

While it is true, Carter's denial notwithstanding, that the administration is playing "the People's Republic of China against the Soviets," this does not mean that the Soviets are being spurned, ignored, or even neglected. After all, the USSR and her satellites and surrogates are being given a free hand in Africa, and now in the Russian drive to surround and isolate the oilfields of the Middle East. This plus the technological assistance we keep pouring into Soviet-held lands.

If the Soviet leaders don't like what Zbig has been saying about them then all they need do is listen to Vance's words about cooperation, and Andy Young's words of encouragement. A few days ago in the United Nations, Ambassador Andy was telling all the nations that Soviet political and military dominance over Africa was not really important; since this will not "compromise U.S. economic interests." Here are some excerpts from AP's report on Ambassador Young's foreign policy statement at the UN:

"United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young said...the United States' main objectives in Africa are to promote human rights and trade relations, and holding foreign domination at bay should only be number 3 on the list of priorities...the United States should try to 'work with' Angola to promote American economic interests...Communist domination, as in Angola, does not necessarily compromise US economic interests...The report that Cubans are training the 6,000-man army of Joshua Nkomo, the Rhodesian guerrilla leader, in Zambia, does not trouble Young. "We shouldn't be afraid of majority rule in Rhodesia, and we shouldn't be afraid of Joshua Nkomo. He is a good Presbyterian."

That the U.S. Government continues to extend technological assistance to the USSR, sometimes at our own expense, is amply demonstrated by the following AP dispatch, from Moscow:

"American and Soviet scientists have been successfully carrying out joint experiments just outside Moscow on a revolutionary process that could result in the cheaper and more efficient reduction of electricity, according to U.S. officials. Dr. William Jackson of the U.S. Department of Energy said the cooperative research effort was helping both countries push ahead with development of the process called magnetohydrodynamics - MHD - as a practical, safe, less expensive, highly efficient method for using fossil fuels, especially coal. Jackson was among half a dozen top U.S. specialists visiting Moscow this week...the delegation's visit came one year after the arrival here of a 40-ton superconducting magnet, built at Argonne National Laboratory in Illinois at a cost of $3.5 million. When energized the magnet can produce a magnetic field of 5 tesla--about 250,000 times stronger than the earth's magnetic field." [For those who are concerned about weather manipulation, please note that final statement--Ed.]

In conclusion, let it be understood that we are aiding the PRC, we are aiding the USSR, and we are playing one against the other, all for the purpose of Convergence...to merge all nations of the world into a Regional World Government, a New World Order in which economic and financial interests will be paramount!

As Harry E. Walkup, M.D., recently wrote: "The motivating force behind the attack on the United States...is not, as is generally supposed, the Communist Party...Nor is the Soviet Union and its satellites the primary enemy of the United States. It, too, like the United States of America, has become an instrument of the Zionist-Anglo-American complot...The real enemy of Christian civilization...is the Zionist-Anglo-American consortium--a coterie of Big Business, Big Labor and Big Governments--that follows the principles of Fabian Socialism;..."

In a worldwide Conspiracy, could any one man make all the decisions?

ARE WE MORALLY BANKRUPT?

"I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just," Thomas Jefferson wrote to a friend. He feared the potential political encroachments of a Judiciary that was not sufficiently bound down by the chains of the Constitution, and he also believed that a time would come when ours would be a government of men, rather than a government of law. The author of the Declaration of Independence would really tremble for our country if he were here today and could see the type of leadership that has been purchased for us through the political and economic power of a sub rosa government which aims to destroy the United States as a sovereign and independent Republic, making it a Regional District in a New World Order.

That our Federal Government is "morally bankrupt" is not the isolated and unsubstantiated opinion of a few diehard conservatives. Even the gulliberals who "made us what we are today" are beginning to show real concern, and citizens of other countries are beginning to look down on us with disgust; sometimes with compassion and sympathy, because they see our country following the same road to ruin that caused the destruction of their own freedoms.

"Spotlight" of July 17, 1978, reports that the eminent novelist Taylor Caldwell recently took a world cruise to relax after writing her latest book. She asked other guests to state their opinions of the United States. A Frenchman said: "Leadership of the world, indeed! America is now a fourth rate power. If she has any power at all. She abdicated power in favor of Russia and China, especially Russia." An Englishman told her: "Your currency isn't worth using for toilet tissue, and that is just about what it is. You certainly followed Lenin's instructions for the destruction of a nation: Debauching the copper you have used in place of the silver you no longer have." A British banker added: "You have only to look at poor England now to see the fate you Americans are in for: total bankruptcy and collapse of your economy; and total domestic anarchy, lawless and corrupt and criminal. That's Socialism just before it becomes Communism; and as your President Roosevelt said, 'It was planned that way'." The comment of a Norwegian citizen: "Look at what Socialism and social planning and social services did to Norway. That is why Scandanavia lost its most productive people who fled to Australia and other free countries. But not to America! We know America is now lost unless she at once curtails all social programs, stops government spending, and gets down to work again, and austerity." A gentleman who seemed sincerely concerned about America said: "Once you were a great republic, powerful and rich. But now, sadly, you are only a chaotic democracy on the way to a dictatorship. You got that way through Socialism. Remember what Socialism did under Hitler." Another Frenchman told Taylor Caldwell: "I know your middle class well. I have business in America. Your middle class, the only worthwhile stratum in your country, is deliberately being destroyed by taxation. That was planned long ago by powerful men in your government who want a nation of docile slaves, and the way to do it is through taxation of the productive members of your country, so that it disappears, and offers no resistance to tyranny any longer." Taylor Caldwell then summarized: "The American money situation abroad is bad. But worse than the money and price situation is the huge contempt you encounter anywhere if you are an American. They think we are idiots and imbeciles, and no one trusts American will any longer. We are regarded as weak and childish and retarded...."

Most of this contempt for the United States stems from the foreign and domestic policies our government has adopted; but much of it also has to do with the personalities of the people who were permitted to establish these policies. A few examples can be cited, the first of which involves a kind of nepotism that has not been practiced seriously since the days of Franklin and Eleanor:

Rosalynn Smith Carter was not elected to any public office, neither has her appointment to a diplomatic post been approved by the United States Senate. Yet, on May 30, 1978 she was sent on a 7-nation diplomatic tour of the Caribbean and South America. It was reported that she reviewed political and economic questions with heads of state and other officials. In other words, she acted in the capacity of an Ambassador-at-large, but without official authorization. Although the U.S. media gave glowing reports of her successful tour, it was not reported in English-language newspapers that her visits did not encourage happiness and good will, did not settle any outstanding questions, and in the final analysis was little more than a publicity-building holiday at the taxpayers' expense. Currently Rosalynn Carter is busy promoting ERA and mental health legislation. It has been rumored that she influenced her husband the President in his appointment of lesbian-rights-leader Jane O'Leary to the now defunct National Commission on the Observance of International Womens Year; as well as his selection of Bella Abzug to chair that Committee. Carter's appointments to this National Commission led to the charge that the President had "put his seal of approval on lesbianism."

Then there is the case of Mrs. Lillian Carter who is currently packing her bags for an Ambassadorial jaunt through Africa and Europe. She is scheduled to visit the countries in Africa that are expected to face hunger and starvation as a result of civil wars and drought. While in Europe Miz Lillian will go to Rome to be presented with a medal by the secretary of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization; this as a reward for her services in India as a nurse while with the Peace Corps.

Brother Billy, the beer baron, is not interested in politics. He ran for Mayor of Plains and was defeated, now he prefers the footlights and TV appearances whereby he is said to be making much more money than his brother the President. Sister Ruth has also "made it big" since Jimmy went to Washington, and especially since she secretly baptized the "born again pornographer," Larry Flynt. Often referred to as a "white witch", Sister Ruth still received cover story treatment in and on the July 17th "Newsweek." There is another sister who is "just a plain sinner" and likes to whiz past the Plains Baptist church on Sunday mornings on her motorcycle shouting about how happy she is not to be going to church. There are others, but most victimized of the lot is daughter Amie who has been used as a kind of political football ever since she went to Washington as a symbol of desegregation, later to be joined by her black nanny, convicted murderess and symbol of the sins of society against criminals.

Something of a clue as to relationships within the inner circle of the Nation's First Family was related by Sister Ruth to a "Newsweek" interviewer. It seems that there was a crisis in her life, and she went to her brothers for help, first to Jimmy. "Jimmy dried her tears, calmed her down and reminded her that God is big enough to answer every problem. Then he drove off in his car. Next, Ruth visited brother Billy. 'I hear you've got a problem and I've been thinking,' Billy told her. 'If I mortgage my house and cash everything within 24 hours, I can raise a pile of money and it's all yours.' 'I thought to myself, what wonderful brothers I've got,' says Ruth. 'Jimmy gives me the faith to believe there's an answer, and Billy has the answer!"

Still speaking of personalities that influence the world's opinion of the United States, we come to Mr. Carter's Ambassador to the United Nations, Andrew Young. Carter defended the appointment by declaring that Young was the finest public servant that he, Carter, had ever known. When Young's pro-Communist statements kept infuriating other U.S. officials, as well as the general public, Carter agreed with what Young had been saying, and predicted that the Third World Nations would come to regard Andrew Young as one of the greatest diplomats of all time. But Young's latest statements have really put a strain on his appointer's faith in his protege. The "London Daily Express" commented that many officials in the U.S. government would like to see Young dropped--from a very great height. But, on the other hand, the paper editorialized, a bad government always needs an official fool, and Mr. Young has volunteered for that position.

This latest episode consisted of saying the wrong things at the wrong time and to the wrong newspaper. In an interview with "Le Matin" of Paris, Young said "there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of political prisoners in the United States." Commenting on the trials of Soviet dissenters, he said the situation should not be dramatized, that similar things have happened in the United States and that "It also strikes at the conscience of the entire world when we (the United States) do things like that." Young "felt that the government of Prime Minister Ian Smith was responsible for the massacre of white missionaries in Rhodesia, and not the black-nationalist guerrillas." This is the way Young explained his reasoning: "If it is a planned operation of attacks on the missions, which it seems to have been in the last few weeks, then I would say that it could only come from Smith's camp." This brought a prompt reply from Black Rhodesian leader Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole who is a member of "Smith's camp" and who said that "The West is morally bankrupt." Rev. Sithole comes to this conclusion because Young is the West's chosen leader for African affairs.

Concerning moral bankruptcy, Frank Flick, president of Flick-Reedy Corp., recently wrote an article which appeared in "Iron Age" magazine of June 5th. He said in part: "When you no longer can trust your government and leaders, your community and your fellow man--then you are truly living in a dark age. When the sense of individual moral responsibility disappears, leaders succumb to a tyranny of the majority. To please the people and win re-election, politicians do what is popular instead of what is right. They propose easy, short-range solutions to problems requiring statesmanlike vision and personal courage. They follow public opinion polls rather than the Constitution and their consciences. The people find it easier to accept handouts than to act with self-reliance and soon begin to fight among themselves to get the largest share. The people increasingly turn over more and more power and personal freedom to the government in return for subsidies." Then we have become morally bankrupt.

PERPETUATING THE WRONG HOLOCAUST. Seldom have so few been able to provide so much free publicity and favorable propaganda for such a long time for such a selective minority group. We refer to the 20 uniformed stormtroopers who flanked a white van bearing a Nazi flag and a leader named Frank Collin who is said to be "half Jewish." This handful of sensation seekers provided front page publicity for months for those who say they are Jews. The propaganda campaign was capped by a demonstration in racially tense Marquette Park in Chicago, before some 1,500 police and a few thousand excited spectators. There was so much publicity for so small a story. Furthermore, during this same period, the visual section of the managed media gave us four evenings of alleged entertainment called "Holocaust," two hours each evening, with appropriate publicity and promotional material in newspapers and TV guides. During that same week network stations showed anti-Nazi movies of WWII vintage; in all there was said to be an average of 14 hours of anti-Nazi programming on network stations that week. All of which might have been overlooked, since the people getting the publicity were the people who owned the networks and the metropolitan dailies, if it had been just a one-time crusade to promote anti-Semitism and to sell more Bonds for Israel. But to punish Americans for something that happened over 30 years ago is too much. This particular holocaust is to be perpetuated in the public (government) schools of the United States. The following article by Rev. Curtis Dickenson of Alamogordo, New Mexico, requires neither comment nor apology.

"The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith (ADL) is promoting plans to teach about the so-called Holocaust in secondary schools throughout the country and to get Holocaust studies included into current curricula. The groundwork for this sudden concern for 'holocaust studies' was laid at a secret ADL meeting last Oct. 9-11 at a conference center near LaGuardia Airport outside New York City. Attending were 'educators' from across the U.S. as well as some from foreign, including Communist, countries. The program underscored the need to teach about the holocaust and to develop strategies for furthering the inclusion of holocaust studies into current curricula. Holocaust refers to the Jewish claim that 6 million Jews were systematically killed by the Germans before and during WWII, a claim that has been branded a hoax by many reliable historians, reporters and agencies.

"Dr. Anna Ocha, of Indiana University's School of Education at Bloomington, Ind., and the president-elect of the National Council for Social Studies, was one of the approximately 200 participants at the secret meeting. Reportedly, she spoke about how information and (approved) attitudes regarding the 'holocaust' need to be 'systematically imbedded into formal education, in order to increase the sensitivity [sic] of students.' Representatives of the National Education Association (NEA) were also present. Mrs. Lynne Koblitz noted that the NEA and the Israeli Teachers Union are conferring about using Israeli textbooks in U.S. schools and that the NEA has already reprinted publications from the Israeli Ministry of Information for distribution in the U.S.

"What is the purpose of this emphasis on 'holocaust'? The Soviet Union has killed over 30 million dissenters. Hundreds of thousands have been slaughtered recently in Cambodia. The Chinese Communists killed upwards of 100 million. Besides this, under Hitler's regime Christians and others besides Jews were persecuted and slain because of their opposition to Nazism. Why the one-sided exaggerated and continuous harping on 'holocaust'? Perhaps the answer was expressed at the ADL meeting by Elie Wiesel, Professor at Boston U. According to the report he said, 'The world hasn't been punished yet for what it has done.' The idea is to make everyone feel guilt and shame to the extent that they will not dare oppose the objectives of the Zionists and their influence over U.S. foreign policy. What they are really doing is generating a lot of bitter opposition to themselves. By trying to keep 'holocaust' alive by graphic fictional portrayal, as in the TV series, they are doing more to instill a sense of hatred on both sides of the issue than ever existed in Germany." BULLS IN THE CHINA SHOP?

If all we know were what we read in the newspapers, or hear on radio, or see on television, "confusion" would be the definitive word to describe the present world situation. Seven Trilateralist-connected world leaders met in Bonn, and merely added to the confusion. Carter and his cabinet are confused. The court economists are confused. Even the liberals are confused and are said to be trying to change their color from pink to blue. Saul Friedman of the knight-Ridder Washington Bureau tells us that "Liberals now would rather switch than fight." He explains and we quote him briefly: "Liberalism, the guiding force of the Democratic Party and much of the government for more than 40 years, has lost its way...Liberals this summer are disorganized, uncertain about their direction and without effective leadership. Their traditional causes—consumer protection, civil rights, tax reform, business regulation, health insurance, disarmament and an easing of international tensions—have come on hard times. And faced with what seems to be a conservative trend in the country, a reaction against the liberal view that government should act and spend to solve human problems, many liberals have joined the fashionable assault on big government. Others have simply closed their eyes and remained silent."

Whether Friedman is himself confused, or is just trying to spread the confusion is a moot question. But he and the Knight-Ridder newspaper chain stand not alone. There is the conservative U.S. News & World Report of current issue. Posed after the manner of the face in Rodin's "The Thinker," Jimmy Carter's countenance bears the overprinted words, "Carter's 18 Months - What Went Wrong?" The story reads in part:

"The 18-month mark sees the President blamed for fumbling the economy at home and relations with friends and foes abroad. Carter is under fire from the very groups that elected him, with his ratings by both the public and Congress sagging to dangerously low levels."

Referring to Carter's recent trip to Bonn and the "economic summit" meeting, Newsweek noted that "Carter's journey came at a critical pass in his Presidency—a time when his popularity at home was at low ebb, his leadership in the world lay in question, and his nerve in the face of Soviet pressure stood under its sharpest challenge yet....The result, in the wake of Soviet adventuring in Africa and elsewhere, was a chill on U.S.—Soviet relations as frosty as any since the Cuban missile crisis in 1962..."

Following the sentencing of Soviet dissidents Shcharansky and Ginzburg, and U.S. correspondents Piper and Whitney, Carter reacted by banning the sale of a $7 million computer to Tass, and by threatening to stop the sale of equipment needed for petroleum exploration. But about 90% of the products sold to Russia require no license, Carter has no power to stop such sales, and they will continue. Feeble retaliation in the face of great provocation if one recalls the Soviet incursions in Africa and the oil-rich Middle East. And yet, all the headlines are about USA-USSR confrontations, about human rights for dissident men trying to get out of Russia and into Israel, about Red actions in Africa and the Middle East. But nothing important is being done about it. It's all smoke and no fire. And yet, there is this great anti-Soviet propaganda drive.

There is the "Love China, Hate Russia" theme. There is a tolerance of every kind of Communism except Soviet Communism. There is confusion in the ranks with distrust of Carter, with Zbig disagreeing with Vance, with both disagreeing with Brown, with Carter's catering to Young and the slightly-exposed Peter Bourne, etc. All very confusing, and meant to be confusing!

THE NEW FLUORIDATION CAMPAIGN. The wire service article began: "A nationwide test with more than 70,000 children shows that weekly use of a fluoride mouthwash can cut tooth decay by 35%, government scientists said Monday (July 17th). The National Institute of Dental Research said that all the children in the demonstration programs were in communities without fluoridated water..."

The new plan: add fluoride to all public drinking water sources in the nation. Where wholesale fluoridation is impossible (suburban and rural areas) treat all children in the schools by forcing them to use the fluoridated mouthwash. Thus all children in the United States will be "fluoridated", whether the parents like it or not.

It might be well to explain that this intensive fluoridation campaign seems to be confined primarily to the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom. While we have no reliable information concerning the Communist dominated countries there are 17 major countries with little or no fluoridation and with little or no serious attempts to promote it. Some of these countries have discontinued its use simply because of its ineffectiveness. So, the next time some fluoridation proponent tells you positively that fluoridation is world-wide and that nobody has ever turned it down, give him some of the following facts that were listed in National Fluoridation News for July-September, 1977:

Australia, with 7½ million people, has no fluoridation and will never have it. Belgium, with almost 10 million people, has no fluoridation. Denmark, with 5 million people, has no fluoridation. It is forbidden by law in food and water. Egypt, with more than 37 million people, was pressured by the United States to fluoridate, but refused. France, with 52 million people, has no fluoridation and has never officially considered it essential to good health. Germany, with 61 million people, discontinued fluoridation in 1971 after 18 years of experiments "for health and legal reasons." Greece, with 9 million people, has no fluoridation and no experimental programs have ever been introduced. Holland, with 13½ million people, discontinued fluoridation after 23 years of experiments. In 1976, by Royal Decree, all permissions to fluoridate were cancelled. India, with almost 600 million people, has a major problem with removing fluoride from drinking water. Fluorosis, the highly destructive disease resulting from too much fluoride, occurs in many parts of India. Italy, with 55 million people, has no fluoridation. In some areas public drinking water must be de-fluoridated. Luxembourg, with 360,000 people, has no fluoridation. Norway, with 4 million people, has no fluoridation. Legislation to introduce it was defeated in 1975. Spain, with 35 million people, has no fluoridation and laws forbid it. Sweden has no fluoridation. It was discontinued after a 10-year experiment, declared illegal in 1971. Switzerland, with 6½ million people, has had only one experimental program which serves only 4% of the people. In 1975 the Swiss health department advised cessation of all fluoridation "due to ineffectiveness." Portugal, with 8½ million people, has only one small experimental plant still in operation. Finland, with almost 5 million people, has one small experimental plant which serves only 1½% of the population.

As Rosine de Bouneville, editor of the British Views-Letter "Candour" points out in the July, 1978 issue: "Students of the esoteric side of history and politics know that the public gaze is seldom allowed to concentrate on the path it is actually following because even the stupidest sheep tend to turn away if they are enabled to see the abyss while it is still possible to avoid it." Then she suggests that all the confusion is planned to hide a new turning of the ways that is being contemplated by the world rulers. She writes:

"Where we really are going is to Peking with the Money Power....!"

This seemed unbelievable until we saw the front page of the Business and Finance section of the New York Times of Sunday, July 16. There was a picture of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank's headquarters in Hongkong, above a two-column headline: "An Asian Bank Challenges West." This 113-year-old bank is British institution, is the central bank for the British Colony, is the largest Asian financial institution outside Japan, has over 400 branches in various parts of Asia, and "has maintained a unique relationship with (Red) China.... Now the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation has disclosed its plans to acquire a 51% controlling interest in the Marine Midland Banks, Inc., the 13th largest bank in the United States (whose former director was Sol Linowitz, who negotiated the Panama Canal treaties, to save Midland's and other banks' interests in Torrijos' dictatorship-Ed.)

"Hongkong bank executives see their move into the United States as the first step in a transformation that will make it a 'global bank'. Given time to digest the Marine Midland acquisition the Hongkong bank will then look for a European bank to take over.... It does not operate like United States banks. Unencumbered by Government regulations (it is the government) and since Hongkong law does not require full disclosure of either its profits or its assets, the bank's annual report is a masterpiece of understatement." unquote.

We mention this because, if the subrosa government is "Going to Peking with the Money Power," then the H&S Banking Corp. is the ready-made liaison for such a venture. And there is ample reason to believe that this may be the real behind-the-scenes purpose of the current "Love China, Hate Russia" theme. Our British observer, R. de Bouneville, gives us these pertinent reasons for such a move on the part of the Rockefeller interests:

a) The Western and Third World's debt saturation and therefore trade stagnation in mountainous surpluses. b) The Rockefeller-Rothschild rivalry and the aims of...Zionism. c) The liberal demands for conventional disarmament and nuclear abolishment, allied to universal outrage at Soviet treatment of Jewish dissidents. d) The bankruptcy of New York and the Chase Manhattan Bank. e) The proposed industrialization and nuclearization of the Red Republic of China. f) The media respectability of all Communisms except Soviet Communism.

"To the discerning," says our British authority, this provides "a scene set for momentous changes such as took place in 1913 when the Money Power betook itself to New York from London. A year later the world was all at war; Britain's power began its long decline and the 'Almighty Dollar' its comparatively short supremacy. The ominous thing about history is the frequency with which it repeats itself."

Commenting on the overall confusion (which we noted at the beginning of this letter), especially in Africa, R. de Bouneville has this to say, and we quote her at length:

"Now all these are side steps on the way to world domination when what is required is a decisive move forward. On the understanding that the devil's forces seem always to be divided over minor issues anyway, who better to make that move than the Rockefellers who would thus further the World Zionist cause and at the same time resuscitate their own financial empire... The powers that are seem to have been paving the way to Peking ever since Nixon opened the door with a pingpong ball. It certainly looks as if the move has been accomplished. A very reliable source tells me that the transfer was made through Hongkong. ...How cosy it all is. Diplomatic visits to, and from, the wise, kind Chinese Communists, so different from these nasty Soviets who, horror of horrors, have taken to persecuting the Jews! Then there is this market of eight hundred million people with whom to do some more deficit trade.

"When everybody's up the Marco Polo trail, we should not ignore the signs: Where the Money Power is, there will the supplicants be gathered together. The saturation of the loan markets is making the moneylenders desperate for a really large, goods-destroying war! After all, it is no use having One World at last if no one is producing what its masters want. So, war there must be, not only to achieve One World (the planners hope) but to get it off to a satisfactory start--satisfactory to the rulers, naturally.

"But since, after the destruction of Nazi Germany there was no suitable 'anti-semitic' target ripe for universal condemnation, it became necessary to manufacture one. Hence the semitic nature of the most publicized Soviet dissidents. However, there remains another 'but.' The success of the anti-Vietnam War campaign has made it too difficult to engender the proper enthusiasm in the USA --and possibly Europe too--for war against communism as such. If the British, Europeans and American peoples can be brought to accept without significant protest a triple alliance with Euro- and Sino-communist dominated states, we would be back to a good old fashioned 'fighting for freedom' situation--freedom for the Jews primarily of course, because that has proved the most successful goad to global war in history to date.

When one looks at a map of the world, it appears that there is no better place for financial whiz-ads to be. Since 1913 there has been this 'special relationship' between Britain, the discarded beauty, and her supplanter. We all know what in the subsequent years happened to both of us. Watching the succession of plenipotentiaries, diplomats, soldiers dropping intentional bricks and politicians laying paths with them, we are blind if we do not recognize the foundations of another 'special relationship' this time between the 'west' and China, or, taking Australasia's Asian destiny into account--between the 'West' and the 'East.' That would constitute a three-quarter World Government at least --and if three-quarters why not the whole. The question is, when is this intended to come to fruition? The intensity of the propaganda to make respectable all communisms but Soviet communism does indicate a certain amount of urgency....

"Before we all get too depressed at the seeming 'inevitability of it all' it may cheer us up to remember that no matter what traitorous governments do, proclaim or agree to, if the people won't have it, it's as dead as a bombay duck." (End of extended quotation from "Candour," Forest House, Liss Forest, Hampshire, England GU33 7DD.)

PREPARING FOR WAR?

When a national, or international, economy faces collapse; when the political leadership of a nation is disparaged and ridiculed and total anarchy threatens; when a social system seems on the point of self-destruction; then nations go to war! Thus they may save themselves from utter chaos if they should win - or give themselves an opportunity to start over again from scratch if they should lose. Likewise, when a ruling clique, whether overt or secret, finds itself in a situation where it is likely to be overthrown, then war is promoted, prepared and declared.

"Report From Iron Mountain," published in 1967, was one of the first, and perhaps the only set of "think tank" findings ever to be published openly and commercially. Allegedly the consensus of 15 selected "experts," selected by the Hudson Institute on behalf of State, Defense, and the National Security Council, the Report states quite emphatically that:

"...lasting peace, while not theoretically impossible, is probably unattainable; even if it could be achieved, it would almost certainly not be in the best interests of a stable society to achieve it..." The Report affirms that "War has provided both ancient and modern societies with a dependable system for stabilizing and controlling national economies," and "the permanent possibility of war is the foundation for stable government; it supplies the basis for general acceptance of political authority." The Report also points out this important economic maxim: "War production is exercised outside the framework of the economy of supply and demand. It provides the only critically large segment of the total economy that is subject to complete and arbitrary central control!" Furthermore, in case of total war wage and price controls are automatically expected and accepted, rationing is taken for granted as essential to the war effort, sacrifices are made willingly by the great majority, in the spirit of patriotism. On the economic advantages of war, one writer (David T. Bazelon) is quoted as saying: "Why is war so wonderful? Because it creates artificial demand...the only kind of artificial demand, moreover, that does not raise any political issues; war, and war only, solves the problem of inventory."

Still quoting from the "Report From Iron Mountain": "The war system not only has been essential to the existence of nations, but has been equally indispensable to their stable internal political structure. Without it no government has ever been able to obtain acquiescence in its 'legitimacy,' or right to rule its society...The basic authority of a modern state over its people resides in its war powers."

And we may add that in a time of total war a state of federal dictatorship exists and is accepted and deemed necessary so long as a state of war exists. Ergo: When economic and monetary collapse seems inevitable, when political authority is disregarded and overt leadership openly ridiculed, then war is the historic way of saving a nation and a society (as well as the power and authority of subrosa governments). So, let's observe the situation as it appears today, and see if it indicates that war may be inevitable:

Politically, anarchy may be just around the corner. A tax revolt is growing by the hour. Rebellion against ridiculous rules and regulations laid down by the Big Brother Bureaucracy is also brewing. And respect for the nation's leaders is at a low ebb indeed. "Time" magazine refers to President Carter's staff as The "Georgia Mafia." The L.A. Times of July 23 titled its lead editorial: "First Money (Lance), Then Sex (Jordan), Now Drugs (Bourne)." USN&WR wrote that it is this same Georgia Mafia which has caused most of the scandal: "Drug abuse aide Peter Bourne in hot water for writing a prescription for a controlled drug, made out to a fictitious person. He quit. UN Ambassador Andrew Young, who courts House impeachment with repeated statements at odds with U.S. policy. He has been told to pipe down. Former Budget Director Bert Lance, fighting court battles over some of his Georgia bank dealings. He's still welcome at the White House. Big danger to Carter: Voters will perceive him as a man surrounded by arrogant aides who consider themselves above the law. Nixon revisited."

A special article in "Time" reports a situation that most citizens won't like: It intimates that while Jimmy runs the country, Rosalynn runs Jimmy, hence may be the real boss in the White House (as regards domestic affairs, that is; Zbig is the real boss in foreign affairs). Quotes from the "Time" article: "She [Rosalynn] serves, to an unusual degree, as a critical sounding board for the President's views on public issues. She questions him about events and Carter holds back little... Says Mrs. Carter: 'We're close, and I do question the things he does. It's important to question him, argue with him, about whether this is the right thing to do or not.'... Claims one occupant of the White House West Wing: 'If you want Jimmy to do something, you'd better get Rosalynn on your side first.'... And Carter has confided to at least one staffer: 'I've never won an argument with her, and the only times I thought I had, I found out the argument wasn't over yet.'... Undaunted, Mrs. Carter keeps in touch with what goes on beyond her surprisingly bare desk in a small, unpretentious East Wing office. She slips into Cabinet and high-level meetings, like the one held this month by Vice President Walter Mondale on his return from a Middle East trip. 'I try to stay knowledgeable,' she explains. 'I just try to keep up with what is happening.' Then, in her quiet way, she tells Carter what she thinks. And he listens." (unquote).

None of the foregoing adds prestige to or respect for the Office of the President. But even more serious, in the minds of the majority, is the state of the Union's economy. As the dollar drops in value and inflation soars up into the double digit sphere, neither Jimmy nor Rosalynn, the Georgia Mafia nor the Rockefeller Trilateralists, seem able to slow down the rush toward disaster. Coupled with this national problem is the correlated approaching bankruptcy of the Big Banks. Which leads to the suspicion that in order to save themselves they are going to sacrifice the country (and countries) in another war!

In our Report of May 19, 1978 we wrote: "The speed with which the Communists began to take over country after country since the United States Senate gave away the Canal in Panama might make one believe that this was a signal, a green light telling the Communists that the road was clear for continued conquests, and that we would not interfere. The August 1978 issue of "The Plain Truth" magazine chronicles the results of this policy in an article titled "Who Will Stop Russia?" The article notes that "key allies around the world are having doubts as never before about the ability of the United States to protect the free world against the rapidly mounting Soviet challenge. Will Western Europe, Japan and others be forced to defend themselves--even in defiance of America?" Here are excerpts from the article:

"When a football team produces a quick succession of goals (or first downs in the American version of the game) it acquires what is called 'momentum' and becomes a real threat. The same is true in the arena of international power politics. The Soviet Union has chalked up some impressive gains recently, in Africa (and the Middle East). The geopolitical momentum is clearly on its side. In Europe the buildup of offensive forces continues unabated... Monstrous new missiles... are targeted on West European cities. In conventional weaponry, the gap between the Warsaw Pact and NATO widens.... On the high seas, the Soviets are developing an offensive strike-force navy designed in large part to be able to cut allied shipping lanes... to isolate America...

"The Soviets realize that the United States and the free nations of Europe are presently too formidable to be challenged directly.... Instead, the Kremlin is concentrating on critical areas of the world (that are) supportive of the Western industrial societies--the Middle East, Africa and Asia. The importance of the Afghan coup is geopolitical (and) if Pakistan were to topple, the Soviets could realize a dream dating back to the days of the Czars--a warm-water port on the Indian Ocean.... Senators were warned during the debate on the sale of planes to Israel, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, that the threat to the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf was of serious consequence to the United States. 'What the Soviets need and what they want,' the Senators were told, 'is control of Middle East oil. The Soviets know the value of the region they are surrounding. Does anyone think they care anything about Afghanistan or Yemen or Ethiopia? The point is that while everyone is drawing attention to the confrontation states at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, we had better watch out for the back door and what the Soviets and Cubans are up to in the Arabian Peninsula and the Persian Gulf.... Whoever controls that oil will control the economic lifeblood of the West. Let the Soviets control that oil, and where will the United States be?"

This warning was bolstered by a professional and well qualified witness. Vice Admiral W.J. Crowe, USN, Chief of Naval Operations for Plans, Policy and Operations, addressing an Annual Current Strategy Forum at the Naval War College last March, said in part:

"The littoral nations of the Persian Gulf possess a resource which... will literally become vital to the political and economic health of the free world... the Western world will not be able to afford serious interruptions in their access to that region. Make no mistake about it. So long as NATO and Japan are so dependent on Persian Gulf oil, the United States will be deeply involved--no matter how resourceful Washington is in solving its own petroleum problems. Moscow is already in a position to bring pressure to bear on Saudi Arabia and its oil routes to Europe.... The future incentives for Soviet intervention in the Gulf promise to increase dramatically. More disturbingly, these benefits ultimately may become sufficient to outweigh the risks and to convince the communist leadership that direct military action would be warranted. It would be the height of folly for the free world to ignore or discount such a possibility.... Unfortunately, the need to deter future Soviet aggression in the Persian Gulf has not received the attention it demands in U.S. and allied force planning... To fight effectively in the littoral of the Gulf we will need control of the adjacent waters and secure routes of supply...."

However, to all intents and purposes--and perhaps by design--Washington is asleep to this danger. And while Washington sleeps, the Soviet drive for world controls gains more momentum! Was it planned this way? A prominent international investment expert made this prediction: "The end result? Watch out for the possibility of a massive reshuffling in world alliances... Given America's present foreign policy, the United States could be left alone in the world without allies....We have an extraordinary foreign policy: Abandon friends, subsidize enemies....When the massive reshuffling is over, the result will be a United Europe unified in the face of the Soviet threat, standing apart, if need be, in defiance of the United States."

Now, as a compatriot is wont to say, "Let's get down to the nitty-gritty." If we believe in the Conspiracy Theory, then we must also believe that. "It was planned this way." Ergo: If a New World Order is being established, then the country with the greatest land mass and the greatest multitude of people must be brought into this New World Order. The convergence of American Corporate Socialism and Russian Soviet Communism is well along the way. Now, the time for integrating the People's Republic of Red China has come. It must be opened up for investment and development, for the promotion of commerce and the utilization of its natural resources—including the human.

However, since there is a certain competition for Communist leadership of the world, Soviet Russia may look askance at any such plan. And, letting the Soviets advance at will on the one hand while promoting their arch competitor on the other hand could be displeasing to Russian leaders, and this could lead to war! But wars are panaceas for sick economies, are far better than abortions and pills for controlling the world's population; and if a few national governments are abolished in the process, so what? National governments are not required when a World Government becomes omnipotent. Regional administrative centers are all that will be needed. So, at the risk of a world conflagration, the hand of friendship is extended to our former enemy, Red China. Witness:

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts in the L.A. Times of July 23: "This is a period of transition in the United States' relations with China and the Soviet Union. Since last winter when...I visited the People's Republic, the promise of a genuine Sino-American rapprochement has grown. At the same time, U.S.-Soviet relations have been subjected to new--and increasing--strains....Brzezinski concluded a successful visit last May...and presidential Science and Technology Adviser Frank Press just two weeks ago returned from China having led the highest-level science-policy delegation ever to be sent from the United States to another country...."

From the Washington Post of July 14: "China has more than $2 billion in foreign currency reserves but will need extensive additional foreign funds in two years to finance its modernization program, Kyodo News Service reported...."

From USN&WR of July 31: "It is Vice Premier Teng Hsiao-ping, once purged by the late Chairman Mao Tse-tung for not being revolutionary enough, who American intelligence officials believe is the driving force behind the switch in China's policy to form much closer ties with the United States."

From the New York Times of July 23: "A new era appears to be opening up in China's economic relations with Japan. The two major Oriental powers, which remained at arm's length for nearly 29 years...are planning a mass of joint industrial projects....."

Thus the next step in the march toward the New World Order. How pleasant our Pursuit of Happiness might have been if we had followed the advice of our first President: "It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world."

ONE CURRENCY FOR THE WORLD?

"Needed: A Common World Currency." So asserts the title of an article in the May issue of "PHP," a monthly magazine published in Tokyo by a dominantly Japanese editorial staff. It is in English, however, and is aimed at a world-wide audience. The title initials of the magazine stand for "Peace, Happiness and Prosperity." The author of the article in "PHP" is Komosupe Matsushita, founder of the multinational electric and home appliance industry, Matsushita Electric. In this article Matsushita concludes:

"We need to integrate the wide variety of currencies we have now. In other words. I suggest we agree on the use of one currency that will be common in all countries of the world....I am fully aware of the numerous problems that would be involved, such as national pride, differences in economic level and so on. However, if we want to continue our community life on this planet, we're going to have to integrate our currencies at the earliest possible moment...I suggest the United Nations or the International Monetary Fund take up the problem, seek to overcome the difficulties which lie in the way by eliciting the the cooperation, effort and wisdom of every country, and therefore achieve an integration of the world's currencies for the peace, happiness and prosperity of the world." (unquote).

Henry Hazlitt, eminent free enterprise economist, comments on Matsushita's article in the August 1978 issue of "The Freeman." He writes, in part:

"The hope that Mr. Matsushita expresses is one that has been voiced by reformers (and One Worlders-Ed.) for more than a century....He (Matsushita) refers to the wild fluctuations in international exchange rates in the past few years. He points out that at the beginning of 1977 it took 290 yen to buy a dollar, but by the end of the year only 240 (as we write this, it takes only 185 yen to buy a dollar-Ed.). He reminds his readers that in December 1971 The Group of Ten countries met in Washington to set up a new international system, known as the 'Smithsonian' agreement, hailed at the time as 'the most important monetary agreement in history'-and that it broke down in a year or so. After that the world entered a 'floating currency' era. But this means that every day the exchange rate of every national currency fluctuates in terms of every other. It means that no one can foresee what any given currency will be worth in terms of any other a year from now, or even tomorrow. And so it means that every man engaged in import or export trade, or in any international business whatever, is forced to some extent to become a gambler....

"A profound irony in Mr. Matsushita's proposals is that he wants to turn over the problem of curing the world's currency ills to the International Monetary Fund. But the IMF is the problem. It was set up at Bretton Woods, chiefly under the leadership of Lord Keynes of England (A Fabian Socialist-Ed.) and Harry Dexter White (a Communist-Ed.) of the United States, to make inflation easier, smoother, and respectable. Instead of letting each country suffer the full consequences of its own inflation, the IMF used the stronger currencies to support the weaker. The long-run effect was only to weaken the stronger currencies....One of the first steps in any real currency reform would be to dismantle the IMF....No international organization can wave a magic wand or draft a magic formula that will bring a sound 'world' currency....Each nation must bear full responsibility for its own currency. Because of the dismal recent record of practically all countries in swindling their own citizens, the return to an honest convertible currency may now be difficult and remote. Individual nations can begin by strictly limiting any further expansion of their credit and currency issues...." (End of extended quotation).

Mr. Hazlitt concludes that the only kind of "common currency" for the world that will succeed would be a return to the gold standard on the part of all nations. However, any such idea was long ago dismissed by the world's Money Barons. They, along with their elitist partners the Monopoly Capitalists and the International Socialists, intend to own and control all the material wealth and resources of the world, while arranging that the worth and wealth of all others will be expressed by a computer-bank entry following a number which will identify the specific person. Among themselves, however, the elitists will require some sort of "world currency" for their dealings among themselves and their various cartels and corporations, and whatever government agencies they will find it necessary to maintain.

The most recent achievement toward fulfillment of this latter goal has been the agreement to establish a common currency for the European Economic Community. Don Cook of the "L.A. Times," writing from Paris under date of July 12, gave an account of this important new venture. We quote:

"By agreeing last week in Bremen to create a new European Monetary System, the Common Market heads of government took what will probably turn out to be the greatest leap forward in European unity since the Schuman Plan of 1950. ...Under the Bremen agreement, the Common Market will create a European currency unit to be known as the ECU, which also is a French word for a gold coin circulated in the days of the Bourbon kings. The Bremen agreement calls for each country joining the European monetary system--which will also be open to countries outside the Common Market, such as Sweden, Switzerland, and Norway--to place 20% of its gold and dollar reserves in a central pool which will be denominated in ECUs. The ECU's value will be close to that of the dollar but will not fluctuate like the dollar. The fund will be managed by a central authority, perhaps something comparable to the U.S. Federal Reserve, which may intervene in the money markets to keep the member currencies relatively stable....This new leap forward in Europe has been deliberately designed by Schmidt (of West Germany) and Giscard (of France) not merely as a challenge to the Common Market but to the United States as well." (Unquote). In the manner intended by the reporter's use of the word "challenge," the United States accepted the challenge when U.S. Treasury Secretary Blumenthal informed the Common Market Countries that the United States approved of the creation of the ECU.

For a further and later report, we refer to the July 31 issue of "Spotlight": "To replace the downgraded dollar, the nations of the European Economic Community have agreed to create a new currency which will fulfill both the role of international denominator and world reserve tender--the two key functions until now reserved for the dollar. The ECU...will be backed in gold and hard currency reserves...and firmly insulated against any fluctuations or disturbances caused by the instability of the dollar. To further eliminate U.S. economic leadership and the influence of dollar transactions, the European nations have agreed to replace the American dominated International Monetary Fund with a European Monetary Fund endowed with over $500 billion in liquid assets--almost a third more than the IMF now commands....

"Most ominously...the oil-producing nations of the OPEC cartel will also move to discard the dollar...the Arabs have agreed to switch to the new ECU as the denominator of oil prices and the tender of all energy transactions--a decision which is bound to set off another spiral of gas price increases in the U.S. and add fuel to the already devastating inflation in this country. Thus the Carter White House will attain at least one of its oft-propagated goals--higher gasoline prices--although not quite the way it had in mind. Beyond that, the profound consequences of this economic watershed are difficult to predict."

Because we import more than we export, it is true that the creation of the ECU is going to cause trouble for the dollar at home as well as abroad. An economic forecaster recently wrote that "around the corner is what appears to be the final blow-off of the greatest inflationary spiral of the past 40 years. The result, unfortunately, will be the complete destruction of the dollar."

Dr. Franz Pick, one of the world's most respected experts on monetary affairs says: "The most serious problem we face today is the debasement of our currency by the government. The dollar has been debased somewhere between 76% and 92% since 1940. The government will continue to debase the dollar until it is worth about a nickel. Then it will repudiate its debts by exchanging 10 to 20 old dollars for each new dollar.... In the end the only things of value will be gold or silver."

The creation of the ECU by Schmidt of West Germany and Giscard of France is their defense against the debased dollar; and it is important to note that the ECU is backed by gold and hard currencies, while the dollar now is backed by nothing more than confidence. Creation of the ECU means that Europe has lost confidence in the dollar and can do something about it. Here in the U.S., the people also are beginning to lose confidence in the dollar and many are trying to do something about it by exchanging it for gold, silver, real estate, art objects, precious stones, whatever they can obtain that is backed by something more than public confidence. However, the great majority must continue to rely on the dollar and must accept the government's premise that "inflation is a fact of life and absolutely inescapable, and the best Government can do is to try to keep inflation controlled at, say, 5% a year instead of the current double digit spiral. In this connection, we were impressed by a paragraph in Gary North's "Remnant Review" of July 7. Regarding "a belief in the inevitability of inflation," he wrote: "This is the crisis of crises. When the voting public feels it cannot successfully deal with the economic crisis of our era, price inflation, then the crisis is here. When they want something done, but they don't understand what needs to be done, then they are being set up for the 'man on the white horse,' the man with the statist answers. People in the doom and gloom camp keep prophesying a crisis (though not the same crisis), but the major crisis is already at the door and growing. (It is) the acceptance of the philosophy which says that price inflation is now normal and that only extraordinary measures by the Federal Government will be sufficient to reverse this trend (or at least keep it under control).... It is a crisis of spirit.... The next step has to be more inflation, and then the call for extraordinary measures...."

Those "extraordinary measures" will probably mean a new kind of currency.. accompanied by more loss of liberty. Or, there could be the elimination of all currency as we know it now, and the adoption of a universal debit card which will make us slaves to a data bank, where debit and credit units are recorded for each numbered person.

Such a system would require a national (finally an international) identity card --and a national identity card means that a police state is imminent. Already legislation has been introduced for the issuance of "forgery proof", laminated Social Security cards to all workers. Employers would be compelled to refuse jobs to those not having such a card. This bill is aimed at controlling illegal workers from Mexico. But, they could also be used as identity cards for data processing a person's debit or credit standing in a no-money society. People without such a card would be "non-people." As James Longley suggests, It is time for the people to do what the politicians won't do:--

QUOTABLE AND EMULATIVE. James Longley has been Governor of Maine for the past 3½ years. He is not a professional politician, was coaxed into running as an independent candidate, but for one term only. He does not choose to run for re-election; but his one and only term has been phenomenal. A $100 million deficit was changed into a $41 million surplus; not by raising taxes, but by pruning 2,000 bureaucrats from the State payroll, by tightening welfare rules, by cutting officials' expense accounts and by eliminating the departmental duplications. Interviewed by Marvin Stone, editor of USN&WR, his statements became the subject of an editorial which appears in the newsweekly's issue of August 7. Governor Longley said in part:

"Government is obsessed with the idea that it can be the great equalizer, that it can guarantee to every man, woman and child the same pay, the same house, the same clothes, the same health care. Many of the welfare and unemployment checks we put into the mail only serve to chip away a little of the pride and dignity of the individual.

"Government is too often served by people who couldn't meet the standards government expects and requires in the business world and doesn't always apply to itself.

"Washington has moved too much into State, local and private affairs. It has become almost an uncontrollable socialistic system that negates and inhibits individual initiative, pride and dignity....we've got a self-defeating system.

"After almost four years in government, I am convinced that the changes necessary to get America back on the course designed by our Founding Fathers cannot be entrusted solely to the two major political parties. We must have more involvement by people and less control by politicians. I feel that the real party professionals, and too many politicians and elected officials, spend only about 10% of their time, or less, doing the jobs they were elected to do and a good 90% of their time seeking re-election or starting a new program that will help insure re-election, at the expense of the taxpayers and more and more cancerous inflation due to the malignant growth and expense of government bureaucracies....

"California's Proposition 13, putting a limit on property taxes, is a message to elected officials that 'you're not doing your job.' It's a message to officials that are spending, and to bureaucrats that are taking advantage of the spending. I think it's a modern Boston Tea Party....

"What is happening in America today...is more of a realization of the working men and women, the middle Americans, that they're the ones being impacted adversely with inflation and taxes. And inflation is a tax....." (Unquote).

What Governor Longley seems to be saying is that the people who pay the taxes are beginning to feel it in their pocketbooks and their stomachs, and they are beginning to do something about it. And we need more Boston Tea Parties.

THE ELECTROMAGNETIC WORLD WAR

Before being put out to pasture by the Presidium of the Communist Party of the USSR, Nikita Khrushchev was heard to say, "What the scientists have in their briefcases is frightening." He was not speaking of Russian scientists, he was talking about scientists of the East and the West working together, cooperating with each other as they have cooperated in the conquest of space, and as they have in international weather modification programs, and in the highly important field of electromagnetic radiation. The greatest manifestation of this type of cooperation occurred last year when, with permission of the U.S. Government, a 40-ton magnet was shipped to Soviet Russia and installed by American scientists and technicians. This is the world's largest magnet, is said to be capable of generating a magnetic field 250,000 times greater than that of the Earth itself. It seems that such a mammoth magnet was required to continue the study of electromagnetic radiation and its application in the spheres of weather modification, space exploration (UFOs?), brainwashing of whole populations and various killer weapons, the chiefest of which would be the Particle Beam Death Ray, the "ultimate weapon" which can totally annihilate everything in its path.

Prior to the setting up of this giant magnet by American technicians in the Soviet Union, various secret conferences had been held between US and USSR officials on the subject of cooperation in international weather modification and allied subjects. In his book, "The Cooling," (Prentice-Hall, 1976) the author, Lowell Ponte, referred to the summit conference of 1974 held in Vladivostok, Siberia between the newly appointed Gerald Ford and Henry Kissinger on the one side, and Leonid Brezhnev and other Soviet officials on the other. Ponte said that many aspects of that conference have been kept secret from the public; such as the fact that joint US-USSR Weather Modification programs were agreed upon, but were considered too controversial to be mentioned publicly. It was after this meeting that the Soviet Union began to work seriously on the business of controlling the weather for the purpose of using such control as a weapon of war, as well as for moderating the climate in the Russian wheat belt.

Using methods first proposed by the electrical genius Nikola Tesla, the Soviet experimenters set up four incredibly high-powered transmitters in specified locations, and began sending out powerful coordinated radiopulses. Tesla had written that this would make it possible to manipulate the earth's magnetic field. Thus the course of giant wind patterns could be controlled--the jet stream, for example; and this would control the weather itself. The first Soviet experiments apparently did little more than disrupt radio signals all over the world and cause some electrical blackouts in various countries. However, in 1976 the Soviets launched three new satellites which were to be used to coordinate those signals sent out by the ground-based transmitters. That winter there was snow in Miami, Florida for the first time in recorded history, temperature readings of 45 degrees fahrenheit in Nome, Alaska, and the weather was remarkably moderate in the Soviet Union.

Next, as the 1977 winter approached, the Soviets began a new series of configured high-energy transmissions, and unusual things happened. Heavy rains returned to California after two years of record drought, flooding towns and destroying both people and property. In many parts of the Eastern Seaboard, cold records were made, buildings collapsed under the weight of never-before-witnessed record snowfalls. Hurricane force winds tore across Europe, and earthquakes began to erupt all over the planet.

"The Soviet experiments got out of control," said Dr. Andrew Michrowski, an expert on Tesla who is a technologies specialist in the office of Canada's Secretary of State. He said, "They created these giant changes in the earth's magnetic field, but then they could not dissipate the standing waves, although they tried to neutralize them with new waves. This is the reason for both the crazy weather and the earthquakes--and the airquakes, too." Airquakes are those unusual booms first heard off the northeast coast last December, 1977. These were said to be Soviet attempts to coordinate radio pulses generating an incredible release of electromagnetic energy "like an explosion caused at a targeted spot by transmitters located thousands of miles away."

Being unable to "control" such experiments, the Soviets stopped, at least temporarily, their weather experiments to await the arrival of the giant magnet and some highly sophisticated computers that were made only in the United States, and would be required to "control" future weather experiments. They then reportedly turned to experiments concerned with developing the electromagnetic radiation program that would produce the ultimate weapon, the Particle Beam Death Ray.

Meanwhile here in the United States, the Pentagon was also working on weather modification programs, but on a much lower scale. Congress decided it should get into the act, and passed the "National Weather Modification Policy Act", in 1976. This law called for the establishment of a "Weather Modification Advisory Board" to be operated under the Department of Commerce. The Board was to make its first report last October but asked for more time. At that meeting an interesting bit of testimony developed. The appointed Chairman of the Board told the House Committee that cloud-seeding was about all that had been done by the United States. He made passing references to the Soviet Union's attempt to redirect the flow of some Russian rivers (to change the climate). Then--and now we quote from the "L.T. Patterson Strategy Letter" of March 1978:

"...Rep. Robert Walker of Pa. asked about the USSR, quote: 'There is a published report that the Soviets have already begun to intervene in the business of weather modification and the fact that there is a CIA study showing the Soviets have already been involved.... Are you aware of any such study and has it ever come to your attention that the Soviets have used this as part of military policy?'. ...The Board Chairman: 'They have agreed not to do it for hostile purposes on a substantial scale. In fact the US and USSR co-sponsored the UN convention that was adopted by the General Assembly.' Mr. Walker persisted: 'Are you aware of a CIA study?' The Board Chairman: 'I am not sure I register on a CIA study.'... This was the extent of the questioning by this committee regarding Soviet weather modification. But WHO is the head of the Weather Modification Board? Who stumbled over the question of Russian activity in weather modification? None other than Harlan Cleveland, the known one-world socialist agitator, who even the State Department refused to grant clearance for!!.... shocked? Probably so. I know I was." (unquote).

Soviet weather experiments may have ended for a while, but the standing waves of electromagnetic radiation they created are still messing up the weather in the United States, Europe and parts of Africa. However, we must turn to that far more dangerous Soviet experiment with weapons of war. And this requires a closer look to the works of one Nikola Tesla:--

The "Slavic Thomas Edison" was the world's first, and greatest, genius in the field of electricity and electromagnetic radiation. Son of a Croatian preacher, he came to the United States from Belgrade in 1884. He arrived with four cents in his pocket and a vision in his mind. To quote from an article by Tom Tiede of Ottawa, Canada: "Tesla's accomplishments were like the dreams of an intoxicated god. He was responsible for modern radio, he perfected neon and fluorescent lighting, he invented radar 40 years before World War II, and he created robots a century before Star Wars. The exact number of his patents is unknown; it is more than 125. Nikola Tesla's greatest achievement was the discovery of the rotating magnetic field, the fundamental element of alternating current... Tesla's A/C was to change the whole nature of power. He teamed up with George Westinghouse to establish the first polyphase alternating current system in America, at Niagara Falls... John O'Neill, Tesla's biographer, says every transmission pole in the world is a monument to that moment... He talked incessantly of death rays, impenetrating waves of energy and other items never produced (during his lifetime, at least—Ed.). Tesla said he knew how to destroy the Empire State Building through electrical vibrations from a palm-sized box. He said he could create a beam of light that could send fuel to ships at sea. He actually began one effort, financed by J.P. Morgan, to create a system that would transmit energy around the world without the aid of wires. This latter work, according to Dr. Michrowski and others, is what is being used by the Russians today to modify the weather. Tesla said the ground is 'literally alive with electrical vibrations,' therefore it can be used as a conductor. Tesla said electricity can be driven into the earth at one point and brought out at another. He used a coil of his own invention to prove his hypothesis. He worked in a Frankensteinian laboratory in the Rocky Mountains, complete with regular thunderstorms from above. He was able to create his own lightning, to bounce wireless current back and forth on the globe, and to illuminate 200 bulbs via earth 26 miles away." (Unquote).

Tesla discovered the Particle Beam Death Ray, which is said to destroy and instantly explode and disintegrate every object in its destructive path. He also said he knew how to surround any nation with walls of electric fire that would make any enemy unable to invade by means of rockets, armies, planes, or anything else. He invented a method of controlling weather by electromagnetism, knew low frequency electromagnetic fields could be used to make whole nations of people desperately ill (Legionnaire's disease?), destroy their mental faculties, cause them to do desperate things such as commit murder or arson, or to submit like sheep and do absolutely nothing, or simply to die. He offered all of his discoveries to the United States to be used as weapons of defense. But the U.S. Government spurned the offer. Disappointed, he died in 1941. The Government seized his papers, blue prints, models, etc., sent them to Yugoslavia where a monument was to be established in his honor. It was from there that the Soviet authorities obtained Tesla's records, began to develop the theories he had propounded.

Said Ernest L. Miller, editor of "The Truth Crusader": "The Soviets now have absolute control of weather globally by exploiting Tesla's blueprints which we gave them via Yugoslavia. The Soviet Union, with the knowledge, if not the approval of the Trilateral Commission which now totally controls our government, our news media, our schools, our entire economy, is waging a highly destructive secret technological warfare against the people of the United States. During 1976-77-78 the United States has experienced the worst floods and droughts and the most destructive storms, and the bitterest, most paralyzing cold in its entire history." (unquote).

However, something even more subtle, more unbelievable and more horrifying concerns what the CIA has referred to as "electromagnetic brainwashing."

As early as 1952, physicist W.O. Schuman confirmed Tesla's theories in one phase of his research in electromagnetic radiation, and furnished mathematical proof that our earth and its atmosphere have a magnetic field that oscillates at a resonant frequency which is identical to that of human brainwaves. If that frequency is altered, then both humans and animals are affected, having "psychological sensitivity to magnetic and electrical fields in extremely low frequency ranges" and "entire geographical areas of people can be controlled and mood-manipulated by electromagnetic energy projected into the highly sensitive ionosphere; and that manipulated oscillations can, through the ionosphere, affect the moods, consciousness, stress, and health cycles in people and in all life forms anywhere on the earth." Lowell Ponte, author and former research specialist with the Pentagon--consulted "International Research and Technology Corporation," a think-tank, explains:

"The frequency range of normal human brain waves range from one to fifteen Hertz... In CIA research with human subjects, it was found that each person has critical frequencies that unlock doors in the mind to tranquility, to disorientation, and to intense pain... The Navy has funded extensive research by Yale University physiologist Dr. Jose M.R. Delgado... In his book, "Physical Control of the Mind; Toward a Psychocivilized Society" (published in 1969) Dr. Delgado waxed eloquent about how he could 'shock into goodness' any wrong-thinking individual. But the CIA went further, finding that you could change a person's mind without attaching electrodes to the frontal lobes (of the brain) at all. Through Project Pandora's research, the CIA took a long step toward electrical control of the mind and opened further the dark box of a future psychocivilization. But the Soviets have researched electromagnetic radiation effects far longer than have the CIA or the Pentagon, and in October 1976 they began an experiment that dwarfs anything the U.S. military has contemplated. The Soviets began tampering with Earth's magnetic field..." (Unquote).

A Soviet publication, "International Life," explains how atmospheric electricity can be used to suppress the mental activity of groups or individuals anywhere, any distance, any time, and create feelings of depression, fear, panic, and terror. The "Arizona Republic" of 11/22/77 contained an AP dispatch telling how Soviet microwaves and Electronic Technology are being used to create thoughts and impressions in the minds of unsuspecting victims."

Finally, there are independent publications that tell of other types of weapons that are being developed by the Soviets. One such publication, "The Star," in its issue of 11/1/77 reported "The Soviet Union is ahead of all other nations in developing parapsychology... They are using these powers on a massive scale..." The National Observer" of 8/23/77 reports that "The Russians already have the capability to create deadly mind weapons and send deadly psychic energy thousands of miles to trigger massive heart attacks and strokes. They can broadcast fiendish invisible thought waves by 'psychic radio' that can infiltrate and control the minds of leaders--or drive them stark, raving mad."

Believable? Well, we know that the Soviets are pouring billions into development of the "occult sciences." We also know that witchcraft and Satan worship are flourishing throughout the world. But we also know that "God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind."

"PLAYING THE CHINA CARD"

In a recent interview President Carter was asked about the deterioration in Soviet-American relations, and did this constitute a threat to world peace? He answered: "When we do have differences, I think they ought not to be concealed and fester; they should be brought out into the open. There's no doubt that President Brezhnev understands very clearly my positions on these issues. But I don't believe that our relationships with the Soviet Union are deteriorating to the extent that there's a threat to world peace..." Then asked about the steps being taken to strengthen ties with Red China at the risk of alienating allies and provoking the Soviets, Carter admitted we are "playing the China card." "We have had the Secretary of State go to China; the national security adviser's been to China; we've had a very high-level group involved with science and technology go to China. There have been increasing numbers of business leaders going to China to work out trade and investment possibilities, including, for instance, oil production. We will have additional cabinet members going to China within the next few weeks. This is a result of our own effort to have better relations with the People's Republic, and also their forthcoming attitude toward the Western World.... One of our goals, ultimately, is to have normal relations with China, but the pace of that progress has to be a mutual thing. The Chinese and we are patient."

In line with the above statement, "Business Week" of 8/21/78 observes in its Washington Outlook section, that "The Carter Administration is quietly pushing its campaign to influence Soviet policy through pressure on trade and technology transfer.... The Administration announced that it was killing the sale of a Sperry Univac computer to Tass... Now the U.S. has asked the British, the French, the Germans, and the Japanese to hold up any sales of a substitute system to Tass." In a similar vein, the "London Economist" of 8/12/78 notes:

"The hitherto leftwing Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers.... voted to suspend exchange visits with the Soviet Union.... (and) Mr. Peter Hain, long-time campaigner against apartheid and more recent convert to the Labour Party ... called for a boycott of the 1980 Moscow Olympics: 'Through the iniquitous repression and harassment of its critics... the Soviet Union has clearly forfeited its right to stage the world's number one spectacle!.. The Russians may come to find their generally close relations with British trade unionism sorely strained, if not broken.'"

In an effort to explain what's really going on (but without exposing any Trilateral Commission secrets), USN&WR's "Worldgram" of 8/21/78 says: "Russia and China are locked into a bitter, irreconcilable struggle for domination of the Communist world. Both try to play the 'American Card.' Peking's plan: Enlist U.S. support against a Soviet effort to gain military domination over China, the rest of Asia, Mideast and Western Europe. Moscow's plan: Use its drive against dissidents at home, its power plays in Africa, disputes over strategic-arms talks to maintain tension in relations with the U.S.--but not to the point of forcing Carter to move closer to China. One sign the Sino-Soviet conflict may be entering a new phase: Chairman Hua Kuo-feng's mid-August visit, first to (Rumania, then to Yugoslavia and Iran). The unprecedented diplomatic foray by China's top leader rang alarm bells in the Kremlin, forced Rumanian President Ceausescu to give Russia's Brezhnev his personal assurances that nothing was amiss in the Soviet's back yard. Three reasons the Russians are upset over Hua's venture abroad. . . First, Ceausescu and Yugoslavia's President Tito --Eastern Europe's Communist mavericks--refuse to toe the Soviet line. Both nurture closer ties with Peking, would welcome Chinese backing for their independent stands. Second, unrest is a common factor in Eastern Europe and Chinese meddling stirs memories of earlier revolts in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany. Third, Hua's trip also coincides with rising tensions in the volatile Balkans, where Yugoslavia and Bulgaria squabble over rival claims on Macedonia. And behind the Chinese move? Basically, Peking wants to gain allies for its struggle with Russia. . . ." (Unquote).

Something that USN&WR omitted in its explanation: There is more than military preparation involved when Ceausescu of Rumania is consulted. Rumania was set up as a nation half capitalist and half communist. That is, Rumania has a form of socialism in which the government is the source and residual owner of the means of production, but a few selected capitalists actually operate the means of production (this is also called State Capitalism and/or Corporate Socialism, and is the form of government the Trilateralists plan for the United States). As a sort of halfway house between Capitalism and Communism, the President of Rumania is ideally situated to act as a go-between whenever important changes in International Power Balances are contemplated. We have it on very reliable sources that when Kissinger first went to Peking, it was Ceausescu who made the arrangements; when Sadat first went to Jerusalem, it was Ceausescu who made the arrangements. Now Hua Kuo-feng has consulted with Ceausescu and we can expect that a new "Balance Of Power Between Nations" is now being arranged. The first step in such a power transition was taken when, after years of diplomatic and commercial "cold-shouldering", a Sino-Japanese peace treaty and friendship pact has been concluded. The potential: With Red China, a giant in landspace and in manpower, allied with Japan, a giant in industry and technical know-how, the Orient could soon come to rule the world, without ever having made another military incursion!

This seems to be the game plan as the Trilateralists coerce the US Government into "Playing the Red China Card," even at the risk of war with the USSR!

That Red China is cooperating, even to the point of changing its system of government (though not abandoning Socialism) is evident in the following dispatch with appeared in the "Chicago Tribune" of 8/16/78:

"Hong Kong (AP)--The Chinese are setting up corporations which will act as nationwide procuring and distributing companies for various products. . . . The new structure is part of a trend toward increased specialization in China's foreign trade apparatus. . . . a 17-member U.S. agricultural machinery delegation on a two-week trip to China. . . met officials of the China Agricultural Machinery Corp. . . . It is one of several similar corporations established by the Chinese, including the China Synthetic Fiber Corp.; the China Coal Mechanization Corp.; the China Natural Gas and Petroleum Exploration and Exploitation Corp.; and the China Shipbuilding Corp. . . . For example, the China Agricultural Corporation forms the center of a system of local agricultural machinery corporations which. . . are being set up in every province in China. They will be in control of day-to-day operations and will report to the main corporation. . . ."

Here is that intended next step in the establishment of the New World Order: A re-orientation of the power balance between nations; a policy initiated by Henry Kissinger and now being developed by Zbigniew Brzezinski on behalf of the sub rosa government which is "playing with atomic fire" and risking a world conflagration in an attempt to gain its ultimate goal. This has brought about an almost unnoticed change in the direction of US foreign policy. Under Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon, the Federal Administration bowed toward Moscow, but under Carter it kowtows toward Peking. That we are doublecrossing our friends and former allies seems of little importance to the powers in high places. The danger of such a program--whether it be the currying of favor with the Reds of China or with the Reds of Moscow--was pointed out quite dramatically by an official of the free and independent Republic of China, Dr. Ku Cheng-kang, who spoke at a Captive Nations Rally held at Taipei, Taiwan last July 21. Here is a part of what Dr. Ku said:

"Freedom is no less dear, if not dearer, than life itself. It is the quality of the inalienable dignity of man's life. Enunciations such as 'Give us liberty or give us death' have reverberated throughout history.... The Red bloc is bent on burying free nations, but free world appeasers have been seeking common interests as grounds for rapport. This has enabled the Communists to trick free nations into supplying them with food stuff and sophisticated facilities... Contradiction does exist between Peiping and Moscow but... their disputes do not change the fundamental premise and (America's) attempts to use Peiping against Moscow are serious mistakes... Backward, poor and confused Peiping does not have the strength to check Moscow (but) to inject strength into Peiping for the sake of harnessing Moscow is to repeat the post World War II mistake of helping Russian growth. We must point out that Peiping is trying to pull the US to its side just so that American strength can be employed against the Russian threat (to Communist China). The Americans in the meantime are referred to as 'U.S. Imperialists,' to be dealt with later. Peiping is eagerly playing the 'American Card' in an attempt to prosecute its grand scheme: the provocation of US-USSR hostilities so as to bury both the 'Russian Revisionists' and the 'American Imperialists' in nuclear ashes, thus killing two birds without even using a stone." (Unquote).

Just how great are the "differences" separating Soviet Communism and Chinese Communism is something of an unknown quantity. But this is certain: Communism is Communism, regardless of the doctrinal differences that may divide one faction from another; and any freedom loving person can have nothing in common with any form of totalitarianism. Realizing that the average American citizen has an innate aversion to political or economic slavery, and certainly to police state conditions such as exist in Mainland China, the Controlled Media is currently flooding the papers and the airwaves with subtle propaganda that is designed to develop a national tolerance toward Communist China. One of the most marked manifestations of this is the glorification of the works of an author named Theodore H. White, an old leftwing "China hand" whom this reporter met in Chungking, China during World War II. White was pro-Mao and anti-Chiang; did everything within his power as a reporter for Time and Life to exalt the former and degrade the latter. White has recently written a book, "In Search of History," which has a chapter on China. He has received plaudits and much space in "The New York Times" and similar publications. More surprisingly, White and his book are reviewed glowingly in--of all publications--"Business Week," and by the "International Money Management" editor, Bruce Nussbaum. Nussbaum says White "presents us with several important lessons in how Mao won sway over the people of China while Chiang failed." Following this brass perversion of the truth about China, Nussbaum tells us that "the China section of White's book is far the best, and here we see America's dream at its best and worst. White shows us how an alliance with the tiny, isolated, but Christian and Americanized elite of Chiang Kai Shek's government... was both natural for the U.S. and a dreadful mistake. For the vision of America led it to link up with men who seemed to be very much like us, but who were, at the same time, very much unlike the Chinese people they were supposed to lead. In the end it was Mao's communists who emerged as leaders of the peasantry, first against the Japanese and then against Chiang."

Correction, please: It was the work of such men as Theodore White, Owen Lattimore, Philip Jessup, John Stewart Service, Joe Stillwell, Mark Gayne et al who made it possible for Chiang Kai-shek's government "to fall without it being apparent that it was pushed." Through the efforts of such as these, the withholding of promised U.S. military supplies became the major factor in Mao's victory; he emerged as "leader of the peasants" by ordering the murder of an estimated 50 million Chinese!

The current crusade to brainwash Americans into accepting Communism has its most insidious expression in the move to Communize the U.S. education system. At the University of Illinois, 11/17/77, Mary F. Berry, U.S. Assistant Secretary for Education, gave a speech titled "The Chinese Experience in Education: What America Stands to Learn." In an important article in "The National Educator" for August, Barbara Morris reports:

"Red China has eliminated testing and grades. The U.S. is rapidly going the same route. Testing is being downgraded...grades...are just about meaningless. For the Reds, according to Ms. Berry, truth is a relative concept. In U.S. schools students are taught the same thing in 'values clarification'. It's called situation ethics and it means it's okay to lie or cheat or steal or kill when it suits your purpose. In Red China, according to Ms. Berry, education must serve the masses. Ditto the U.S. Only the semantics is different here. In the U.S. education is not designed for the benefit of individuals, but for society. 'Society' or 'masses'--what's the difference? In Red China, says Ms. Berry, education must be combined with productive labor. It starts at six... with Children working at least one hour a day producing voice boxes for dolls. At the middle school level, children make auto parts as part of the school day. ...Secretary Berry admits, 'We will draw on the Chinese model.'..The U.S. Office of Education is working on development of Lifelong Learning programs--another Chinese import. Such programs will enable people to work and study their entire lives for the benefit of the state. Ms Berry admitted U.S. Lifelong Learning programs are indeed drawn in the Chinese experience, that such programs are expected to meet the 'needs for intellectual fulfillment and social growth. It is here that the Chinese have set the pattern for the world to follow, and it is here that American higher education may have its last, best opportunity for growth'. Berry is not talking about the future when she recommends radical proposals for U.S. education. A meeting of the National Council for the Social Studies, held in Cincinnati last November, featured several presentations on Communist Chinese education as a model for U.S. education. In one such presentation, teachers learned how the Red Chinese educational system 'is related to achievement of national goals and citizenship preparation...how cultural activities and recreational pastimes provide a vehicle for transmitting new social values'...Educators know what Red Chinese education is all about and when the U.S. Assistant Secretary for Education publicly admits that the U.S. government is making an effort to make such a totalitarian scheme the model for U.S. education, then you have to know that we are in serious trouble."

THE CASE AGAINST STATE-CONTROLLED EDUCATION

Madalyn Murray O'Hare, professional atheist, addressing an American Atheists annual convention at St. Francis, California last May, was heard to say: "Let's face it, there is no way we could have held an atheist convention 10 years ago. Everything today is much better. Part of the reason is public education." In this one instance, the O'Hare person is probably right. Certainly, having initiated some 15 federal lawsuits, most of them dealing with what she defines as separation of church and state, she has never instituted a suit dealing with separation of education and state. State-controlled education is one tenet upon which atheists, humanists, and communists all agree.

Another school year has begun, hundreds of millions of dollars will have been spent by millions of parents to prepare millions of children for another year of government-enforced education--or what purports to be education. Federal, State and County (or Metro) Governments will have spent or appropriated billions of dollars on buildings, buses, books, gyms and athletic fields, campuses and the paraphernalia that goes with modern educational endeavors. Teachers will have been told by their union bosses that they may now go to work--or that they must await contract settlements. And more politics than usual will be involved this school year---

The National Institute of Education has released a report: "Declining Enrollment: The Challenge of the Coming Decade." The report says that school budgets are getting bigger and bigger, but that school enrollments get smaller and smaller. The reference is to public (government) schools, of course. Private, Christian and church-supported schools, conversely, show smaller budgets and larger enrollments. Example: a local parent called a radio talk show host, and asked the guest speaker--a school board member--why it should cost $1500 a year to "educate" a child in a public school and only $900 a year in a private school, where her child was receiving "a much better education?"

Educationists and their principal labor union, the NEA, are worried about the flight from public education and are seeking ways and means, either to halt the exodus or to attain stricter state control and regulation of the private schools that are springing up in all parts of the nation. One suggestion is to "return to the basics" and cut out some of the innovative programs in public schools. Yet another plan is to set up a federal, cabinet-level Department of Education, apart from and distinct from its present position as the "E" in "H.E.W."

A few months ago Senator Edward Zorinski (Neb.) created quite a stir when he caused to be published a statement he made before the Subcommittee on Education, Arts & Humanities, of the Senate Committee on Human Resources. He told the Senators, in part:

"My constituents as well as parents all over the country have become increasingly alarmed by certain changes taking place in our schools. They see dangers in the schools becoming more concerned with children's attitudes, beliefs, and emotions than providing them with a basic education. The techniques now being used to change children's attitudes and values are an invasion of privacy, a threat to the family unit and the emotional stability of the child...The curriculum writers, theorists and behavioral scientists who have managed to change the thrust of American education in recent years have been able to accomplish their goals through the use of federal grants from various agencies, particularly the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. A large portion of the grants come under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act.... And are generally described as 'innovative' programs.... As stated by one of my constituents, 'A great majority of these materials deal with some sort of desperate need to treat all students as if they lived in a mental health center.' Some of the objectionable programs:

1. Project Reflect. Pre-testing and post-testing to achieve 'desirable concepts.'
2. Hilda Taba Social Studies. Altering attitudes through emotional, psychological and psycho-therapeutic techniques....
3. APEX English curriculum. Subjecting students to radical, sensational materials most of which are contrary to basic family concepts.
4. Contact Language Art Series. Self-disclosure techniques leading to invasion of privacy of students and parents.
5. Human Development in the Family--Home Economics. Students being asked to read "Sexology" magazine, discuss homosexual marriages, deep diaries about conflicts in the home. They are asked how much money the family spends on them, how many charge accounts parents have, etc.
6. Project Developmental Continuity. Materials and techniques for students with handicapping conditions are being used in regular classes with students not identified as having handicapping conditions.
7. Understanding Child Maltreatment. For all grades, kindergarten through 12th. Teaches children how to tell if they are being abused by their parents who are referred to as 'caretakers'.
8. Humanities Education Materials. Includes 'How to Live With Your Parents and Survive.'.... Another course, 'Living With Dying,' insinuates that it is unrealistic to search for immortality.

"A serious question is raised when Congress permits programs such as these I have described to continue with federal help. When concerns are voiced, the advocates of behavior modification cry 'censorship' and demand even more federal funds with less control."... (Unquote).

Another cry of the educationists and behavioral scientists is for "better control of educational programs through creation of a federal, Cabinet-level Department of Education," separate and distinct from H.E.W. This may seem to be comparatively unimportant, but NEA president John Ryor points to the fact that "Creating a department of education is, indeed, a profound step, in which the federal government will be recognizing, for the first time, that it has a responsibility for education in and of itself." What this means is pointed out quite clearly in an article by David Breneman and Noel Epstein appearing in the Aug. 6 "Washington Post." Quote:

"The Congress... appropriated nearly $23 billion for this fiscal year to finance programs linked to education at the elementary, secondary and post secondary levels. But the critical distinction that often gets lost is that these programs serve purposes only indirectly related to education. The GI Bill, for example, was enacted after World War II to ease the transition of millions of servicemen returning to civilian life, to prevent the large-scale unemployment that might have occurred if no alternative to work had existed--not to aid education. The Post-Sputnik programs supporting science education, teacher preparation and graduate education, enacted in the 1950s under the National Defense Act, were created as essential parts of the nation's defense effort--not to aid education. The massive Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965... was basically a civil rights and income-redistribution measure, a centerpiece of the War on Poverty, and certainly not a measure to aid schools.... The same holds at the higher education level.... A reshuffling that attempts to draw these programs together under the organizing principle of education is a profound restatement of federal purposes and priorities and cannot be regarded merely as a move to correct organizational mistakes of the past. Speaking at a conference on government reorganization, Rep. John Brademas made this point: 'Reorganization is a fundamentally political act...political in that every organization and every reorganization means a distribution or redistribution of power and influence over the substance of policy. Organization is not just management. It is policy and in the American democratic system, policy is politics.' (Unquote).

In the case of this new Cabinet-level department, the policy is to gain direct and total federal control over every facet of education in the United States!

Leonard R. Read, president of the Foundation for Economic Education, has an interesting commentary on government control of education. In his book, "The Love of Liberty," he first quotes George Washington: "Government is not reason, it is not eloquence--it is force. Like fire it is a dangerous servant and a fearful master; never for a moment should it be left to irresponsible action." Then Read quotes Woodrow Wilson: "No man ever saw a government. I live in the midst of the Government of the United States. I never saw the Government of the United States." Then Read adds in his own words:

"...we have been sponsoring, arguing for, trying to explain something no one ever saw--trying to make the case for an unperceived abstraction. In the interest of better communication, why not use a term that is consonant with what organized force really is: the police? All of us, from youngsters to oldsters, have seen policemen....So let us (use the word 'police' in place of the word 'government') to better present our freedom point of view."

Cataloging some of the instances where the police act as foe rather than friend, Read comes to the subject of police-type education. "This is featured by three forms of police coercion: (1) compulsory attendance, (2) police dictated curricula, and (3) the forcible collection of the wherewithal to pay the enormous bill. The police have no more place in education than in religion. In my view, police 'education' has been one of the greatest errors in American history and this fact is becoming more and more evident with each passing year. The collectivist jargon issuing from classroom accounts, in no small measure, for collectivist practices in all walks of life.

"What would then be friendly (as opposed to the action of a foe)? Get the police out of education except to identify any and all misrepresentation, and impose appropriate penalties. Leave education--as we leave religion--to citizens acting freely, cooperatively, competitively, privately, voluntarily. Education is a voluntary taking of ideas freely offered by others, not a police process of stuffing information into a captive audience." (Unquote).

We hear much oratory on the subject of separation of church and state (most of it based on erroneous assumptions); but almost never is there a voice raised in defense of the equally important principle: separation of school and state. The reason probably stems from the fact that, where people once would cry, "Give me liberty or give me death," now they are apt to say, "Give me security or give me death." The idea of security has become so ingrained in the peoples' thinking as the responsibility and duty of the state that people actually expect the state to educate and even support the youngsters as well as the oldsters.

It was not always thus. There was a time when the words "state" and "government" were not synonyms. In the thinking of the Founders of this Republic, the word government meant, first of all, self-government of the individual. government according to the laws of God. Next in importance, government meant the family. Totalitarianism seeks to destroy the family unit because every real family is a government. It is man's first church, his first school, and also his first state. Finally, the state is a form of government, but originally it was always referred to as the civil government, to distinguish it from all the other forms of government. For example, not long ago we were referred to a school textbook that was used in high schools and normal schools in the United States before World War I. Its title was "Elements of Civil Government," by Alex L. Peterman, a professor of civil government. According to Peterman, the family "is a form of government, established for the good of the children themselves, and the first government that each of us must obey." When he came to the subject of civil government as distinguished from other forms of government, Mr. Peterman named five areas, according to their rank in importance to the citizen prior to World War I: "The township or civil district, the village or city, the county, the State, and the United States."

But now all this has been reversed: Today the United States government is the civil government; and civil government has become the over-all government in man's life. And this, of course, is the essence of totalitarianism. "From the self-government of the Christian man as the essence of government, we have gone to the idea of the state as the totalitarian ruler over man," wrote R.J. Rushdoony in his book, "Law & Liberty."

Citing the fact that Karl Marx's "tenth commandment" called for free education for all children in public schools, Rushdoony points out that "the state has no more business running the schools than it has running the churches.... State-supported education is totalitarian education. The essence of totalitarianism is simply this, that the state has all the answers to life, and virtually every sphere of human activity should be governed by the state. The totalitarian believes that education, economics and trade, the family, child welfare, old age welfare, medicine, science and all things else need the controlling and guiding hand of the state. There are different kinds of totalitarianism--Marxist, democratic, Fascist, Fabian and the like--but their differences are not basic, whereas their agreements are. Common to all forms of totalitarianism is a belief in the state control of education. From Plato's blueprint for a communist state to the present, totalitarian planning has counted heavily on control of education."

When did this plan to control American education begin? Well, in this 20th century, we might refer back to 1902 when the General Education Board, a tax exempt foundation was created by John D. Rockefeller, Sr. Its "Occasional Letter No. 1" laid down the plan in the following words:

"In our dreams we have limitless resources and the people yield themselves with perfect docility to our molding hands. The present educational conventions fade from our minds, and unhampered by tradition, we work our own good will upon a grateful and responsive rural folk. We shall not try to make these people or any of their children into philosophers, or men of learning, or of science... of whom we have ample supply. The task we set before ourselves is very simple, as well as a very beautiful one, to train these people as we find them to a perfectly ideal life just where they are. So we will organize our children into a community and teach them to do in a perfect way the things their fathers and others did in an imperfect way, in the homes, in the ship, and on the farm."

Are those "molding hands" shaping your children's lives?

THE STATE OF OUR UNION

In the month of March, 1945, the United States was winning a war, the last one the United States was to win. Recently freed from a Japanese prison camp in the Philippines and back on the job, we were with a group of correspondents Jeeping northward from Manila to observe some clean-up operations that were being conducted by General MacArthur's forces in north Luzon. The road ran alongside a railroad track and, rounding a bend in the road, we came upon a strange sight. Two trains had collided head-on and the tracks had never been cleared. The two locomotives had crashed into each other in such a way that their cow-catcher noses had been locked together and then raised to form, with the track as its base, a perfect triangle, the collapsed railway cars holding them locked in midair. Sitting alongside us was William Randolph Hearst, Jr., who later would become the infamous Patty Hearst's uncle. Seeing the wreck, he exclaimed: "What a helluva way to run a railroad!"

Two wars later--Korea stalemated and Southeast Asia lost--we can look upon the U.S. National scene and paraphrase that remark: "What a helluva way to run a government!" A few 'for instances' follow:

One of the country's most respected free enterprise economists recently made this statement: "The U.S. is entering into a state of fascism, whereby individuals are forced to accept the responsibility of ownership, but the government takes the rewards. In no uncertain terms, this is slavery. Looking at a cross-section of America today reveals pockets of bust and boom. Some people are making fortunes while others are losing their shirts...Because of government intervention, investments are being made in the wrong areas...Hard times are upon us...In essence, what lurks around the corner is another 1973-74 type inflationary recession, except it will be worse."

Indicative of this current state of "inflationary recession" is the plight of the weary U.S. dollar. In a 'letter to the editor' appearing in our very liberal local daily, the writer stated: "The dollar continues to take a nosedive on the European money markets. Inflation eats us alive here at home. Congress sits around and tries to set new records for doing nothing. All they seem concerned with is their pet projects. President Carter doesn't seem to be worried about anything. Why should he worry? He has a job and so do all his friends. A $30-billion trade deficit is more than we can continue to shoulder. The biggest slap in the face came this week when a Japanese official who wished to remain nameless laughed and said, 'If you think the dollar is low now, wait till next week'."

Another letter to an editor: "All we need to do to make the dollar sound again, according to you, is enact an energy bill which will cut our oil imports....If dependence on foreign oil is really what ails the the dollar, why is it weakest against the currencies of countries which import far more oil, percentage-wise than does the U.S.? Item: the dollar has been consistently weak against the Japanese yen and Japan imports 75% of its petroleum versus about 25% for the U.S.?"

In line with the foregoing, Carter and his Commissar of Energy, James Schlesinger, keep telling everybody that our trade deficit is so great because of the oil we import, that reducing oil imports would solve the deficit problem, would even help to solve the problem of inflation. Commerce Department figures belie the statement. July trade deficit was the fourth largest ever; imports amounted to $14.8 billion, only $3.1 billion of which was for oil. Auto imports were the highest, oil was a poor second. Obviously, it will take more than a trade balance and a reduction of oil imports to strengthen the dollar abroad and stop the inflationary spiral at home.

"The London Economist," writing from the standpoint of a foreign country looking to the U.S. for world leadership, was quite sarcastic when referring to our Administration's handling (or mishandling) of the dollar situation. It said in part: "The U.S. has an unfortunate record of promoting a problem into a PROBLEM...and of aiming for a SOLUTION without thinking too hard about the consequences. So let it not be with the dollar in 1978...President Carter last week let it be known that he felt 'deep concern' about the dollar's free fall, and asked his top monetary advisers to come up with recommended remedies... He then went off on a holiday, to float down a river in Idaho on a rubber raft.... The danger is that foreign reactions to this muddle may bring America to the point of meeting a PROBLEM with a SOLUTION...the final decision will not be taken by economists, but by politicians; in this instance, by President Carter and probably by Mr. Stuart Eizenstat, the non-economist member of his kitchen cabinet to whom he listens hardest on economic issues."

While Carter was floating down the river on a rubber raft his advisers, those who were not on vacation with him, started doing things, and the dollar kept deflating overseas and inflating at home. News dispatches of August 31 noted that "the nation's economy received several jolts yesterday with reports that

WHAT THE E.R.A. REALLY SAYS....Last February, President Carter most appropriately signed the new Federal Sexual Exploitation of Children Act. Among other things, this good and proper law makes it a crime to receive for sale through the mail or foreign commerce any pornographic films or other material picturing children in obscene and lascivious acts. So far so good. But ironically, at the time he signed this bill the President was urging the Illinois legislature to ratify the so-called Equal Rights Amendment and stating that the amendment's protection for the rights of women is long overdue. What the President did not know is that the proposed Equal Rights Amendment says absolutely nothing about women. Furthermore, if he had taken the time to read the proposed E.R.A., he would have realized that if and when it becomes a part of our Constitution the anti-pornography law that he had just signed would immediately become unconstitutional and void because the proposed E.R.A. would establish an unlimited bill of rights for sex, and nothing else.

Here is what it says, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State on account of sex."

The new anti-pornographic law that the President signed last February makes a criminal out of the importer solely on account of the sexual nature of the lascivious pictures that he proposes to sell. That law or any law that regulates, provides for, or forbids this action or any action "on account of sex," be it marriage, seduction, rape, abortion, prostitution, indecent exposure, for instance, would violate the new E.R.A. civil right of sex to go anywhere by or with anybody at any time. When and if Congress would begin to "enforce the E.R.A. by appropriate legislation," human decency in the United States would have to go underground. This is apparently why the advocates of E.R.A. do not print and distribute copies of the amendment they are striving to have adopted. (Footnote commentary by Dean Manion, August 20, 1978).

the prime interest rate increased to 9¼%; new orders for manufactured goods dropped again and the dollar continued to lose ground in foreign markets. And while wages of the average working American climbed by a record 2.1% during the second quarter of the year, according to government reports, consumer prices rose even faster, 2.9%."

Just to make matters worse for the Administration, what was hailed as the biggest scandal since Watergate came to light. Wire services reported: "Contractors working on federal buildings have paid millions of dollars in bribes to General Services Administration employees, the agency's top investigator said yesterday (8/31/78). And federal agents believe some of those bribes have been funneled to Swiss bank accounts... Jay Solomon, administrator... said he expects a grand jury to indict about 50 persons--including GSA employees, employees of other government agencies it serves, private vendors and contractors... The source, who asked not to be identified, said federal agents were piecing together the story of GSA employees funneling big, big money in bribes into the Swiss accounts.... The Washington Post reported that... FBI agents have found that most employees under investigation spent the payoff money on cars, girls, dinners, and trips, while living in relatively modest homes."

Adding fuel to the creeping chaos was the rash of strikes and strike threats by public employee unions. Postal employees were again threatening to strike and in New Orleans, Philadelphia and numerous smaller communities public school teachers were on strike. As we went to press "Striking firefighters stood and watched as fire engulfed a block-long section of a downtown area" of Anderson Indiana, a city of 71,000.

All of these things, plus another nationwide scandal involving the federal Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA). The U.S. Labor Department administers CETA through the federal Regional Council setup, and it is supposed to be "designed to help unskilled, unemployed persons get jobs." But in reality, CETA had developed into something of a political payoff racket through which local politicians who are especially cooperative with Regional Government schemes can enhance their political power. The situation in Palm Beach County, Florida is said to be typical. Investigators have learned among other things, that: 1) Four CETA-paid workers hired to do yard work at a church, were also working for a private construction company owned by the pastor of the church. 2) A person hired as a trainee in the CETA-funded "on-the-job" training program operated by the Urban League, had already had some 13 years experience in the job she was hired to learn. 3) A CETA-funded project was paying part-time employees full-time salaries, and so on.

If the whole truth were ever learned, and published, the concept of Regional Governance (of which CETA is a part) would be found to be the root cause of the majority of the local scandals involving the use of federal funds. Regionalism brings about the transfer of political power from your local government to

OOPS!... In the DBR of 8/11/78, titled "The Electromagnetic World War," We stated that Nikola Tesla was "the son of a Croatian preacher." We were wrong and some Americans of Serbian extraction were quick to point this out. Here is the correct information, as published in "Ethnic Heritage Studies, 1977," by Cleveland State University: "Nikola Tesla was born in Smiljan, Lika in 1856 and died in New York City in 1943. His father Milutin was a Serbian Orthodox priest who worked hard for the development of Serbian national consciousness, education and economic development in various places in Lika which at that time was under Austria-Hungary. Nikola's mother Georgina was also an inventor as was her father."

a bureaucrat-dominated regional planning commission. This is the necessary administrative base for the installation of socialism in the United States. Without the powerful and all-pervasive bureaucracy created by Regional Planning Commissions, National Socialism could not operate; it would lack the machinery for control.

We are quick to blame the Federal Administrative Department for imposing this totally unconstitutional form of governance upon the Nation. But, in reality, we should understand that we would not now be ruled by appointed bureaucrats if our elected representatives had been doing the job they were elected to do! It was the Federal Legislature which gave these bureaucrats their power, and it was the State Legislatures which permitted these federal bureaucrats to use that power in an unconstitutional manner!

Former Congressman John R. Rarick, in his "You've A Right To Know," published a treatise which pinpoints the beginning of our national sorrows in both the political and economic spheres. We quote the article, by E. F. W. Wildermuth, a retired member of the New York State Bar:

"Oath-defying public officials constitute a large proportion of the population in Washington, D.C., thereby making it the crime capital of the world.... It is a crime to violate the oath of office. The U.S. Constitution mandates that public officials in this Federal Republic swear to uphold and defend the supreme law of the land, the U.S. Constitution.... No government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed can be better than are the governed. We, the people are to blame for permitting lawlessness in government by public officials... Under the American system government is a trust and its public officials are its trustees. This Nation is riddled with faithless betrayers of that trust. Some hold high public office and some are politicians who constitute the minimum of quality in human beings.

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. Notwithstanding this prohibition and in utter defiance of their oaths of office to uphold the Constitution, a faithless Congress has betrayed its trust. ... There are those anti-Americans among us who preach the false doctrine that the supreme law of the land is outmoded. The principles embodied in the U.S. Constitution can never become outmoded: freedom, life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness under a government of laws can never become outmoded. The people who defy those principles of decency and righteousness are outmoded in the strict sense of the word, now and forever.... Remember Watergate? The null and void Panama Canal Treaties? The raid on the U.S. Treasury last year by Congress for self-help in obtaining luxurious salaries and bigger and better benefits, and another bail out of New York City Bankers? And there is talk about ethics in Congress!" (Reprinted from "You've A Right To Know," P.O. Drawer E, St. Francisville, La., 70775).

"Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness... whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and institute a new government." So swore 56 Patriots in 1776....

THE SUMMIT MADE SIMPLE

The whole world is agog over the fact that three men are meeting in strictest secrecy at a spot called Camp David. An ex-Governor and two ex-terrorists, now elevated to positions of leadership in their respective countries, are said to be trying to bring peace where there is no peace. Nobody expects that anything of enduring value will result, but everybody is hoping that good news will be forthcoming. Most of these people would be shocked if they were told that this Summit at Camp David is just one more step toward that alleged utopia that is called The New World Order. Let's see what history can tell us:

The March toward the New World Order has many lines of approach. When one road becomes blocked, or progress is stalled, then the International Financiers and their Communist and Monopoly Capitalist affiliates are quick to find another route, and continue the march.

For example, early in this century the international policy makers decided that a League of Nations would be the proper route toward World Government. But an isolationist attitude then prevailing in the United States--and especially in the United States Senate--caused the scheme to come to grief. After a series of Kellogg-Briand and similar pacts that fell through, another World War became necessary, and the Financial Mafia tried all over again with the United Nations. The UN was a CFR-Communist creation from the very beginning. But it soon became evident to the policy makers that trying to create a World Government in one fell swoop would not work; that it would have to be done piecemeal; and the Concept of Regionalism was introduced. Regionalism at the national level was necessary in order to establish a socialist form of government. At the international level, Regional World Governments and Regional Economic Communities were equally essential. Later, these could be united. As a starter, the Atlantic Union was proposed. This would have created a Regional Federation of the countries on the Atlantic Seaboard, stretching from Europe to the United States. But a certain isolationist attitude still prevailed in the United States, and to a lesser degree in what was left of the British Empire. So the Atlantic Union scheme stalled, still rears its head for a vote in each new Congress.

The International policy makers took an alternate route. They decided to leave the United States and England out of their plans for the time being, and set up a United States of Europe. However, they went at it cautiously. First came a wedding of the coal, steel and iron industries of France and Germany with the so-called Schumann Plan which, according to the late A.K. Chesterton, was really designed by David Lilienthal, author of the Tennessee Valley Authority. To continue with Mr. Chesterton's analysis of the plot as it applied to Britain:

"Sights were then raised for an all-out attempt to secure the political unification of Europe through the Strasbourg movement, but when this venture failed to get off the ground the internationalists placed it in mothballs and proceeded at once to seek political federation by hiding their intentions under the economic cover. Thus was born the European Common Market, and with it the European Economic Community, based on the enactments of the Treaty of Rome. The political motivation was now all too clear. When Harold Macmillan endeavored to secure Britain's adherence to the Common Market....President Ken-neddy stipulated that Great Britain would only be admitted to the Common Market if she subscribed to the provisions of the Treaty of Rome in their entirety. As Kennedy could not have been speaking in his role as President, in that the United States had no conceivable right to meddle in the affairs of sovereign nations, one is justified in assuming that he spoke as a ventriloquist's dummy manipulated by the Money Power. In fact, all the evidence available establishes that the European Common Market is the child of High Finance, and that Britain's entry into the EEC is required as a further step towards the obliteration of nationhood and its replacement by the phased advance of World Government. The foregoing was published in 1971, and history has proved the author to be correct in his predictions; Britain has been forced into membership in the EEC according to the pre-arranged plan. Meanwhile, with Western Europe at least temporarily in the control of the Money Power, the next advance would look to the industrialization of the USSR and Red China. Along came the Money Power appointee, Henry Kissinger, to direct this part of the conspiracy. He brought about the ping-pong diplomacy that made it possible for President Nixon to visit Peking and to revisit Moscow, and the concept of the Trilateral Constellation was conceived. This ploy provided that the world--disregarding Western Europe and Japan for the nonce--should be divided into three regions to be controlled by, respectively, the USSR, the PRC, and the USA. But this operation proved to be even slower and more complicated than the creation of the EEC. In addition, both Western Europe and Japan began to show signs of rebellion because Russia was being favored at the expense of Western Europe, and because Red China was being favored to the possible detriment of Japan. So, the Money Barons changed courses--again temporarily--and took another road; one which would concentrate on the union of the industrial nations of the world. This brought about the creation of the Trilateral Commission, with the newly conditioned Carter replacing the bumbling Ford, and with Zbigniew Brzezinski taking the place of Henry Kissinger at the controls of the mechanism.

It is noteworthy that Winston Lord, now President of the Council on Foreign Relations, asserted in the 8/4/78 issue of "Women's Wear Daily," that, "The Trilateral Commission doesn't secretly run the world. The Council on Foreign Relations does that." One of the best short definitions of the TLC was supplied by Antony C. Sutton: "The basic Trilateral structure is a power pyramid. At the tip of the pyramid we can identify a 'financial mafia,' comprising several old-line American families, the American aristocracy. Below this highest level is the Executive Committee for the U.S., linked to the Executive Committees in Europe and Japan. Trilaterals control the Executive Branch of the U.S. government and so, control policy. An ongoing project is to dominate nine 'core countries' in Europe and Japan which, by virtue of their productive ability, account for 80% of world output. The 'core' group can then dominate the remaining 20% of the world. The American multi-nationals provide country-by-country liaison, intelligence and conduits, the sinews to bind a global New World Order to the directions of the 'financial mafia.' Trilateralists have rejected the U.S., the U.S. Constitution and the democratic process. Their objective is to obtain the wealth of the world for their own use under the pretense of 'public service'." (Quoted from "The Trilateral Observer," Box 4218, Scottsdale, Arizona).

So much for the TLC as such. The truth of the matter is, it hasn't been doing too well. The sudden surge to prominence of the Arab World and the importance of Petrodollars made the taking of yet another road toward the New World Order seem advisable. This plus the fact that the European Common Market that they had created for their own purposes, suddenly rebelled and brought out its own international currency, the ecu, which is undergirded with a gold basis. The TLC was all set to bring out a new monetary system based on paper promises, and EEC beat TLC to the punch with a gold-backed issue.

What made the situation even more precarious was the decision by the majority of OPEC members to make a deal with EEC and reject the U.S. dollar as "oil buying currency." TLC had saved its plan previously by making a special deal with Saudi Arabia and by inducing Anwar Sadat of Egypt to go to Jerusalem on an allged "peace mission." A repeat performance seemed essential; only this time the United States would have to be brought into the picture as a "fulltime partner" in a Summit Conference which would be held at Camp David, and with President Jimmy Carter acting as chairman.

Let it be understood that this is not an Israeli-Arab confrontation, it is simply an Israeli-Egypt conference, and one which is about as phony as the pretense of a love match between Christine Onassis and KGB agent Sergie Kuazuv; both being arranged for the same purpose: to gain control of the wealth of the world. So very much of that wealth is represented by black gold, and this is the real bottom line of the current Summit Conference at Camp David.

But, we're getting ahead of the story. The Trilateralists found themselves in a peculiar situation because they had to play the Arabs against the Israelis, and

SENATE DOESN'T DARE EXTEND ERA!

Bella Abzug and the other ladies who have their hearts set on the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) are in for a nasty shock after they read this story. It turns out that 30 States which have ratified the ERA have made special mention of the seven-year limit which expires March 29, 1979--less than seven months away. Thus, if the Senate passes the House-approved three year extension for states to ratify ERA, it would nullify the action of the 30 State Legislatures which have already ratified it. In other words, Congress could kill ERA by trying to extend the time limit for ratification. Even so, a filibuster appears sure in the Senate when proponents of the extension bring up the legislation on the floor. In addition to the need for the 30 States which specified the March 29, 1979 time limit to re-ratify the amendment in the next few months, four States have rescinded ERA since they ratified it. There is a question as to whether or not a State can rescind ratification once it is made; however, it is difficult to see how even the Supreme Court could say that the time limit which has either been written into the amendment when ratified by 30 States or implied during debate can be ignored. Senate insiders tell the "Spotlight" that Republican Senators Orrin Hatch, Jake Garn, and James McClure are the ones to watch in the upcoming Senate 'debate'--which could well turn into a filibuster with 'Alice in Wonderland' again reprinted in full in the Congressional Record."

The 30 States with ratifications stipulating or implying the seven-year ratification period are: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Hawaii, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Delaware, Kentucky, New York, Oregon, Vermont. Five State ratifications did not refer to the seven-year ratification period. They are: Alaska, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island. Of the 35 States which to date have ratified the ERA, four States--Nebraska, Tennessee, Idaho and Kentucky--later voted to rescind ratification.

The following 15 States have not ratified the ERA: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Utah and Virginia.

without permitting either to get hurt seriously (hence the importance of selling airplanes to both Saudi Arabia and Israel at the same time, thus showing our alleged impartiality.) The reason: many, indeed most of the members of the financial mafia that seeks to rule the world are political Zionists. They are not about to permit any real harm to come to the country they created. But, at the same time, there was all that new petrodollar wealth which had to be properly "handled" and "invested."

Faced with the need to change courses in midstream and take a new road to the New World Order, a variation of the tried-and-true Hegelian dialectic: Take the present situation (thesis), create a crisis (antithesis), and provide a pre-planned solution (synthesis). Camp David is supposed to provide the synthesis. Even before the summit, however, there was one matter that demanded a solution. If OPEC renounced the dollar and turned to ecu, some megabanks in the United States were going to be left with mountains of worthless, unbacked paper and facing bankruptcy. Saudi Arabia being the most important of the OPECs, a new, special deal had to be arranged. So, in mid-August, Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal flew to Disneyworld in Florida to meet Mohammed Abalkhail, Saudi Arabia's finance minister. The details of the deal we do not know, but a few days later Saudi Crown Prince Fahd Ibn Abdul Aziz was quoted as saying that Saudi oil would continue to be priced in dollars. (LA Times, 8/28/78). A dispatch from Tokyo confirmed: "Saudi Arabia will continue to use the American dollar as the currency of international oil business, Crown Prince Fahd said in an interview with a Tokyo newspaper..."

But there's a catch to the above: The other members of OAPEC (Arab oil producers and exporters) are not in accord with Saudi Arabia, are jealous of the special treatment accorded the Saudis, and may renounce the dollar, declare a price rise in oil, and even declare an oil embargo come December. The USSR is also disturbed because the Kremlin has denounced the Camp David Summit on the basis that any such meeting should have been held at Geneva, where a Soviet official would serve as co-chairman. Too, the Soviets are worried about their lack of sufficient oil to keep their American-built factories running--and this brought about that great romance:--

Oil tankers serve two purposes: they transport oil and, in case of an embargo, they serve as offshore oil storage facilities. Russia needs tankers, Christina Onassis has tankers. There are unconfirmed rumors that Armand Hammer, Of Occidental Oil and a long-time friend of the Soviets, was the go-between. In any case, Christina was introduced to Sergei Kuzov, Communist shipping official and KGB agent. Selected as the front man for a big business deal, Kuzov wooed and won the lady with the oil tankers. Now the Onassis tanker fleet will be redirected by the KGB in the event of an oil embargo. Also, with Russia controlling the sealanes and controlling the tankers, a real energy crisis could be brought about if and when desired by the Money Power!

STOP PRESS. UPI dispatch of 9/8/78: "Syria, fearing the Camp David Summit could lead to a US-Israeli mutual defense treaty, has urged Arab states to sign similar pacts with the Soviet Union...Prime Minister Begin has said he favors a US-Israeli mutual defense pact." So, divide and conquer; not peace, but war. Is this the message from the Summit? Let's pray the signs are wrong.

INVITATION TO TERRORISM

Strikes by firefighters, policemen, teachers and other public employees are popping up all over the country. The reason is easily explained: public sector workers want more money, taxpayers are outraged by rising taxes and declining services, and elected officials are caught in between the two. Since they, too, are public servants, the city officials generally respond by taking the side of the taxpayers who elected them, and they take a harder line against illegal strikes and unreasonable demands.

It was President Carter who helped aggravate matters. At a time when even the controlled public opinion polls indicated that the majority of people was antagonistic towards public sector unions, their bosses and illegal strikes, the President made a statement on national television which seemed to justify illegal strikes by public sector employees. Asked whether he favored strikes by public employees, such as the threatened postal strike, Carter said:

"I deplore strikes, but recognize the right of workers to conduct labor negotiations. If they are unsuccessful, sometimes strikes are advisable. But, of course, I prefer to see their disputes settled without strikes."

Carter's position was denounced in the House of Representatives, and in many newspapers, even the New York Times, whose employees were not on strike at the time. Said Congressman Eldon Rudd (R-AZ): "I was shocked by the President's statement at his news conference last week, that in his opinion public employees have the right to strike. This situation of public employee union blackmail tactics need Congressional attention and legislative remedy. Someone should tell President Carter that a majority of the American people oppose public sector strikes, which are illegal in 43 States. Federal employees, including postal workers, are also prohibited from striking."

The strike in Memphis, Tennessee is a classic example of the abusive power of public sector unions; but it is also more than that. It is an ominous warning of the manner in which terrorist activities can become widespread throughout the United States! In Memphis, city employees are represented by 13 different labor unions. Contract issues were settled with 11 of the 13 of the unions. However, the policemen and the firemen were not satisfied when comparable terms were offered them. So, they walked out. City officials called it blackmail, but they gave in, decided it would be necessary to re-negotiate the contracts with the other 11 unions. The situation became so complicated that the Mayor, Wyeth Chandler offered to let a federal mediator choose the terms between the city's best offer and the police and firemen's demands, and then submit the settlement (and the resultant tax increase) to the public referendum. "No way," said the union bosses, and they threatened a general strike. School teachers were ordered by their union bosses not to cross picket lines when the schools opened Aug. 17. Intense pressure was applied to the mayor and the city council to accept what the latter considered a bad contract; the union bosses wanted things their way or not at all. To add pressure, Tennessee's Democratic Governor, Ray Blanton (who signed a compulsory bargaining bill for teachers at their annual convention last June), disregarded the wishes of the Memphis taxpayers, and went right along with the union bosses. He threatened to withhold the city's share of gasoline taxes if the city didn't settle with the unions. And, if it became necessary to use the National Guard to prevent arson and maintain order during the strike, he would charge the city $70,000 per day for the use of the guards....

Not much was published in the national press about the Memphis situation after that, until Sept. 7, when an alarming new item was flashed, and then killed by the communications controllers. The item did get published in a few newspapers, however, and we received a clipping from the L.A. Herald-Examiner. It read:

"U.N. TO REVIEW MEMPHIS POLICE. The United Nations Commission on Human Rights will consider allegations of police brutality in Memphis that could 'embarrass the country,' a federal official said yesterday. 'This is a very serious violation or violations going on in this city,' said Bobby Doctor, Southern regional director of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, while releasing the commission's report on police misconduct. He said the U.N. Commission on Human Rights has placed on it Sept. 11 agenda a review of the charges. A United Nations spokesman in New York said the commission would meet Monday in Geneva, Switzerland." (unquote).

Before offering any comment, there's more to the story that needs to be told. In the Miami Herald of September 14 there appeared a story by Charles Babcock of the Washington Post Service. It began: "In what is described as a precedent-setting agreement, Memphis officials signed a court settlement that prohibits police spying on political groups. Jack Novik, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, said Wednesday that the settlement is the first of its kind in the country. The precedent is important, he said, because the ACLU is involved in similar suits in several cities including Washington, Chicago, Houston and Detroit, and has been working to get other cities to pass ordinances barring such intelligence gathering. Arthur J. Shea, deputy city attorney in Memphis, said in a phone interview Wednesday that the suit was a 'backlash from the 60's... We had organizations, we didn't know what they were doing. It was the duty of the police to make sure. We were trying to make sure the city didn't burn down more than it did.'... The city agrees not to engage in any form of political intelligence-gathering in the future. This includes prohibitions against using information or taking photos or license numbers of participants to public rallies.... City officials could not be reached for comment Wednesday on why they agreed to such a settlement. Allen Boone, a top aide to the mayor, said most officials were at a meeting with the mayor out of town.... The suit was filed two years ago on behalf of political activists who asked city police for their files, only to find they had been destroyed hurriedly. Through depositions over the next several months, however, ACLU attorneys said they established that domestic-intelligence-unit informants infiltrated the leaderships of many groups. The unit collected material on a range of activities from the Ku Klux Klan to the sanitation workers' strike that took Martin Luther King, Jr. to Memphis in 1968, Novik said. He said, however, that (the ACLU had uncovered) no evidence that the Memphis police were spying on King during the trip on which he was assassinated." (unquote).

Still withholding editorial comment, here is one more item which is pertinent: a story released by UPI for publication on Sept. 14, 1978: "The FBI will begin extensive campaigns to thwart the top echelon of white-collar criminals and to monitor spying by foreign governments, Director William H. Webster says. Webster said the FBI will increase the number of agents assigned to combat white-collar crimes such as corporate fraud, bank embezzlements and the corruption of elected officials."

COMMENTARY. Memphis, a Southern city where Martin Luther King, Jr. was assassinated, was selected as the target city. Public sector labor unions--13 of them, mind you--moved in to organize city employees and hamstring city officials. Then, about two years ago, ACLU went to work against the city government. Finally, a set of dangerous "precedents" were established, precedents that will now be applied to other cities in the United States. First, the United Nations was invited to take part in a purely domestic matter and was given the power--thanks to Jimmy Carter's Human Rights Crusade and the UN Conventions he signed--to check on the conduct of a police department in a city of the United States! Secondly: Public sector labor union bosses in cooperation with the ACLU, caused the city officials to sign an agreement stating that the police could no longer investigate "political activities" by groups and organizations! It should be emphasized that terrorist activities can always be classified as political activities. When Menahim Begin ordered the murder of English men, women and children as leader of the Irgun Zvai Leumi, this was classified as political activity. When Anwar Sadat spent time in prison as a punishment for his terrorist activities, his actions were classified as political activities. If the PLO kills Israelis, it is political activity. Likewise when the Red Brigade kidnaps and murders a former Prime Minister of Italy, when Patty Hearst aids in robbing a bank, when terrorists bomb and burn private and public buildings, when groups skyjack airplanes, hold hostages, etc. All these are classified as political activities by the perpetrators of the crimes. Therefore, if the local police are prohibited from taking preventive action, and if the FBI is to concentrate on "white-collar crimes," then rampant terrorism is being invited!

And let there be no misunderstanding about this: an increase in political terrorism is being planned for the United States, and for all the Americas. The attempted terrorist takeover of Nicaragua (Communist inspired and backed, of course) is in process as this report is being written. To bring the terror even closer to home, note the following AP dispatch of Sept. 8, 1978:

"The group of Mexican radicals that claimed responsibility for killing the son of Mexico's ambassador to the U.S. has outlined a blueprint for nationwide revolution, starting near the U.S. border with the aid of combat trained Mexican Americans, the San Diego Sun reported yesterday. The plans, detailed in a clandestinely published 23-page booklet seized by police in Ciudad Juarez, lists seven zones of Mexico targeted for insurrection by the 23rd of September Communist League, beginning in Mexico's northwest area that includes Baja California, Sinaloa, Sonora, Durango, and Nayarit.

"Mexican intelligence sources told the newspaper that the assistance of militant Mexican Americans was being sought by the guerrillas....'They're trying to recruit left-wing Chicanos and especially those with previous military combat experience,' said one source. 'We also have evidence of militant Chicanos meeting with suspected 23rd of September members. The 23rd of September has written in its pamphlets that it considers Mexican Americans and illegal Mexicans are persecuted in the United States.'" The 23rd of September group claimed responsibility for the kidnap-execution of Hugo Margain Charles, 35, the son of Ambassador Hugo Margain. The body was found Aug. 30 in a field 18 miles from Mexico City." (unquote).

If such a kidnap-execution were carried out in the Memphis area today, police would have been unable to do anything to prevent the crime, else it would be adjudged a violation of the UN Declaration of Human Rights, and city officials punished for such action.

One other situation forms a part of our story. While the International Communists are busy trying to take over Nicaragua, then Mexico, then Guantanamo, then Puerto Rico, et al, in the Middle East they are currently attempting to get control of Iran. The Shah is thoroughly anti-Communist, but his country has a common border with the USSR. Iran is the only remaining important defense against the Soviet takeover of Middle East oil and the sealanes therefrom. In addition to the unrest and terror that is being generated in Iran, there are an estimated 50,000 Iranian students in the United States. They are being brain-washed into staging demonstrations and committing acts of terrorism. Washington police were jolted last November by the organization and ferocity of an attack by anti-Shah students near the White House during a visit by the Shah. These young men are revolutionaries, anarchists, and they are in the United States. Many are here illegally, they intend to stay, more arrive each year. The U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) told a questioner that "the United States has no resources to track these kids. With a million illegal Mexican aliens, we have no time to spend on Iranian students." There is an Iranian Student Association which acts as an umbrella for seven or eight different Iranian political and religious groups, and there is no question but that the Association has been infiltrated by Communist and other extremist organizations.

In addition to the 50,000 Iranians and the "million Mexicans," there are also thousands upon thousands of aliens pouring into the Southern States from Haiti and other trouble spots in the Caribbean. And nobody seems to know how many Asians have entered the United States as a result of the war we lost in Southeast Asia. Whether we like it or not, the United States is being deluged with the tired, poor, huddled masses and wretched refuse from teeming shores who are yearning to be free; but their idea of freedom often tends toward anarchy and the fulfillment of alien ideologies they brought with them from other lands and other cultures. The point being: If INS is unable to control this immigration, if the FBI is to concentrate on white-collar criminals, and if the police departments of our cities are prohibited from gathering intelligence or engaging in any kind of preventive action; is this not an open invitation to anarchy?

As we have attempted to show in this report, Memphis was a target city. The campaign began with the "unionizing" of the city's employees, from its sanitation workers up to all appointed persons. Then came the ACLU and associated "civil liberties" and "human rights" groups. And finally, in came the United Nations to render a human rights judgment on an American city. Ergo:

Permitting public sector labor unions to take over our government, whether it be city, county, state or federal government, is a dangerous business indeed. Recognizing that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," we should also recognize the "signs of the times": The American people are revolting against higher taxes and swollen government bureaucracy. But the public sector union bosses are manipulating their members to a counter-revolt by means of illegal strikes across the nation. They are demanding "binding arbitration" which has been declared unconstitutional by three State Supreme Courts, and which forfeits the rights of the people to govern their own cities, counties, states and nation. The times are troublesome and they are made more so by public sector unions. But has inflation made the "price of liberty" prohibitive?

WHO OWNS THE CHILD?

Martha Lippitt, wife, mother, schoolteacher, scribbled a note to her husband Tom. It said: "The only answer is to leave and run my Christian school underground as is done in Soviet Russia. Don't try to find me. I will watch the papers from Cleveland in the main library in the city I am in to see if you ever win this case, but I doubt it as we now have a dictatorship. Love, hastily, and take care of yourself. Martha." Then she took their two children, Amy aged 7 and Alice aged 8, and they "went underground." Meanwhile, the husband Tom, left without any children to surrender to the public school system as the judge had ordered, was put in jail instead, for contempt of court. About two months later, thinking the case had been settled, came back home and the family was able to observe Christmas, 1977, together. But then, the judge reopened the case. The authorities "kidnapped" the two little girls, put them in the county home, and picked up the mother, forcibly, and carried her off to jail.

This is part of a true story, told in detail in The CLA Defender of June, 1978, a magazine published by the Christian Law Association, which is headed by the lawyer who got the Amish their freedom from public education in the early 70's. Address: CLA Defender, P.O.Box 30290, Cleveland OH 44130.

The Lippitts were upset with the pornography and obscenity in the textbooks in use in the public schools, with sex education, with the new math, with the social studies which teach socialism, and with the secular humanism which pervades all the subjects in a public school. They sought a Christian school where they might place their children, but found they were all state-licensed and all exhibited, in the Lippitts' opinion, a less than Christian atmosphere, and they used many of the same secular, humanistic textbooks found in public schools. There was one exception, a Christian school that was not state-licensed, but it was on Cleveland's far west side, and it would require a daily 80-mile round trip right through the heart of Cleveland's traffic-jammed highways. Their old '68 Dodge was not in the best of shape for such a daily trek, and this was not a plausible answer to their problem. But there was one other possibility:

Martha Lippitt had been a schoolteacher, a good one, with a certification from the Ohio Department of Education in secondary English, French, Spanish, and German, and with high recommendations from her former school principals. It would seem that these qualifications, combined with her natural love for her children, would make it possible for her to run her own Christian school. But, instead, they have made her a fugitive from the law, a convicted child neglecter, an inmate of the county jail--but they also made her a respected champion of parental rights in education.

The Lippitts decided to open their own Christian school. So, in the fall of '77, Tom and Martha Lippitt founded and incorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio, the Martha I. Lippitt Christian Day School. But, the school was not licensed by the state; this would have made them servile to the state and change-agents would have invaded the school, telling them what to teach, what not to teach, how to teach, what textbooks they might use, etc.

The school operated just about a month, then was closed down by order of the judge (Cuyohoga County Juvenile Judge Angelo J. Gagliardo). In Ohio there are two legal charges that can be brought against parents who send their children to unlicensed schools. There are criminal charges that can result in fines and possible imprisonment. There are also civil charges which may result in the state's taking custody of the children. In the Lippitt case, they used both. At one of the trials the judge gave his answer to the question: Who owns the child? He rendered this dictum: "Children are not pawns; they are not the property of parents." Rather, he insisted, they are wards of the state.

At latest word, the children have been returned to the parents, with the stipulation that they must send them to the school that requires the daily drive of 80 miles of heavy traffic. Failing this, the children will be taken away from them and placed in foster homes--and sent to public school. The story as published in The CLA Defender ends with the following summary:

"The Lippitts were accused of failing to provide their children with a quality education, yet the children are outperforming their public school peers...The issue in this case, according to the court, is child neglect and lack of quality education. But this is always the type of language used when governments seek to justify a misuse of their God-given authority. The real issue in the case is, we believe, the control issue. 'Who owns the child?' The court was not interested in the academic performance of the students, but in the licensure of the school. The issue is not quality, the issue is control. The state is insisting on the authority to 'protect the best interests of the child,' but they always insist on defining those best interests themselves. If the government has the authority to dictate to Tom and Martha Lippitt what is in the best interests of Amy and Alice, they also have the power to say what is best for the little children closest to your heart. But what if you, like Tom and Martha, just don't agree with the government?" (Unquote).

The case of the Lippitt family is not unique. The bureaucrats are taking parents to court in state after state to force them to take their children out of unlicensed schools. They are jailing parents, pastors, and private school administrators. They are taking children out of Christian homes and placing them in foster homes. They are taking unlicensed schools to court daily. The Christian Law Association is being flooded with requests for legal defense. They say almost one request per day is coming in from private and religious schools that need legal aid because they have refused to become chartered or licensed, and have refused to accept tax-exempt status (the government takes special care to police tax-exempt organizations. To take any favor from State is to become servant to State). And the situation becomes worse as the bureaucrats become more frantic. We quote, with permission, from Gary North's Remnant Review of Sept. 15, 1978 (the full text of his newsletter can be obtained by sending $3 to 713 Cornwallis Rd., Suite 100, Durham, N.C. 17707).

* * * * *

...If one group of people can capture a monopolistic agency, compel all children to attend it, write its textbooks, indoctrinate the victims for a dozen years, minimum, and then send them out at age 18 to vote, where do you think we are headed?...I wrote an essay...in favor of completely independent, profit-seeking, non-tax-exempt schools.

It is bad enough to operate any organization in terms of its tax-deductible status. The authorities take special care to police tax-exempt organizations...The government can always threaten a tax-exempt organization with the removal of its tax-deductible status, another major defect of such organizations.

Little did I know how soon it would take place!

THE I.R.S. STRIKES

On August 22, 1978, the Federal Register published a frightening document. The Commissioner of the I.R.S. has announced that schools, including church-operated schools, that started operation about the time of school integration (meaning after 1957, but especially after 1960), will, as of the end of October, be automatically assumed to be racially discriminatory, at which time their tax-exempt status will be removed. Guilty until proven innocent has always been the legal status of those challenged by the I.R.S., the courts have determined. . . . Now, the schools are under the auspices of the I.R.S., and they are guilty until proven innocent. Schools will be able to appeal this removal of their tax-exempt status in October by proving: 1. That they are hiring racial minority teachers; 2. That they are actively recruiting racial minority students; 3. That they have established scholarships for racial minorities; 4. That they are increasing the proportion of racial minority students; and 5. That they now have this percentage of minority students: 20% of the percentage of minority students in the school ages in that community.

They are now doing to private schools what the boys at HEW are doing to every private college and university in the country: integrate, by percentage numbers, or else. Get those tokens in there, now. Pay for their educations, now. recruit them, now. Pay taxes to the public schools. Pay tuition at the school, make donations to the church or school in addition, and now, to make certain you conform to the new rules, pay for minority students to come and fill the percentage slots.

They are trying to bankrupt the schools. The war is being waged at every level, from every side. It is a war against those who deny the sovereignty of the messianic state. It is a campaign of harassment. . . . (This) has little to do with Negroes, and everything to do with men's political power. If you doubt my analysis, consider the Bakke case. It didn't hit the front pages because of Mr. Bakke, whose charisma is something less than that of Calvin Coolidge. The issue is this: who controls the schools? . . .

Some of you worry a lot about taxes. Yet you don't worry about what is happening in the public schools. You have tried to reduce your tax burden, but you have allowed the messianic State to take your children into its indoctrination centers for a minimum of twelve years, or in some cases for lots longer (though the later years were not compulsory). We live in an era in which men grumble about 25% tax brackets--those who have only recently been forced into them by inflation--and never give a thought to the confiscation of their children. . . . The State has stolen men's children and they have remained quiet. And will they protest when the same State takes their money? Are children worth less to us than money?

If the drift into socialism continues, do you think it would be a good idea to have alternate schools, teaching totally different curricula, financed by parents or other voluntary organizations, so that your grandchildren will have a better place to learn than the compulsory, monopolistic, tax supported, government schools? If you think it's a good idea, you're running out of time. I am not exaggerating. We are literally at the crossroads. This month.

Please, for the sake of the First Amendment, write a letter, no matter how short, and make six photocopies (as required), protesting this massive infringement on freedom of speech and religion. You. . . worshippers of anything except the State, write a letter. . . . There are only a few days remaining. All letters of protest, and the five copies (you keep one for your files), should be addressed to Jerome Kurtz, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Internal Revenue Service, 1111 Constitution Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20224.

Be polite. Be firm. Just let them know that there are many people out there, of many faiths, of many perspectives, who resent the fact that a basic constitutional right is being threatened. This is a First Amendment issue, not a tax issue, not a race issue, and certainly not a neutral issue. If you have to put it on lined paper, do it. If you have to write it in crayon, do it. But please stand up and be counted on this one. If the I.R.S. succeeds in bankrupting these little schools...then we have speeded up the timetable on the march into socialism.

If you can get a few other people to follow through on this project it will really help.... Take (this letter) to your pastor, if he can't get enthusiastic over this topic, you might try locating a new church. If they shut down tax-exempt church schools on the basis of racial discrimination, how do you think the churches are likely to fare?.....

This incredible I.R.S. persecution has been kept very quiet. Christian school administrators are absolutely unaware of it. There is no mobilized campaign. I am asking you to join in an effort which will probably lose until the courts overturn it, if ever. All I'm asking is that you go down fighting on this one. If they close our independent schools, and you have done nothing, then you are, in some small degree, responsible. Write your letter, now! It needn't be eloquent. It needn't even be typed, although that would help. All it needs is five copies and the original. (Bureaucrats, after all, are bureaucrats.)"

In your letter be sure to mention that you are commenting on the Proposed Revenue Procedure on Private, Tax-Exempt Schools.

These regulations are scheduled to go into effect without public hearings, because I.R.S. claims that the regulations are not significant, which is obviously absurd and misleading. So, in your letter, also protest the absence of public hearings. Your original letter and the five copies must be postmarked on or before October 23. If you wish to consult the text of the proposed regulations, they are in the Federal Register, vol. 43, no. 163, Tuesday, August 22, 1978, pages 37297 and 37298. THE YEAR OF THE CHILD

The "liberation" of children has been underway for years. Liberation from the family, the church, from the "narrow parochialism" called love of country. But this "liberation" has proceeded so subtly and so gradually that few parents are aware of what has been happening to their children. True, the impact of school desegregation rulings caused shock waves throughout the nation, and the many judicial mandates concerning the bussing of children into alien neighborhoods have created minor uproars. But the changes in curricula, the new methods of teaching, the introduction of sex education, of obscenity and pornography, the increase in crime and violence, the drug traffic—these have been accepted, or at least tolerated with sorrow, because "children of this generation are different," etc.

Change-agents who are paid to usher in The New Society assume that "schools are, of course, creatures of our culture. They are transmitters of its values and beliefs.. To the extent that other agencies which socialize the young neglect a wider perspective of human development and world affairs. The schools can perform a corrective influence...." They are told that "The task of bringing about the kind of transformation which will make education a better instrument for coping with interdependence is formidable. We need to shed an inheritance of parochialism which we have been accumulating for the past 200 years."

It was Harlan Cleveland who made the most revealing statement. He said: "The students in our public schools constitute, as my colleague Francis Keppel puts it, the nation's greatest and most attractive sucker list. Ecerybody who has anything to sell...would naturally like to get at this future market of American adults, and get at them as early in life as possible. Those of us with global perspectives to sell may chafe at the sluggish reaction of American public education, but we had better first try to understand its profound and not illogical motivation."

As Cleveland recommended, those who "had things to sell" hastened to get at this "sucker list" of students in public schools. But, something happened that slowed down the process. Parents began to discover what was happening to the children (some parents did, at any rate). Those parents began seeking private schools, or church-maintained schools, where their children might get the kind of education that was denied them in public schools.

Suddenly, the federal government—or an agency thereof—has stepped in with the apparent objective of bankrupting or seriously limiting the scope and the efficiency of private schools. The following condensation of a statement made by the Hon. George Hansen of Idaho, is self-explanatory. We quote from the Congressional Record of September 20, 1978:

In the last several years, the progressive deterioration of public schools in many parts of the country have led to the establishment of private schools. When I speak of deterioration, I have reference not only to a lower level of learning achievement, but also to spectacular increases in crime at schools, and the progressive establishment of an atheistic and secularist religion to impart alien values to our young children. It is also true, and cannot be denied, that some schools were established for the sake of avoiding segregation.

Comes now the Internal Revenue Service, which on August 22, 1978, proposed that all schools--I repeat, all schools--formed or expanded at or about or after the implementation of desegregation plans in the respective communities will be presumed guilty of systematic racial discrimination and their tax-exemption revoked retroactively.

We have become inured to the routine contempt the IRS has chronically demonstrated for accepted civilized standards of fairness, something which has its roots in the regrettable presumption that in tax matters the citizen is guilty until proven innocent, an innocence that has to be proven at the expense of the taxpayer, no matter how groundless or frivolous the charges. The proposed regulations I have mentioned to you is a fresh example of this attitude. It proposes to make a blanket finding of racial discrimination and automatically harass all private schools, putting on its victims the onerous burden of proving their innocence. At the same time, it says that it will be practically impossible to refute the charges unless there is an affirmative program operating.

I have objections to all of this, which forms the substance of the proposed regulation. But what shows truly brazen boldness on the part of the IRS, what puts all their previous efforts at trickery in the shade, is the fact that they have the astonishing gall to say that this is an insignificant regulation, a mere procedural change which does not merit public hearing. If you will consult section 556 of title 5 on the United States Code, you will find that Congress insists that rulemaking be done in the open. Only strictly internal and procedural matters--such things as meeting times and personnel matters--should be exempt. The regulation I have referred to was published Aug. 22 in the 'notices' section of the Federal Register, sandwiched between a docket notice and a notice about a certain pension plan's exemption from a particular rule. Despite its substantive nature, the proposed regulation was not published in the proposed rules and regulations section, but was buried in the back. Moreover, in the proposal itself, the IRS makes the absurd assertion that the proposed regulation is not significant, and thus that it does not come within the scope of 5 USC 556. The position of the IRS is silly. This is no merely procedural matter but a substantive proposition that calls into question the tax liabilities, supposedly long past settled, of hundreds of thousands of citizens for many years past. It obviously has the gravest conceivable implications for the survival of private schools, and certainly gives the IRS wide scope for abuse and harassment. It is nonsense to claim that the regulation, whatever its merits, is not significant.

What is involved here is not actually a matter of racial discrimination, nor is it really a tax matter. Since the regulation explicitly includes church-related schools, and since there is nothing in the regulation that could not later be applied to churches themselves, what is involved is a very deep first amendment question. It is a patent evasion to label this regulation 'procedural' and claim that it is of no significance. In this transparent maneuver, the IRS is in violation of at least the spirit, if not the letter, of the law, and Executive orders governing the making of administrative rules and regulations. To stop this outrageous flouting of congressional intent, I have today introduced legislation... which prohibits the so-called procedure from coming into effect until the IRS has complied with all the requirements of Treasury regulations for public notice and hearing. It states, in short, that this is a significant regulation and must be treated as such..." (End of quotes from statement by Rep. Hansen.)

While IRS was taking surreptitious steps to bankrupt private schools or to gain firmer control over those state-licensed schools that would be allowed to continue to teach, the next step toward totalitarian control of the U.S. education system was already underway. As this report is being written word comes that the U.S. Senate has approved a measure that would create a separate Cabinet-level Department of Education. Thus could be assured centralized bureaucratic control over a nationwide, monolithic, compulsory school system.

It should be understood that this attack on private and church-related schools is not an isolated incident. It is part of an overall plan to create and maintain a New World Society. To comprehend the total plot, we must take a look backward.

After the United Nations was established, a new educational goal was brought into the schools, called "Toward World Understanding." Then, in line with its "human rights" drive (which President Carter has revived), UNESCO produced in 1959 the "Declaration of the Rights of a Child." This was adopted by the UN General Assembly "without any exception or reservation." Here are the highlights of that document, and we are quoting:

"The child needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth...The child shall enjoy the benefits of social security...The child is entitled to receive education, which shall be free and compulsory...The child shall be protected from practices which may foster racial, religious and any other form of discrimination. He shall be brought up in a spirit of understanding, tolerance, friendship among peoples, peace and universal brotherhood and in full consciousness that his energy and talents should be devoted to the service of his fellow men." (unquote).

This was a declaration, not a convention (treaty), and little was done to implement the declaration at the time. So, let's skip the intervening years until we come to 1975. This was the year that was declared by the UN to be the "International Women's Year." At the same time the years 1975-1985 were declared to be the "International Women's Decade." Readers will be familiar with the manner in which our appointed President Gerald Ford fell in line and cooperated with the UN scheme by naming a National Women's Year for the U.S., and by appointing a Commission to organize and promote the program. President Carter endorsed the program, named a few extra lesbians and women's libbers to the National Commission--and the results of the Houston horror that ensued need not be retold.

Pleased with the progress achieved by IWY, the UN passed another resolution naming the year 1979 as "The International Year of the Child," with UNICEF as the international agency in charge of implementation. President Carter, always eager to do anything that might aid and abet his personal Human Rights crusade, followed the lead of the UN (or vice versa?) and issued Executive Order No. 12053, creating a "National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979." This Executive Order covers two pages in the Federal Register, but here are the highlights; and these are direct quotes.

Executive Order 12503

April 14, 1978

National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution of the United States of America, in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) and the United Nations General Assembly Resolution of December 21, 1976 which designated the year 1979 as the International Year of the Child, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the observance of the International Year of the Child within the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

There is hereby established the National Commission...composed of not more than 25 persons...shall coordinate its efforts with local, State, national and international organizations including the United Nations Childrens Fund (UNICEF)...shall foster within the United States a better understanding of the special needs of children...health, education, social environment, physical and emotional development, and legal rights and needs of children that are unique to them as children...conduct studies, inquiries, hearings and meetings as it deems necessary...may assemble and disseminate information, issue reports and other publications...coordinate, sponsor or oversee projects, studies, events and other activities...make recommendations to the President on national policies for improving the well-being of children...may request any Executive agency to furnish such information, advice, services, and funds as may be useful...appoint and fix the compensation of a staff...receive compensation at a rate not to exceed the daily rate...for GS-15...may also receive traveling expenses...The Commission shall terminate on April 1, 1979.

Here is what amounts to a black check. While the President says he is fighting inflation, cutting costs, striving for a balanced budget, he creates a commission that may spend all it can get out of Congress, and then demand extra funds from Executive agencies which are "authorized... within the limits of available funds, to furnish such...upon request of the Chairman of the Commission."

All this for the purpose of "liberating" the child, and for creating a new social class of "citizens under 18" endowed with special rights and special freedoms which will make them a class apart. In 1970 at the White House Conference on Children it was recommended that "laws dealing with rights of parents be re-examined and changed where they infringe on the rights of children... Amendments (to existing laws) should reinforce the primacy of the rights of the child." And humanist/psychologist Richard Farson spelled out those special rights of the liberated child: freedom from physical punishment, freedom to vote, total sexual freedom, economic freedom, etc.

To bring this about, private and religious schools must be abolished, unless they conform to the rules and regulations established by the federal bureaucracy. To make control firmer, a separate Department of Education is to be established. Then comes the next step: to make attendance in public schools mandatory for all children from the age of two! If this should happen, this one thing would take children in their most formative years and place them under the control of humanist educators who admittedly seek to "change their values" and to produce a new kind of citizen for The New World Order!

We ask you to think of these things in terms of your sacred right and duty to raise your children in the manner and the faith in which you believe. Big Brother is already making children into humanists, criminals, or anarchists. Who was it Who referred to a good use for millstones? This should provide Biblical authority for action!

CAMP DAVID AFTERMATH

There is the truism which ends with "But you can't fool all of the people all of the time." It is also true that you can fool a majority of the people all of the time; especially a majority of U.S. Senators and Representatives. That's why our political leaders keep telling us that democracy is the best possible form of government. It also seems true that it doesn't take much effort to reverse a majority opinion and make yesterday's wrong today's right, especially with a majority of U.S. Senators and Representatives. Take, for example, the case of Jimmy Carter. Tom Wicker is an associate editor of "The New York Times" and while that Voice of Internationalism is temporarily silenced because of a strike, Wicker and others of the propaganda staff continue to operate the Times News Service, which sends out features to hundreds of dailies throughout the land. Tom Wicker's column for publication October 5th began:

"Suddenly Jimmy Carter is looking good....Perhaps not in modern history has so spectacular an achievement (the summit conference) so quickly redeemed a president whose standing had been so low. Only Richard Nixon's 'opening to China' comes to mind in comparison, and Mr. Nixon, in his first term, never slipped as far down in the polls as Mr. Carter did before Camp David." Then Wicker mentions some of the things that have happened because of Carter's new standing with the majority, especially the majority of U.S. Senators and Representatives: "...House and Senate conferees have agreed on a civil service reform bill that gives the White House most of what it wanted. Natural gas legislation, however tortured, has at last been agreed upon. A separate Department of Education is about to be approved in the Senate and sent to the House." Wicker neglected to mention that, thanks to the lobbying efforts of Carter and staff, the Senate would agree upon the extension of ERA ratification time.

Carter's success in all of these things is attributed to his success in the Camp David Conference. And this certainly should show us how quickly the majority opinion can be reversed and how easily the majority can be fooled, especially the majority of U.S. Senators and Representatives. The real facts being that Camp David may have been a success for Jimmy and Menahem, and maybe for the Rockefeller coterie as well; but it was a failure and a downright deception played upon the rest of the world. One of our correspondents who tells it like it is--L. Lee Layton, Jr. of Dover, Delaware--adds a variation to our theme. He writes:

"In the early days of radio, the quarter of an hour broadcast of Amos and Andy was tops. At one time, Andy displayed an insurance policy for $10,000 and, in his big, booming voice said, 'Amos, this gives us $10,000.' Amos, in his small piping voice replied, 'Yes, Andy. The big print gives it to you, but the small print takes it away!' From the September 18th Wilmington, Del. 'Morning News' in big headlines at the top: 'Summit Successful; Israel Agrees To Give Back Land.' But in the small print" 'Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai and full autonomy for Palestinians in Israel-occupied territories in five years...' Just as Amos said: 'The big print (in the headlines) gives it, but the small print (in the story) takes it away!'"

"Newsweek" of Oct. 9 utilizes the same technique. The headline reads "A Vote

For Peace." But the last paragraph of the article takes the vote away. Quote: "The settlements issue made it difficult for the U.S. to gain Arab backing for the Camp David agreements and last week Secretary of State Cyrus Vance returned from a five-day mission to Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Syria with no commitments of support." Initial reaction of the Saudis: Unacceptable. Of Jordan: Dangerous and apt to create armed hostility. Of Syria: a step-up of the war in Lebanon, worst in all the years of strife that have been visited upon that nation which is divided--like ancient Gaul--in three parts: Muslim, Christian, Palestinian, with Syria and the UN trying to police them all. Reaction of the other Arab states: the seeking of closer ties with the USSR, because they feel they can no longer trust the United States! As for the Palestinians, who were supposed to be given some kind of a homeland as a result of the Camp David Conference, here is what correspondent Dennis Mullin, of U.S.N. & W.R. wrote from the West Bank of the Jordan River:

"The vast majority of Palestinians here are political moderates. For the past 11 years they have preferred to live quietly under the Israelis while keeping a low profile. Responsibility for fighting their cause has been left to the PLA. Yet there is a growing political militancy among young Palestinians on the West Bank and in Gaza. Terrorist incidents against Jewish targets are increasing, and Israeli newspapers comment regularly on the proficiency and daring of the saboteurs... Mayor Khalaf (of Ramallah, a major West Bank city) asks: 'Why should a Jew from New York have the right to move here and take my land?' Moreover, the Palestinians do not believe that Israel is sincere in its pledge to make at least a partial military withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza. They see the Jewish settlements around them as only the first step in an Israeli master plan to take all the lands away." Said Mayor Khalaf, "In 10 years there will be another 2 million Jews living here. We are gradually being driven off our land." (End of quotes from U.S.N. & W.R. article).

Let's look at the current situation as a result of the Camp David agreements: Egypt is neutered. Other Arab states are thrown into the Soviet sphere of influence. Syria has begun a military operation designed to destroy all Christian factions in Lebanon. Israel has a secret agreement with those same Christian factions, promising them protection. Already there has been one clash between Syrian and Israeli forces. The U.S. is now committed as a "full partner" with belligerent Israel and neutered Egypt. If a full-scale conflict should develop between Syria and Israel as a result of the Camp David agreement, then here comes another "Vietnam syndrome," with U.S. troops actively aiding Israelis and the USSR actively assisting the Arabs. What makes this an ominous possibility are the words of an experienced and respected financial and economic analyst who insists that the American economy is in such a desperate state that we can expect a total collapse--or--there will be a war perpetrated to prevent such a collapse (as was the case when World War II was brought about). This is the aftermath of the Camp David Summit!

How did it all begin? Let's go back to 1939. From that time onward for the next eight years, three Zionist terrorist gangs (Haganah, Irgun and Stern) carried out the most dastardly crimes against the civilian Arab population, as well as against officials of the British Government stationed in Palestine. Quoting from a booklet published by the Palestinian Arab Delegation, titled "The Holy Land State," we are reminded that:

"Practically every political and military leader in the so-called Israel of today was a member of one of these three Zionist terrorist gangs. Menahem Begin (Current Prime Minister of Israel-Ed.) was the leader of the worst of them, the Irgun, which committed thousands of crimes, the most notable of which was the blowing up of the King David Hotel on July 23, 1947, when 91 persons were killed and 45 injured... In 1947 there were in Palestine 1,350,000 Muslim and Christian Palestinians who were indigenous, or born in Palestine; the others, 450,000 Jews, were immigrants and mostly aliens... During the hostilities between Zionists and Arabs in 1947 and 1948, Zionist armed forces, aided and abetted by the forces of Britain (Rothschild controlled), the Mandatory power, were able to occupy 80% of Palestine and expel by force and massacre, over 1 million of the indigenous Muslim and Christian Palestinians; and occupy Arab homes, lands, properties and all their possessions in 8 towns and 300 villages. It must be recalled that the Palestinian Arabs owned at that time over 94% of the lands of Palestine, and the Jews owned less than 6%." (End of quotation).

So much for the human background of the Camp David story, and for the reason why Palestinians and many residents of Israel distrust Begin, and why Arabs detest Anwar Sadat for seeking a separate peace with Israel. There is yet another part of this background story that is not being told Americans; the story of the maneuverings for financial power and economic control on the part of the International Bankers. We must be brief:

When there existed a great British Empire, there also was "The City," about a square mile of office and bank buildings, in the heart of commercial London, an area so independent that even the London Police had no authority over it. Here was (and still is) the Bank of England, the Rothschild Gold Exchange where the daily price of gold is announced, various financial institutions, all more or less dominated by the Rothschild interests. "The City's" money power ruled 87% of the British Empire and was dominant in world affairs for about two centuries. With the coming of the twentieth century came also the discovery of vast supplies of oil and the many uses to which oil could be put--the original John D. Rockefeller began by peddling crude oil as a remedy for cancer). This discovery of petroleum and its applications gave rise to a new money power which was--and is--dominated by the Rockefeller interests.

Thus there were two enormous money powers dominated, respectively, by the Rothschild interests in Europe, and the Rockefeller interests in America--two powers that cooperate generally, yet compete within the walls of high finance. This strange relationship is explained incidentally in an exclusive article on "The Mossad" in the Sept. 25, 1978 issue of "The Spotlight." Mossad is a Hebrew acronym for "Central Institute for Information and Espionage," described as "the CIA of Israel and the strong-arm service of World Zionism." According to George Nicholas of Spotlight, Mossad's major pursuits are "assassination, kidnapping, terrorism, currency manipulation, forgery, defamation and subversion--as well as the admitted pursuit of information and espionage." In a chart outlining the Mossad connections, there are listed five different "syndicates": The International Crime Syndicate headed by Meyer Lansky, the International Banking Syndicate headed by David Rockefeller, the International Flight Capital Syndicate headed by Bernard Cornfeld, the International Narcotics Syndicate headed by William Mellon Hitchcock, and the International Finance Syndicate headed by Baron Edmond de Rothschild. These five are then shown to converge into "Intertel," or "The International Casino Gambling Syndicate known publicly as "Resorts International," and headed by James Crosby, Chairman. "Intertel" is explained in these words: "CIA, FBI, Customs, IRS, NSA and other high Federal intelligence officials recruited from US government and organized into mysterious private network." The whole story of Mossad is told in "The Spotlight" of Sept. 25; but of special importance to our thesis in this newsletter is the explanation printed beneath the large chart. It reads in part: "David Rockefeller's banking empire is distinguished, despite overlaps, from the Rothschild's finance syndicate because Chase Manhattan will cash checks and perform other normal services while putting together billion-dollar multinational deals, but Rothschild specializes only in financing big ventures. The Rothschilds and Rockefellers are both charter Bilderbergers, and rivals in the power struggles within that super-secret organization."

The rivalry between Rockefeller and Rothschild interests is important if we are to understand the Middle East enigma. The Rothschilds financed the creation of the state of Israel, while the Rockefellers concentrated on the oil that lay beneath the desert lands of Arab states bordering Palestine. Rockefeller, of course, found it necessary to cater to the Zionists (even as does the visible government of the U.S.). But Rockefeller's chief concern was oil. L. Lee Layton, Jr. notes: "At a Bilderberger meeting a couple of years ago the Rockefellers were shocked to learn they had helped to build up Israel to such strength that it could wreck the Arab nations. So now the latter might be blackmailed into withdrawing all their billions of dollars of deposits from the New York banks, thus toppling the Rockefeller empire--and down with it would fall the whole American economy." It was for this reason that the Rockefellers talked the Saudis into coercing Sadat of Egypt into going to Jerusalem, thus starting this whole series of steps leading up to the Camp David Summit. It is also the reason why the Rockefeller interests are trying to destroy the U.S. dollar as an international exchange unit, replacing it with some new kind of paper currency...but that's another story.

The one direct result of the Rockefeller-Rothschild rivalry was Rockefeller's creation of the Trilateral Commission and, in retaliation, Rothschild's moves to strengthen the monetary and political importance of the European Common Market.

There were two cooperating yet competing world money powers: the Rockefeller interests and the Rothschild interests. There also were two cooperating yet competing international organizations dealing with world money power. There was the World Bank-IMF combine, and there also was the European based Bank for International Settlements. BIS was established at Basel, Switzerland in 1930 as "an institution for cooperation among the central banks of the various countries." At the Bretton Woods Conference of 1944 when the World Bank and IMF were established, Harry Dexter White and Maynard Keynes tried to force the liquidation of BIS, but the central bankers of Western Europe rejected the idea. So BIS has been of assistance in the promotion of the Regional Government known as the European Economic Community, and in the creation of the new gold-backed ECU currency. Principal difference between the two organizations: World Bank-IMF promotes the use of unbacked paper currency like the SDR and the Trilateral Commission's suggested new currency; while BIS insists upon dealing with gold-backed currency. Hence the new ECU.

About ten years ago a new money power emerged: the Arab World Petrodollar. As the dollar weakened, OPEC billionaires began buying up U.S. banks, industries, real estate, anything with intrinsic value. Noe OPEC is threatening to renounce the dollar, demand gold-back ecus in exchange for their oil. Thus the double danger of economic collapse. And when collapse is feared, Powers prepare for war. Is this to be the Camp David Aftermath?

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

When one United States Congress expires and a new U.S. Congress is waiting to be formed and convened in the new year, the same thing is happening with State Congresses and, to a lesser extent, with County and local public offices. This provides an interlude when political activity is different: now legislators are not voting for or against bills, people are voting for or against legislators. It is inevitable that, at such a time, records of incumbents are discussed and the promises of challengers are considered. It is also a time when unfinished business is talked about and appropriate action considered: business such as the Panama Canal treaties, the ERA controversy, the U.S. Government attitude towards Rhodesia and the Republic of South Africa, the SALT treaty, the plans for national health insurance, a new Department of Education, the Middle East question and out part in it, inflation, price and wage controls, and many other important matters of unfinished business.

During this interlude when there is no Congress to do anything either good or bad, there is an opportunity for the voters to take actions that will change the political complexion of the next Congress, and possibly bring about better solutions to these pieces of unfinished business. Let's list a few of the problems that should be on the patriot's action agenda:

PANAMA CANAL. We place the Canal on the list of unfinished business because, as Congressman Robert Dornan (R-CA) said: "We have not yet lost our American Canal in Panama... There is still one more test the treaties must withstand. This test is in the form of enabling legislation which the House of Representatives must pass for the Carter-Torrijos agreements to go into effect. Without passage of this legislation, there will be no more money provided to implement the treaties....the treaties cannot go into effect until March 31 of 1979. While the upper legislative chamber has acted, it is still incumbent upon that legislative body which is closest to the American people to finally decide the outcome for all time. It is up to us, the Congress of the people, to finally render a verdict." That verdict will depend upon the composition of the next, the 96th Congress of the United States. This, then, is one of the key questions to be asked of every candidate running for a seat in the next House of Representatives: "Would you vote for the appropriations necessary to carry out the terms of the Panama Canal treaties?" If his answer is "yes," or "I'll have to take it under advisement," or some similar evasion, then do your best to keep that man off the public payroll." Also, there is the "Dishonor Roll," those 68 Senators who voted for the treaties. Those whose terms expire this year are Senators whose terms should be expired forever. They are: Sparkman, AL; Haskell, CO; Biden, DE; Nunn, GA; Percy, IL; Clark, IA; Huddleston, KY; Hathaway, ME; Brooke, MA; Anderson, MN; McIntyre, NH; Case, NJ; Hatfield, OR; Pell, RI; Baker, TN.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT. The "Unfairness Doctrine" triumphed in the Senate Oct. 4th. The 35 States that votes for ERA cannot rescind their votes and the three more States that are needed have until March 22, 1979 to vote for ERA. However, there will be court challenges on this unfair time extension, as well as on the alleged inability of States to rescind their votes, as four States already have. Phyllis Schlafley, who has spearheaded this citizens' fight against ERA has vowed that "we have only begun to fight," and she deserves every assistance it is possible to give her. There is a very important reason for the need to defeat ERA: the National Organization of Women (NOW) and the lesbian groups are looking to passage of ERA as a signal to "take over the country." It seems that they mean this literally; at least that's the way they were said to be talking at a recent lesbian gathering in New York City. They want to establish a matriarchy and take control of the government as well as society. With the production of "test-tube babies" and utilization of hoped-for developments in the science of cloning, they aim to make men mere chattel (as they say they have been up to the time of ERA), and babies can be raised and educated by the state, in child care centers, as in Soviet Russia. NOW President is Eleanor Smeal, and she told her followers after the ERA vote in the Senate, that their immediate goals would be "more women appointed to judgeships, more day care facilities, national health insurance, better treatment facilities for rape victims, the "right to choose" abortions, and gay rights. "We'll not be intimidated any longer to remain silent on these things," she said. "We have just begun. We know the real opponent is not the Schlafleys.... The real opponent is the people..." So, they're going after society as a whole, to change it and make it more appealing to a lesbian tribe of modern Amazons.

Tied in with the campaign of the libs and the lesbians is the resurgence of the gay rights issue, which of course applies to all sexual aberrants. Telling the story of this resurgence far better than we could do it, is an open letter from Anita Bryant of "Protect America's Children," which appeared in the Oct. 8 issue of The Miami Herald. We quote:

"Dear Fellow Citizens: It is sad for our community that the wounds of a year and a half ago have been savagely re-opened by the people who callously refuse to recognize reality. Now they want us to vote again on whether to grant special privileges to militant homosexuals—even though they were defeated June a year ago by 2½ to 1. The people of Dade County dislike having to go back to the polls to re-state what is obvious. The people of Dade County don't want to persecute homosexuals. The people of Dade County don't want to re-hear the hysteria of this sad segment of society. Therefore, the leadership of Protect America's Children, representing a cross section of our community, will not appear jointly with the irresponsible elements who have re-introduced the controversy. However, as in the past, we will speak out responsibly and act with dignity to inform the citizenry. We will fully expose this proposed pro-homosexual ordinance for the dangerous law it represents. Sincerely, Anita Bryant Green, President".

It is important to realize fully what Dean Clarence Manion, a respected constitutional authority, said about ERA: "The amendment says absolutely nothing about women. On the contrary, it reads as follows: 'Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.' What would be protected by ERA would be the unlimited right of men, women and children to be as sexual as each or any of them please. Laws prohibiting explicit sex acts in public or even on TV would then be unconstitutional. So also would be all anti-abortion laws, and laws against marriage of two men to each other, or the marriage of two women to each other. Laws against rape would be questionable. Homosexuality and lesbianism would automatically be legalized and whoever interfered with such activities would be subject to a civil suit for damages. Thus the ERA would not be a protection merely for the rights of women. It would be a protection for abortifacient murder and all forms of degeneracy." No wonder the lesbians look upon the passage of ERA as merely their starting point in fighting "the people" and in establishing their matriarchy!

THE TAX REVOLT. Tabled in a House Committee is Joint Resolution 23. It is to be reintroduced in the next, 96th Congress, and pressure for its passage will have mounted because of the successful passage in California of Proposition 13 and the expected passage of similar tax-reduction measures in other States in the upcoming elections. HJR 23 is more important than Proposition 13 because it is federal in nature and it gets closer to the real causes of inflation as well. We quote:

TAXES ARE REVOLTING, WHY AREN'T YOU?

Federal taxes are too high and must be reduced;
